TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE AND HIS SPECIAL GOOD LORD, ROBERT ERLE OF LEY-CESTER, BARON OF DENBYGH, KNIGHT OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER, ONE OF THE QVEENES MAIESTIES MOST HONORABLE priuie Counsell, &c. Grace, mercie, peace and truthe in Christe.

L men can skill to complayne vwith Iob, that this short life of ours is fraught vwith many miseries, afflictions, and aduersities, and verie experience shewveth it to be so. For vve see dayly in others and feele also in ourselues, the continual perils and crosses that beseege vs and perce vs to the hart, euen from the time of our birth too the giuing vp of our lastgasp. VVe find them painful, irkosome and tediousse to vs, and therfore vwe vwould faine shif them of. But in the meane vvhyle, do vve looke vp to the hand that smiteth vs, do vve consider the causes vwhy they belayd vpon vs, do vve seeke out the ends vvhervnto they tend? or haue vve an eye to the fruts and effects of them? Nay rather degenerating into a kind of bruyishnesse and hanging our heads groueling downe to the groundward, wee eyther imagin them to growe out of the earth, or impute them to the influence of the skies, or fater the vpon fortune, or attribute them vnto men, or vvyte the vpon the vnhappinesse of the time, or tie the to the place, or finally stand amazed at the afstisitions themselues, surmizing any thing rather thā the truthe, as vwho should say that God eyther could not or vwould not gouerne all things by his only vwill and prouidence, vwhich is as much as to denie that there is any God at all. By reason vvhervof vve seeldome or neuer enter into ourselues to consider our ovne state and the inestimable goodnesse of our God, to think how iustly vve haue deserued too bee scourged for our sinnes, and how farterly he dealeth vwith vs in clensing the corruption of our infected nature, and in shewving the perfectnesse of his mightie povver in these frayle earthen vessels of our vveake and mortall bodies. None of these things do we take heede of: and therfore much lesse do we looke so farre afore vs, as to consider that the end vwhy God scourgeth vs, is to bring vs backe againe to him by repenteance, that he myght shewve himself a mercifull fater to vs, and heape vp his benefits and gracieuse gifis vpon vs, too our greater comfort. VVe consider not that the end of vvorldey afflications is alvvayes happie too such as feare him, and that the short induring of the troubles of this life, procureth an inestimable vveight of glorie in the life to come. Finally vvee consider not that God being our maker and gouernor, hath by good right a soueraine dominion ouer vs and al other his creatures; too order and dispoze vs at his good vwill and pleasure, and that the same his doing is vvrouted by incomprehensible, povver, vvisdome, and righfulness, so as there cannot iustly arrie fault or blamie be found in any of his proceedings. By meanes vvhervof it commeth to passe, that if he giue vs ease and prosperitie, vvc be so farre off from thāfulnessse for the same, that vve mount vp into pryde, and not only step forth to disdeyning and skorning of thoseto vvhō he hath giuen lesse abilitie: but also procede to the vtter forgetting & despising of his maiestie, as though vve had al things of our selues, & vvere not beholding to him for any thing. And if he touch vs eyther in our goods, bodie, name or otherwise to our mislyking: then eyther vve storne, chafe and fret against him, (specially if vve seen not an apparent cause of his doings) vwherin vvee blasphemē him by accusing him indirectly of unrightuousenesse: or else vve fal into despaire, thinking it vnpossible for vs to scape out of the present daunger, vwherin vve bereue him of his cheef glorie, vwhich is to shew mercie by persevering the afflited, and by raysing vp such as are vnder foote. Thus (as much as in vs is) vvee vtterly shake off his yoke, taking him to be nother our fater nor oure God. Heerby it is manifest, that vwheras euery of vs hath the name of patience in his mouth, fewe knowve vwhat right patience is, and in maner none at alldoo put it in vre. Some think it too be a stout bearing out of aduersities without admitting anie greef or hartbyting for the same. And othersome take it to be a yeelding to the present affliction vpon hope too outvveare it by length of tyme. But none of these tvaynec is the true patience, vwhich is allowved of God, and meete to be in a Christen man, as vwill appere to the diligent reader of this present vvoork. For the one is but a lingering in distresle vwithout certaintie of good issue, and the other is but a dulling and amasing of the senses, to make mannes nature more stuppeorne against Gods hand, vwhich is too stuppeorne of it selfe alredye. God therfore knowving the frovardnesse of mankind, & minding eyther to bring vs home to himself or to leave vs vtterly vnexcuzable: doeth in this booke purposely aboue al other parts of the holie Scripture, bothe defend his ovne Maiestie in mainteyning his ryghtful soueraintie ouer al his creatures: & also set dovn a perfect paterne of patiēce, conteyning the due obedience and subiectiō of the creature too his maker. These are the twoo cheef points vvherypon the vvhole booke of Job is grounded. In the discourse vvhe: of, there is shewved the incessant desitousenesse and indeuet of Satan too bring man too destruction: and mannes vrabilitie too stand against him, vwithout the speciall prouidence and protection of God. VVhereof, the first vvarneth vs too stand alvvayes vpon our gard, that vvee be not surprised by our so futtle and cruell enimie: and the other berceth vs of all selftrust, driving vs to seeke our refuge and succour novvhere else but in God. And too the intent vvce may the more vvillingly suffer all crosses, and take all things in good vvoorth at Gods hand: it is shewved that God never forlaketh vs in our troubles, but vpholdeth and maynteyneth vs euē in our vitermoste extremities, by a secret and incomprehensible vvoorking, not alvvayes seene of the vworld, nor prelenty perceyued of ourselues: and that his afflicting of vs is not for anye hatted or ill vwill of purpose to destroy vs, but of a faterly louing-kyndnesse, to make vs knovve better bothe our selues and him, vwhich is the soueraine goodnessse and perfect felicitie. and therfore that he alvvayes giueth them a happie end, to our singular vvelfare and saluation, making vs to triumph viitoriously ouer sin, death, hell, the diuell, damnation, our selues and all the assaults of the vworld, through the tryal of our fayth, vwhich by that meanes becommeth more fine and preciouse than golde. Again, to the end that the vvicked may not think theselues to haue sped the better by Gods long forbeating of thē, and by their hardening of their harts against his manaces, and vvarnings: it is told them, that the longer that God vvincketh at thē, the heauyer his hand vwill be vpon thē, and that vvheras these temporall afflictions are but svvere chastizements and assurances of Gods inestimable loue, and of eternall revward too the Godlye: they are too the others sharp punishments in this vworld, and authenticall vvarrants of Gods vtter displeasure, and as it vvere foretastes of their ovne vnauydable damnation in the vworld too come. Thus is the prude of our rebelliousse iature beaten dovyne on all sides, that by learning true humilitie, vve might receyue the comfort vvhich God giueth to his chosen. Manie other notable doctrines are diuersly interlaced: as, that Gods vvornderful vvoorking in his creatures and in the order of nature, ought to leade vs to the knovvledge of the creator: That vvc ought not to be inquisitiue of Gods secrets further than he listeth to vte: them vnto vs, not negligent in seeking so farre foorth as he shewveth them: That his only vword is the absolute and onely sufficient rule, to dire& the religion and liues of all men in alcaces and all respects: That nothing in all the vvhole vworld happeneth by casualtie, but all things are guided and gouerned too their appoynied ends by the foredeterminate purpose and prouidence of God: That man being corrupted by originall sin in the fall of Adam, hath not anye enterance of reconciliation, nor any continuance of attonement vvith God, but by the mediator, through the only free mercie and gift of God: and finally (vvith innumerable other like) that there is no difference of the Ievv or Gentile, Greeke or Barbarouse, learned or vnlerned, hygh or lowe, or of anye other state or persone before God, but that vho soever serueth him faithfully and vnfeynedly, the same is accepted of him as his decre chyld, notwithstanding that he seeme not too bee vwithin the bounds of the visible church. Herevnto are added the duties of al degrees, states, and callings, vvith a perfect paterne of a pure and vncorrupted life, specially in those vvhom God hath aduaunced to honour, vvelth or authoritic, to the intent they should be as it vvere bright mirrours of Gods Maiestie vpon earth, by sheding soorth the light of their vertues to the good example of others, in preseruing the common vvelth by justice and pollicie, and in maynteyning Gods Religion. For it is manifest that Job vwas not of the meaner sort of men, but comparable (bothe in riches and authoritic) vvith the greatest men in his tyme, and farre aboue the most of those that beare greatest poste and countenance in these dayes. Therfore vnto all such as loue the true nobilitie, (vvhich descendeth not too posteritic by ryght of inheritance, nor is purchaced by riches, fauour, or any vworldly meanes, but is the free gift of God, consisting in the excellencie of the mynd of the possesser, and not i the opinion of the variable multitude) it shall bee verie good too consider, not only the generall commendacion vwhich the holie Ghoste giueth vntoo Job, in that he calleth him a soundman, euen such a one as feared God and eschevved euil : but also the particular protestations vwhich Job himself maketh in the xxix. and xxxij. chapters, and in the xxv. verse of the xxx. chapter of this booke. For there in defence of his innocencie against the vvrongfull surmisess of his freendes, he setteth dovvne xvij. poynts, vwheroft although some do fitly agree to the common life of al Christians: yet do they all linke vvholy together intoo the nature of true nobilitie, and belong cheefly to such as are of moste preheminence:and vwithout them no man can iustly account himself to be noble or honorable. The first point is the comly and reuerend grauitie of his persone, vwherethrough he vvas feared of his interiours, honored of his equalls, esteemeed of his superiours, and loued of all good and honest men. The second is his pitifulnesse tovwards the distressed, as vwell in feeling inward compassion and greet for their miseries, as also in comforting, cheering, succoring and helping them. The third is his stouinesse and vigilaniesse in executing of iustice, so as he ministred ryght to euery man indifferently vwithout respect of persones, boulting out the truthe of thirgs that vvere cloked or vnknovvne, punishing open enormities though they vvere not presented nor complayned of, and himself pleading and maynteyning the ryghtfull caces of the ignorant and such as vvanted abilitie too help themselves. The fourth is the vndefiled chastitie of his bodie proceeding from the chastnesse of a pure hart, so as he did not cast anye levvd or vvanton fancie tovwards any mannes vvyfe or daughter. The fift is his playne dealing, in vter absteyning from all deceyt, crastinessse and guyle. The sixth is his stedfastnesse, in that he could not bee allured by the intytement of his eyes, nor prouoked by flatterie, too step aside from the truthe, or too commit anye vnseemly thing. The seventh is his gentle clemencie, in suffering his bond seruantes and vnderlings too reason their caces vwith him vvhien they thought thenselfes vronged, and in yeelding them ryght euен against himselfe. The eyght is his speedie dispatching of mennes sutes, so as he suffered them not too pyne vwith long lingring. The nynth is his liberalitie in maynteyning such as vvere destitute of liuing. Therenth is his abstinence in forbearing too doo anye man vvrong, hurt or hinderance, notwithstanding that he myght scape vncontrolled for it. The eleuenth is his hating of couetousnesse, in that no vvelth nor riches could infect his hart. The twelft is his stayednesse, in that no abundance could make him proud to disdeyne others, or to set more store by himselfe, or to haue the less care and regard of God. The thirteenth is the noblenesse of his hart, in that hee vvas so farre from reioycing at the fall of his enimies, that he rather pitied their miseries, and could not by anye meanes bee persuaded too bee reuenged of them, or too speake euill of them. The fourteenth is his hospitalitie, in giuing interteynement too straungers and such as vvanted releef. The fifteenth is his lovelinessse, in that hee vvas contented too heare of his faultes, and cloked not his sinne vvhien hee had doone amisse, but suffered him selfe too bee reproued euen of his vnderlings. The sixteenth is his iuste and vpryght dealing vwith his Tenants, in paying them truely for vhatsoever hee tooke of them, and in not oppressing them vwith greeuouse rentes, incommes, or seruices. And finally (vwhich is the verie vvelspring of all vertue, the moother of all true nobilitie, and (as ye vwould saye) the verie locke and keye of all good conuersation among men) he protesteth that he had God alvvayes before his eyes, or (vwhich is all one) that he vvas of a pure, sound, and vncorrupt Religion. For too feare God, is not too bee afayde of him as the bondman is of his Lord, the Trevvand of his Schoolemayster, or the theef of the galovves : but too conceyue such an invward reuerence of him, by reason of his iustice, mercie, vvisdome, povver, prouidence, and ryghtuosenesse, as too thinke him vvoorthie of all honour and obedience, and too yeeld the same vvillingly and hartely vntoo him, so as vvee vwould bee lothe and sorie too offend him, euen though vvee myght bee sure too scape vnpunished. The onely meanes too bring vs vwherenvntoo, is the ryght knowving of his holie vwoord and the stedfast cleaving therenvntoo, vwithout svvaruing one vway or other, and vwithout taking leauue too doo anye thing that is not vvaarranted there. This feare of God caused Job too dravve his eyesight alvvayes invward, and too looke onely vntoo Gods vwill, not regarding eyther vwhat his ovne affections and lustes stirred him to, or vwhat his povver, riches, and authoritie inabled him too doo, or vwhat any outvward occasions and oportunitiess moued him too, or vwhat the intyementes of the vworld and the persuasions of men allured him too doo, or finally, vwhat fame or infamie, gayne or losse, loue or hatred, or anye thing else prouoked him too doo, but vwhat he knevve ought too bee doone of ryght, equitie, reason, and conscience. For vvhien mennes eyes (I meene their myndes and vvittes, vwhich are in deede the very eyes or lampes oflyght too the vwhole man) are occupied outvwardly: eyther they rushe foorth into all levvdnessse and become vtterly vvicked, like vvild horses that haue cast their ryders, and run looce vwhither soever their furie inforceeth the,

and the greater that such persones, are the more harme do they bothe by deede and by example: or else they be dazled vwith the glittering gloſe of vainglorie, accompanied vwith feare of punishment or hope of revvard, and ſo finally fall into the ſound ſleepe of ſenſleſſe hypocriſie, doing all things in obedience of their ovnē vvill, and not of Gods vvill. These later ſort are tolerable in the aſtive and ciuyl life, and oftentimes do greate good bothe to their neyghbouts, and to the vvhole common vveale, but neuer to themſelues, bycauſe their good doing ſpringeth not from the right roote, vvhich is the hartie obedience of God, ne tendeth to the right end vvhich is the only glorie of God: and therfore they may vveil bee likened to the ſhipvrights that buiſled the Ark of Noe, and yet periſhed themſelues in the flud. But the other ſort do good nothir to themſelues nor to others, except it be againſt their vvills, vvhē God maketh them an enſample of his rightful iuſtiſe, by giuing them the due revvard of their vvickedneſſe. Hovvbeit foralſmuchas theſe things together vwith all other points before rehersed in this epiftle, are largely and ſubſtantially diſcuffed by the faithfull and learned ſeruant of God Maiftre Iohn Caluin in theſe Sermons of hiſ vpon the booke of Job, and it vvere an vnſeemly thing for an vnexpert ſcholer to vvyte the battell of Troy again after Homer, as the Proverb ſayth: I vvil not be tedious in vwithholding your L. long from the reading of the Sermons themſelues. Neuertheleſſe I haue presumed vpon your L. patience to ſet dovvne this foreſayd breſt abſtract of thiſ vvoork, to the intent your honour and all other noble men (to whom cheeffly vnder our moſt graciouſe loueraine Ladie Queene Elizabeth, the care of Gods Religion and of thiſ common vveale belongeth) beholding the groundvvoork and as it vvere the platiorme of ſo manye excellent matters, and therevpon conſidering the goodneſſe, neceſſarieneſſe, and profitableneſſe therof to the vvhole churche of God, and too the furtherance of eche mannes ſaluation, might like the better of the boooke, (as I doubt not but that the oftener your L. shall reade any part of it, the better you vvill like it) and by yout vvellyking cauſe it too bee the more imbraced of others to their ſingular comforit, edifying and vvfelrare. For although the books of holiſ scripture take no authortie or credit of man, but haue a ſingular kind of ſpirit, lyfe, and vvoorkfulneſſe in themſelues: Yet notwithstanding foralſmuchas it is incident to the nature vvelneere of all inferioures, to regard or negleſt euē the beſt things, according as their ſuperiors ſeeme to make more or leſſe account of them, and vvheng godly and vvel diſpoſed men haue taken peines to open the Scriptures to the vndeſtanding and capacitie of the people, their doings and vviriting are oftentymes moſe ſlighty and negligently receyued than they deserue to be: The vvellyking of ſuch noble men and magistrats as God hath moreouer innobled vwith the knovvledge of hiſ Goſpell, is a greate furtherance too the good accepting of bothe of them among all inferiour degrees, and God looketh to be ſo glorified at their hands. VVherfore I humbly commend thiſ woork, together with my traſlation therof, vnto your good L. accuſtomed fauour, wherof I haue had ſo often triall heretofore in accepting of diuers works of mine, though conteyning good, commendable, and godly matters, yet not of like ſubſtance, importance and trauell vnto thiſ. And my truſt is that your goodneſſe, bothe in reſpect of the newyere, (vnder the benefit wherof I am the bolder to preſent it as a token of my bound dutie and thankful mynd towards your honour,) and alſo in reſpect of the woork it ſelf, (which being aduizedly red will doubtleſſe yeeld much more frute than can be exprefſed in woords): will beare with my faults and imperfections where any ſhall occurre. For although my conſciencē beare me wiſneſſe that I haue delt playnly and faithfully in al reſpects, and not ſtepped aside willingly in any poyn̄t from the beaten path: and although ſome may think it ſtroung that he which aduentureth vpon ſo greate and weightie works, ſhould in any wife ſecke excuse of ignorance or ouerſight: yet notwithstanding foralſmuchas I knowe the generall infirmite of mannes nature, how eaſie it is to ſlip vnwares, and thiſ woork is the firſt of any greate weyght that euer I traſlated out of the French toong to be published, I craue it as a ſpeciall fauour to my ſelf, and as a benefite to the Churche of God, that where any fauks ſhall be found I may bee made priuie to them, and I will bee as forward as the forwardeſt to amend them. Thus beſeeching God to graunt your L. to ſee many happy and proſperouſe newyeres vpon thiſ Realme, and vpon the Churche of God furthered and aduaunced by your good counſell and indeuer, to the increaſe of your owne honour bothe heere and in the world to come, I humbly take my leaue. # TO AL GENTLE READERS, GREETING.

Fewer men needed to learne what patience is: surely the state of this present time ought to leade yea and to drawe them to it. For if we looke well about vs, we shall finde that there hath not bin almost any Realme or countrie, wherin God hath not vittered great scourges. If ye demaund the cause: it is evident, so as euen the blind (as ye would say) may see it. Let the old men that are now alyue consider the wicked things which they haue seene committed commonly, since they were first able to remember, vnto this day: and must they not needs say (as it was sayd of the tyme of the generall flood) that all flesh hath corrupted his wayes vpon earth, that all is full of extorcion and outrage, and that such as beare the name of Christians do (as sayeth Sainct Peter) fulfill the waye of the heathen, by living in shamefulness, pride, lecherie, drunkennesse, gluttonie, quaffing and abominable ydolatrie? But like as it is good to knowe the causes of the aduersities that happen, to the intent that men may the better bethink themselues, to amend as well publikly as privately: so is it ryght necessarie to be sensed with true patience, that we sink not vnder the burthen whē Gods scourges continue long vpon vs, for euen that also is one of the points of the amendment which he requireth of vs. Neuerthelesse, it is a thing that cannot be learned ellwhere than in Gods woord. For although the auncient Philosophers and other wyse men of the world haue spoken of it and giuen certaine rules of it: yet was there neuer any man found that for all his learning therof in their schoole, could shewe that he knewe what it is at the neede and when it commeth too the putting of it in vre. And in verie deede euen those that tooke vpon them (as I sayd) to teach others, besids that their doctrine was vnperfēct in itself, most commonly wist not where they were when it came to the point that they should haue practized it in daungers: and those that did best, shewed I wote not what a resemblance of patience, which being more neerly considered was cleane contrarie. Therfore not without cause doeth the Apostle Sainct Paule send vs too the whole scripture too learne patience and comfort: according also as in another text he sayeth, that the end of the scripture is to make a man perfect and readye in all good woorks. But yet among the books of Scripture, the booke of Iob is commended too vs by name for that purpose by the Apostle Sainct Iames. And the verie bare reading of the storie, sheweth sufficiently that it is not without cause. Neuerthelesse, it is not to bee doubted, but that the help of a good expounder is verie profitable euen to the skilfullest, and likewise necessarie in common, for the better knowing and vnderstanding of the diuersitie of the matters, and for the furtherance of a mannes owne profiting in the doctrine that is conteyned in it. That is it which hath moued certaine good men, too putforth this yeere The Sermons of the faithfull seruant of God and his Churche Maister Iohn Caluin, vpon the booke of Iob, notwithstanding that he himself which is the author of them, and at whose mouth they were gathered, withstoode it as much as he could, according as he hath doone with his other Sermons. Furthermore although other men of knowledge haue traueld too give a more easie vnderstanding of this booke by their wrytings, yet notwithstanding, besides that these Sermons are in the common Frēche toung: his maner of handling the doctrine thereof is so playne and well framed to the capacite of the grossest sorte (as yee woulde terme them) howbeit without omitting any needfull things, and moreouer so applied one way and other to the behoof of the present tyme, that surely all such as intend to judge vprightly and without malice, shall find good helpe heere, wherwith to content themselues. For proof wherof, it is not now needful to shew a summe of the book, or of the cheef points of doctrine & of the vse of the same diuerse ways. For besids that he shall better find it here and there in reading his Sermons: the first cōteyneth a sufficient discourse, and yet verie short to be easily borne in mynd. Howsoever the case stand, if those that reade the wholē, bee folke that haue already left idolatrie, and giuen themselues to the doctrine of the Gospele: they shal find heere wherwith to further themselues still more and more in the knowlēdge of God and of our Lord Iesus Christ, and specially to strengthen themselues with right patience in their aduersities. Or if they be such as haue not yet knowne or listed to discerne the true Religion, to frame themselues thereaftē by leauing the false Religions, what occasion so ever hath letted them, yet being warned by the doctrine of this booke so chawed to them as they shal finde it, and cheefly being wakened by Gods extraordinarie iudgement in Iobs persone, which they shall see there laydfoorth and declared at length: they shall bee prepared to bethinke themselves better, and too take profit of the greate number of aduersities which are seene nowadayes in the world, and of farre greater wherwith it is verie likely that God threateneth men for the greate and open despizing of his Gospele. For althoough the things that are happened this yeere, as well in his punishments layd vpon the wicked sort and the enimies of Christ, as in his chastizements layd vpon the faithfull, bee verie terrible: Yet notwithstanding forasmuch as verie fewe amende, and contrariwise most men growe more spitefull in fighting against Iesus Christ, and some having begonne to do well wex rechelesse againe, yea and viterly turne away: there is none other thing too bee looked for, but that he will continue too smite still. So then, the first sort shall haue to consider, that if Iob being a sound and righiuouse man that feared God and eschewed euill, (according as it is witnessed of him) and living so long tyme before the comming of our Lord Iesus Christ and the greate light of the Gospele, was handled so straungely at Gods hand who loued him: and that the same was to the end that his patience should be tried: it is no maruell though wee now in these latter dayes, vnder the reigne of Iesus Christ, haue now and then many crosses to beare, and bee for our peculiār faults chastized with strype vpon strype at the hand of the liuing God, who notwithstanding loueth vs, for the seruing of whom according to his woord, we be turned from ydolls vnto him, as sayeth Sainct Paule to the Thessa'oniāns. The secōd sort shal haue to think & bethink, yea and to chaw as their cudde, that if God do so shake the rodde in his hand ouer those that are alreadye reclamed to his lure, to bridle the and make them walk right forward throughout: and that if he haue gone that way to woork with Iob as is reported heere, who notwithstanding had bene as an Angell in the world, in indeuering to do his dutie to God and man: VVhat is likely to lyght vpon themselues, if they not in generall amend and vtterly forsake their foolish, shamefull, and wicked ydolatrie, and particularly the manifest contempt of God wherof they be full, living at this day as Epicures and Atheists : and moreouer, some their whoredome and bauderie, some their drunkeynesse and gluttonie, (according as there be some countries that are specially giuen therunto) some their ambitious pompe, some their vayne worldliness, some their snatching and extortion as wel pryuate as publik, and othersome their crueltie and insatiable desire to shed mannes blud, in spight of all lawes and too the confusion of all ciuill order among men ? They shall (say I) haue this little word of saint Peters too wey, which ought to astonish them more than all the thunderclappes that ever rattled in the aire : that is to wit, that if chastizement begin at the house of God, and at those which are the true Christians : what shall the end of these bee, which rebell against Gods Gospell, and if the rightuouse do hardly scape, where shal the wicked and sinfull appere? Behold the thing that all the good seruants of God, and all faithfull preachers of the Gospel do brotherly pray for at this day, as me haue done heretofore. Behold, the thing that all the little flocks of the reformed churches dispersed heere and there do pray for: Behold, the thing that euen Iesus Christ (as yee would saye) in his owne person prayeth for : is that they may by him be reconcyled to God, and receyue his grace in such wyse, as it may not be in vayne. And it is to be hoped that God of his greate mercie will yet notwithstanding bring manye of that sort to such chaunge, as he will make them true and earnest followers of the Gospell, as he hath done oft heretofore. Notwithstanding, if any or many of them being so intreated for Iesus Christs sake, do harden themselues : let such vnderstand that they shal not scape Gods hand at the last day, and it may be that they shal feele it yet sooner to their greate confusion . For it is he whose preheminence and none others is in controuersie at this day: and which shal of a truthe get the vpper hand of all his enimies early or late, whatsoeuer betyde. He is willing to haue pitie vpon his creatures, and by word he giueth comfort and patience to all such as are pinched: but specially he comforteth those that are alreadye vnder his banner, graunting them to haue peace in him, although they haue none in the world. Amen.

God punislieth the pride of such as trust in their owne VVisdome in inferior things. 477.b.29.

God blindeth the wise euen in worldly things, much more in the secrets of his Gospell, and therfore wee ought not to be offended when we see the VVise of the world haue no tast of the Gospell. 305.b.36. & 50.

VVish

VVe may VVish for nothinge, which wee ought not to pray for. 109 a 35.

VVit, robbeth God of his honour.
477.b.51.

God will punish such as apply theyr wittes to naughtie purposes. 477.b.53.

The cause why the Papists and heretiks stand so stify to the Articles that are in cōtroversie between them and vs, is for that they trust more too their owne VVitte than to the scriptures.
636.b.30.

The Sermons of Maister John Caluin vpon the booke of Job.

Pag 1.

The first Sermon vpon the first Chapter.

There vvas in the lande of Hus a man named Job, sounde and vpright, fearing God, and vwithdravving himselfe from euill.

HE BETTER TO profit our selues by that which is conteined in this present booke, first and formost it behoueth vs to understande the summe of it. For the storie here written, sheweth vs howe we be in Gods hande, and that it lyeth in him to determine of our lyfe, and to dispose of the same according to his good pleasure: and that it is our dutie to submit our selues vnto him with al humblenesse and obedience: and that it is 20 good reason, that we shoulde bee wholly his, bothe to live and dye: and specially that when it pleaseth him to lay his hand vpon vs, although we perceiue not for what cause he doth it, yet we shoulde glorify him continually, acknowledging him to be iust and vpright, and not to grudge against him, nor fall to striuing with him, assuring our selues that we shal always be vanquished in pleading against him. So then, the thing that we haue briefly to beare in mynde in this storie, is, that God hath suche a soueraintie ouer his creatures, as he may dispose of them at his pleasure: and 30 that when he sheweth any rigour which we think straunge at the first blushe, yet notwithstanding we must holde our peace, and not grudge, but rather confess that he is ryghtuous, and wayt till he shewe vs wherfore he chastizeth vs. And herewithall we haue to beholde the patientnesse of the man that is sette heire before oure eyes, according as Saint Iames exhorteth vs. For when God sheweth vs that we ought to beare all the miseries that he shall send vpon vs: wee can well afoorde to confess that it is oure duetie so to doo: but yet therewithall wee alledge oure owne 40 frayltie, and wee beare oure selues in hande, that that ought to serue for our excuse. VVherfore it is good for vs to haue suche examples, as shewe vnto vs how there haue bene other men as fraile as we, who neverthelesse haue resisted temptations, and continued stedfastly in obedience vnto God, although he haue scourged them euen with extremitie. Thus haue we here an excellent mirror. Moreover, we haue to consider not only the patience of Job: but also the issue of it, as Sainct Iames sayth. For had Job continued in miserie: albeit that he had had more than an Angelicall strength in himselfe, yet had that bene no happie issue. But when we see he was not disappointed of his hope, and that he found grace, because he humbled himselfe before God: Vpon the sight of suche an issue we may conclude, that there is nothing better, than to submit our selues vnto God, and to suffer peaceably whatsoeuer he sendeth vs, vntill he deliuere vs of his owne mere goodnesse. And herewithall (besides the storie) we haue to consider the doctrine comprised in this booke. That is to wit, concerning those that came vnto Job vnder pretence to comfort him, and yet tormeted him much more than did his owne miseries: and concerning the answers that he vsed to repulse their checks, wherwith it seemed they wold haue daunted him. But first of all, as in respect of our afflictions, we haue to note, that although God send them, and that they proceede from him: yet notwithstanding the diuell also stir- 60 eth them vp in vs, according as S. Paule tellet vs, that we haue war against the spiritual powers. For when the diuell hath once kindled the fire, he hath also his bellowes: that is to say, he fyndeth men that are fit to pricke vs always forward, bothe to feede the euill, and to encrease it. So then we shall see howe Job (besides the miserie that he endured) was also tormented bothe by his frendes and by his wyfe, and (aboue all) by suche as came to tempt him spirituall. For I call it a spirituall temptacion, not onely when we bee smitten and afflicted in our bodies: but also when the diuel commes to put a toy in our head, that God is our deadly enimie, and that it is not for vs to resorte any more vnto him, but rather to assure our selues, that henceforth hee will not shew vs any mercie. See whervnto al the discourse tended which Jobs frendes layd afore him. It was to make him beleue, that he was a man forsaken of God, and that he deceiued himself in imagining that God would be mercifull vnto him. Surely these spirituall battelles are farre more harder to be borne, than all the myseries and aduersities that we can suffer by any persecution. And yet dothe God let Sathan runne so farre vpon the biyde, that he also bringeth his seruants with him, who giue vs suche assaults, as wee see Job hath endured. Marke well this for a speciaall point. But herewithall we haue further to marke, that in al this disputation, Job mayteineth a good case, and contrarywyse his aduersaries mayteyne an euill case. And yet it is more, that Job mayteyning a good quarell, did handle it ill, and that the other setting foorth an vnjust matter, did conuey it well. The vnderstanding of this, will be as a key to open vntoo vs all this whole booke. Howe is it that Job mayteyneth the good case? It is in that hee knoweth, that God dothe not euer punishe menne according to the measure of their sinnes, but hath his secrete iudgementes, whereof he maketh not vs priuie, and therefore that it behoueth vs to wayte till he reuele vnto vs for what cause he doth this or that. Thus is he in this whole discourse persuaded, that God doth not always punish me according to the measure of their sinnes: and therupon assureth himselfe, that hee is not a man rejected of God, as they would make him to beleue. Beholde heire a good and true case, notwithstanding that it be ill handled. For Job raungeth here out of his boundes, and vseth such excessiue and outragious talke, that in manie poyntes he seemeth a desperate person. And specially he so chafeth, as it seemeth that he would euen resist God. Thus may ye see a good case mishandled. But on the contrarie part, they that vndertake the euill case (that is to wit, that God doth awytes punishe men according to the measure of their sinnes, haue goodly and holie sentences, and there is nothing in their whole talk which would not entice vs to receyue it as if the holy Ghoste himselfe had vttered it. For it is playne truthe: they be the groundes of religion: they treate of Gods prouidence: they treate of his justice: they treate of mennes sinnes. Thus see wee a doctrine whiche wee muste receyue without gaynsaying; and yet the drift of it is euill, namely for that these men labour thereby to cast Job into dispaire, and to drowne him altogether. But heerby wee see, that when we haue a sure grounde, it behoueth vs to looke that wee buylde vpon it in such wyse, as all thyngs bee answerable therenvnto: according as Saint Paule

Ephr.6.c.12.

Paule

Paule sayeth of hymselfe, that he builded well, forasmuche as he founded the Church vpon the pure doctrine of Iesus Christ, and therfore that it hath such a conformitie in it, as those that come after him, shall not make any other foundation, eyther of chaffe, or of stubble, or of any other brittle stiffe: but haue a good foundation, stedfast, and substantiall, readie layd to their hande. Likewise in our whole lyfe we haue to looke vnto this poynt: namely that if wee be grounded vpon good and rightfull reason, it behoueth eche one of vs to stande vpon his garde, that he reele not, ne wauer not one way or other. For there is nothing easier than to marre a good and rightfull matter, so sinfull is oure nature, as wee fynde by exprience at all tymes. God of his grace may giue vs a good case: and yet we may bee so stinged by our enimies, that we can not holde oure selues within our boundes, nor simply followe that whiche God hath enioyned vs, without adding of som trick of our own. Seing then that we be so easily carryed away: we ought the rather to pray vnto God, that when we haue a good case, he himselfe will vouchsafe to guyde vs in all singlenesse by his holie spirit, so as we may not passe the boundes, whiche he hath set vs by his worde. Herewithall also we be put in mynde, not to applie Gods truth to any euill vse. For in so dooing we dishonour it: lyke as these men doe heere, who although they speake holily (as wee haue shewed already, and as wee shall see more fully hereafter) are notwithstanding but traytors to God. For they corrupte Gods truth, and abuse it falsly, applying that thing to an euill end, which of it selfe is good and rightfull. So then, whensoeuer God giueth vs the knowledge of his woord, let vs learne to receive it with such reverence, as our receyving of it may not be to deface good things, nor to sette a colour vpon euyll things, as oftentimes those that bee most sharpwitted and cunning, doo overshoote themselues, and abuse the knowledge that God hath giuen them, vnto deceyt and naughtinesse, turning all thinges topsyfurie, in suche wyse as they doo nothing but snarle themselues. Considering therefore how all men are giuen to suche infirmite: it standeth vs so muche the more on hand, to pray God to giue vs the grace to applie his word to suche vse as he hath ordeyned it: that is to wit, to purenesse and supplictie. And thus ye see what wee ought to consider in effecte. But now that we understande what is in this booke: we muste laye foorth these matters more at length, in suche sort as the things that wee haue but lightly touched, may be layd forth at large according to the processe of the historie. It is sayde, that There was a man in the lande of Hus, named Job, a sound and upright man, and fearing God, and withdrawing himselfe from euill. VVe knowe not, neyther can we guesse in what tyme Job liued: sauing that a man may perceiue he was of great antiquitie: howbeit that some of the Lewes haue ben of opinion, that Moyses was the author of this booke: and that hee did set it as a looking glasse before the people, to the intente that the childe of Abrahā (of whose race he himselfe came) might knowe that God had shewed fauour to others that were not of the same line, and therupon be ashamed if they themselues walked not purely in the fear of god, seing that this man (which had not the mark of Gods couenant, nor was circumcised, but was a Painim) had behaued himselfe so well. But forasmuch as this is not certaine: wee muste leaue it in suspence. Neuerthelesse let vs take that whiche is out of all doubt; that is to wit, that the holie Ghoste hath endited this booke, to the ende that the Lewes shoulde knowe howe God hath had people to serue him, albeit that they haue not bene separated out from the rest of the worlde: and that although they had no the signe of circumcision, yet notwithstanding they walked in all purenesse of conversation. By the knowledge wherof, the Lewes haue had occasion to be so muche the more diligent to kepe the lawe of God: and sith he had voutsafed them suche fauour and prerogatiue, as to gather them oure from among all other strange nations, they ought to dedicate themselues wholly vnto him. Also a man may perceiue by the booke of Eze- Ezecl.14.4 chiel, that the name of Job was renoumed amōg the people of Israel. For in his. xiij. chapter we see it is said, that if Noe, Job, & Daniel wer amōg the people that shuld perish, they should sauue no mo mens lyues but their owne, & al the rest of the people should be destroyed. See howe the Prophet speaketh of these three men, as of suche as were knowne and renoumed among the Lewes, as I haue touched alredie. And therby we see what the intent of the holie ghost is: namely that the Lewes shuld haue a mirror and pattern whereby to knowe, howe they ought to keepe the doctrine of saluation that was giuen vnto them, seing that this man whiche was of a straunge nation, had so kepte himselfe in such puritie. And that is the chiefe thing that wee haue to remember concerning the name that is sette downe here, when he sayeth that he was of the land of Hus. True it is, that some men doe place this land far eastward. Neuerthelesse in the fourth chapter of the Lamentations of Ieremie, the same word Hus is put for a part of Edom. VVe know that the Edomites are descended of Esau: and true it is that they also had circumcision. Howbeit forasmuche as they were strayed away from Gods church, they had it no more as the signe of his couenāt. Therfore if we take Job to haue ben of this land of Hus, then was he an Edomite, that is to saye, of the lyne of Esau. And we know how the Prophet Malac.14.4 saith, that although Esau and Jacob were natural brethren, borne bothe at one burthen: yet God of his mere goodness chose Jacob, rejecting Esau, and cursing him with all his whole linage. Lo how the Prophet in speaking to magnifie Gods mercie towards the Lewes, telletth them that he chose them not for any worthinesse that was in their persons, considering that he had rejected Jacobs eldest brother, to whom the birthright belonged, and had chosen him that was the yonger and inferior. So then, although that this man was borne of Esaus line: yet notwithstanding we see howe soōdly he liued, & how he serued god not only by vpright conuersation & equitie amōg men: but also in pure religion, which he defiled not with the idolatries and supersticioes of the infidels. As touching the name of Job, some interpret it to signifie Weeping or Wailing. And other some take it for an vtter enimie, not suche a one as he hateth, but such a one as is as it were a white for men to shoot at. There is no cause why we shuld dout whether this man (whose countrey is so marked out, & whose name is expressed) were or no, or lyued or no, or whether the thinges that are written here, did come to passe or no: so as we should think it to be but a tale contrived, as if a man shoulde vnder a counterfayte name sette oure some thyng vntoo vs that was never doone. For I haue alreadye alledged the recorde of Ezechiel, and also of Sanct Iames, who shewe right well that there was a Job in deede. And further, seeing that the storie it selfe declareth it, wee can not in anye wyse deface the thyng whyche the holie Ghoste meanto viter so precyfely. As for the refydue, wee haue too marke, that in that tyme, aloughhe the worlde were falne awaie from the true seruyng of God, and from pure Religion: yet notwithstanding there was still farre more soundnesse by a great deale, than there is at this day, specially in the papacie. And in dede we see, that in Abrahams time Melchisedech Gen.14.d.18 had Gods churche and sacrifices which were without any defilement. And so albeit that the more parte of the world was wrapped in manyfolde errores, and false and wicked imaginacions: yet notwithstanding, God had reserved some little seede to himselfe, and he had always some that that were hild still vnder the pure truth, yea and which waited continually when God shold stablish his church, and choose out one people, (that is to wit the offspring of Abraham) to the end they might knowe that they were picked out from the rest of the whole worlde. But verie true it is, that Job liued after this tyme, howbeit that the Churche of god was not then so wel established as it was afterward. For we know that while the children of Israel liued in Ægypt, it was like that all shuld haue come to nougat. And specially we see to what an afterdeale they were come in the end

Exod. i.c.16. when Pharaon commaunded that their menchildren shuld be killed: and in the wildernes where it seemed that god had reiectet them. VVhen they were come into the countrey of Canaan, they had greate battels agaynst their enimes, and specially the seruice of God and his tabernacle were not yet there so wel apointed as was requisite. God therefore hauing not yet settled an apparaunt state of the Church, would there shuld always remain some fmal seeedes of it amōg the Paynims, to the intent he might be worshipped: & that was also to conyince those that are turned aside out of the right way like Paynims: for Job alone was inough to condemne a whole countrey. Noe also condemned the whole world (as the Scripture sayth) because he hild himself always in purenesse, and walked as before God, at such time as every man had forgotten him, and al menne were gone astray in their owne superstitions. Heere then is Noe judge of the whole worlde, to condemne the vnbeleuuers and rebelles. As muche is to be sayd of Job, who hath condemned all the people of that countrey: in that he hath serued God purely, and the residue were full of idolatrie, 30 shamefull dedes, and many errors. And this came to passe, because they hild scorne to know the true and living God, and how and after what sort it was his will to be honored. So great regard hath God always had (as I haue sayde) to make the wicked and the vnbeleuers always vnexcusabla. And for this cause it was his will, that there shoulde always be some men that should folow the things that he had shewed to the anciēt fathers. Such a one was Job, as the scripture tel'eth vs, & as this present story sheweth ful wel, who serued God purely, and liued vprightly among men. It is sayd, that He was a sound man. This word Sound in the scripture is taken for a playnnesse, when there is no poynte of fayning, couterfayting, or hypocrisie in a man, but that he sheweth himself the same outwardly that he is inwardly, & specially when he hath no starting holes to shift himself from God, but layeth open his heart, and all his thoughts and affections, so as hec desireth nothing but to consecrate and dedicate himself wholly vnto God. The sayde worde hathe also bene translated perfect, as well by the Grecenes as by the Latins. But for as muche as the woerde perfect, hath afterwarde bene misconstrued: it is much better for vs to vse the woerde Sound. For manie ignorant persones, not knowing howe the sayde perfection is too bee taken, haue thoughte thus: Beholde heere a man that is called perfect, and therfore it foloweth, that it is possible for vs to haue perfection in oure selues, euen during the tyme that wee walke in this presente life. But they deface the grace of God, whereof wee haue neede continually. For euen they that haue liued moste vprightly, muste haue recourse to Gods mercie: and except their sinnes be forgiuen them, and that God vphold them, they must needs all perishe. So then, although that they whiche haue vſed the woerde perfect, haue ment well: yet notwithstanding for as muche as there haue ben some that haue wrested it too a contrarie sense, (as I haue sayd) lette vs kepe still the woerde Sound. Then looke vpon Job, who is called Sound. And how so? It is because there was no hypocrisie nor dissimulation, nor any doublenesse of heart in him. For when the scripture meaneth to sette downe the vice that is contrarie to this vertue of Souđnesse: it sayth Hart and Hart, meaning therby a double heart. Letvs marke then, that fyrt of all this title is attributed vnto Job, to shewe that he had a pure and simple mind, that he bare not two faces in one whood, ner serued God by halues, but laboured to giue himselfe wholly vnto him. True it is that as nowe we can not be so founde as to attayne to the marke as were to be wished. For as touching those that follow the right waye, although they goe on forwarde limping: yet are they so laine, that they dradge their legges and their wings after them. The case then standeth so with vs, so long as wee bee wrapped in this mortall bodie, that vntill such tyme as God haue quite discharged vs of all the miseries wherewith we be subiect: there shall neuer be any perfecte soundnesse in vs, as I haue sayde afore. But yet for all that, it behoueth vs neuerthelesse to come to the sayd playnnesse, and to giae ouer all counterfaſtnesse and leaſing. And further, lette vs note, that the true holynesse beginneth within vs, insomuche that if wee shewe all the fayrest countenances in the worlde before men, and that our lyfe be so well guyded that every man shal commende vs: yet if we haue not this playnnesse and soundnesse before God, al is right nougat. For it behoueth that the fountayne bee fyrite pure, and afterwarde that the streames that runne oute of it bee pure also. Otherwise the water may well bee cleere: and yet neuerthelesse bee bitter, or else haue some other filthie corruption in it. Therefore it behoueth vs to begin alwaies with this text, That God will be serued in spirite, Iohn.4.c.24. and in truth: for he is a spirit; and he regardeth the truth of the heart, as it is sayd in the fift of Hieremie. Then ought Hierem.5.a.3. we to learne first and formoste, to frame our hearts to the obeying of God. For after that Job hath bene reported to haue ben sound, it is also sayd of him that He was vpright. This vprightnesse is ment of the lyfe that he led, whiche is as it were the frute of the said roote which the holie ghost had planted afore. Job then had an vpright and souđ hart. For his life was simple, that is to say, he walked and liued among his neybors, without hurting of any person, without doing any wrong or trouble to any bodie, without setting of his mind to any guyle or naughtinesse, and without seeking his owne profit by the hinderance of other folks. VVe see now what this vprightnesse iporteth, whiche is added in this place. And hereby wee be admonished, to haue an agreeablenesse betweene oure hearte and oure outwardē sences. Truc it is (as I haue sayde afore) that we may well withhold our selues from yldoing, & that we may wel haue a fayre shewe before men: but that shall bee nothing, if ther be any hypocrisie or couert dissimulation before god, when it commeth to the roote that is within the hearte. VVhat must we do then? VVe must begin at the foresaid poynt, as I haue tolde you afore: and then to haue perfecte soundnesse, it behoueth that our eyes, our hands, our feete, our armes, and euery thinge be answering thervnto: so as in our whole life we may shewe that our will is to serue God, and howe that it is not in us yne that wee pretende a meaning to keepe the same soundnesse within. And heere ye maye see why Sancte Pavle alio exhorteth the Galathians to walke after the spirite, if they liue after the spirite: as if he shoulde saye. Verily it behoueth that the spirite of God dwell in vs and gouerne vs. For it is to no purpose to haue a gay life that pleasest men, and is had in great estimation, vnsesse we be led by the grace of God. But what? It behoueth vs to walk: that is to say, it behoueth vs to shew in effect, & b. our work, how the spirite of god reigneth in our myndes. For if our hands be stained with robberie, with crueltie, or with other annoyances: if the eies be caried with leud & vnchaftrokes, with coueting other mens goods, with pride, or with vanitie: or if the feete (as the scripture sayth) be swifte to do euill: therby we wel declare, that our hart is ful of naughtiness and corruption. For it is neither the feet nor the hands, nor the eies that guide the selues: the guiding of them cometh of the mind & of the heart. VVherfore let vs endeuer to haue the said agreeableness which the Scripture sheweth vs, when it sayth, that Job hauing this soundnesse and plain meaning did also liue vprightly, that is to say was cōuersant ameng his neyboris without any anoying of them, & without seeking of his own peculiar profit, & kept 10 an euuen hand with al the world. Also ye see the reason why God proueth whether we serue him faithfully or no: It is not for that he hath nede of our seruice, or of any thing that we can do: But bicause that when we deale well with oure neyboris, so as we kepe our faithfulnesse toward al men, according as nature it self teacheth vs: in so doing we yeld assuranuce that we feare God. VVe see many whiche beare the face of verie zelous Christians, so long as it is but to dispute, and to hold long talke, and to beare men in hand that they study to serue God, and to honor him: and yet for all 20 that, as soone as they haue to do with their neybours, a man shal perceiue what they haue in their harts. For they seeke their owne aduantage, and make no conscience to rake to the selues, and to beguile folk whē they haue them in their danger, by what meanes soever it be. Now then there is no dout, but that those which seke their owne aduantage and profit, are hypocrites, and that their hart is corrupt: and how earnest christiās soever they semē outwardly, God bewrayeth that they haue nothing but dung and poyson in theyr hearts: And why so? For looke where soundnesse is, there 30 must nedes be vprightnesse also: That is to say, If the affection be pure within, then wil it folow, that when we haue to deale with men, we shal procure the welfare of every man, in such wise as we shal not be giuen to our selues and to our priuate cōmoditie, but shall haue that indifference whiche Iesus Christ auoucheth to be the rule of life, and the whole summe of the law and the prophets: namely that we do not that thing to any other man, which we wold not haue done to our selues. So then, we perceiue that by this cōdemnation of Job many men are condemned, forasmuch as the holye 40 Ghost declareth, that this man had not onely a soundnesse before god, but also an vprightnesse and plain dealing amōg men. This plain dealing which he speaketh of, shal serue to giue sentence of damnation vpon al such as are full of maliciouſnesse, and vpon all suche as passe not to snatche and rake to themselues the goods of other men, or which passe not to spoyle other men of their liuings. This sorte of men are condermed by this present texte. For it foloweth, that He feared God, yea, that he was a man which feared God, and withdrew himselfe from euill. Now seing that Job had had the prayse of keping right and equitie among men: it behoued him also to walk before God: for without that, the rest is nothing worth. True it is (as I haue said afore) that we can not liue with our neyboris to do harme to none, and to doo good to al: vnlesse we haue an eye vnto God. For as for the that folow their own nature, albeit that they be indued with goodly vertues, (for so will it seeme) yet are they ouertaken with self loue, &c it is nothing else but vainglouriousnesse, or some other such respect which thrusteth them forward: in so much that all the shew of vertue which appered in them is marred therby. But although wee can not haue the sayde vprightnesse without the fearing of God: yet notwithstanding, the seruing of God, and the regarding of our neyboris ar two seueral things, in likewise as god hath distinguished them in his law, at such time as it pleased him to haue them writte out in the two tables. Then let vs beare in mind, that like as heretofore vnder the worde vprightnesse, the holye Ghoste ment to shewe after what maner Job liued among men: so also when he saith that Job fearēd God, he meaneth to set out the religion that was in him. And hereby wee be warned, that if we will frame our life aright, we must firste haue an eye vnto god, & then to our neibors. I say we must haue an eie vnto God, to giue our selues ouer vnto him, & to yeld him his due honor: And we must haue an eic to our neyboris, to discharge our selues of our dutie towardes the, according to that we be cōmaunded to helpe them, and to liue in equitie & vprightnesse: and finally (forasmuch as god hath knit vs eche to other) that euery man study to imploye his whole abilitie to the cōmon comoditie of al. Thus ye see how the case standeth with vs in hauing of an eye bothe to God and me, for the wel ordring of our life: for he that loketh on himselfe, is sure that he hath nothing but vanitie in him. For if a man were able to order his life in such wise, as he might seeme faultlesse to the world, & yet notwithstanding, God disliked him: what shal he gain by his ouerlaboring of himself to walk in such wise as al men might magnify him? As to Godward he is nothing else but vncleannessse, & nedes must this sentence whiche is written in S. Luke be verified, namely that the thing which is most high and excellēt before men, is abominable before God. Then let vs beare in minde, that we can neuer order oure life as we ought to doe, except we haue our eyes fastened vpon God and our neybour. Vpon God: and wherfore? To the ende we may know, that we be created to his glorie, to serue him and to worship him. For although he haue no neede of vs as our neyboris haue, nor is either the better or the worse for our seruice: yet is it his will to haue reasonable creatures which shuld know him, and in knowing him, yeld him that whiche belongeth vnto him. Furthermore, wheras he speaketh of the feare of God: we haue to vnderstand, that it is not a slauish feare (as men terme it:) but it is so termed in respect of the honour which we owe him, for that he is our father and maister: Do we feare God? Then is it certaine that we desire nothing but to honour him and to be wholly his. Doe we know him? That must be in such wyse as he hath vttered himselfe: that is to wit, that he is our maker, our maynteyner, and one that hath shewed suche fathery goodnesse towards vs, that we of dutie ought to be as chil- dren towards him, if wee will not bee vtterly vnthankfull. Also it behoueth vs to acknowledge his dominion and su- perioritie ouer vs, to the end that euery of vs yeelding him his due honoure, may learne to please him in all respectes. Thus you see, how that vnder this fearing of God, here is comprehended all religion: that is to wit, all the seruice and honoure whiche the creatures owe vntoo their God. And surely it was a ryght excellentē vertue in Job to feare God after that maner, considering howe the whole world was turned asyde from the righte waye. VVhen we heare thys, when we perceyue that although we liue among the veryest naughtypackes in the whole worlde, wee shall bee vtterly vnexcusable, if wee bee not giuen to the seruing of God as wee ought to bee: And this is well to be mar- ked, bycause many men are of opinion, that when they are among the thornes, God will holde them acquit and excused: and that if afterwarde they corrupt themselues, (or as the Proverbe sayeth) hold with the Hare, and hunte with the Hounde, (whiche is all one) God will pardon them. But contrarywise looke vpon Job, who is called a man that fearēd God. In what countreye? It was not in Iewrie, it was not in the Citiie of Hierusalem, it was not in the Temple: but it was in a defyled place, in the middes of suche as were vtterly peruerted. Albeit then that hee were among suche people, yet had he suche stay of him- selfe, and liued in such wise, that he walked purely among his neyboris, notwithstanding that at that tyme all was full of crueltie, of outrage, of robbery, and of suche other like

enormities in that place. VVhereupon we haue to consider, that it shall turne so much to our greater shame, if we on our behalfe haue not a care to keepe our selues pure in the seruice of God, and of our neighbours, seing he giueth vs such occasion as we haue, that is to wit, that Gods word is continually preached vnto vs, that we be exhorted vnto it, and that he refourmeth vs when we haue done amisse. It standeth vs on hande then to giue eare to that which is shewed vs here. And therefore in conclusion let vs marke that which is added here in the text: namely that he withdrew himselfe from euill. For we see that the cause why Job ouercame all lettes and encounters that might hinder him from the seruing of God, and from liuing vprightly among men, was for that he had a stay of himself: for he knew right well, that if he had taken libertie to do like other men, he should haue bene giuen to all vices, so as he should haue bene the enimie of God. Job then walked not so in the feare of God, and in such playne dealing and soundnesse, without great store of encounters, or without the Diuels heaving at him to ouerthrow him and to cast him into the filthinesse of the whole world: but he withdrew himselfe from euill, that is to say, he withhold himself. VVhat must we do then? Although we be in the Church of God, yet we see great abundance of euils, and (how soever it happeneth) there shall neuer be such plainenesse and purenesse, but we shalbe mingled with store of skorners and vnriffriftes which are firebonds of hell and deadly plagues to infect all men. Therfore it behoueth vs to be very ware, seing there are so many stomblingblockes and so great loocenesse, whereby to trayne vs forthwith vnto vnthriftnesse. VVhat remedie then? Let vs withdraw our selues from euill: that is to say, let vs fight against such asaultes after the example of Job: and when we see abundance of vices and corruptions reigne in the world, albeit that we be fayne to be intermedled with them, yet let vs not be defiled with them, nor say as commonly men are woont, namely that we must needs do as other men do: but rather let vs take counsell by Iobs exâple to withdraw our selues from euill, and to retyre in such sorte, as Sathan may not be able to make vs to yelde for all the temptations that he shall cast before vs: but that we may suffer God to clenze vs from all our filthinessse and infestation according as he hath promised vs in the name of Iesus Christ,) vntill he haue pulled vs quite out of the soyle and vncleannessse of this world, to match vs with his Angels, and to make vs partakers of that endless felicitie, for the which we must labour here continually.

Therfore let vs present our selues before the face of our good God, with acknowledgemēt of our sinnes, praying him to giue vs suche feeling, that in acknowledging our owne poorenesse, we may alwaies haue recourse to the remede that he giueth vs: which is, that he pardoning al our offences, wil so gouerne vs by his holy spirit, that although Satan be named the Prince of the worlde, and haue such a scope among men, that the more parte of them are so peruertered as we see: yet notwithstanding we may nor be harried away with them: but rather that our good God will hold vs backe vnder his obeystance, and that we may know the thing wherevnto we be called, so as we may follow it, and maintayne the brotherlinesse which he hath ordeyned among vs, so linking our selues one with another, as we may desire nothing but to procure the welfare of our neyours, to the ende we may be settled more and more in his grace which he hath graunted vs by our Lord Iesus Christ, vntill he make vs to receyue the fruite of it in his heauenly glory: and that it may please him to bestow this benefite and grace not onely vpon vs, but also vpon all people and nacions of the earth: &c.

The second Sermon vpon the first Chapter.

2. And he had seuen sonnes borne vnto him, and three daughters.
3. And he had a greate substance of Cattell: to wit, seuen thousand Sheepe, three thousand Camelles, fife hundred yoke of Oxen, fife hundred shee Asses, and a great household, in somuch that he surmounted all them of the East.
4. And his Sonnes went and made feasts at their houses, every man his day, and they called their three Sisters also to eate and drinke with them.
5. VVhen they had made an end of their feasting, Job sent for his children and sanctified them: and rising vp betymes in the morning, offered sacrifices according to the number of them: for he sayde, It may be that my children haue sinned, and haue not blissted the Lord in their hartes. And thus did Job every day.

Esterday we heard the prayses which the holy Ghost gaue vnto Job, not so much for himselfe as for our instruction, to the end we should know how we ought to rule our life: namely that wee walke in singlenesse of heart, so as there be no peece of counterfaitenesse in vs, and that therewithall our workes also may yelde witnessesse of the same singlenesse. And moreover, that we feare God, knowing how it is he to whom we must referre our whole life, and that his honour is the thing that we must giue our selues vnto. And further, that forasmuch as we be continually beset with many stumbelingblockes, and the Diuell practizeth to thrust vs out of the right way: we should stande vpon our garde to withdraw our selues from euill, and to recouer our selues vnto God, vntill such time as we be quyte dispatched from all the defilements of the world by death. And now it inseweth in the text, That Job was an exceeding riche man: and

50 a great part of his possesſiōs is specially recyted to vs here. It is no small thing to haue Seuen thousand head of small Cattell, fife hundred yoke of Oxen, as many shee Asses, and as many Camelles. Lo here a great substance for one man. And therefore it is sayde, He surmounted all them of the East. But anon we shall see wherfore this is rehersed vnto vs. For his patience was so much the more prayseworthe, for that he being bereft of so great goodes, and brought to extreame pouertie, did notwithstanding contine quiet, as if he had lost little or nothing: See then how 60 God hath so much the better tryed him. But herewithall we haue to consider, what a vertuouse minde was in Job, seing his riches had not blinded him with pryde, nor caused him to set too much by the world, or to discharge himselfe of the seruice of God, as we commonly see that many men by reason of their great riches, become so loftie, that it is vnpossible to tame them, abusing their credite to the oppressing of poore folke: and besides that they be ful of craultie, they be also stately and full of pompe: So that riches are accompanied with manie inconueniences. Therefore it is not in vaine that it is told vs here, that Iob being so riche, had neuerthelesse alwayes persisted in the seruing of God, and helde himselfe in the sayd singlenesse wherof mencion is made here. For by his example the riche men of this worlde are warned of their duetie, whiche is,

I.Ti.6.d.17 to take good heede that when God hath pur abundance into their handes, they be not entangled by them, according also as the Psalme exhorteth them. And further (according as Saint Paule speakest to Timothie) that they be not puffed vp with pride; nor put their trust in the trāstorie things of this worlde, wherein there is no certainie: for he that is riche to day, may become poore by too morowe, whensoeuer it pleaseth God. So then, seing that the goodes of this worlde are tickle, and that wee maye soone be bereft of them: riche men (sayeth Saint Paule) oughte to take good heede, that they rest not themselues vpon them, nor make an ydoll of them, as thoughte they were sure to possesse them, and enjoy them euer, but must be readie to yeeld them vp. And to be short (according as I.Cor.7.e.29 it is sayd in an other text) such as haue fields and vineyardes, medowes and corne ground, money and wares, must haue a care to vse them in suche sorte, as if they had none at all, so as they may be poore in heart. Thus then we see what we haue to note vpon this sentence. For least any man might alledge, that it is verie hard to behauie himselfe so purely in the mids of so great riches, considering howe

Mat.13.c.22 Christ himselfe calleth them thornes: therfore the example of Iob shall condemne all such as keepe not themselues vndefiled, how hardly soever it be to be done. It is ve-rie certaine, that a rich man shal haue more adoo to walke in the feare of God, than shall a poore man. And true it is also, that pouertie of it self bringeth store of temptations.

For when a man is in necessitie, hee falleth to thinking in himselfe, what shall become of mee? and the diuell thrusteth him forward to distrust. Herevpon he shall be induced to murmur against God, according as we see that marie fal into a rage, and it seemeth to them that God dothe them wrong, and they wot not on which side to turne the selues: whervpon they conclude thus: Sigh I can not get my liuyng by my labor without doing other men wrong:

I muste take an other waye to the wood. Herevpon they take leaue to rob and reave, and t'ey do manie shrewde turnes, harmes, and damages to their neighbours. Beholde (I praye you) the temptations whiche pouertie bringeth.

But if a man make comparison betweene it and riches: it is certain that the richer sort haue far greater assaults, forasmuch as Satan is euer at their elbowe, to blindfold their eyes, to the ende they should ouershoote themselues, and forgetting their state, lift vp themselues against God, tye themselues wholly to the world, make a mock of the heauenly lyfe, beare them selues in hande that nothyng can hurt them, abuse their credite in sundry wise, haue regard of nothing, bee lothe to beare any yoke, bee vnwilling to yelde to any reason, and thinke all other men too base to be in their companie, in so muche that if it were possible for them, they woulde plucke away the lighte of the Sun from the poore, so that finally they beare themselues in hand, that they deserue of good right to be shoaled out, & to be set aside, as it were on a row by themselues. VVe see now the corruptiōs and other infinite miseries that riches bring: and yet there is no excuse for the that berich.

VVherfore? For here shall Iob be made their iudge afore god, forasmuch as he was not corrupted nor peruerted by the great abundance & quātitie of goods that he had, but alwayes serued God in singlenesse of heart. But if the rich men be made vnexcusabla: let the poorer sort also looke well to themselues. For I haue tolde you alreadie: that it is easyer for a man to walke simply, to whome GOD hath not giuen so greate abundaunce, than for such as haue a greate raunge. The case is lyke as if a man were in some little boate and in some small riuier. It is lyke ynough that he might bee tossed, and it is lyke inough that he might rushe agaynst some stub, or agaynst some bank of the riuier: but he is not in such daunger, as he that is in a shippe on the middes of the sea, where the waues and stormes are fare more violent. Euen so (say I) stands the case betweene the poore and the rich. For surely so long as wee be in this worlde, we rowe vpon the water, where wee may bee tossed with tempestes, and rushe againte some thing, and euermore be in daunger. Thus are the poore as it were on a little Ryuer: but the ryche are as it were on the myddes of the sea, so as they hardly can scape synkyng in some whirlpoole or other. Nowe then if there be no excuse for the ryche sorte: what shall become of those to whome GOD giueth the meane to holde themselues in simplicitie? VVee see therfore that here is a generall lesson to serue for all men, as wel greate as small, and that it behoueth eche man to benefit himself by the example that is set here before our eyes. But yet herewithall the vertue of Iob is ryght commendable: for we haere the iudgement of our Lorde Iesu Christe, how it is ryght hard for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heauen. Not for that riches do of themselues hinder vs from seruing God as I haue sayde: but it hapneth through our naughtinesse and corruption, that where as it becommeth vs to take occasion to bee drawnen vnto God by the benefits which he bestoweth vpon vs, wee bee the further drawne backe from him. VVherfore we see that Iob was a man of wonderfull vertue: seeing that in the midst of such riches, he had not his eyes blyndfolded too conceive any pride in his hart, so as he shold tread other folks vnder his feet, or forget God, or become a dissolute, vaine, and pompos person: but hild on his race which he had begon. Lo here the vertue that was commendable in him. And this is done, to the end that if we can not attain to bee full equall with him, yet every one of vs shoulde looke to himselfe, and goe on forwarde to the marke that is sette afore him. Furthermore wee see also, that riches of themselues are not to be condemned, as some fantasticall persons surmisse, who hold opinion, that a riche man can not bee a Christian. For let them fynd me any of the pore that may be compared to Iob in this vertue, and then let the condemne riches. But when a man shal haue sought throughout all the poore men in the worlde: hardly shal hee fynde one that shal come any thing neere this man.

Seeing then that the case is so, lette vs marke that riches of themselues and of their own nature are not to be condemned, and specially that it is a great blasphemie against God, if a man find such fault with riches, that he thinketh the partie which possessthem, to be vterly mard. For from whence come riches but from God. Therfore when a man condemneth them, hee setteth hymselfe agaynst God. And further, it behoueth vs too marke, that God must nedes work farre more maruellously in a rich man than in a pore man, as I haue sayde afore. For I haue alreadie shewed the difficultie that a man hathe to mayn-tayne himselfe in simplicitie and vprightenesse, when hee hathe abundaunce of goodes. Then had God neede to vttre a singular force of his holie Spire to preserue riche menne from corrupting of themselues. But if a man despize such a grace of God, dothe he not lyfte vp himselfe against God? Hereby then wee bee warned, not too condemne Ryches in them selues, lyke also as we see how our Lord Iesu Christ hath shewed vs, by matching the pore & the rich togither in the kingdome

Luke.16.d. of heauen, when he speakeþ of Lazarus in saint Luke.
v.19. He sayeth there, that the Angels caried Lazarus: For albeit that he was an outcast among men, and a poore creature of whome no account was made, in somuch that he was forsaken of al men: yet neuerthelesse behold how the Angels carie his soule into Abrahams bosom. And what was this Abraham? A man riche both in cattell and in money, and in houſhould, and in all other things ſauing houſes and lands, for those were not lawful for him to haue, bicause it behoued him to tary Gods leſure, til he gaue him the land 10 Gen.13.b.6. of Canaan to inherite. True it is, that he purchased a burying place, but he had not any inheritance, notwithstanding that his mouables were very greate. Therfore when we ſee the soule of Lazarus caried by Angels into the boſome of Abraham, who is the father of the faithfull: wee perceyue that God of his infinite grace and goodneſſe calleth both riche and poore to ſaluation. And vnto this purpoſe makeþ that alſo which S.Paule ſayeth: namely that God wil haue al men to be ſaued. For he ſpekketh of kings and princes, who of ordinarie do mifſebehaue themſelues 20 1.Tim.2.b.4 in their greatneſſe, and can not find in their harts to ſtoupe vnto God: yea it ſeemeth to themſelues that they be no mortall men: and yet God picketh out ſome of them to himſelf, and will not haue all to be lost and to periſh. Thus ye ſee what we haue to marke. Yet for all this, the rich meſſe must not flatter themſelues, but rather knowe howe they ſtand as it were vpon yce, where they may ſoon ſlide, and that they be as it were among thornes, ſo as it behoueth them to looke diligently to themſelues for being pricked. Lo howeche one of vs ought to be touched with carefulneſſe to comend our ſelues vnto God, that we may walke according to his will. And vpon this ſaying, That Job had ſeven ſonnes, and three daughters, I note howe it doth vs to wit, that God had ſent his bliſſing vpon him, to make him proſper by all meaneſ. And (as I haue touched heretofore) we ſhal hereafter better ſee the cauſe why al this is exprefſed, and the intent of the holiſ Ghof: that is to wit, that it was an incomparabla vertue in Job, to beare paciently Gods taking away of all the things which he had put into his hand. And it is verie wel declared alſo, how his chil- 30 dren behaved themſelues, and how he himſelf also on his part gouerned them in the fear of god. And this is done to the end that we ſhould vnderſtand, that when God affi- 40 eth vs, he ſheweth by effect, that he can diſpoſe of his creatures at his owne pleasure, and that although we be at our wits ende, and ſee not the reaſon why God handleth men ſo roughly: yet it becommeth vs to caſt downe our eyes, and to confeſſe that he is rightuous, and to wayt his leſure, vntil he diſcouer vnto vs the cauſe why he diſpoſeth things ſo. But now let vs proceede with that which is reherſed to vs here. It is ſayd, That Jobs children feasted one another day by day, euerie one in his turne, and that they caſted their ſisters to beare them compaie. True it is, that naſture may well ſtirre vp bretheren to loue one an other: but yet are men become ſo euill, as there be very fewe that conſider what brotherhood importeth. For the prooſe hereof wee ſhall ſee manye bretheren that agree lyke cattes and dogges. They be bretheren, and yet for all that, they ceaſe not to ſpite and malice one another, as if one of them woulde eate an other. VVe ſee then by ſuche (according 50 as men grow out of kynde into crueltie) that bretheren are acquainted with concorde and louingneſſe: and althoſh it be not ſo with all of them: yet is every man ſo addiſted to himſelf, as there be verie fewe that loue one an other in ſuiche as God teacheſ. Thus doth the holiſ Ghof ſet a looking glaſſe before our eyes, to make vs to beholde the good agreemet and loue that was among Jobs chil- dren, and ſpecially howe they exerciſed themſelues continualitherein, to the ende they would not giue any occaſion of euill miſtrouſe to an other. For the feaſtes that they made, were to none other end, but to yeld record of their brotherlyneſſe and agreement. And ſee how it is ſaid pre- ciſely, that they wenre to ſeeke their ſiſters, to the intente that their friendſhip might vtter it ſelue in all pointes. Behoued here a great vertue. Albeit a man may perceiue that Job feared not that there was any fault in the thing that was ordeined for a good purpose, and to a good ende: yet neuertheleſſe we ſee how he thought in himſelf even then that God miſt bee offend in it. Surely this is a verie notable example. And out of all doubt, good agreement and friendſhip among me, and ſpecially among bretheren, is as pleauant a thing vnto God as any can be. VVe heare howe it is ſayde in the Psalme: It is a ioyfull thing when Psalm.133. bretheren agree in one: It is lyke the deawe that falleth downe to giue foyzon and nouriſhment to the grounde, and lyke the oyle that droppeth downe from Aarons bearde, ſo as the ſcent of it was ſhead ouer all his rayment. Lo what two ſimiilitudes here be to ſhewe how God loueth peace and amitie among men, and aboue all thinges among bretheren. They doe vs too vnderſtande, that when men embracē one an other with heartie loue, it is all one as when the fieldes and herbes receyue nouriſhment by the deawe of heauen: and alſo that it is a thynge that yceldeſ a verie ſweete ſauoure afore God, as a good and acceptable Sacrifyze vnto him, even lyke the ſcent of the holiſ oyle that was poured vpon Aarons head. Neuerthelater: this is ſpoken of ſuch as imbrace one an other after a godly maner. For it may well be, that wi- ked men ſhall beare an affection of loue one towards an other, and they maye peraduenture lynke themſelues togither to accompliſhe their appoynmentes: but all this is naught: friendſhip muſt come from god, and go to God. And marke here how the name of brotherhood is ſette downe, to the ende we ſhoule be taught to lifte vp oure eyes vnto God, and to looke vnto him as ofte as there is any queſtion of louing one an other. Furthermore we ſee here, that the beſt thinges in the world may eſtouones bee corrupted by the naughtineſſe of men: And hereby wee ſee alſo what our naſture is, euer ſince Adam ſinned: that is to ſaye, that euer ſince he ouerſhot him ſelue: hiſterto good haſte bene turned into euill, notwithstanding that our intent or meaſyng be good. As for example: When a hufbande loueth his wyfe, or when a father loueth his children, they be good, holiſ, and commendable thinges: and yet neuertheleſſe there is not a ma to be founde in the whole worlde that loueth his wyfe in ſuiche measure, as nothing may be founde faulte with in hiſ loue, or that loueth his children with ſo pure and heartie loue: but that there ſhall alwayes bee ſome medlie of corruption. And why ſo? For ſeing that God hath ordeined, that the man ſhall loue his wyfe, and that it is preſcely ſayd, Loue your wyues as youre owne bodies: ſhall their ſo dooing be imputed to them for a faulte? Can the good bee turned into euill? Doubtlesſe that cammeth of oure curſed naſture: lyke as one grayne of ſalte, or one droppe of vine- ger fayleth not to marre a greate deale of wyne: Euen ſo is it with men, for holding them ſelues in meaſure, they haue not their affections ſo well ruled, as there maye no faulte be founde in them, or not to bee condemned in manye reſpectes. Then is it no ſtraunge caſe, that Job thoughte in himſelfe, that his chyldeſ miſt haue offend God in the thing that of it ſelue was good and co- mendable. Not for that he co-denined the feaſting of bretheren togither, ſpecially ſith their making of good cheere one with an other, was to mainteyn theſelues in mutual amitie. That was not the thing that Job founde faulte with:

But for as much as he was thoroughly acquaynted with mans infirmite: he knew it was very harde to keepe measure , so as no vice should be intermedled with it by the way . And therefore he tocke good heede to himself, and sanctified his children . But yet neuerthelesse we haue further to note, that Job had well marked and borne away the thing, which experience sheweth vnto vs : namely that in all feasts and banquets there is some disorder, where-through God is not so wel honored as he ought to be. First of all, in such meetings there wil be awiales some superfluite of meates, and they that come thither, do for companie sake eate and drinke more than their ordinarie. And hardly could a man thinke of the excesse that is there : in so much that euene the holiest men that feare God best, are ouerseene there . True it is that they play not the gluttons in stuffing of the paſche , nor in crāming themselues like swine, and much lesse wil they be so drukē as to be out of their wits like beasts: no not so: but so much may be done, as they may somewhat passe measure. And how so: for we see that a man overshootes himselfe in that case ere he be aware. So then we see that some incōuenience hapneth in feasts, notwithstanding that they be made for a good cause, and that the intent as well of him that biddeth his freends, as of those that come to keepe him companie, be good. For hardly can it be escaped , but that there shall be some faulē, wherof the vcry doer himselfe shall not be priuie. And furthermore whē a man is there, what a deale of vain and fond talke shall he haue to hold him withall? VWhere a man ought to eate as in the presence of God, and to be merrie as it were with the Angels: there shall be store of vanities, which shall carie men in suche wyse, as many of them(yea euene of the good men themselues)shal think, that they make no good chere, except they disguse the selues I can not tell howe : There are yet many other euill inconueniēces, wherby we see that God is offended diuers wayes, according as men finde in themselues afterwardē. So then, let vs marke wel, that Job did not without cause mistrust and doubt least his children had sinned agaynst God, seing they made feastes in such wyse, notwithstanding that they were of the faithful sort, as I haue sayde afore. Now if it so be, that where feastes and banquets are best ruled, yet there is some fault that God misliketh: how is it with them that drie God out of their cōpanie, & fro their table, as men are commonly wont to doo? For if we shall speake of feasting: wherat do men begin? At calling vpon the name of God? Nay, that woulde be thought too sad a matter. Therfore the name of God must be buried. Hath a man well suffized his appetite? then is it no tyme to say grace . For it behoueth them to remembre the good cheere that they haue made, that is to saye, that they be swine. For if a man make mention of God, it wil be thought, that all the pleasure which they haue taken in their feasting, is turned into sorow. And afterward all must runne ryot, in suche sort as there shall be no talke, but of ribawdrie and wantōnesse, or rather of trecherie and malice, so as there shall be none other newes, but of backbiting their neyghboure, and of practising deuises agaynst this man and that man. See what banqueting breedeth. Nowe then sith that men are so inclined to vice , it is not possible but there must be some faulē, notwithstanding that they giue not themselues the brydle in all poyntes. I pray you then, muſt it not needs be as it were a gulfe of hell, where they meeete together to make cōpaſtes of wickednesse and treason? Therfore let vs marke well this sentence,to the end that sith we know men to be so much inclined to vices, that they marre the thing that is good, and turne it into cuill: wee may take the more heede to our selues, that when we eate and drinke one with an other, we confesse oure selues alway sinners, for offending God thereby. True it is in deede, that we muſte not bee ſcrupulous and ſuperstitious, as ſome bee which eate not a bit of breade with quietneſſe of conſcience: If a man tell them, that they ought to aduife themſelues what they doo: therevpon they conclude that men can neyther eate nor drinke without offending of God. And when they are once come to ſuche ſcrupulouſneſſe, as to thinke that they ſinne in all things that they doo: they fall to concluding: VVell, then let vs ſet all at randon : I ſay, there are ſuche as theſe to be found. But this is not as we oughte to doo, this is not as the Scripture leadeth vs. Therefore let vs wake and keepe ſure watche, that we be not taken vnwares. VVhen wee be ſet at the table to drinke and to eate, let vs pray vnto God, beſeeching him of his gracious goodneſſe, to keepe vs in ſuche ſobrietie, that being nou‐ riſhed by his giſtes, wee may bee the better diſpoſed to ſerue him: ſo as our meates may not ſerue to ouercharge vs, but to ſuſteyn vs, and to giue vs ſtrength, that we may be the better able to occupie our selues in the ſeruice of our God . And that he will graunte vs the grace ſo to paſſe through theſe corruptible things, as we may always labour for the heauenly lyfe, wherenvnto he calleth vs by his woerde. For God mayntayneth vs not in this world to liue for a day, or for ten, or foriftie yeareſ: but to the intent we ſhould come to the ſayd heauenly glorie. Let vs then conſider how wee oughte to behaue our selues: and when wee be at the table, let vs ſeede for our repaſte in ſuch wyſe, as if God himſelfe dieted vs. And althougle we be in this worlde taking our nouiſhment of the foode that we knowe: let vs looke vp vnto God, who ſheweth himſelfe a father towardes vs, and hath wiſneſſed vnto vs that wee be his children, in ſo much as he hath a care of theſe our poore bodies here, and will haue his loue extend euene vnto them, notwithstanding that they be but rottenesse. Therefore when we ſee that God doth ſo nou‐ riſh and ſuſtayne vs, we may be the meryer and the better auſſured of his goodneſſe and fatherly loue towardes vs. And hereby we ſee why S.Paule ſayeth, that whither we 40 in the name of God . There are many which ſuppoſe that Coloſſ. 3.c.17

there ſhould bee no thinking vpon God when men come too eating and drinking: whereas in very deede we ſhould therfore thinke ſo much the more of God . Seing that God giueth ſuch vertue vnto bread by his woerde, that we be ſuſtayned by it, will he not haue vs to acknowledge his preſence, and how he hath hiſ hand ſtretched ouer us? Sothen it is rather a cauſe that wee ſhould thinke the more vpon God . For we ſee that our eating and drinking are ſanctified by yeelding all honor to hiſ name. And therfore when it commeth to ſaying of grace, let vs acknowledgē that ſome fault may haue escaped vs: and then will God ſurely forgiue vs all our miſdoing, if ſo be that we repayre vnto him . Thus you ſee the cauſe why it is ſayd here precyſely, that when Jobs children had made an end of feaſting eche other by turnes, Job commaunded them to ſanctifie themſelues, and afterward offered a ſolemne ſacrifice for eche one of them, ſaying: It may be that my children haue ſinned, and that they haue not bliſſed God. But wee will ſpeake of this whole matter in the ende . VVee ſee then that Job was none of that ſorte, which after they haue made nyceſſe for a whyle, do finally concludē to ſet all at randon . But he goeth to the remedie: that is to ſay, that God will beare with vs in our infirmitiēs. Albeit (ſayeth he) that my children haue not done their duerie in all pointes: yet am I ſure that God will haue pitie bothe vpon them and vpon me. And therefore let vs aske him forgiueneſſe. But yet for all this, Job forbade not hiſ children to vse their accustomed feasting: And wherefore? for the thing of it selfe was good , as I haue sayd afore . If Job had sayde, I see here a leawd matter : truly he had not made sacrificize: for that had bene to abuse Gods name, and to make it a cloke of euill . Sacrifyses were not ordyned to mainteyne vs in euil, nor that any man should fode and flatter himselfe in his sinnes, so as he should say, I may do sacrificize and then God wil be contented . Job therefore sacrificyzed not to haue it sayde that he maynteyned an euill thing : but he knew that his children did well in giving such intertaynement one to another, and that it was a commendable thing so to do . Forasmuch as he knew that, he ment not to finde fault with the thing that was good, but sought for the remedie , that if any fault lay hid vnder it, it might please God to amende it : as if he should say, Of good reason ought we to craye pardon at Gods hand, to the end he may supplie our infirmitie . VVe see then after what maner Job proceedeth here , and also after what maner we must proceede . And furthermore let vs marke, that Job in comauounding his children to sanctifie themselues, hath shewed the maner of the bringing vp which he gaue them in their childehood , that is to wit, to serue God . If it had bene simply sayd, that Job had sanctified the Lorde : a man might say, Very well , he was a good man for his owne behalfe , but he had no great regard of his children : he did inough for the discharging of himselfe to Godward, but he hath layde the brydle in the necke of the others . But contrarily it is sayde, that he commanded them to sanctifie themselues : which thing it had bene in vayne and vnauyable for him to do , had they not bene taught long afore how they ought to walke in the feare of God . And although they were as then men-grownen, and euery of them had a house of his owne, and kept a table by himself: Yet notwithstanding , Job ceassed not to keepe the continually vnder some awe . Behold here a doctrine very profitable for vs, which is, that parents must so guyde their children, as God may be honored of them all . And it behoueth vs to marke this doctrine the better , forasmuch as we see it is so ill put in vre . For in these dayes they that haue children, coulde well finde in their harts to haue them taught : but hardly shall ye finde one among a hundred, that is led with a zeale and affection to Godward . How are they led then? Euery man mindeth his owne profit . He may well say, I wold fayne haue my sonne taught : but what? that if he be of a good wit, he may come forward, that he may make himselfe braue, that he may gather goodes, that he may come to credite and honour . Lo here the respects that fathers haue in their desire to haue their childre brought vp . But where is there a man to be founde so well aduis'd or bent to such simplicitie, as to say, It is ynough for me that my childe serue God, for I am sure that God will blisse him, and make him to prosper, and although he be poore to the worldward, it is ynough for me that God is his father? And God also will render such rewarde vnto the fathers, as they haue deserued . For they imagine that they haue done very much for their children , when they haue aduaunced them : and God suffereth their children to put out their eyes, and to be as hangmen to torment them . VVe see it to be so before our eyes: and yet they perceiue not how it is God that chastizeth them, and that iustly . And therfore so much the more behoueth it vs to marke well the doctrine which the holy Ghost sheweth vs here vnder the example of Job, that is to witte, that fathers and mothers should holde their children in such awe, as they may cause them to serue God . And specially this circumstance is not to be forgotten : namely, that although Jobs children were growen to full yeeres of discretion : yet ne-uerthelesse their father hilde them alwayes as it were vnder awe, warning them to aske forgiuenesse of God when they had offended him, and to purifie themselues . But now adayes as soone as children be ten yeeres old , by and by they thinke themselues men: when notwithstanding it were meeete to give them the rod fiftene yeeres after that they ware the furniture of a man, and seeme to the selues to be maruelous fellowes, for they be no better but sillie offskooring : and as for to suffer any correction or any instruction, it is very straunge with them: yea they would thinke they had great wrong and iniurie offered them . Contrariwise we see what is layde here . But what? The fathers are worthie to haue their children disobedient and stubborn against them, VVhy so? For meeete it is that he which wil be honored should be honorable: that is to wit, it is requisite that he should shewe cause why to be honored . How then shall a father purchace himselfe authoritie towards his children, to be obeyed of them and to keepe them in feare? Euen by hauing such a grauitie and stayednesse in himselfe, as his children ought to be ashamed to gaynsay him or to stand against him in any thing . But if the fathers shake off the feare of God: how can it be that their children should obey them, sith that they themselues yelde not God the honour that belongeth vnto him? Lo here the cause why children shewe themselues so loth to be corrected, and why they cannot be kept in awe: namely for that their fathers are disobedient vnto God . And so it is, that both the fathers and the children are condemned here: the fathers for their negligence in not taking heede to bring vp their children in the feare of God, and the children for not suffering themselues to be gouerned by their fathers . And here they haue a goodly example: for it is spoken of such as may say, My father hath hilde me in awe as long as I was yong, and yet must I still be alwayes vnder the rod? Jobs children might haue sayde so . But we see that although they be come to haue householdes of their owne: yet are they still vnder the gouernance of their father: for in the text it is not sayde that they gaynesayd any thing that he comauanded them, as it is reported of the children of Hely : but rather that they obeyed him to the ende they might be partakers of the sacrificizes which he offred for them . This that we heare then, is ynough to condemne al these petie roylsters which make such a brauerie, and carie their crest so high . They know not what this awefullnesse in any wise meaneth: they are but offskooring, and yet neuerthelesse they will beare the countenance of men . But we see here how those that are of age and discretion to guyde a household orderly, be hilde still vnder the gouernment and obedience of their fathers . Furthermore as concerning this worde Sacrifice, it is ment according to the ordinarie custome of the lawe, whereby, (to the intent a man might be partaker of the sacrificizes) it behoued him to be purifyed , that he might be dewly disposed thervnto . And albeit that Job was not of the countrie where the lawe of Moses was written, but rather (by all likelyhood) was before Moyses was borne: yet notwithstanding it hath alwayes bene a custome among the faithfull, that when they should sacrifice vnto God, they had some signe of clenzing , that is to wit, of purging themselues from the filthinesse wherewith they had bene imbrewed and defiled . And this was not inuented by man: we must not thinke all this to haue bene deuised as a trifling toy by men: but it was Gods will it should be so . And wherefore? for his meaning was to put men in remembrance , that they are not worthie to approche vnto him . VVhen we come vnto God, it behoueth vs to acknowledge our owne poorenesse, and to be ashamed of it, and to say: How dare I preesse before the maiestie of my God? what fauour shall I finde there? Gods will is to haue this knownen in all ages: and now although we haue not the saide Ceremonie of clenzing our selues: yet it behoueth vs to haue the meaning of it in vs: that is to wit, that at all times, and as oft as we come vnto God to make our prayers and petitions vnto him, we must acknowledge that we be vnworthie, sauing that we know the meane wherby he receyuethe vs, that is to wit, to clenze our selues by beleeuing in our Lord Iesu Christ, knowing that he is the onely wasshing whereby all our spottes may be made cleane. Will we then be acceptable vnto God? It behoueth vs to attayne to it by the meanes of our Lorde Iesu Christ, shrowding vs vnder the grace which he hath purchased vs by his death and Passion, as who is the full perfection and accomplishment of the things that haue bene giuen forth in old time in figures and shadowes,

Therefore let vs cast our selues flat before the face of our good God, with acknowledgment of our offences, beseeching him to make vs know better what we haue left vndone: and that as long as we liue in this corruptible worlde, we acknowledging our selues to be wrapped in many sinnes, may resist the temptations of our flesh, and buckle our selues to battell against all things that may turne vs aside frō the obeying of our God. And although we faile in diuerse sortes, yet neuerthelesse let vs pray that we may walke in such soundnesse afore him, as we may desire nothing but to dedicate our selues wholly vnto him, and that it may please him to accept the seruice that we offer vnto him in the name of our Lord Iesu Christ, notwithstanding that it be vnperfect, vntill such time as his glorie shall shyne fully in vs. That it may please him to bestowe his benefite and grace, not onely vpon vs, but also vpon all people and Nacions of the Earth: &c.

The third Sermon vpon the first Chapter.

THIS Sermon is yet still vpon the text of the fift verse, which is set downe in the last Sermon afore, according also as it hath partly bene shewed alreadie.

Began to tell you yesterday, what is ment by this saying, that Job sanctified his childe, or commaunded them that euery of them should sanctifie himself. For vnder the Lawe and before the Lawe, when men offred sacrificyses, it behoued the offerers to be clenzed before hand: and that was to do them to wit, how we be not worthy to approch vnto God, by reason of our vncleannessesse and filthinesse. If we come vnto God such as we be of our selues: we deserue to be shaken of, and to be taken at his hand for stinking carions. Therfore it standeth vs in hand to make our selues cleane. And how may that be done? The men of old time had certayne Ceremonies, according as it was needfull that they should haue such healpes before the coming of our Lorde Iesu Christ, by reason of the rawenesse of the time. But now in these dayes we know, how we ought to haue recourse to the preciuose bloud of Gods sonne, which was shedde to wash vs withall. Therefore if we meane to be receyued for cleane before God: it behoueth vs to repayre to the bloud of our Lord Iesu Christ. And furthermore we, must also sighe for our sinnes. For by this meanes are we to be clenzed: namely by acknowledging the euill that is in vs, which by and by causeth a sorinesse, and hatred of our selues, for that we haue bene so vnhaippie as to displease God. And thus we see, why we haue no more the figures that were before the comming of our Lorde Iesu Christ, and yet do keepe still the truth and substance of them. What is to be done then at all times and as oft as we call vpon God? Every one of vs must haue an eye to his owne poorenesse and vncleannessesse, and be displeased with himselfe for it, and therewithall also desire our Lorde Iesu Christ to washe vs and make ys cleane with his bloud, so that we may appear as if we were pure and cleane, in the presence of God his father. And this is to be done, not onely one day in a weeke, nor for some certayne time: but continually all our life long: and we must beare in minde how saint Paule sayeth, that our Lord Iesu Christ was sacrificyzed as the true Easterlambe, to the end that we should still be coparteners of that sacrifice, specially (as he sayeth) in all purenesse. He sayeth not that Christians ought to sanctifie themselves vnto God once a yere: but that they ought to continew their holiness all their lyfe through out. Wherefore? Because the sacrifice which Iesu Christ hath offered, and whereof we be made coparteners, is euerlasting, and the vertue thereof indureth for euer. So then, let vs every morning and euening apply our indeuour to that which is shewed vs here: that is to wit, to sanctifie our selues, vntill it please God to be so gracieuse vnto vs, as to dwell with vs for euer. From the time that the lawe was published, God specially comauanded the Iewes, saying: Sanctifie your selues: for to morow (sayeth Moyses) the Lord will shew you his glorie. But God is openly shewed vnto vs in the person of his sonne, yea and that in such wise, as we may behold him as it were face to face, so the Gospel be preached, for there hath God discouered himselfe familiarly vnto vs. Therfore it becommeth vs to haue the sayd affection and zele which I haue spoken of: that is to wit, that we be wholly and fully giuen vnto him, forsaking all filthinesse that may hinder vs from the seruing and honoring of him. But it foloweth, that Job offred sacrificyses according to the number of his children. We haue alreadie briefly shewed, that although Job feared least his children had offended God: yet notwithstanding he forbade them not to keepe compaines stil togither, because their so doing was a good thing: but sought the remedie of the infirmities whereto men are inclined and subiect. Moreouer it may be demaunded, how it came to passe that Job durst offer sacrificye, seing he was not instructed in the lawe, specially for asmuch as it is very likely, that he liued before Moyses was borne. For the Sacrificyses that men offer vnto God without faith, deserue to be mislyked. How then could Job offer sacrificye, hauing not any assurance of Gods will? We must call againe to minde that which hath bene touched in the Lecture: that is to wit, that it was Gods will to haue alwaies some seede and remnant of people in the world, that should call vpon him with a pure hart, vntill such time as his Church were settled among the Iewes, and his law published in writing. True it is that by and by after the flood, Noes children were corrupted: I meane those that were descended of his race, who hauing yet the fresh remembrance of Gods horrible vengeance, ceased not to invent many superstitions, and to disanull the true seruing of God: yet notwithstanding there were alwaies some fewe remayning, which maynteyned themselues in the sayde purenesse that God comauandeth. And that was to the ende, as God hated and abhorred all sacrificizes that were made without knowledge and fayth. True it is that there was solemnite ynough in them: but that auayled nothing, for as much as it behoueth alwaies to hold the rule which the Apostle giueth vs: namely that the outward sacrificizes boote not at all, furtherforth than they be grounded vpon obedience vnto God and vnto his word. And true it is that Job had not the Law written: but it was ynough for him that he had the doctrine that came from God, and which Noe had giuen vnto his children. Those that had perseuered in the same, were not taught it by me: but although they hard the doctrine by men, yet notwithstanding they hilde the rule thereof as the rule of God. For it was ynough for them, that God gave them knowledge of his will, without vsing the meane of Prophets as he did afterwards. VVe see here then that Iobs Sacrificizes were not made at all aduenture, but vpon an assured and grounded sayth. VVhen it is sayd Gen. 8. d. 20. that Noe after the flud tooke of the cleane beasts to Sacrifice: therby we see he had instructiō frō heauen, for it lay not in him to discerne betweene beast and beast, so as he should say, Amōg these I see some that be pure & cleane, and the residew be vnclane. Needes must God haue taught him that. Euen so also is it with Job: who made not sacrificize, for that he was the only deuiser of it: but he yeelded himself to Gods will, wherby he was guyded and governed, & that is the propertie of faith, according as I haue sayd alreadie. And herevpon we haue to consider, first that frō the beginning of the world, God hath in suchwise suffered me to go on in darknesse, that yet notwithstanding he hath left them certayne recordes, whereby they might be couicted of their cursednesse: in so much that if there were nothing else but the outwarde Ceremonies, it were fully ynough to condēne the vnbeleeuers. Furthermore we see also how men be wholly giuen to euill, in so much as they peruerter the things that are good and holie, and when God hath declared his will vnto them, they turne it altogether backward and to the flat contrarie. For asmuch then as we see men so fleeting and vncertaine: we may perceyue that we haue neede to pray vnto God to keepe vs in awe, and not to suffer vs to step aside from the purenesse of his seruice, as it will befall vs if he holde vs not backe. And herewithall we be also warned, that the seruing of God in outward shew, and the setting of a fayre face vpō it, is not all that is to be done: but that the chiefest poynt, is to serue him in deede, by knowing what a one he is, and what his will is, to the ende to hold ourselues therenvnto. For there hath bene great pompe in the sacrificyses of the Paynims, yea and euen of them that haue serued God aright: and yet notwithstanding the one sort haue bene rejected, and God hath abhorred them, & the other sort haue bene acceptable vnto him. The Heathen me made their sacrificizes with great pomp, they had incense and perfumes & such other like things. And the Lewes (specially in the Law,) did as much. But how? As for the Paynims which ment to honor God without knowing him, for asmuch as they knew not any whit of God or of his maiestie: needes must they do sacrificize vnto the Idols which they had forged and set vp in their own brayne. God the accepteth not any other seruice, than that which is done vnto him by one that knoweth him. Thus much for the first point. And for the secōd, it behoueth that the seruing of God be spirituall. The Pagans haue surmized, that God would be appeased if a man offered him an Ox or a Calfe: but that was a great mockerie: as who would say, that God were transfigured, and that when he is angrie with men, they could appease him by the meane aforesayd. Therefore it behoueth men to set downe this rule first of all, namely that the seruing of God is spirituall: we must mount farre hygher than

end that God might continually haue some Church in the world, & some small nūber of people to worship him. And herewithall he would also that the same should turne to the dānation of the vnbeleeuers, & that they should be made the more vnescusfable. VVe know that men labour continually to shrowde theselues vnder the couert of ignorāce: and they beare theselues in hand, that they be cleared before God, when they haue gotten that buckler. But Gods will hath alwayes bene, that there should euer be some smal number of people to serue him in al purenesse, & the same haue evermore bene as iudges of all those that are turned aside, and gone astray frō the right way. So hath it also bene cōcerning Job. Yea all we know also, that God hath ordeyned Sacrificyzings euen frō the beginning of the world. For had they bene inuented at mans pleasure, they had bene but tryfles and apish toyes, which God would haue reiectet. And furthermore we know, that the sacrificizes of Abel were preferred before the sacrificizes of Cain, by reason of faith. But if Abel had deuised the sayd maner of sacrificyzing to God, of his own head: he could not haue had any fayth. For the chiefe poynt is, that God do leade vs and gouerne vs: and faith can never be without obediēce: it must needs be answereable to that which God hath ordeyned. So then we see that God is the author of the Sacrificizes that haue bene euer since the creatiō of the world. And when he cōmaunded men to do sacrificize vnto him: he did it not without shewing the end & marke wherto the same tended. For had me offred but the brute beasts without vnderstanding: it had bene of no valew, and it had serued but for a mockerie. But we know that God in strūcteth those that be his, vnto their saluation. Therefore there is no doubt, but that God in cōmaunding Sacrificizes, did also shew the true vse of them, and how they might profite men to their saluation. And this was to the end they might know themselues to be vtterly vnworthie to come neare him, and that they had deserued death, so as it behoued them to acknowledge themselues wholly blameworthy, and therewithall also vnderstand, that there was yet some meanes whereby to reconcile themselues vnto him. And so in the first place wee note, that suche as haue 40 serued sacrificizes rightely and according to Gods will, haue graunted themselues to haue bene giltie of death, in case as if a man should passe a lawful obligation or bond of some debt. Also this is the cause wherefore Sainct Paule speaking to the Collosians of the Ceremonies of the Lawe, termeth them obligations, bonds, and handwritings which serue to hold men in bondage before God, and to shewe them that they could not shunne the iudgement of endless death, were it not for one remedie which God hath giuen of his owne free mercie. And it is a very good and profitable lesson, when men acknowledge and confessethemselues giltie before God, and set before their owne eyes what they haue deserued, so as when a brute beast is slayne, they knowe it is for their sinnes sake. Lo how Gods minde was to allure men to lowlinesse. Here withall it was his will also to nourish them in hope, that although they were wretched, yet notwithstanding there should be one sacrificize offered, wherby their sinnes should be washed away. Behold how the fathers of old time vsed their Sacrificizes. And herevpon the Heathen folke haue done the like: but that hath bene without faith, because they knew not the God vnto whom they ought to haue done the honour, & on the other side, they knew not what seruice was acceptable to God, and therefore they had no sure ground to stand vpō: to be short, they knew not, neither to what end, nor to what purpose they made sacrificize. By reason whereof all was done at auenture, (as they say) and so was it but a needelesse labour, specially forasmuch than these visible shapes: for they must leade vs to a heauenly end, and not holde vs downe here in the worlde without lifting vp of our mindes vnto heauen. Yee see then how the faythfull haue alwayes their eye vpon God when they made sacrifice: and therby were put in minde of their vices and sinnes, to the ende to be displeased with themselues for the same. The Paynims knew no whit of this. Now then we perceyue, that we may not rest vpon the outward shewe, when we deale with the seruing of God: but we must come to the well head: that is to wit, 10 we must know which is the God whom we should worship, and we must vnderstand how and in what wise it becommeth vs to preace vnto him, and that the Ceremonies which we vse, do leade vs to this spirituall seruice whereof mention is made here. As for example, in these dayes the Papists haue many Ceremonies like vnto vs: for they can well bow downe their knees when they purpose to pray, and they haue such other things: And yet for all that, we see they know not wherevnto they shape themselues, forasmuch as they go to kneele downe before a puppet of 20 wodde or stone: wherby they shew how they know not what God is: and so it must needes be, that all the religio which they thinke themselues to haue, is vncleane and vnholie. They haue store of apish toyes: but they turne all vpside downe, bycause they regard not what God hath commaunded, but rather follow their owne inuentions, bearing themselues in hande, that they haue done much, when they haue patched a great sorte of ragges togither. But they labour in vayne, forasmuch as they holde not themselues vnder the rule of Gods worde. Behold wherin we differ from them which know not how there is but one God whom we ought to worship, and vnto whom we must come by meanes of our Lord Iesus Christ, and that it behoueth vs to serue him according to his worde. VVhen we know this: we may well say, that the sacrifices which we offer vnto God are acceptable vnto him, and that he taketh them in good woorth. But we obserue also, that many men abuse euен the sayd maner of worshipping God which is good and holy, in asmuch as they do it after a beastly maner. How is that? True it is that we haue not any Idolles in it: true it is that we haue none of all the fine maskingknackes that are in the papacie, wherwith the seruice of God is infected and marred. But yet there are which thinke they haue well quit themselues, when they haue done some Ceremony, as whē they haue put of their cap, or made curtisie. Beholde how they discharge themselues afore God (for so they beare themselues in hand) and yet in the meane while regard not the lowlinesse that I haue spoken of: namely that when we preace vnto God, it becommeth vs to acknowledge our selues giltie before him by reason of our sinnes: they regard not the meane of seeking fauour in our Lord Iesus Christ: they regard not the yeelding of themselues vnto God in all purenesse, so as they may be holy vnto himward. They passe not a whit for all this geere. They haue good store of outward Ceremonies. Yea verely, but (as I haue sayd) all this is nothing. Nowe then let vs learne to serue God in spirit and truth, and faith wil be a good guide therewith, when we haue our eyes fastened vpon Gods worde, which will leade vs alwayes to our Lord Iesus Christ, who is the heauely patterne & the mirrour wherin we must behold the will of God his father, to frame our selues thereafter. Thus much concerning the Sacrificing whereof mention is made in this place. Nowe when it is sayde that Job offred Sacrifices according to the number of his children: it is to shew that he spared not his substance which God had indewed him withall. If he had bene a poore man, he had bene neuer a whit lesse welcome vnto

Heb. 8. b. 5.

God, though he had brought no sacrifice at all. But in asmuch as he had the meane and abilitie wherwith to do it: it is sayd that he employed it thereabout. And nowe let vs apply the same to our selues. I haue told you already, that we haue not any more the sacrificyzing which was before the comming of our Lorde Iesus Christ. But when the care concerneth praying vnto God: (which according as the principall seruice which he demaundeth at our hands, Psal. 50. c. 14. 15.) is that we should call vpon him, that we should profess him, that our whole welfare should depend vpō him, that we should giue him thankes for his benefites, and that we should inforce our selues to be holy both in body & soule: euē so, (to the end that all the whole may be consecrated to his honour,) we must also serue our neighbours turnes with the things that he hath giuen vs, assuring our selues that our being in this world is to the end that we should be partakers one with another, in such wise as no man ought to be giuen to himself, but all of vs ought to profite the members wherewith God hath knit and vniited vs together. Seing it is so, let euery man haue an eye to himselfe. True it is that to pray vnto God is a thing common to all men. Neuerthelesse it behoueth eche one of vs to pricke forward himself, according to the knowledge which he hath. VVhen a man is better taught than others: it is certayne that he ought to be so much the more earnest and feruent in praying vnto God, and also to haue a greater care of himself. Thus ye see how we ought to consider what our abilitie and measure is. And afterward when it commeth to the offering of our selues vnto God: it behoueth vs to haue an eye to that which he hath indewed vs withall, for according as euery of vs hath receyued, so shall he be the more blame worthy if he glorifie not God. So then, whē soever God giueth more abundance of his spirit vnto vs, than to other men: we must looke well to it, that we make our neighbours partakers with vs: that such as haue wisedome, giue couſell vnto others: and that such as haue abundance, succour such as haue neede of it. Lo here how we ought to frame our selues vnto that which is spokēn here of Job: namely that he offered sacrifices according to the number of his children. As for the residew, wherces it is sayd that Job offered sacrifice for his children: it is to shew vs, that such as haue charge of others, must be watchful, and that when any fault happeneth, they must hold themselues blameworthie before God for the same. And this is well worthie to be marked. For we see how ambition reigneth in the world. If a man haue many children: he is glad that he hath so many reasonable creatures to be vnder him at his comauement. If he haue wherwith to finde a great household: he liketh well of himself for it. But what? All is but mere Ambition or vaineglorie. For there is no regard had of the charge that is matched with it. True it is that God doeth men great honour, when he giueth those whom he hath created after his owne Image, vnto the to be their vnderlings. But yet therewithall, this honour carieth a great bond with it: namely that such as haue householde to gouerne, must alwayes be watchfull. For if an offence be committed against God in any household: he that is the head & maister of the house, must thinke himself blameworthie. He must mourne before God as if himself were the partie that had done the deede: and although he be not consenting vnto it, yet must he thinke thus with himselfe. I haue not discharged my selfe of my duetie, albeit that I watch both night and day. Although I exhort as wel my children as also my men seruants, and my mayde seruants to serue God: yet is it impossible for me to do all that I ought to do. For I see my chilđre offend, I see faults in my men seruants, and mayd seruants. Of whom take they they it? Although I take payne to instruct them, yet are there many things to be found faulfe with. For I haue not giuen them such example as I ought. Had I walked in the feare of God as becommeth me, they must needes haue folowed my steppes: and so it may be that their stepping aside from the right way, hath bene through my default and offence: and therfore I must shew them such example as I would haue them to folow. If fathers and masters that haue children and seruants vnder their hand, had this regard with them: things would be better ordered than they be. And aboue all others, Princes and Magistrates ought to marke this president, that it behoueth them to be watchfull, and to set good gard vpon such as are committed to their charge: so as if there be any fault, they must thinke themselues to blame for it: and if they espie any disorders or loocenesse, they must assure themselues, that it is because they themselues haue not discharged their dutie. Likewise is it with the Ministers of Gods worde. If they perceyue that the Church behaueth not it selfe as it ought to do, so as it haue troubles and contrarieties in it, and specially that Gods name be blasphemed: it behoueth them to sigh for it, and to beare the burthen of it, assuring themselues that God sheweth vnto them, that they haue not discharged themselues as they should haue done. And here ye see why Sainct Paule sayeth, that he is brought lowe because of the faults that were in the Church of Corinth. Behold, it was Gods will (sayeth he) to do me shame there. Had Sainct Paule consented to whoredome, or to robbery, or to wantonnesse, or to other such vices of the Corinthians? No, he had laboured to rebuke them by all means possible: can it be sayd that he had shewed them the way of riot? No whit at all. But although he had discharged himself to the vttermost towards men: yet notwithstanding he ceassed not to feele still, that God ment as it were to disgrace him in part, so as he was fayne to bewyle the offences and disorders that happened in the Church wherof he had the direction and charge. If Sainct Paule, who had had such a zele to do his duetie, did neuerthelesse feele himself blameworthie when there befell any misorder in the Church: I pray you what will become of vs, who are as colde as yee in respect of him? what shall become of them which make no account at all whither God be honored or no: but all is one with them so they may make their owne profitte and maynteyne their owne state? Then let vs marke well that which is sayd here: that Job sacrificyd according to the number of his childre: and let vs likewise take good aduice to huble our selues afore God, and not onely to aske him forgiuenesse when the mischiefe is come to passe, but also to preuent it as much as is possible. And how? That parents hold their children short: that Maisters looke well about them, so as God be serued and honored by them, and their houles well ruled in all purenesse, that they may be as it were litle Churches: Also that such as haue a more honorable charge and authoritie, be so much the more diligēt. As for example, that the Magistrates be circumspect to make lawes conuenient to hold their people in good order, and to cut of all things that are against the seruice and honour of God: and that when they haue done so, they be diligent to see good order kept whē it is once appointed, so as they shut not their eyes to make countenance of not perceyuing the misorder a whit when a fault is committed, but alwayes haue medicines preseruatiue at hande: That the Ministers of Gods worde tarie not till all be marred, and till the Diuell haue gotten his full scope: but that assoone as they perceyue any breach, and that things folow not on in good array, they indeuour to remedie it with all speede pōsible, to the end that things go not to haucke as they be comonly wont to do. And now it followeth that Job sayd: It may be that my Children haue sinned: and that they haue blisſed God: for so it is worde for worde. But the word Blisſe is sometimes taken to Curse: as when it is sayde, that Naboth had Blisſed God and the King, that is to say had Cursed them. And we shall see such examples againe hereafter, and then will I declare more at large, after what maner this worde is put in two contrarie significations. But before we come to that, let vs marke how it is reported here in the text, that Job sayde. It may be that my children haue sinned. Here we see that Job wayted not that God should sende him some message to threaten him for the sinnes of hischildre: but preuented the matter and was carefull of it without any mans warning, saying: It may be that my children haue done amisse. And this is a point which we ought to marke well. For now adayes there are very fewe that can abide to be admonished and to be told of their faults, although their faults be notorious in al respects: yet (if it be possible) they will finde some shift or other to excuse and hide theselues, in so much that if a man will rebuke them that do amisse, he must prepare himself to sustaine mortal warre at their hād, so as he shal be as a deadly foe to them for procuring their welfare. But if me can not abide to be rebuked when they do amisse: how will they of the selues and of their owne good will, blame themselues as worthie to be reproved, and say: It is possible that I haue committed such a fault, eyther I or mine: But we see here how Job thought alwaies in himself, It is possible that my cbldren haue sinned. And so the holy Ghost hath shewed vs what our duetie is: that is to wit, that when we perceiue our selues faultie and worthie to be condemned, every of vs must pricke and spurre vp himselfe to make his owne accusation of his owne good will. And vpon farre stronger reason, I say that when God is so gracieulē vnto vs as to prouoke vs, so as we haue others to exhort vs to do our dutie: if we be stuppeorne against God vpon his sending of such messengers vnto vs, and suffer not our selues to be reproved by them: it is certaine that we set not our selues against mortall men, but that we bende our selues against the Majestie of God, who would fayne plucke vs backe to saluation, when he seeth vs readie to throwe our selues headlong into euerlasting destruction. Marke this for a speciall poynt. And by the way we see that Job tooke not thought onely for himselfe, but also for those that were committed to his charge, according to that which we haue sayd. But now adayes, men do the cleane contrarie. For if a man can excuse himself: by and by he taketh couert as fast he may. Hath a man done this or that? He will streyn make a leazing to discharge himself, that he may not be acknowledne of his fault. If he haue eyther children or seruants, he will seeke to discharge himself that way, saying: yea marie, I haue heard that such a thing was done, but it was not long of me. Thus we see how the most parte of men do seeke such startingholes. And it had bene much more for Jobs behoofe to haue layd the burden vpon others. But he knew that of his children did amisse, he himself should yeld account for it. So then let vs learne, not to soothe our selues in hypocrisie, nor to devise how to cherishe the vices which we ought to redresse as much as in vs lieth. Behold what is shewed vs here. And by the way it may be demaūded, whither Job ought to haue tormentid himself so in vayne, so long as the faultes were unknownen to him: for it seemeth to be sufficient if a man humble himself afore God assoone as he perceyuth that he hath done amisse: but as for to imagine, it may be that I haue done amisse, it may be that I haue committed such a fault: it seemeth that that is more than needeth. First of all let vs beare in minde that which Salomon sayeth in his

his xxvij. Chapter. Right happie (sayeth he) is the man that feareth , or which maketh himself to feare, (for so doth the word import,) that is to say, which inureth himself to be afrayd: but he that hardeneth his hart (sayeth he) shall runne headlong into al euill. In saying so, Salomō sheweth vs, that we must walke heedfully , looking still afore vs, whither we may haue committed any fault. And this feare is doubled there : to do vs to vnderstand that we must feare, as wel for that which is to come, as for that which is past . Our feare for that which is to come, must 10 be this: namely that we beare in minde how we ought to walke aright in al our wayes, & that we haue the forecast and skill to aske couſell at the Lordes mouth as the Prophet Esay commaundeth vs, and to betake our selues to his holy spirit , to the end that he may giue vs wisedome to keepe our selues from swaruing one way or other after what maner so euer it be. Thus ye see how we should feare for the time comming . Our feare for that which is past, ought to be this: that although we know not the faults which we haue comited, and that there haue ſcapēd many vices ouerthwart our eyes without perceyuing them: yet ne: ertheleſſe it behoueth vs to bethinke vs thereof, and to mislike of it, and to condemne our selues for the ſame. And thus we ſee after what ſort it behoueth vs to be afrayd, both for the time past and for the time to come. And this is it that we haue to note vpon the ſayde ſentēce when Job ſayd : It may be that my children haue ſinned, notwithstanding that they ment not ſo to do. And the care that we ought to haue to prouoke our selues to call vpon God, is that he ſhould pardon our offences, to 30 the end he ſuffer vs not to ſteep aside any way, but that we may contine in the path which he sheweth vs. In conclusion, when Job ſayeth, It may be that my children haue Blifed the Lord: we muſt marke that the worde Blife is taken to Cuſe, notwithstanding that it ſignifie to bliffe. And that is done to make the matter more odious, to the intent we may know what a fault it is, not to bliffe God, that is to ſay, not to yeeld him the prayſe which he hath deserued at our handes . For at ſuch a deede, the heares ought to ſtand vp vpon our head, and we ſhould ſhake & quake for feare when mention is made of Curing God . Ye ſee now wherfore the word blife God, hath bene applied to the contrarie vſe . And this is it that is ment when in ſhort wordes it is ſayd, that Job feared leaſt his children had not bliſſed God as became them, or that they had not bliſſed him at all, which is all one as if they had curſed him. For the principall poyn̄t that we haue to conſider, is how we ought to glorifie God in all our life: and hereby we ſee also to what end we be created, and wherfore we liue . Therfore if we be deſirous to haue our life allowable before God, we muſt alwayes ayme at this marke: namely that he be bliſſed and glorified by vs, and that we haue ſuſh a burning zeale & affection to ſerue to his glory, as we may aſſure our ſelues, that it is an intollerable, yea and even a moſt horriblie thing in all reſpects, that his name ſhould be blaſphemed and as it were curſed through vs, that is to ſay, that we ſhould cauſe his glorie to be as it were defaced, ſpecially ſiſh he hath put his image in vs, to the ende it ſhould ſhine forth in vs. To the intent therefore that we ouerſhoote not our ſelues as many do, who liue not but to blaſphemē God, that is to ſay, to be accuſed of him, because his name is blaſphemed by them: let vs beare in minde, that ſuſh people are as monſters made againſt kinde . Neuertheleſſe let vs pray God, to giue vs the grace to know, why he hath ſet vs in the world: which is to the ende we ſhould magnifie him, wayting for that moſt happie day wherein he ſhall gather vs vp wholly to himſelfe, when we haue liued in ſuſh wife in this world, as we haue not ſought to be gouerned otherwife than by him, ſubmitting our ſelues vnto him in all reſpects and all caces.

But let vs caſt downe our ſelues before the face of our good God, with acknowledgment of our ſinnes: praying him of his goodneſſe to make vs feele better what we haue done, ſpecially in ſuſh ſort, as we may come to preſent our ſelues vnto him, without deſire of any thing, ſauie onely to finde him merciſfull for our Lord Iefus Christes ſake. And for aſmuch as we know we be beſet with ſo great infirmities as we finde in our ſelues, and that he is the only Phyſician that can heale vs: let vs pray him to purge vs more & more, vntill he haue brought vs to the perfection for the which we long continually . And ſo let vs all ſay, Almigh‐tie God our heauenly father we acknowledge in our ſelues, and we confeſſe as truſt is : &c.

The fourth Sermon vpon the first Chapter.

- 6 IT cameto paſſe one day, that the ſoules of God came to appeare before the Lord, and Satan alſo came amongst them.
7. And the Lord ſayd to Satan: whence commest thou? Satan anſwering, ſayd vnto the Lord, from walking about, and from hunting vpon the earth.
8. And the Lord ſayd vnto Satan: haſt thou taken heede of my ſeruant Job; who hath not his match vpon earth, a ſound and vpright man, and fearing God and withdrawinge himſelf from euill?

E haue ſene by the premisses, what the life and conuerſation of Job was among men: and now is shewed in what wife God diſpoſed of him, to the ende we might know, that while we liue here belowe, we be not gouerned by fortune, but God hath an eye vpon vs, and full authoritie ouer vs, as good reaſon is he ſhould haue, ſeing that we be his creatures . For anouſter we ſhall ſee, how it pleased God to affiſt Job, wherin the chiefe thing that is principally touched, is that God hath the direſtion of the worlde, and that there is not any thing done, which is not diſpoſed by him. To exprefſe this, the Scripture vſeth a fashion agreeable to our rudenesſe. For we be ſo weake, as we can neuer comprehend Gods

Maieſtie in the full highneſſe thereof, nor poſſibly attayne vnto it . Therfore it behoueth God to come downe to be coprehended of vs: that is to wit, that he ſhew not himſelf in his glorie, which is infinite, but according to the ſmal capacitié that he ſeeth in vs, wherenvnto he applieth himſelf. To be ſhort, we ſhal neuer know God as he is, but we ſhal know him in ſuſh meaſure as it ſhal pleafe him to maifest himſelf vnto vs, that is to wit, according to that which he knoweth to be proſtitute for our ſaluation . And the manner of ſpeak whiſh we ſee here: when it is ſayde that the Angels appeared before God as it were on a ſolenme high day, is borowed of the Kings of this world, which keepe Dan.7.d.10. their estates and Aſſyres . Certaine it is (as the Scripture Psal.34.b.8. ſheweth in many other places) that the Angels are euer- & 91.c.11. more before God, notwithstanding that they execute his Exod.11.b.5.

commaundements, according as it is sayd that they pitche their tents round about vs to gard vs, and that God hath appoynted them to guyde vs, to the ende we should be as it were vnder their protection. Also it is sayd that they execute his wrath and vengeance vpon the wicked. But yet for all this, the Angels being spirites, are not hindered to serue God, and to obey him, nor to execute his iudgement here belowe, albeit that they be all the whyle continually in his presence. And therfore when our Lord Iesus Christ sayeth, that the Angels which haue the keeping of little infants, do continually see and behold the face of his father: thereby it is gauen vs to vnderstand, that although the Angels assit vs, and that we feel their vertue in main-tayning vs: yet notwithstanding they ioy still all the while in the glory of God, and are not separated from him. And therfore wheras it is sayd in this text, that they appeared: it is not ment, that when God sendeth them forth they be separated from his Maiestie and deprived of the heauenly life during the time that they are in their voyage: but for asmuch as we be rude & grosse, the Scripture ment to like God to earthly Princes, to the end that by a more homely & familiar maner, we might know how the Angels do not any thing of their owne propre mouing, but that it is God which comandeth them, who hath all dominion ouer the, and they come to yeelde him account, and nothing is hid frō him, in so much as the Angels haue not any proper or peculiar authoritie in themselues: and that although they be called Powers, Principalities, and Vertewes, it is not for that God hath resigned his own office vnto them, it is not for that he hath despoyled himself of his own power, it is not for that he himself abideth ydle in heauen: but it is for that the Angels are instruments of his power, to the end it should be spread out ouer all. VVe see then what we haue to gather of this text: that is to wit, that God worketh in such wise by meane of his Angels in the gouerning of worldly matters, that all of the come to accout afore him, in such sort as nothing can escape him. And furthermore wheras it is sayd, That Satan also came among the Angels: it is not for that he wound himself in thither, as some haue vnderstood it that he crowded himself into the cōpanie to make himselfe a good page: But contrariwise, the holy Ghost ment to do vs to vnderstand, that not only the Angels of Heauen which obey God willingly, and are wholly inclyned, & given that way, do yeelde account vnto him, but also the Diuels of hell which are enimies and rebels to him to the vttermost of their power, which labour to subuert his Maiestie, and prætize to confound all things: so as they be forced (spite of their teeth) to be subiect vnto God and to yeeld him account of all their doings, and cannot do any thing without his permission and leaue. Thus ye see in what wise Satan appeared among the Angels. But yet by the way, the maner of theyr dealing is diuers. For when the Angels guyde vs, and do the thing that God hath commaunded: they haue the nature to apply themselfes vnto him, and haue none other inclinatiō but to obey him, & he on the other side dwelleth and reigneþ in them by his holy spirit. Lo here the cause why we say, Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heauen. Because we see so much counterfayting and so many horrible rebellions against God here belowe: we desire him to settle his kingdome peaceably here as it is aloft, where his Angels be wholly obedient vnto him. But the Diuels obey him as inforced, that is to say, not of their owne good will, but bicause God compelleth them. They would with all their hart resist his power, and oppresse him if they could: but they be fayne to follow him in all points whether so euer he listeth to leade them. And hereby we see why the Angels are in this place expressly termed the children of God, and the Diuell by his propre title of Aduersarie, for so dothe the worde Satan signifie in Hebrew. True it is that men are very oftentymes called the Children of God, bycause he hath printed his image in them, specially in the faythfull, forasmuch as they be reformed to the likenesse of our Lord Iesus Christ, who Col.1. b. 15. is the lively image of God his father, and also for that Hebr.1. a. 3. they haue receyued the spirit of adoption, which is a Rom.8.c.15. warrant vnto them that God beareth a fatherly loue to- Gal. 4. a. 6. wards them. Rightly therefore may we be called the chil-dren of God. So may also Princes and Magistrates. For they haue the same honorable title, which is gauen vnto Psal.82. them, bycause God hath aduaunced them, and set them in that hie estate, to the intent to be knowne in the person of them. VVe see then how the name of Gods Children may well be applyed to men. But the Angels are so called in the Scripture, bicause they drawe neere vnto God, and are as it were beames of his brightness. And therefore in Col.1.c.16. asmuch as God calleth them Principalities, Vertues, and Highnesse, it is good reason that we also shold acknowledg them to be as it were the sonnes of God, forasmuch as we may not separate the vertue that is in them, from the vertue of God, bicause they be as streames that gushe out of that fountaine and spring, and we must awytes repayre thither. Let vs know then that this honour of being taken and reputed for the children of God, belongeth to the Angels, bicause his glory vterreth and sheweth it self in them. And therefore so much the more are we be-holden to the infinite goodnessse of our God, who hath appointed them to be our seruāts by meanes of our Lord Iesus Christe. For in asmuch as our Lord Iesus Christ, who is the onely Sonne of God his father, yea euen his naturall sonne, (for the belonging of this honour vnto him is not befalne vnto him through grace, but he is his naturall sonne, and for the same cause, his only sonne also) In asmuch then (I say) as our Lord Iesus Christ hath not bene spared for our redemption & saluation: the Angels also (who are the children of God) are by his meane appointed to serue vs, as the Apostle sheweth in the Epi-stle to the Hebrewes, and also as it is shewed by Jacobs lad-Hebr.1. d. 15. der, where it is sayd that the Angels came downe frō hea-Gen.28.c.12. uen to the earth: and Iesus Christ affirmeth the same thing John.1.g.51. to be accomplished in his kingdome: you shall see the An-gels (sayeth he) come downe from heauen vnto men. So then seing we perceyue that God hath ordeyned his An-gels to serue for our welfare: so much the more are we bound to his mercie. Moreouer he hath done vs so great honour, that his Sonne (to redeeme vs) hath not taken vpon him the nature of the Angels: but (as the Apostle Heb.1.d.16. sayeth) hath clothed himself with our nature and our sub-stance. VVhen we see that the Sonne of God is come so neare vnto vs, as to vouchsafe to be partaker of mans nature, we may perceyue that his so doing is the verie w̄c̄spring from whence proceedeth the other grace, that the Angels trauell and watch in our behalf, and also that it is their peculiar charge and vocation to procure our wel-fare. According herevnto, the holie Ghost sholeth them out from them that be with Satan, and sheweth that they be willingly the seruants of God. In what wise? Euen as his Children. VVhen a childe obeyeth his father, he doeth it not against his will: but he doeth it bycause he is inclyned therewnto, bicause his owne nature teacheth him so to do, and bicause he hath a certaine louingnesse which induceth him to discharge hiunselfe of his duetie: and euen so do the Angels. On the other side, Satan is an aduersarie. For albeit that he appeared before God and was fayne to render his account: yet was it not for that he yeelded of his owne accordē, nor for that he was willing wiling to be subiect vnto God: but rather he rowzed himself against him, and was inflamed with so excessive rage, that he wold have ouerthrown Gods power if it had bene possible for him. So then he hild still his naturall corruptiōn, that is to wit, of being alwayes an enemie: and yet was he constrainyd to come and do homage to him that hath the souerayne dominion ouer all creatures. For Satan also is subiect vnto God, and therefore it may not be surmyzed that Satan hath any authoritie, other than is giuen him by God. And good reason it is that all should be subiect to him, sith that all things proceede from him. The Diuels were created by God as well as the Angels, howbeit not such as they now be. VVe must alwayes hold this for a certaintie, that the naughtinesse which is in the Diuels, procedeth of themselues, and that when they became Apostataze, to separate themselues from the fountayne of rightuousnesse, they forsooke God, and turned themselues away from him. Lo how they were peruerted and became altogether cuill. Likewise whereas sinne is in mans nature: it is not of Gods putting in by creation, but by reason that Satā did spread his naughtinesse further abroad at such time as man was beguyled by his wyliness, to disappoint the benefit of God. Thus ye see how the Diuels became accursed of themselues, and that their being cruell, full of rebellion, full of lying, and full of wickednesse, came altogether of their turning away from their

Iude.1.a.6. thereof? For when it is sayd, that the Diuell is the Prince of the world: it were ynoch to make vs afryde, were it not that we know there is a brydle aloft, which reyneth him backe, and hindereth him of doyng that which he would. For if Satans power were not limited, he wold out of hand haue his full fling at vs. VVe knowe he desirēth nothing but our destruction, according also as he is our deadly enemie: so that (as it is sayd of him in another

vnder him. Go now and chalenge great nobilitie. Go your wayes and auance your selues: yet shall the Diuell haue dominion ouer you, how soever it be. Lo how God cutteth mens combes, and maketh them ashamed. After he hath so brought them downe, he waketh them vp againe, to the end they shold walke in more feare. For if wee thought we had not an enemie that would make warre vpon vs, or that were so puissant: we wold be slouthfull, and we shold liue here as it were in peace. But behold, 1.Pet.5.c.8. God telleteth vs that Satan is like a roaring Lion which hath his throte euer open to swalow vs vp: and that we haue no weapons to resist him, except he giue vs them: so as our force must come of him: and that is to make vs be-thinke our selues well, and stand vpon our garde, and not to be sleepie, for then the Diuell will straigntwaies take vs vnprouided. Thus then we see why the Scripture sayeth that the Diuell is Prince of the world: namely euen to the intent, first of all to bring vs lowe, and afterward to teache vs feare and warenesse, that we may call vpon God, beseeching him that he will not suffer vs to fall into Satans snares, but that he will strengthen vs as he hath promised to do, so as we may alwayes keepe good watch. Furthermore also on the other side, to the intent that Satans puissance be not ouer terrible vnto vs to make our courage quayle, and to cast vs into despayre: it is sayd vnto vs that he can do nothing without Gods comission, that he must be fayne to aske leauē of him, and that when he hath spit out bothe fire & flame, he can do nothing more than God permitteth him by his good pleasure. True it is that the Diuell will not cease to be furious, and to venture himself vpon the pykes: but what shall that boote him, sith God will neuer suffer him to do otherwise than he shall thinke good, & no more. VVe see then to what purpose it is here declared vnto vs, why the Diuell steppeth in among the children of God. It is not for that he wound himselfe in as though he had bene of the companie and order of the Angels: but it is to shewe vs that he is vnder Gods obey-sance as well as the Angels, howbeit that it is in a farre other qualitie. For the holy Ghost nameth him aduersarie, wheras the Angels are called the childē of God, to signifie vnto vs that the Angels obey with their good wil, and that they be willing seruants, whereas Satan is inforced, so as there is nothing but necessitie and constraint in him. But let vs nowe come to that which the Scripture addeth: namely that God demanded of Satan, from whence he came, and that Satan answered, from going about the Earth, yea even to hunt. VVhen such rehersals are made, we know alwayes how it is for our infirmtie: for God needed not to enquire what Satan had done in the worlde. But what then? For as much as our rudenesse and the small measure of our vnderstanding comprehend not these things: it behoueth vs (as I sayd afore) that there be such a declaration as is agreeable to vs. And herein we see the goodnesse of God: in that he frameth himself vnto vs: and because we cannot attayne vnto him, nor mount so high: he humbleth himself to vs, and as it were transformeth himself, to the end that we shold know that which is good and conuenient for vs: Seeing that God cometh so vnto vs: I pray you, ought not we to be confounded with shame if we be slowe to heare him? And hereby we see what a villanie it is of the that would bereue poore idotes of all doctrin. For they say that the holy Scripture is ouerhard for a man to byte vpon. True it is, that in respect that there is nothing else but darknesse in vs, the Scripture will be very hard for vs: but yet therewithall, a man must consider how God hath promised to enlighten the little ones and the lowly. And indeede we see, how he hath proceeded. For to what Psal.19.c.3. purpose is it set out vnto vs here so homelily and after the maner maner of men? God sheweth vs how his meaning is, not onely to instruct the great Clerkes, and such as are very subtle and well exercysed in schooles: but also to apply him self vnto vs that are of the rudeſt & vnſkilfulleſt ſort, that can be. Seing God proceedeth ſo on his part: what an unthankfullerneſſe is it for men to drawe backewarde, and to ſhrowd themſelues vnder this shadow & colour of ſaying that it is i[m]poſſible for them to vnderſtand the meaning of the holy Scripture? For we ſee how God hath applied himſelf vnto vs. By the way we haue to gather chiefely,

how it is the minde of the holy Ghost, to ſhewe what Satans office is, what his nature is, and whereabout he buſieth and applieth himſelf altogether: which is (as I haue ſayd) to hunt after his pray without ceaſſing, like a roring lyon. And S.Peter vſeth the ſayd ſimilitude purpoſely, to waken, vs that we might stand vpon our garde night and day, and call vpon God to defend vs agaynst all the aſſaultes of our enimie, and againſt all that he can practize againſt vs. True it is that we ſee not Satan, ne perceyue

not by eye ſight what he prepaſeth and practizeth to our deſtruſion: & therfore haue we ſo much the more cauſe to be afraide of his guyles and policies. Lo here the cauſe why S.Paule ſayeth, that our fighting is not againſt fleſh and bloud. For hereby he meaneth, that if we had to deale with viſible enimies, we might well eſcape their handes by ſome ſhift or other, and we might finde the meane to reſiſt them. But behold (ſayeth he) they be ſpirituall guyles that fight againſt vs, of whom we haue no ſight at all, except God giue vs the eyes of fyath to eſpie how Satan is againſt vs, ſpecially by the temptaſions that he triumpeth in our way, whereby he eggeth vs to euill, and laboreth to marre vs. So then, we muſt fully reſolute our ſelues of this poyn̄t: namely that the Diuelles are alwayes buzie to procure our deſtruſion, that they go about the earth, that they be neuer away from vs, that they be euer ſeeking meaneſſe to get into vs, and that as ſoone as they find neuer ſo ſmall a breach, they enter into vs to throwe vs into endleſſe deſtruſion, and we be ſurpryzed before we miſtrift that we are affayled, according as euery man knoweth by expe‐rience, that we perceyue not when the Diuell is neere vs, and yet in the meane while we ſee our ſelues woūded to death. VVherfore, when we feele any wicked deſire in our ſelues, ſo as we be caried, ſome to one lewde luſt, & ſome to another: we muſt marke that it is the enimie that worketh ſo craftily. And thus we find by expe‐rience, that the Diuelles are euer practizing againſt vs: ſpecially againſt thoſe to whom God hath giuen wiſdomē and knowledge. For although the Diuell poſſeſſe the wicked and reprobates, and worke in them with all effectu‐neſſe, as Sainct Paule ſpeaketh to the Thellungians: yet perceyue they not that the Diuell is any thing, and they make but a ſport of their vices. They be ſo bewitched in euill, as they feele it not a whit. For they be become blockiſh as Sainct Paule ſayeth in another place. But whē the faythfull finde their mindes attaynted with any euill affection, & that Satan hath preuailed ſo much as to make entrance into them: they know that Satan hath preuented the vnwares, & that they perceyued not whē he gaue the battell or alarme. VVe muſt not tarrie till we haue ſuch an aſſault: but we muſt be afraide & take heede to that which is ſayd. For God sheweth the care which he hath of vs, and how it is not his will we ſhould be taken vnwares for want of knowing our aduersaries, when he ſayeth that the Diuelles go about the earth continually hunting after theyr pray. If a man ſhould tell vs that enimies were at hande, and that there were certayne bandes comming vpon vs, euery of vs would ſtande vpon his garde, and deuife all meaneſſe poſſible to defend our ſelues and to with‐

ſtand them. And why ſo? Because we be fleſhly, and haue a care to preferue this tranſitorie lyfe. But behold, our enimie Satan hath ſtore of wyles and ſuttleties, more daungerous and mischieuous than all the enimies in the world: his deſire is to caſt vs all headlong into deſtruſion: we know what strength he is of, as hath bene declared alreadie: it is exprefly ſayd that he is at hande with vs, and that he besiegeth vs on all ſides, and that he hath a thouſand wayes to winde aboue vs. VVhen all this is tolde vs and yet we be neuer the warer, is it not a token of more than beaſtly blockiſhneſſe, and that we haue no mynde at all of the heauenly life, and that wee conceyue no more than we ſee, like as the brute beaſtes do? But when it is tolde vs that Satan ceaſeth out to go about the worlde, but continually foloweth the chace, and is neuer idle, wee muſt proſte our ſelues by that do‐trine. And why? Because he being the enimie of our welfare, deſireth nothing els but to leade vs into the fame deſtruſion wherevnto he himſelfe is come. As concer‐ning that God ſayeth here, Hast thou not marked my ſer‐vant Job, how he is an upright and ſounde man, which fea‐reth God and withdraweth himſelfe from euill? This is to do vs to vnderſtand, that God ſpyteth Satan in thoſe to whom he hath giuen the grace to walke according to his will. And herein we ſee vpon what condition God hath ſet vs in this world, namely that we ſhould be here as mirrors of his vertue. For when he giueſt vs the grace to gouerne our ſelues by his holiſt Spirite, he ſetteth vs as it were vpon a ſcaffold, to the end that his gra‐cious goodneſſe and mercie ſhoulde be knowne in vs, and therevpon he himſelfe might be glorified againſt Sa‐tan in our perſones. And ſure the honor is inestimable which God doeth vnto vs, when he choozeth vs, I ſay when he choozeth vs poore wormes of the earth, to be glorified in vs againſt Satan, and to make his triumphes by vs. Let vs conſider what a thing this is towards men. Alas: And can God drawe any thing out of men, that may ſerue to his glorie? It is very certaine that he can‐not: for there is nothing in them but euill. But what then? After that God hath chozen vs, he ſheadeth out his holiſt Spirite vpon vs, and giueſt vs of his grace, where through it is his will to be glorified in our perſones, and ſo maketh he hiſt ryumphes againſt his enimies. And hereby we be admoniſhed, not to thiſke it a ſtraunge matter, if it pleafe God to exercyſe vs with ſtore of incounteres and temptaſions. But rather when wee perceyue that God keepeth vs occupied: the fruite that commeth of our incounteres ought to content vs throughly: that is to wit, that God is glorified, and that his power is knowne, in ſuch wiſe as Satan is confounded in all his aſſaultes.

50 Seing then that the iſſue of our conſictes is ſuch and ſo happy: I pray you, ought wee not to beare them paciently? Moreouer, like as God ſpyteth Satan in the perſone of Job: ſo alſo haue we wherewith to ſpyte all our enimies, when this protection of Gods is well printed in our hartes, ſo as we know how it is he that dwelleth and reig‐neth in our hartes by his holiſt Spirite, & that it is he which fenceſt vs, and which is a bulwarke and forteſſe to vs. Marke alſo what Sainct Paule ſayeth in the viij. to the Rom.8.b.10.

60 Romanes. For after he hath ſhewed that the faythfull are inuincible when the ſpirite of God beareſt them re‐cord of their lyfe: he ſayeth that althoſh they haue not receyued him fully and perfectly: yet notwithstanding (yea though they had receyued but ſome one ſmall drop) the ſame is the ſeede of lyfe, to auſſe them that God will accompliſh that which he hath begonne. Seing then that the faithfull haue ſuch an auſſurance, that God hath giuen them of his holiſt Spirite, to ſhewe vnto them that he will be their father to the ende: therevpon they may lift vp their voyces and mindes, and vaunt themselues against Satan, against death, and against all things. And wherfore? Because nothing is able to put them from the sayd loue which God beareth them, and which he hath once shewed to them in our Lord Iesus Christ. Thus we see how we must do, and what we haue to holde vs to, as shal be layd forth more at large hereafter, specially when we come to declare what the mischiesves were that Satan wrought against Job, and how we ought to take them. 10 But at this present I do but onely touch that which is necessarie for this present purpose. Let vs come to that which is in the text, where mencion is made of Iobs vprightnesse. True it is that I haue already declared all that matter, so as it were b̄t superfluous to make a new discourse of the things that haue bene touched heretofore. It shall suffize for vs to make a short rehersall of them, to the intent to bring that thing to our remembrance which is greatly for our profite to know. Marke then wherfore the holy Ghost hath declared the life of Job new againe: 20 It is to the ende it shold be as a patterne for vs to shape our selues like vnto it. Is it our desire to frame our liues to Godward, and to his seruice? Then must we first of all haue this sayd soundnesse of hart, that we be not double, and that we serue not God in outward appeareance only, with our feete, handes, and eyes: but that our hart march afore, and that we haue a pure and single meaning to give our selues ouer vnto God, to be wholly his, and to abhorre all hypocrisie. Behold at what point we must begin, if we meane to haue our life well ruled, and allowed 30 of God. For vprightnesse must in any wise spring of the feare of God: that is to say, we must shewe outwardly what lieth hid within vs: so as if the roote be good, it shall by and by bring forth good fruities, that our workes may beare record how our protestation of seruing God and of assuring our selues of all things at his hand, is not wayne. And this consisteth in two things: namely that we deale with vprightnesse & equitie amōg our neighbours: (mark me that for a speciall point:) and also that we haue a religiosenesse in vs to serue God, imputing all vnto him. And this vprightnesse tēdeth not to the end that ech one of vs should shrinke aside by himself, to seeke his owne profite: but that we shold communicate all together, according as God hath bound and knyt vs together into one bodie, so as every man haue a care to serue his neighbors turne, & to maynteyne this brotherly communion and equitie of not doing that to another which we would not haue done to our selues. Thus see we how God proueth what we be: that is to wit, whither we liue vprightly amōg men without hurting or hindering of any man, or rather whither we labour to do seruice vnto all men. For the principall poynt is, that we referre all vnto God, acknowledging our selues to be wholly his, and that it is reason that our life & our death be offered vnto him in sacrificye: that we worship him, that we do homage vnto him for the things that he hath giuen into our handes, that we confess how he ought to haue all superioritie ouer vs, that we protest it by our prayers and requestes, and that we shewe how it is he that is our whole refuge, and how it is he to whom we are beholding for all things. Lo here the record which it behoueth vs to ycelde, of the soundnesse that is hidden in our hart, as of a roote that is hidden in the earth. But for asmuch as the cace so standeth that we can not walke as it becommeth vs to Gods lyking, except wee vtterly withdraw our selues from euill: This also is well attributed vnto Job, and vnder his persone we are aduertised, that wee shall neuer serue God without great difficulties and many hinderances which the Diuell stir-reth vp: so as if wee will keepe the right way, it behoueth vs to leape ouer the trenches, to steppe ouer the stones, and to marche among thornes. And thus wee see the manifolde incombrances that are cast afore vs, to turne vs aside from walking as God hath appoynted, yea and euen to marre vs altogether. But what for that? Let vs learne to put this lesson in vre, that Job serued God by withdrawing himselfe from euill. So then, when we see the whole worlde corrupted, so as wee be as it were among briers, and can see nothing but euill examples: let vs resist all such things. For why? If wee be so lazie as to make excuse, that because the worlde is wicked and foward, wee may well do as other do: that is overfond. For lo, here is Job set before vs to condemne vs. For if he in those dayes withdrew himselfe from euill: ought not wee to do the like in these dayes too? Specially seeing that God giueth vs warning, that wee cannot liue holily without great battelles and great hardinesse? And what more? He giueth vs the grace to ouercome all Satans assaultes, in such wise as there is no excuse for vs, if wee do not as Job hath done. For he liued not in a time when all things were well ordered, or where men were as Angelles: No, no: he liued among idolaters: abundance of wickednesse reygned in his time: and there was as greate store of vice in the world then, as there is at this day. And yet for all that, Job folowed not the bent of other mens bowes, as the Proverb sayth: But he retyred into himselfe, being well assured that he ought to serue God. So then, let vs not in these dayes alledge the corruptnesse of our time, in that all is turned topsiterie: But rather let vs consider that God by meane thereof prouoketh vs to be so muche the carefuller to shunne the thing that may infect vs. For in asmuch as wee see how vices are as it were an euill ayre: we must flee from them, in case as if one should tell me that my meate were poysoned, I woulde haue no minde to meddle with it: or as if a man should tell me there were daunger in a place, I would not come there. And why then are not wee carefull, seeing that God himselfe sheweth vs that all the vices in the worlde are as badde as deadly plagues? And sith that God hath giuen Job the grace to withhold himselfe so from euill: Let vs not doubt but he will assisst vs at this day with like power. But finally and in conclusion it is sayde, that Satan ment as it were to haue spoyted God, saying, That Job serued him not for naught, for so much as he had blissted him in such wise euen vnto that day, that he prospered in all his affayres. So then (sayeth Satan) Job may be an hypocrite for ought that is knowne: but if thou touche him with thine hande, thou shalt see what will come of it. VVee see here how the Diuell laboreth on all sides to ouerwhelme vs, and when he seeth that he getteth nothing by one poynt, he deuileth and practizeth some other new tricke. For the wyles are infinite whiche he forgeth in his shop: and therefore it behoueth vs the more to stande vpon our garde. It is certayne (as I haue sayde alreadie) that prosperitie corrupteth men more than all the afflictions of the worlde do. For riches are willingly accompanied with pryde, pompe, contempt of God, cruetie, craftynesse, and all other such like things: and they bring with them all delights and pleasures, in such sorte, as a man becommeth altogether beastly. But Satan came so farre short of winnyn any thing at Jobs hande by this meanes: that he turned himselfe to the other side, and made sute that he might bee tryed by affliction. And by the way wee must consider, that God knoweth right well what is requisite for the tryall, as well of our fayth as of our obedience, and that he needeth not to be counselleld by the Diuell.

Diuell. But this is sayde expressly vnto vs, to do vs to wit, that if God sende pouertie vpon vs, or afflēt vs, he doth it partly to the ende wee shoule bethinke our selues, and not bee puffed vppe any more for prosperitie than for aduersitie: and partly to teache vs to pray vnto him according to the necessities that oppresse vs. Herewithall wee muste also marke, that the Diuell is alwayes at our elbowe to ouerthrowe vs if he can: so as if wee scape from him on the one side, he stirres vp a newe temptation againe on the other side. To bee 10

shorte, that which is sayde in one woerde in Zacharie, is declared to vs here at large: that is to wit, that Satan is the accuser and the aduersarie of all the children of God, according also as in the Apocalips it is sayde that he is the accuser of our brethren. And it is exprefly shewed vnto Zacharie in that vision, that Satan did set himselfe to accuse Iosua the hygh Priest as the head of the Churche and as a figure of our Lorde Iesus Christe, whome he came thither to accuse before God. And so, considering that wee haue so strong a partie, and that Satan laboreth by all means possible to throw vs downe, notwithstanding that wee haue bene long tyme fenced by the hande of God: wee perceyue wce haue greate neede, that Iesu Christe should be our aduocate, and that he should maynteyne vs by his power against Satan, that we bee not intrapped by his wyles and policies. Thus we see wherof we be warned in this sentēce: to the end we should betake our selues to God, beseeching him to strengthen vs against the téptatiōs of Satan, in such wise as we may never be vanquished, forasmuch as the Lord 30 shall stablish vs in the iuincible power of his holy spirite.

Therefore lette vs caste our selues downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes: beseeching him to make vs feele them better, so as wee may bee displeased with our selues for them, and mourne before his Maiestie: and that in desiring pardon according to the measure of our offences, wee may request him also, that he will not suffer vs to be turned any more from his obedience, but rather that 40 we may continue in it to the ende: and that he will so print in our hertes the sayde soundnesse whiche he hath inioyned vs, as wee may not in any respect couet any thing saue onely to yelde to him that which is his dewe, that is to wit, that he may be knowledged to be the author of all goodnessse and welfare, and that wee may do him seruice, liuing in true brotherlynesse with our neighbours, withholding vs from all wrong doing, and doing good to all men, to the ende to withstand all the troubles and temptations of this worlde, vntill wee be come to the kingdome of Heauen. That it may please him to give this grace, not onely to vs, but also to all people and nations of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage of error and darkenesse, to the right waye of saluation. For the doing whereof, it may please him to rayse vp true and faythfull ministers of his woerde, that seeke not their owne profite and vayneglorie, but only the aduancement of his holy name, and the welfare of his flocke: and cōtrariwyse roote out all sectes, errors, and heresies, which are seedes of trouble and diuision among his people, to the ende we may liue in good brotherly concord all together: and that it may please him to guyde with his holy spirit, all Kings, Princes, and Magistrates, that haue the rule of the sworde, to the end that their reygning be not by couetousnesse, crueltie, tyrannie, or any other euill and disordered affection, but in all justice and vprightnesse: and 20 that we also liuing vnder thē, may yelde them their dewe honor and obedience, that by the meane of good peace and quietnesse, we may serue God in all holinesse and honestie: and that it may please him to comfort all afflieted persons, whom he visiteth after diuers maners with crosses and tribulatiōs: all people whom he afflieteth with plague, warre, or famin or other his roddes: and all persones that are smitten with pouertie, imprisonment, sicknessse, banishment or other calamities of bodie or vexatiō of mind: giuing them all good pacience, till he sende them full discharge of their miseries: and specially that it may please him to haue pitie vpon al his poore faythfull ones, that are dispersed in the Captiuitie of Babylon vnder the tyrannie of Antichrist, chiefly which suffer persecutiō for the witnessing of his truth, strengthening them with true constancie, & comforting them, and not suffering the wicked and rauening woolues to execute their rage against them, but giuing them such a true stedfastnesse as his holy name may be glorified by them both in life and death: and finally that it may please him to strēngthen all Churches that are now adayes in daunger and assaulted for the quarell of his holy name, and ouerthrowe and destroy all the deuyses, prætyzes, and attempts of all his aduersaries, to the intent that his glory may shine over all, and the kingdome of our Lord Iesus Christ be increased & aduaunced more and more. Let vs pray him for all the sayd things in such wise as our good Master & Lord Iesu Christ hath taught vs to pray, saying: Our father, &c.

The fifth Sermon vpon the first Chapter.

9. Satan sayd to the Lorde: doth Job feare the Lord for nothing?
10. Hast not thou bene a bulvark to him on al sides? Hast not thou fenced his house and al that he hath? Doest not thou prosper him in all his affayres? Is not his possession far enlarged?
11. But lay thy hand vpon him, and touch that vwhich he hath, and see if he vil not curse thee to thy face.
12. The Lord sayd vnto Satan: I give thee povver ouer all that he possesseth: but touche not his person. And Satan vvent out from the presence of the Lord.

Lbeit that the Diuell do but his office here, that is to wit, peruerit all goodnessse, and falsly accuse Job as though he were an hypocrite: Yet neuerthelesse, in so doing he discouereth the euill which is in men willingly, and wherevnto wee bee inclyned by nature. For being wilie and politike as he is, he knoweth full well on which side to assayle vs. Let

60 vs marke then, that here the Diuell betrayeth a disease wherewith all of vs are atteynted, vntill God haue healed vs of it by his grace: that is to wit, that in time of prosperitie we can blisse God: but if he afflēt vs, we change our minde, and thenceforth beginne to grudge against him, forgetting all the prayse which we had giuen him so long as he dealte with vs after our desire. And so there be many hypocrytes which cannot be knownne nor discouered vntill God sende them aduersitie. For so long as they be at theyr ease, and in rest : they shew not the rebelliousnesse that is within them, but let it lie hid. Lo

 1. Pet. 1. b. 7. here the cause why the Scripture so oftentimes sheweth vs, that God tryeth those that are his, siftynge them by afflictions, and casting them as it were gold into a furnace, not onely to purge them, but also to make them knowne: for to those two purposes do afflictions serue: that is to wit, God killeth the vices that are in vs. For when he punishest vs, then are we tamed, and he commaundeth vs to withdrawe our selues from the worlde, and not to be given to our pleasures and fleshly delights. But there is yet a further thing: that is to wit, that like as in a furnace gold is tried to knowe whither it haue any drosse in it: so also God sheweth what we be, by afflicting vs. For men knowe not themselues before they haue bene so proued. Before wee haue passed through the fue, we seeme to our selues to feare God, and that there is nothing to be mislyked in vs: and yet all the whyle there be many vices in vs, that we know not of. It is God that sheweth them vnto vs, it is he that maketh vs to perceyue them: when he sendeth vs any trouble, or any aduersitie, then finde we what our infirmitie is. Now if God make the afflictions of his faythfull ones to serue them as a mirror wherein to behold themselues: it is much more likely that they will shewe what is in other men, whither they haue fayth and obedientnesse in their hertes or no, and whither they be hypocrites, or whither they serue him in truthe. Here ye see what we haue to marke in this streyne, and experience sheweth vs, that it is so. For we see a greate number, who when God sendeth them all 30 things at their pleasure, do speake as sweete as sugre, as they say: and ye would maruell to heare how that good God shall be prayzed: specially when they finde their dishes full furnished, so as nothing is wanting, & how well it liketh them to confesse that God is good. But if he beginne to handle them any thing roughly, that things fall not out to their contention, they take it sore to hart. If God proceede and plucke their fethers from them: then fall they yet to further outrage of murmuring, yea and they belke out blasphemies against him: and albeit that they vtter them not with their mouth, yet is their hart full of poyson within, so as they chafe vpon the bit, and repine at God for handling them otherwise than they like of. Ye see then that in time of prosperitie there are ynow that will blisse God: but that is but hypocrisy, I speake of such only as meene not to do it in deede. For they be the worst which sooth themselues in such wise as they perceyue not their owne vices. Sith the cace standeth so, let vs marke that Satan hath in this point had an eye to the diseases wherwith men are atteynted. And so we see with what an enimie we haue to do: he lieth in wayte for vs & prieth about vs on all sides, to spie where he may haue any entrance to wound vs. Therefore let vs beare well in minde, that when we shall haue prayzed God, and serued him in time of prosperitie: that is not all that we haue to do: but we must put our selues in a readinesse, that when soever it shal please God to scourge vs, to exercise vs with manifold miseries and inconueniences, we notwithstanding must bridle our selues, & haue the lowlinesse to submit our selues vnto him, and to receyue all his chastyzement paciently & quietly. If we be not come to this triall, that is to say, if we be not paciet when God scourgeth vs: all the seruice that we do vnto him wil be no great matter. True it is that God will well accept those that be his, euen in the time of their prosperitie: howbeit forasmuch as it behoueth vs to consider why he maketh vs to passe thoroewe the sayde boultell of affliction: therefore must wee the better beare away this lesson here. And furthermore wheras it is sayd here, that men will curse God to his face when they be combered with afflictions: true it is that this commeth not to passe at the first pushe. For as yet a while there will remayne some reuerence of God who is imprinted in vs: so as if we be put to some hard pinche, no doubt but wee will groyne at it and repyne against it secretly: but to open our mouth to blasphem God, it will as yet go agaynst our nature. But when we haue thus fretted and chased at it, if the miserie increaseth still, or contynew very long: then doth our impaciencie kindle as a fyre, and we beginne to flush out that which had erst hene locked vp in our hertes. Thus wee see how at length they that are afflicted do curse God to his face: that is to say, how they ouershoote themselues out of measure, so as they regarde not any more the Maiestie of God to humble themselues vnto it, ne consider that if they are become rebelles against him, they shall not any more attayne to take holde of his iudgement which streyned them from rushing into such outrage. And therfore good cause haue we to pray vnto God to bridle our tungen as well as our hertes, and not to suffer vs at any time to fall into such excesse as to curse him openly: but rather that the issue of the chastyzementes which he sendeth may be so lucky to vs, as they may turne to our profite and welfare, according as his intent is that they should do, when he scourgeth vs. Lo what we haue to gather of this streyne. And by the way let vs marke that although Satan be the father of lying, yet he speaketh truth here, when he sayeth that God had bene a Bulwarke to Job, and had fenced his house on all sides, and that he had made him to prosper. Beholde how he turneth himselfe into 2. Cor. 1. d.

an Angell of light. For asmuch as he was before God, it stooode him in hande to set a fayre color on his matters, for there was no place for him to vse suche trumperie as he vseth towards men to deceyue them. Thus Satan groundeth himselfe vpon true principles: but that was to apply them vnto euill: for his desire was nothing els but to destroy Job. And he sayeth, that God had bene a bulwarke to him. Then let vs vnderstand, that if we will be maynteyned in this worlde, God must needes put to his hand. For what is our life: and to how many necessities is it subiect? Therefore we could not stand one minute of an hour, if we were not preserued by the grace of God.

In like wise is it with all things that we possesse: God must be fayne to fence vs. And who I pray you is he that speakeith here? It is euen Satan, whose comming is of purpose to ouerwhelme vs, both in our goods and in our persones, if we be not (as you would say) well walled, so as God serue vs for a bulwarke, according also as we shal see him to be in the processe of the text. For as soone as Satan hath his leauue, we see howe he raketh away all Iobs goods from him, and with what violéce he goes about it.

Therfore it was requisite that Job should be fenced all the whyle aforhand by the grace of God, and that it should serue to rāpyre him round about. And this lesson is greatly for our profite. For hereby we be warned to pray vnto God, that it may please him to defend vs, for asmuch as whyle wee be in this worlde, wee are as it were in a wilde wood full of robbers. And here we see also why the Scriptures attribute these tittles vnto him: namely that he is our buckler and shielde, our wall and trench, our rampyre and bulwarke, our towre and fortresse. VVherefore dothe the Scripture vse so many woordes to betoken that Gods protection is of force? It is to teach vs, that without him we shold perishe a hundred thousande times a day, and therefore that he must be faine to watch continually for our safetie. VVe see then (as I haue sayd) how it is requisite that men should acknowledge their life to be nothing, considering how it is so frayle as nothing can be more, & how it is subiect to an infinite number of deaths, in so much that they be thereby stirred vp to pray God to take them into his tuicion : and when they shall haue liued one day, they must acknowledge that they were maintayned by God, and vnto him must they yeeld the prayse of all . Lo what we haue to marke in this streyne . For if Satan who is the enemie of all truth , do cōfesse how it is God that is mans defence , & is cōpelled to say so, as if he were vpō a racke: seing God hath made vs to taste of his working, and made vs to feele it : what an vnthankfulnesse shal it be if we confesse lesse than Satan hath done, who desireth nothing els but to deface or rather vtterly to abolish Gods gracious goodnesse, by his lying , so as it might not be knowne at all? So then wee see that such as thinke not of this protection of God, are worse than the Diuell, and needes must it be that they are turned into brute beasts, or rather altogether bewitched . Thus much concerning that woord . Consequently it is sayd, That God gaue Satan leaue to do what he listed with all Iobs goodes, condicionaly that he touched not his persone . Here at the first blushe a man might maruell, why God did so giue ouer his seruaunt Job to Satans pleasure: is it meete that the Diuell should haue such credite with God, that when he craueth leaue to worke vs mischiefe , God should graunt it him? It seemeth that God fauoureth him, and that he maketh sport with vs in the meane while as with a tennis ball. But let vs marke, that whē God graūteth Satan this thing, he doth it not to pleasure him, neyther is he moued of any fauour that he beareth towards him : but because he hath ordeyned it in his own purpose: he is not moued by Satans sute, nor perswaded by him to suffer Job to be so punished . He had alreadie so determined in his owne purpose . Before Satan had vttered any worde, or made any such petition, God was minded to punish his seruaunt, and he minded it for just cause, the which he hath disclosed vnto vs: & though the same were to vs vnkowne , yet muste we lay our hand vpon our mouth and say, that God is righteous and vnpartiall in all that he doeth . Thus ye see the first point that we haue to marke: that is to wit, that God here graūted not Satans request as though he had bene moued by his sute : but for asmuch as he was minded of his owne good will to chaftyze Job : therfore he graunted Satan his demaunde: verily euen to spyte Satan , and to haue the greater triumph agaynst him in putting him to confusion . For Satan made full reckening that Job should haue cursed God to his face, that is to say, that he should haue blasphemed him with open mouth, when he came to be beaten so roughly . And why did Satan so? For he considered what we are of our selues : that is to wit, how we be as fleeting as water, and that all our streghth is nothing . But in the meane while he had no vnderstanding of Gods grace, how strong and invincible the same is in vs . True it is that he feeleth it, and that he hath experience of it spite of his hart: and yet for all that, he knoweth it not a whit . And see how he is deceyued, see whervpon he maketh his reckoning : namely that if he can get leaue to torment vs, we shal be vanquished out of hande, we shal be swallowed vp of heauiness by and by, and that we will fal into despoyre & blasphemie God . Lo what Satan hopeth, and what he pretendeth to do . Marke it well . But God will resist him, and disappoint him of his hope . For he will send the grace of his holy Ghost before hand, and so shal Satan be confounded when he sees he hath no power to compasse the thing that he ment to haue attempted against Gods seruaunts, but all goes backward and cleane contrarie to his intent: God therefore knowing what the issue of Iobs afflictions should be: had determined in his own purpose to scourge him, and so you may see he did it not at Satans instigation . VVhy then doth the holy Scripture tell vs here, that it was done at Satans request? That is for two causes . First, that when we be beaten with Gods roddes , we might know that Satan procured it, yea euen to cast vs into despoyre . And this is it which S. Paule sheweth vs in the text which Eph.6.b.12. hath bene alleaged a few dayes ago: namely that we haue battell against spirituall powers, and not against flesh and bloud . As often then as any euill befallas vs, let vs be sure that Satan hath practized it against vs: to the end we may withstand him by faith: and that we being fenced & armed with the mightie power of God, and knowing that Satan hath so great power ouer vs, may retyre our selues to the refuge of him that is able to strengthen vs . Here ye see whervnto the Scripture had an eye in that case . And now for the secōd poynt, the Scripture meaneth to shew Gods fatherly loue towards vs, in somuch as he supporteth vs as his little babes, and giueth not any such libertie ouer vs, as our enemie would very faine haue, specially that he might take his pleasure in afflicting vs, were it not that he knoweth how the same is for our singular welfare . True it is that we must be fully resolued vpon this poynt, namely that though we know not wherefore God punishment vs, we must awayes acknowledge the same to be rightfull . But yet therewithall it behoueth vs moreouer to haue this lesson printed in our harts: namely that God loueth vs so tenderly, that he desireth nothing but to bring vs home againe, in so much that he spareth vs, and holdeth vs as it were in his lap, for so we see that the Scripture speaketh . Now then, when we see Satan come to kindle the fire, & that he hath sewed vnto God to haue Job persecuted : let vs marke how the Scripture sheweth vs, that God hādleth vs not so roughly without cause , and yet that it is not at the sute of our enimie, (for he would desire nothing so much as to keepe vs in rest and at our own ease, if it were expedient for vs:) but because it is good for vs to be so exercised by afflictions, yea euen at Satans hand: and well doth God permit him so to do, forasmuch as he knoweth it to be good and profitable for vs . Marke (I say) what we haue to note here . And to proue that it is so, let vs take a cōtrarie example . In the last Chapter of the first booke of Kings, it 1.Kings, the last Chapt. is likewise sayd that God hild an Assye: and there is such another description as is here, how the Prophet had seene God set in his chayre of estate, and how he demaunded there, VVho is it that shal beguyle me Achab? Satan preuented not God in that case, nother came he aforhand to say, If thou wilt giue me leaue to beguyle Achab, I will do whatsoeuer thou wilt haue me to do . But God beginneth, saying: where shall I finde a lying spirit to go and deceyue Achab? for I see he will needes be drowned euen into the bottome of hell . And wherfore is it that God speaketh so? Euen bycause the case stood vpon executing of iust vengeance vpon an hypocrite, a despiser full of crueltie, and a mortall enimie of all goodnesse . Achab was a man that had peruerted al Gods seruice vtterly, and was wholly defiled with his owne Idolle: and therewithall also is full of sturdinessse and malice against the Prophetes, and would giue no eare to any admonition . VVhen he was thus hardened in his sinnes, in such sort as a man could gayne nothing by seeking to bring him into the right way: after that God had assayed all wayes, & saw he was a man forlorne: then he hild his assyses, and demaunded who was he that would deceyue Achab: for it was Gods will to execute the office of a iudge . VVe see then, that when God meaneth to punish wicked folke, and to execute his wrath vpon the according to their deserts: he tarrieth not till he be moued to it by Satan, but preuenteth him . In this present text when question is had of punishing Job, that is to say, that God dealeth roughly with one of his owne children, needes must the same come to passe by the pursute of the enemie. Lo here the diuersitie which sheweth vs the reason why Sarans request is graunted him in this text. So then let vs marke well, that the Scripture meaneth by all meanes ro teache vs to glorifie God continually, that we knowing his goodnesse towardes vs, might take occasion to magnifie him, and therewithall that we should vnderstande how his vengeance is iust agynst all wicked persons, and that if he punishe them, he doeth but his office, to the ende he may bee feared, reuerenced, and honored of all the world, and thusye see what we haue to beare in minde. But by the way a man may thinke it straunge how God is serued so by Satan. But I haue told alreadie, that we shall by and by wanze away like water, if wee bee not fully periswaded of this poynt, that the Diuelles are in such wy'e vnder Gods guydance, as they can do nothing without his leaue. Yet is there a further matter, that is to wit, that the Diuelles are as it were Gods hangmen to execute his iudgements and the punishments which he will haue done vpon the wicked. Also they are as his roddes whereby he chastizeth his children. To bee short, it behoueth the Diuell to be the instrument of Gods wrath, and to execute his will: not that he doeth it of his owne voluntarie good will as I haue sayd, but bycause God hath the soueraine dominion ouer all his creatures, so as they must needes yelde vnto him, and turne themselues wheresoeuer he thinketh good. But here is one great diuersitie which we must marke. For when God hath giuen Satan leaue to punish Job, he sayeth to him: Behold, thou mayst worke thy spite vpon all his substance, but touche not his persone. And againe, after he hath destroyed all his goodes, he sayeth: thou mayst touch his persone, but thou shalt not come neere his soule. Herein againe we see how God reserueth alwayes the soule of Job, so as Satan can no more but torment him in goods, and in his mortall life, and in his honor: for he had not the power to enter into his soule to seduce him, and to make him to burst out into impaciencie. This wil be the better vnderstood by a contrarie similitude. When God gieth Satan commission to execute his wrath vpon the vnbeleeuers, he not onely permitteth him to punish them in their goods, and with sicknesse and diseases, or in some other maner: but also he goeth further, which is, that he gieth him power to leade them into error, and to deceyue them as we haue alreadie alleged in the example of Achab. Behold how God sayeth, Who shall beguyle me Achab? And Satan sayd, I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of al his Prophets. We see there a farre larger commission than this is here. For the matter is not only that Achab should be beguiled by some outward meanes. But we see that the Prophets must beguile him vnder the shadow of truth. And that is it that S. Paule meaneth by saying, that when men haue no minde to obey God and his truth, nor wil to frame themselues thervnto: and aboue al when God hath bene so gracious as to manifest himselfe vnto them, and to shew them the way of saluation: if they be so vnhappy to refuze so great grace of God and to refuze it: then behold, God sendeth them falseprophets & deceyuers, who not only shall peruer all good doctrine, but also shal be beleued: for he will giue them speedinesse in error. It behoueth vs to wey wel this saying, according also as it importeth much. For what is met by this speedfulness of error? It is when God withdraweth his brightness from vs, wherby our wittes are dazeled and we become so dull, that we discerne no more than brute beasts: but although the pit lye wide open before vs, yet we stumble into it without seing of it a whit. And why so? Because there is no more aduisenesse or wisdome in vs, forasmuch as God hath giuen Satan power to mocke vs and beguyle vs, yea and euen to blinde vs and bewitch vs in such wise, as we wote not which way to turne vs, that we tumble not into some new snare or other. Behold (I say) how God worketh toward the vnbeleeuers and reprobates: namely that he giueth Satan speedinesse of error, to intrap them, and they shall neuer perceyue it. But he dealeth not so towards such as are his, when he afflieteth them. For although Satan assault them: yet notwithstanding they be alwayes preserued, & haue wherwith to beate back his temptations. For God hath armed the with his owne power, so as Satan can do no more than he hath leaue to do: and God putteth a barre in his way, in such sort as he is hild short in every mischefe that he steppeth forth vnto, and can do nothing further than Gods good pleasure licēceth him. Thus ye see what we haue to mark. And herewithall we haue to obserue further, that Gods iudgements are of such a sort, as he executeth them both vpon good and bad. True it is that if we will folow our owne opinion: we might wonder how it should come to passe, that God giueth such authoritie and preeminēce vnto Satan, as to be able to leade vs amisse. This wil be a very straunge thing to our owne imagination. But what then? Seing that the Scripture telleteth vs so, it behoueth vs to humble our selues, and to wayte till the day come that we may better conceyue Gods secretes which are incomprehensible to vs at this day, & therfore we must learne to magnifie them, and to honour Gods iudgements, hauing them in reurence and admiratiō, vntill they may be better knownē vnto vs. For we haue too small a capacitiē to know them throughly as now. Therefore we must walke in humilitie, cōtenting our selues to know but in part, vntill full knowledge be disclosed vnto vs at the latter day. But how soever the case stand, we must not be ignorāt in that which the Scripture sheweth vs: that is to wit, that God serueth his own turne by Satan, in such wise as Satan is alwayes readie to seduce men when they haue deserued it: and specially when they refuze to obey the truth, then must they needes be caried away vnto lyes. As concerning the faythfull God doth now & then leaue them also vnto Satan, so as they be seduced by him, like as Job was not exempted from that inconuenience in the end. And also we see what is sayd of Dauid in the holy stories. For wherof came it that he numbered the people? The text reporteth how it was the Diuell that stirred vp all the mischief, when Dauid numbered so the people of God. Dauid the being one of Gods children, was notwithstanding sometimes deliuered into the power of Satan, to be beguyled by him. Now when we see this, we haue good cause to pray vnto God, and to come shrowd our selues vnder the shadow of his winges, and there to hyde vs. For if such things befell vnto Dauid, what shall become of vs? Herewithall let vs also marke, that whē God giueth Satan such sway ouer the faythfull: it is not for a little whyle. And here ye may see why it is sayd, that Satans dominion is ouer the vnbeleeuers and vpon all the stubbornehearted. It is not without cause that Sainct Paule maketh this distinction. He worketh euen now (sayeth he) in all the vnbeleeuers. Thus placeth he the reigne of Satan, in them that are separated from GOD and cut off from his Churche. And wherefore? For there we see he is in his owne boundes. But when he hath power to wound the children of God, our Lorde permitteth that to humble them: to the ende that when they be so grieuously tormented, and yet doo all the whyle resist the assaultes that are made vpon them, they shoulde vnderstande that that that commeth not of themselues, but that they be vphild otherwise, that is to wit, by the grace of God, and by the power of his holy spirit. So then, when God giueth Satan leaue to tempt faithful ones: ordinarily it is to make them to be serued therewith as with a medicine. And herein we see Gods maruelous goodnesse, how he turneth the euill into good. For what can Satan bring but ranke poysen and venim? Yea we know he hath nothing with him but death: for he is called the Prince thereof.

Heb. 2. d. 14. So then, whatsoeuer Satan can bring, it tendeth altogether to mens destruction, and to the drowning of them in endlesse damnation. And yet notwithstanding, God findeth the meane that the euill which is in Satan, is turned to our welfare. And here we see how Sainct Paule was physiked, as he himself confesseth, after he had spoken of the hygh reuelacions that had bene giuen vnto him.

is readie to throwe vs headlong into the bottomlesse pit, and that there is nothing that prouoketh Gods displeasure more: for needes must he alway shewe himselfe an enemie to the prowde, and to such as presume vpon their owne strength in what wyse so ever it be. And Sainct Paule was in the same daunger, if God had not remedied it. In what sort did he it? It was (sayeth Paule) by sending me the messenger of Satan to buffet me. See how Satan worketh in sainct Paule, yea euen by Gods permission. And what was the issue of it? Out of doubt Satan ment to haue ouerwhelmed Paule, and his intent was to haue driven him into wickednesse, to the end he should haue giuen over the seruice of God, and by little and little withdrawne himselfe from Christianitie, by reason of the wearisome troubles and miseries which he endured without ceassing. Lo here what Satan intended. But what for that? God purposed another ende: namely to brydle his seruant, that he should not forget himselfe, and so exalt himselfe to much. And for this cause was he buffeted. For he vseth the sayde similitude of buffetting for the nonnce: as who would say, God vseth him not as a man of armes that fighteth in the fielde, to giue him a glorious victorie: but buffered him like a boy to his shame and reproch. Thus the holy Apostle whom God had endewed with so excellent giftes of the holy Ghost, was so farre made an vnderling to Satan, that Satan spitted in his face and wrought him many other villanies. VVe see then how God turneth the euill into good, when he maketh all Satans stinges to serue vs as medicines, wherby he purgeth vs of the vyses that lye hid in vs. And therefore we haue cause to prayse God in all respects, yea euen though that at the first sight his iudgments be ouer boystous to our imagination, and that we be not able to cōceyue them by our fleshly vnderstanding. VVhen we haue well considered all, we shall euermore haue wherefore to magnifie God. Thus much as touching this streyne, wherein it is sayd that God gaue Satan leaue to punish Job, howbeit so as he forwarned him that he should not touche his persone. In effect, we haue to marke, that when God giueth Satan libertie to assayle vs in such sorte as he maketh many sore assualtes vpon vs: Yet neuerthelesse he goeth all by measure, as one that knoweth what we be able to beare, and what is expedient for vs. Finally it is sayd, That Satan went out from the presence of the Lord. Not that Satan did what he list as if God save him not any more: but to signifie vnto vs what the furie of Satan is, and what is his accustomed maner of dealing: that is to wit, that he did the worst he could, without regarding that he is subiect to God, and that he vseth his owne rebelliousnesse, in making hauock of Iobs goodes: howbeit that there is yet one thing more ment by that saying: that is to wit, that Satan did in effectuall deede shewe the leaue that he had gotten. For I haue tolde you already, that this streyt determination of God, which was vnknowne to men, is now declared to vs here. For whereas the Scripture telleth vs the things which are apparant vnto vs, as how Job was by and by spoyled of all his goodes, how his children were slayne, and how he himselfe was sore plagued in his owne persone: these things were commonly knownen to all men. But all men knewe not that which was rehearsed afore: that is to wit, that God hilde his assyses, and that all was disposed by his ordinance, and nothing happened without his prouidence. They that haue the eyes of faith to comprehend this, haue the vnderstanding of it. The residue, perceyue but onely the things that were done outwardly. And here we see wherefore it is sayd, that Satan went out from the presence of the Lord. For the holy Scripture putteth a difference betweene the outward things that are done, and the purpose of God which is not knowne but to the faythfull, which lift vp themselues aboue their owne reason and aboue all their naturall wittes. For we shall neuer attayne to the knowledge of Gods Maiestie, except we be caried vp aboue all our owne abilitie. And now the Scripture returneth to the Storie, when it sayeth that Satan is departed from the presence of the Lord: that is to say, it was visibly perceyued and after an apparent maner how he punished Job. Thus we see what is ment therby. The residue is awytes to expresse the nature of Satan: which is, that he with an inordinate rage casteth out fyre and flame as though he would make a cleane dispatch of all togither: and to be short, how it is his office to tempt men, as it appeareth in the place where Iesus Christ was tempted, where it is sayd, Behold, he that tempteth. This Matth. 4. a. 3. terme and title of Tempter is attributed peculiarly vnto Satan. And why so? To the ende we should know, that he seeketh nothing but to destroy all, and to put mankind to confusion. Thus we see that all his diligence, all his going about and all his trotting vp and downe, is to leade vs with him to destruction: and for that purpose desirereth he to be exempted from obedience vnto God, that he might turne all vpside downe. Seing we know this, wee ought to be so much the more prouoked to pray vnto God, to take vs into his hande and tuition. For when he receyuethe vs, we be in safetie from all the troubles that Satan can practize agaynst vs. But if God once withdrawe himselfe from vs, or do but onely flacke his hande a little, by and by we shall be ouercome by Satan. VVe see then how we be taught, on the one side to humble our selues, and to walke in feare and wariness, and on the other side to call vpon God, assuring our selues that as long as we be succoured by him, wee shall want nothing: yea, and that although wee be fayne to fight against great distresses: yet we shal be sure of the victorie, which he hath promised to all those that are his.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the Maiestie of our God, praying him to make vs perceyue the euilles that are in vs, and that vpon the knowing of them, every one of vs may feele himself full of infirmities, yea euen of the outrageous vices, for the which wee well deserue to be thrust out of his presence. And herewithall let vs pray, him to strengthen vs in such wyse by his holy spirit, as we may blisse him continually both in prosperitie and aduersitie: & that we may not desire any other thing than to please him in all points, and to yelde our selues wholly vnto him: And that although we haue todo with an enimie that is ouerstrong and ouer boystous, whom we be not able to resist and to beate backe his blowes: yet notwithstanding, through the mayntenaunce and power of our good God, we may contine in his obesfance vnto the end: that is to say, euē vntill he haue gathered vs home to himself, to make vs partakers of that most happie triumph, which he hath prepared for vs in his heauenly glorie. Thus he will graunt this benefite and grace, not only vnto vs, but also, &c.

The sixth Sermon vpon the first Chapter.

- 13. One day as his Sonnes and Daughters were eating and drinking of wine in their elder brothers house,
- 14. A messenger came vnto Job and sayd: The Oxen were laboring, and the Shee asses were feeding by,
- 15. And behold the Sabcans brake in vpon them and tooke them, and haue slayne thy seruants with the edge of the sworde, And I am escaped alone to bring thee woord of it.
- 16. And as he was yet speaking, Behold there was another which sayd, The fyre of God is fallen from Heauen, and hath burned vp thy Sheepe and thy seruaunts, And I only am escaped to bring thee woord of it.
- 17. And as he was yet speaking, behold another which sayd, The Chaldees haue made three bandes and brake in vpon thy Camels, and haue taken them away, and haue also smitten thy seruants with the edge of the sword, And I only am escaped to come and tell thee.
- 18. As he vvas speaking, behold another, saying: Thy Sonnes and thy Daughters vvere eating and drinking of vvine in their elder brothers house,
- 19. Behold an hideous vvinde from the vvilernesse russhed against the house, and crushed the fourre Corners of it togither, and it is fallen vpon the yong folke, and they be dead, And I am escaped alone to tell thee of it.

Psal.34.b.8.

T is sayd that Gods Angels incamp themselues round about the faithfull: and this present storie sheweth vs, how greatly it is for our behoofe 30 to be so garded and fenced rounde about. For we see whathe rage of Sathan is against all those that feare God. If we consider well what the state of our life is: we shal finde our selues subiect to a hundred thousand kinds of death, and that we cannot treade one step, but we shal be wounded and we haue skill enough to say, that man is nothing, considering the fraytie that is in him. But in the meane while we consider not sufficiently what the malice 40 of Sathan is, who vnderpriyeth vs, and practizeth all that he can against vs, to cast vs into despayre. And therefore our Lord is here minded to aduertise vs, what neede we haue to be garded by his Angels, which fight against all the assaults that Sathan intendeth against vs. For like as Sathan is an aduersarie against vs: so doth God appoint his Angels to maintaine vs, and will haue them to be the workers of our welfare. Nowe, that we may the better vnderstand that which I haue touched: let vs first marke that Job is punished here in sundrie sorts, that is to wit, in al his goods and in his children. Sathan was helde short so as he could not attempt any thing against his person, but onely against his goode: This sheweth full well, that God had giuen the vp into his hands, and afterward Iobs children also, which were as deare to him as his owne life. And there is yet one other poynt: which is, that Job forewent not his goods and his children all after one maner: but the Diuell had a policie to sende him diuers temptations. For he stirred him vp enemies on the one side, and he himselfe serued to send downe lightening from the heauen, and tempests from the ayre on the other side. Lo how this seruant of God is tormented in diuers sorts. And it might augment his grieve and trouble him yet more, to thinke thus with himselfe. How now? Not onely men are contrary to me, but also God himself fighteth against mee. Behold here the craftynesse of Satan. True it is that this will seeme straunge to vs at the first push: and here we may see what hath moued some men to be of opinion, that God hath set vs downe here a certaine portraiture of pacience, and not a plaine storie or deede done. But suche men vnder-stand not how God dealeth with his seruautes according to the measure of fayth which he hath distributed vnto them. How is that? VVe are not tempted all alike: for God hath not made vs all so strong as were requisite.

There are some weakelinges, and God supporteth them.
And if he chastize them, it is to humble them, to the end they should take heede to themselves, and call vpō God more earnestly. There are other some farre more strong and stoute: and wherefore are they so? Bycause God hath powred out his spirit vpon them in much greater abundance. For (as I haue earst sayd) accordingly as God dealeth vnto vs of the strength that is in himself: so doth he exercise vs, & he will haue our fayth tried, which thing we are sure is not against our profit, howbeit that he onely know wherefore he doth it. He is not bound to vs to giue vs one droppe of strength, he may leauie vs in our owne weakenesse, to cause vs to be oppressed and vterly destroyed every minute of an howre. For in our selues wee 50 haue no meane to resist, sauing so farre forth as God strengtheneth vs by his grace. Yet notwithstanding (as I haue sayd) that is not all after one fashion. For the one sorte abyde weake still, and the other sorte haue a farre greater strength. And here we see wherefore the holie men that haue bene indewed with excellent graces, haue also bene much more tormented in their life. VVhich of vs hath bene so roughly dealt with as Abraham, or hath had so miserable a life as neuer to be in rest? For we see that God commaunded him to forsake his native coun-trie: and when he had done so, he taried linging in the middes of his iourney, vntill his father was deceased by the way. In the ende he went into the coun-trie, and yet he wist not which way he should take nor whither he should go. For God vouchsaued not to tell him which was the Countrie that he called him vnto, but hild him as a foule vpon the water. VVhen he was come thither: some troubled him, other some spyted him, and he had nothing but vnquietnesse. VVithin a while, when the men had wrought him as muche spyte as they coulde : famine persecuted him, so as he was fayne to get him away, and his wife was taken from him. Afterward when he returned : he was new to begin agayne, and he was fayne to go to an other place to seeke pasture. And yet for all this, God sayd to him, Take no thought, I will gie thee this lande, and thou shalt be lorde and maister of it. Yea, but he sawe nothing. Of all this whyle he had not a place to settle in, and yet notwithstanding God promyseth to make him heire of the whole worlde. Afterwarde, whyle it was lykely that he should haue had issue, he had none, and yet was that the thing that shoulde haue ben his comfort. He is olde and drouping, and yet God sayeth vnto him, Thou canst haue no welfare except thou haue issue. And howe coulde that bee? for he is alreadie so aged, as he could not wel tarrie for it. God hath giuen him Isaell. But he must be banished and cut off from that house. After in the ende when he had Isaac according to the promise : God plucked that sonne of his from him, and sayd to him, Go kill him. This is yet more than we haue hearde of Job : for if a father heare that his children be slayne with lightning, or else that some bodie hath murdered them : surely it muste needs be a great grieve to him, and hard to beare. But to goe kill his childe with his owne hande, that is a thing too extreme for him to do : But Abraham must come in place againe heere. Afterwarde when God had giuen him his sonne againe, as though he had ben raised vp frō death : he shewed him what maner of promise it was that hee had made vnto him. Hitherto (sayth God) I haue borne thee in hande, that thou shouldest inherite this lande. But so faire 30 off art thou from enjoying it thy self, or from taking possession of it during thy lyfe : that thyne off spring must bee driuen from hence, and dwell in a strange land vnder exceeding cruel tirannie, by the space of foure hundred yeares. VVe see how God exercised his seruaunt Abraham after a strange fashion vnaccustomed among men : And wherefore? for he had also strengthened him by his holie spirite, and therefore he gaue him greate and verie rough assualtes. See then howe God woorketh in those that are the excellenter sorte, to the ende they shoulde bee as mirrours and examples vnto vs to follow. And in good sooth a man shall never make such workmanship in a litle shop as in a greate one, where he may haue stiffe and store of woorkmen, so as all things are well furnished and in good order. For if he haue but a small shop, he shall not bee able to doo any great peece of woorke. Euen so dothe God. VVe see then howe it was conuenient that Job shoulde be set foorth vnto vs as a patterne, and that God shoulde plague him to the vttermost, to the intent that when wee compare our selues with him, every one of vs may be ashamed, seing we be not able to suffer any affliction, be it never so light or meane: for we be so tender as it is pitie to see it. If God send vs any aduersitie, wee never consider wherein he spareth vs : but our mynde is vpon our present grieve, and wee will not be comforted by takyng holde of Gods goodnesse, in that hee holdeth vs vp. As howe? If a man be sicke, he taketh suche an inward conceyte of his disease, that hee thinketh vpon none other thing, neither considereth he the matter thus: God hath giuen me here many meanes to ease mee withall, I am succoured in my distresse, men haue a care of me, I am serued and tended (as one man hath his wyfe, an other his children, and an other his seruantes too tende him) and therfore I see that God doth not punishe mee out of measure : I say he hath remedies in a rediness for him: either he hath of his owne store, or else he shal be releued by some other. VVe never thinke vpon any of these things : but the grieve doth possesse vs in such sort, as we be still chawing on the bitte too torment and rack our selues, yea & euen to be angrie with God. And this is as villanous an vnthankfulnesse as the other is : for when any inconuenience troubleth vs, wee must euer thinke with our selues: Alas, if my good God pitie me not, what shall become of mee? I shoulde not only endure this grieve, but also farre greater, which I haue deserued, and God will fynde meanes inowen to punish me more : for it is sayd that he hath his rods layd vp in his cofers, and that when it pleaseth hym to bring them foorth against vs, we must be fayne to feele other maner of stripes at his hande than wee haue doone yet. If wee mynd such things, it is certain that in the middest of the greatest miseries and troubles that we can haue in this worlde, wee shall bee comforted, and feele some assuagement of oure greefs. But we do nothing at all in that behalfe, in so much that this lesson is wrtten in vaine. So then, let vs beare in mynde, that in the person of Job, it is Gods wil to gie vs a looking glasse, wherin to behold, that if we be scourged we must not take our aduersities so sore to hart, nor be so nice, as to saye, I can haue no worse than this. Let vs take good heed that we prouoke not Gods wrath in that wise, as many vnadvised persons do. But let vs bethink our selues thus: Surely my aduersitie is not ouer burdensom, and that it is bicause I am too tender. But what shoulde be done with me, if my God did not reache out his hand vnto me? then out of question I shoulde not haue this trouble alone. For he hath store of other fare greater and far more excessiue. God knoweth what measure to keepe in punishing me, so as if it please him, he can cast mee into so bottemlesse depthes, as I shall be caryed euen into hell. Therfore it becommeth me nowe to haue an eye to his goodnesse: and to thanke him that he hath pitied mee, and spared mee. And for the profe hereof, beholde here Job, who was a man as I am, and seemed to be thorooughly fensed to the vttermost : and yet I see howe God hathe afflicted him here, not onely in one kynde, but after diuers fashions. So then, when I weighe my selfe in the balance with him, it is good reason that I shoulde be pacient, that I shuld humble my selfe vnder the myghtie hande of God, and 40 that I shoulde applie my selfe too his good will, desiring him to gouerne mee, and to dispose of mee as of his creature that is in his hande. If we deale thus: we shal perceiue that God is euer present to succour suche as trust in him, and rest themselues vpon him. For albeit that wee see a wonderful strength in Job : yet verily he was a fraile man as we be. And for profe hereof, how could he haue bene so strengthened, if God had not lent him his hand? And is the strength that God vttered in Job, abated at this daye? Hath God altered eyther his purpose or his nature? No : 50 Then when we see that God hath strengthened Job: we come to the promises that belong not to any one man alone, but to all men. Lo how God sheweth, that if we bee dismayde at the feeblenesse of our owne fleshe, he hathe wherewith to remedie it, if wee flee too him for refuge : & that if we be beaten down, he hath wherwith to strengthen vs, yea though we were otherwise altogether forsaken. Seing then that God offereth vs remedie in suche wise, whereby to relieue all our feeblenesse : lete vs not dout, but that as he hath vpheld his seruant Job, so wil he worke in vs also at this daye. For his meaning is nothyng else than to seale vp his promises which are common to al men, and to give vs assurance and exerience of them in the person of one man, to the ende we shoulde not doubt but he will be as good as his woord. Therefore let vs not alledge this excuse: Lo I am a man. For why? VWas not Job a man? was not Abraham a man? was not David so to? And wherof came it that they resisted temptations? O, yes. But they were ayded. And is not God at this daye

the same he was then? is he chaunged since that tyme? Is it his minde to ayde but a three or foure? VVhen he sayd, I will be your fortresse and bulwarke, and I will stick to you in all your needes, ment he it but to Job, to Abraham, and to Dauid? ment he it not to his whole Church? So then, vnlesse we will charge God with vntruth, we must boldly conclude, that like as he assisted Job, so will he also assist vs. But what? when we be destitute of the grace of Gods holy spirit: that proceedeth of our owne naughtinesse, bycause we regard not the good turne that he is redy to do vs when he giueth vs his promises, And that although he preuent vs, seeking nothing but to vtter his power in mainteining vs: yet notwithstanding, we shut the gate against him. And so we well perceyue to what intent this story is written vs, that is to wit (as I haue sayd already) that we might knowe how God afflictesth those that are his: and therewithall vnderstand, that he forgetteth not to succoure them at their neede, and that according to the greatnessse of their necessitie, the remedie is always redy in due season. Furthermore we haue here a godly recorde, that afflictions are not always signes that God hateth vs. If we haue not this beliefe, it is impossible that we should be pacient in aduersitie. For it is not for naught that Saint Paule saith, we ought to haue comfort through pacience. If a man comfort not himselfe in God, though he shewe never so great and invincible courage, yet is not the same to be called pacience. For he is not pacient as he ought to be. It is but the pacience of a lumbard as we say in the prouerbe: that is to say, it is pacience perforce and against our will, as a mule chawing vpon hys 30 bit. True it is that suche as are of that sorte, would fayne make themselves constant, they would in no wise bowe, and they say, see the wicked fortune, but what though, we must for all that be constant. Here ye see what the pacience of the vnbelieuers is. Although they be renowned in the world for couragious and stout fellowes: yet cease they not to lifte vp themselues against God, and to find faulfe with him: and to be short, euery of them wyll needs cleare himselfe. I know not (say they) why this is happened to me, but if it be for that fortune is againte me, or for that God is idle and hath no mind of things, or rather else for that mans state is such. And so in the meane while, suche manner of men ceasse not to haue their hearts full of venim. But God will haue vs patient after another manner, that is to wit, hee will haue vs readye to endure all thinges, assyuryng oure selues that good and euill procede from the hande of hym. Hee wil haue vs to abyde his chastizemente, desyring nothyng but to bee gouerned by him, and renouncing all oure owne affections. And though he it seeme troublesome to vs, hee will haue vs fyghte agaynst oure owne wyked lustes, and too resynt them in suche wyse, as hee alone maye continue our maister: for it is not possible that we shoulde haue that pacientnesse so franke and free in vs, if we take not occasion to comfort oure selues in God. And howe will that bee? It behoueth vs too bee well assured, that when God scourgeth vs, hee purposeth not oure destruction, but rather procureth oure welfare. For as for hym that imagineth and deemeth God too bee bente agaynst hym: hee can not but fall intoo some greefe and anguishe of mynde, yea and euen into some frenzie to play the sauage beast, and to lift vp hym selfe against God. Can we loue God when wee persuade our selues that hee seeketh nothing but to vndoo vs, and to destroy vs? So then, it is verie necessarie for vs to bee fully resolued, that when God punisheth vs, it is not a token that he hateth vs, nor that he holdeth vs for his enemies: but rather that he by that meane procureth our sal-uation. And here we see how that (as Saint Paule sayth) our victorie consisteth in taking hold of this loue of God in Iesus Christ, so as we be thoroughly persuaded, that God hath adopted vs to bee his children: for if we haue that principle, wee shall not be dismayde with any affliction. VVhy so? for sith that God loueth vs, wee shall never bee confounded: and so little shall our afflictions hinder oure welfare, that they shal turne to our furtherance, and God will woorke in suche wise, that our saluation shall be aduaunced by the meanes thereof. So then, seeing that Job who was beloued of God, and was one of the excellente men that euer were in the worlde, hath bene so greeuously afflicted: Let vs assure our selues, that if God do nowe and then suffer vs to abyde ouer harde and painfull aduersities, yet ceasseth hee not to keepe vs still vnder his protection, and to loue vs, and of very loue to prouide for vs the things that are good and profitable. But wee muste come to that whiche is set downe here, that is to wit, that God punished Job, not only in his goodes, but also in his children. This is to be marked wel. For sometimes he that sheweth himselfe stout in some one kinde of temptation, will by and by be quayled in some other. As for example: There may be some man which in suche wyse despizeth the goodes of this worlde, that if he haue bene verie riche, and afterward be sore impouerished: ye shall not see him shrinke, but continue still in good quiet, and he will say: well, I haue ben riche, but it was Gods wil to chastize me: I am bereft of all my goodes and substance, God be praised for it. A man woulde thinke that this man is so constant, as it shoulde seeme he hath no feeling of his aduersitie. Behold the great vertue of him. Yea, but if he be assayed on the other side, so as there happeneth some new temptation to him: yee shall see him so encombred, as he hath no meanes to comforte hym selfe. Then is it not ynough for vs to bee pacient against some one kynde of aduersitie, but wee must withstand all troubles.

And here we see also why our Lorde exerciseth vs in diuers maners: which is a thing to be marked aduisedly. For after that God hath sent vs some aduersitie, and we suppose oure selues to be escaped from it: we thinke it straunge to see an other mischiefe come backe againe in the necke of it. This I say is verie harde to oure imagination. But God hathe good reason to quicken vs vp so by diuers temptations, too the ende oure pacientnesse maye shewe it selfe as I haue sayd heretofore. Now if a mannes goodes bee deare to him: much more precious muste his children needes be. And here we see also why it was oure Lordes will, that this should be the last tydings, as though Job had ben sette here vppon the racke. VVhen a man is layde vpon the racke, his tormentes are continually increased more & more, vntil they be come to the vttermost, that they can no more. Sathan vsed the lyke policie with Job. For when hee caused woerde to bee brought him: Beholde, thyne Oxen and thy Shee Asses are taken awaye by the Sabeans, and Robbers are come, and haue slayne thy seruants: then was it as if he had firste put the carde too him. VVell, here we see the man layde vpon the racke. VVhen one came and tolde him: Beholde, fire is falne downe from heauen, and hathe consumed thy cattel: it was as if a man shuld haue hanged a great weight at his feete, too encrease his paine, and to put him to the more grieve. But see the extremitie that came in the ende, when one brought him word of the death of his children. Then let vs learne that when wee haue scaped some one aduersitie, which we thought to be ouer heauie and ouer-hard to suffer: God is able to send vs an other, that shall farre exceede all that wente afore. And why is that? For Sathan preaceth vpon vs on the one syde, and God gi-

ueth him leue so to doo, to the end aforesayd : which is, that we shold passe through such triall, to the intent that God might be glorifyed in vs, and that we might haue so much the greater cause to yeeld him thanks: when he shal haue deliuered vs from the assaultes of suche an enimie, and so mighty as Satan is. Sometimes also he doth it for our hardnesse sake. VVhen he seeth that we be dull vpon the spurre, and that we be ouerflowe and restie : he muste needs prick vs so muche the more roughly : according as we commonly say, A rough horse must haue a rough ryder. And so haue we nothing here in the example of Job, but to marke that which I haue touched alreadie. But here is also that whiche I haue spoken of afore, namely that Iobs temptations were diuers in an other respect. For the robbers had carid away his goodes and cattell, lightening from heauen had burnt vp a greate parte of them, and a greate tempest of wynde had ouerthrownen the house where his children were, and they were slayne vnder it. Although his enimies had come and carried away his cattell, and that in the end they had broken into his house, & vpon his children: all this had not ben so hard and strange a matter as when it is said, that the lightning fell from heauen, & that a mighty boystous wind had killed his childre. For in that case Job was prouoked to say, what a thing is this? Men are agaynst me, and God hath made himselfe mine enimie. For from whence commeth this lightening of the ayre? From whence come these hideous wyndes. It is sayd that the windes are Gods messengers to execute his commaundements as though they were Heraulds. It is sayd, that the fire of heauen is as it were a signe of his presence. Job therfore myght haue cōcluded thus: I see how God warreth against me on the one syde, and men on the other, and there is neither heauen nor earth with me, but all is against mee. Alas, whither may I goe? Herevpon hee myght haue ben altogether plunged in dispaire. VVe see then, that when the temptations are so diuers, we be much more troubled. And experience also sheweth it, so as euerie man may feele it in himselfe. For if we bee tormented but after one sorte, yea though the same be even to the vttermoste, yet doo wee still conceyue some hope. But when one man persecuteth vs on the one syde, and an other ryseth vp against vs on an other syde, and the nūber of our enimies encreaseth, so as we be layd at on all sides, & it semeth that god is against vs too, then can we no longer hold out, and wee quite quayle(as they say)like poore soules that be past all hope. Nowe when we see that this befell vnto Job: let vs mark it well that we may take profit by it: assyuryng oure selues that God will also throughly trye oure faithe and constancie by diuers temptations. VVhen men trouble vs or doo vs any harme: it seemeth to vs that God dothe vs wrong, if he auenge vs not incontinently, so as we would haue even heauen to bende it selfe agaynst our enimies to reuenge the injurie that they haue done vs: and we consider not a whit how it is God that tryeth vs in that wyse, and that he knoweth what is profitable and expedient for vs better than we our selues.

By the waye, a man myglite demaunde heere, howe it happened that fire came downie froin heauen too burne vp Iobs cattell. For the diuell hath not the lightning and tempests in his power: we graunt him no suche sou. raintie, as to haue dominion in the ayre to rayse whirlewynches and tempests at his pleasure. The answeare herevnto is easie: howbeit that this matter shall be handled more fully in the next sermon. Neuerthelater, let vs mark, that although the wyndes be Gods heraulds to execute his will, and that the lightening haue lyke nature: yet the diuell woorketh by them, when God vseth his seruice, as hath ben declarid heretofore. Then let vs think it not strange, that God shoulde give the diuell such a libertie, as to be able to raise vp lyghtenyngs, whirlewynches, and tempestes. For he is not able to doo it as often and as muche as he himselfe li-steth: but God serueth his owne turne by hym, as it please-th himselfe. Thus yee see the question assoyled, so as yeede not to maruell that the diuell hath raysed vp suche a tempeste and rage of foule weather, as to beate downe a house, or that hee hath stirred vp the lightening of heauen, that is too wt, so farre foorth as God permitted him, specially seyng God directed him to exercise the fayth and pacience of his seruaunt. And heerewithall on the other syde wee haue also to marke, that Iobs pacience was so muche the more vertuous and commendable, in that hee fell from suche heughte, and in that hee seemed to bee so well fensed: and yet notwithstanding ceassed not to blisse God even when hee was utterly forlorne. This (I saye) is woorthie of singular commendation: for wee knowe that suche as are in prosperitie forgette them selues. I saye, not onely that the worldlyngs and suche as thynke not at all vpon God, but also that the faythfull whiche haue walked in the feare of God all theyr lyfe long, yea and even they that keepe still in the same mynde, are ouerseene when they haue all thynges at will, so as they forgette themselus, and knowe not themselues any more. Lette vs marke what happened to Ezechias. Although he were wholly giuen to serue God and too doo his owne duetie: yet notwithstanding when hee sawe hymselfe aduaunced aboue or-dinarie, hee sente no more for the Prophete Esay, nor medled any more wylth seekyng counsell at Gods hand, but did all thinges after his owne fansie, and magnifyed himselfe so muche, that he prouoked Gods displeasure in the turning of a hande for shewing his riches vayngloriously, in so muche that the hande of God was fayne to fall verye roughlye vpon hym, bycause of his follye and ouerweening, wherewith hee was carryed awaie. And this is it that David meeneth when hee sayeth, I saye in my abundance or prosperitie, I shall never be remoued.

David knewe well how he had ben aduaunced by God, and hee never darkened his grace: but rather his mynde was, that it myghte bee had in remembraunce too the worldes ende, that God had drawne hym vp from the dung of the cattell, and settled him in the state of the kingdome. Hee magnifyed thus, his will was, that thys shuld be spoke of after his death, he vaunted not himself of his nobilitie, he chalenged nothing to himselfe. And yet for all that, when God had stablished him in his kingdom, so as he sawe himselfe in rest: he began to aduance himselfe, and sayd he had brought all things to such a point, as hee shoulde never bee more remoued. But David sheweth what we bee when wee be at our ease, namely, that wee be sotted in the sayd follie, as it seemeth vnto vs that God wil nevere change our estate when we be in our pleasures and iolities. Lo what we haue to marke here: namely that ther was a wonderfull strēghth of mynd in Job, considering how he resisted the said temptation so solein and so great, and not only one temptacio, but as many as came vpon him altogether at one blow, and yet we see how he oustroode them. A little afore, he had ben in such prosperitie, as it myghte seeme that all men had fauoured hym: there was not that man that dydde not magnifye him.

Too be shorte, Satan him selfe sayeth, it shoulde seeme that God hilde hym in his lappe. Hee is in thy hande (sayeth Satan) and thou preseruest hym in such wise, as it shuld seeme thou makest a cockney of him. Herewithall we see how he is handled in the turning of a hande, which thing might haue ben a very hard matter for him.
So much the more then are wee warned not to ceasse to looke

ooke well to our selues when God sendeth vs any prosperitie. For it is certain that if Job had not oftentimes ben waked by this trumpet, to saye, who am I, what is my estate? he had bene vterly confounded, as soone as God had afflicted him. VVherfore let vs take heed to walk in feare and trembling, chiefly when wee see that God sendeth vs any worldly prosperitie. For then is the tyme that the diuell watcheth narrowliest to surprize vs, and to cast some temptation before vs that wee neuer thought of. Thus ye see what wee haue to marke vpon this sentence, where it is sayd, that at the time when Job was so well settled, that he seemed he had so many bulwarks, as no euill could touche him: then in one moment both lyghtening from heauen, and a whirlewynd of the aire, and his enimies striped him out of all that he had, so as he was brought to vtter extremite, sauing his person whiche God had reserued still to more greeuous temptations. But for the residue, let vs retorne to the sentence, whiche I haue touched alreadie: that is to wit, that we know what the rage of Satan is agaynst the faythfull. VVee haue seene heretofore how God holdeth him shorte, saying, Thou shalt not touche the person of Job, and herewithall wee see with what furiousnesse he hath proceeded. Let vs now consider the meanes which he hath to torment vs. For looke how many infirmities we haue, looke how manie kyndes of aduersities there are in the world, looke how many ouerthwart things ther be against vs: so many are the sharp darteres that Satan hath euer in a readinesse against vs, and so many woundes and deadly stripes is he able to giue vs, if God prouide not otherwyse for it. Seing that the diuell hath continually suche weapons, and that we on our side are altogether naked. I pray you what shoulde become of vs if god did not remedie it? So muche the more therfore haue we cause to render thanks to our god, seing we perceyue that Sathan can doo no more than hee giueth him leaue to doo. And therewithall we haue neede also to call vpon God continually, and to say, Alas Lord, if we be not vnder thy protection, what shall become of vs? VVee bee sure that thou chastizest vs for a time: but therewithal thou shewest vs thy fatherly goodnesse, in that thou sufferest vs not to be vtterly rooted out, considering the outragousnesse of the enimie with whom we haue to doo. For shuldest thou giue him the brydle against vs, we must needes be devoured sodaynly, euen as one poore sillie sheepe among an hundred thousand woolues. VVe see then how we ought to keepe good warde and watch, and to stande vpon our garde, to praye vnto God that he suffer vs not to be left vp for a prae vnto Satan. For if Satan durst be so hardie as to offer battell to the Sauior of the world, according as we see how our Lord Iesus Christ was assailed: Mark.4.a.1. wee may be sure he will bee moare hardie to runne vpon Luke.4.a.2. vs. And therfore let vs take the armour that God hath giuen vs to resist him withall, which is his werde, whervnto Saint Paule sendeth vs, when he meaneth to arme vs thoroughly against all the temptations of the worlde and the diuell. Then let vs receiuē that which God giueth vs, that wee be not negligent to helpe our selues with the meanes which he putteth into our hands, but that we may succour our selues at our neede. Thus we see what wee haue in summe to remember concerning this lesson, if wee will take profit by that which is shewed vs here in the example of Job, wayting til the residue be set out more at large.

But let vs fal downe before the face of our God, with acknowledgement of our offences, praying him to make vs understand the better, yea euē in such wise, as when he affiſteth vs, we may assure oure selues it is for our sinnes and offences, and therewithall knowe that it is his will too mortifie vs to the world ward, and to drawe vs continually to himself, by making vs too passe through afflictions, which must be ſo much the more ſweet and amiable vnto vs, whē we ſee how they tēd to our welfare. And furthermore that he wil give vs the grace to be ſo mortified, as we may desire nothing but to be ſubiecte in ſuche wiſe to his obeyfaunce, as wee may neuer ſwarue from it, but perſuer in it more and more, euē vntil he haue drawn vs into eternall reſte. That it maye please him to give this grace not onely vntoo vs, but also to all people and nations of the earth, &c.

The ſeuenth Sermon vpon the firſt Chapter.

- 20 Then Job rose vp, and rent his clothes, and ſhore his head, and caſt himſelfe to the grounde, and vvorſhipped,
- 21 And ſayde, Naked I came out of my mothers vvombe, and naked I ſhall returne again: the Lord hath giuen, and the Lord hath taken avvay: Blifſed be the name of the Lord.
- 22 In all this Job ſinned not, ne charged God vwith any vnreſonablenesse.

Ee can well ſaye that Pacience is a great vertue, as it is in deed: and yet there be very fewe that know what this worde Pacience meaneth: whereby a man may iudge, that we be not very hafthy to be pacient, and to haue the vertue that we eſteme ſo much. But God perceiving ſuche carelesnesſe in men, myndeth to ſet before our eyes the thing that is ſo needfull for vs: for if we be not pacient, our faith muſt needes vaniſhe awaie: for ſhe is not able to maynteyne hir ſelf without it. And forasmuche as it is ſo, Gods will is, that in the middes of the miseries of this world, we ſhould always haue a quiet hearte, and bee ſo well assured of his goodnesſe, as the ſame may make vs merie and contented, and we may boſt oure ſelues againſt Satan and all oure enimies. And howe were that poſſible, if wee looked no higher than the worlde, ne conſidered not that althoſh our estate bee miſerable in the opinion of the fleſhe: yet ought wee too be contented with it, ſeing that our God loueth vs?

And this preſent text is as excellent as any in all the holiſt Scripture to ſhewe vs what this woerde Pacience importeth. And it behoueth vs to be taughte it, if wee will haue God too acknowledge vs for paciente in oure afflictions. VVe commonly ſaye, a man is pacient, althoſh he haue no point of true pacience in him. For whoſoever ſuffreth aduerſtie, him doo men call pacient. But by the way let vs holde this for a rule, that to be pacient, it behoueth vs to moderate our ſorow. If there be any aduerſtie it muſt be auſaged by conſidering that God ceaſeth not to procure our welfare continually, and that we ought to bee ſubiecte vnto him, and that it is good reaſon he ſhould gouerne vs according to his good pleaſure. Lo here wherin pacience ſheweth it ſelfe. But there is nothing better nor more behouefull, than to looke vpon the glaffe that is ſette before vs here. VVe haue ſeene that Job myghte haue ben ouerwhelmed with the report of ſo many euill tydings. But is ſayd, that he roſe vp and rent his clothes, and polld his heade, and caste himselfe vpon the ground to humble himselfe afore God . Here we see, first of all that such as are pacient, are sure of some grief, so as they feele great sorrowe and anguish of hart: for were we as a block of wood, or as a stome, it were no vertue at all in vs. Is that man worthy to be praysed, which hath no feeling at al of his aduersitie? VVe see sometimes a poore madman laugh and scorne the whole world, yea euen when he is at deathes dore: but that is bycause he hath no feeling of his miserie. This therefore deserueth not to be taken and estecmed for a vertue, for it is rather a blockishnesse. The brute beasts haue somtime no feeling, yet are they not pacient for all that. So then let vs marke, that this word Pacient, or Pacientnesse betokeneth not that me should become blockish, so as they should haue no heauiness at al, nor be combered with any griefe when they feele aduersities: but the vertue is when they can moderate themselues, and hold suche a measure, as they cease not to glorifye God in the middest of all their miseries: nor be so ouercombred and swallowed vp with sorrowe and anguish, as to quale altogether: but fight against their owne passions, vntill they maye be able to frame themselues to the good will of God, and to conclude as Job doth here, and finally to say, that he is righteous in all respects. And now let vs see what we haue to marke here, where it is saide, that Job rent his garmente, and shone hys head: for such fashions were customeable in the East countries, according as we knowe that ther were mo ceremonies in those countries, than are in these cold countries where we dwell. For when there happened any thing that mighte moue men to great trouble: they rent theyr garments in token of sorrowe. Marke this for a speciall poynte. And likewise in that countrie where men were wont to weare long heads: they polld themselues when they mourned, like as on the contrary parte, where men use to poll their heades, they let their heare growe when they make any sorrowe. Therefore Iobs rending of hys garmente, and his polling of his heade, are tokens of the heauiness that he conceiueth here. For it is certaine that he did it not vpon any hipocrisie, as oftentimes they that meane to counterfeit, do disguise themselues, to the ende that men should thinke them to be in great heauiness, when they ceasse not to laugh in their harts. Job vsed no such hipocrisie. Let vs assure our selues then, that when he tare his garment and shone his head, he was full of extreme anguish and sorrowe: and that when he cast hymselfe to the grounde, the same was another like recorde thereof. But it seemeth that Job gaue bridle to his heauiness, which were a fault to be cōdemned. For we know that men are wont to be but to excessiue and inordinate in their passions. For although they restraine and represse theselues as much as they can: yet ceafe they not to passe measure: and there is nothing more hard, than to moderate a mans selfe in suche wise, as we may keepe rule and compasse: we see that men cannot make mery, excepte they be ouer mery. Sorrowe and heauiness is a passion yet farre more headdie, caryng men awaye with farre greater force than gladnesse doth. And therefore we haue cause to stand vpon our guard, as oftentimes and as long as God shall send vs any aduersitie. For it is the thing wherein we are wont to ouershoote our selues most. And here it is saide, that Job rent his garmente. It seemeth he ment to pricke himselfe forward to be more sorrowfull than he was: for the man that beholdeth himselfe so defaced, is astonished at himselfe. And afterwad whē he came to his heare: a man mighte saye he had as it were soughte helpe to sharpen and increace his griefe, and that it was as much as to strike the spurres into his owne sides. And this(as I haue saide) may seeme worthy to be condemned. But first we must vnderstand, that the scripture purposeth here to expresse, that the sorrowe of this holy man was so great and so velenent, as he was not able to stay himselfe from vsing the ordinary fashions, yea euen to the tearing of his garments, to shew that he felt such anguish as had wounded him euen to the bottome of hys hart. This is it that the scripture ment to expresse. But by the way, although men ought to stand vpon theirarde 10 that they be not swalowed vp of sorrowe when they be afflicted: yet notwithstanding, when God sendeth vs aduersitie, it is meete that we should thinke vpon it. For the common fashion of putting awaye all griefe is starke naught: and yet for all that we see howe men haue falne into it: insomuch that when they haue ment to haue pacience, they haue quenched the consideration of theyr mischaps, thrust them far off, and chased them quite away: & to be short, haue labored to be so brutish, as they might not know nor disceme any thing at all. But cleane contrariwise, when God scourgeth vs, it is not to giue vs blowes on the head with a beetle, to the ende we should be astonisched and cast in a swound: but his mind is to induce vs to think vpon our miseries, as how? For besides that we ought to call our sinnes to remembrance and to craue pardon for them, and to be so much the warer afterward to walke as it becommeth vs: we are instructed also what our life is, to the end we should not haue an ouerliking of it, nor be puffed vp with vanitie or presumption as we be: but rather acknowledge the bond which we stand bound in to our God for vs so gently as to carry vs as it were in his lappe: and finally, that forasmuch as we see he hath a care of our life, we should looke a greate way afore vs, that is to say, keepe on our way still to the everlasting kingdom wher as is our true ioy and rest. VVe see then that God ceaseth not to be mercifull vnto vs when he sendeth any affliction vnto vs. For he doth it to the end that by trying what is in vs, we also might knowe what our state is. Moreouer it is good and profitable, that the faithfull, when God affliceth them, should enforce themselves to thinke, who am I? what am I? and wherefore am I thus afflicted? Nay it is meete for the to think vpon all these things. For we see how Job could rend hys garmentes and sheare his head without offending of God. Not that he intended thereby to cast himselfe into ouer-great heauiness: but all his doings tended to humilitie, like as also the same was a signe of repentance among the men of old time. For if God sent any plague or warre among them: they clothed themselues with sackcloth, and cast dust vpon their heads. VVhy did they so? It was not 20 to feede the euill sorrowe, whereof saint Paule speaketh and saith that it is after the manner of the world (for we must eschue that fault:) but for another sorrowe whiche he affirmeth to be godly: which is, when men acknowledging themselues to be wretched sinners, do come before their judge and there condemne themselues, and shewe that they be worthy to be cōfounded. For he that clotheth himselfe with sackcloth, and casteth dust vpon his head, witnesseth that he hath not any thing wherof to glory, but that he must hold his mouth shut, so that(in case as if he were alredy buried) he is faine to say, I am not worthy to go vpon the earth, but it is meete that the earth should be vpon me, and that God should cast me so lowe, as I might be trampled vpon, with mens feete. Thus we see how Job behaved himselfe. VVhen he sawe how God called him to lowlinesse, he was contented to frame hymselfe to hys good will, and for the same cause rent his clothes and shone his head. Hereby we perceiue(as I haue touched alredy) that pacience is not without griefe, and therfore that it behoueth

it behoueth Gods children too be sad, and to feele their owne sorowes: and yet for all that not ceasse to haue the vertue of pacientnesse, when they resist their owne passions in such wise as they conceiue no hartburning against God, nor passe measure in sorowyng, nor kicke against the spurre, but rather giue glorie vnto God, as it followeth immediately in the texte, That when Job did cast himself vnto the earth, he did it to worship God. For true it is, that the woordis whiche is sette heere, signifieth To encline or boun downe amanes selfe. But the meanyng of it is, that hee humbled himselfe before God too doo him reuerence. VVe see many caste themselues too the grounde, who for all that ceasse not too rage, in suche wyse, as if it were possible, they woulde mounte above the cloudes to giue battell vnto God. And we see some also caryed awaye with rage, bycause they can not rush agaynst God as they would do. But contrarywyse Job did cast himself to the earth, of purpose to worship God, hauing a speciall eye vnto him to humble himselfe before his high Maiestie. For when wee feele Gods hande, it is to the intent wee shoulde deo him more reuerence than wee haue doone afore. Surely if God handle vs gently, it ought to moue vs to come too him, according as he allureth vs by his doeing. VVherefore vseth hee that greate goodnesse but of purpose to drawe vs vnto him? But forasmuche as we be so loth to come to him: he is fayn to summon vs, and to shew what authoritie he hath ouer vs: lyke as when a prince seeth his subiect slow to doo his dutie, hee sendeth his officer to him too summon him. So also God perceyring that we passe not of comming vnto him, or rather that wee come not too him with so willing and earnest affection as were requisite: provoketh vs and summoneth vs. Job therefore knowing what is the ende and true vse of afflictions, did caste him selfe to the ground, of purpose to do reuerence vnto God, and to say: Lord, it is true that I haue serued and honored thee heretofore, and of all the tyme that I haue flourished and ben in my chiefest triumph, I haue had a pleasure to doo thee seruice. But what for that? I haue not knowne my selfynough, and nowe I see what my frayltie is, and howe that all of vs are wretched creatures. And therefore my Lord, I come now to do mine homage new agen to thee, seing it pleaseth thee to afflise me in this world. My Lord, I willingly yeeld my selfe vnto thee, and I desire nothing but to put my selfe as a subiect into thy hand, howsoeuer the world go. Thus much concerning this saying, that Job did cast himselfe to the grounde, of purpose to worship God.

And nowe lette vs come to that whiche is sayde, that is to wit, howe Job acknowledged what men are, Naked I came out of my moothers wombe, and naked (sayth he) I shal returne again. VVheras he nameth his mothers wombe, he meaneth another thing: that is to wit, the womb of the earth, who is the mother of all things. Or else as a man pinched at the hearte, hee vitereth not his woordes too the full, but as it were cutteth them halfe off, according as wee see that suche as are in extremitie of sorowe, expresse not their woordes to the full. Neuerthelesse, thys protestation is cleere inough: that is to wit, that Job ment to saye thus: Verie well, then must I bee fayne too retorne intoo the earthe, even in the same plighe that I came oute of my moothers wombe. True it is that a man maye take this saying two wayes: Fyrste as a generall sentence: Beholde howe menne come naked intoo the worlde: and when they passe out of it they come too the same poyntagayn: they broughte not theyr ryches, nor theyr honoure, nor their pompe, nor their pleasures with them, and they must be fain to go away into rotteness, and the earth must receiue them. But the other exposition is more agreeable: namely, that Job applyed the sayde sentence to his owne person, as if he shoulde say: I came naked oute of my mothers wombe, and it hath beene Gods pleasure to enriche me for a tyme, so as I haue had great heards of cattell, a great houshalde, and a goodly sorte of children, and too bee shorte, I was gloriously decked with the benefites and blessings whiche God had bestowed vpon me. But now it is his wyll that I shall go hence starke naked: It is he that hath enriched mee with all these things, and nowe he taketh them away agayne, too the intent I shoulde returne into my first state, and dispose my selfe to creepe foorthwith into my graue. And this sentence is well worthy too bee marked. For Job coulde not make a better prooef of his pacience, than in determining too bee starke naked, s: the it was Gods good pleasure that he shoulde bee so. True it is that men haue fayre excuses, as that they can not force nature, but that (spite of their teethe) they muste be fayne to returne naked too their graues. And euen the Paynims haue sayde, that there is not any thing but deathe, whiche sheweth howe small a thing man is. VVhy so? For wee haue a gulfe of covetousnesse in vs, so as wee coulde finde in our heartes to swallowe vp the whole earth. If a man haue plentie of ryches, of Vyneyardes, of Meddowes and possessions: that suffyzeth him not, God muste bee fayne too create newe worldes for vs, if he mynde to satisfie vs. And yet bee wee once dead, we must haue no more ground than our owne lengthe, wherein to rotte and consume away too nothing. So then, death sheweth what we bee, and what is our nature: and yet neuerthelesse yee shall see many striue agaynst that necessitie. They make them gorgeous Tombes, and they will haue triumphant funeralls. It should seeme that suche men coulde finde in their hearts too resle God: but they can not attayne to their purpose. And truely suche is the generall state of man. But as for vs, it becommeth vs too suffer patiently the losse of our goodes and riches, whensoeuer wee bee berefted of them: I say, it becommeth vs to suffer God too strippen vs out of all, euen to our bare and naked skinne, and to prepare our selues to returne to our graue in the same state. Beholde (I saye) wherein wee may proue our selues too bee patient. And this is it that Job ment in this sentence. Also as ofte and as long as wee wante the goodes of this worlde, or indure hunger and colde, or bee nippedit with any aduersitie, and haue no reliefe: let vs bethinke vs of our birthe, and let vs consider our selues, bothe what wee bee, and whence wee come. For men abuse the fatherly care that God hath of them in prouiding them the things which they haue neede of. True it is, that we ought to haue this lesson wel imprinted in our heart: namely, that God will not haue vs too wante any thing, nor hath put vs in this worlde without mynding to nourishe vs there. But yet muste wee alwayes acknowledge that the same commeth from elsewhere than [from our selues] and that we may not think wee haue the thinges in our owne right, which wee holde of the free goodnesse of our God. If a man should finde mee of his owne free coste, and say vnto mee, come dayly too mee, thou shalt haue thus muche wyne, and thus much bread, and I will intartayne thee, howbeit that I will not binde my selfe to thee, but giue thee it freely: If I would hereupon holde plea agaynst him, too binde him at whose hande I ought to begge every day, and at whose hande I receiue all my substancialle: or if I make a rente of that whiche he giueth mee of hys free lyberalitie, shoulde it not bee a very heynous vnthankefulnesse?

I should

I shoulde deserue to be spitted in the face . And therfore muche more are wee bounde to receyue Gods benefites with all modestie, assuring our selues that he oweth vs not any thing, and that in as much as we be poore, it becommeth vs to repaire vnto him too begge at his endlesse liberalitie every day. So then, when soever wee bee driven to any necessitie , lette vs haue recourse backe (as I haue sayde) and examine, from whence came I? Euen out of my mothers wombe, starke naked, and a poore and wretched creature: I was not able to helpe my selfe, nor too ridde mee of the pouertie wherein I was , so as I must needs haue perished altogether, if I had not ben succoured by others: so it pleased God too foster me, and to intertayne mee euen too this houre , and too giue mee of his gracious benefites without number. And therfore if it please him now to scourge me, it is good reason I shuld beare all paciently, seyng it commeth from his hande.

Thus yee see what wee haue too marke vppon that whiche Job sheweth vs in saying, Naked I came out of my mothers wombe, and naked I shall returne agayne, too my graue. Finally when God giueth goodes intoo our handes, wee imagine that wee shall possesse them some long tyme , and that the ownership of them shall contynue with vs, and that wee shall bee so accompanied with our riches, as they shall goe with vs too oure graue, and that they shall never departe from vs. But lette vs not make suche accompte of them : for that were but too deceyue oure selues . But contrarywyse , lette vs assure our selues, that if it bee Gods good pleasure to take away the goodes that hee hath lente vs, whether it be to night or too morowe, wee muste bee readie to forgoe them, and that hee doeth vs no wrong to bereue vs in one minute of an hour, of all that wee coulde get during our whole lyfe . As conceraing the residue , Job leadeth vs yet further, in saying, that God had giuen, and God had taken away, and that the name of the Lord was blisst therfore. VVhen hee sayeth, that God had giuen, hee sheweth howe it is good reason, that God shoulde haue the disposing of the things that hee hath put into oure handes, seyng they bee his. For when God sendeth vs riches, hereleaseth not his owne right, that he shoulde no more haue the soueraintie which he ought to haue as the maker of the world. For this word Maker importeth that he hath made all things in suche sorte, as it is meete that al power and souerain dominion shuld remain vnto himselfe. And albeit that me possesse their portion of it, according to the portion of goodes which he hath giuen them in this world, yet is it meete that he shuld still continue lord and maister. Job therefore knowing this, submitted himselfe wholly too Gods good will. And it is the thing that al of vs confess to be most rightful notwithstanding that in the meane whyle there is not any man that is willyng to frame himselfe thereafter . And for proose hereof, if God giue vs leaue to ioy a two or three dayes in any benefite of his : wee thinke he doeth vs great wrong if hee take it from vs againe, and wee grudge againste him for so dooing. And what meaneth this? It is the same vntankfulness that I speake of euen nowe: namely that when God hath once shewed himselfe liberal too vs of his owne free goodnessse : wee are of opinion that hee ought neuer too sayle vs whatsoever wee doo . Lo here a sentence common inough in talke , howbeit so yll practised, as a man may well see that it is vnderstood but of a verie few. So much the more behoueth it vs to consider what is meante by this saying, The Lord hath giuen, and the Lord hath taken away: that wee may knowe what maner of authoritie the Lord hath, to giue vs the enioying of his benefits, and also to take them away from vs euery minute of an houre at his pleasure. And here we see why Saint Paule exhorteth vs that forasmuch as the shape of this world passeth away, and all the things therein do glide and vanishe away : we shoulde possesse as if we possesled not, that is to saye, we shoulde not haue our minds tied to them, as it is said in another place, that we must not settle our selues vpon the vncertentie of riches, but when God shall haue bereft vs of all that he gaue vs, we must be alwayes redy to say with Job: very well, thou O Lorde hast vsed thine owne righte, thou hast giuen and thou hast taken away at thy pleasure. Thus yee see what is the effecte of this streine:namely, that as often and whensoever wee thinke vpon the goodes of this world, we must alwayes beare in mind, that we hold them all of God. And vpon what condition? Not in feesimple, so as he should pretend no more title to them, nor be master of them any more : but vpon condition that if it please him to put them into our handes, he maye also plucke them from vs when hee thinks good. Let vs understand then, that we be so muche the more bound to him, whē he causeth vs to enjoy some benefite of his for a day or a moneth, or for some space of time, and that we must not thinke it straige if he bereue vs of them afterward, but haue recourse to the said knowledge whiche I haue spoken of, namely that God doth euermore hold such a superioritie ouer vs, as he maye dispose of hys owne as hee listeth hymselfe. If it bee lawfull for mortall menne to dispose of their goodes as they liste them selues : ought wee not to graunt it muche more to the lyuing God? Seeing then that God oughte to haue thys mastership, not only ouer the things that wee possesse, but also ouer our owne persons and ouer our chil-dren:let vs humble our selues afore him, to submit oure selues wholly to his holy will without gainsaying.Yea but for all that, there are very fewe that yelde so muche honoure vnto God. True it is that all men will easly say how it is God that hathe giuen them all that they possesse:but what for that? They chalendge all to them selues and vaunt them selues as it were in spite of him. And what is that? I praye you is it any better than flat mockerie? Yea verely it is too grosse an hypocrisie when after wee haue protested to hold al things of God, yet notwithstanding we meane nothing lesse, than that he shoulde haue the disposition of them, or that he should chaunge anye thing, but we would haue him let vs alone and set vs at free libertie, as if we were separated from him and exempted from his jurisdiction. This is as muche as if a manne should say, O I am well contented to acknowledge suche a one for my prince: I will do mine homage and allegiance vnto him : howbeit so as he enter not into my house, so as he come not to demaunde anye thing at my hande, so as hee trouble me not. The worlde coulde not bear with such a vilanie:and yet neuerthelesse we see how men dallye with God. And what is it that we meane by thys confession, that wee holde all of hym, and in the meane while will not abide that he shoulde touche anye thyng? VVe see then howe the worlde dothe openly play mock-holyday with God:and yet that it becommeth vs alwayes to followe that which is shewed vs here:that is to wit, that forasmuche as God hath giuen vs that which we possesse, he may call it backe againe and withdrawe it from vs whē he will. But yet that which is added by and by after(namely that the name of God should be blisst) importeth more. For herein Job submitteth him selfe in suche wise vnto God , that he confesseth him to be good and iust, notwithstanding that he be scourged so roughly at his hand. I haue said that this importeth more:bycause that euerye man may graunt all power and soueraintie vnto god, and he maye say, well, seyng he hath giuen, he maye also take. But

But in the meane whyle he will not acknowledge that god dealeth iustly and by good reason: for ther are many, who when they be scourged, doo blame God of crueltie, or of ouergreat roughnesse, so as they cannot reserue vnto him this right of his to withdrawe that thing which he hath givien them, nor consider (as I haue sayd afore,) that they posesse their goodes with condition, that they may be stripped out of them to day, or to morow. There are very fewe that haue this consideration with them, to rest quietly vpon it, and to confesse that there is nothing better than to subm't all things to Gods maiestie, and to ac-knowledege that if he shoulde let vs folow our own sway, there were no way with vs but confusion: and that if hee gouerne vs according to his will, all will be to our profite and welfare. Lo whervnto it behoueth vs to come. And al so we see there is very muche imported in this sentence when it is sayde, Blessed be the name of the Lorde. For wee must not only picke out the wordes: but also consider of what mynd they procede, and that they be spoken truly and vnfaynedly. For how is it possible that wee shoulde blisse the name of God, if wee do not first acknowledge him to be righteous? But he that grudgeth against God as though he were cruell and vnyknyd: curseth God: because that as much as in him lyeth, he lifteth himselfe vp against him. He that acknowledgeth not God to bee his father, and himselfe to be Gods child, ne yeeldeth record of his goodnessse, blisseth not God. And why so? for they that taste not of the mercie and grace that God sheweth to men when he afflicthe them: must nedes grynd their teeth at him, and cast vp and vomit our some poysone a-gaynst him. Therfore to Bless the Lordes name, importeth as much, as to persuade ourselues that he is iust and rightfull of his own nature: and not only that, but also that he is good and merciful. Lo here howe we may blisse Gods name after the example of Job: that is, by acknowledging his Justice and vprightnesse, and moreouer also his grace & fatherly goodnessse towrdes vs. And here we see also why the text addeth for a coclusion, That in all these things Job sinned not, nor charged God with any unreasonableesse. VVord for woorde it is thus: Job did not lay afore God or put vpon God any unreasonable thing: and it is a maner of speaking well woorthie to be marked. VVhereof commeth it that men martir themselues in suche wyse when God sendeth things cleane contrarie to their defyre: but for that they know not that God doth all by reason, and that he hath iust cause to do so? for had we it welprinted in our hartes, that all things which God dothe are grounded vpon good reason: it is certain that we woulde be ashamed to encounter him as wee do: considering (I saye) how we knowe that he hath iust occasion to dispose of all things in such wise as we see. Nowe then, it is purposely sayd, that Job imputed not any vnreasonable dealing vnto God: that is to say, that he imagined not God to doo any thing that was not iust and vpright. Marke this for a speciall poynt. But it behoueth vs to marke, that in these words(vnto God)there is verie muche implied: for we consider not how horrible a matter it is to talke of Gods woorkes after suche sorte as wee doo. If God sende vs not what so euer wee wysh, wee fall too reasonyng wyth hym, and wee holde plea with hym. Not that whee wylly seeme too doo so: but the deede it selfe sheweth that it is so neverthelesse. VVe haue an eye to euerye blowe, saying : Howe commes thys too passe? But of what mynde is thys spoken ? Euen of a venomous hearte, Asif a man shoulde saye, Thys matter shoulde haue gone otherwyse, I see no reason why it shoulde bee thus: and so in the meane whyle, God is condemned among vs.

Behold how me rash without their bounds: And what do they in it? It is all one as if they should accuse God to be either a tyrante, or a brainlesse person that seeketh nothing but to bring all to confusion. Lo what horrible blasphemie there followeth every blast of mens mouthes, and yet there be very fewe that consider it. But yet it is so great a matter: as it hath pleased the holy Gost to teach vs, that if we mind to give glory vnto God, and to blesse his name as becommeth vs, we must be fully perswaded, that God doeth not any thing without reason. So then let vs not charge him, nether with crueltie nor with ignorance, as though he did things of spite or at randon: but let vs acknowledge that in al points and in all respects he proceedeth with wonderfull iustice, exceeding great goodnessse, and infinite wisdome, so as there is nothing but vprightnesse and equitie in all his doings. And true it is that here remayneth one point more to debate: that is to witte, how Job acknowledged G O D to be the taker away of the things that he was spoiled of by the theeuers, whiche seemeth a very strange thing vnto vs. But forasmuch as this time will not serue to declare it now: we will reserue it till to morrow. It shall suffice to shewe you, that if we bee afflicted, we must not thinke it happeneth withoute reason, but rather that God hath iust cause to do it. And therefore when we be troubled and greeued, we must haue recourse vnto him, and pray him to graunt vs the grace, to know that nothing befalleth vs in this world, but by hys ordinance: yea and to be assured, that he disposeth things in such wise, as all turne continually to our welfare. And when we haue this manner of knowledge, it will make vs to beare patiently the afflictions that he sendeth vpon vs. Also it will serue to humble vs before him, and that when he hath made vs to tast of his fatherly goodnessse, we shall desire nothing but to glorie him by all meanes, as well in aduersitie as prosperitie.

Now let vs fal downe before the presence of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him so to bridle vs, as we maye not ouershoote our selues in our vaine imaginacions, but rather that we knowing how all our benefit and welfare lieth in him, may come to him to seeke it, resting our selues wholly vpon his mercie: That when he hath once made vs to tast of it, we may be so fully perswaded of his loue which he beareth vs, that although he cause vs to walke in many troubles and aduersities in this world, yet we may never cease to cleave fast to him continually, nor to walke in feare and obedience vnto him, vntil he haue rid vs out of this mortall body, and out of this imprisonment and bondage of sinne wherein we be, to gather vs vp into his heauenly glory, where we shall haue no let, but that we maye reioyce in our God as partakers of his glory and of all his goodes. That he will graut this grace not only to vs but also, &c.

The eight Sermon, which is the first vpon the second Chapter.

This Sermon conteyneth the end of the former Chapter, The Lord hath givien and the Lord hath taken away. &c. and also that which followeth in the second Chapter.

IT befell on a daye, that the children of God presented themselues before the Lorde, among vvhom came Satan also to present himselfe to the Lord.

2 And

- 2 And the Lorde sayde too Satan, from whence commest thou? Satan aunswere the Lorde and sayd, from going about and from walking vpon the earth.
- 3 And the Lorde sayde too Satan, haste thou taken heed of my seruant Job, vvhich hath not his match vpon earth, a sound and vpright man, fearing God and vvhich drivving himself from euill, and vvhiche keepeth still his soundnesse? Hast not thou soughe mee to the ende I should haue destroyed him vwithout cause?
- 4 And Satan answered the Lord, A man wil give skin for skin, & althat he hath, to saue his lyfe.
- 5 But novve lay thy haunde vpon him, and punishe him in his fleshe, and thou shalte see it he vwill not curse thee to thy face.
- 6 And the Lorde saydetoo Satan: Beholde, he is in thy haunde: But spare his soule.

Hau declared heretofore howe the Diuell beeing Gods mortall enemie as he is in deede; is fayne for all that, to yelde obedience to his maker, to whom he is subiecte, not that he doeth it willingly, but by force. Insomuche that although the diuell be so sore enraged as he is, to annoy and destroy the whole 20 worlde: yet notwithstanding whatsoeuer he attempteth, or whatsoeuer he can deuise and practise, hee is able too bring nothing to passe, without the will of God. And like as Satan is hilde in awe, so also are the wicked men of the worlde. True it is that they passe their boundes as farre as they can, and they beare themselues in haunde, that they can withstand God, and there wanteth no good will in them to doo it. But yet in the meane whyle God accomplisheth his owne will by them, so that they be as tooles wherwith he worketh and serueth his owne purpos. And this poynte is verie well vttered too vs in the confession that Job maketh, when hee sayeth that God, (who had giuen him the goodes that he possessed, had also taken them away from him. For it is certaine that Satan was the doer of all, both in raysing the horrible tempest, and in spoiling Job of his substanciall, and in killing of his children. VVherefore is it then that hee imputeth these things vnto God? Specially seeing wee haue seene heretofore, that theevies and robbers spoyled him of his goodes, is it meete that God should be vttered as the authour of such theevyng and robberye? It should seme that we ment to wrap him in the sinnes of men: for we cannot excuse them that came to inuade the goods and cattel of Job. VVe see here the theevies whom we may condemne: and yet notwithstanding Job sayeth not, It is Satan that hath so wholly spoyled mee, or they bee the theevies that haue robbed me: but he sayth it is God that hath done it. Doth Job blasphem God in saying so? No. For god alloweth his saying as we haue seene alreadie, that he charged not god with any vnreasonable dealing: He hath confest that God is rightuous and full of equitie, and hath glorified him as meete was: and yet neuerthelesse he sayth flatly here, howe God was the dooer of the things whiche the theevies did, and that the diuell was a dooer of them too.

Nowe then wee see here, how God is euermore soueraine in degree in guiding and disposing the things that are here belowe, to leade them to suche ende as he thinketh good. And heere is no matter for vs to iudge of after our owne vnderstanding as some ouerweening persons doo, who will needes bee wise in making God and all his whole worde subiect to their owne fansie. These are beastes, yea and as beetleheaded beastes as any can be. They haue neither knowledge nor wit: & yet to purchase them selues estimation, they saye, they see no reason why God should be the doer of all things: for then should he be the author of sin. Do they not then control the holie ghost for speaking so? for we must needes yeld to that. And when a man hath debated the matter throughly to and fro, hee muste nedes come to the sayde conclusion, namely that we comprehend not the greatnessse and heythg of Gods dooings, further than it pleaseth him to give vs some tast of them, at least wyse according to our capacite: which it ouersmall. None knoweth Gods workes but himselfe alone: they are a bortorilesse depe (as the scripture sayth) and we haue no means to attain to them, in somuch that all they which wil search them shal be confouled, except they goe too it with all reverence and lowlynesse. Therfore it belongeth onely vnto God to giue vs knowledge what, howe, and wheresore he doth: and therwithal it behoueth vs to content our selues with that which the scripture telleth vs. And although it seeme straunge vnto vs, and we bee not able to comprehend it by oure capacite and reason: yet must we confess that God is ryghtuous. And forasmuch as we attaine it not: let vs tary the coming of the latter day, at which tyme we shall know no more by parcelmeale, nor as it were in dimnesse (as saint Paule sayth) but wee shal then behold the things face to face whyche are shewed vs nowe as it were in a glasse.

Thus then wee see an excellente Texte too shewe vs howe God guydeth and gouerneth the whole worlde by his Prouidence. But wee haue furtherto note, too what purpose the Holye Ghoste telleth vs, that GOD doeth all, and that nothing can come too passe without his consent. It is to the ende that wee myghte despise Satan and all wicked men, when wee see them practyze and invente never so manye thinges: because wee are sure they are not able to bryng their enterpryses about. See then howe God meaneth to assure vs of his protection, and to shew vs how Satan is so fare off from beeyng mayster of hymselfe too accomplishe the thyng that he woulde: that he is fayne to serue Gods tourne. Seing that the case standeth so, let vs apply the holie scripture to suche vse as this: namely that althoughe wee bee hemmed in with enimies rounde about, and be here as a sheepe in a wolves throte: yet notwithstanding we must not ceasse to trust in God, and to warrant our selues, that as long as we be vnder the shadow of his wings, we shall be sure of our saluation. How so? Bycause hee hath soueraine dominion ouer all creatures, in such sort as he holdeth euen Satan himselfe and all wicked persons of the world in awe, & leadeth all things to such issue as he thinketh good. Lo whervpon we ought to stay, that we may call vpon God quietly, and when wee haue called vpon him, assure our selues that he will guyde vs. And heere withall it behoueth vs to beare in mind, that which I haue touched, that is to wit, that we become no iudgers of god, for that were ouergreat presumption. VVere it not too diuelish a pride if men should not acknowledge God to be rightuous, except they could perceiue him to be so: but would haue God to humble and abase himselfe so much as to say: wel, I see I must be accomptable to you? As for those that aduaunce themselves into such pride, are they not al wel worthie to be quite ouerwhelmed by God? Yes certeſſe are they. Also wee ſee here why Salomon ſayth, that they whiche are ouerinquiſitio in ſearching Gods maieſtie too farre, and more than is reuiſte for them, ſhall be ouerwhelmed in their owne pride, ſo as they ſhal be confounded. Then there remayneth nothing for vs, but to haue the ſayde ſobrietie of praying vnto God too teach vs ſo much as is for our benefite and behoofe, and to receiuē whatſoever he ſaih for good and rightful, without pleading to the contrarie. Thus ye ſee how we ought to proceede. But many men thiſke themſelues to haue gained much when they haue found ſome trifling cauillation, to vpholde that God dothe not all the things that are doone by Satan and by wicked men. It is commonly alledged for anſweſe, that when wicked folke doe any euill, God woorketh not that: but only ſuffereth it, and ſimply giueth them leauē. But ſeeing hee hath authoritie and power to let them: is not his ſuffering or permiffion all one as if he did it himſelf? Therfore that is but a verie fonde exciſe, and God hath no neede of our leaſings to mayntayne his truthe and ryghtuousneſſe withall. VVe muſt not fynde ſuche ſtarthingholes to ſtop wicked folkes mouthes withall, which would ſpeake blaſphemie againſt Gods holinesſe: but it is iouough to haue that whiche the holiſcripture telleth vs. For that God not only permitteth and giueth leauē, but also executeth his wiſe, both by the diuell and by wicked persons, it appeareth by this, that the Scripture ſayth not, Lorde thou bafeſte permitteſt, but Lorde thou haſte doone: Like as where Dauid confeſſeth his ſinnes and offences when God had puniſhed him greeuously: he ſayth, Lorde, of whome ſhall I compayne? for I ſee it is thy hand: and although that Dauid was perſecuted by wicked men: yet he caſted it the hand of God. Behold howe the Lorde himſelf ſpeaketh. VVill we bee wifer than he? Shall wee make him beleue that he hath neede of our gay coloures, to warrant him that no man may offer him reproch? For ſee how he ſpeaketh of his owne woorkes. VVhen he minded to puniſh Dauid for rauiſhing Bethſabee, he ſayd vnto him, thou haſte doone this thing priuily, but I will make the Sunne too beare witneſſe of it. Howe was that? VVhat was it that God would doo vnto Dauid? It was that Abſolom ſhould rauiſhe his fathers wyues, and defile them in the preſence of all the people, in the fygħt of the Sunne.

Pſal.59.10.

c.12

Ye ſee here an inceſte, whiche is horrible and agaynst nature, and yet neuertheleſſe God ſayth flatly, I will do it, for thoſe bee his woordes. VVe ſee then howe it is not a ſingle leauē or permission: but that God himſelfe workeſt in ſuche wyſe, as the wicked muſt needes be the iſtrumentes of his wiſe, as wee haue ſayd. And I pray you, as touching the office of a judge, is it no more but too giue the hangman leauē to doo whathee liſt? VVhen a iudge muſt ſit vpon an offendere, and giue ſentence according as lawe and conſcience will beare: will hee ſay to the hangman, I giue thee leauē, goe doe what thou wilt with thyſ man? No, but contrarywyſe he pronounceth the ſentence, and afterwārd according too the ſame, putteſt the offendere intoo the Hangmannes handes too doo execution vpon hym. Beholde, God is the ſoueraine Judge of the worlde: and doo not wee diſhonor him, in ſaying that he doeth but giue Satan leauē to doo what he liſteth? is not this as muche as too mocke Gods iuſtiſe and to peruerit all order? Yes out of dout is it.

So then, let vs marke, that when the wicked run ryot, and ſeke nothing elſe but to put all to conuſion: God is neuertheleſſe aboue them, guyding and gouernyng thiſges after ſuche a forte, as nothyng commeth too paſſe without hys Prouidence, nor otherwyſe than he haſte diſpoſed it.

And heere wee ſee, why it is exprefſely, that God wageth them whiche are caried away by their owne ambition or couetousneſſe, to make warres, and too cauife all the troubles of the worlde, and thatas hee entartayneth them in his ſeruice. For he termeth them his ſeruauntes. My ſeruaunt Nabuchodonoſor (ſayeth he.) And what maner a one was Nabuchodonoſor? Firſte and formoſt hee was an idolater, and ſecondly a wicked caytife, that defyred nothing but to ſheade mannes bloud, and too turmoyle the whole worlde, as muche as in him laye. There was neyther equitie nor vprightneſſe in hym: and yet notwithstanding God auoucheth him to bee his ſeruaunt. And in what wyſe? He muſte not onely permitteth him or giue him leauē: for it were a beaſtynesse to talke ſo, and if Aſſes coulde ſpeak, they would behauē themſelues more reaſonably than thoſe that pretend themſelues too be wyſe after that forte. Now then wee ſee how God executeſt his commaundementes and ordinaunceſ ſo: Yea, but heerewithall lette vs beare in mynde, that the euill can not by anye meanes bee fathered vpon hym. Satan muſte beare the blame ſtill for his owne naughtynesse, and men are reproued and condemned by their owne conſcience whiche ſhall bee their iudge and GOD shall bee glorifyed in all that hee doeth. And howe is that? VVe knowe that all thiſgs oughte too bee eſteemed according to the intente and ende that men ayemat.

Lette vs nowe conider after what forte God guydeth and gouerneth the thiſges that are doone here beneath. It is true (as wee haue ſene alreadye) that Satans deſyre is nothyng elſe but too deſtroye and bryng all thyngeſ too ruyne: But God on the other ſyde inten- deth a cleane contrarye ende. For all his woorkes are called iudgementes: and in ſo ſaying, the holiſcripture by that one woord alone, meaneth too take awaie all the lewde imaginacions that myghte come in our myndes, ſo as this is as a mark too iuſtifye all the woorkes of God, that is too wit, that they bee iudgements and ryghtfulneſſe. And for proof hereof, God puniſheth ſuſh as haue offendere. And who is he that is able too pleade againſt him that he doeth not well? moreouer his meining is too inure his faythfull ones too pacience, too mortifie their fleſhly affections, and to teache them lowlinesſe. VVhat ſay wee too theſe thiſgs? can we condenme them? It is verye certein that we cannot. Take mee euen the wickeddeſt me that lyue, and demaund of them whither it be lawfull for God to chaſtize mennes ſinnes and transgresſioſ, or whither it belong vnto him to humble thoſe that are his, to exercyſe the obedientneſſe of their fayth, and to tame them, to the end they may lerne to renouunce the world. And they ſhalbee fayne to glorifye God ſpyte of their teethe. Seing then that God leueleth at that mark: it foloweth that all his woorkes are iuſt and ryghtfull, notwithstanding that men do cauill againſt them. True it is that the wicked ceaſe not to grunte and bark againſt God though they cannot bite him: but yet muſt it needes come to paſſe (as Dauid ſayeth in the oneandfiftiſt Pſalme) that is to wit, that God ſhalbee iuſtifyed [or founde ryghtuous] in iudging. It is not without cauife that Dauid ſpeaketh ſo. For he knewe, how there is ſo ouergreat boldneſſe and naughtynesse in men, that they defyre nothing more than to liſt vpon themſelues againſt God, and to caſt forth woordes at all aduen- ture. Dauid therfore perceyuing ſuch malapertneſſe and frowardneſſe in the world, ſayeth: Verye well, true it is that the creatures paſſe their bounds ſo far and with ſuch excedeſſe, that God muſt needes bee blaſphemed and put too reproche, and his creatures become as his judges. But

But yet for all that, he shalbe founde cleere. VVhen men haue grudged their fill against him: in the end and at the knitting vp, his righteousnesse will appeare spight of their teeth. Then let vs not maruel though there be murmuring against the doctrine: for it must needs be so, and the holy Ghost hath prophecied so beforehand, as we see: but let vs walke on in singlenesse of mynde, and hold our selues with that whiche God declareth to vs concerning himselfe. Thus we see how we ought to practise the sayd lesson. And therewithall let vs holde fast the comfort that is giuen vs here, and lete vs fence oure selues with it: that is to wit: that Satan and all the wicked folke in the worlde may lifr vp themselues against vs: but yet for all that, they must passe vnder the hand of God, and execute his will. And that shall be perforce, spye of their teethe: but yet it shall be so, because God hath soueraine preeminenſe ouer all the world, and as well the diuell as the wicked sorte are subiect to him, and can do nothing without his consent. And here we see, why it is said againe, that Satan appeared among the children of God before hym. For (as I haue declared heretofore) Satan mente not to disguize himselfe thorough hypocrisie, that hee myght intermeddle himselfe among the angels. But hee is fayne too appeere before God, to yelde an accompt of his doings. Not that the thing is doone in some place certayne: but the Scripture speaketh so, too applye it selfe to oure rudenesse, because wee conceyue not howe all thyngs are presente afore God, and that he is of suche a power and preeminence, as nothing is hidde from him. VVhen this is vttered vnto vs, wee must acknowledge that the Scripture applyeth it selfe to oure reason, and that it teacheth vs by such meane as is most conuenient for vs, and moste agreeable to our vnderstanding. God therfore is lykened here to a Prince that holdeth his Alisites or Court, whereto all men muste come before him, and there bee iudged. And thus yee see why it is sayd, that vpon a certaine day the diuell made his appearance with the angels.

Psal. 41.1.1. Let vs mark then, that like as God sendeth his angels to guyde vs, and to be ministers of our welfare, so that they be as it were his handes, and the instrumentes of his power to maynteyn vs: so also on the contrarie part, he sendeth the diuell to vexe and torment vs. And he knoweth to what end he dothe it. True it is that at the first we may well bee astonished, when we see not the cause why God doth this or that. But wherby shall our fayth be approued and tryed, if it be not by glorifying God, and that where as we be at our wits end, yet neuerthelesse we cōclude, that al that euer procedereth from God, is ryghtful and iust, and that there is nothing bur stedfastnesse in all his wayes? If we be not thus mynded, how shall our fayth be allowed?

And surely this prefente storie is a goodly instruction for vs in that behalfe. For vnlesſe wee consider wherefore God intended to persecute his seruant Job: it will seeme to vs, that we haue good cause to complaiyn of him. How so? If God punishe wicked folke, it is well done, yea and in so doing we can not gaynesay him. But if a man walke in vprightenesse and simplicitie, why dothe God deliuere him intoo Satans hande? If a man saye, O he dothe but permitte or suffer hym onely: If Satan were so at hys owne libertie (considering howe outragious hee is) and that wee also were lefte vp too the praye, shoulde wee not of necessitie bee ouerwhelmed at the first pushe? But contrarywyse, wee see howe it is Gods purpose to haue the pacience of his seruaunt made knowne by it. And althoſh hee haue other reasons whiche are hidde from vs for a tyme, yea euen all our lyfe long: yet muste wee holde oure selues short, and confesse, that all that he doth is good, yea though wee perceyue not too what end hee

doethit. So then, albeit that wee see not neyther the dyuels about vs, nor yet the Angels: yet muste we assure our selues, that God sendeth both the one and the other: verily to maynteyn vs on the one syde, and too trouble vs on the other. And so it standeth vs alwayes on hande to knowe, that God hath iuste cause to chaſtize vs, and that if hee ouerwhe'me vs a hundred tymes a day, wee be well woorthie of it: and yet that as I haue sayd alreadie, God hath not alwayes a ſpeciale vnto that, when he afflieth vs: but that nowe and then it is his will that Satan should torment vs ſo, to the intente that wee myght obtayne victorie agaynst him, and that our victorie ſhoule bee ſo muche the more honourable, as his assayling of vs hath ben the more honourable, as his assayling of vs hath ben more terrible. Also his meaning is too exercise vs by practise, to the intente wee may ſtandē in awe, and not take occation to aduaunce oure ſelues, nor to ouersleepe oure ſelues in vayne ſelftrūſt and presumption, as we haue ben wonte to do. God then wakeneth vs in ſuch wife, as we perceiue, that if we were not vphild by him, it woulde bee to our ſorow, ſpecially if wee were not relieved: in ſo muche that it would bee our chaunce too fall and to ſtumble downe at every blowe: and therefore that it is requisite that God ſhoule put his hand vnder vs, or else oure falles woulde bee deadly. Therefore it is Gods wil that wee ſhould feele it. But aboue all, wee muſt vnderſtānde, that the Angels haue a ſpeciall care of vs to guide vs, accordyng as God hath appoynted them to be miſtiſters of oure welfare, and committed vs to their keeping.

And hereby wee ſee why they bee called powers and principalities. In the meane whyle the diuels ceaſe not to turmoyle and deſtroye all thinges as neere as they can: which thing happeneth not without Gods will, howbeit that it be doone to the ende that we ſhoule be wakened by them, and invred with temptation and tryall, and to the ende wee may haue ſo muche the greater and excelleſter victorie when wee haue fought valiantly: and fy‐nally, to the ende that Satan may gayne nothing at oure hande, for ſo muche as wee bee guarded with ſtrengthe from aboue to withstande all his temptations. Lo what we haue briefly to beare in mynd concerning this ſentence. But forasmuch as this hath ben expounded already heretofore, I wil not ſtand vpon it, but briefly put you in remembrance of that which hath ben touched. God de‐maundeth of Satan from whence he came, and Satan tel‐leth him he hath royled ouer the whole world, and haſe made his vagaries and outleapes rounde about it. And as touching Job, he asketh him, Haste thou not taken heed of my ſeruant Job? Heerein the ſcripture yet agayne applyeth it ſelfe to our rawnesſe: for God hath no neede too aske Satan. All things (as I haue ſayde) are presente with him: howbeit forasmuche as wee vnderſtānde not that: it is for oure behoofe to haue ſome ſuche maner of ſpeeches as wee are better acquaynted with, and that God ſhoule not ſhewe himſelfe ſuche a one as hee is in his owne infinite Being: (for then ſhould wee be ſwallowed vp) but ſuch as we may coeceive him, and ſuch as we may beare. And heerein wee ſee his greate goodnesſe towardes vs, in that whereas we be not able to come vp vntoo him, he commeth downe vnto vs here, to the ende wee might knowe him, at leaſte wyſe ſo farre foorthie as is for oure profyt. For yf wee ſhould presume to enter into his greate Maieſtie, wee ſhoule bee ouerwhelmed. If wee bee not able too looke vppon the Sunne, but our eyes ſhall be dazed: I praye you howe ſhall we beholde the glorye of GOD in full perfectenesſe? It is imposſible for vs too dooit, tyllye wee bee made newe a-

1.Iob.3.4.2. gaine : according as Sainct Iohn sayeth that wee shall see him as he is, when we be become lyke vnto him. In the meane while, lette vs be contented to be his children, and too haue the grace of his adoption sealed in oure heartes by the holie Ghoste : and consequently lette vs knowe him in the image wherin he sheweth himselfe vntoo vs. And thus muche as concernyng that which hath ben touched, namely that (as Sainct Peter sayeth) Satan ceaseth

4.Pet.5.5.8. not too goe aboue lyke a roring Lyon whiche seeketh continually for a newe pracie. Seeing it is so, lette vs kepe good watche, and stande vppon oure garde: For after Sainct Peter hath threatened vs in that wyse: he addeth, VVithstande you stedfastly through faith.

Heereby he sheweth vs, that wee must not be afaynde although Satan haue suche a power, and that he be called the prince of the worlde : I saye wee neede not be afayrd that he shoulde ouerwhelme vs, so long as we be armed with faith. For we shall haue strengthe inough, and we shall be sure of the victorie, if we rest vpon God, and leane vnto the grace of our Lorde Iesu Christe, whereof mention is made in the tenth chapter of Iohn . The father (sayth he) whiche hath put you into my hande, is stronger than all. Feare ye not that Satan shall ouercome his maker. For God hath put vs into the handes of oure Lord Iesu Christ, to the intent that he shuld be the good and faythfull keper both of our soules and of our bodies. Therefore let vs rest our selues vpon him: but yet let vs not ceasse to be still ware and carefull. Suche as are negligent shall fynde them selues ouertaken at every blow. For as for the surenesse whiche we haue in God, it maketh vs not dull, nor to forget our owne daungers, wherein wee be: but only vpholdeth vs that wee quayle not in fyghting. But as for them that are drouzie and flatter theselues : they despise Gods ayd and relief. Our Lord sayth, I wil hold you vp, be not afayrd : for although Satan giue charge vpon you with thundering assaults, and that it seemeth too you that all shall goe too wrecke : yet shal ye be safe vnder me, and vnder my hande. But when he sayth so, his meaning is not that men shoulde presume vpon themselues and go no further : but contrarywyse he sayth, Come too mee, retire your selues vnder my protection, that I maye bee your fortresse against them that deuise mischiese towards you. And sith we fynd our selues assayed of so many enimies : it behoueth vs so much the more to knowe what great neede we haue of Gods helpe, and that when we be vnder his protection, we are surc, that neyther Satan nor all the wicked menne in the worlde , can bring that thing aboue whiche they haue enterprised against vs. Let vs marke then how the diuel is painted out liuely vnto vs, and that when the holie ghost sayeth, that he ceaseth not to keepe his courses and circutes about the earth, it standeth vs on hand to keepe always sure watch, and to be euermore awake of purpose to pray vnto God, and to haue our recourse vnto him, and also to arme our selues more and more with faith, that we may enter into the field of battell to fyght couragiously, vntill such time as God graunt vs to enioye the victorie that he hath promised vs . And where as it is sayd here of Iob, that God questioned with Satan about him specially : it is a token (as I haue declared alreadie) that euen in those dayes he had very fewe fellowes that serued God purely. And here we see why it is precisely sayde, that he withdrawe himselfe from euill. For all was full of corruption, and it was nothing else but an overflowing of iniquitie. If there had ben good store of righteous menne in the world, and that Iob had had manie like himselfe, that had giuen themselues to serue God as he did : God had not Spoken of that one man alone : but heere it is sayde ex-

By this then wee bee warned, notto marre our selues when we be among wicked persons : and that though we see the whole worlde set vpon mischies, and turned vpside downe, we must not take example therat, to suffer oure selues to be caried away, but keepe vs still in righte obediencie vnder the guidance of God, beseeching him to strengthen vs with his holie spirite, that our heeles be not tripped vp by the stumblingblocks which we see, and which the diuell casteth afore vs to thruste vs out of our waye. Seing then that Iob liued after that sort in all soundnesse notwithstanding that al the corruptions of the world were at that time(for all was corrupted:) Let vs mark, that although things be never so farre out of order, wee must not giue our selues libertie to doo euill: but wee muste haue an eye vnto God, and be throughly setled in him, and walke as it were in his presence. For we see what reccorde was giuen to the holie fathers that liued rightuously : that is to wit, that they regarded not what men did, to saye, I shall haue leau to doo as muche as they, I wil be no better than my neyours : but they coulde saye : Behold, God seeth vs howe wee walke in this worlde, and therfore we must behauour our selues as if we were before him, and we must haue our eyes fastned and settled vpon him. I haue tolde you heretofore what the qualities and tytles importe whiche God giueth here vnto Iob : namely, that fyrist he had the sayde substantialnesse or soundnesse of heart, for that is the true foundation wherevpon we must grounde our selues. Admit wee haue all the vertues of the worlde, so as wee be praysed and honoured of all men, and that we seeme to be very angels : yet shal all our whole life be but dung and stark filthinesse before God, vnlesse the sayd fountaine of the heart be pure and cleane : for according therervnto shall our workes be esteemed. Therfore let every man enter into himself, and searche his owne conscience: for we be wel liked of men, and all men may be well contented with vs, yea and they may clappe theyr handes at vs : and yet wee shall be neuerthelesse cursed afore God, if there be any hypocrisie in our hearts: or if we be not purged cleane from all dissimulation, so as there maye be no doublenesse in vs, nor twoo heartes at once, as the Scripture sayeth in another place. Now when we be so mynded to serue God : our lyfe also will be answerable therervnto, and we shall walke as it becommeth vs. VVee see diuers that woulde fayne bee taken for the ryghtuousest folke in the worlde. But what? their verie lyfe sheweth the contrarie : They are menne of so good behauoure, as it is a woorder to see them : yea with full mouth. But with full eyes, with full eares, full feete, and full handes, they bee fullye diuels incarnate, and deadlie plagues too infecte the whole worlde. Sothen, let vs marke well, that the saide soundnesse must bee matched with honesty and vpright dealyng, so as wee maye bee conuersante among menne, without annoyng any man : indeuorng too helpe oure neyours, and shewing the freindlinesse which God comandeth vs. Here we see wherin we shewe our soundnesse: and this is the true touchestone wherby God proueth vs. Like as gold is tried either by the touchestone, or in the furnace : euen so oure soundhartednesse sheweth it self by oure honest and vpright dealyng, when we lyue among men without annoyng them, and without desyre to drawe other mennes goodes vnto vs, beeing voyde of crueltie, voyde of pride, and voyde of vayngloriosenesse : And, contrarywyse beeyng courteouse too helpe euery man, pitifull to succoure suche as are in necesstie, and diligente too imploye our selues according too the abilitie that God giueth vs. And like as it behoueth vs to walke

to walke vprightly and faythfully with oure neyghbours : so behoueth vs also to feare God. For it were no reason that men should haue their right and dutie, and that God in the meane whyle shuld go without his. For it is he that we must begin at, according as he is highest in degree. So then wee must in suche wise applie our selues to the seruing of our neyghbours, as in the meane tyme God be not forgotten.

And this is a thing well worth the marking. For sometymes shall wee see an outward countenance of vertue in men, so as a man would saye, they be Petie angels, and no man can fynde faulfe with them : But what for that ? They regard not God, but rather despize him. Therfore it is not without cause that God purposing here to commende his seruant Job, matcheth these two things together, namely that he had liued vprightly among men, and also that he had the sayd deuoutnesse, that is to wit, a true mynde to worship the liuyng God. And yet for all this, he dwelled here in the worlde among many corruptions. Now if we consider the soundnesse wherein he lyued : wee be ouerlazie but if we resist all the euils wherwith wee be enuironed. It is sayd, that Job withdrew him selfe from euill : and therfore lette vs not thinke too serue God without trouble, for we shall be prouoked to doo euill on all sydes. How then shall wee walke as it becommeth vs. It behoueth vs indeuer to withdraw oure selues from euill, yea even from the euill that is within vs. If the euill were but neere vnto vs, yet woulde it stand vs on hand to bee heedfull in withdrawing our selues : for if we smell any stinche, incontinently we turne away our face.

Roms.8.b.7. And I pray you when Satan seketh to poysone vs, and all is full of infection, haue we not good cause to withdraw oure selues. But (as I sayd) the euil is within vs, it is as a burning ouen : and looke how many wicked lustes there bee to carye vs away : so many aduersaries are there too the wil of God. All the whole nature of man (saith Sainct Paule) is nothing else but enmitie agaynst God. Therfore it behoueth vs to be the more careful to put this doctrine here in vre, that is to wit, of withdrawing our selues from euill. And howe shall wee withdraw our selues ? Firste of all let vs take heed of our selues, and of our wicked affections, whiche serue to turne vs asyde from God. Then afterward lette vs beware of leude persons, who are as it were fyrebrandes to set the mischefe more on fyre : and these are mortall plagues. Nowe then, when wee see so muche iniquirie, so much loosenesse, and so muche outrage in the worlde, that vices haue their ful scope : what is to bee done ? Let vs withdraw our selues, and lette vs

2.Cor.6.d.17 shunne occasion, according alio as Sainct Paule alledgedeth Esa.52.c. 11. the same recorde, saying : VVithdrawe youre selues, and flee farre from Babylon, you that carrie the Lordes vespells. Hereby Paule meaneth, that after we be once baptized in the name of our Lorde Iesus Christe, it behoueth vs to be holie both in bodie and mynde, and to bee giuen wholly vnto God, and dedicated to his seruice : whiche thing can not bee doone, but by withdrawyng our selues from the defylementes that may corrupt vs. So then lette vs eschue occasions of euil. And when wee see the worlde so ouerflowed with all vice, let vs aduisedly withdraw our selues, and fasten our eyes vpon God, who maketh vs holie. And now our Lorde addeth a tylte whiche hee vsed not afore : that Job kept still his soundnesse.

Heerein our Lorde commendeth his constancie, whiche was not apparant vntill suche tyme as hee had bene wounded to the quicke. Job had heretofore ben a man that feared God, he had ben sounde, he had had the sayd substantialnesse that I speake of, and he had had the foresayde honest and vpright dealing in his conuersation with his neyghbours. Truly it was very muche for him too haue so many goodly vertues: but yet it was not knowne that he had such constancie in him, as to holde out in his soundnesse. But nowe is Job bereft of all his goods, and he hathe loste his children : and yet for all that he blisfeth the name of God, acknowledging that he ought to liue vnder condition that if God giue him goodes too vse, and afterward take them from him again, he ought to prepare himselfe to nakednesse and miserie, and not kicke against him that hath all power and authoritie.

Lo here the iuincible constancie that was knowne to bee in Job, whiche heretofore had had no suche tryall. And hereby we see, that it is necessarie for vs to be afflieted, and that although we fynd it harde and paynfull at the firste sighte, yet is it behouefull for vs. And why so ? For wee thinke not vpon Gods helpe, as becommeth vs, vntill wee haue trauailed thorough many daungers, and that it hath ben our chaunce to get the vpper hande ouer all temptations. So then, lette vs marke well, that lyke as God hath told vs, that Job kept stil his soundnesse, notwithstanding that he had ben sore persecuted : so also must we passe by the same gate: that is to wit, wee must be in continuall readynesse to serue God, and too giue our selues wholly vnto him, notwithstanding that wee bee tryed in diuers sortes. And wherefore ? Euen too holde still oure soundnesse. VVe see then howe it is needfull that every one of vs should be so exercised, to the ende that on the one syde wee may knowe what nede we haue of Gods help : and that on the other syde our faith may bee the better tryed, and the power of the holighoste shewe and vter it selfe the better in vs, by getting the vpper hande in the temptations and battels, that are put vnto vs by Satan. God then graunt vs to bee armed aforehande with the sayd heauenly vertue [of constancie] to withstande all encounters vntill we haue the full victorie, when wee shall be gathered into the euerlasting rest of the heauenly kingdom.

But let vs cast our selues downe in the presence of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faultes, beseeching him to make vs feele them better, to the intent that in crauing pardon at his hande, wee may be rightly sorie and displeased with oure selues for them, and that therewithall we may be so forestrengthened by him, and by his holie spirite, as the diuell may not be able to get in any thing at our handes, but that wee may get victorie against him, against the whole worlde, and against all oure fleshly affections. And so let vs all saye, Almighty God and our heauenly Father. &c.

The ninth Sermon, which is the second vpon the seconde Chapter.

- 7 Satan vvent out from the presence of the Lord, and smote Job vwith an euil sore from the sole of his foote to the crovvne of his head.
- 8 Then tooke he a potsherd to scrape himselfe, and he sate him dovvne in the duste.
- 9 And his vwife said vnto him, dost thou yet hold still thy singlenesse ? Blisse God and die.
- 10 He ansverred hit, Thou speakest like a foolish wyomā. VVe haue receiued good of the Lord, and shall vve not receyue euil ? In all this Job sinned not vwith his lippes.

E haue to marke heere, that when God hath withdrawen his hande from vs, wee muste prepare oure selues too suffer muche greater miseries than wee haue escaped. For wee see after what maner God proceedeth, when he afflicthe hys seruauntes. If they bee but Nouices, so as they bee not acquaynted with the suffering of aduersitie, he sparreth them, lyke as wee woulde not lay so greate a burden vpon a little childe, as vpon a man. God then hath a regarde of our ablenesse too beare, and according as wee bee practized with the induring of troubles, so sendeth he them too vs smaller or greater. But when wee bee once as it were inured with them, then maye he the better lay full lode vpon vs: for he hathe also giuen vs wherewith too beare it ute. And wee see howe he speakest too Peter, saying that at suche tyme as he was yong, he was lefte at his owne ease and rest: but when thou arte olde (saythe he) another shall 20 girdle thee, thou shalte bee tyed and bounde, and thou shalte bee haled whither thou wouldest not. VVe see then what a regarde God hathe too holde vs vp, while wee bee yet tender: and that afterwarde when hee hathe made vs strong, he sendeth vs more greevous and heauie afflictions, forasmuche as vse oughte too haue strengthened vs already aforehande. This hathe beene shewed in the person of Iob, too the ende that euery of vs mighte receyue instruction by it for him selfe. Righte harde things were they vnto Iob, that 30 he was spoyled of his goodes, that he loste his children, and that he was broughte too pouertie: But it was an other maner of thing when Satan smote him in his body, so as he was full of paynfull botches, whereof a man coulde not tell the kinde, sauing that it was as one whole Leprosie: yea and the holy Scripture sheweth vs, that of necessitie the disease muste needes haue beeene extreme.

Lo howe he is heere, as it were, caste ute of mens compagnie: euen hee who hadde heretofore beene honored of all men, is heere nowe as a rotten caryon, in so muche as he is lyke too fall in peeces (as yee woulde say) in his owne stinche, and too endure the extremest payne in the worlde, for suche sores coulde not bee without greate burning, whiche tormented him euen too the vttermoste. Then see wee heere, that this latter miserie was farre more excessiue than all the miseries that had happened vnto him afore. And this is it that Satan mente also, when he sayde: yea, will not a man alwayes quitt skinne for skinne? or will he not giue his 50 owne childe for his raunsome, so he may scape him seifer? He that hathe sauad his owne lyfe, thinkes still he hathe gayned muche: and although he haue loste all, yet hathe he wherewith too comforte him selfe, and too assuage his sorrowc. Beholde the sullenesse of Satan, which he groundeth vpon the nature of man. Truely this poynte was not founde in Iob: but yet the case so standeth, as all of vs are enclyned too bee of that minde: namely that our lyfe is so precious vnto vs, as it is more easie for vs to beare all the residue, than the mischaunces that lighte vpon our owne persons. But so the case standeth, that wee see heere an iuincible constancie in the seruaunt of God. For as hee continued in hys soundnesse when God punished him in his goodes and children: So also did he the lyke when he was persecuted so roughly in his body, that he had not one whole place in it, but was ful of matter, and in extreme grecfe and tormentes: but howe souer the worlde wente, he ceassed not too blesse God. Then if God graunte vs too escape some one inconuenience, let vs followe the councell that I haue giuen afore, and learne too dispose our selues too the suffering of three or foure moe, whiche shall bee greater and excessiuer than the first. And it is good reason that God shoulde encrease the weighte of oure burden, according too the strength that he hathe inabled vs withall. For in so dooing, he hath an eye too oure welfare. Specially it behoueth vs too marke well this circumstance, that Iob had not any long respite betweene the continual growing of his miseries vpon him. God dothe oftentimes giue vs some respite, that when hee hathe tryed oure pacience by some aduersitie, wee may haue laysure too take breathe agayne, and too assuage the griefe and heauynesse that wee haue endured, and then afterwarde God sendeth vs some other heart-sore: but heere hee layde on stroke vpon stroke. For assoone as Iob had beene visited after one sorte in hys goodes, wee see him afflicted immediatly in another. VVhen the robbers had made cleane riddaunce of all his great cattell, the lightning came from heauen too consume the rest: His children dyed, as if the hande of God had beene their enimie, and by and by after he was plagued in his owne person. Heere was inough too haue ouerwhelmed Iob, notwithstanding that he had a wondersfull stoutnesse in him. But it was Gods will too worke after suche a maner in him, too the intente that every one of vs when wee bee afflicted, shoulde consider that God ceaseth not too bee oure father still. For he never forsooke his seruaunt Iob, althoughe he were come to suche extremities. And when wee suffer but the one halfe, yea or the tenth parte of that whiche he endured: shall wee bee excused if wee murmur? Nay rather, haue wee not cause too thanke God for regarding of oure infirmtie, when he punisheth vs but according too that whiche he feeth vs able too endure? And what letteth that wee shoulde not bee afflicted as muche as Iob? Is it for that God hathe not so muche authoritie ouer vs? or is it for that Satan is become more gentle nowe a dayes? VVee bee sure that the rage of oure mortall enimie Satan is the selfe same it was, and that he is of the same mynde still that he was then, and that he keepeth still his accustomed nature, that is too witte, too bee as a Lyon roaring with open mouthe too swallowe vs vp. If God giue him the brydle, wee bee sure wee shall endure as muche or more than Iob. But our afflictions are meane and sweete, if a man compare them with the afflictions that are spoken of heere. Therefore let vs conclude, that God sheweth him selfe courteous and very pityfull towrdaus vs, seeing wee bee chastized so gently at his hande, and that he keepeth such a measure as wee bee not racked too the vttermost, nor he vseth so greate and excessiue rigour as wee see heere in the person of Iob. Furthermore it is heere shewed vs, howe men oughte too renounce themselues, that they may giue them selues wholly ouer vnto God. But as long as a man standeth in his owne conceyte (yea euen though he bee well accustomed too serue God,) it can not bee but hee shall rather goe backwarde than forwarde. Fer prooife whereof, he that standeth in hys owne conceyte, delighteth also in hys owne pleasures, and in his owne ease, and he desireth to haue all his owne commodities, and al that his lust leadeth him to. But god meaneth to hadle vs cleane contrariwise: How is that? Is it for that God delighteth to trouble vs? No: but because it is behoofefull for vs to be so tamed and brought lowe that wee may shewe the subiectiōn which wee oughte to yeelde vnto God. If God should frame himselfe to our will in the things that he sendeth vpon vs: a man coulde not well discerne what it were too bee obedient. But when he handleth vs cleane cōtrarie to our appetite, and that wee be so subiect vnto him as we holde all our affections vnder his brydle, to the ende to frame our selues to his lure and to yelde him the honor of governing vs, yea euen after his owne good will as he listeth to dispose of vs: therein we shewe that we are obedient to him.

Thus we see what is declared to vs in this text. And 10 wee see howe Job is fayne to fighte againte all his owne affections, to bereue himselfe of them, and to hold himselfe as a prysoner: for otherwise he shoulde leape out of his boundes, he shoulde lift vp himselfe agaynst God, or at leastwyse he shoulde fall into such anger, as he shoulde do nothing but storne within himselfe so that God shoulde haue nother credite nor superioritie in him. Then let vs take example at Job, to resist all our affections and to bring them vnderfoote, if we intende to serue God. For it is impossible that he shoulde haue the full vse of vs till 20 we be come to that poynt: that is to wit, till we renounce our selues, and that wee set not so much store by our lyfe, but we can better finde in our hartes to yelde our selues subiect to him whose we are, and to whom it becommeth vs to dedicate our lyfe, than to be so giuen to our owne commoditie and ease. True it is that wee may well desire God to assit vs and to sende vs what so ever is meete for vs. But yet therewithall wee must holde vs at this stay: namely that he may do what he knoweth to be good: and that though it be against our appetyte, yet 30 he will graunt vs grace to frame our selues vnto him, and to folowe him throughout whither soever he call vs. And that is the thing which wee haue to practyze all the time of our lyfe. VVhen a trade, occupation or handicraft is hard, we must haue the more time to learne it, and it hath the more cunning belonging to it. This lesson here is hard for vs to learne, yea and ouerhard (say I) for vs to put in vre. True it is that we can well ynoch confesse, how it is good reason that God shoulde be chiefe Mayster and reygne ouer vs, and that wee shoulde not striue against 40 him: but when it commeth to the deede doing, there be very fewe that demeane themselues thereafter? Therefore let vs all the time of our lyfe learne to remember the sayd lesson and to invre our selues to it, vntill wee haue profited in it as we haue neede to do. But for al-muche as it shall be handeled more at large heereafter: now I will no more but glaunce at the things as I passe by them.

Let vs come to that which is added in the text: that is to wit, that Jobs wife commeth to him to prouoke him to despayre. How now? (sayeth she) Continuest thou yet still in thy singlenesse? Blisse God and dye. The Diuell findeth meanes ynow to incomber vs, without hauing any belloves to quicken vp the fyre. For we know there is so great sturdinessse in our nature, as it is pitie to see it. In steade of quiet submitting of our selues vnto God and vnto his holie spirit and will as we ought to do, we concyeue wandering imaginations, and there is not any of vs all, which hath not as it were a whole storehouse full of such dotages in his brayne, where through he is as it were made drunken, according as we knowe that all the lustes of our fleshe are enemies against God. So then, there is none of vs which ouershooteth not himselfe, though we haue no intycers to prouoke vs against God, or to drawe vs vnto despayre. To be short, though Satan take no instruments without vs to deceyue vs withall: he shall finde ynow within our owne persones. Our enemies are alreadie within vs. For (as I haue sayd) all our wauering sancies, are vtter enimies to God: and all our affections are armed agaynst him, to make vs striue againt hys punishments when he sendeth them vnto vs. Therefore it was a double warre vnto Job, when besides the possibilitie of being tempted in himselfe, his owne wife prouoked him to despaire: for that was the full measure of all miserie. But God permitteth it to happen to his faithfull ones, and that especiallye when hee purposeth to trye them to the quicke. And this lighted not vpon Job alone. But we see it most of all in Dauid: yea and wee see it also in our Lorde Iesus Christe. Beholde here two mirroures wherein God ment to represente the said kinde of temptation vnto vs. For one of the grecuousest cōplaynys that Dauid maketh, is that hee was mocked, for putting hys trust in God, insomuche as he became a laughingstocke to euerye man, and men bleared out their tungs at hym saying: O feela, he bare himselfe in hand that he fale in Gods lappe: he called him his protector, his buckler, and his fortresse: hee bragged of his calling vpon him, and of his resorting to him for refuge: and to be short, it seemed that God shoulde never haue forsaken him: and nowe a man may see howe he hath esteemed him. All the myseries that Dauid endured, were not so hard to disgeit, ne wounded him so deadly, as these reproches that men offered him. And verely Satan seeth how he holdeth vs as it were by the throte, when hee hathe once wonne thys poynte at oure handes. For hee standeth not skanning whether hee maye pricke vs and wounde vs in the arme, or in the legge: but hee commeth righte to the hearte, and too the throte of vs when hee hathe once doone so muche, that wicked folke fell a mockyng of vs, as thoughtle wee hadde trusted to God in vayne, and were disappoyneted of the hope that wee wayted for at his hande. VVee see then that our faithe goeth too vtter wrecke, if wee give place too any suche temptation. And looke what befell vnto Dauid, the same was accomplished in our Lord Iesus Christ. Therefore it behoueth vs who are his members, to be fashioned like vnto hym, and that the same likenesse be fulfilled in our persons, and that wee put our selues in a readiness to resist when we indure aduersities and when wicked persones come to sting vs by scoffing at our fayth, of purpose to cast vs into such despayre, as our hartes might misgivie vs that God is against vs, and that wee bee cut shorte of the trust that wee reposid in him, when wee finde not the succoure that wee looked for at hys hande. Lette vs arm our selues againte suche temptation, that wee quayle not vnder it. True it is (as I haue erst sayd) that it is a right harde temptation to ouercome: but wee see what is written here of Job. Is not he that vphild him strong ynoch to helpe vs also, that we may not quaille? Neuerthelesse we haue here an example, how that after Satan hath tormented vs and that wee haue bene visited bothe in bodie and goods and in all things els: to knit vp the matter withall, wee must bee fayne to be mocked, and to haue our fayth assaulted. And this cannot bee done, but the name of God must bee blasphemied: and therefore wee must needs be grieved and sorie at the hart, when that happeneth. For when the vnfaythfull skorne vs as reieected of God, they blame him of vntruth as though he had beguyled vs, and therefore it muste needs grieve vs and torment vs. But how soever the world go, let vs not faynt for all that: but let vs call to remembrance what hath hapned vnto Job and vnto Dauid, and what Iesus Christ hath shewed vs, to the end we may not thinke it straunge if we be fashioned like vnto his image. For here we see vpō what cōdiciō God hath grefed vs into the body of his sonne, so as he is the generall patrone of all the faythfull, as Saincte Paule declarereth in the viij. to the Romaines.

But let vs now consider what is imported in the said temptation, whiche Iobs wyfe bringeth, saying: Dost thou yet holdstil thy singlenesse? As if she had said, what gaineſt thou by seruing God? For thine intent in seruing him, hath ben to be supported by him, that he should haue liked well of thee, and that he should haue shewed by his dooings that he is thy father: and thou ſeefſt howe hee is an enimie too thee, and perſecuteth thee. So then thy ſoundneſſe bootteth thee nothing at all. Lo heere what hir conclusion is: As concerning that which foloweth, namely Bliffe God and dye: it is expounded in diuers maners. For wee haue ſeen how this word Bliffe, is ſomtimes taken to Curſe. And that custome, (that is to ſaye, that maner of ſpeaking) ſerueth to teache vs to deteſt blaſphemie againſte God, as a thing that ought not to be named. Then are we done to vnderſtād that to grudge agaynst God, or to ſpite him, or to caſt forth any woordes that may ſound to his diſhonour, is ſo deteſtable a thing, as wee muſt even ſhudder and quake at it: according as wee ſee that when Sainct Paule ſpeaketh againſt whordome and other villainous loofenelle, and againſt gluttonie and robbery: let them not (ſayth he) be once named among you. And therefore ſome expounde this ſentence thus: Bliffe the Lorde, that is to ſay, prouoke God to anger, and then thou dyest for it: reuenge thy ſelfe on him once ere thou dye: for thou ſeefſt well inough that he hath deceiued thee.

And it is not to be doubted but this woman here was an iſtriuuent of Satan, and therfore it is not to be maruelled though ſhe be as a Sheediuell, or as a feend of hell, to ſette Iob in ſuche a rage, as he ſhoule lift vp hiſmelfe againſte God, and fall too riſhing againſte hiſmaieſtie. But if the matter be throughly conſidered, the naturall meaning of it is this rather: Bliffe God and die: that is to ſay, wel mayſt thou perſiſt to bliſſe God as muſh as thou wiſt: but when thou haſt all doone, thou ſhalt gayne nothing by it, it is but lost labour: thou muſt be fayn to die, do what thou canſt: it is fully determined that it ſhall be ſo: for thou ſeefſt that God hath not heard thy prayers, whether thou glorifye him or not: it is all one: none of thiſ ſhall come at Heauen: therefore thou haſte ſpunne a fayre threde in humbling thy ſelfe afore God: nay, ſith thou muſt dye lyke a poore forlorne caytife, looke not that God ſhould be appeaſed towards thee, nor that hiſwrathe ſhould be affuaſed, thou muſt needes paſſe through it. True it is that the ſenſe commes continually all to one poynſt: and therfore it behoueth me not to ſtande greatly upon the woordes. For the principal point is to haue ſuch doctrine, as the hoſlie Ghoſt giueth vs. For the firſte poynſt, and without any diſſicultie, (as the woordes themſelues conteyne) it is certaine that the marke wherat Iobs wyfe ſhotte, was too diuine him to deſpayre, to the ende he ſhould haue fretted and chafed againſte God, and haue loſte his whole vnderſtāding, and in ſtede of bliſſing of God as he had earſt done, haue prouoked him to wrath, and finally haue flinched himſelf ouer all the fieldes lyke a wood beaſt.

And here we haue to conſider throughly, what is ſayde of Iob: for it is a common iſtruction for all the fauithfull. Therefore let vs beare it well awaie, and applie it to oure our owne vſe. True it is that thiſ ſaying heere, came oute of a womans mouthe: But howe many are there too bee founde, that will ſay the lyke at thiſ daye? It is the ordinarie custome of the world. For wee ſerue not God (now adayes) but by indenture as they ſay. Yea and men themſelues are not afraide to confeſſe their owne vnbelleefe by their prouerbes. They ſaye a man ſhoule not truſte ſo much to the boughes, as to lette goe hiſholde of the bodie of the tree, which is as muſh to ſay as they muſt not truſt altogether vnto God. VVhervnto tend theſe things, but to ſhewe that we yeeld no honor vnto God? But we conceiue them accordingly as the thinges themſelues impoſt. If God doo vs good, peraduenture it may ſo be that we will ſhew how we be beholden to him. But if hee hanidle vs amiffe, incontinently it is at our toungs end to ſay: To what purpose doo we ouerlabour our ſelues? Also let vs marke well, that if Iob were tempted and prouoked by hiſowne wyfe: Satan ſhall haue ſtore of vndermyners in theſe dayes to leade vs into lyke temptation, if we be not armed and fenced to reſiſt it. Thus we ſee then what wee haue to do. Besides thiſ, if it happen that the wicked come not to prickē vs forward after that maner: yet it may bee that euen they which haue proſited moſt in Gods ſchole, may conceyue ſuſh imaginations of themſelues. VVe ſee how euen Dauid confeſſeth of hiſelf, that he had ſtode Pſal.73. as it were vpon yce, and thought he ſhoule haue ſlyded when he entred into that diſcourse with hiſelf, and ſaw how the wicked ſort were oftentimes too well intreated, ſo as they glutted themſelues with the pleaſures of thyſ worlde, and pyned not awaye as the good men doo: and that on the contrarie part, the poore fauithfull ones drinke heere of the water of ſorow, ſo as God ceaſeth not too puniſh them. VVherfore he protesteth, that in the ende he came to ſay, And what? Then, that I haue indeuored to haue cleane and pure handes, is it any better than loſte tyme? is it not an vnprefitabla labor? Dauid confeſſeth that he was encombrēd with ſuſh a temptation: not that he was overthowne in it, but for that it came before him and he reſiſted it ſtedfastly. So then lette ys marke, that when the diuell bringeth ſuſh matches to ſet vs the more on fyre agaynst God in our afflictions: we muſt not giue eare to him, leaſt he entrap vs: and therfore that we muſt bethinke vs of thiſ leſſon a long tyme aforēhande, which ſerueth to giue vs victorie agaynst ſuſh encounters. And here we ſee wherfore it is ſayd in Eſay, Say ye, there is a rewarde for the ryghtuous. That is to ſaye, conclude you ſo with your ſelues. VVhen you ſee al thiſ ſo conſounded, as it maye ſeeme that all order is turned vpside down, and that God fauoreth the wicked, and hateth the godly, or rather that Fortune beareth al the ſway, & that God is a ſleepe in heauen, and gouerneth no more the thiſes here beneath: yet muſt you alwayes affiue your ſelues of thiſ, that the rightuous ſhall reape the fruite of their labours. So then it is true that there can not bee a worse temptation, than to thiſke that we loſe our labour in ſeruing God, and in prayſing hiſname, and in holding our ſelues vnder him. And therefore it behoueth vs to bee fully perſuaded, that God wil in no wife diſappoint thoſe that honour and ſerue him. If wee haue not thiſ opinion: it is imposiſble that euer we ſhould haue the leaſt deſire that can be in the worlde, to giue our ſelues vntoo God. If wee imagin that God turneth hiſbacke vpon vs, that he makes a ſport to ſee vs turmoyle ſo here below that he ſhutteth hiſeyes, and that it is but loſte tyme too walke in all carefullneſſe: who is hee that can bende hiſelfe to doo well? Now then, forasmuche as it behoueth thoſe that ſerue God and come neerest vnto him, to bee fully reſolved, that he rewardeth thoſe that feare him: we ſee that the woort and deadliſt temptation that Satan can trumpe in our way, is when he bears vs in hand, that wee doo but loſte tyme, when wee praye vntoo God, and make oure recourse vnto him. And ſo muſche the more muſte wee bee watchfull agaynst ſuſh temptations, as we perceyue them to be ſo wicked and dangerous. Herewithall let vs beare in mynde, that it behoueth vs to be ready fenced agaynst the greatest freendes that wee haue.

The case is so here, as I maye yeeld nother to my wife, nor to my neigbore simply, no nor euen to him whome I trust best. For our linking one with another must be such as we always haue regard of God, and that the bond of our concord and frēdship proceede from him. Also let vs remember, that if a man haue a diuell in his house to disquiet him, or if he haue two or three: so much the more neede hath he to stande vpon his gārd: and it maye in no wise serue to excuse them for setting them selues in a chafe against God. For it declareth vnto vs that we must garde 10 our selues on al sides. And why so: for Satan our mortal enimie is ouerwily, he spieth on what side he may best enter, and if there be any feeble place, there will he make a breach. And the easiest entrance that he hath into vs, is by the loue that the husbande beareth to the wife, and a singular freende vnto him that he trusteth. Satan sees well y-nough that we giue way to such manner of persons, and therefore he laboreth the more earnestly to serue his own turne by them against vs. Yet must not this diminishe the frendships that are good and godly: but the husband must 20 pray God, that he suffer not his wife to be as a firebronde of hell, to kindle the fire of impacience, or of distrust in him, to prouoke him to blasphemē. Also it behoueth the wife to pray God, that her husband may guide her as is cōueniente, and be alwayes able to instrucē her aright as her head and superioure. And moreouer when God hath gyuen vs freends and acquaintance, we must pray hym that they may serue all to his honoure, so as eche of vs maye further other in the way of saluation, and not entice one another vnto wickednesse. Thus we see what we haue to 30 do in the firste pointe: and consequently, let vs aduise oure selues well, that every one of them, both wiues and husbands, freends and kinsfolke, may helpe vs to serue God, and that we our selues may ay me alwayes at that marke: specially when we see that God dwelleth in them, and that he vseth them as his own hands to guide vs withall. But if a freend, or a kinsmā, or a wife go about to drieve vs to despaire: then out of all peradventure we must renounce them all, for God must be preferred, and our frendship must begin at him, and leuell at him, as at their true mark. 40 And this is it that we haue to marke in this streine according also as Job sheweth vs by his owne example, saying: Thou hast spoken like a foolish woman: verely we haue receyued good at the hand of the Lord, and shal we not also receyue euill? When as Job answereþ, that his wife hath spoken foolishly: thereby we be admonished, that we ought to reproue suche blasphemēs sharply, forasmuche as they bee spewed out by Satan. For if we see a sword drawnen against vs, or a foyne cast at vs to wound vs vnto deathe: what would we do in that behalfe? would we suffer our selues to be slayne without making countenance of any thing? No: but we would take heed to shifft off the blowe or to ward it, if we set any store by our life. Euen so when Job saw himselfe so persecuted of his owne wife, and that she wēt about not to worke him some harme in his body on-ly, but to sende him to the deepe pit of hell: he refisted her stoutly. We see then with what corage we ought to pro-ceede in suche cases, and howe it is no dalyng with Satan seeing we finde him so furious an enimie, nor no going to the matter as though we went to some light skirmish that were easy to overcome. And furthermore, Job had also an eye to that which hath bene recited heretofore. For (as I haue said) if a man vpbraide vs, that it is but a vaine thing to trust in God: true it is that the same doing troubleth vs, and is inough to quenche our faith: and therewithall God is accused of misdealing and of mocking his seruants, and specially of vniustice: all that is proper to him is plucked from him, and he shal be no longer God, except he discerne good from euill, to aduance those that serue him in sowndnesse, so as he may be iudge of the world, and ready to heare them that resort to him for succor. If God be bereft of such vertues: we see most certainly, that both his glory, and his Godhed, and his being, are quite abolished. So then Job could not beare with such blasphemēs, Psa. 69.c.10 according also as it is said in the Psalme, that the zeale of Gods house ought to bite our harts and to consume vs, and that the reproch which men offer vnto him, ought to rebound vpon vs, so as it behoueth vs to be grieved whē we see the honoure of God impeached. Then if we be his children, it becommeth vs to set our selues agaist it. And thus we see what we haue to note when Job rebuked his wife so stoutly (as to say) Thou hast spoken like a foole. And herwithall let vs beare in mind, that this answer here ought to be made agaist all like temptations, from what partie soever they come, or from whence soever they be sent at vs. But aboue all, when we be troubled with the lewd imaginacions of our owne flesh, it behoueth vs to folowe the example of Job, and to learne of him howe to deale with our owne griefes: and whereas we haue bene accustomed to be angrie with them that sting vs or do vs any wrong: every one of vs must begin to storme agaist himselfe: so as we may bethinke our selues thus: I haue such a vice: I am angry with mine enimies if anye one of them haue practised euil against me, and I can haue no pacience, but am caried away with a desire of vengeance to re-quite like for like: and yet when I haue well aduised my selfe, I finde not a worse enimie to my welfare, than my selfe: that is to say, this vngracious nature, and the wicked affections that I conceiuē within me, are as many enimies to hinder my welfare. And therefore it becommeth me to be angrie at my selfe, because it is from thence that my greatest enimies come. Wherefore when such temptacions come vpon vs, as we see it happened here to Job: let vs learne to withstand them stoutly, without soothing of our selues, to the end we may overcome them. And when we see our selues trained by any lewde fancies to striue against God (as our nature is full of rebelliousnesse, and of striuing against him) we must not flatter our selues to say as some do, that it is but our nature, and that we be not able to amend it: but let vs assure our selues that such excuses shall stande vs in no steade: for it behoueth vs to fight stoutly and to resist them, and it is not for vs to saye flatly, O, we must saue our selues, or I wote not what: no no: But we must enter into the combate, yea and into a liuely combate, where we must employ all our witte, and all our endeouure, or else we shall never come to an end of it. Lo whereof we be aduised in this streine. And whē Job addeth, Seeing we haue received good of the Lorde, why should we not also receive euill? he setteth downe a naturall argument to induce vs to beare patiently the euill and aduersities that God sendeth vs. For if we be so muche bounde to a man, that when we haue received a good turne at his hand, we wil haue such consideration of him as to saye, he is a man that hathe done me greate good: if herebypon we indure not any thing at the hands of them to whome we be so muche beholden, will not men saye that there is to vilanouse an vnrthankfulnesse in vs? According then as we be bound to mortall men, so also will we be pacient when we shal be faine to suffer any inconuenience for them. If a childe be willing to beare with his father, forasmuche as hee knowes that his father begat him, and nourished him, and kepereth him still in his house: if the childe notwithstanding that his father be rough towards him) be bound neuerthelesse to acknowlege that it is good reason he should abide him: If (I say) we graunt so much vnto creatures: what must we graunt to the Crea-tor. VVe tor? VVe see that God dothe vs many good turnes, and shall wee endure no euill at his hand when it please him? Ought not he too haue superioritie ouer vs, and too punishe vs when he thinketh it good? This consideration ought to make vs bowe downe our neckes, and to holde vs in quiet: and that is the argument that Job maketh heere. He had sayde heeretofore, The Lorde hath giuen, the Lorde hath taken away, and that is another reason. For thereby he ment, that when God giueth vs goods, it is not to appropriate them vnto vs (as they say:) but too let vs haue the vse of them for a time, so as wee shoulde bee ready at all houres to sende him home agayne that which he hath lent vs. Lo thus wee see how Job alleageth 20 a natural reason: and nowe he bringeth another seconde reason. And what is that? VVe receive good at the Lords hande, and why then receyue we not euill alio? For sith we bee so greatly bounde vnto God, it is too vile an unthankfulness, if we can not finde in our hearts to suffer any thing for his sake. And furthermore, if we will marke this reason well: wee must first compare God with his creatures: and then secondly wee must compare the benefites that God giueth vs, with the benefites that we can receyue of men. VVhen God commeth in the ranke, I pray you what is all the honor, and all the authoritie that can be giuen to creatures? is it any more than a dreppe in respect of that which is due vnto God, and which he hath deserved? So then let vs marke well, that if we were a hundred thousande times more patient too suffcr afflictions than we bee: if the aduersarie came vnto vs on the behalfe of men too whorne we are bounde, yet were our doing too no purpose. VVhy so? because the Maiestie of God surmounteth all creatures in suche wise, as wee can not discharge our selues towards him, as becommeth vs: and that although we do our duetie towards men: it is impossible too accomlische that whiche wee owe vnto God. But aboue all, we must marke the graticus giftes that he dealeth to vs continually with his owne hand. Let vs count well, for we are sure, that when we haue counted [to the vttermost] we must confess with David, that there is nother number nor measure of them. And wherfore? For Gods goodnessse is a botomlesse pit, insomuch as wee must needs be rauished as ofte and as long tyme as wee muse vpon them. And for prooife thereof, if a man consider howe God hath shewed him selfe a father too him, euen from his birthe, yea and before his birthe: I pray you muse we not bee confounded before we can reache to the hundredth parte of them? Seeing then that the case so standeth, that Gods graces are innumerable, and can by no meanes be comprehended: why receyue we not the aduersities that he fendeth vs? For althought we were afflicted muche more than we be: yet shoulde Gods benefites farre surmount all the afflictions that we can suffer at his hande. So then let vs marke well the sayde reason of Jobs, to the ende that when soever God shall afflicte vs, we may beare al things patiently, assuring our selues that it is good reason we should receiue aduersitie at his hande, sith we haue receyued so many of his benefites. But the rest of this sentence shall be reserved till to morrowe, because it can not as nowe be set out at length.

And let vs pray to this good God, that it may please him to haue alwayes regard of our infirmities whensoeuer he shall afflict vs: and that forasmuche as it is good reason that we should be inured vnto pacience so long as we be in this worlde: although wee bee forced to passe through many thornes and diuers hartgreeses and vexations of minde: yet neuerthelesse our good God wyl so arme vs with his strength, as wee may not quayle. And that forasmuche as our life is a corruptible and ruinous caban: he will holde vs vp in our feblenesse, euen vnto the ende, and vntill suche time as he haue ridde vs quite and cleane of the infirmities of our flesh: and that therewithall wee also hauing our recourse vnto the fatherly goodnesse which he vseth towards vs, may be succoured by him in all our necessities, not doubting at all but he will bring vs to the saluation which he hath promised vs, assuring our selues, that if we persist in his obeysance, we shall neuer be disappoyneted, and that if we sticke vnto his promises, he will neuer fayle to haue his hande stretched out ouer vs to succour vs. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only to vs, but also to all people and nations of the worlde, &c.

The tenth Sermon, which is the third vpon the second Chapter.

This Sermon conteyneth the rest of the exposition of the tenth verse afore, and afterward the verses following.

11. And three of Jobs friends hauing heard of all the aduersities that had happened vnto him; that is to vvit, Eliphias the Themanite, Baldad the Suhite, and Zophar the Maamathite, came from the place vvhile they dwelte: for they agreed to come to haue compassion of him, and to comfort him.
12. And vvhile they lift vp their eyes a farre off, they knevvy him not, and then they lifted vp their voyce and vvept, and rent their clothes, and cast dust vpon their heads to vvardre heauen, 13. And sate dovvne by him vpon the grounde by the space of seuen dayes and seuen nightes, in suche vvhile as none of them spake one vvorde, for they sawe that his greefe vvas greatly encreased.

Esterday I declared in effect what Job ment by this sentence, VVe haue receyued good at the Lordes hande, and why receyue we not euill also? It serueth to shew how men are tooo vnthankfull, if they acknowledge not them selues so greatly bounde vnto God, for the number of benefites whiche they haue receyued at his hande, as they ought not to refuse any maner of afflictions when he listeth to exercise them therewith. But there are that vnderstande it otherwise, as though that by these words, VVe receive good at the Lordes hande, Job hoped, that yet in time to come, God would be the same towardes him agayne, that he had felt him to be heretofore. And so it seemeth to them, that Job ment to comfort his wife and him selfe by saying, This miserie shall not continue for euer: although God punish vs, he meaneth not to continue it to the vttermost: for in the end he wil haue pitie vpon those that are so distressed. But the naturall meaning is that which I haue set downe already:

already: that is to wit, that Job calling to remembraunce the good that he had receyued at Gods hande, helde him selfe so behoden vnto him, as he thought him selfe bounde to abide all aduersities paciently. And heerevpon we may gather a good and profitable doctrine: that is to wit, that as ofte and as long as aduersities oppresse vs, we must acknowledge, that God hath shewed him selfe so good a father too vs in so many sortes, as it becommeth vs not to thinke it straunge if he chastize vs at tymes, nor bee prouoked and moued to grudge agaynst him for the same. And heerewithall it is certayne that Job coulde not haue bene comforted, except he had applied Gods former benefites too the tyme too come. For if wee consider but onely howe God hath beene good too vs in tyme past, and that wee shall haue no more: too what purpose were that? for wee coulde not bee pacient, as haþe beene sayde already. VVee must bee well assured of the goodnessse and loue of God, and we muste truste continually too his grace, not doubting at all but that he will proceede too loue vs still, notwithstanding that he deale roughly with vs. Job then calleth to minde the benefites that he had receyued heretofore at Gods hande, in suche wise as he maketh this conclusion: namely that God had not changed nother his purpose nor his nature, nor ceassed too continue good and righteous, notwithstanding that he had afflicted him. VVhen we haue this consideration with vs, we see wherwith to assuage our sorrowes. True it is that the aduersities that go agaynst our nature, are very sharpe and harde for vs to beare: like as medicines are bitter and troublesome, and therefore must be somewhat sweetened, that they may be the easyer received. God also giueth vs wherewith to season our sorrowes, to the intent wee should not bee ouer sorrowfull. Heere we see a principall poynt: namely that although God seeme to bee bent agaynst vs: yet considering how wee haue founde him so good, and that he hath made vs too feele his loue after so many sortes: wee shoulde not doubt but he will continue the same euen to the ende. For this cause it is sayde, that in all these things Job offended not with his lippes. And we must not understande heere, that Job was an hypocrite, to glorifie God with his mouth, and yet had a minde or heart too the contrarie. VVherefore then is it sayde that he sinned not with his lippes? It is to shewe that he had a wonderfull stay of him selfe. True it is, that sometimes although wee conceyue euill imaginacions: yet wee holde them in, so as no euill wordes escape vs. As howe? A man is tempted too bee offend with God, and many imaginacions runne in his head, in so muche that he would fayne lifte vp him selfe willingly agaynst God, yea and euen conceyeth blasphemies. But heerevpon he bridleth and rebuketh him selfe thus: wretched creature, what meanest thou? VVee see then, that in the middest of our temptations, God giueth vs the grace to resist them, so as wee come not to the extremitie to blasphemē him openly. Not that wee bee not blame worthy in the meane while for conceyuing suche thoughts, or that wee ought not too condemne our selues for so doing before God: but it appeareth well, that the holy ghost hathe wroughte in vs, when wee haue not consented to suche temptations nor had any liking of them. And a man may well take this sentece in this sense: namely that Job offended not with his lippes, that is to say, that he came not too extremitie: but that although he were sore prouoked too euill, yet he resisted, so as the euill overcame him not, but he maynteyned his battell stedfastly. Notwithstanding, wheti wee haue considered all things throughly, there is no doubt but that Job is set heere before vs as a man rightly perfecte in pacience. And for the better comprehending heereof, let vs marke howe S. Iames James 3.2. sayth, that he which hath not sinned with his tongue is perfect aboue all men. And why so? VVee see that forasmuche as men bee ouerswifte to speake, insomuche that nowe and then a thing is spoken before we can conceyue it: he that is able to holde him selfe in, so as no worde flippeth from him but with good aduisement and well set: sheweth him selfe too bee indued with a singular grace. Thus wee see what wee haue too note heere concerning Job: namely howe he is so farre off from shewing any sturdinessse agaynst God, that euen all his wordes are so well ordered, that whereas other men are light of speche, and vnable to rule their tonges: Job humbleth him selfe before God. And heereby wee bee taughte too call vpon God, too graunt vs the grace, that wee may neuer caste foorth any wordes that may tende too the dishonoure of his holy name. For wee knowe that the tongue ought too bee dedicated chiefly to the honour of God. True it is, that wee ought too apply all our members therewith: for like as he hath created all, so is it good reason that all shoulde bee imployed to his glory. But he will haue our tonges too sounde in suche wyse in our mouthes, as they may bee instrumentes too glorifie him: so as if wee apply them to the contrarie, it is as muche as to peruerte the order of nature. And forasmuche as wee bee giuen too that vice (as I haue sayde) and there is nothing more difficulte than too withholde our selues from it: Therefore wee haue so muche the more neede too call vpon God, that he may governe vs in suche sorte, as wee maye not vter one worde that shall not bee to his honour. Furthermore, if wee nowe and then conceyue some euill imaginacions (as it is not possible but we must needes haue many wicked thoughtes, considering our great frayltie, and howe Satan eggeth vs too this or that:) let vs assure our selues that wee are already faultie before God, and that wee muste aske him forgiuenesse of it, and yet therewithall fighte valiantly still, and thrust those thinges vnder foote, and doo according too that which was sayde yesterday. For Job not onely rebuked his wife: but also discouered hir folly. Therefore it becommeth vs to take good heede, that wee enter not into disputation and pleading agaynst God, but rather that wee learne too bridle, yea and too rebuke our selues lustily. Thus wee see wee must bee sharpe to condemne suche vice as is in vs. And heerein wee see the beastlynesse that haþe reigned and reigneth, yet still at this day among the Papistes. For they say in their sinagoges, that if a man fall in doubt whether there be a God or no, or whether God be righteous or no, or if he conceyue horrible and outragious blasphemies in his head, it is no sinne at all, so he consente not too it vterly. If a man bee tempted too strip his neighbour ouute of his clothes, or to murther him, or to blasphemē, or too giue him selfe to whorehunting, so as he feele that his affections within him doo carrie him away: they say that all this is no sinne. Muste not suche folke needes bee worse than brute beastes? But I see one resolution whiche is common ouer all among the Papistes (and well worthy are they of suche resolutions, forasmuche as there is nothing but hypocrisie in the, by meanes wherof they make so light of sinne, as if it were nothing at all, making it to be but a venial sinne, when a man hath offended God deadly:) which is, that if a man haue committed the horriblest sinne in the world, he needeth but one sprinkling with holywater, and by and by he is discharged towards God; But for our parte (as I haue sayde before) let vs thinke that if we be prouoked by any wicked doubtingnesse, we

be condemned alreadie before God. Then let vs preuent his iudgement, and be our owne iudges, and yeelde our selues guiltie : and yet in the meane whyle let vs not doubr, but God hath mercie on vs, and will hold vs vp in our infirmities : conditionally that by the grace of his holy spirit we shake of al such things, and agree not to put the wicked imaginacions in practize, which we shal haue conceyued in our mindes . Thus you see how wee ought to deale in this behalf . It is consequently sayde. Tbat three of Iobs frendes haing heard of all the miseries that were happened vnto him, tooke abyce to visit him. And to what ende? To haue compassion of him, and to comfort him! It is a good likelyhood at the fyrst blush that God meant to releue his seruant Job, when he sent men vnto him that pretended to haue pitie vpon his miseries, and were skilfull and wise to comfort him, as we well shall see by their discourses anon after, how they were exquisite persones. And so a man might suppose, that God would henceforth stretch out his hand vnto Job, to deliuere him from the miseries that he had sent him . But we see, that this visitation of his frendes, was to increase his miserie, and to plundge him euen into the bottome of endlesse waues. VVhereby we be admonished, that if at any tyme we be in hope to be drawnen out of our afflictions : we must not thinke it straunge though the matter fall not out as wee haue conceyued . For we see how Job was disappointed of his hope whiche he had when he sawe his frendes, and how they became as Diuelles to torment him more than he had bene tormented afore . Yet notwithstanding, their minde was not to do so, neyther came they to mocke Job: 30 they brought no malicious purpose nor wicked intent with them : but they had a right and hartie good will and loue towardes him . For it is sayd that their meaning was to haue compassion on him, that is to say, to take to themselves some part of his miserie, so far as was possible for them to beare such a grieve, as if they had bene ioyned & knit togither in this persone . Lo to what ende they came, and yet notwithstanding, we see how Job had his affliction more grieuously increased by it . Then let vs take warning by such example, that although we be well minded towards our neighbors, and be desirous to comfort them in their miseries: yet God must guyde vs, or els our sayd good intent will nothing auayle vs . Therefore when wee see our neighbors in any daunger or necessitie : truely we ought to beseech God to giue vs the grace to haue compassion of them and to succour them : but yet that is not all. And wherefore? Because wee haue not the spirite of wisdome: in so much that we go cleane awke, and yet we beare our selues in hand, that we do the best in the world, when it shall be but to dryue a poore man to despayre, which felt to muche of his miserie before . VVe see how there be many zelous persons, which are very earnest and desirous to shewe themselves charitable towardes those whome they are able to helpe: but what for that? there is no handsonnesse nor good fashion [in their dealing.] VVhen they come to a poore creature that is alreadie afflited, they bring him a new torment. And wherof commeth that? Euen of the want of discretion and skill . Therefore God must be fayne to worke in this cace: and (as I haue sayd) if we will succour one another in our necessities: when God shall haue giuen vs this affection, then let vs pray him to giue vs also the meane and right vse of it out of hand, that we may giue that which is good and profitable, and that we may haue skill to handle folke according as shall be conuenient and agreeable to their nature: so as if the persone be plundged in excesse of anguish, the comfort that we bring him may be so well applied to his vse, as he may feele some relief by it . VVec must pray God to giue vs this vertue: (for it is not to be founde in vs.) And afterwarde if God haue giuen vs wisdome, he must also put a louing kindnesse in vs, that wee be not so rigorous towards those of whose well doing we may haue cause to bee past hope, but rather be inclined to a pitifull affection, that is to say, be mildly minded to hope well of their well doing, according as it is sayd that chariti 1.Cor.13.4.7. hopeth all things. And thus ye see what we haue to mark. Furthermore when we compare these men with our selues: we finde for a certaintie, that God had neede to gouerne vs in that cace. VVhy so? For these are none of the common and ordinarie sorte of men (as I haue declared alreadie) they be no dullardes: but they be greate personages, and well aduysed in all poynts, accordingly as they shewe themselves to be . And yet neuerthelesse we see how they proceede in such wise, as there is no let in them, but that Job might haue bene dinged downe vnto hell . And what is the cause of it? God ment to shew vs how there is no other wisedome nor discretion in the minde of man, nor any rule or measure in him, except that he himself giue it. Let vs be sure then, that vntesse we haue that, we shal not be able to comfort suche as are so afflicted . For if Iobs frendes which were so excellent men, did so overshoote themselves: it is a much more likelyhood that wee shall misse, if God supply not our want and giue wherewith to behauie our selues as is meete for vs . Thus we see what we haue to remember . Moreover, whereas it is sayd that they tooke counsell to haue compassion of him and to comfort him: in these two woordes it is shewed vs, what is the dutie of such as see their frends and neighbours indure aduersitie . Then are there two things requisite in comforting and also in succoring . For we may implore our selues to the vttermost to succor such as haue neede of our help, and yet it shall be no great matter if we haue not the hart to be as they bee, and to ioyne our selues with them, as though we felte their greeves in our owne persones. VVec 1.Cor.13.4.3. may giue all our goodes to the poore , and yet if we haue no loue, it is nothing. Sanct Paule by speaking so, sheweth that wee may well doo many fayre thinges, whiche notwithstanding shall be but leasings and vanitie, except we haue louingesse to guyde them all . And we shall see some that will aduenture themselves valiantly if a man stand in neede of their helpe: but yet haue they not any feeling or compassion [of his grieve.] Lo why it is sayde that Iobs frendes are come to comfort him, and as it were to drawe him out of his miserie, and to haue compassion on him . And in dede, there is not that man of vs, which first and formest desireth not this comfort: that is, that men should haue compassion on him . As for example: if a man indure aduersitie, and it happeneth that others come to serue him or to do what they can for him: if he be of opinion that they whiche do him good haue no care of him, nor be touched with compassion of his miserie: it will be but as a dubling of his grieve. True it is that he shal receyue the good that is done vnto him, but he regardeth it not in comparison of their compassion: in so much that whereas other men succour him not at all, nor giue him any ayde, yet if he perceiue in himself that those poore folk haue a feeling of his miserie as if they were his own members, he will make more account of that, than of all the succour that a man can giue him [without it.] So then, when we minde to discharge our selues of our duetie towradess those that are in aduersitie: let vs beginne at this poynt: that is to wit, to pitie their miseries, and to feele some part of them as neere as we can . For this is the true tryall of loue . And herewithall it is true that wee must also shewe this compassion of ours by our doings. There are that will be sorie ynough when they see their neighbours bours in aduersitie : but yet therewithall they fare as blockes, so as a man can get no succour of them, they be so dismayed. But we must follow the fashion that is set downe here : namely to be pitifull and tender harted after such a sort when we see any man indure aduersitie, as we alwayes haue our handes at libertie to succour him after the abilitie that God hath giuen vs . Then muste wee not haue our mindes so ouerset with sorowe, as our hertes should be dismayed, and our wittes vtterly amazed : but rather this pitifulnesse of ours must extende yet further, 10 and quicken vs vp to seeke how we may salue the sores that we see in our neighbours . And this is it that is meant here by the secōd place, where it is sayd that Iobs frendes being come to mourne with him, purposed to haue comforted him with all speede, so as their comming was not onely to weepe and to say, we feele some part of thy miserie, but also to comfort him if it had bene possible. Thus then we see of what mind they came . But what for that? They fayled in the middes of their iourney. VVhen they went first in hand with their errand, they were in a good minde . But they hilde not the meane that was requisite and needfull, which is, that when they were once come, they should haue had the same compassion towards Job still, and they should haue sought such meanes to comfort him, as had bene most agreeable to him, and they should haue shot alwayes at that marke . But they did not so: yea contrariwise they became as men amazed . And howe is that? doubtlesse they found not any thing to be offerid at in the persone of Job : howbeit for asmuch as they saw suchextremenesse of affliction, it seemed to them that 30 God would not haue handled him so sharply, except he had bene a castaway . And so they tooke such a conceyte by reason of the excessiue miseries that they sawe in Job : as they lost their courage to comfort him . And here wee see why it is sayd in the Psalme, Happie is the man that hath consideration of them that are in trouble. David had passed that way as well as Job . For he had indured great aduersities, in suche sorte as he was like as if he had bene forsaken of God, according as I haue sayde heretofore. And a man might say, But beholde, is it not to be seene that it was but a fondnesse for him to glorie of his trussting in God, and to warrant himselfe that he would succour him? for we see the playne contrarie . For asmuch therfore as David was condemned by men vnder the colour that God persecuted him, and exercised his pacience in sundrie wise : he sayeth, Right happie is the man that hath consideration of the affiected . Hereby he meanieth, that if we see any man in anguish for his hard aduersities: God requyret aboue all things, that we should not at the first dashe take such conceyte as to say, O he is damned, God sheweth full well that he purposeth to cut him off, there is no more hope of him, behold he is past recoverie. VVe must not be so rigorous, but wee must haue the wit to say, very well, let vs wayt what God will do : aduersities are common as well to good men as too bad, and when they light vpon good men, they are not without a cause. VVhen God scourgeth them, although we perceyue not the cause wherfore he doth it, yet it becometh vs to consider that God is righteous . VVe see then that afflictions are common, both to Gods chosen people and such as he holdeth for his children : and also to the castawayes and those that go into damnation . But forasmuch as it is not for vs to judge of it, except God haue shewed vs what end the afflictions shall come vnto : it becommeth vs to holde our verdict in suspence, as if a man should say, Is this man affiected? very well, let vs acknowledge the hand of God, and begin to say, Alas I haue well deserued as much or more: wretched creature, looke if thou haue not offend-ded thy God so many wayes, as he may punish thee an hundred thousand fold more than him whom thou seest to indure so much . Let vs then aduise our selues to conclude thus, Very well, I see this poore man is handled verily roughly : true it is that he lead a naughtie life , and that he suffereth rightfully : but yet we know not what God will do with him . Lo here the wisedome that David exhorteth vs vnto : namely that wee shoulde wayte to see whether God will deliuer those whome he persecuteth with his owne hand, albeit that it be rightfully done. Also let vs learne to be fenced against al stumblingblockes that may come in our way, that wee bee not troubled when things exceede our imaginacion, and that we be not letted by them to do our duetie continually, and that our harte fayle vs not in the middes of our iourney . Truly this lesson is harde to put in vre : but so muche the more payne ought we to put our selues vnto, and God will giue vs the grace to bring it about. This is the thing that I speake of at the beginning : namely, that if we haue a desire and zele to comfort our neighbours, wee muste desire of God to furnish vs with the meanes to do it, to the intent that whē it commeth to be put in vre, we become not vnprofitable like blockes of woode : yet notwithstanding, it must not be thought ouer straige, that Iobs frendes were so astouned, considering the plight wherein they found him : for he was vtterly disfigured, so as they coulde not know him at the first sight, as the text sayeth . Vndoubtedly they had such an affection rooted in their hart, that when they saw him so miserable, yet they could not cease to shewe that they loued him still, howbeit that when they knew him, they were vtterly astonished . It is consequently sayd, That they lifted vp their voyce and fell a weeping . These teares here came nor of counterfetnesse, it was a good affection that they had . Howbeit for asmuch as they were abashed by reason of the great miseries that Job indured: we see they be so troubled and dashed out of countenance, as they be not able to do their duetie as they meant to doo. Then to haue some loue & to vitter the signes of it, is not all that is requyred: but this loue must be well ruled, to the end we may well serue one anothers turne, as God commaundeth . As touching that it is sayd, that they rent their clothes, and cast dust vpon their beades, that they cast themselves vpon the ground, and were seuen dayes and seuen nights without speaking any woorde : therein we see the sayd compassion whereof we haue spoken afore : and besides that, we see how their meaning was to humble theselues with Job, as it were to make intercession to Godward to haue pitie vpon him . For when the men of old time did cast dust vpon their heads, it was in token of humilitie and acknowledgment of their sinnes . And first they knew that their state was to say, doth God punish vs: then let vs be thinke vs of that whiche wee haue forgotten : that is to wit, that we be but rottennesse and a thing of nothing . For when men are in prosperite, they make themselues drunken, they flaunt it, they sore in the ayre, and they be not touched with any care . But assoone as God smyeth them, then they storne, and they consider nother whence they are come, nor whither they must returne . Also the men of old time, to the end to bring all this to remembrance , vsed the sayd Ceremonie : thereby yeelding themselues faultie before God, as though they had bene wretched offenders . And the thing that is requyred at offenders handes, is that they should acknowledge their faults, craue pardon, yelde themselues giltie before God, and returne vnto him with true repentance . Job had good occasion so to do: and his frendes also could not shew forth their frendship, if they had not done the like . For we be bound to take vpon vs the persone of our neighbours, to 40 aske aske God forgiuenesse in their behalfe. The greatest reliefe that we can giue to such as are in distresse, is to pray God that he will not shake them off altogether. But wee cannot by our prayers succour those that are in aduersitie, without hauing that which I haue recited: that is to wit, without keeping of them companie, to humble our selues afore God, and without coming to them to mourne with and that when he saw them running into destruction, he was sorie for them in his hart, and shewed bitter teares and sighes for them. If Dauid haue done thus for his enimies that persecuted him: why should not we doo it for them whom we know to be the children of God? Certainly we ought to folowe Dauid, in praying for our enimies. For without we do so, Christ will not auow vs to be his Disciples. But it is an ouergreat leudnesse if we haue not such pitie vpon those in whom we perceiue some signe of godlinesse and religion, and which are instructed in al one doctrine with vs. Therfore when they come to sue for pardon at Gods hand: it becometh vs to ioyne with them in that case. Behold(I say) what ye haue to marke when it is sayd, that Iobs friendes rent their garments, cast theselues agaynst the ground, and sprinkled dust vpon their heads.

Herewithall we note, that although such Ceremonies bee signes of repentance: yet we muste not thinke that men shal be discharged for clothing themselues in sackloth, for much weeping, and for vsing such maner of fashions as may make them seeme to haue nothing but lowelinesse and aduersitie in them: but rather we must bethinke our selues of this sentece of Ioels, Rende your harts and not 30 your garmentes: whereby Ioell meeneth, that it is to no purpose for men to haue great store of Ceremonies, or to martyr themselues much in outward sight of the worlde, except their hartes be broken before. And what maner of Rending or breaking is it that God requireth in our harts? It is that wee shoulde cast downe and humbled before him: that when we perceyue any signes of his wrath, (specially when we feele the blowes of his hand alreadie,) we shoulde be paciēt: assuring our selues that all comes for our sinnes: and that wee do not as many do, who when they 40 be beaten with Gods roddes, chawe their brydles like mules, and conceyue I wote not what a fiercenesse and bitternessse, which serue to set them in a rage against God, notwithstanding that they make countenance as though they were well tamed. But contrarywise (as I haue sayd) it behoueth our harts to be rent, (according to the exhortation that is made vnto vs in the Psalme) by laying our

Psal.17.4.3. & 62.b.9. hart open before God, to the ende he shoulde know al that 45. is within it. Then let vs follow the sayd saying of the Prophēt Ioell, that we shoulde not rend our garmentes, but our hartes rather: for therein will the true repentance shewe it selfe. But it is impossible that our hartes shuld be rightely rent, without shewing of the foresayde lowelinesse by experience, in confessing our sinnes, to the intent to giue glory vnto God. And herein a man may see what a mōckerie is in those that thinke themselues to haue done verily much, when they haue graunted that they haue done amisse, that they haue committed a great offence against God, and that they haue caste a stumblingblocke into the Church: and yet peraduenture if a man grate vpon them but a little further, and woulde make them to understand their faults: it would make them to say, O, that were toto much: and it woulde seeme vnto them that God were ouersharpe and rigorous against them. But in any wise we must not thinke that God receyuethe vs as repenant persons, except we bring him the sacrificye that is spokē of in

sed as we can no more: and that we be so ashamed of the cōmitting of the sinnes whereof our conscience hath remorse & accuseth vs, as wee know not where to become, vntil we haue found fauour in our God. Thus much then as concerning this poynt, that repentance consisteth not in ceremonies, but hath her seate in the hart of man, howbeit that if she must shew her self by signes, and that if we haue a minde well dispozed, she muste so appeere before men, as we may not onely haue this woerde in our mouth, to say, we haue offended: but also our harte must speake it before our tung. But when as it is sayd that Iobs friendes sate by him seuen dayes and seuen nights: it is not ment that they departe not out of that place of all that whyle: but that they abode with him by the space of seuen dayes, lamenting there with him, and casting themselues vpon the earth: and specially that they yeelded a good record of their loue towarde him, in abandoning all their own pleasures and commodities, to be there in sorowing with him whom they meant to comfort. Lo what the summe is.

20 And therewithall it is sayd, that they spake not one worde: wherein wee see that whiche I haue touched heretofore: namely that they were very sore troubled, when they saw Gods hande so rigorous vpon Iob. For they came of set purpose to comfort Iob: and now they are dumb. VVhat is the cause of it? Is it for that they haue forgotten all the reasons that might serue to comfort him withall? No, they had a wellsettled remembrance, as we shall see hereafter. VVherefore is it then, that they hild their peace? Bycause they were preuented by this imaginacion. How now? wee tooke this man to haue bene the seruant of God, and peraduenture if God had punished him, wee would haue thought yet that there had bene some order to comfort him. But we see that God hath forsaken him, and that he hath set markes vpon him to shew that he is a reprobate persone, and that there is no more hope in him, and therfore we see no meane to comfort him. Thus wee see the cause of their astonishment. But they ought to Ezai.40.g. haue had an eye to Gods promyses, whereby he witnesseth vnto vs, that when it seemeth vnto vs that all is loste 27. & 41.b. 8.d.14. and past hope of recoverie for vs: he is able to sende remedie still. Howbeit they did not so. Hereby then we are admonished, (as I touched afore) to pray vnto God, to hold vs in, that we be not moued with such compassio in the aduersities eyther of our selues, or of our neighbors, as to conclude that we must be past al hope of recoverie. For the Diuell desires nothing more than to cause vs to make such a conclusion, and to put into our heades that God hath cast vs off. Supposest thou (wil he saye) that God will euer receive thee to mercie seing thou hast offended him so many wayes? If we give place to such temptatiōs: behold how wee be bereft of Gods grace and of all his promises. And therfore let vs so much the more earnestly pray God to strēgthen vs in such wise, as we may beate backe such assaults of Satan, that when soever wee be afflieted in our owne persones, or happen to see our neighbours suffer aduersitie, wee may not be vitterly dismayed, but rather take courage to make this cōclusion: very well, it is true that these afflictions are great: but yet must wee stil trust in God, and hope that he wil turne this aduersitie 60 of ours to our welare, according as he maketh all things that he doth in this worlde, to serue to the welfare of the faythfull. If we haue this consideration with vs, wee shall neuer be destitute of cōfort in our troubles, nor neuer bee barred from Gods help, so we flee vnto him for succour.

But let vs fal downe in the presence of our good God, with acknowledgment of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as we may alwaies be readie to endure the chastymentes that he shall send vs, and abide them without

The eleuenth Sermon, which is the first vpon the third Chapter.

After this, Job opened his mouth, and cursed his day.

2. SO Job ansvered, and sayd:
3. Let the day perish vvhetherin I vvas borne, and the night vvhetherin vvoord vvas brought that a man childe vvas conceyued.
4. Let that day be ouercast vwith darkenesse, and let not God requyre it from aboue, and let it hauen no brightnesse to giue it light.
5. Let darkenesse and thicke shadow voverwhelme it, let it bee ouercouered vwith clovydes, and let the heate of the day burne it vp.
6. Possessed bee that night vwith darkenesse, let it not bee reckened among the dayes of the yeere, nor come in the number of the monethes.
7. Desolate bee that night, and let it haue no gladnesse in it.
8. Let them that are vvont to curse dayes, curse that, and they also that fall a mourning.
9. Let the starres bee darkened in it, and let it haue no hope of light, nother let the eyeliddes of the morning tvylyght see it:
10. Bycause it did not shet the doores of the vvombe that bare mee, to hyde these troubles from mine eyes.

E must here consider the intent of the holy Ghost, to the ende wee may applie this whole doctrine to 30 our owne vse. Hitherto wee haue seen Iobs patience, and howe he submitted himselfe wholy vnto God, yea and that he hath not ceased to blisse him, notwithstanding that he were deemed miserable among me. But now it feemeth that he turneth all topsiteruie, and that he is angrie with God. But if wee marke all thinges well and throughly: here is a combate, wherin we see, that on the one side mans infirmitie sheweth itselfe: and on the other side he hath yet still some strength to resist his temptations. Job then is here as it were in a mamering: [by meanes wherof,] whereas heretofore there was nothing but constancie and stoutnesse in him: nowe there is a mixture, so as the frayltie of his flesh maketh him to be so farre ouerseene, as he murmureth agaynst God, howbeit that his intent is not to fall out with God. Neuerthelesse, woordes scape him which are euill, and proceede from a faultie minde, and can not bee iustified. Thus yee see the first poynt that wee have to consider: that is to wit, what the state of Job is: namely that he sheweth not himselfe so stedfaste as he did afore, but is encountered with suche a battell, as doth well shewe him to bee a frayle man, and not able to beare out his temptations as he fayne would, nor to submit himself vnto God with so peaceable a minde as were requisite, and as he had bene wont to do. And here we haue a very profitable warning. For first we see, that men are able to do no more than is giuen them from aboue. Therfore let vs learne, not to brag of our owne strength, as we see the more part of men abuse themselues, by bearing theselues in hand that through their owne free will they bee able to move mountaynes and to woorke wonders. Howbeit we must not be deceyued with such imaginacions: but must assure our selues, that as long as God vpholdeth vs, wee may well stande: but if he loozien his hand from vs, wee shall by and by be cast downe. Then is there not any thing whereof men can boast, but they muste altogether depend from aboue, and resort alwayes thither when they wil bee well strengthened. Herewithall wee see the so-dayne chaunge that happened to Job. For it seemeth not that he hath any newe occasion to be so out of pacience as to curse the day of his byrth: considering howe he dothe it seuen dayes after he had shewed himselfe so pacient. He seemeth to bee become quyte another man than he was afore. But all our strength vanisheþ away in the turning of a hande, if God contineþ not in ayding of vs. And here wee see wherefore a man is likened to a shadowe. It is not onely bycause our lyfe is so frayle and flightfull: but also bycause wee are uncon-stant, so as there is no holde of vs, but wee bee fickle mynded, looking sometimes so stately as it should seeme wee had the courage of a Lyon, and by and by becoming as faynþarted as a woman, so as there is nother reason nor stomacke in vs: and so farre of are we from hauing the valiantnesse to encounter agaynst temptations, that we cannot abyde so muche as to heare that any man shoulde rebuke vs. Then lette vs marke well the suddenesse of the chaunge that befalleth vnto menne, that 50 wee may looke the better aboue vs: and when we haue called vpon God in the morning, lette vs doo the like all day long: and to bee shorte, let vs thinke vpon God continually without turning our selues aside after any maner wyse. Thus wee see howe wee muste alwayes bee carefull: thus wee see howe wee muste alwayes continew in prayer and supplication. And nowe let vs come to that whiche is sette downe in the text, Howe Job cursed the day of his birth. Some there haue bene, that would excuse Job altogether, as though he had bene caried away in his aduersitie, howbeit without blaspheming of God.

Other some imagine that he hath forgotten the paci-entnesse whiche he had had heretofore, and that he is altogether enraged, so as he hath no more minde to glo-risie G O D, but is caryed away by his owne passions, and speaketh as a man out of his wittes. Heretofore he blamed his wyfe of folly: and now he sheweth himselfe a double foole in cursing the day wherein he was borne.
But it is certayne that Job is not come too suche extremitie: for it is alwayes his purpose too obey God, as wee shall see. Neuerthelesse, there is a mixture in him:
that

that is to wit, in his fighting he fayleth not to be wounded, he ceaseth not to receyue blowes, he staggereth, he steppeth awrie. So then, let vs marke this mixture: that is to wit, that Job hath not so sounde a perfection as he had afore: and yet notwithstanding, that although his aduersitie pinched him, so as it was likely that he should haue faynted in the middes of his way: he hilde on his course still with full purpose to obey God, howbeit that in the

Rom. 7. d. 19 meane while (as sayeth S. Paule) he accomplished not the good that he desired. Paule in that place treateth of himself, and confesseth that although his whole desire was to giue himself vnto God: yet notwithstanding it came not so to passe, but he was hindered by his own nature, which was ouerweake. If S. Paule acknowledged so much of himselfe: let vs not thinke it straunge that the like should happen to Job, so as he shoulde be desirous to frame himselfe to the good will of God, and yet his affection should not be so perfect in all points, but that he must be faine to haite and to stoope. And herein we see that which happed to our father Iacob, at suche time as God meant to cause vs to understand, that when soever the faithfull encounter against temptations, it shall not be without carrying away of some curste blowes that shall leau their markes behinde them. VVe see how Iacob wrestled with the Angell of God: and wherefore? not for that he was Gods enimie: but bycause the Lorde which trieth those that are his, mindeth also to prooue his owne children, as we haue seene in the first Chapter. Therfore it is sayd that the Patriarke Iacob stroue and wrestled with the Angell. VVhereby it appeareth that God ment to exercysse him, and also that Iacob disposed himselfe to beare out the bruntes that he shoulde be put vnto, in somuch that God inhonored him by giuing him the name of Israell, which is as much to say, as mightie towardes God. But in the meane whyle, went he away with the victorie without touch of brest? No, but he had his thygh crushed in such sort, as he halte and was lame of it all his lyfe after: The vpper hand was his, but yet was he fayne to be humbled. Behold how the faithfull withstand temptations: namely that in some poynt they may chaunce to stoope, yea euen in such wyse as God shall humble them all the dayes of their lyfe, that they may haue occasion to know their own infirmities till they grone againe: but yet for all that, they get the vpper hand in encountering, and God suffer them not to be vterly oppressed. Then muste Gods children comfort themselues in this, that when God sendeth them any afflictions, they may well feele some such inward heauinesse of minde as they shal not knowe whiche way to turne them, yea and so farre overshoote themselues as to vse wordes that are not to be excused: but yet for all this infirmitie, the strength of God shall not cease to dwell still in them and to hold them vp in such sort, as they shal feele themselves to haue alwayes some good affection: and that although their legges fayle them, yet their harte shall holde his owne still as the Prouerbe sayeth. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this sentence. But that we may the better vnderstand wherein Job ouershot himself, and how farre: let vs consider in what maner it is lawfull for men to be wary of their lyfe. There haue bene many Heathen men, which knowing the miseries of this earthly lyfe, haue sayd that the day of birth ought not to be a time of mirth and ioy but rather of sorowe, for so much as when man commith to it, he beginneth with weeping. Beholde a creature that is full of all vncleannessse, and as vyle and miserable as is possible to be imagined. And moreouer if wee marke things well, it is a bottomlesse gulfe of all miseries wherenvto wee bee subiect. So then, if wee haue an eye to the present state and condition of this lyfe: wee shall haue cause to say, that wee ought to lament when children are borne, and that wee ought rather to reioyce when men dye, forasmuche as they bee deliuered from many euilles. The Heathen men spake after that maner: Howbeit their vnderstanding was not able to reache so farre as God leadeth vs by his worde. For they sought no further in this present lyfe, but too continew in it: howbeit, not altogether to eate and drinke, but also to bee in honor, to purchace themselues estimation, and to finish every man his own course. Herewithall we haue the holy Scripture, which telleth vs that God who hath put vs here bylowe, hath printed his owne image in vs, and therefore that wee ought to consider the noblenesse and woorthiness which he hath giuen vs aboue all Creatures. If there were no more but this, that God hath fashioned vs after his owne image and likeenesse, whereby he meaneth to haue his glorie shine in vs: I pray you, had wee not whereof to reioyce in our selues, and wherefore to magnifie him? Furthermore, besides our eating and drinking in this worlde, wee haue also recorde that God is our Father. For to what purpose is it that the earth bringeth foorth hit foyzon? even too norishe vs withall. It happeneth not by fortune, but it is God that hath so ordeyned it. And wherefore? because he woulde shewe himselfe a father towards vs. VVee see then that the helpes which are to mayntayne vs heere bylowe, are all of them auouchementes and proues of the fatherly loue of our God. Ought not wee to make account of such a benefite, yea, or can wee make so great account of it as it deserueth? But it is yet more, that God will exercysse vs heere bylowe in the hope of the heauenly lyfe, that he giueth vs some taste of it, that he calleth vs, and that he will bee serued, and horred of vs, to the ende we shoulde knowe that wee are his, and that he hath intaryned vs to bee of his household and familie. Then if all thinges be well considered, haue we not good cause to magnifie the grace that he bestoweth vpon vs, when he sendeth vs into the worlde to inioye here this present lyfe? Yet neuerthelesse it is true also, that we haue cause to sighe and sob, forasmuch as we be in a bottomlesse pit of all miseries, so long as we be here. But what for that? wee must marke from whence the same proceedeth. The Paynims knew no further, than that the state of menne is miserable: but wee must consider wherefore God hath made vs subiect to so many inconueniences: namely bycause of Sinne. For wee muste haue recourse to the firste creation of man, and consider that God was no niggard of his goodes, but hath poured them out bountifullly, as he that is the fountayne of all liberalitie. Then hath he shewed himselfe more than liberall towardes mankind in the persone of Adam. But wee were bereft of those blissinges, and it was requisite that God shoulde cut of his benefites which he had giuen vs, for somuch as our father Adam through his owne vnthankfulness was turned away vnto wickednesse. So then, sith wee say that all the miseries of this present lyfe are the frutes of our sinnes wee haue occasion to sighe: not for that wee be so miserable, or for that our state is so harde and troublesome: but for that we be giuen to so much naughtiness, and to so great rebelliousnesse agaynst God, that whereas his image ought to shyne feorth in vs, it seemeth that wee haue conspired to doo him spyte. And this is the cause why Sainct Paul's lamenteth, and we see here the true sorowe which Christiars ought to make: not for theyr hauing of cold and heate, not for their induring of diseases and other calamities: but for that they see themselues as it were in the pryon and bondage of sinne. VVretch that I am,

saythe Saincte Paule. And saythe hee so bicaus hee is impatient, or for that hee lyfgetteth vp him selfe agaynst God? No: but for that he is the instrument of the holy ghost, and sheweth vs, that in this present lyfe wee haue cause too sighe and grone without ceassing. And whyso? for wee bee shutte vp in a deadly prison, and are subiecte too so many wicked lustes, as wee can not by any meanes attayne to dedicate our selues vnto God, by reason of the great number of our corruptions, which ceasse not too prouoke vs vnto euill. Thus wee see howe 10 wee maye lament our case after the example of Saynt Paule, who giueth vs a rule thereof. But heere wee see howe Iob curseth the day of his birthe, wherein hee is not too bee excused, nother can it bee sayde that hee ouershotteth not him selfe. And why so? For it behoueth vs too ioyne them bothe together: that is too witte, that when God created vs, he also printed his owne image in vs, and dyd vs the honour too bee the excellentest of all his creatures: In whiche respecte wee haue cause too blesse his name continually: And although this lyfe bee so full of miseries, as nothing can bee more: yet the case standeth so, as wee can not sufficiently value the inestimable benefite that G O D hath bestowed vpon vs, in giuing vs thys present lyfe, bicause that by maynteyning vs thererin, hee maketh vs too feele by experiance, that hee hath a care of vs, and will not by any meanes forsake vs, howsoeuer the world go. Seeing wee haue this, haue wee not whereof too reioyce euen in the middest of all oure aduersities? So then, the faythfull man whiche speaketh with good aduisement, will never curse the day of his birthe, what miserie soeuer he endure. Iob therefore behaueth him selfe vnthankefullly too Godwarde, in cursing so the day of his birthe: and it can not bee sayde that he deserued not blame for passing his boundes. Furthermore let vs marke, that the children of God maye also blesse their birthday. I meene in not considering their wants, too bewayle themselues with Sainct Paule: but simply in hauing an eye too the benefite whiche God gaue them when he sent them into the worlde. True it is that the Heathen men abused it: for when they solemnized their birthday, they dyd it too exceede in many follies and superfluous pompes. But the very originall and welspring of the solemnizing of birthdayes, was, for that the holy fathers knewe it was good reason, too yeelde God thankes, and therfore they hilde that day as a solemn feast, to the ende to prouoke them selues to prayse God. Yea verily: for when wee haue passed some yeres of our lyfe, although wee ought too call Gods benefites too remembraunce incessantly: yet is it requisite that 50 at the day of our entraunce into the worlde, there should bee kepte an euerlasting memoriall of them, so as wee might say, I see well that this yeere is past: God hath brought me hitherto: I haue offended him many wayes, and therefore it is meete that I shoulde nowe aske hym forgiuenesse. But aboue all things he hathe shewed me great fauour, he hathe maynteyned me alwayes in hope of the saluation that he hath giuen me, and he hath deliuered me from many daungers: and therefore it becommeth me too call the same too remembraunce. And now that I am too enter into another yeere, it is good that I prepare my selfe too the seruing of God. For the euil aduentures that I haue passed, shewe me how great neede I haue of his succour, and that without him I shall bee vndoone a hundred thousande times. Thus wee see how the holy fathers were woont too solemnize their birthdayes, and howe it is a good and profitable exercise. The Heathen men (I say) haue abused it, and wee see at this day how they that call th̄selues Christians do play flat mockholyday with God when they solēnize their birth-dayes. For they make no reckening of prayers, nor of thankesgiving, nor of the acknowledging of their sinnes, nor of Gods benefites: but of pampering them selues after a beastly maner. But (as I haue sayde) it behoueth vs alwayes too blesse God vpon oure birthdays. And why? forasmuche as God hathe set vs heere in thys worlde too bee his children: he hathe not put vs foorth as Oxen and dogges, but as reasonable creatures, that beare his image. And further, forasmuche as we be baptized in the name of oure Lorde Iesu Christ, and that besides oure creation, God hathe also moreouer pryned his marke vpon vs for an aduaantage, too the intent wee shoulde bee as his deere frendes, and bee receyued into his Churche: therein wee haue cause too blesse God double. And so they that curse the day of their birthe, by chafing at the miseries and affiictions that they endure, shewe well that they bee vnthankefull; and that their owne affections doo too muche ouermaster them. Euen so stooode the case with Iob. And therfore wee haue the more cause too pray vnto God without ceassing, that hee will vouchsafe too holde vs backe: and that if nowe and then hee suffer vs too let slippe some wicked words, and that wee bee not so stedfast as were requisite: yet notwithstanding that thoughē wee bee shaken, wee may not fall, but recouer our selues agayne, and learne too gather our wittes better aboute vs, too brydle our selues: and that when wee see there hathe beene any frayltie in vs, wee maye condemne the faulte, too the intent too retorne byandby agayne into the righte waye. Thus yee see what wee haue too marke heere. But when it is sayde, Cursed bee the night wherein word was brought, beholde a manchylde is conceyued: it shoulde seeme that Iob mente too spite God in so dooing. For thoughē wee haue cause (as I haue earst sayde) too blesse God for creating vs after his owne image and likenesse: yet is our case suche, as the men are preferred before the women in mankinde, we know that God hathe ordeyned man as the head, and giuen him the dignitie and preheminence ouer the woman. And heere wee see also why Sainct Paule saythe, that i. Cor. ii. b. 7. the man muste go with his head bare, bicause he is the glory of God: and the woman the glory of the man. True it is that the image of G O D is printed alike in them bothe: but yet is the woman inferiour too the man, and wee must go by those degrees whiche God hathe set in the order of nature. So then, it is reason that God shoulde bee glorified bothe in males and females: howbeit that hee must cheefly bee glorified at the birthe of a manchilde: and yet cleane contrariwyse Iob saythe: Cursed bee the nighte wherein it was reported that a manchylde was borne. And why dyd hee so? For had it not become him too haue thoughte well of all these thinges, according as God had disposed the dayes? Yes: but Iob turnerh all too the contrarie. And heere wee see that whiche I haue touched: namely that hee so wanzereth awaye in his owne passions, as hee forgetteth Gods graciousnesse, whereof he had spoken afore. For he had sayde: very well, seeing we haue received benefite at Gods hande, why shoulde wee not also receyue euill? for wee bee bounde too bee subiect vnto him. Iob shoulde haue borne these thinges well in minde. Howbeit forasmuche as it is an excellenter matter too haue a manchilde borne, than too haue a womanchilde: hee sayth: cursed be the right wherein he was conceyued. But (as I haue sayde afore) all this is too teache vs too pray God too arme vs, and too giue vs strength and power too withstande temptations, considering that he which is a parterne of pacience, was so carried away. And therefore if at any time wee bee in-combred with any excesse, so as oure fleshe prouoketh vs in such wise as wee haue not so quiet a minde too obey God as were too bee desired: let not that cause vs too bee out of heart, sith we see that the same thing hathe befallen vnto Iob. Then behoueth it vs to humble our selues, acknowledging our owne frayltie, and in the meane whyle too bee of good courage, vntill God haue giuen vs the full victorie. Furthermore wee haue too marke also, that such as haue children, ought so too reioyce of the having of menchildren, as they reiect not their daughters, as wee see some vayneglorious fooles doo, who thinke that God dothe them greate wrong, if hee sende them not menchildren. And for what purpose? Too the ende too continue their houses, too purchase estimation, and too come in credite. Lo after what maner men woulde as it were prolong their owne lyfe for euer. And yet in the meane whyle, if God give them daughters, it is for their profite and they knowe it not: and therefore they woulde haue God too consent too their foolish fancies. Also God dothe oftentimes punishe this presumptuousnesse. For he giueth menchildren too those that are too desirous of them, and they scratche out their eyes in the end, and are as seagulles too swallowe vp their substaunce. The fathers are of opinion, that their children shall increase their house, when they haue malechildren. And yet most commonly it is an occasion too bring a house too confusion, so as it shall bee poyned at wylt the finger. And what is the cause thereof? It is for that men apply not themselues too God and too his will. VVhen men desire too haue children, that desire is good, so it bee well ruled. But it must come too this poynt, Lorde, if thou giue mee issue, let it bee too the ende that thy name may bee honored when I am gone. And if thou doo mee the worship too bee a father: let mee so bring vp the children that thou shalte giue mee, as they may bee rightly thine, so as they may learne too serue thee, and thou guyde them according too thy good will. Beholde (I say) howe fathers and mothers must content themselues. VVhen God sendeth them but one childe, whereas they woulde haue three or foure: and when God sendeth them a daughter, whereas they woulde haue a sonne: let them saye, Euen so Lord, thou knowest what is meete for vs, and wee must frame our selues thereafter. Beholde (I say) wherein the blessing of God sheweth it selfe. But forasmuche as men are inordinate in their desires, it is meete that God should scorne them and their follies. By the way wee bee taughte also not too despise one another. For whereas God hathe honored men in giuing them the dignitie of beeing the head of mankind, and appoynted the women too be inferiour in degree: men must not be proude of it. And truely wee heare howe Sainct Paule sayth, that mankind is come of the man, that is too wit, of Adam. But howe dothe he continue, but by meanes of women? If men coulde separate themselues from women, and maynteyne a little worlde by themselues alone: they shoulde haue good cause too make their boast. But now if a man consider him selfe, he can no sooner say, my father, but he must by and by say also, my mother. So then, seeing that mankind is continued by meanes of the woman: it becommeth vs too thinke that wee bee bounde one of vs to another. Furthermore, too what purpose is it, that the weman was created? Verily that she shoulde bee a helpe to man: and it behoueth her also too bee subiect too him. But yet for all that, she is mans companion, as the scripture termeth her. For it is sayde, that among al the things that God created, there was not any helper that coulde bee meete for Adam. And why so? because he was not of nature like vnto beastes, but was of a more excellent creation. Nowe if women bee mens companions, there is no cause of disdayne, that men shoulde trample them vnder their feete, or shake them off, or holde scorne of them: but they must bee knitte togither with the sayde mutuall bonde, saying: Very well, God created vs and fashioned vs: and he maynteyneth vs by men and women: and that is doone to the ende wee shoulde live togither in one common accorde, knowing that there is a bonde of copartnershippe whiche God hathe consecrated as inviolable betwixte vs. Thus we see what wee haue to remember, that wee may behaue our selues vprightly. And nowe let vs come too that whiche is rehearsed heere. It is sayde, that Iob wysched that the day of his birtbe were ouerwhelmed with darkenesse, that it were burnt vp with the heate of the day, and with stormes and tempestes, that it were striken out of the course of the yeere, that it mighte haue no starres, and that it might not come into the Kalender, too bee under the government of the Moone. It seemeth heere, that he would peruer the whole order of nature. But heereby wee see how our passions boyle within vs. True it is, that if men could mourne without excesse in their afflictions, it were not to be condemned. VVhy so? For our Lorde Iesus Christ was not affectionlesse: yea, wee see that when he endured any greefe, he felte it, he sighed at it, and he was sad for it: and yet for all that, he was the vnspotted Lambe of God, insomuche that there was nothing in him that could be blamed. How is it then that he had heauiness in him? saue onely that (as I haue sayde already) his sorrowing was moderated as was convenient, and was not wicked nor sinfull of it selfe. But all our passions are wicked, because they bee wrapped in some sturdiness agaynst God, or in some distrust, or in som<sup>e</sup> other outrage of the flesh. If god send vs any good, it is not euill done of vs to be glad of it: and specially we can not yeld him thanks, but we must haue our hertes at libertie, to feele the good lucke that he hathe sente vs. But what? Men are alwayes so full of vanitie, as they can neuer make themselues merry without offending of God. As for example, if God sende them riches, there goeth I wote not what a vayneglorie, medled with them I can not tell howe. Or at leastwise they call not vpon God with suche feruentnesse as they were wont to doo, but become very lazie, and giue them selues ouer too that which they haue in hande. To be shorte, as faste as men purpose too make themselues merrie or to bee sad, there will euermore bee some excesse: and hardly can they hold themselues from offending God, because they haue not suche stay of themselues as were requisite, but let themselues runne at randon. And specially, if the aduersitie bee great, men shall very hardly scape too forgette themselues, and too be carried away according as it befalleth heere vnto Iob, when he saythe hee woulde fayne, that his birthday were quite wyped oute of the yeere. But dydde hee hym selfe dispose the dayes of the yeere, that hee shoulde desire too chaunge Gods ordinaunce? when our Lorde sheweth vs the modestie which we ought to keepe in making of othes, he saith: ye are not able to make one of the heares of your head whyte when it is blacke, or blacke when it is whyte: and howe sweare you then by your head? But heere Iob passeth somewhat further. For he woulde plucke the starres out of the skie, he would set the whole worlde worlde on fire to burne vp the earth, and he would haue the cloudes, and the windes, and all things els too mingle themselues togither at this desire. Hereby wee see, that when men are muche pinched with aduersitie, they ouershoote themselues in suche wise, as there remayneth no more modestie, nor any thing els in them br<sup>t</sup> outrage. Sith we see this in Job : it behoueth vs to stancē the more vpon our garde, and to be well aduised, that our sorowing in our afflictions be after such a sort, as in the meane whyle God be blisſed in all that he doth, that wee prouoke him not to displeasure, no not euen b<sup>r</sup> / vnuaduisednesse, for it is certaine that Job meant not to displease God willingly, neyther was it his intent to do agaynst Gods minde : but this befell him through vnuaduisednesse. For our passions are blinde, wee haue no wit to discerne, wee wander without keeping eyther way or path. In so much then as wee know our affections to be so outrageous, wee haue so much the more neede to pray God to rule them for vs. But by the way, if wee compare Job with those that blasphemē God with open mouth, I pray you, howe woorthie are such men to bee condemned? For Job hauing serued God all the time of his lyfe, is neverthelesse set here as it were vpon a scaffold by the spire of God, to the ende men might by him perceyue their owne wretchednesse and humble theselues, & vnderstand that when the grace of God fayleth them, they are in a forwardnesse to cast them selues into hell, if they bee not hilde backe. Seing that Gods will was to exercysē Job in such sorte, as to set him out for a gazing stocke and to make him serue for an example and learning vnto others: what shall become of those that blasphemē God, yea euen without cause? for there are some that if any harte grieve happen too them, so as they be troubled, or if a man doo but stirre their choller: yee shall see them teare Gods name a peeces, and they thinkē that it ought to serue them for excuse if they can say, why then did he chafe mee? If a man happen too doo them a little displeasure, or if a flie chaunce too crosse before their eyes: Iesus Christē, and his death, and his bloud, and his fleshe, and all that euer he hath, shall bee tornē all to peeces. As who would say, that our Lord Iesus Christē had taken mans fleshe vpon him, to bee made a Rayling stocke, at those monsters handes whiche are not woorthie too liue vpon the earth. And yet notwithstanding, they will take it for their excuse too say, suche a man did anger mee. Thou supposest that thou bendeſt thy ſelue againſt man, and yet notwithstanding when thou bendeſt thee agaynst him that hath grieved thee, the eace is ſo that God is offendē by it? But when they come too aduaunce themſelues in that wiſe againſt God: ſeeme they not Monsters contrarie too nature? Therefore lette vs take heede that we ſo brydle our affections, as Gods name bee not blaſphemēd by vs, whereas it ought to bee prayſed and blisſed. Marke this for one ſpeciall poyn̄t. Furthermore, wee ſee that in blaſpheming of God, men haue a certayne natu‐rall Rhetorike, and are ſo cunning in the art, as there is no lacke in them. God hath giuen vs ſpeach, to the intent wee ſhoule confesse him too bee good, rightuous and full of equitie in all reſpectes and caces, and to the ende that in all our talke, our indeuer ſhoule bee too ſpeakē of him with all reuerence. But when it commeth to the poyn̄t that God ſhoule bee honored aboue all thinges, wee ſpeakē ſo faintly of him, that ſcarſly can a man wring a little woorde out of vs that ſhall bee well ſet. But if menne will go too blaſpheming: then yee ſhall ſee them as eloquent as may bee deuyſed, and there is not the man that may not ſeeme to haue bene

at ſchoole to learne fine Rhetorike. Euen ſo is it here. Job did it not of ſet purpoſe (as I haue ſayd afore) for he withhilde himſelue as muche as he was able, and lie fought agaynst the temptation. And yet notwithstanding wee ſee howe his owne nature caried him away in ſuche wiſe, as he coulde nor holde himſelue from this kinde of Rhetorike which is totoo flowing. For where to els ſerueth his ſetting downe of ſo many fashions of ſpeache, whiche he heapeth vp as it were into a lit‐tle pyle? For ſo much then as wee ſee ſuch a vice roo‐ted in menne, what haue wee to doo? wee muſte pray God to open our mouth, and to giue vs the grace that all our woordes may tende to his honor. And moreouer that he will reſtayne vs after ſuche a forte, as wee may take good heede that wee ſpeakē not vntowardly and at auenture, when occation is giuen to talke of his iudgements, and of the good that he hath done vs, and of the corrections that he hath ſente vs, and of ſuche other like thinges: and that wee may beare ſuche reue‐rence to his Maiestie, as our woordes may bee well fra‐med, that there may not be any reproche, and much leſſe any outrage, as wee ſee is happened here vnto Job. Yea and wee muſte be the more provoked therewith by this that he ſayeth, Let them that are woont to curse dayes, curse the day of my birth: and let them that rayſe vp weeping and lamentation, ban the night wherein I was conceyued. Seing that Job ſpeaketh ſo, wee ſee yet better, that men haue neyther measure nor ſtay of themſelues when their affections beginne to boyle vp. For like as in a pot, when the firſt ſeething is ouerpast and it hath caſt his firſt ſkum, other wallopſ come after, ſo as a man cannot ſtop them: euen ſo fare our affections, which are ſo outrageous as a man cannot weeld them at the firſt brunt. But contrari‐wise we ſee what is taught vs in the holiſ Scripture: namely that when Dauid ment to prayſe God as became him, he was not contented to applie all his wittes and all his indeuer too the doing of it: nor to call men to beare him compagnie: but he ſayeth alſo, Yee Heauens, thou Earth, yee Trees, ye Hilles, thou Hayle, thou Snow, thou Rayne, and all yee ſencaleſſe creatures prayſe yee the Lorde. VVee ſee what zelousenesſe there ought to bee in vs when wee minde to ſerue God in good earnest: that is to witte, wee muſte desire, not onely that menne and women, but also that the ſencaleſſe creatures ſhould with one common conſent applie themſelues to prayſe God with vs, ſo as there may be nothing in this worlde neither aboue nor beneath, whiche ſhall not bende it ſelue wholly to glorifie God. And herewithall alſo let vs pray God to giue vs the grace too bee able too imploie our ſelues thereaboutes, and to ſtrengthen vs againſt all temptations that may chaunce: not onely againſt the auaultes that ſhall bee made vppon vs by our enimies from without, but alſo againſt the affections that are within vs.

Nowe lette vs fall downe before the preſence of our good God, with acknowledgement of our offences, beſeeching him too make vs understande them better, and too open our eyes, that when wee beholde the miseries wherewith we are like too bee drowned and vtterly fordone, wee may learne to haue recourſe too his ſouerayne goodnesſe, ſo as he may continew the thing that he ſhall haue begonne in vs, by making vs too taste of his loue: And that if he ſende vs any afflictions, eyther by reaſon of our ſinnes, or for the tryall of our pacience, wee may not bec ſo vngracious as to grudge againſt him, but rather bliſſe him, affiuring our ſelues that he hath iuste cauſe to chaſtize vs: and yet neuertheleſſe beſeeching him too gouerne vs in ſuche wyſe by his holy spirit, as wee may desire nothing but to frame our selues to his good will, to the ende he may cause the precious bloud of his sonne (which was shed for our redemption) to bee auaylable in vs, and that wee may be settled therein more and more vntill he haue gathered vs vp to him into his immortall glorie wherevnto he calleth vs. That it may please him to graunt this grace not onely vnto vs, but also to all people and nations of the earth, bringing all poore ignorant soules to the knowledge, &c.

18. Therethe prisoners rest togither, and no man heareth the voyce of the extortioneer.
19. There the great and the smal are equall, and the seruant is free from his maister.

Haue declared heretofore, that when we be heauy and sorowfull, the onely remembrance of Gods benefytes muste cheere vs, or at 30 leastwyse asswage our miseries and grieses: so as if any aduersitie pinch me, and I bethinke me of the great number of benefites that God hath done for mee, the same must asswage my sorow. And sith the cace standeth so, no afflictions ought to make vs forget the knowledge which we haue of Gods benefites and graces: and yet notwithstanding it cometh so to passe. VVhereof we see example in Job, who is the true mirrour of pacience. For what soever miseries he indured: yet ought he to haue acknowledged it for a great good fortune, that he was sent as a reasonable creature into the world, that he had borne the image of God, and that he had bene cherisched and mainteyned vnto mans age, to the intent he might know God to bee his Father. Behold here such benefites as are inestimable: and yet is Job so farre of from comending them, that he wifsheth he had neuer tasted them. VVee see then howe sore temptations trouble vs, and that in steede of taking some comfort and asswagement of our sorowes by Gods benefites, wee turne the same into a 50 corzie, in somuch as we could finde in our harts that God had neuer done vs any good, nor that wee had neuer knowne him. Not that Job was vtterly of this minde: but because woordes escaped his mouth without aduisement, by force of the miserie that he indured. This then is no encouragement for vs to consent vnto wicked intentes: but wee must brydle our selues in such wyse, that if such fancies come in our head, wee may drive them a great way of from vs. And certaine it is, that here is great and sinfull infirmicie woorthie to be condemned. For we see 60 the example that is shewed vs in the two and twentith Psal.22. 4.1. Psalme in the persone of Dauid, and specially in the persone of our Lord Iesus Christe. Dauid is there as a man destitute of helpe, to whom God sheweth himself to bee contrarie, in so much that he seemeth to bee vtterly shaken of, and therefore he cryeth out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken mee? And this is spoken in the persone of Iesus Christ, as of the head of all the faythfull.

But yet neuerthelesse, after he hath thus made his mone, he addeth: Lord thou diddest drawe mee out of my mo- Psa.22.b.10 thers wombe, thou diddest gather mee vp from the matrice, thou hast shewed thy selfe to bee my God before I could knowe thee or call vpon thee. Dauid did set this geere before him, of purpose too render thankes vnto God, and too sing vnto his name in the middes of his sorowes: and afterward he stablisheth himselfe in good hope for the time to come, not doubting but God regarded him still with compassion, considering that he had shewed himselfe so gracious and pitifull towardes him alreadie. Here wee see a lesson comon to all men: which is, that when we bee distressed with aduersitie too the vttermoste, even that it seemeth a vayne thing and but lost labour to call vnto God: yet it behoueth vs too consider, that he hath created vs and put vs into this worlde, imprinting his owne image in vs, and giuing vs many tokens too knowe that he taketh vs for his children. This ought to make vs lise vp our mindes alofte, to yeede him his woorthie prayse: and moreouer it muste serue vs for a spurre to make vs to trust in him, doubting not but he will shewe himselfe the same hereafter, whom wee haue felte him heretofore. True it is, that it were better for a man to be vnborne, than to bee vtterly lefte vp vnto miserie: in so much as our Lorde sayeth, vnhappie is he by whom offences come: It were Math.18. a.
7. & 26. b. farre better for suche a man, that he had never bene borne. Yea, but when the cace standeth but vpon the 24. suffering of calamities and troubles: wee must not take them so sore to harte, as to forgette the gracious goodness that he shewed vs, when it pleased him too make vs to inioy the light of the worlde, specially with condicition that we should be his children, because he hath printed his image in vs. There was therefore a peece of vnthankfulness in Job. But let vs marke therewithall, that he speake not as one that conserued to such meening. He was so turmoyled, that this escaped his mouth vnwares: and yet neuerthelesse he was fully resolued in his hart stil, that God had done him so much good, as of very reason he ought to acknowledge it. And hereby wee bee taught, that although God strengthen vs by his holy spirite, so as we haue some pacience and power to withstand aduersities:

Psal.22. 4.1. Math.27. e.
46. why hast thou forsaken mee? And this is spoken in the persone of Iesus Christ, as of the head of all the faythfull.

aduersities: yet notwithstanding there will be some frailenesse mingled with it, in so much that our griefe shall ca-rie vs away as it were some hideous tempest in vs, so as wee shall not bee able to rule our selues in all poynts as it were requisite. And hereby wee be warned to walke in feare, and to stande continually vpon our garde, be-seeing God to succour and releue such weakenesse as he knoweth to bee in vs. Furthermore, if at any time wee bee so assaulted too passe our boundes and to make suche complayntes: Lette vs praye God too arme vs, 10 that wee may well atchieue such a combate. And how soever the worlde go, lette vs practyze the lesson that I haue spoken of: whiche is to set before our eyes the benefites of God whiche wee haue receyued in tymes paste, too the intent they may so comforte vs, as our sorowe doo not ouermate vs too oppresse vs altogether, but that wee may keepe still some taile of Gods goodnesse, too the ende wee may hope still for mercye at his hande, notwithstanding that wee haue no likelihood at all of it, and that it seemeth wee bee vterly 20 shutte out from him. Thus yee see what wee haue to marke in this streyne. And herewithall wee see, that when menne are once falne vnto wickednesse, there is no ho with them. It was already too muche to haue sayde, why was not the doore of my mothers wombe shet vp? why was I borne into this worlde? But he addeth further, why did the knees receyue mee? why did I sucke the teate? Herein wee see that Job considereth not Gods benefytes to his ewne profite, albeit that he haue felt them in greate number, but rather reiecteth them al- 30 together: and this it is to make an ill beginning. Therfore wee muste take good heede too our selues: and so soone as our Lord maketh vs to knowe any good that wee haue receyued at his hande, it muste so touche vs too the quicke, that wee may not bee so churlish and frowarde as too turne good into euill. For if wee once beginne too forget Gods giftes, or too turne them contrarie too that wee ought: it is certayne that the same inconuenience and vyce will folowe vs too the vttermost, as wee see here by the example of Job. VVhen 40 God openeth our mothers wombe to let vs out into the worlde, he giueth vs certayne women too take vs vp, according as wee see it is very needfull, considering that the poore humane creature commeth foorth in as greate necessitie as any thing can bee. This done, he prepareth nourishment whereby wee be strengthened, and he turneth the womans blood into milke, that wee might sucke sustenance out of it. God then doth so prouyde for vs, euen at the tyme that wee haue neyther witte nor reason, and are in daunger of death, not able too helpe our selues, no nor too aske helpe at other folkes handes. God preuenteth and ouergoeth vs.
VVee see here benefites of diuers kyndes. But wee see that Job did put them all in a bundle, and was angrye with them all. Therefore lette vs hereby take warning, too bee moued to consider Gods fatherly goodnesse and too thanke him for the same, so often as he setteth foorth any of the benefites that wee haue re-ceyued of him. And when wee haue so begonne, lette vs go through with it. For as it is sayde in the French Prouerb, Loaves are made horned by setting of them a-misse into the Ouen, and when men haue once ouer shot hemselfes, they wote not howe too keepe measure any more. Nowe if it happened so vnto Job, who was indewed with so singular constancie: what shall become of vs that are but as leaues, so as there needeth but a little blaste of winde too shake vs downe? Then lette vs vnderstand the neede that wee haue to flee vnto God, that he may reache vs his mighty hande. But after that Job hath sayde so, he addeth yet worser: which is, that if he were dead, he shoulde haue rest. The reason (sayeth he) is that death endeth all things, so as there is no more eyther riche or poore, there is no more any Seruaunt or Mayster: Those that haue troubled the worlde holde themselues in quiet: and they that haue bene troubled are also at rest with them. I shoulde lyue still and sleepe, I shoulde no more haue any care or feeling of miserie.

It seemeth at the firste blushe, that Job speaketh here lyke a Heathen man that hath no hope of the lyfe too come nor of the resurrection, howbeit that the same were never cleane wyped out of his harte. But sometymes there are so greate and so headdie passions in vs, that the seede of God is as it were choked, and all the light of religiounesse whiche wee ought to haue, is dimmed, and all the conceytes thereof are cast vnder foote, so as they can beare no sway.

This is well woorth the noting: but it had neede too bee declared more at length, for too be well vnderstood.
VVee see howe the present afflictions blinde vs. If it be sommer and that wee bee ouerwhote (for wee muste take these familiar examples) it seemeth one of the paynesullest troubles that a man can indure: specially if a man bee so ouerladen that he faynt, and bee not able to holde out any further, he woulde haue a froste that shoulde clyue the stones, and he thinkes he shoulde bee well refreshed, and that he shoulde bee the more at his ease. And if it bee winter, wee will thinke that no heate can bee to greate for vs. Lo howe the present passions carie vs away, and this befalleth too all men: Yet notwithstanding some are muche more tender and nyce too suffer aduersitie, than othersome bee. Therefore according as eche mannes nature and complexion is, thereafter doth he torment himselfe with the aduersitie that he indureth, and thereafter dooth he martyr himselfe too the vttermoste. Forasmuche as wee see suche experiences, wee knowe that menne are caried awaye by their affections, in suche wyse as they thinke vpo nothing but the thing that grieueth and tormenteth them. And the same thing is too bee seene here in Job.
For he is so ouerpessed with his miserie: that he looketh mooste too that whiche shoulde befall him after his death, and thinketh nothing at all of the seconde lyfe.
I say he thought nothing at all of it when he spake after that sorte at aduenture. True it is that he had the knowledge and beliefe of it printed in his harte: but it laye as a couered fyre, which is as it were choked with ashes.
And lette vs not thinke it straunge, that our euill and sinfull affections, shoulde cause vs so to forgette the thinges that wee knewe and were sure of afore. For wee see howe good zeale hath had the same propertie bothe in Moyses, and in Sainct Paule. VVhen Moyses Exod.32. g. desired God too bee striken out of the Booke of lyfe, 32.
to the ende that the people might bee sau'd: wee see there a good and holie minde, euen suche a one as God allowed of: and yet was there somewhat to be gaine-sayde in it. Dothe Moyses thinke that God can roote out his owne chosen? Is God chaungeable in his purpose? Moyses knewe well that God had chosen him and adopted him to bee one of his children. How doth he then desire to bee wyped out of the booke of lyfe?
It was as much to saye, as if he had never bene recke-ned in the number of them that muste obtayne euerlast-ing lyfe. Doth he demaunde it of God in waye of Hypocrisie? No: there is nothing that carieth him away but his owne zealousnesse, which is so feruent in him, as he passeth for nothing but the welfare of the people

people that was committed vnto him . For what a matter was it when he hearde the sentence of condemnation , that God woulde destroy all the children of Abraham ? If this offspring that God hath chosen to himselfe bee so rooted out , the couenant of God muste also needs bee abolished : Lorde , then rather lette mee bee razed out of thy booke , than too say that all this people here shall perishe . Moyses then was seazed with so greate an anguishe , that he forsat himselfe : he had no more regarde of himselfe : neither considered he that those whom God hath chosen muste of necessitie bee preferued euen to the ende . This was gone from him for a little whyle : and thus wee see why he desired to be wyped out of the booke of lyfe . As much is to be sayd of Sainct Paule . I woulde wishe (sayeth he) to bee cursed for my brethrens sake . How so ? Sainct Paule knew himselfe too bee a member of our Lorde Iesus Christe , and was sure that he was an instrument purposelie chosen too glorifie him : and woulde he nowe repeale the sayde grace ? woulde he breake off the course of Gods determination when as he knewe well that it is vnchangeable ? No , as he himselfe declarereth anon after . Then was there some contrarietie in him . Yea , but no inconuenience came of that . For as I sayde , his zeale whiche is good and holy , draue him and inflamed him in suche sorte , as he had no respect of his owne welfare for the present time , but was desirous that GOD shoulde fulfill his promise in the offspring of Abraham , to the intent that his name might not bee blasphemed . Nowe wee see by example , that good affections doo sometimes as it were steppe afyde out of the waye in Gods children , and make them too forgette that which is knowne and certayne vnto them . And sith the case standeth so , wee muste not thinke it straunge though Job were so hardly distressed that he was forced to speake lyke a harebrayne , so as he maketh all menne alike and equall when they bee dead : and it shoulde seeme by his saying that menne perishe , and that there is none other lyfe after this . His dealing thus , is not for that he had not wel conceyued another opinion in his minde and ingrained it in his harte : but he speaketh as a man that rauesth in a traunce . For his griefe had so blinded him , that he was not his owne man but was become lyke the boylng sea , wherein the waues iustle one agaynst another . Then see wee a fayre lookingglasse , whereby wee may perceyue that our affections are blinde , because they folowe not reason , too knowe the thinges that wee ought to bee mooste certayne and fully resolued of in all the worlde . For what shall become of vs , if wee knowe not that wee are created to a better lyfe ? It were better for vs that wee were Asses and Oxen . For the brute beastes inioy the present lyfe : they feede , they take their rest , and they trauell without any greate feeling of it . But men eate not one morsell of bread without care : in the middes of their pleasures , they haue a number of hartbytinges of their owne (besides that they wante not annoyances at other mens hands) for every man for himselfe becommeth his owne hangman . Therefore if wee haue no hope of the seconde lyfe , what shall become of vs ? And truly our Lordes will is , that the same shoulde abyde printed in the hartes of all menne , according as wee see that although the Heathen men were become brutishe , yet notwithstanding they retayned still some knowledge of the seconde lyfe , and of the immortalite of the soule . And as for those that knewe it not , God hath lefte some marke or other , whereby too make them vnexcusable , yea and it were but even the zoombes that they haue made to burie deadfolkes in .

Euen that is a recorde of the resurrection . But here wee see that Job wist nothing of all this . VVhat shall wee say then , but as wee haue sayde alreadie : that is to witte , that when wee giue heed too our affections , they put out our eyes , or els seele them vp so close , as wee can see neuer awhit , but speake of and on , without any aduysed vnderstanding or staye of our tal'e ? Beholde wherevpon wee ought too muze . But on the other side lette vs marke the grace that was giuen to Job , in that he did not vtterly consentee too this so raunting talke , (for that had bene a blaspheming of God) but onely did lette slippe such woordes at randon . If a man had asked him by and by , what sayest thou ? is there no difference betweene good menne and bad ? dooth death make a finall ende of all thinges ? thou speakest here like an infidell that never knewe of God nor of Gods religion . For God teacheth vs , that after death there is a better lyfe than this , and an everlasting heritage , which he hath prepared for those that are his , and for those whome he hath chosen : and as for the reprobrates , seeing that they haue despzyed him curing their lyfe , they shall knowe him to bee their iudge . If Job had bene posed thus , he would haue confessed such things , yea euen vnfaynedly : and yet for all that , he ceaseth not too ouershoote himselfe in the same thinges . Also wee see that all the matter consisteth not in knowinge ; but wee muste persever in the same knowledge , to withstande temptations with it when they assayle vs . For if wee haue reade the holie Scripture , if wee haue haunted sermons , if wee haue bene taught that which is requisite for a mans saluation : and yet for all that , be negligent , and bende not our minde to bethinke vs of the things that wee haue herd afore : it is all one as if a man being well furnished with Corselet , Murryon , swoorde , and Target , should hang them all vp vpon a spirget , and suffer his armour too rust , and his swoorde to sticke faste to the scabberd , when he shoulde come to haue neede of them . He may well say , I haue armour and weapon ready : but what shall it boote him to looke vpon them ? yee see his furniture is vnprofitable , bycause he hath suffered it to rust : and moreouer he shall not knowe how to handle eyther swoorde or target at his neede . Euen so standeth the case with vs . VVee may well haue knowne the thing that is good and conuenient for our saluation , and yet for all that , when as wee thinke our selues too be handsome and well appoynted men , wee shall not haue the skill howe to applie all things to our behoofe : but this knowledge of ours shall bee as it were rustie , so as it shall not come to our remembrance when wee haue neede of it , and when it might stande vs in best steade . Then see we here a good lesson for vs : which is , that it is not ynochough for vs to haue knownen the thing that God sheweth vs for our profit : but wee must also exercise it without ceassing , and our remembrance must be refreshed , to the intent we may knowe which is the true vse of the holie Scripture . For if that which is spoken of here befell vnto Job , who notwithstanding had earnestly minded the woerde of God (I meene not the woerde written , but the woerde that God had giuen him by inspiration:) if he (I say ) misstid not to bee besotted at his most neede : what shall become of vs that are mucche weaker than he was ? And therefore lette vs beseeche this good God , that if at any time (for to make vs humble,) he suffer our owne infirmtie too ouerrule vs , so as wee haue no such power too warde Satans blowes as were requisitie : yet notwithstanding the same may bee crossed out of his reckening booke , and not bee called too acount . Thus wee see what wee haue to do . But will wee wee bee assoyled at Gods hande? Then must wee first condemne the faultes that wee perceyue in our selues. Furthermore as touching the state of the seconde life: the Scripture sheweth vs as muche as is expedient to be knownen in this behalfe: which is, that it is true, that whē men are come too the ende of their race, God draweth them backe from hence beneathe. For this life is like ned too a course or a race. Therefore wee haue made an ende of our race or iourney at death. But yet for all that wee ceasse not, either too bee in payne: or else too bee in blessed ioy after that oure soules are parted from oure bodies. Lo what wee haue too beare in mynde. As touching the paynes of this present lyfe, as the care of eating and drinking, of maynteyning oure selues in apparell, and of keeping oure selues from harme taking, as well by meanes of men, as by meanes of beastes: all this shall vtterly ceasse: and yet in the meane whyle it is sayde, that the children of God are gathered vp into ioy. True it is, that as yet wee haue not the crowne that is promised vs, and whiche is prepared for vs. For the whole body of Iesu Christ must bee made full and perfect togither. And heere wee see why it is sayde that oure life lieth hidde in Christ vntill the time of his com ming. But yet the faythfull resting in Abrahams boosome are already so farre foorth partakers of the sayde ioy, as they knowe that God is their father, and that the trust whiche they haue had in him is not in vayne. And specially wee muste marke howe Sainct Paule saythe, that as long as wee bee shutte vp within this mortall body, wee walke in hope, without any beholding or sight of the things that are promised vs, for all those things are hid from vs: but when wee bee parted out of the worlde, we see the thing that wee hoped for, and the thing that was earst hid from vs is then shewed openly vnto vs. VVe see then how the faythal that are departed out of this world, are in ioy with God, and do know, that forasmuch as they be Christes members, they can not perish: yea and that they knowe it much better, and with a greater power, than they had done during this present life. And as for the reprobates, they are as condemned caytifs, that wayte but for the houre of execution and torment. For they bee sure already of condemnation.

Iude.1.6.*

And heere wee see why it is sayde that the diuels are lokked vp in darke prissons, and bounde as it were in chaynes, vntill they come too the sayde finall confusion, whiche is prepared for them agaynst the comming of our Lorde Iesu Christe. Thus wee see what the Scripture dothe breefly shewe vs concerning the state of the seconde lyfe, in wayting for the last day. But it is spoken soberly vnto vs, because wee bee too muche giuen too fonde and curious questions. And wee see that men loue better too bee inquisitiue what is done in Paradise, than too knowe whiche is the way too come thither. Beholde, God him selfe telleth vs, saying: Come too mee. Hesheweth vs howe we may come thither: and wee passe not for it. You would maruell too see howe colde wee be when it standeth vpon the poynt of going vnto him by the meanes that he hath giuen vs: and yet in the meane whyle wee bee buzie indeauarding what is doone heere? and what is doone there? what is this? and what is that? wee bee desirous too knowe that whiche God hath hidden from vs: for he will not haue vs too knowe ought as nowe, but onely in parte.

4.12.* And heere wee see why the holye Scripture vieth such a sobernesse. It is because wee shoulde not couet too bee ouersuttle in these fonde questions, but bee contented to knowe that whiche is for oure profite. Yet ne-

uerthelesse it standeth vs in hande too bee well refolued in the sayde article: that is too wit, that in death, there is not reste for all men. True it is that all men, yea euen the wicked also (as I haue sayde) shall bee discharged of the necessities of this present life. But in the meane season they fayle not too bee tormented, feeling God too bee their judge, at whose hande they can looke for no mercy, for they knowe that this confusion is throughly ready for them, and that they shall bee plunged downe into hell. Seeing (I say) that they are cast and repriued too that day: they feele an vnquietnesse whiche passeth al the paynes and tortments of this world. It behoueth vs too knowe this, too the intent that whyle we liue heere belowe, wee may pray God too guide vs with his holy spirite, that wee may not couet any vnlawefull thing: wayting continually till he accomplishe his promise, in gathering vs all togither into his heauenly kingdome. Lo what wee haue too beare in minde. And as touching the rest, although Iobs talke was out of square, (as I haue sayde already) yet notwithstanding wee may gather some good and profitable lesson of it. Howe so? VVhen he sayth that Kinges and Princes doo buyld vp desert places: he sheweth the foolishe vayngloriousnesse that is in worldelings, and in suche as would make them selues renouned heere. VVhen men deuyse, practize, and consulte of buylding houses and palaces: wee knowe that commonly there is excesse. VVhen they proceede according too the order of nature, and fay, ver y well, it is Gods will that wee should lodge heere belowe, and thererpon doo buyld them selues houses too dwell in according too their articles: it is a very good lyne that they drawe by. But they that meane too magnifie themselues in the worlde, content not themselues with that, but will printe an euerlastingnesse of their names in their palaces and castles, and they will haue them too bee seene a fare off. VVho buylded suche a place? it was yonder Prince. Thus yee see the vayne gloriousenesse that passeth beyonde the order of nature. And that was it that Iob mente too giue inkling of. As if he had sayde, men that liue vpon earth are pricked with muche care, in suche wylle as they take muche payne, and fayle not too heave out one another. For they bee so pricked with their owne lustes, that they wage battell agaynst nature. For what meeneth thyss their buylding in deserthes? It is to make buyldinges that are as it were incredible, that when a man commeth too the place, he maye take vp hys hande, and blesse him, saying: Howe is it possible too haue buildest in this place? For if a situation be conuenient and easie to builde vpon, and a man see some fayre building vpon it: very well, it shal be thought no strange matter, and it wil be mockt at by some maner of quippe. But if a man see a place that is as it were vnapproachable, and some other take vpon him to say, I will make it a place of estimation: then beholde, the desert is buylded vp. Beholde it is made as a new worlde. Suche maner of men meene, as it were too stomacke agaynst God. For they purpose to reforme the worlde and the order that God hath set in it, they will haue it seene that nothing shall let them [of their purpose.] And whereas God hath set barres before them to say, you must go no fur ther: they leape quite ouer them. Lo what vayngloriousnesse is in many men: and this is the thing that Job ment too betoken heere. Also (as I sayde) his wordes are farre out of square: but howesoeuer the case stan deth, a man maye yet gather some good lesson of them. Moreouer when hee addeth, That the ser uant is set free from his master, and that the poore and the

Psal.2.6.8 riche are all one: it is to shewe vs, that men muste not glorie in their present greatnessse, according as saint Paule speakest of principalities, wherein he speakest as David dorthe. For thus he sayth in the Psalme: I haue sayde, ye are Gods. VVhich is as muche to say, that Princes, and suche as are in authoritie, are Gods lieuetenants, and haue preheminence aboue the rest of the worlde, as though he God had priuiledged them. But what for that? yet are ye mortall men, and shall dye as men, and so assure your selues. Thus wee see that they whiche are aduaunced to highe estate, ought not too dazzle mens eyes, but rather acknowledge their owne frayle state, and that forasmuche as the worlde and the shape therof passeth away: their riches, t' eir credite, and their honor shall come to nought. Therefore let them not besot them selues. But let them continually thinke vpon death, and let those that haue seruauntes and subiectes vnder them, thinke thus with them selues: we must come to account, we haue one in heauen who is master of vs all, as saint Paule sayth: there will bee no accepting of persons, there shall bee no more bondage or mastershippe for men too allege before God. True it is that the earthly policie, and also the state of Magistrates is ordeyned of God. But all this concerneth the worlde and worldly things, whiche shall take an ende. And therefore must these things bee transitorie also. Then let vs all take heede that wee holde our selues in lowlynnesse and modestie, and that wee attempt not any thing which God hath not giuen vs libertie too do. But nowe let vs returne to the matter that we beganne withall: that is too wit, that Iobs talke ceassed not too bee outragious and excessiue, and without any measure: and that if he hadde consented vnto it, it had bee ne horrible blasphemie. But the case so standeth, that forasmuche as he had not suche a strength in him selfe as too bee able too master him selfe: he was attaynted with many euill faultes, as men must needs feele in the encountering, that they haue alwayes infirmities in their fleshe. And furthermore we see heere howe Job speaketh of little babes. For where as he sayth: As an vntimely birthe: it is as muche as if he ment too tell vs, that when God putteth an humayne creature into the mothers wombe, it hath no soule. But contrarily wee knowe that when the creature is conceyued in the motheis wombe, God breatheth a soule into it, and it is certayne that it hathe in it the seede of lyfe. And so Job sheweth him selfe not too bee well inough settled in his wites, to consider of Gods workes, and too iudge rig hly of them, too discerne betweene blacke and white, but is altogether straight. And whereof commeth that? Euen of the hardinesse of his passions, as I haue sayde. VVee see heere as it were a tempest or storme that maketh Job bothe deafe and blinde. Sometimes when it thundreth, and the ayre is so sore troublid that a man can not haire any thing, all oure wittes bee as it were vtterly amazed, and therewithall we be striken in feare: and when we see the

1.Cor.7.5.1. flashes of lightning, and haire the thundercrackes, and the ratling of some sore and vehement hayle: wee imagine that wee should bee fordoone, and wee shrinke our selues inwardre in suche wyse, as wee dare not once put out our heads. Euen so stooode the case with Job. VVherefore let vs consider these things, and therewithall let vs also beare in minde the doctrine that I haue touched already. True it is, that heere wee must marke two things: for wee haue two extremities, whereof it behoueth vs to take heede. The one sorte thinke it is no pacience, if a man bee not altogether peaceable. The other sorte are of opinion, that although a man chafe agaynst God, and resift him: yet he ceaseth not to be patient, conditionally that at the end he mislike of his fault and repent it. These men giue them selues the bridle, and take leaue to commit many sinnes, yea and they suppose them selues too bee pacient when they haue so stomaked agaynst God by that meane, wherethrough they bereue them selues of Gods grace. Therefore wee must take heede of these two extremities. And let vs marke, that our pacientnesse in submitting our selues too Gods good wyll, is not too bee without any greefe at all, or not too stomacke the matter at some times, or not too feele the waues that come rushing agaynst vs, so as wee shoulde be as senselesse persons in that behalfe: But rather, when wee be in suche battels, let vs not discourage our selues for the matter: but let vs call vpon God, and therewithall feeing continually howe greatly wee bee giltie before him, let vs pray him too strengthen vs by the power of his holy spirite, that wee may bee able to withstande suche assauutes, whereby wee mighte bee oppressed at the first biowe, if he susteyned vs not. Beholde (I say) howe it behoueth vs to deale, to the ende that when God shall haue giuen vs any power and strength too withstande temptations, he may encrease the same in vs, vntill we be come to the ende of all our battels.

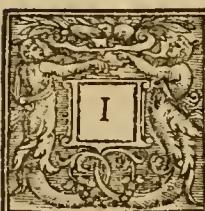

Nowe let vs fall downe in the prefence of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, beseeching him to make vs feele better what we haue not done, that we may be sory for them, and craue pardon of him, and walke in suche aduisednesse, that beeing shrouded vnder the shadowe of his wings, we may be fenced with a good and invincible defence agaynst our aduersarie, and all that ever he can practize agaynst vs. And forasmuch as we bee inuironed with so many wants while we be in this world, let vs pray also too bee strengthened with power from aboue, that wee may not faint in the midst of our journey, but holde out our race, hauing alwayes our eye vpon the glory that is promised vs in heauen, and purchased for vs by the death and passion of our Lorde Iesus Christ, not doubting but that we shall fully and perfectly enjoy it, when we shall haue earst taken possession of it heere beneathe by hope and pacience. That it may please him too graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also too all people and nations of the worlde, &c.

The thirtenth Sermon, which is the third vpon the third Chapter.

20. VVhy giueth he light to them that are in miserie, and lyfe vnto them that haue sorrowfull hearts, 21. VVhiche vvayte for death, and it commeth not to them: [and] vvhiche seeke for it more bulily than for treasures?
22. They vvould reioyce and bee merie, they vvould bee very glad if they mighte finde the graue.
23. [VVhy giueth helight] to the man vvhose vvay is hidden, and vvhich God hath shet vp?
24. My lighing commeth before I take my repaste, and my roaring is lyke the ouerflowyng of of vwaters.

25. I haue met vwith the thing that I stoode in feare of, and the thing that I mistrusted is falne vpon mee.
26. I haue not beene in prosperitie, I haue not beene in quiet, I am not in rest, and yet notwithstanding this trouble is come vpon mee.

Ob complayneth heere, as though God did men wrong too put them into the worlde , and too exercise them with store of miseries. And so 10 he maketh his reckening, that if God will haue vs to liue, he should maynteyne vs at our ease, and not incomber vs with many troubles. Thus wee see breifly what is conteyned heere. Verily Iobs intent was not too pleade agaynst God, as if he would go to lawe with him: but yet in the meane whyle, the greefe that he susteyned carried him so farforth, that these complayntes passed out of his mouth. Howe nowe? VVherefore hath God set vs in this world? Is it not to the ende that wee should 20 knowe him too bee our father, and that wee should blisse him, because wee bee sure that he hathe a care of vs? But contrariwise it is too bee seene, that many men are afflited and tormented with many miseries. Too what purpose doth God holde them at that poynt? It seemeth that he would haue his name too bee blasphemed. VVhat can they doo whome he handleth so rigorously? when they see death before their eyes, or rather haue it betweene their teeth, they can not but fret and chafe at it. Thus wee see an occasion of murmuring agaynst God, 30 and it seemeth that he him selfe is the cause of it. Heere wee haue a very good and profitable lesson: which is that wee shoulde assure our selues, that when God scourgeth vs, yet he ceaseth not too giue vs some taste of his goodnessse, in suche wise as euen in the middest of our afflictions wee may still prayse him, and reioyce in him. Yet notwithstanding it is true that he refrayneth our ioyes, and turneth them into bitternessse. But there is a meane betwixt blessing of Gods name, and blaspheming of it: which meane is too call vpon him when wee bee oppresed with aduersitie, and too resorte vnto him, desiring him too receyue vs vnto mercy. But men can never keepe this meane, except God haue an eye too it of him selfe when he scourgeth vs. Therefore let vs marke first, that whensoeuer God sendeth vs any troubles and sorowes, he ceaseth not too make vs taste of his goodnessse therewithall, too assuage the anguise that mighte holde our hartes in distresse. Howe is that? VVe haue shewed heeretofore, that if men had an eye too Gods former benefites towards them (yea though it were but in that he hathe susteyned them from their childehoode, after he had brought the out of their mothers wombe, and giuen them life:) it were inough to comfort them, euen when they bee ouerladen with dispayre , and too make them thinke: May not God punishe vs justly? for wee bee bound too beare patiently the aduersitie that he sendeth, and nature teacheth vs so to doo, forsomuche as he bestoweth so many benefites vpon vs , according as Iob hath shewed heeretosore. VVe see then howe this one-ly one consideration oughte too assuage our sorowes, according as it is too bee seene, that if men put suger or honey into a medicinethat is ouer bitter, it will alay it in suche sorte, as the patient may the better take it, wheras otherwise it would go neere to choke him. But there is yet a further matter in this: namely, that God sheweth vs the vse of his chastizemēts which he sendeth vs: which is not that he meeneth too destroy vs so ofte as he scourgeth vs : but that it is for our profite and welfare: and he promiseth vs, that if wee bee faythfull, he will not suffer vs too bee racked out of measure, but will supporthe vs. So then, if wee bee afflicted, there is no reason why wee should take pritch agaynst God, as though wee founde nothing but rigour at his hande. For wee bee so comfor-te in our afflictions, as if our vnthankfulnesse letted vs not, wee might reioyce and say, blessed bee the name of God, although he sende vs not all our owne desires. Thus muche for the first poynt. And nowe heerewithall wee must marke also the seconde article, which I haue tou-ched a'ready: whiche is, that although wee haue nothing but distresse, although wee bee helde as it were vpon the racke, and that wee haue nothing at all too comforthe vs: yet must wee not bee hasty too take pritch agaynst God, but wee muste rather call vpon him, according as it is sayde: let him that is sorrowfull pray. Sainct Iames she-weth vs the meane whiche wee ought too holde. If wee bee merrie (sayth he) let vs sing: not after the maner of the worlde (whiche ruffleth it, and royeteth it, without acknowledging that his goodes come of God) but in rendering prayse too God for our gladnesse. And if wee be in sorowe and heauinessse, let vs pray vnto God, beseeching him to pitie vs, and to abate his rigour. Thus wee see, that when the faythfull are at their wittes ende, so as they can no further go, yet must they not rushe agaynst God, and finde faulte with him: neither must they outrage, as those do which are full of pride and rebellious-nesse: but rather let vs thinke thus: Lorde, I see my selfe too bee a wretched creature. I knowe not where too be-come, I wote not what too doo, except thou receyue me to mercy, and shewe thy selfe so pityfull towardes me, as to releue me of my miserie, which I can no longer beare: 40 Thus wee see that the children of God must beare their aduersities paciently, although God chastize them rough-ly for a tyme. And it is too bee seene, that although Iob had continually minded the same lesson: yet was he not sufficiently arm'd too withstande temptations: for he sayth heere, VVhy dothc God give light too suche as are of troubled minde? He remembred not that God had iust cause too keepe men in the middes of many miseries, and that although their state be wretched here below, yet is God righteous still: and that albeit he punishe vs, and 50 keepe vs occupied many wayes, yet it becommeth not vs to holde plea with him, vnder colour that he holdeth vs heere agaynst our will, and that wee bee shutte vp in prison while wee bee in this life: neither must wee conceyue any displeasure for all that. Iob did not sufficiently consider this. Now if suche a person as Iob was, happened too ouershoote him selfe, and too kicke agaynst God, for want of hauing the sayde regarde that I haue spoken of: muche more must wee set our mindes vpon the sayd two poynts: that is to wit, that we beare in remembrance, that God never forsaketh vs, and therefore that we may not bee ouer sorrowful when God sendeth vs any aduersities, bicause wee bee sure that his chastizing of vs is af-ter suche a sorte, as therewithall he releueuth our greefe, at leastwise if it bee not long of oure selues, and of oure owne vnthankfulnesse: And secondly, that when wee bee distressed that wee can no more: God calleth and allureth vs friendly vnto him, yea I say, he prouoketh vs 60 D.v. too toore sorte vnto prayer as often as wee bee as it were vtterly stripped out of all that wee haue. Lo heere the true remedie : which is too call vpon our good God too haue pitie vpon vs, and not too suffer vs too bee so dismayde as too say, I wote not what to doo, and it is too no purpose too go vnto God. Let vs keepe our selues from suche incombraunce, and persuade our selues that wee shall alwayes be sure too fare well, if wee call vpon God, who will bee alwayes mercyfull too vs, even in the middest of our afflictions. VVhen wee haue these two 10 poyntes well settled in our remembraunce, wee shall no more say : VVherefore is it that God holdeth those here whiche are in sorrowe of minde ? For wee see wherefore he dothe it. There is great reason why God should chastize men. For howe great are our sinnes ? the number of them is infinite. Agayne, if wee looke vpon our lustes, there is also a very bottomlesse gulfe, which hath neede too bee mended. God therefore must mortifie vs. Furthermore, if wee consider howe muche wee bee giuen 20 too the worlde : wee shall finde that our affections had neede too bee plucked from it by Gods chastizementes. Moreouer howe great is our pride and presumptuousnesse : And therfore must God needes humble vs. Besides all this, howe colde are wee too craue his helpe : and therefore he must bee fayne too inforce vs too it. Finally ought not our fayth to be tryed and made knownen ? Then see wee not reasons inowe why God holdeth vs heere, and will haue vs to be miserable, so as there is nothing but paine, trouble, torment, and anguish in all our whole life ? Is there not sufficient reason why 30 God should doo this ? Marke heere a speciall poynt. And sithe that he continually calleth vs vnto him, and maketh vs free passage vnto him, and that wee haue suche a remedie in our miseries : may we not holde our selues well appayed ? VVe see howe we ought too bee armed and fenced agaynst the sayde temptations, whiche reynged ouernuche in Job, howbeit that he was not vtterly overcome of it. For when Job speaketh heere of suche as desire the graue, and whiche willingly dig for it as for some bidden treasure, longing to dye and can not: he putteth him 40 selfe in the same ranke, as we shall see by the sequele : wherin he confirmeth his owne infirmitie and vice. For it is not lawfull for the faythfull to mislike their owne lyfe, and too wishe so for death. True it is that wee may wish for death in one respect : which is, in consideration that we be hilde heere in suche bondage of sinne, as wee can not serue God so freely as were too bee wished, because we are ouerfraught with vices. In respect hereof it is certayne that we may sigh, and desire God to take vs quickly out of the worlde. But (as is sayde afore) it may not bee 50 for that we hate our life, or for that wee bee weiry too be hilde heere because wee be handled ouer rigorously : but wee must beare our lot paciently, in wayting Gods leysure too deliuers vs. And wee see that Paule holdeth the selfe same measure when he sayth too the Romanes,

Alas, who shall deliuers me from this mortall body ? For I am vnhappy. But yet therewithall he sayth, Thankes bee too God through our Lorde Iesu Christe. Lo heere howe saint Paule on the one side calleth himselfe unhappie, and desirith too bee taken out of the world : and on the other side is contented and at rest, because God preserueth him, and he knoweth that God will never forsake him, howbeit that he bee subiecte too many miseries. VVe see heere his contention. And that wee may the better vnderstande the whole : let vs marke howe Job hath done amisse in two poynts. That is too witte, in not hauing the regarde that he ought too haue had in desiring death : and also in not keeping measure.

Heere wee see two faults that are very grosse. VVhen I say that Job had not his eyes fastned vpon the marke that he oughte : I meane that hys wishing for death, was not bicause he sawe himselfe to bee a miserable sinner, and coulde not attayne too the perfection which all of vs ought too labour for : but because he was weiry of the nipping greeves, as well which he presently indured in his person, as whiche he had susteyned before in his goodes. And so he desired death, because it seemed to him that God pressed him ouersore. Thus wee see the first faulte that I speake of. But if wee apply the same too oure owne vse, it will bee yet better vnderstoode and apparaunte. If a man searche and trye him selfe throughly, and thinke thus with him selfe : I am giuen to suche a vice, and I fight agaynst it, but I can not come to my purpose : and the matter is not for one vice alone, but I haue two or three that torment me. Surely yet I will not give my selfe the bryde, neither will I wounde my selfe, I feare the vengeance of God, and will holde my selfe in suche sorte as I bee not vtterly vanquished : I see I must bee muche more earnest in seruing God, and in fighting agaynst the world and mine owne flesh, as it is verye requisite I shoulde bee, for I am hilde backe and hindered by mine owne lustes. I saye, if a man acknowledge him selfe suche a one : after he hath well examined his lyfe, he sayth therepon : yea my God, I see my selfe in miserable plighe, and when shall I bee deliuered out of it ? For needes must I beare sinne in me, and although it reigne not in me, yet doth it dwell in mee. And what else is sinne, but the diuels scepter, whereby he reigneth ouer vs ? Then am I the bondslauie of Satan and of death. O my God, muste I tarrie euermore in this weerysome plighe ? A Christian man may well haue suche sighes, and beseeche God too set him free from suche a bondage wherein he seeth him selfe too bee. But if the matter concerne aduersitie: wee must regarde nother colde nor heate, nor pouertie, nor sicknesse : but we must haue our eye only on our sinnes. And specially when God punisheth vs, in what wise so ever it bee, wee must mount vp higher, without any resting vpon the bodily aduersitie, and think thus with our selues : beholde the frutes of our sinnes: forasmuch as we haue done agaynst Gods will, it is good reason that he shoulde shewe him selfe a iudge towards vs. VVhen we haue thus acknowledged our sinnes, the same worketh a remorse in vs, and prouoketh vs to conceiue the sorrowe wheroft S.Paule speaketh. And thus much as concerning 2.Cor.7.c.u. the first poynt. But it is not inough to thinke as afore is sayd : that is to wit, to wish death in such wise as I haue earst shewed : but it behoueth also too keepe measure. I say, we must not onely wish it vpon good cause, but we must also bridle our desire, so as it bee ruled by the good pleasure of God. And this will bring too passe, that the outrage which is shewed heere in Job, shal be restrayned as with a bridle. I haue already touched this poynt in the text which I alleaged out of S.Paule. For after he had made his moane, and wished to be deliuered out of this prison of death : he addeth, I thanke my God : and he ceaseth not to be quiet, even in the midst of those complaintes and longings. And why so ? for he seeth it is good reason that God shoulde be the master, and gouerne vs at his pleasure : and that we should paciently wayte for such ende as he listeth to giue vs. S.Paule perceiving this, concludeth immediatly, that although he be a wretched sinner : yet notwithstanding he is sure that God will guide him in such wise, as his saluatō can not miscarie. S.Paule then had an eye to those two things. And therefore he sayth that he yeldeth God thanks, notwithstanding that he

he bee in miserie. Euen so muste wee doo. And in so do oing, wee shall not onely bee the readier too indure all the myseries of this worlde for the honour of God, that hee maye be glorifyed both in our persons, and in oure humilitie : but also wee shall bee willyng too suffer for our neighbours, as Sainct Paule also sheweth vs by his owne example. He sayeth too the Philippians that as for himselfe, it shoulde bee farre better for hym to bee taken out of the worlde : but for youre sakes (sayeth he) it is requisite that I live, because I know that you haue as yet neede of my labour, and that God imployeth mee about the edifying of your fayth, and vnto him do I submit my selfe. And afterwarde he sayeth: Although it were for my behoofe to goe hence oute of hand, yet am I willing to abyde here still. Lo how faint Paule exhorteth all men to submitte themselues in such wyse vntoo Gods pleasure, as whyle they liue in thyss worlde, they may not onely bear their afflictions paciently, but also bee readie to suffer for their neighbours, so as their labour may be profitable to the cōmon weale, 20 and they themselues do seruice to the church of God. Thus we see what wee haue to marke. But what? This lesson is not yet vnderstode, forasmuch as there are verie few that put it in vre: for if God leauē vs in rest, ye shall see vs so blynched with vayne and fonde ioye, and wee be so ouersotted, as wee knowe neyther death, nor our owne frayltie any more, neyther haue wee ayu discretion at all. And if God visite vs with any afflictions: it needes not to be asked whether we blasphemē or no, or whether any othes passe out of our mouth or no: there 30 will be store of mysliking, of murmuring, and of impaciencie, which shall be full of sturdinessse. And when the winde is in that doore with vs, howe many be there that thinke vpon their sinnes, and that grone vnder suche a burden, and therewithall looke vntoo the ayde that God giueth them, howe he suffereth them not to be vterly ouercome by Satan, and therewpon doo quiet themselues and take comfort in that he preferueth them? The number of them is verie small: and yet is not this written in vayne. But in generall wee haue now to consider, that the faythfull may well sighe and grone all their lyfe long, till God haue taken them out of the worlde, alwayes wishing for their ende, that is to saye, for death: and yet notwithstanding they must restrayne themselves in such wyse, as they maye wholly submitte themselues to Gods good pleasure, knowing that they are not made for them selues. Fyrste I saye, that the faythfull may well sighe as folke that are wearie of their long pinning in thyss prison of their fleshe: namely for the cause that I haue touched, whiche is, because they serue not God in such freedom as were requisite, but drawe theyr lynes amisse, so as they woorke awrye, and oftentimes swarue asyde. And (whiche more is) wee muste syghe but so fare foorth as is lawfull for vs: whyche is too bee doone so often as wee enter intoo the confyderation of oure owne ouerwearynesse when the matter standeth vpon the seruyng of GOD. For, that muste spurre vs to desyre God too take vs oute of this worlde, and make vs haue an eye to the lyfe that is prepared for vs in heauen, whyche shall bee fully shewed vpon vs at the comming of our Lorde Iesus Chryst.

And heereby wee see howe it is not onely graunted to Gods children to wishe for deathe, but also that they ought to wish for it. For they shew not a good proove of their faith, except they seeke to go out of this worlde, according as in deed all things hast and labour toward their marke. But our mark is aloft, and therfore must we never leauē running till wee come to oure wayes ende whichē

GOD hathe sette vs: and wee muste desyre that that may be quickly. Neuerthelesse lette vs alwayes beare in mynde the cause that I haue spoken: namely that wee must not bee prouoked to wish for death, because we be subiect some to sicknesse, some to pouertie, some to one thing, and some to an other: but bycause we be not fully reformed to the image of God, and because we haue manie imperfections in vs. Marke well (I say the cause that muste spurre and prouoke vs to desire death: namely, too the ende that beeinge ridde of this mortall boodie (whiche is lyke a cabane full of all flinche and noysomnessse) wee maye bee fully reformed too the image of God, so as hee maye reigne in vs, and all the corruption of our nature be vterly done away.

And furthermore, lette vs keepe vs within the compasse of desyring too lyue and dye at Gods pleasure, so as wee maye not bee giuen too oure owne will, but so as wee maye make as a sacrifice of it in that behalfe, that our liuing maye not bee too our selues but to God, so as wee may say, Lorde, I know myne ewne frayltie. Neuerthelesse it is thy will to holde me in thyss world, and here I am, and good reason it is that I shoulde tarye here: But whēsoever it shal please thee to cal me hence, I make no great accompt of my lyfe, it is always at thy comandement, to dispose of it at thine owne pleasure.

Bcholde (I saye) howe we ought too deale in this case. And herewithall, lette vs haue oure affections euermore quieted, yea euen in such sorte, as wee may continually prayse Gods name, assuring our selues, that both in life and death, he will alwayes shewe himselfe a Father and Sauior towards vs. But after that Job hath spoken so, he addeth: That such as are so distressed in their hearts, would bee full gladdē and fayne, if they myght fynde theyr graue. VVherein he bewrayeth himselfe to speake thorough a brutishe and vnauidited affection, and that hee keepeth neyther measure nor modestie. For hee confesseth that wee come to nought there. So then wee see howe he is faine, howbeit not with a deadly fall, but with a halfe fall, and God rayseth him vp agayne afterwarde as wee shall see. Yet neuerthelesse the case standeth so, as wee must verily condemne this infirmitie heere in Job: that is too saye, he was so dismayde with heauinessse, as he could no more taste of Gods goodnesse, therby to gather never so little comforte too sustaine himselfe by.

But forasmuche as wee see that this besell vnto him: so muche the more muste wee bee earnest in praying vntoo God, that sorowe maye not ouermate vs so, as wee shoulde bee vterly ouerwhelmed by it. Therefore let vs alwayes be so vnderdropped and stayed vp, as wee maye syghte agaynst sorowfulnessse, and feele that it is good for vs to liue heere according to Gods will, and that although we haue greate grieses and troubles heere, yet must wee stande fully resolued vpon this point, that it is good for vs to continue here still in this world. And wherefore? To the ende that God may be glorifyed in vs, to the ende that our fayth may bee tryed, to the end we should call vpon him, and professē him to be alwayes our father, notwithstanding that he scourge vs, and to the ende that by meanes thereof we may bee prepared too 60 the heauenly lyfe. This taste of the said fathery goodnessse, must always make vs desyrous to go vnto God, & not suffer vs too gliae bridle to anye one outrageous and beastly affection, as wee see that Job hath doone heere. And by the waye hee sheweth, whence this heauinessse came vpon him, that had so wholly swallowed him vp, and from whence also it proceedeth in those that are so dismayde as they can not admit any conforte to assuage their miseries. He sayth, To the man whose waye is bidden, and and which God bath shut in, as if he had made hedges round about it, that no man shoulde enter into it.

This is well woorthe to bee noted. For Job sheweth wherin he sayled: namely in not yelding himself inough to Gods prouidence. Yet notwithstanding, heerewithall hee discouereth a disease wherevnto all of vs are subiect. That is to wit, that we be desirous to know all that must befall vs, and what our state shal be: and al this we would haue declared to vs: in so muche that when wee are in perplexitie, so as wee knowe not what shall become of vs, and that the inconuenience pyncheth vs, and we see no ende of it: then are we at the poynct of vtter dispaire.

Lo here a mischiefe that is ouer common and ordinarie. And wee must marke it well, to the ende wee maye seeke the remedie on the contrarie parte. VVhat then is the inclination of men? It is, that they could well fynd in their heartes too leape vp to the cloudes, to knowe what shall bee the course of their whole lyfe. And we see how they determine with themselues, I will do this and that.

Prou.16.4.1. Salomon mocking at the ouerweening that is in men, sayeth that they determine vpon their whole lyfe: and whereas they can not moue the tip of their tong without God doe guyde it: yet determine they vpon this and that. And what a mockerie is it? They are not able too moue the tippe of their tong, and yet they presume too say, Behold I will doo this a ten yeeres hence: according

Lam.4.1.13. also as Sainct James agreeith with Salomon, in scorning of the sayd presumptuousnesse whiche is in men. For so long as God letteth vs alone at our ease, every man beleueth what he listeth himself, and we take our selues too be petigoddes. But assone as God turneth his hand, and beateth vs with his rods: ye shall see vs so amazed, as we wote not where to become: we think it not possible for vs euer to scape out of our miseries, we looke on the one syde and on the other, and we see no end at al of them: we be as it were so shet vp in them, that we cannot take hold of the goodnesse and myghtie power of God to succour vs. And this is the verye affection that Job sheweth vs here, which is an ouercómon disease as we fynd well ynough by experience. For there is not anye thing that troubleth and tormenteth vs so much, as when wee see our selues shut vp, and know not what wil be the end of our miseries, nor what shall become of vs, in so much as being assayled on all sydes, we conclude with our selues, that we can neuer get away without vtter oppression and ouerthrow. Haue we this sayd disease? Then let vs resort to the remedie. For if the disease be not cured, we must nedes fall into the sayd excessiue passion, whereof mention is made heere: namely that wee shal. wishe for death as ,men in despaire, and shall haue no assuagement of our miseries, but only to desire God to ouerwhelme vs out of hande. But the conueniente remedie of this disease is, to referre our selues to Gods prouidence, that he may see brightly for vs, and that sith wee bee blynde, and in darkenesse, our God maye guyde vs as he knoweth is good for vs, and leade vs foorth in all our enterprises. Beholde also whervnto the holie scripture binngeth vs backe. Ieremie sayeth, O Lord, I know that the waye of man is not in his owne power, neyther is it in man to walke and direct his owne steps. This is as much to saye, as a man taketh too muche vpon him, when hee purposeth to dispose of his owne lyfe. Let vs vnderstád then, that it is Gods will to humble vs, in as much as he shutteth our eyes, so as we see not what must become of vs, and wee know not to daye what wee haue to doo to morowe, but God intertayneth vs by the day lyke iourneymen (as men terme them) after the maner of a hyreling, who being waged for a daye, woteth not who shall set him a worke the next morowe. Beholde howe God will haue vs to liue, to the ende wee shoulde learne to depend wholly vpon hym, saying: True it is Lord, that my lyfe is frayle, but yet thou knowest what shal betyde me, thou hast forseen me Lorde, and therefore I put my selfe into thyne hande. I haue many cares too torment me and trouble me, but I discharge mee of them into thy lappe: forasmuch as I am sure too be safe vnder thy protection and custodie, I holde my selfe contented.

Thus we see how it behoueth vs to deale: And when we haue this sayd Prouidence of God thoroughly imprinted in our harts, so as we can depend wholly vpon it: although wee be turmoyled with manie troubles in thys worlde, yet we see a good foundation that will make vs to stand steadie and constant in our calling, to serue God according to his will all the dayes of our lyfe. Then let vs learne to settle our selues vpon the sayde prouidence of God: and when we see things so shuffled together in the worlde, as wee knowe not on which syde to turne vs, we may not therfore ceasse to be apeaceable and quiet, assuring our selues that God ordereth and guydeth all things in suche wise, as there is nothing that can hinder the welfare of the faithfull, seing that he hath once taken them into his protection.

Thus we see what wee haue to marke in this strayne: Now in the ende Job addeth, that he bath no rest, and that he is in heauiness before he take his repast: and yet notwithstanding (sayeth he) I haue not behaued my self heretofore as moste men doo: I haue not settled my self in my prosperitie, but I haue continually feared the miserie that is come vpon mee. Let vs mark then this complaunt of Iobs. For on the one side it sheweth, that his miseric was extreme: and therewithall (sayeth hee) what is the cause why GOD handleth mee so? For when God threateneth menne, he sayeth: Forasmuche as thou hast made thy selfe drunken in thyne own pleasures: forasmuch as thou hast ben as it were blynded by them: forasmuch as thou wart so altered when I didde thee good, that thou hast not knowne me: thou maist see wherfore I intend to punish thee. And God sheweth precisely that he cannot abyde with this fleshly selfeloue which is in me. For whē they wene that they shall always haue ease at will, and whē they shal say peace, and al is safe: behold a sodain storne shal ouerthrow them, which they forswa not aforé had. VVc see then how god punishesth this presumption and rashnesse that is in men, who whyle they bee in prosperitie, beleue they shall dwell in it for euer, and in the meane season consider not, that they are in the hand of God, nor think vpon their owne frayltie. But himself in a redinesse to indure the aduersitie that God should send vnto him) was ouertaken with such anguish and so greate : it standeth vs on hand to looke to haue much worse, according to our deserts. And if God spare vs and hold vs vp for a tyme, let vs not therevpon conseyue any vayne and fond imaginacion, to think that no aduersitie can touche vs. For if we think so, God must wake vs vp in good earnest, and shew what power and authoritic he hathe ouer vs. VVhat must we then do? we must be vigilant to keepe good watch, and specially whē God handleth vs gently, so as we susteyne no aduersitie: yet notwithstanding we must haue an eye to that which may betyde vs, after the example of Iob. For if the miserie that he misdoubted, lighted vpon him, wee may be sure we are not sharper sighted than hee was, to foresee a farre off the incōueniences that may hit vpon vs. Also when we be falne into them, let vs not therfore ceasse to resort to our God. For we see how God hathe ayded his seruant in the ende? And although he seemed to be plunged into the gulfes of hell: yet notwithstanding God reached him his hande, and therfore let vs also hope for the like towards our selues.

Now lette vs pray this good God, that it may please him to open our eyes, that wee maye the better knowe what is needfull for vs, and that when wee see too howe many wantes and myseries wee bee subiecte in this worlde, we may learne to sigh and grone: and specially that forasmuch as we be hild here in the bondage of sinne, so as we can not serue our God in full libertie, we may long for the kingdome of heauen, where wee shall haue full perfection and enioyemente of the graces, wherof we haue but a tast in this world: and also where wee shall be ioyned to our heade Iesus Christ, to reygne with him in euerlasting glorie. That it maye please him to graunt this grace not only too vs, but also too all people and nations of the world, bringing backe.&c.

The fourteenth Sermon, which is the first vpon the fourth Chapter.

This Sermon conteyneth still the Exposition of the two last verses of the thirde Chapter, and then the fourthe chapter as followeth.

1. E Liphas the Themanite ansvered and sayd.
2. If a man assay to talke, shall it grieue thee? And vvho can holde himself from speaking?
3. Behold, thou hast taught many, and thou hast strengthened the vyearie handes.
4. By thy wordes thou hast stayed them vp that vvere falling, thou hast strengthened the weake and trembling knees.
5. But novvethat the euil is come vpon thee, thou art out of quiet: and novvethat it hath touched thee, thou art astonyed.
6. Is not this thy feare, thy trust, thy hope, and the vprightnesse of thy vvayes?

Pon Iobs talke which we treated of yesterday, ther remaineth to vnderstand, that whē we be in prosperitie we cannot hope that God wil continue it for the tyme to come, nor let vs be in rest still. For Job semeth to meene, that the faithful must alwaies stand in dout, and that they must thinke that the thing which they hold with the one hand, shal be forthwith taken away in the other. Herevpon wee note, that we must not imagine more than God promiseth vs. For it is a vayne and fonde presumption, when men behight them selues that thing which God leaueth them in dout of. And therfore God punisheth such maner of ouerweening, when we imagin what wee liste, and write vpon it that it shal be so. God will not haue vs to haue any other leaningstock than his woord, which is the assured truthe that can not ly. Therfore whensoeuer men presume vpon themselues, there is nothing but vanitie and leasing, and it is no wonder though they be disapoyneted of their purpose. For our Lord hath good reason to mocke them, when they passe mesure after that fashiō. And so must we hold this for a generall rule, that our trust must be settled wholly vpon Gods promises. And now lette vs consider what God promiseth. He sayeth that if he haue thought vpon vs to day, he wil not forget vs any more to morow but we shal be helped by his hand all the tyme of our life. Behold what his promise is. Then may we wel assure our selues, that God will always kepe vs, and that by meanes thereof we shal not be in daunger of falling into decaye. But yet herewithal we must make our account to be subiect to manie inconueniences. For our Lord sayeth not that he will keepe vs shut vp in a mew, so as wee shall see no aduersitie, nor be acquainted with any trouble, but be in continual ioy and felicitie: hee promiseth vs no such matter: but only that hee will ayde and succour vs in all our necessities. VVherefore it behoueth vs to vnderstand, that God will exercise vs in manie aduersities, and that we be subiect to the common afflictions of this presente lyfe: and that in the meane season it oughte to suffize vs that we shall be ayded by him, and that we shal not be vtterly forsaken. Seing the case standeth so, wee perceyue verie well, that we must not sleepe when we be in prosperitie, as thoughē this state of ours were euerlasting, so as nothing coulde chaunge it. And therfore in presuming so farre, we step beyond our boundes: and why so? For God telleteth vs that wee may peraduenture suffer manie aduersities: but he will helpe vs continually. Nowe then, in the meane whyle we shall fight, yea and be assayled on all sides. And therefore those that passe their boundes in suche wise, shall be punished for their ouerhardinesse, as I haue sayd alreadie. At a woorde, the fayrhfull may euer be in doubte, and yet never ceasse to be in quiet. How so? For when we consider the chaunges and turmoylings of this worlde: wee must needs be afryde and careful, and euery of vs must prepare himself to receiue blowes, when it shall please God to smyte him. But yet heerewithall wee knowe, that in oure falling we can not lyghte otherwyse than vpon our feete, because we be hilde vp by the hande of God: nor bee vtterly oppressed, bycause hee releueuth vs. VVee see then how we can not bee vexed with ouergreat vnquietnesse, and yet wee may bee sore greeued in our heauinessse, not to withdrawe oure selues from God, and to make no accompt of calling vpon him, but to haue our recourse vnto him. To be short, there is great diuersitie betweene the carelesnesse wherevnto we be inclined by nature, according to the disposition of our fleshe, and the assurednesse that we haue by resting oure selues selues vpon Gods promises. For when we haue the sayd fleshly presumptuousnesse , it is like a certaine drunkennesse, which maketh vs blockishe , so as we haue no regarde of God nor of his helpe , making oure reckening that all shall go well with vs though he nother looke to vs,nor thinke vpon vs. But if we rest vpon Gods worde: we will call vpon him, and we will looke about vs on all sides , and consider that oure life is a thing of nothing, that our state is wretched, that death manaceth vs on all sides, and that we be hemmed in with infinite miseries. 10 Heerevpon wee pray vnto God, and make our moane vnto hiin : and yet neuerthelesse , if it please him too punishe vs, wee are readie to receyue his strypes with all meekenesse : Loe howe wee ought to deale. But there is yet more : which is, that the faythfull man must enter intoo himselfe , acknowledge his sinnes , and consider that he giueth continually newe occasion why God shoulde iustly punishe him . So then, although wee bee promised that God will mainteyne vs in this worlde, as though wee were brooded vnder his wings, so as we shal bee there in peace and without any disquietnesse : yet doo our sinnes cause him to chastize vs, and to shewe some roughnesse towardes vs. God can not abyde too suffer vs to runne so into decay : and if he shoulde leaue vs after that sort at random without anie chastizement, it woulde bee oure vtter vndoing . If earthly fathers marre their children when they cocker them too much : it is certaine that we shoulde bee much more marred, if God shoulde not chastize vs and shewe some signe of roughnesse towardes vs . For as experience sheweth, 30 we abuse his goodnessse in all respectes . The faythfull therefore, acknowledging themselues to offend God without ceasing, must also beare in minde, that he hath rodde in a readinesse too beate them for their sinnes, and that eyther too day or to morrow hee can chaunge the prosperitie which they presently enjoy , and therevpon deale rigorously with them. So then let vs marke, that we must not sleape after such a sort, but that when God mainteyneth vs heere in quietnesse, wee must also haue an eye to that which may betide vs, and be alwayes 40 ready to receyue the afflictions that hee shall sende vs. Nowe let vs come to that which is reported heere: that is to wit, that Eliphas the Themanite one of Iobs friendes that came to cōfort him, is entred into talke against him. For he telleth him in effect, how he feeth to wel, that the feare of God & the purenesse which he seemed to haue in outward appearāce, was but hypocrisie because he delt so farre out of square, & could not paciently receyue the correction that God sent him. But anon after he entreth yet further : that is to wit, that of force it must needs 50 be that Iob is a reprobate, considering that God handleth him so roughly. And why so? for the good men are never smitten with such extremitie. Lo heere the first ground that this Eliphas taketh to reason vppon agaynst Iob. But we must bethinke vs of that which I haue declared heretofore : which is, that Iob hath a good case, but hee handleth it verie yll : and that his countercompanions haue an yll case , and handle it verie well : according as some tymes a man may set a fayre colour vpon an euill matter, and so doo they . It standeth vs in hande to markethis: for otherwise all the talke that is rehearsed too vs here , will bee confused. Iob (as I haue sayde) hath a good case. For hee acknowledgeth that it is God whiche scourgeth him : and althoough he account hymselfe woorthie of such corrections in as much as hee is a sinner, yet notwithstanding he is fullie perwaded that God looketh not at that, and that his sending of so great aduersities vnto him, is not in respecte of his sinnes , but for some other secrete cause whereof he is not priuie . In the meane while he shutteth his mouth, and sayth that hee can win nothing by pleading agaynst God . Yet ceaseth he not to vse much wandring talke : And that is the cause why I sayde that he handled a good case amisse . But they that visite him doo take an vntrue principle : which is, that God doth alwayes deale with men in this earthly life , according to their desernes . This saying is vtterly false : for we see the plaine contrarie , and the scripture sheweth it vs , and experience serueth vs for another proufe of it. But yet the case so standeth, as in the meane seafon they that say so , ceasse not to alleage good & holy reasons, whereoutof wee also may gather good and profitable doctrine. Howbeit for the better vnderstanding of the whole , let vs call to remembrance howe it is sayde in the Psalme. Blessed is the man that considereth aright of him that is smitten : that is to say which iudgeth discretely of him that is afflicted . And what maner of wisedome is that? It is too thinke that God will deliuer him in the time of aduersitie . Thus we see what the holy ghost requireth of vs, if wee will not bee rashe iudges, and turne all Gods woorkes vpside downe. VVhen wee see poore men beaten that they can beare no more : wee must vnderstande that God is so mercifull, as he will succour them : and that it is not to be sayd, that he meeneth to destroy them vtterly. To bee short, if we will bee discrete iudgers of the chastizements and corrections that God sendeth vpon men : wee must wayte for the ende of them : and we must not bee ouerhastie to giue sentence at the first dash : but we must stay our selues, and marke what it pleaseth God to do. And according as he sayeth that his displeasure is short, and Psal.41.4.1. that his mercie lasteth vnto life : wee must encline our selues to wayte on the hither side, that is to wit , to hope well, and to wayte for a good and happie issue. Thus we see what we haue to marke . But Iobs friendes remembred not that, and that was the cause why they overshot themselues. They see Iob smitten with extremitie , and thereupon conclude, that God ment to shewe in him an example of a reprobate person , and that those thinges had not happened vnto him, if he had not beeene a wicked and vngracious person. And why so? for they conceyued not that which the scripture sheweth vs : namely how it is the propertie of God to succour those that are his, when they be in distresse . And the scripture telleth vs, not onely that God aydeth the afflicted , but also that he draweth those out of their graues, which seeme to bee alreadie deade. Although then that our afflictions bee great and excessiue , yet muste wee still hope for Gods helpe , which doubtlesse will bee beyonde all the opinion of man, and beyonde all the meanes that we can conceyue. And it is not in this Text onely that the Scripture speaketh so : but it is a doctrine verie ryfe through out . It is sayde that the righteous man Eze.37.4.16. Pro.24.1.16 not onely shall bee shaken , but also that hee shall fall seuen tymes a day . Then may wee fall many tymes : but yet shall Gods hande bee readie to holde vs vp, so as our fallings shall not bee deadly , at leastwyse not too broose vs so sore , but that God shall deliuer vs. Beholde howe the Scripture speaketh. True it is that there bee diuorse promyses whereby it seeneth that God maketh a difference of his owne children from the reprobates and dispysers of hys woordc : as when hee sayeth , that the hardhearted man shall bee ta med by force of strypes lyke a Mule or a restye horse , and that GOD will not cease too beate vpon them with great strokes, whiche are so rebelliou lious and sturdie agaynst him : and contrariwise that such as trust in him shall be hedged in with mercy, that is too say, that God wil on al sides blesse them and make them too prosper. VVee see heere a princely promise, whiche seemeth to exempt Gods children from all aduersities.

Psal.30.a.4 Esa.38.d.17 But yet it behoueth vs so to expound these sayd promises, as we haue an eye to that which is sayde, howe God will be knownen to bee the preseruer of his seruaunts, by drawing them from their graue. So then, if God hedge vs in with his mercy, it is not to make vs cockneys, so as no aduersitie should touche vs, so as we should not be needy, so as we should feele no scarsitie, or so as we should never haue any greefe: God mindest not to vse suche manner of dealing : for it were not conuenient for vs. But he will haue vs too passe through fire and water (that is too say, through all kinde of miseries) and too bee so distressed, as wee wote not where too become. And heere-upon he will remedie our necessities, to the ende we may knowe howe it is he too whom wee bee beholding for our welfare. Thus wee see after what maner our Lorde worketh. Also let vs note, that too iudge wel, it behoueth too beare this poynt alwayes in minde : that is too wit, not onely that God punisheth such as are the worst sort, but also that he exerciseth the pacience of his faythfull ones, scourging them and handling them farre more roughly than he dothe the wicked. To bee shorte, let vs alwayes haue an eye too the issue, as I haue sayde, and let vs not maruell though we see not Gods helpe at the first day. Lo heere the principle which wee muylay before vs, that we may knowe howe to make our owne profite 30 by that whiche is recited to vs heere. As touching the words that Eliphias vseth, they bee these : If a man at-tempt talke, or If a man rayse talke: for as well the one as the other may be spoken, bicause the Hebreue word hath a double signification. And forasmuche as the Hebreue worde which is put heere for talke or speeche, is sometimes taken also for a thing : Some vnderstande it thus : If God tempt thee, is it meete that thou shouldest bee so farre out of pacience? Is it meete that thou shouldest be so sore moued? For wee knowe that the Scripture termeth it a temptation, when wee bee troubled, and when God trieth vs after what maner so euer it bee. So then, the meening shoulde bee suche as this : is it meete that thou shouldest repine agaynst God, when thou seest that he trieth and tempteth thee? that is to say, when thou seest that he mindest too proue what is in thee? But if al things bee throughly considered : the naturall meening is, If a man assay or attempt too speake. And why so? For Eliphias addeth immediatly, And who is he that can with-bolde him selfe from speaking? As if he should say, thou art so farre out of square agaynst all reason, that men must needes finde faulte with thee, and there is not the myldest man in the worlde, but he shouldest bee constrainyd to rebuke thee, if he sawe thy outragiousnesse and thy behauing of thy selfe heere like a sauge beast. Therefore thou must bee restrayned, for thou wouldest inforce the meekest man aliue too speake. Lo heere the playne meening. But in effect Eliphassis minde is, too shewe that Job hath not walked aright, nor with a cleere conscience before God. Lo heere the first poynt. Afterwarde he entreth into this general argument which I haue touched : that is to wit, that the righteous are never oppressed in that wise with affliction : but that it is alwayes a token of Gods vengeance. And therefore when he perceyued that Job was tormented in this wise, he deemed him too bee a reprobate person. Thus yee see the two poyntes. And nowe let vs come vnto the first of them. He sayth vnto him, Thou becretofore hast taughte the *whole worlde, thou hast strengthened the quinering knees. Thou hast refreshed the weery bandes, thou hast ame-ded suche as dyd amyffe, thou hast comforted suche as were tormented: and nowe when the miserie is come vpon thyselfe, I see thou arte out of quiet: and therefore I con-clude, that the feare of God whiche thou haste had, was no more but the very same hope whiche thou pre-tendest: namely, that God shoulde always haue beene fauorable vnto thee. Too bee shorte, thou haste serued God vpon vsurie. It was not for that thou diddest giue ouer thy selfe vnto him in good earnest, but in respect that thou diddest hope he woulde always haue beene mercyfull vnto thee, and so long thou couldest well finde in thine heart too scru him, but nowe that thou feelest him somewhat roughe, thou renouncest his seruice. VVhereby it is to bee perceyued, that there was nothing else but hypocrisie in thee. Thus wee see in effecte, the whole grouud of the discourse that Eliphias maketh here. But true it is, that wee marke not what is in our selues, when wee eyther counsell other men, or comfort them, or rebuke them. Euery man can doo that: yea euen the moyste idiothes. For (as it is sayde in a common prouerbe) it is easie for them that are in health, too comfort suche as are diseased. But if wee can shewe by oure owne dooings, that the thing whiche wee speake vnto others is in our selues, and that wee speake it from the heart : that is a true prooef that wee deale not deceit-fully. VVee shall see diuers that are as eloquent, and more eloquent than needeth, and whiche can babble so well too the purpose as yee woulde wonder, and they never want tongue, if it bee but too prattle. But if it happen that God doo but fillip them with his fingers ende, they wote not what conforte or any thing else meeneth. VVhat is too bee done then? VVhen wee speake too our neighbours, let vs shewe vnto them, that the thing which wee speake vnto them with our mouth, is throughly grounded in our harts. Thus we see how we ought to proceede. Yet is it not met hereby, that we should cease to comfort and incourage our neighbors, and to reproove one another. For they that passe not to chastize such as do amisse, and to cōfort such as are in heauiness, and to reforme such as go astray : shew theselues to haue no care, neither of God, nor of his seruice. For if we loue God with a right affection : it is certayne that (as muche as in vs lieth) we will seeke that all men may do the like. A true Christian will not content him selfe too walke a-right : but he wil [doo his best] too drawe the whole worlde to the same accord. And therfore it behoueth vs to put that thing in vre, which S. Paule also sheweth vs, 40 1.Tbes.5.b.11. of teaching and reforming one another : but (as I sayd) we must do it frō our hart. And how is that? Verily that whē it shal come to the trial, we may shew in very deede that we haue not spoken frō the teeth outwarde, but that the word which issued out of our mouthe, is throughly rooted in our hart. But here we see what the vse of Gods word is: namely not only to teach and too shew what is good: but also to correct such as haue done amisse, to rebuke such as deale disorderly, and to strēngthen the weak, the feeble, and those that are of small corage. And ther-60 fore the prophet Esay auoucheth, that it belongeth too the charge of all Prophetes, all teachers of the Churche, and all such as haue charge to beare abrode the worde of God: not onely to vter that which is commanded them to speake, (wee may see heere what God will haue declared vnto vs) but also too haue the cheerfulnessesse too spurre and pricke forwarde them that are lazie, too giue corage too the weake, too lifte vp them that are falne, and too bring backe them that stray, into the right way.

*Esa.35.a.3.

Thus

Thus yee see what is the true vse of Gods worde : namely that it is the way, aswell too instruct men aright, as also too shewe the effectualnesse of the Gospell, according also as when S. Paule telleth vs howe wee must apply the holy scripture too our instruction, he saythe, that it serueth not onely to knowe what is good, and too discerne betweene good and euill : but also too exhort, too reprove, and too conuince vs. And heereby wee must bee the more prouoked too receyue Gods worde desirously, and with a cheerefull and louing affection, forsomuch as wee see howe all that belongeth too our welfare is comprehended therein. God then not onely bringeth vs that whiche is for our behoofe too knowe : but also forasmuche as he seeth our frayltie, he intendeth to remedie it, and will haue his word to serue to strengthen vs : and forasmuch as he seeth we be brittle and in daunger too fall, he setteth vs vp agayne anone after : and forasmuche as he seeth vs inclined too hypocrisie, and too soothe our selues in our owne vices : he spurreth vs, too the ende wee may perceyue our owne euils, and not delight in them. Seeing then that wee perceyue howe God hath so well prouided for all things which he knoweth too bee behoefull, as he will haue his worde too serue vs throughly in that behalfe : ought not wee to be the more inflamed to receyue the same worde ? Seeing wee perceyue it too bee suche a treasure, ought wee not (I say) too receyue it with a cheerefull minde : consideringe howe it is sweeter than honyn, as it is sayde in the nyneteenth Psalme. Also when wee heare the worde of God : it standeth vs in hande too knowe wherefore.
There are that would haue a man too doo nothing else but say, Beholde what wee haue too marke vpon this text : and that man should make colde expositions, and that there shoulde bee no exhortations, no rebuking of vices, nor liuelynesse. Yea, but that were as muche as to deface the doctrine of God, as if a man should cut a sunder the sinewes of a body, that it might haue no more strength in it. VVhat is too bee done then ? VVhen wee come too a sermon, or when any man readeth alone by him selfe, wee must vnderstande, that it is Gods intent, not onely too shewe vs what is good, as if he should say, go on that way : but also too rebuke our sinnes in vs, that it may bee as a messenger too pricke vs forwarde too learne too humble our selues before him. Is it euen so ? Then let vs marke also howe sluggish bee, and that wee hye vs not vnto him with suche zele as were requisite, insomuche that he is sayne too giue vs some strokes of the spurre too quicken vs vp, and all his exhortations serue too humble vs, and too make vs too submit oure selues frankly to his will. Thus we see howe we ought to deale to make the worde of God to serue to our vse, and in what wise we ought too put it in vre. Aboue all, they that are cheefe in this charge must marke well, that they bee not quite discharged when they haue faythfully informed the people what is good : but also that they must haue the foresayde liuelynesse of encoraging them, too the intent that suche as are dul, may be somewhat quickned : and of comforting suche as are in distresse, too the intent they may finde reliefe in God : and of rebuking suche as delight in their owne vices, too spurre them in suche wise as they may be abashed and ashamed in them selues. And like as the ministers and teachers must app'y these things to all men openly : so must every one of vs apply it to himselfe, following that whiche the Apostle sayth in the Epistle to the Hebrues : for in alleaging the saying of the prophet Esay, he sayth wee must not tarry till others speake to vs, but every one of vs must bee a scholemaster to him selfe. As if he should say, Beholde how that vnto al such as are appoynted to carry abroade Gods worde in his name, the Prophet Esay giueth commaundement to comfort the trembling knees, to stay vp the handes of suche as faynt, to releue suche as are oppressed, and too pull them backe into the righte path, which are gone astray. But yet neverthelesse my freends (sayth he) marke howe every one of you also is bounde to succour him that is weake and feeble, to cherishe him that is weery and out of heart, to comforte them that are oppressed with sorrowe, and (to be short) to employ him selfe in that which he knoweth to bee meete and expedient for the welfare of his neighbours : and finally, that every one of vs must do the duetic of a preacher towards him selfe. Lo what we haue to marke in this text. And whereas recorde is giuen vnto Job, that he had instructed many. Heere is shewed vs, first the excellent vertue that was in him. And wee must also take instruction by it to doo the like : that is to wit, to drawe all men with vs (as muche as in vs lyeth) to serue God with one common consent. True it is, that all men are not indewed with so great giftes : but yet must every man consider his owne measure, and employ him selfe according as God hath giuen him abilitie towards his neighbours. Therefore wee must vnderstande, that whatsoeuer God hath imprinted in eche of vs for the common buylding vp of his Churche, wee must discharge our selues of it, and according to the giftes that every of vs hath receyued, so must he profite others, and all of vs must communicate togithers, that wee may go to God with one accorde, and every man shewe openly that he hathe a desire to serue his neighbours turne. But nowe let vs come to the conclusion that Eliphas maketh. Forasmuche (sayth he) as thou art out of pacience when the aduersitie is come vpon thee : it must needes be sayde, that thou hast beeene but an hypocrite, and that the feare which thou hast had, was but a hope and a looking that God should always fauour thee. Verily had Job beeene suche a one as Eliphas surmizeth him to bee, his saying had beene true. For (as I haue touched afore) the marke too knowe hypocrites by, is when they can babble to teache others, and shewe not in dede that their doctrine serueth their owne turne : and when they haue a fayre vtterance, but keepe nothing within to serue their owne turne at their neede. Then let vs learne to bee every man his owne scholemaster and teacher : And if we minde to profite our neighbours by this doctrine : let every one of vs beginne with it at him selfe. And whereas Eliphas dothe Job wrong, in saying that he founde him astonished, as though there had beene nother wit nor reason in him : wee perceyue thereby, that to humble vs therewith, God may well suffer vs to be so delte withall : but yet wee muste also presuppose, that whatsoeuer temptations happen too Gods children, they shall neuer vtterly decay, but God will succour them in suche wise, as they shall haue wherwith too stablish and strengthen themselves, notwithstanding that of nature they bee so feeble and weake, as euen to stumble without ablenesse to rise agayne, were it not that God reached out his hande vnto them. Then let vs vnderstande, that when wee haue taughte other men, and wrought wonders, in reproving the sturdie and wilfull sorte, in reforming those that went astray, and in strengthening suche as are fayntharted : wee shall bee so muche the more blamable and worthy too bee condemned, if wee shewe not by our owne doings, that wee spake it from our harte and earnestly. The greater then shall the damnation of those bee, who hauing meddled with teaching of others, doo themselues take no profitte at all by the doctrine. And this ought well too make vs

to walke in feare and humblenesse. Therefore when it commeth to the case of instructing, let vs thinke thus: True it is that God will haue me serue my neighbours turnes. But so it is that I must be mine owne iudge: I carie abrode his woerde, and therefore I must teache mine owneselfe. Otherwise, if I frame not my life according to that which I speake and vtter with my mouth, it wil be to my great and horrible confusion. Aboue all men, the ministers of the Gospell must well consider this. Here we

1.Cor. 9. 4. see also why Sainct Paule sayeth, that he blamed and condemned himselfe, to the ende he might be the first in the ranke, when the condemning of others shal come in question.

27. To be brief, we that haue the charge to beare about the woerde of God, shall be so muche the more blame worthie, though wee haue faithfully taught that which God himself hath shed out vpon vs by the gift of his holy spirit, if we haue not begonne to shew the same at our owne persons. And so, must we amend others? Let vs first amende our selues. Muste wee exhort others? Lette vs

Gal. 6. 4. 1. first exhort our selues, and lette vs alwayes bee the first in leading of the daunce. Specially when we rebuke such as haue done amisse, let vs practyze that which Sainct Paule sayeth, that is to wit: let vs vse all softnesse in reproving them that haue done amisse. And that it is so, looke vpon thy selfe (sayeth he:) and if thou finde thy selfe frayle, then must thou beare with thy neighbours, and yet in the meane while the same must not hinder the liuely admonishments which God inioyneth vs. Thus wee see what we haue to gather, that we may profit our selues by this text: [that is to wit,] that as oft as it shall please God to correct vs, (after what maner so euer it be) wee muste shewe, that when we be desirous to comfort other men that are inlike troubles, we haue bene good and faithfull teachers towards our selues. As concerning the sentence where it is sayd, VVas not thy feare then a counterfetnesse? Were not thy hope and the simplicitie of thy wayes [so likewise]. Here Eliphias meeneth to shewe Job, that he had bene an hypocrite, and had not serued God but for desire to see me and to be seene. And certaine it is, that if we serue not God, (yea though we feare that we shall haue him against vs:) it is but a flauishe maner of seruice. For God will not haue vs to be as hyrelings in seruing him: but he will haue vs to go to it with a free courage, and to be so wholy giuen vnto him, as we may say, Lord, we bee thine, and reason it is that euery one of vs shoulde dedicate himselfe vnto thee, and labour to glorifie thy name. VVe see then how we ought to haue a free harte in ser-uing of God, and not be led to it by flauishe constraint. True it is that in some other textes it is rightly sayde, that we may well serue God, considering that we shall not be disappointed of our labour, according as it is sayd in the Psa. 19. d. 12 nineteenth Psalme, and in other like places. But all this doth easly agree togither, that is to wit, that in seruing of God we muste be led with a free minded affection: and yet neuerthelesse must assure our selues, that God wil not suffer our labour to bee vnprofitable, according also as Sainct Paule speaketh. God (sayeth he) is righteous, who 1.Cor. 15. g. promiseth that your traueling shall not be in vayne, so as 58. it should bee loste labour when you bee so persecuted. 2.Thef. 1. c. 7 The holy Scripture is full of this doctrine, and specially it is sayd in effect, that suche as truste in God shall not Heb. 6. c. 10. lose their rewarde. Then as touching the first poynt wee may well haue an eye too the promises that God hath made vs, namely that wee shall not lose our labour in seruing him, nor be disappointed of our longing, but that our rewarde is greate in heauen: and yet notwithstanding that in the meane time the seruice that wee do vnto God, muste bee free hارت: that is to wit, that when soeuer it pleaseth him to plague vs, wee muste not therfore ceasse to continue our obedience towardes him, and to walke in his feare, as well as when he dealt gently with vs, and mainteyned vs in good plig. And in doing hereof yee see how wee must not looke too haue a hyrelings rewarde, to say, O I will serue God condicionally that he deale with me after mine owne desire. If wee come too this point, it is no seruing of God after the maner of children: but after the maner of those that bee hyred for wages by the day. VVhat is, to bee done then? we must haue a freeharted affection too dedicate our selues wholy vnto God and to give our selues wholy to the seruing of him, yea euen as well in wo as in weale: being well assured that our labour shall not be disappointed, when wee shall haue proceeded in such simplicitie. But for asmuch as this matter can not bee layde forth at length as now: 40 wee will keepe the rest till to morrow.

Now let vs humble our selues in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him too make vs vnderstante them better, that wee may dislyke them, and seeke the remedies which he offereth vs, to the ende they may bee corrected, and therewithall guyde vs in suche wise in this worlde, as we may desire nothing but too please him in all points and all respects, and to follow his holy commaundements. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heauenly father, &c.

The fifteenth Sermon, which is the second vpon the fourth Chapter.

This Sermon contayneth yet still the exposition of the sixth verse, and then afterward as foloweth.

7. Consider I pray thee, vwho euer perished being an innocent? or vwhere haue the vpright bene destroyed?
8. As I haue seene, they that plough vnrighitousnesse, and sovve incomberance, gather the same.
9. They perished vvith the blast of God, and vvere consumed vvith the breath of his mouth.
10. The roring of the Lyon, the noyze of the Libarde, and the teeth of the Lyons vvhelpes are dispatched.
11. The Lyon perisheth for vvant of pray, and the LyonesSES vvhelpes are chaced avvay.

Irst and formost wee haue to beare in minde what was declared yesterday: whiche is, that to serue God aright, wee muste bee ledde by a freeharted affectiō, to give our selues vnto him without hauing any respect of being well intreated at his hande afterward, or that he will sende vs our owne hartes desire. For as for those that will so indent with God to receyue at Godshande what soeuer they themselues desire: firste they shewe thermeselves too be ouer-fleshly, and to muche giuen to their lustes: and secondly they woulde binde God after a very straunge fashion, and behaue not themselues as children towrades their father.

father. For they bee drien by a flauishe respect, they bee hyrelinges, and wagismen. VVhat muste wee doo then? Referring our selues to Gods good pleasure, wee muste haue suche a constancie in vs, as too honour him bothe in woo and weale, and too desire too bee his, and too continue in the obeying of him, what soever hee doo too vs, or how soever he dispose of vs. If wee bee not of this minde, all the seruice we can doo him shall like him neuer a whit, notwithstanding that it bee neuer so well liked and esteemed of the worlde. And therfore lette vs not referte our fearing and reuerencing of God, too the ende that wee would haue him doo what wee liste. But although he be rough and sharpe towards vs, so as it may sometimes seeme that he would thunder vpon vs: yet neuerthelesse lette vs abyde still in awe, and say: Lorde it is reason that thou shouldest raigne ouer thy creatures. Also it is not for the childe to commaunde his father, nor too binde him too the stake, but too say: Here I am Sir, gouerne you mee according too your good pleasure, for I protest I desire nothing but too bee subiect vnto you. Behold what wee haue to doo. But surely wee knowe well inough, that (as the

for he hath promised vs a plentifull rewarde, and wee shall not bee disappoyned of our expectation. But yet must the sayde freeharted affection go before it, that we make not any bargayning with God too say he is bound to vs according too our appetites, and that he muste of necessitie graunt vs what soever wee haue imagined in our owne brayne. Lo howe Gods seruaunts knowing 30 that their seruice is acceptable, and that it shall not bee vnprofitable, doo notwithstanding not reste themselues vpon the rewarde that is promised them: much lesse then muste they intend too bring God too the bente of their bowe, or too taske him of necessitie too doo this or that: but muste with all lowlinesse referte themselues wholly in all things too his pleasure. And whereas I speake here of rewarde: I debate not whither rewarde bee dewe vnto vs or no, for as nowe wee stande not vpon that matter. VVhen wee haue done all that is possibele too be done, God shall be neuer a whit in our debte. But when he promiseth vs rewarde: I vnderstande it too bee of freegift, and that it is not for that wee haue deserued it, or for that wee bee woorthie of it: but because that as he hath receyued vs into his fauour, so will he also allowe of our woorkes, yea, whiche he himselfe dothe by his holye spirite. For as touching goodnessse there is none in vs, and yet looke what God hath giuen vs, he accepteth it as if we brought it to him of our owne. And when he receyuth our woorkes so of his owne mere 50 goodnessse, it is too giue vs the better courage too serue him by hauing an eye too his promises, wherein he protesteth vnto vs, that our rewarde is greate in heauen, yea and that he will blisse vs in this worlde also, so as wee shall not want any thing at all. Then may wee cast our eyes herevpon, and comfort our selues: but herewithall (as I haue sayde) wee muste not recken that God shoulde deale with vs after our owne deuyce: but rather determine with our selues too referte the matter wholly vnto him, and too submitte our selues wholly 60 too his good will. Thus wee see the doctrine that wee haue too gather of this texte, whiche is very profitable for vs. For it is a marke whereby too discerne Hypocrytes from Gods children. An Hipocrite may well magnifie God with full mouthe in time of prosperitie. But if the worlde go against his desire, a man shall see that all is chaunged with him. And what is the cause of it? It is for that suche maner of menne beare no reue-rence too Godward, further foorth than he applieth himselfe vnto them. And what kinde of reuerence is that? If I bee minded too serue mine owne turne by one: very well, bycause I can drawe profit out of him, I will make good countenance too him: but if he perceyue it, he will shake me off like a villaine, and he serues mee but well. Nowe if mortall menne can not beare suche carlifnesse: what shall become of vs when wee come vnto God? shall wee loue him, or shall wee honour him, but onely so farre foorth as may bee for our owne profit: what a mockerie is that? See wee not how the order of nature is peruerted? But if there bee true friendship betweene vs and any manne: wee will honor him for his vertues which wee knowe to bee in him, and too the ende wee may liue togither in one common acconde too serue God. I say that when God giueth vs suche markes, wee may well serue and honour a man. So then, wee may well haue this regarde too creatures whiche are nothing. But as touching God, he muste bee honored for his owne sake, bicause he deserueth it: and wee muste bee so rauished to the honoring of him, as wee may not thinke of our selues, sauing as in second place and in inferiour degree. VVee may see then how the hypocrites bewray themselues by repyning against God in the time of aduersitie, and when he handleth them not after their owne fansie.

And for asmuch as moste men are giuen to this vice: wee see there is cause, why wee ought to marke this lesson the better. And nowe Eliphas addeth: Consider if ever any righteous man haue perished, Marke if the rightdealing men haue bene rooted out. Eliphas (as I haue sayd alreadie) taketh here a good sentence, so as the reasons which he bringeth here against Job are good and holie, notwithstanding that the case bee euill. And surely the principles that are sette downe here, are drawne out of Gods pure truthe. By reason whereof it is as much as if the holie Ghost had pronounced this saying. That neuer any righteous man had yet perished, and that neuer any rightdealing man had bene destroyed. Neyther coulde any suche thing happen. VVhy so? For God hath promised too haue a care of the righteous, as it is sayde, The eyes of the Lorde are vpon the righteous, and his eares are open too their prayers, too heare them and too succour them at their neede. The Scripture is full of this matter: that is too witte, that Gods hande is stretched out too preserue the righteous, whiche call vpon him and put their truste in him. For needes must the Diuell haue bene stronger than God, if the righteous might haue perished: and therefore lette vs alwayes haue recourse too this sentence of Iesus Christe. The father Iohn. 20. f. who hath put you into my handes is stronger than all. His meening is, that our welfare shall neuer bee in hazard, for so much as God taketh vs into his keeping. VVherefore? for he will spred out his power ouer vs too maynteyne vs. Psal. 34. s. 16

Therefore let vs conclude, that our welfare is in good suretie, when God hath once taken charge of it. And so it is a sure doctrine, that the righteous cannot perishe, nor the rightdealing menne bee rooted out. But there is greate difference betweene perishing and afflicting: for punishmentes and afflictions serue not alwayes too destroy menne, as I haue declared partly alreadie. Yet may the affliction bee so grieuous sometimes, as it will seeme that they bee deadly. VVhat is too bee done then? wee muste conclude according as I haue shewed here before, that for so muche as God chalendgeth it too bee his office to pull menne out of their graues, wee neede not doubt but that wee shall bee succored by him, when wee haue indured for a tyme. VVee see then that Eliphias misapplieth his matter, as though Job were perished alreadie, and that God had forsaken him vterly without any remedie. But it is not so. True it is that he was a poore man altogether disfigured, irksome to beholde, and a spectacle that might shewe the wrath of God: but yet did not God ceasse too loue him, as wee may see, and as experience sheweth at the ende. Eliphias therefore is prevented with a dread, whiche maketh him too misdeeme, in so muche 10 that he leaueth no more roome for Gods mercie and meere goodnessse. Lo wherein he ouershot himselfe. Also when wee see a man in suche miserable plignt, that he seemeth too bee vterly fordone, and that there is no more hope of his recouerie: lette vs learne, (I say) too magnifie Gods goodnessse, and too hope that he can yet still remedie the mischieses that seeme incurable. True it is that too mans expectation, all may bee fordone: but God hath meanes (which are incomprehensible too vs) whereby to succour his seruants, when 20 he listerth too shewe himselfe pitifull towrdes them. Let vs tarie his leasure till he shewe vs the ende: and in the meane whiile let vs suspende our iudgements, least wee be iudged to be ouerhatie and rashe. Thus we see what wee haue too marke: namely that wee muste acknowledge the power of God to be so greate, as he is able too succour those that are as it were ouerthrownen, and that he is able too quicken them againe although they were alreadie dead. But we must not apply this doctrine one 30 ly to our neighbours: wee must also practice it eche one of vs in himselfe. And wherefore? For when God sendeth vs any great troubles: by and by wee conceyue that which is spoken here of Job: wee neede no Eliphias too vexe vs and too beare vs in hande that wee bee paste recouerie. There is none of vs all, that hath not the seede of hartburning in himselfe, too trouble and too martyr himselfe in his afflictions, yea euen too drive vs into despayre. Our owne nature affoordeth vs that. So then, when God scourgeth vs, wee bee troubled with suche an imaginacion as this: Howe nowe? God hath promised 40 too succour suche as are his: and thou pynest away here, yea euen with extremitie. Thou callest vpon God, and he answereth thee not. VVhere are his promises? Thou seest well ynough he hath shaken thee off: and therefore there is no cause why thou shouldest any more thinke, that he accounteth thee for any of his. For if thou were, it is hyghe time for him too looke vpon thee and to pitie thee nowe, or neuer. But he sheteth his eyes, and makes as though he sawe thee not: and therefore thou seest he hath vterly forsaken thee. Beholde the temptations wherunto wee bee subiect, and which steppe before vs too driue vs vterly into despayre. So much the more then haue wee neede to bee fensed against suche a conflict. And after what maner? It is (as I haue sayde) that when any mans minde casteth suche temptations before him, he muste answere and say: It is true that neuer righteous man yet perished: it is true that the right dealing men cannot bee rooted out: but what is this perishing? it is more than too bee onely afflicted. And wherefore? For the holy Scripture telleth vs that God rayzeth vp the dead, that he giueth courage too suche as are vterly dismayed, and that he recouereth suche as are wounded to death. VVhen the Scripture sayeth so: is it not to shewe that God vtereth his woorking towards all that are afflicted? Yes: for when it is sayde, you that are dead, you that are alreadie rotten, lifte vp your selues, receyue yee full liuelynesse, and flourishe yee as fresh herbes: Too whome is it that Esay speaketh? It is too the faythfull. The faithfull then muste sometimes become like rotten carkeses, that God may giue them liuelynesse agayne. For as wee see the herbes too become greene in the springtime, which were as good as dead in the winter: even so muste God worke in vs. There bee many other sentences, whiche tende vnto the selfe same ende. So then, wee perceyue that God preserueth not his seruants as one that meerieth to make them Cokneyes: but as he that mindeth too take them out of their graves, and to maynteyne them after a wonderfull fashion, too the intent they may knowe howe it is he too whome it belongeth too haue dominion ouer death, and to give life. And therfore wee haue a warrant, that the isses of death are in Gods hande. Beholde here a notable promise. VVhen Dauid intendeth too shewe vs howe it is God that guydeth vs: he sayeth that the isses or outgoinges of death belong vnto him. And why is that? He meeneth that wee bee as it were throwen headlong into death at euery blowe, and that wee cannot setforth one stuppe, but it shall seeme that wee are vterly vndone. But God hath the isses of death in his hande sayeth he. So then lette vs marke well these sentences, that wee may bee throughly fencid when the Diuell shall come too blowe in our eare, And who art thou? Seest thou not howe thou haste no succour from aboue? the righteous perishe not. Too barre Satan of his purpose, lette vs haue these answeres ready: It is true that the righteous perishe not, nother am I perished. But thou arte as good as a dead man: [saythe the Diuell] and my God [let vs say] is he that hath the isses of death in his hande. And that is it which David meeneth in another texte, saying: Though I were 50 in the shadowe of death, thy sheepooke ô Lorde shall guyde mee, because I alwayes put my trusste in thee: yf thou bee my protector, I shall bee exempted from all euill.

Thus ye see howe wee ought too practice this lesson. And here it enseweth, That suche as sowe extortiōn, or labor extortiōn, and such as sowe incomberānce, shall gather the same. VVhiche thing is confirmed by a similitude. For Eliphias sayeth that the roring of the Lyons is stinted, that their teeth are broken, and that theyr whelpes are destitute of pray. VVhereby he meeneth, that suche as haue bene full of crueltie and extorcion, shall bee daunted by the hande of God. But somewhat afore, he had sayde, That the wicked had perished at the blaste of God, and by the breath of his mouthe. As touching the former sentence where he sayde, that suche as labour for iniuitie and sowe trouble or incomberānce &c. I say it is 60 a similitude taken of the tillers of the earth: And the sayde twoo woordes Iniquitie and Trouble, or (whiche is all one) vnrightousnesse and incomberānce, ate ioyned togither in the Scripture, too signifie the extorcions and outrages whiche the wicked commit, too vexe and disquiet their neyghbours: and also the woerde Incomberānce or trouble, is spoken of suche as doo nothing but tosse and tunnoyle other menne. And firste it is sayde, that they Plough, bycause that they whiche are so desirous too annoy their neyghbours, and too do them some harme, doo make preparatiues, lyke as when the labouour intendeth too sowe his grounde, he muste firste plowe it, and the earth muste firste bee tilled. Euen so the wicked consulte aforehande vpon their vngraciousnesse, trecheries, and vnlawfull dooings, devysing guiles and deceytes: and afterwarde when they haue layde the whole platforme, they seeke all meanes posible to put their lewde enterpryses in execution: and that is the verie laboring [or tillage] that Eliphias speakeith of here.

For

For he sayeth, that herevpon they sowe incomberance: that is to say, when they haue made their preparations, they runne vpon poore men too fleece them and to eate them vp. But these menne (sayeth he) doo reape that which they haue sowed: that is to say, God maketh all the mischiefe which they haue conceyued and inueneted agaynst others, to light vpon their owne heades. VVee see here a sentence that is true and wee must take it as spoken by the holy Ghoste, even to gather a generall lesson thereof. And to put it to the true vse, wee must pray God to graunt vs the spirit of wisedome in that behalfe, that wee may not wrest the Scripture this way or that way to drawe it to a contrarie sense, as wee see that Eliphias hath done. But whereas the holy Scripture sayeth, that suche as plowe iniquitie and sowe incomberance shall reape the same: it is a threatening whiche God vttereth against the wicked, who thinke to aduaunce themselues highly when they play the rauenous beastes, fleecing one man and eating vp another: specially when they deuour all, seeming to themselues to be iolly conquerours, and standing in their owne concytes for doing so. But our Lorde telleth them, that they beguyle themselues very muche: for he maketh all their enteipryzes too turne too their owne confusion.

VVherefore ye see a threatening, whereby God purposeth to represso the ouerboldnesse and maliciousnesse of men, minding too holde them shorte, too the intent they may liue togither in all good loue and vprightdealing, so as no man may labour to hinder his neighbour: like as on the contrarie side, we heare also the promise which is giuen vs in these wordes: he that soweth blis-3.Cor.6.6. fnessesse shall reape the same Sainct Paule speaketh this of Almesdeedes. He sayeth that if wee sowe vpon our neighbours, that which God giueth vnto vs, wee shal gather it agayne: in so much that wee shall haue abundance of his gracious gifthes and blissinges, and God shall shew out his riches vpon vs, and shewe himselfe gracious and liberal towardes vs when we bee in necessitie. This promise then serueth to giue the faithfull a good minde to deale frankly with their neighbours and to succour them.

Now see we the true vse of this Lesson: which is, that we must keepe our selues well from practyzing any annoy-
Esa.33.4.1. ance or deceyte. And why so? So little shall wee bee able to auaunce our selues by these wicked practizes or other vnlawfull meanes: that God shall put vs to confusion in the ende. VVee see then how wee ought to represso all our wicked lustes, that wee may deale vprightly and reasonably with our neighbours. On the other side, for as much as all noysomnesse and extortion displease God, let vs be well ware to behaue our selues vprightly: that is to say, let vs labour to do well, so as euery one of vs may not onely absteyne from all misdealing, but also consider that if God haue giuen vs any abilitie, we must profit one another, and cōmunicate mutually al together. And here-Psal.7.16 vnto lette vs also gather togither the sentences of holy Scripture which tende to the same ende. Cursed be thou that robbest, for thou shalt bee robbed when thy turne comes about. And afterwarde, Looke what measure men make, the same shall bee giuen them againe. VVhen we heare all these sayinges, let vs vnderstand that God doth euermore turne all the mischiefe that wicked men had deuised, vpon themselues. The Scripture speaking of the wicked persone, sayeth: he shall fall into the pit that he hath digged. And afterwarde, iudgement without mercie shall he haue which is merciless and vnpitifull. VVhen wee heare suche sentences, lette vs tremble and bee circumspect to walke so iustly and vprightly with our neighbours, as men may knowe that wee bee continually restrayned by the feare of God. Thus wee see what we haue to marke in effect in this sentence. But by the way, if a man be vexed after he haue done good, or if he be persecuted when he seeketh to liue in peace and cōcord with his neighbours: we must not conclude that he is of the companie of those which gather trouble and incomberance because they had sowed it. And why so? For we heare howe the holy Scripture sayeth the contrarie: namely that God doth sometimes suffer such things, too triе the pacientnesse of such as are his. VVee see the examples that are reported to vs in the holy Scripture. Dauid protesteth that he sought nothing but concorde, and Psal.120.6.7. yet notwithstanding, that he was troubled, not the lesse, but the more. Had he prouoked his enimies? had he giuen them cause to doo him displeasure? No: but he sayeth he was hated without cause: and herein he shewed himselfe a true member of Iesus Christe. Therefore wee must come backe to that which Sainct Peter sayeth, yea Psal.69.4. even alledging the Psalme. VVho so (sayeth he) is desirous to prosper, and to be blissted of God, and to leade a quiet life: let him seeke peace, and giue himselfe to wel-5. & 1.Pet.3.b.10. doing. Lo what God promiseth vs: that is to wit, an ordinarie blisssing, which is, that when we be giuen to well doing, he will guyde vs, and not suffer vs to bee racked out of measure. But what? Neuerthelesse if yee suffer for welswoing, thanke God, sayeth he. And whereas he sayeth, If yee seeke to be at peace with euery man, yee shall finde it: immediatly he addeth, that there shall alwaies bee so much vnrthankefulness in the world, as the wicked shall deale lewdly with thoes that haue sought nothing but their welfare. Then if wee see any man afflited: wee muste not by and by conclude, that he is so dealt with for sowing of iniquitie, or for sowing of trouble and incomberance: for wee knowe not what the cause is that God visiteth them in such wise. True it is, that if wee shall haue knownen one too haue bene a wicked persone, then is Gods iudgement visiblie and notorious vpon him. If a man haue bene a despicer of God, or such a one as hath ledde a lawlesse lyfe too the offence of others: wee cannot but iudge as the Scripture telleth vs. But if wee will judge at the firste dashe without further knowing of the partie, than onely by that wee see him scourged: and therewpon say he is cursed: Behold, this is a rashe and ouerpresumptuous iudgement, and suche a one as God findeth fault withall. Therefore we muste haue a stay of our selues, and proceede with suche mildenesse and aduisenesse, as I haue shewed heretofore. But after that Eliphias hath spoken so, he addeth that such maner of men, (that is to wit, as haue practyzed deceyte and violence to oppresse their neighbours, & haue put their wicked practizes in execution) shall be destroyed by the blaste of God, and by the breath of his mouthe. VVhereby he sheweth, that although menne ceasse too doo their dueties, yet God ceaseth not too doo his in punishing suche as are so giuen too outrage, crueltie, and annoyance. And that is a thing very true and well worthie too bee throughly marked by vs. And wherfore? what thing is it that hardeneth the wicked, and which causest them to go through with their vngaciousnesse? Bycause they beare themselues in hand, that no manne dare open his lippes against them, that men will stande in feare of them if they behaue themselues like wilde beastes, that euery man shoulde stande in such awe of them as all the world should quake at their onely looke, and that when they haue pilled and polled all that euer they can, noman can once speake against them, bicause they haue wherwith to currie fauour with such as may annoy them, according as wee see how thoes that haue have vsed suche wicked practyses, haue alwayes brybes at hand to stop the mouthes of them that may punishe them. For as much therefore as the wicked which give themselues to suche misdealing, hope to scape all punishment at mans hande: it is sayde, that they shall bee destroyed by the blast of God: that is to say, that although men omitte their duerie, so as there is no iustice executed, and that they which haue the vsing of the swoorde, holde their peace and play the dumbe Idolles, so as there is no man to maynteyne right and reason, but wickednesse is borne out: Yet will not God be idle in heauen. Then lette vs beare in minde, that if the whole worlde soothe vs vp in our naughtinesse: yet shall our cace bee neuer the better for all that, neyther shall wee haue gayned any thing by beeing so flattered in our vyses at mens handes: for we must come to our account before the heauenly iudge. Behold here a speciall poynt which wee haue to marke. And therefore let no man blindfolde his owne eyes to giue ouer himselfe too naughtinesse, when he seeth [he may saye,] VVell, if I plucke this 20 thing to my selfe, no man dare speake agaynst mee. Yea: but wee heare howe it is sayde here, that if men giue vs libertie to doo euill, is God idle in the meane while? Psal.ii.b.4. will he bolstre the euill? hath he not tolde vs that like as he is neere too suche as call vpon him: so also he beholdeth and marketh with his eyes, all the wicked and all those that doo men violence and extortio[n]? Then seeing the cace is so: let it prouoke vs too walke in feare, assuring our selues that wee must yelde our account before our iudge, and that we shall haue gayned nothing by the 30 fauour of men. Thus we see what we haue to marke. But it is a sentence of great weyght when it is sayde, that the wicked perishe by the blaste of God and by the breath of his mouth. For herein it is signified vnto vs, that God needeth not to make any greate preparacion, or to arme himselfe when he intendeth to represe such as are stubborne, or whiche deuour all things, or which give themselues too guylefulness too deceyue their neighbours, and specially which are full of crueltie and extorcion too deuour the whole worlde. God then needeth not to 40 leuie greate powers of men too strengthen himselfe with all: he needeth not to seeke meanes here and there how to ouerthrow them: let him but onely blowe vpon them, and behold all is dispatched. Nowe therefore we see that this maner of speaking, (wherein it is sayde that the wicked perish at the blast of God and at the breath of his mouth) importeth very much: like as Esay also speaking of men generally, setteth vs downe this selfsame blast, to shewe vs howe brittle our state is, and therefore that wee haue neede to be maynteyned by God, or els we shall be in hazard of perishing every minute of an houre: & furthermore to make vs to vnderstande that although the wicked haue their full scope in this worlde, that they triumph, and that they be both stoute and strong, so as they seeme invincible: yet there needeth no great force to destroy them, for the onely blast of God wil be inough to dispatch them quite and cleane. And now let vs come to that which is sayd concerning the kingdome of our Lord Iesus Christ. For this sayd power is referred to the breath of his mouth, and to his word: that is to wit, that the wicked shall be rooted out by it. Behold how Esay speaketh, Ezai.ii.b.4. 2.Theb.2. and Paule applieth the same texte to the latter comming of our Lord Iesus Christ. How then is it that Iesus Christ reigneth? It is when his enimies are confounded by his simple woerde, which is as a blaste, and he needeth no other thunderboltes to ouerthrow them. Sith the cace standeth so: let vs looke to our selues. For as oft as the Gospell is preached, God thundereth vpon all the despizers thereof, and vpon all such as become harde harted and stubborne against him. True it is that for a tyme wee perceyue not the force of this woerde in punishing the wicked. But yet in the ende they shall be fayne too feele, how it is not in vayne that God hath sayde by his Prophet, and confirmed it by his Apostle, that Iesus Christ shall destroy the wicked by the blast of his mouth and by the vertue of his word. And therfore (for feare of the said sentence) let vs submit our selues to the Gospell, that we feele not the force inclosed in the same to our owne confusion, but rather see the experience of it to our welfare. Thus muche concerning this texte. Afterward there is a similitude of Lyons, Lionesses, and Lionesses whelpes, howe all of them shall bee scattered and destroyed. There is no doubte but that Eliphassis meening here, is that God stretcheth out his strong arme against suche as are outrageous, and violent against men, and to be shorte, which resemble Lyons and wilde beastes. Here wee see what the effect is. True it is that wee see the meeke ones so afflicted, as it seemeth that God would breake them and brooze them in pieces, as wee haue example in Dauid. But yet for all that, this sentence ceaseth not to bee true, specially if wee consider Gods iudgements, howe he procedeth with them moste commonly. For as touching the punishments that God layeth vpon the worlde, there can no rule bee made of them without exception. VVhen it is sayde that suche as are mercylesse shall haue iudgement without mercie, James.2.c.13. wee muste not vnderstande it in all poyntes and in all caces according too the present course of things whiche wee see: neyther muste wee conclude that all suche as are cruelly persecuted, haue therefore bene cruell. VVee see what befell too our Lorde Iesus Christe who is the Head, the Mirrour, and the Patterne of all Gods children. VVee see also what hath befallne too moste of the faythfull. But (as I haue erst sayde) wee muste take it as an ordinarie iudgement. And that it is so, wee heare by the promisse on the contrarie parte. That is, Blis. Psal.37.b.11. sed are the meeke for they shall inherite the earthe. & Math.5. Iesus Christe telleth vs there, that if wee bee mylde a.5. and lousing, if wee liue gently among our neyghbours, and if wee indeuer too doo every man good: wee shall inioye the earth: that is too say, wee shall continue in quietnesse and wee shall not bee troubled. Yea: But (as I haue declared before) it is not mente hereby, that wee shall bee exempted from all inconueniences: onely God will cause that wee shall possesse the earth, vere-ly so farre forth as shall bee expedient for vs. Lo what wee haue to beare in remembrance. So then, lette vs 50 not thinke that thing straunge whiche is spoken in this texte, that is too wittie, that the Lyons teeth shall bee broken, and that the roring which they make shall bee stinched, that is too say, that God will stretche out his arme and his power to daunt such as are so full of pryde and fiercenesse, as they seeke nothing but to eate vp and too deuour all. God therefore sheweth his arme too bee strong, as wee ordinarily see. For wherevpon shal God shewe his iudgements more greate and notable, than vpon these Lyons that are like woodde beastes, set vpon the spoyle, yea and gluttred with mannes bloude. VVee see howe God sheweth himselfe a judge more nota-ble in that cace, than vpon the litle ones and vpon those that haue not exercised suche violence. And therefore lette vs learne too bee afaynde of Gods iudgements, and too preuent them: and as oft as he executeth suche things vpon those that are giuen too hurte their neyghbours, lette vs glorifie him, assuring our selues that hee wil iudge the whole worlde, and E.ij. haue haue pitie of such as are wrongfully vexed, so as in the end he wil bee their safety, and shewe by verye deede that he never forgeate them; no not euen then when they seemed to be vterly cast off. VVhat is to be done the we must looke vpon Gods iudgements in such wyse as we may perceyue them whē he sheweth them. For this world is as a Stage, whervpon God setteth vs forth manie examples, which we must turne to our owne behoues, that we may walk in his feare absteyning from all euill, and dooing good to our neyours, by walking soundly, and 10 vprightly among them in all respects. And if wee doo so: no doubt but wee shall feele the power of our God too maynteyne vs, notwithstanding that wee must bee fayne too walk through many miseries in this world, and (to be short) although we be as it were among a thousand deathes, and perceyue not as yet the help that he promiseth, yet shall wee not ceasse too be maynteyned by him after a woonderfull maner.

But let vs fall downe in the presence of our good God with acknowledgment of our faults, praying him to make vs perceyue them better than wee haue doone heretofore, and that in hauing an eye to his promises wherby he allureth vs so gently vntoo him, wee may warrant our selues, that if wee walk in his feare, he will never forget vs. And that although wee haue offended him so manie wayes, as wee bee well woorthie to bee shaken off by him, and that Satan also would make vs beleue, that wee shall no more bee receyued to mercie: yet notwithstanding he will cause vs too knowe that he hath pardoned vs, yea and that he is readye to receyue vs at all tymes and as often as we will come backe to him. And that wee may rest vpon his promises for the performance hereof, let vs pray him so to guyde vs by the same, as we may atteyne to the perfect fulnesse of his benefits which he hath promised vs, and which he hath prepared for vs in heauen. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only to vs, but also to all people and nations of the earth, &c.

The sixteenth Sermon, which is the second vpon the third Chapter.

12. But one thing hath bin brought to me in secret vvhersof myne eare hathe heard a little.
13. Among the thoughts of nyghtvisions vwhen men are asleepe.
14. Fearfulness and trembling came vpon mee, and made my bones afrayd.
15. The vvynd vvhisked hereand there, and made the heare of my bodie to stare.
16. There stode one, and I knevv not his face: there vvas an image before myne eyes, and I heard a voyce in silence.
17. Is man more ryghtouse than God? Is man more pure than his maker?
18. Behold, he syndeth no stedfastnesse in his seruants, And he hath put vanitie in his Angels.
19. How much more [then in] them that dvvell in houses of clay, vvhose foundacion is dust, vwhich are consumed and destroyed by the moth?

After that Eliphias hath shewed his reason, that Job had not serued God faithfully, and with a pure heart, at least wyse not of any affection that he had to doo so: heere he addeth Gods authoritie, to shewe that Job neither can nor ought by any means to replie, that he should not be condemned of God by good right. Some men thinke that Eliphias boastereth here of the hauing of some revelation, which he neverthelesse had not. But if al be wel considered: there is no dout, but that his pretending that God had reveled such a matter vnto hym, is a matter of certaintie. For wee must holde this for a principle, that these generall sentences whiche he alledged are good, but yet ill applyed. And we muste 50 not thinke it strange, that God should inspire him after that maner. For nowe adays we be taught after an other fashion than were the fathers of that age. God speakest vnto vs. But howe? It is in suche wyse, as that the Prophets are the instrumentes of the holie Ghoste, and wee haue the gospell wherin God sheweth himselfe familiarily.

Then let vs looke vpon the maner of speaking which God vseth now adayes in his Church: which is, that he hath disclosed his whole will vnto vs in his holie scriptures. In tymes past God opened himselfe to such as it pleased him to shewe that speciall fauour. And how? By visions, as the holie Scripture witnesseth. So then let vs assure our selues that Eliphias was an excellent man: and therfore we must not thinke it strange, that God should appeere vnto him in vision by night, and that he should knowe that thing whiche the Scripture teacheth vs this daye. Then is not the pretending of this matter a false brag. But Eliphias doth out of dout in this case misapply that thing to an euill purpose in the person of Job, which had bene reveled vnto him for an other ende and vse. For we see that God sheweth him, that men oughte too walke in lowlynesse.

Beholde, whervnto this vision which was giuen him tendeth: that is to wit, that menne shoulde not stande in their owne conceyte, nor bee puffte vp in pryd, too thinke themselues ryghtuous or of great woorthinesse: but that they shoulde vnderstande, that when they come to shewe themselues before God, there is nothing but sinne in them, by reason whereof they must needs bee confounded, and therfore must haue an eye to their corruptions and bee sorie for the same. Eliphias had receyued suche maner of doctrine as this, whiche was good. But now he layeth al the burthen vpon Job, and thinketh himselfe to haue woonne his spurres by ouercharging him that had serued God faithfully. VVe see then, that for the generall case, Eliphias boasteth not in wayne, that he had bin taught of God. But he playeth the ill scholer in this poynt, that he taketh no heede too himself, but intendeth too oppresse Job contrarie too the truthe.

Now let vs come too lay foorth the whole matter particularly. He sayeth, That a thing was brought to him in secrete, and that his eare had bearde a little of it: Yea (sayeth he) in a vision by night, that I hearde a blast which whiskest hitther and thither, and at the laste there was a voyce, whiche spake to mee in silence. True it is that he addeth, that there was also an Image: and wheras he sayeth he knew not what it was, sauing that he was abashed euen that he shudderred all his bodie ouer, and that the heares of his flesh flood staring vp for feare and astonishment, and that he was as in a traunce: all this tendeth to shewe, that that he reporteth no dreames here, but that it is the very testimonie of God whiche muste bee receiued with au-

Gen. 15.c.12. thoritie. And hereby wee see that in all the visions & 28.d.17. which the auncient fathers had, God did set certeine

Act. 7. d. 31. tokens to amaze them, and to put them in some terrour

32. and feare which serued to authorize his woord, too the Esa. 6. b.5. end it should bee receyued the better. For wee see how men are not so well inclyned too heare God speake as they ought too bee, except he make them too feele his Maiestie. If a man of some great estate speake vntoo vs, it is a wonder too see how wee bee more earnest too hearken vntoo him, than wee bee too heare or reade the holie scripture. VVherof cometh this, but of that wee be carnall and beastly? Now too remedie such faultinesse, it hath pleased God too giue always some tokens of his Maiestie, too the intent that his woord myght bee recey-ued, and that men should take them to bee of the greater credit and authoritie. Also when mention is made of any visions in the holie scripture, it is always sayd that the holie fathers haue bin striken in some feare, and not without cause for so it behoed them too bee prepared to humilitie, that they myght obey God simply. There is yet another reason; which is, that although we seeme to be well minded to heare God, yet are we not of capacitie to receyue that which he telleth vs, except our flesh bee tamed. For there is an inward prude in vs which puffeth vs vp after such a sort, that we knowe not what is good & conuenient for vs, vntill such tyme as God haue striken vs downe. Thus wee see wherfore God never appeared vntoo men, but he gaue them some feeling of feare, namely to the end they should not like to well of theselues, nor stand too much vpon their owne reputation, nor trust too much too their owne strength. Now then wee perceiue whervnto the long description that Eliphias ma-keth here, is referred. But he saith it is a secret matter, and whereof he had had but small intelligence. True it is that at the first blushe it may seeme a trifling, whē he calleth it a secrete, that God should at leastwise be as righteouse as men, or (as hee concludeth in the ende) that men haue not regarded to be so righteous as he. Euer man confesseth this in wordes: and not so much as the very heathen haue euer gaynsayd it. VVhat mysterie then or what Secret is there in this matter? Let vs assure our selues it is more than necessarie: for although me agree in this point, that there is none ryghtuous but onely God, and that we bee full of infirmitie in comparison of him: yet notwithstanding wee acknowledge it not suffisiently, neither is it suffisiently imprinted in vs: for were wee fully and throughly persuaded of Gods ryghtuousenesse, and of our owne naughtiness: it is certeine that wee should not doubt as we commonly doo, there should no grudgings bee hearde in our mouthes, there should bee no gaynsaying nor replying in our harts, wee should bee altoogither quiet, and whensoeuer it should please God too put vs too shame, wee would confess he had good right so to do. But now the cace standeth so, as ye shall see me kicke against God assoone as he toucheth them: nay, if he spare their sinnes and do but warne them of them, they wil not come to any true acknowledgement of them.

And so a man may perceyue hereby, that all men are puffed vp with presumptuousenesse, and knowe not what

Gods ryghtuousenesse is, that they might humble theselues vnder it. And therfore it is not without cause that

Eliphias termeth it here a secrete, when God sheweth him that he himself only is ryghtuous, that all men ought to be ashamed of their wants, and knowledge theselues to be wretched. And after the same maner also

Rom. 3.c.21. doth Sainct Paule take it, when he telleth the Romanes how it was an vnknowne and secrete thing vntoo men, that God purposed too vtter foorth his ryghtuousenesse by Iesu Christ, to the end that all the world should acknowledge theselues indettē vntoo God. True it is that a man cannot say, there is anye difficultie herein:

but yet (as I haue shewed afore) men attribute I wote not what too theselues, and they cannot fynd in their hartes too vncace theselues out of the sayde vayne ouer-stateliness: in so much that in their owne opinion, they thinke theselues able to worke wonders by their free will. Herepon they beare theselues in hande, that they shall purchase rewarde at Gods hande. But contrariwyse God will bee knownen to be onely righteous, and that there is nothing but wickednesse to be founde in men. Thus much concerning this poynt. But Eliphias in saying that he herde a little of the sayde woerde, sheweth wel: that he exalted not himselfe to farre. For he taketh not vpon him a perfection of wisedome, to say that nothing had escaped him, and that he had comprehended every whit of it to the vttermoste: but he sayth he had some taste of the saide doctrine of God, and that he had conceyued some part of it. VVee see then that here he speaketh modestly: declaring that he is not as an Angell of heauen, so as he could behold Gods glorie in full sight:

but that according to mans rudenesse, he had bene taught to know how to communicate that thing vnto his neigh-ours, which he had receyued of God. Lo what he ment to say in effect. And hereby we be admonished, that how familiarly so euer God shewe himselfe vnto vs: it is a great matter that wee [be admitted to] knowe things in part, and we must not thinke that we ca haue any so perfect vnderstanding, as there may be no lacke in it. For they that thinke so of theselues, beguile theselues, and thereby shet theselues out of the gate that was open for them to come in at afore. And so let vs marke well, that there is much done for vs, when wee haue any little taste, or any enterancē into the knowledge of Gods truth. If this bee ment of the Prophets and teachers whom God hath chosen and ordeyned, and vnto whom he hath gi-uen most excellent giftes, (as wee see here an example in Eliphias:) what shall be sayd of vs? for he is set before vs, not as one of the simple and contōn sort of people: but as one to whom God himselfe hath appeared: and yet he telleth vs he heard but a little. Behold then what we haue to marke in the firste place. Truly were wee throughly persuaded of this, there should no suche ouerweching be seene in our talke. For every of vs beares himselfe in hande, that he is ignorant in nothing: and they that are least exercysed in the holy Scriptures, will needes haue 50 this reputation of theselues, that they be so subtle and sharpwitted, as they speake nothing but good reason, as though the holy Ghost were in their sleeue. And whence cometh such pride, but that they which are not yet out of their apcēe, imagine theselues to vnderstaad all things? And furthermore this pride is accompanied with carelesnesse:

for the most part passe not to profite theselues. And why so? They weene they be come to the perfection of all knowledge: and many men when they haue heard a two or three woordes of the Gospell, yee shall see them so ful 60 of it, as they can be. They passe not for learning of any more knowledge: no, they will needes teach other men:

to be shorte, they be more than Doctours. But God laugheth such presumption to skorne. For the little that they might haue receyued must be takē from them, & so shal they go away empty, according to that which is written in the song of the virgin Marie: which is that such as

Luke 1.c.13. are full of winde, esteeming theselues riche, and standing vpon their reputatiō: haue bene starued for hunger. Then let vs learne to prayse God in such wise for that which he hath giuen vs, and so to know that we haue neede to proceede dayly more and more, as wee may haue an earnest desire too profite more and more, and come too it with all modestie. And the more familiarly that wee be taught concerning God and his worde, so much the more must we be as little scholers, that we steppe not to it with such pride as to thinke that all is in our owne brayne, but that we come to it according to our abiutie, as I haue sayd. For there muste be none that hath the perfection of all wisedome, saue Iesus Christ, to the intent that he may deale it to euery man in measure and certaine portion. Furthermore let vs marke well the circumstance of this place. For it treateth of Gods righþousnesse wherof we haue spoken, and of our knowing how we be full of sinnes & corruptiōs, to the end we may apply our whole studie to the same doctrine, assuring our selues well, that we shall never bring it throughly to passe. VVherefore it behoueth vs to minde it so much the more, and to applie our whole lyfe therewith. For had it bene throughly knownen, men had not falne into so horrible darknesse in the papacie. But what? There it seemeth to them to be a superfluous thing to treate of free iustification by fayth: they counte that as a madde doctrine, and skoffe at vs for stāding so much vpon it. Yea: but here it is shewed vs, that euen those which haue had visions from heauen, haue had much a do to vnderstand a little of such secrecie. So then, let vs vnderstand, that it behoueth vs to be diligent in this article: for when we haue imployed all our wittes about it, yet shall we not comprehend the hundredth parte of that which is in it. And for proofe hereof, is not Gods righþousnesse an infinite thing? And are not our corruptiōs, as a Sea, or as a bottomlesse pitte? Therefore we must not maruell at Eliphas for telling vs here that he had but a small taste of this article. But let vs nowe come to that which he addeth, which is, That a breath (or winde) went to and fro, so as his bodie quaked and shuddered, and his beare stooode vp stiffe through out all his bodie: and that there appeared an image vnto him, which he knew not, and that at the ende he heard a voyce in silence. All this was done to the ende which I haue touched: that is to wit, to make Eliphas readie to receyue that which God purposed to say to him, and to prepare him in such wise, as he might vnderstand how it was God that spake, to the ende that his doctrine might be of authoritie: and furthermore that Eliphas might be humbled, so as he might no more be hoysed vp with presumption, according as men comonly chalenge to themselues I wote not what. It behoued Eliphas to be altogether abased, to the end he might know his owne want, and give the glorie vnto God. True it is that in these dayes we haue no such visions as they had in times past. But it behoueth vs to knowe, that whereas God gaue such signes to the auncient Fathers, they must serue for vs also at this day. And therfore when we reade the holie Scripture, or come to a sermon: we muste be touched with the Maiestie of God, to yelde him reverence, so as we defile not his holy truth by esteeming it as if a man should tell vs some merie conceyted tale, but rather thinke thus: Seing that our maker speaketh vnto vs, it behoueth all knees to bowe before him, and all men ought to quake at that which he sayeth. Lo what we haue to marke in this sentence. And morcouver, wee knowe,

Exod. 19. c. that God in publishing his lawe, shewed tokens to affray 16. & 20. c. all such as he ment to teache at that time: and therewpon 18. 19. the people sayd: Let vs not come neere the mountayne, Heb. 12. c. 18 for wee shall all die if God speake vnto vs: Thus yee 19. see how it was Gods will to authoryze his lawe in such wise, as the people were vtterly dismayed by reason of the grete number of miracles that he shewed. And was this done for their sakes onely which were of that time? No, but God ment to giue vs also knowledge of his power which is permanent vnto the worldes end. The Gospell hath had yet greater prooef of maiestic. So then, there is nothing that eyther can or ought to hinder vs frō receyuing of the Gospell, except our owne vnthankfulnesse and vngraciousnesse put out our eyes. Although wee can not see all the wonders that God hath shewed: 10 yet muste wee holde our selues contented in that God teacheth vs by his woerde, without any longing for new visions, as many wandring spirites doo, which woulde that the Angels shoulde come downe from heauen, and bring them some newe reuelations. But herein they doo God great wrong, for that they content not themselues in that God hath shewed himself so familiarly vnto vs. For seeing that wee haue the holy Scripture, it is certayne that wee cannot want any thing. And aboue all thinges, in this brightness of the Gospell wee haue a perfection of wisedome, as Sainet Paule sheweth. Sith the case standeth so: they that are tickled with a fonde desire to haue some visions, doo well bewray, that they neuer knewe what the holy Scripture is. Then let vs content vs with that which it hath pleased God to disclose vnto vs, as well by his Prophetes, as by his sonne our Lorde Iesus Christe, assuring our selues, that there he maketh vs a finall conclusion without any further passing. And hereby wee see whereto they are come, that haue such a desire to raunge abrode, and to leape beyonde their boundes. Here wee see from whence came the horrible confusion that is in the Popedom: here wee see wherevpon the Pope groundeth all his doctrine. For he sayeth that the Apostles haue not declared all that is for the profit of the Churche, and that the holy Ghost is come too make men to frame new articles, and to make menne to reste themselues vpon holy Councils. For asmuch then as the Pope and all his hangers on, haue not hold themselues to the purenesse of the holy Scripture: God hath vndoubtedly blinded them in their owne folies, and we see some among them to be so dull and brutishe, and finally which haue bene growen so farre out of kinde, as to worshipe stones and stockes of timber, and that thinges are so farre out of square, that euen little babes might well bee ashamed of them. And this commeth of that Diuelish curiositie, that they bee not contented to be taught simply by the holy Scripture. Beholde also wherevpon the Religion of the Turkes is founded. Mahomet hath reported himselfe to bee the partie, that should bring the full Reuelation ouer and besides the Gospell. And by meanes therof, they be vtterly become brute beastes. And at this day wee see, that those poore beastes buzie their heades about as doltish and vnsensible thinges, as any can bee. But it is the iuste vengeance of God, who hath giuen them ouer to a wilfull stubborne mynde. As much hath bene done to other fantasticall persones (and specially of our dayes) whiche haue troubled the Churche, and woulde needes haue their visions. And it was one of the Articles of that cursed creature that was burnt. Hee mice- neth Seruet yet, but that he was to come. That wicked creature the Spani- dishonored God, as though the Fathers of olde time arde. had had but a shadow of the holy Ghoste, and as though that after he had once shedde out himselfe visibly vpon the Apostles, he had retyred againe incontinently, in suche sorte as the Churche hath bene destitute of the holy Ghoste. Beholde what he did sette downe: and as in respect of himselfe, he would haue made himselfe a Mahomet, to haue the holy Ghost at his comandement.

But a man may see how the deuill had caried him away : & it was requisite that God should bring some such men to that poynt, to the end we might the more abhorre the. But for our part, let vs follow the order that I haue tolde alreadie : that is to wit, let vs bee taught according to the rule that God hath ordeyned , and let vs not be so headie as to binde God to agree to oure desires , nor to our fashions : but let vs content vs with the holy Scripture, seeing that God hath inclosed vs within the bounds thereof. Furthermore as touching that Eliphias sayeth, That hee beard the voyce in silence : It is too shewe , that God had prepared him in such wise , as hee bare away that which was spoken vnto him. For a man that is rauished as it were in a traunce, may well heare a thing , and yet haue no remembrance of it when he commeth againe to himselfe : and so there are many , who when they come too sermons, doo heare well the matter that is treated of, but it settleth not in them, insomuch that if one aske them what was treated of, they cannot tell him one worde. And why so? for (as the prouerbe sayth) their wittes were a woolgathering : one of them muzed on this thing , and another on that : they were houering in the aire, and they were not setled to giue eare vnto God. For all such vaine fancies as we conceyue, and as come in our mindes , are as many turmoyles to hinder vs from giuing such eare and audience vnto God, as we ought to give . So then, those that wander in their owne imaginacions , cannot comprehend these things , to say , I see a lesson whiche ought to bee common among vs , and wee must bee fully settled in it by sayth. For this cause Eliphias sayth, that this voyce came to him in silence or stilnesse. For before that God had so disposed him, he presupposed that it stooode him on hande to give eare , and to bee attentiu to that which should bee spoken vnto him . And this is it that I haue touched alreadie: namely that when we come to heare Gods woerde, wee must not haue our wits rouing here and there after that maner : but we must holde them short, to giue diligent hearing vnto God, so as our fleshely affections and vanities carie vs not vnto wickednesse, and turne vs not hither and thither out of the way. And to be short, wee must be quiet to heare all that God will haue sayde, to the ende that the same may be rightly vnderstoode of vs. VVe see then what wee haue to gather vpon this sentence. And nowe let vs come to the doctrine that Eliphias handleth heere. Shall man be righteous than God? and shall man be more righteous than his mas- ker? Beholde he findeþ no stedfastnesse (or truth) in his seruants, he bath iudged that there is follie (or vanitie) in his angelles. And boþe shall they do then which drell in houses of Clay ? In the first place heere Eliphias setteþ downe the sentence, and as it were the Theme that hee groundeth himselfe vpon : that is to wit , that it is an vreasonablenesse in men, to desire to glorifie themselues in comparison of their maker. Must not men needs bee destitute of wit and reason , when they will so glorifie themselues in comparing themselues with God? Lo here his Theme or grounde. And forasmuch as men cannot easily abyde to haue their owne authoritie condemned : Beholde here the reason whiche hee addeth to confirme his doctrine, which is, that if God shoulde examine his Aungels, hee should finde fault in them, and he should not finde them stedfast : but they should perceiue themselues to be vaine and weake creatures. Now if the Aungels be such: what shall become of men, which dwell in houses of Clay ? For what is our bodie? what foundation hath it? what firmenesse souer seemeth too be in it: there needs but one little shoure of raine too washe it quite away. Then sith the case standeth so : let vs now assure our selues, that we cannot stande in Gods presence, if wee come thither presuming to bring any righteousnesse of our owne, considering that the verye Aungels are not able to doo that. Thus we see in effect what is sayde vnto vs heere. But we haue too consider what is ment by the mention that is made here of Aungels . Some imagining it to be against reason that God should not finde his Aungels throughly righteous : haue concluded , that it is not ment here concerning those Angelles that continued in their obedience to God , but of those that are faine and become renegates. For the Deuils were once Gods Aungels, But they kept not the state wherein God had created them, but fell an horrible fall, insomuch that they are faine to bee the mirours of damnation. VVe see then after what manner diuers haue expounded this text : namely, that seeing there was no stedfastnesse in these Angels which fell: what is to bee looked for in men whose foundation is of Clay &c. But we must not seke out forced expositions to magnifie the Angels. For this place speaketh of Gods seruaunts, & the tytle is honorable. Eliphias would not haue sayd, God bath not found stedfastnesse in his seruants, but he would haue sayd, Beholde the Deuils which were heretofore appoynted to the seruice of God : But nowe they be faine after such an horrible fashion , that by their fall all things are brought into a wauering, insomuch that euē mankind also is come to like perdition , and is drawne into the selfe same decay. Eliphias woulde haue spoken so : but he sayth, God found no truth in his Aungelles : he founde follie or vanitie : He sayth not that he founde Rebellion or backsliding, but he sayth onely vanitie, which is a greater maner of speeche . So then when all is well considered, no doubt but Eliphias speaketh heere, of the Aungelles that serue God, and giue themselues wholly therunto. And what meaneth he then by saying that there was no stedfastnesse, but rather vanitie and vnstedfastnesse in them ? 1.Tim.d.16. VVhen Sainct Paule sayth that there is none Immortall but onely God: it is certaine that hee excludeth all creatures. And yet we know that the Aungels are immortall spirites. For God hath created them of purpose, that they should not any more returne to nothing , no more than the soule of man may at any time die . Howe then shall we make these sentences agree , that the Aungelles are created to liue euerlastingly : and that there is none immortall but onely God? The solution is verie easie. For the Aungels are immortall, because they bee sustayned by power from aboue, and bycause God mainteyneth them, who beeing the immortall nature it selfe and the verie fountaine of life, is in them, as it is sayde in the Psalme. Psa.36.c.10 O Lorde, the fountaine of lyfe dwelleth in thee , and in thy light shall we see light. Then seeing there is no life but in God onely, and yet notwithstanding the same is no hinderance to the spredding of life into all creatures, because it proceedeth of his grace : wee perceyue howe the Aungelles are immortall, and yet haue no stedfastnesse in themselues, but haue need of God to strengthen them by his meere goodnessse. VVithout this, the thing would happen vnto them which is spoken in the hundred and fourth Psalme, which sayth, when thou withdrawest thy spirite, all decayeth. VVhat is it then that giueth liuelinessse to the Aungelles of heauen, but the spirit of God? And so wee see they haue not that thing of themselues, which is giuen them of God, neither could they inioy it for euer, if GOD shoulde not continue the sayde grace which he hath put into them. And like as wee speake of life, so must we speake of righteousnesse also. The Aungels are not stedfast furtherfoorth than GOD holdeth them vp by his hande. Rightly are they called Principalities and powers : but that is because God executeth his his power by them and guideth them. To bee short, the Angels haue nothing in theselues whereof to make their boast. For all the power and stedfastnesse whiche they haue, they holde it of God, and are so much the more indeitd to him for it. As touching that which followeth, namely, that God findeth or putteth (for the Hebrew word importeth that God putteth) follie or vanitie: it implyeth not that the vanitie which is in the Angels commeth of God: but the meening of it is, that he putteth it to the [or chargeth them with it] by his iudgement: that is to say, that as a judge hee giueth sentence that there is folly and vanitie, (that is to say, that there is faultinesse) in the Angels, yea & that they coulde not stande before him, if hee would deale rigorously with them. Verily this seemeth straige to such as are not exercised in the holy scripture. But if wee wist what the righteousnesse of God is: wee should not marueyle that the Angels themselues are foud to bee faultie, if he should compare them with himselfe. For we must alwayes come backe to this poynt, that the good things that are in all creatures, are small in estimation of that which is in God which is vtterly infinite. Therefore we must alwayes put a difference betwene the one & the other. VVe see the Angels haue wonderfull power & vertues, specially in respect of vs: for notwithstanding that the Angels abide in the degree of creatures, yet may wee well gloriſe them. But when wee come to God: the greatnessſe of him muſt swallow vp all the rest, in likewise as wee ſee how the Sunne darkneth all the Starres of the Skie. And what is the Sunne? He is a planet as well as the rest: and yet neuertheleſſe bycause God hath graunted that creature to haue more brightnesſe than the other Starres: all of them muſt needs bee ouerſhadowed, ſo as no Starre can bee perceyued when the Sunne hath his full power. And what will be done then, when God himſelfe commeth foorth? As the Prophete Eſay ſayth, there ſhall bee neither Sunne nor Moone any more, but the brightnesſe of God ſhall bee ſuch, as it ſhall be ſeen and knowne ouer all. VVhen Eſay ſpeaketh of Gods kingdome, he ſheweth that all things muſt be done away, and nothing bee glorified but onely God. Seeing it is ſo, let vs reſerue it alſo to that which is ſpoken heere: that is to wit, that God findeth lacke in his Angels, although they be his ſeruants. And yet this is no let, but that the ſeruice which the Angels do vnto God, is perfect, according to the perfection that can be in creatures: likewiſe as in that respect, when in praying wee desire God that his will may be done on earth as it is in heauen, we witneſſe that there is no vntowardnesſe in the obedience which the Angels yeeld vnto him, but that he reigneth in them after ſuch a peaceable maner, as they bee wholly conſirmable to his will. But wee muſt alwayes bear in minde that which I haue touched: that as long as we go no further but to the degree and ſtate of creatures: there ſhall be a perfection in the Angels, verily ſuch perfection as may in creatures. But come we once vnto God: the ſayd perfection is as it were swallowed vp, like as the Starres appeere not any more when the Sunne giues his light. Furthermore it behoueth vs to marke well howe S. Paule ſayth, that Iefus Christ is come too gather togither the things that are in heauen and earth. And therby he ſheweth, that the Angels haue their stedfastnesſe in the grace of our Lorde Iefus Christ, forſomuch as he is the mediator betwene God & his creatures. True it is that Iefus Christ redemeſ not the Angels, for they needed not to be rauſomed from death whervnto they were not yet falne: but yet was he theyr mediator. And howſo: to the intent to ioyne the vnto god in all perfection, and afterward to mainteyne them by his grace, that they may be preſered frō falling. Now ſeeing that God findeth faultinesſe in his Angels: that is to ſay, that they haue no stedfastnesſe in them further thā they be mainteyned from aboue: what is to be thought of vs? VVe muſt be fain to come to that which Eliphas addeth. Are men of ſuch glorie, yea or of ſuch power as the Angels of heauen? Let their caſe be conſidered. For howe were we created? we dwell in corruptible and transitorie lodgings. Brag wee as muſch as we liſt, yet is there nothing but vanitie in vs: that is to ſay, our bodies are but dust and poulder, and all muſt go into corruption. Then ſeeing that wee dwell in houles of Clay: will wee bee excellenter than thoſe that dwell in the glorie of God, and beholde his face alreadie? The Angelles being not ſubiect to any of the chaunges & turnings of this world, dwell alreadie in the heauenly immortalitie. And we find by expeſience, that our life is no better than a blaſt, and we looke to be diſpatched out of this worlde every minute of an hour. Sith the caſe standeth ſo: how commes it to paſe that we preſume ſo of our ſelues? To be ſhort, there is no stedfastnesſe in men, which doth not ſlip and vaniſhe away by and by. Then if the caſe ſtand betweene God and vs, let vs leaue to haue good regarde too the one ſide, that is to wit vnto God. True it is that we vnderſtand not his mightie power as apperteyneth: but the Angels (which are now muſch neerer to him than we bee) and which beholde his face) haue no ſuch perfection but that ſome fault may be found in them, if hee liſt to examine them with rigor. VVhat ſhall become of vs then, if we conſider our owne weaknesſe? what ſhall become of our vertues, if we would compare them with the Angels which are ſo noble and excellent creatures? Thus we ſee what we haue to remember in this ſentence. For the reſidue cannot be declared at this preſent.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him ſo to dispose vs to the receiuing of his worde, as wee may not come to it heedleſly, as the things that we heare, may run in at the one eare and out at the other, but that wee may beare them away, and imprint the throughly in our harts, to make vs chaunge our wicked affectiōs, & to renounce our ſelues: that being quite ridde of all vaine truſt in our ſelues, wee may deſire nothing but to worship the great God, and to yeeld him the praife that he deſerueth, ſpecially for the inestimable grace that he giueth vs in our lord Iefus Christ, and for the loue that hee hath ſhewed vs in him, in that he ſpared him not, but deliuereſ him to death for vs: and that he may make vs ſo too feele the frute and effectualnesſe which hee hath purcaſed vs by his death and paſſion, as in the ende we maye bee receyued as righteous and giltleſſe by God his father. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely vnto vs, but alſo. &c.

The ſeuenteenth Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the fourth Chapter, and the firſt vpon the fifth Chapter.

This Sermon conteyneth ſtill the expositiō of the .xvij. and .xix. verſes of the fourth Chapter, and then as followeth.

20. From

20. From Morning to Euening they bee destroyed, and bicause no man setteth his minde vpon it, they perish for euer.
 21. Doth not their excellencie go avvay with them ? they shall perishe, [but]not in vvisedome.

1. CAll novv if there be any to aunsvvere thee, and consider any one of the Sainctes.
 2. Doubtlesse, Anger sleaeth the foole, and enuie killeth the vvitlesse person.

E haue seene already whervnto this talke tendeth: that is to wit, to humble men, bicause they be farre from the perfection of the Angels . And sith the case standeth so, that if God listed to iudge his angels with rigor, he should find fault ynoch in the : what then shold become of them which are so vnable to say any thing for themselues, as they haue nothing in the but vanitie? Neuerthelesse it might seeme, that that which is rehersed heere, was not sufficient to proue the intent of Eliphias . For albeit that men bee feeble , and albeit that their lyfe be nothing : yet doth it not therefore followe, that they be eyther sinners or faultie before God . For they be seueral things to say, our life is transitorie, and vanishest away euery minute of an houre, and to saye that God may condemne vs . But if all things be well considered : the reasons that are heere alleaged, are fitte for the purpose . For the case standeth not simplie vpon mens frailtie as in respect of their bodies: but vpon their dwelling here in this corruptible flesh , and that they bee so earthly as they thinke not on themselues , although they haue death continually before their eies. Also wee must marke the comparison in such maner and forme as it is set downe heere, betweene the Angels and mortall men . VVe see the Angels are neere vnto God, and behold his glorie, and are wholy giuen to his seruice : and yet for all that, there is no stedfastnesse in them , further than they be vphild by the grace of God : They might fade and vanish awaye of themselues, were it not that God of hys meere goodnesse mainteyned them . But now let vs come to men . VVhere dwell they ? They bee farre ynoch off from the sayd heauenly glorie, they are here in the sayde transitorie lodging : for what else are our bodies ? Then are we (to speake properly) in our graues . For our bodies are prisons, as darke to hinder vs from the beholding of God, as if we were alreadie vnder the earth . VVhat is our foundation ? dust : and yet wee consider our selues neuer the more , how that we continually go into decay, and that death threatneth vs incessantly: we consider not this a whitte . Therefore wee neede not too woonder though there be nothing else but infirmitie in men, seeing that the Angels which are so neere vnto God, haue not so exquisite a perfection , but that God may condemne them if hee list to enter into iudgement with them . Now we see that the argumēt which Eliphias vseth heere, is verily fit and agreeing to his purpose . But now remayneth to wey the words that are touched here, that we may aduantage our selues by them . Truely when any man speaketh to vs of the shortnesse of our life, we thinke it to be but a needlesse talk : for who is he that knowes it not? But it is not for nought that God speaketh so oft of it, and putteth vs in remembrance of it . For had we throughly conceyted what our life is : it is certaine , that first wee woulde not bee so worldly as wee bee , neither woulde oure thoughts bee so blockish as they bee : And secondly wee would haue regarde of the heauenly kingdome, and rest our selues wholly therupon . But we despise the heauenly life and are so intangled heere, as we cannot bee drawne hence . It foloweth then that none of vs knowe what the thing is which euery of vs confesseth : that is to say, that our life is but as a shadow that passeth away, & that a man is but like a floure, or a greene herbe, which incontinently is cut downe and withereth . To be short, although the proverbs that import the ouershortnesse of this worldly life haue alwayes bene rife ynoch, & yet still are : yet do they not peerce to the harts of vs . And here we see why we be warned to thinke vpon it the better . Surely if wee could recken our yeares as Moyses speaketh of them in the xc. Psalme : certesse wee should bee taught as well to Psa.90.d.12 thinke vpon death, as also to tend to the marke that God calleth vs to . But what ? we wote not how to count them vpon our fingers . For beholde our childhōd is such, that they which are in it , differ little or nothing from brute beastes, sauing that there is more incombrance and trouble with them : but as for vnderstanding or reason, there is small or none in little ones . And certes, draw we once neere mans estate, our lustes are so ouerboylng , as wee cannot bee bridlede . Are wee come to mans estate ? It passeth away out of hande : and anon olde age attacheth vs, so as there remayneth nothing to vs, but to bee wearie of our life, and to put other folkes to trouble & paine . Nowe then if wee wist howe to reckon the race of our life vpon our fingers : certeynly we should not bee such dullards as wee bee . And therefore let vs not thinke wee lose our time, when we set our mindes vpon this lesson : that is to wit, to knowe that our life is nothing, and that a hundred thousande deathes manace vs in the cheefe lustinesse that we haue heere bylowe , when any of our kinsfolke or friendes depart , or if we see any Corse go to buriall : wee haue the witte to say , And what is mans life ? If there bee anie great death in a Towne or in a Countrey, wee bee yet more moued . But all this is forgotten with vs by and by . Therefore haue wee neede to exercise our selues in this doctrine all the tyme of oure life . And thus wee see why the Scripture speaketh so vnto vs . As concerning the present text, it is sayd first of all, That men dwell in houses of Clay, and that theyr foundation is but dust . That is to say, if we consider this present life by it selfe , wherein consisteth it ? In beeing inclosed within lodgings that tende but to corruption . And what else are those but oure bodies ? Beholde then what our stedfastnesse is : that is to wit , that every whit of it goeth incontinently vnto dust, and we be consumed either by woormes or by wīnde : that is to say , wee bee dispatched as soone as a worme which is but a thing of nought, and which we scarce esteeme as a living creature: and yet are we consumed sooner than it . Thus wee see what is sayde vnto vs in the first place . Afterwarde Eliphias addeth : That men perishe and are consumed from morning vnto the euening . Some expound this, as though it were ment that men perishe in small time : and that is verie true . But hecrewithall there is yet more: that is to witte , that wee passe not a minute of oure lyfe, but it is as it were in approaching vntoo death . If wee consider it well, when a man ryseth in the Morning , hee is sure hee shall not steppe foorth one pace, hee is sure hee shall not take hys repaste, hee is sure hee shall not turne about his hande, but hee shall still wex elder and elder, and his life euer shortneth . Then

Then must wee consider euen by eye sight, that our lyfe fleeteth and flydeth away from vs. Thus wee see what is ment by beeing consumed from Morning to Euening. And it is sayd afterward, that men perish for euer, because no man thinkes vpon it. VVee must treate of these two poyntes, that we may profite our selues by this doctrine. The one poynt is, that whatsoeuer wee doo, we should alwayes haue death before our eyes, and bee prouoked to thinke vpon it. This (as I haue sayde) is well knowne among men: the verie Heathen had skill to say so. But what for that? Euerie man can playe the Doctor in teaching other men that, which is conteyned heere, and yet in the meane while there is neuer a good scholler of vs all in this behalfe. For there is not any man which sheweth by his doings, that euer he knewe what it is to bee consumed from Morning to Euening: that is to wit, that all his lustinesse is but feblenesse, and that there is no stedfastnesse in vs, to holde our selues in one continual state: but that we alwayes hafte toward death, and death towardes vs, so as we must needs come thither at length. Verely if wee had no more but this single doctrine alone: It woulde stande vs in no steade, but to make vs storne and torment our selues: lyke as when the Paynims knewe that our life was so flightfull, they concluded therupon, that it was best neuer too bee borne, and that the sooner wee dyed the better it was for vs. Lo howe the Paynims rejected the grace of God, because they knewe not the honour that hee doth vs when he sendeth vs intoo this worlde, euen to shewe himselfe a father towardes vs. For in as much as wee bee reasonable creatures, and haue the Image of God printed in our nature: wee haue a recorde, that he holdeth vs heere as his children. And to dispize such a grace, and to say, it had beeene better for vs neuer too haue beeene created: is it not apparent blasphemie? So then it is not ynoch enough for vs to knowe, that so long as wee bee in this worlde, wee bee consumed euerie minute of an houre: But we must come to the seconde poynt: that is too witte, that when wee haue well behilde howe brittle our lyfe is: wee must also marke how wee bee repayred againe by Gods grace, and specially howe wee bee susteyned and vphilde by the same: according also as these twoo poyntes are matched together in the hundred and fourth Psalme. For it is sayde there, that as soone as G O D withdraweth his spirite and woorking, all goeth too decay. Yea: but the Prophete addeth also, that if God spred foorth hys power, all is renewed in this worlde, and all things take their liueliness of him. VVee see then what wee haue to marke: that is to wit, that when wee knowe our selues to bee lesse than nothing, and that wee bee so subiect vnto death, as we must run thither (as ye would say) spite of our teeth: we must vnderstand also, that in this so great weaknessse, God holdeth vs by the hand, so as we be vphild by his power, & strengthned by his grace. Behold wherein we haue to reioyce. But the chiefe poynt is, that we should haue an eie to the benefit & good grace which God hath giue vs aboue the order of nature in restoring vs by his worde, as the Prophet Esay sayth: All flesh is but as grasse. Verely man is greene and florisheth for a while: but he withereth by and by. VVhereas the worde of the Lorde indureth for euer: yea, not onely too continue in heauen, but also to the ende that by it we may haue euerlasting life, & be redeemed out of the vniuersall corruption of this earthly life, that God may dwell in vs & make vs partakers of his euerlastynesse. VVee see then wherto we must come to profit our selues by this lesson, as we shal say yet once againe anon. Furthermore forasmuchas wee see our selues wanze away so fast, that from Morning to

Euening we go continually to our decay: therfore must we be the busier to bestow the time well that God giueth vs, because it is so short. God hath put vs into this worlde to keep vs occupied in his seruice: if we haue long time, yet can we not bee to diligent nor earnest in dooing our dutie, to discharge our selues when it shall come to the poynt to doo God seruice, both with our bodies and our soules. But forasmuchas wee see that he needeth but to turne his hand, and beholde we be at the last cast: ought we not to bee much more earnest to runne? according also as the Scripture exhorteth vs, shewing vs that this life heere is but as a race, and therefore wee may not go loyteringly, but euery man must cheere vp himselfe, and pricke and spurre forwarde himselfe. Thus wee see what we had as yet to note vpon this sentence, where it is sayd that men are consumed away from morning to night. But now let vs come to that which Eliphias addeth. He sayth. That they perish for euer, because no man thinketh vpon it. A man might demaunde heere, whether we shun death when we thinke not vpon it. For in the nine and fortie Psalme, it is sayd that the wise men and fooles are gathered all into one herde. So then it behoueth vs to vnderstande, that all mankinde is shet vp vnder this necessitie of dying. And wherefore then is it sayd heere, that all perishe for euer, because none thinke of it? First of all Eliphias ment to teach vs heere, that men doo as it were wex beastly when they looke not to them selues. For loke what he speaketh here, we must alwayes referre it to the present case. He maketh it not his generall case to treate of, that mans life is transitorie, without going any further: but he intendeth to shewe vs, that forasmuch as wee bee poore silie creatures creeping heere vpon the earth: wee cannot attaine to the perfection of Angels, nor yet come neere it. So then whereas he sayth that all perish for euer because none thinke of it: he meeneth that men go on as brute beastes, without iudgement, without discretion, without thinking vpon death any long time aforehande, and therefore are taken tardie. On the other side he purposeth to declare, what meare of their owne nature, were it not that God hath gathered them to himselfe, and gouerned them by his holie spirite, to the ende they should take heede to his doctrine. Beholde the two poynts which wee haue to marke heere. And as touching the first, It draweth neere to the text which we alledged euen nowe out of the Prophet. For there the Prophet mocketh the carelessnessse of men, that make their account to dwell here bilow for euer, notwithstanding that they ought wel to perceyue what their life is: that is to wit, that in the turning of a hande ye shall see it broken off. But no man thinks of that: It should seeme that men take pleasure in beguiling & forgetting theselues: they consider not their endes, but they beare themselues in hande, that they be as it were Idols. Is not this a wilfull sortting of themselues in brutishnesse? But the Prophete sayth this follie is reproued, and that it is well knowne by experience, that men deceyue themselues and throw themselues hedlong into destruction, when they frame themselues such an immortalltie, as to imagine that they shall dwell here for euer. Thus wee see a folie heere, which is conuinced euen by eiesight. But yet (sayth he) so farre of are their posteritie from waxing any whitte the wyzer by it: that they bee gathered thither in one flocke like sheepe, and the graue swalloweth them vp both great and small: and yet of all the while, none of them thinkes vpon it. See howe this geere replyeth to the purpose of Eliphias. So then let vs marke that the holye Ghoste intendeth too doo vs too vnderstande, that forasmuch as wee bee so flightfull, wee ought to haue death alwayes alwayes before our eyes, to the ende we should make hast thitherward, and not be attached with scarefulness when it shall please God to take vs out of this world, nor yet be amazed as wee see the most part to bee, who are striken with such an astonishmēt, that they know not where they be. Therfore if we bethinke vs a great while afore hand what our end shall be, and vpon what condition we were created: then shall we not perish like fooles without thinking vpon it. But there is yet more: that is to wit, that we must haue a further foresight than to this matter onely, 10 if we will not perish for euer. VVhy so? For here is mention made but of men in their owne kinde. Now it is certaine, that if we haue not an eie to the renewment which God maketh by the power of his spirite: we must all of vs be consumed. And for the better conceyuing heereo, let vs take the helpe of that which is sayd in the hundred and second psalme. There, to the intent that men should not ouerlike of themselues in their owne state, nor brag of any lustiness of their owne: the Prophet giueth vs euēn the verye skies for an example. Although wee see so 20 high a maiestie in them, as wee bee driuen into a maze with it: yet notwithstanding, euēn those selfe same skies must grow olde, and be chaunged, and go into corruption as a garment doth. And what then shall become of men? Must not they needs be much more frayle? But in the meane season (saith he) the sonnes of Gods children shall continue. If we bee giuen to the feare of God, wee shall haue a firme and well settled state. Beholde how the Prophete separateth Gods children from the common order of nature, when they haue once the seede of life in them, whereof Sainct Paule also speaketh in the eight to the Romanes. For see howe he comforteth vs: forasmuch as we be loden with the burthen and with the corruptible weight of this bodie, wee haue (sayth hee) the spirite of God, which is the seede of our true life, and by his power we shall one day be fully restored. And therefore let vs marke well, that such as thinke vpon their fraitle as they ought to do: after they haue knowne theselues to be nothing, and that there is nougat else but vanitie and leasing in them: shall not perish for al togither. And why so? For 40 they seeke the remedie which God hath offered them: which is, that they shall bee gathered out of this bondage of death, and be renued by God, who hath chosen them to himselfe, and make his power to flowe downe vpon them, that they may drawe water out of that fountaine of lyfe. VVe see then how such as bethinke themselues both of this present life, and of the ende thereof, cannot be consumed for euer, because God remediethe the wretched state wherein wee bee borne by nature, and calleth them to himselfe. This is it that we haue to gather of this sentence: and this is it that I touched not long since: that is to wit, that when we haue singly perceyued that our life is nothing, our so doing will not greatly boote vs. VVhy so? For it will but make vs dismayde. But if wee wil take courage: we must haue an eie to both the points: that is to wit, that when we see the necessitie that is in vs vntil we draw neere vnto our God, we must mourne, and not do as the worldlings do, who beeing drunken in their pomps, pleasures, or riches, doo wittingly and willingly mocke and beguile themselues. But (as I haue sayd) wee must cast away all these kinde of blindfoldings, and open our eies: and when we be come vnto our God, and haue acknowledged the miserable plight wherein we bee, wee must assure our selues, that God will reach out his hand vnto vs, because hee seeketh nothing else but to succour vs, and to draw vs out of the darkenesse wherein we bee by nature. Thus wee see what wee haue to marke in effect. And immediately after, it is sayde, That the ex-

<sup>7</sup>cellencie of men shall bee taken astray in them, and that they shall perishe [and] not in wisedome. True it is, that it behoueth vs to bee humbled by death: that is to witte, that God should bereue vs of all glorie, and that wee shoulde bee brought as it were to nothing, to the ende wee might know that al our steds astnesse and power proceedeth not from else where, than from the free goodnesse of our God: and to be short, that we liue, not in our selues, but because it pleaseth God to haue vs too come neere vntoo him, and that we should drawe out of the fulnesse that is in him, according as he hath giuen it vs in our Lord Iesus Christ. For hee is the fountaine that is opened vntoo vs, and which God sheweth vs, and whervnto he leadeth vs, to the intent we may be filled therewith. Then behoueth it vs to be brought to nothing in our owne nature: and yet therwithall to know, that after that God hath once striped vs out of it, he will cloth vs with it againe. And heere we see wherefore S. Paule (when he hath sayde that wee must grone so lōg as we liue in this world) addeth, not for that wee desire to bee vnclothed, (for wee desire too bee heere still: beholde wherevntoo our nature driueth vs) but because wee knowe there is another better dwelling place prepared for vs, when this lodging of ours is once destroyed, and that God will cloth vs with his owne immortalitie, and bring vs againe into our true state. And this is the thing wherein wee differ from the vnbeleevuers, and from those that haue not tasted a whitte of Gods grace. Thus we see why it is sayde in this sentece, Shall not all their excellencie bee taken away with them? For if ye do but behold what the present state of men is, and consider what they be in themselues: ye must needs conclude that they be brought to nothing by death. But we haue the grace of God, which is a supernaturall succor to vs, insomuch that in perishing we perish not, and when we be vnclothed we be immediately clothed againe, as I haue sayd alreadie. And thus we see why Eliphas addeth, Not in wisedome. For he intendeth alwayes to condemne men bicause they bee so blockishe, as they neuer thinke vpon themselues. Then let vs marke, that it is great wisedom to prepare our selues vnto death, & to passe through it cheerfully when we come at it. I say we shall haue profited greatly, and be reputed for wise in Gods sight, when we shal haue learned this present lesson throughly, and be able to put it in vre to receyue frute by it: and yet notwithstanding we see how every man shunneth it. For it is a melancholike matter, insomuch that if a man speake of death, every man is greeued at it, & falles into his dumps. Neuerthelesse the case so standeth, that if men set not their mindes vpon it: they must needs overshoot themselues in all their deuises, and in all their consultations: and all the greatest wisedome that they weene too haue, must needs bee turned into foolishnesse. And wherefore? For is there any greater folly, than for a man not to know him selfe? to what purpose serue all our wisedome and discretion, but to looke too our selues? And so they that thinke not vpon death, ne put theselues in mind of it, overshoot themselues as much as is possible for them. Yea they could finde in their hearts, to play the wilde Colts in forgetting themselues. VVe see then how it is all one, as if men ment to burie all the wit and reason that God hath giuen them. Therfore it is not without cause that Eliphas cōdemneth men heere, for dying without wisedom. For it is as much to say, as although God haue tolde them whervnto they must come, & haue set the Butte before their eies, as if he should say, Go me thither: yet they run astray all their life long, & know not whither they go. And when it cōmeth to the poynt that they must depart hence, they grunt and grudge at it, striuing & fighting against god: and although it boote it boote them not to doo so : yet shew they a furious sturdiness. Thus then doo wee now see in effect, what wee haue to marke in this text . It remayneth to see the conclusion that Eliphias maketh here : which is , that he sayth to Job , that when hee hath turned him on all sides, Hee shall not finde any faythfull man of his sort, nor of his compa-nie, but that he is as a man vterly forsaken of God. Hereby we see, that when he spake of men heretofore, he toke them as they are in their owne proper nature : that is too wit, without hauing any respect to the special grace which God giueth too those that are his , in opening his kingdome vnto him, in giuing them the hope of saluation , in gouerning them by his holy spirit, and in making them to go to a better and an euerlasting life. Eliphias then ment here, to set me down in their owne proper state & plight, such as they be of their owne selues , during the time that they be separated from god. And this appeareth in that he sayth to Job , Thou canst not finde so much as one fayth-full man of thy sorte , or whome thou mayest call thy companion. VVhy so ? For (sayth hee) Anger sleaeth the fooles, and Envie, (or spite, or fretting, or choler, or moodi-nessse, which gnaweth a man like a wilde beast) is the thing (sayth he) which killeth the wittlesse. But certes, according as I haue declared alreadie, Eliphias doth amisse in applying this to the person of Job : yea and hee doth him great wrongs in it. Yet notwithstanding, this doctrine ceaseth not to be both true and verie profitable. As how ? That is to wit, that as oft as we be chastized at Gods hande, wee must haue an eye to those that haue gone afore vs, to see whether they haue suffred the like tormentes and anguish or no. For if wee see Gods children too haue traced the path before vs : it must not greeue vs to bee ioyned with them. As how ? VVe see that the holy fathers which were farre excellenter than all other men , haue indured ad-uersitie, no men more. Now if God haue not spared them: why should we chalendge more priuilege than they had?

So then, as oftas we see that Gods children haue beene beaten with diuers rods, and vexed with many miseries and greefes : we haue wherewith to comfort our selues, and to cheere vp our hartes. For we must alwayes haue an eye to the ende, howe God never forsooke them, but pitied them when they were come too such extremityes. So must wee also hope that hee will doo as much for vs.
Marke this for a speciall poynt. Furthermore if wee will haue God too be pitifull and mercifull vnto vs in our aduersities : let vs beware that wee frette not agaynst him, and that we kicke not agaynst the spurre. For if we doo, then shall this sentence bee verified vpon vs , That anger sleaeth the foole : as if it were sayde, that such as chafe and grinde their teeth against their afflictions, shew themselues too haue profited euill in Gods schole. And, what shall they gaine by it in the ende ? It shall bee a doubling of their miserie. VVhen they shall haue fomed out their rage agaynst GOD, or when they shall haue spewed out their blasphemies: do they thinke they haue wonne their prize by it ? Alas , it maye not bee so : they deceyue themselues too much. For (as I haue sayde alreadie) it shall bee but a doubling of theyr miserie. Lo howe Anger sleaeth the foole. Moreouer when they haue a spye at others , and ~~shame~~ pleading agaynst G O D for dealing roughlier ~~w~~<sup>in</sup> them , than with such and such : what else doth siche manner of fretting , but make them to pine the<sup>sigh</sup>slues awaye, so as in the ende: they perishe and come vterly too nought ? Beholde what wee haue too gather vpon this Text. But the Papistes were tootoo farre ouerfolted , when they made this saying of Eliphias to serue their turne , too prooue that men ought too pray too the Sainctes that are departed, and that men ought to flee to them for refuge. Beholde ( say they ) it is sayde that Job shoulde haue a respect too some one of the Sainctes, and that he shoulde seeke to him, if peraduenture hee would answe-him. This is much to the purpose. For is it sayd heere, that Job went to seeke to the dead too make intercession for him vntoo God ? No : but contrarily (as I haue shewed heretofore) the very truth of the matter is, that he should not finde any of the Sainctes too bee of his companie.

And why so ? For the Sainctes were alwayes of a meeke mynde in theyr aduersities : and God chastized them after such a sort, as hee refrayned his rygour, so as the end was good and happye. And althoughe they had for a time beene as it were shaken off at his hande, in suche sort as it coulde not be perceyued that hee had any care of them : yet notwithstanding they referred themselues vnto him, and prayed alwayes vnto him, assuring themselues they should neuer be vterly forsaken of him, nor disappointed of the saluation that he had promised them. Lo heere the intent of Eliphias. So then we see heere that the Papistes are falsifyers , and haue manifestly corrupted the holy Scriptures. Verely they had neede to be borne with-all in one behalfe : I meene not in their beastliness : but in that they had verie great neede to wrest and wring the holy Scripture too prooue their dreames. They woulde make men beleue, that they ought too pray vnto Sainctes deceased : and yet the holy Scripture cyphereth not one woorde of it , neyther can a man finde so much as one fillable there for the good prooef of it. But they wil proue it : and therefore they muite needes confounde all , and white must bee turned into blacke. But in the meane while it behoueth vs too shunne all mennes inuentiones, which haue bene foolishly contrived without Gods warrant. And wherefore ? For first of all men wander out of the right way of saluation , when they follow their owne deuiles: and secondlie it causeth the holy Scripture too bee torn a peeces, so as men corrupt it and turne it upsyde downe. Therefore let vs learne to mislyke whatsoeuer thing men haue forged of their owne braine, and let vs holde vs to this simplicitie, namely that we must not couet too knowe ought, sauing that which God hath declared too vs with his owne mouth. And too conclude, let vs marke well these twoo poyntes , which wee haue glaunced at alreadie : that is too witte, as often as we bee scourged by Gods hande , let vs marke well whither the faythfull that haue gone before vs , haue not beene in the lyke plight. If wee finde that God hath exercysed them in manye tribulations : let vs comfort oure selues when it commeth too our turne too followe them , and let vs bee sure that God will not forsake vs at our neede, no more than hee forsooke them. Furthermore when wee see that God doth scourge vs in these dayes as well generally as particularly , and that wee must bee fayne to indure manye tormentes and troubles: Let vs acknowledge our selues too bee well woorthie of them , considering the great thanklesnesse that is too bee seene in vs. For whereas it hath pleased God to call vs vntoo the knowledge of his Gospell, and too haue vs yelde a recorde that wee bee hys children : howe doo wee take anye profite by this hys grace ? Nay , contrarywise it seemeth , that there is in vs a delight too disanull it and too make it vnauyelable . Howe is God serued and honoured at our handes ? wee ought too bee (as yee woulde saye) little Angelles , considering the light of the Gospell whiche G O D hath giuen vnto vs. And yet wee see there is nothing but naughtinesse and hy-pocrisie in the most part of men: VVe can good skill to make some protestation of oure fayth : But let a man examine oure lyfe, and hee shall finde no conformatie to the Gospell, but rather it seemeth, that wee haue conspired against God, to withdraw our selues from him. VVe see how they that haue some goodly outward shew, become brurish : and theref ore let vs be sure that God visiteth vs with his whippes bicause of our sinnes. Yet notwithstanding let vs not cease to trust in him continually, and to call vpon him, praying him too burie our former faultes, and too guide vs in such wise henceforth, as it may serue to drawe vs vntoo him selfe : And too the intent hee may haue pitie vpon vs , let vs come vntoo him with a lowly minde, so as wee haue no peece of the enuie and hartburning in vs whereof mention is made heere : assuring our selues, that if wee haue, it will but styrre vp and inflame Gods vengeance the more agaynst vs . VVhen wee bee come too suche a sturdinessse , it behoueth G O D also too rushe stouterly vpon vs , as it is sayde in the eighteenth Psalme. VVith the frowarde thou wilt deale frowardely. For if men wyll needes playe the wylde beastes : it is sayde that God will stryke them both sidelings & ouerthwart. And

And like as a tree that is throughly well sattled and deeply rooted in the ground, standeth fast though it be shaken with windes and stormes : euen so it seemeth that after God hath once aduaunced the wicked, they shall reigne continually, & their triumphes shall neuer come to an end. But Eliphias sayth, that when he saw such a likelihod, hee forbare not too curse the wicked out of hande : and hee sayth out of hand or immediatly, meening that he taried not til there came a change, as we comonly do, who at the first blush, whē we see the despisers of God to be in their cheefe ruffe, and to haue the winde at their sterne as they terme it, doo linger the time and are as it were astonied, saying, what will this geere proue to? If we perceiue them to be falling into decay, then we chaunge our minde : but so long as we see them florish, wee wote not what to say, we be at our wits end. Contrariwise Eliphias tellet vs, that hee was not abashed a whitte at the matter, but spake his minde according to that which God had vttered. For his comming to give iudgement and condemnation heere, is not of his owne head and after his owne fancie : but hee declareth that according as God sheweth vs that the wicked shall be confounded in the end, so he grounded himselfe therupon, and was not shaken from it by any temptation, but although he had seene the wicked flie so high a pitch, yet hee hilde still at one stay, saying : They must needs come to nought. Nowe wee see in effect what is conteyned here. And let vs applie this lesson to our owne vse, that we may knowe how well agreeable the same is vnto vs. True it is that we haue not to do with that condemning of other men: for it standeth every man in hand, rather to looke vnto himselfe, and that is the thing wherunto euery one of vs must applie his indeuer. For those that meddle so hastily with the iudging of their neighbors, forget themselues, & God will not spare the though they flatter themselues: they must be faine to come before their iudge, who wil handle them rigorously, bicause they ouerslipt themselues so much in their owne faults. Let vs note then, that our minde must not gad heere and there to seeke out the euill that is in our neighbours : but every man must enter into himselfe, and examin his owne state and life ; and when we finde any fault in our selues , wee must condemne it. Furthermore whereas it is sayd that we must also curse the wicked and the despizers of God: it is not to yelde such authoritie or preheminence to vs as of our selues. Howe is it then? First of all if the wicked sort persecute or trouble vs, so as they doo vs any wrong or annoyance : wee imagine that God hath gauen vs ouer, and that he careth no more for vs. And heerepon we bee tempted too conceyue a greefe as though we had lost our time by walking in singlenesse and vprightnesse, saying : Howe nowe? I looked that God should haue succoured mee at my neede : but I haue serued him , I haue put my trust in him, and yet he suffereth mee too bee tormented to the vttermost, I finde no releef: when I pray vnto him, hee makes as though he were deafe. VVee see heere a vereie troublesome temptation, when GOD seemeth too make none account of succoring vs, at such tyme as men missintreat vs and persecute vs. And therefore, too comfort our selues withall, wee must practise this lesson in all our troubles and incomberances: which is, that though the wicked bee in theyr tryumphe too daye , so as they sette theyr foote vpon our throte : it is not for that G O D hath forgotten vs, or for that hee will not sende vs remedie of it in the ende: But let vs wayte with pacience , and wee shall fynde the issue too bee suche as G O D hath promised: that is to witte, that he will regarde vs with mercie. Nowe then wce see what profit redoundeth vntoo vs by cursing the wicked: that is to wit, wee shall perceyue howe there is nothing but vnhappinesse in all their estate throughout. But let vs proceede yet further. VVhen wee see the wicked too haue a better tyme than the good men and the children of God: when wee see them craftie and politike : when we see them triumph : and euen when they seeme to bee exempted from the common miseries of this earthly life : I say when we see this: we be vexed, and wee wote not what too say , nor what too thinke : for it seemeth that it were better to giue our selues to lewdenesse than to good, forsomuch as God setteth no better order in the matters of this world. But to the intent we bee not prouoked to doo amisse, wee must take this for a conclusion : that is to wit, that when the despisers of God seeme too bee as Kings and Princes , so as they take theyr pleasure and glorie in their estate : yet they ceasse not too bee cursed . True it is that this cursednesse appeereth not at the first day , for it is secrete : But it mult haue keyture too shewe it selfe. And on the other side, we must beholde the thing though it cannot be seene with eie: yea we must beholde it by fayth : and bicause God hath spoken it alreadie with his owne mouth, we must sticke vntoo that which hee sayth. And it is the selfe same matter that the seuen and thirtie Psalme treateth of . For as Psal.37.

Psa.73.b.7. much as wee see things so confounded during this mortall life, as the wicked and frowarde sort not onely haue their ease as well as the good, but also it seemeth that God is minded too cocker them and to shewe them alfaour : by reason whereof wee may see them perking vp and flourishing like the Cedars in mount Libanus, and to be short, all that they desire commeth to effect , and it seemeth that their eyes will stroute out of their heades for fatnesse, as the three score and thirteenth Psalme saith. VVhat is to bee done in this cace? The worlde deemeth such folke blessed : and men clap their handes at them on all sides. VVee must curse them : that is to say, we must bee fully resolued with our selues that all this is nothing, and why so? For God hath tolde vs it is so. Then will he not haue our eyes to bee bleared with present things : but he will haue vs assure our selues by fayth, that all this shal turne to the mischiefe and vtter vndoing of such as submit not themselues vntoo him. And as concerning thyss word Curse, let vs marke that it giueth not vs scope too wiſe the mischiefe or confusion of the partie, (I meane through desire of vengeance, as oftentimes we bee so carried away by our passions , as there raigneth nothing in vs but hartburning and bitternessse, or at leastwise a foolishe and vndiscreete zeale: ) But whereas it is sayde that Eliphias cursed the wicked mans house : it importeth nothing else, but that he hilde him to that which the Scripture teacheth and sheweth vs. And therefore it is not for vs to be iudges : for it were too great a rashnesse , if wee should take so much preheminence vpon vs as to say, O, that man shall make an euill end, or such a man shall come to shame. A man must not presume so farre:but it belongeth to God only to curse or to blesse. On our part we haue no more to do, but to agree to that which he saith, answeiring. So be it Lord, thou only art the competent iudge of all the worlde. Then doth it behoue vs to herken what he tellet vs, and to obey his sayings without any replying to the contrary, or without any demauding how it shoulde bee possible too bee done , or howe it maye bee gone in hande with. For if G O D haue once spoken the woerde, euerie one of vs must holde himselfe contented with it. Nowe wee see what this woerde Curse importeth. It remayneth that we gather the whole summe of that which is conteyned heere. For these two temptations which are cast in our way are so commō, that every of vs feeleth feeleth himselfe to haue neede to bee armed against it : for we shall euer be in daunger of miscaryng, vnlesse we take hold of the conclusion that is set down here. Therfore whensoeuer wee bee outrageously misintreated by the wicked, and that they haue vs at any aduantage, so as it should seeme they would deuoure vs, and that wee haue no meanes to put them from vs : let vs make much of this sentence, and call it to remembrance, that in the end God will not suffer the wicked to ruffle it out continually (for he is welable to redresse things amisse) whiche thing we may be sure of, seing that he sheweth it vs in verie effect and by experience. Beholde heere an inestimable comfort for the faithfull when they be oppresed and tormented wrongfully : which is, to knowe that those which so persecute them, are cursed of God.

And furthermore let vs vnderstand on the contrarie part also, that our afflictions are blissted: that is to say, that although the worlde esteeme vs as wretches, so as we be a gazingstock, and haue our fleeces eaten from our backs, yea and be also troubled and tormented : yet for all this, God ceaseth not to dispose things in suche wyse, as the euill is to vs warde turned intoo good, and all this their dealing shall further our welfare. Behold how the children of God ought to cheere vp themselues in the mids of their sorowes. And heere wee see why it is sayd in the Psalme, that God will cutte asunder the cordes of the wicked, which draw the plough vpon the backe of his churche: namely to the intente that good men shoulde not stretche out their handes to doo euill, as commonly we thinke that things shal continue alwaies in that broile, and that there shall neuer be any better ende of them : & therupon we be tempted to give ouer our selues vnto euill, and when any man goeth about to doo vs wrong, it is the next way to set vs in a chafe against him. VVee see then that such as be desirous to walk in the feare of God and in singlenesse, are in daunger to stretche oute theyr handes vnto euill, that is to say, to give themselues to the folowing of the wicked. But God sheweth that hee will cut asunder the cordes of them that torment vs so, and that they shal haue no more abilitie to anoy vs hereafter. Marke this for a speciall poynt. And furthermore when we see that suche as scorne God to the full, and are giuen ouer to all lewdnesse, are not restrayned of their full scope, but take the benefite of the tyme, so as Ladie Fortune (as they terme it) seemeth to laugh vpon them: Let vs not ceasse to curse them, that is to say, let vs paciently wyt what the ende of them shall be, and assure our selues that all their prosperitie shall turne to their confusyon, to the intent that we should not envie them for it.

And finally let vs learne to applye all this to oure vse, as I haue sayd. Therefore if God suffer vs to indure much in this worlde too humble vs withall, so as one of vs is smitten with sicknesse, another with pouertie, and eury man beareth his owne crosse : let vs not thinke for all this, that God hath forgotten vs, or that our state is the worse. And why so ? For like as we curse the wicked in their prosperitie, and know it is nothing else but a dream which glideth awaye by and by : so also on the contrarie part, when it shall seeme that God hathe shaken vs off, when the worlde iudgeth the same of vs, and when oure own flesh and our own nature prouoke vs to such temptations : Let vs assure our selues that God will turne all to our welfare, and that his afflicting of vs is, because we haue neede to be wounde out of this intangling worlde here, and that in so doing, he dothe the duetie of a Physition towards vs, intending to purge vs from all oure naughtie corruptions, and from all the outrageous lustes of our fleshe, which make vs to kicke agaynst our master lyke horses that are ouerpampered. God then foreseeth all this. Also let vs holde it for certayne and sure, that wee bee blissed when the worlde feeth nothing but cursednesse in vs : and that euen when (according too the fleshe) wee can perceyue nothyng but vnhappynesse : euen then wee see by fayth, that we can not lyght otherwyse than vpon oure feete, bycause God loueth vs and sheweth himselfe to bee our father. VVee see in effect what we haue to beare in mynde. But lette vs bee well aduysed, that we cast not foorth suche sentence of cursing, but agaynst fooles. As for vs, we can not iudge who be fooles, except we haue Gods spirite to guyde vs with suche discretion as we maye not iudge at all aduenture. I haue tolde you alredie who be the fooles that Eliphias speaketh of: that is to wit, those whome menne woulde take too be the wylself, and whiche glorie of the fynenesse and suttletie of their wittes . Yea, but for so muche as they feare not the liuing God, and are so carryed away as they looke not euen to themselues: we see the reason why there is nothing but folie in them. VVil we iudge of suche men? First of all lette vs haue an eye vntoo God, and secondly lette euery of vs enter intoo himselfe, and examine himselfe well. For that is the true wisedome, and therein it consisteth. I saye we must first and formoste haue an eye vnto God : that is too wit, too submit our selues wholly vntoo him, too serue him in true humilitie, too frame our selues vntoo his woerde, to put oure whole trust in his grace, too call vpon hym, and to flee to him for refuge.

Thus wee see at what poynete wee must begin, if wee mynde too haue a true rule of wisedome. And afterwarde lette vs enter intoo our owne selues too vnderstante our owne vices and wantes, that wee may mylyke our selues for them, and syghe when we see that wee keepe not our way foorth on to Godwarde as wee oughte to doo. VVhen wee haue doone so, wee maye haue a good discretion to iudge of fooles. For although the worlde clappe their handes at the wicked: yet lette not vs ceasse to set light by them, yea and to hate them, and to abhorre them, as it is said in the fifteenth Psalme. Psalme.15.b.4 For wee muste haue none in estimation but suche as walke in the feare of God.

Beholde who ought to be honourable, and honoured among vs. For as for all these despisers of God whiche delight in naughtynesse : we must esteeme them but as dirt and myre, wee must accounte their dooings but as fylth, so as wee can not abyde the stinche of it. For they liue not but too the dishonour of God: and when men make reuerence too them, or sooth them vp : we muste abhorre them as dogges, and as filthinesse that dothe but infect the whole worlde. Thus we see howe we ought to procede, that wee may iudge accordingly with God. And therewithall let vs also practise the thing that is set downe here when Eliphias sayeth, that he out of hande demed them accursed whom the world thought to haue attayned to the full measure of all felicitie. VVherby it is met, that we must not change our opinion, according to the alterations that we see in the world, whē we perceiue the wicked to be exalted, so as it seemeth too vs that all will come to naughte, or rather that God execute not his office any more, and that it is all one to doo good or euill, and that it is to no purpose to doo well. Therefore let vs not be so swift and hastie to iudge according too the successe of things: but lette vs consider, that bee the world neuer so troublesome, wee must always conclude, that whatsoeuer God hath once declared vntoo vs, shalbe fulfilled. Too be shorte, there is no reason why wee should measure Gods iudgements after our owne fan-

sie. But let vs hearken to that whiche he sayth vnto vs: and although that at the fyrste dash we perceiue not the effect and accomplishment of that whiche is conteyned in the holie scripture: yet let fayth worke in that behalf, and hold vs backe, and lette not our wits roaue here and there, but let vs say: Seing it is so, that this man is a despizer of God, and leadeth a loose life: it can not be but he must come to an euill end. And why so? Not for that wee know it alreadie, nor for that the missehap sheweth it selfe: but bycause God hathe sayde it: and that muste suffice vs.

Moreouer, lette vs learne too saye it as it is conteyned here. For Eliphas meaneth not that he heard other men report, behold such a man shall be cursed, or he shall be vnhappy: but he saith he trusted in God that it should be so. And although he sawe things confused in the worlde: yet notwithstanding, he was fully perswaded that none were blissted but the children of God, and such as honored him, and leaned altogether to his goodnessse, yea and that althoughe they were persecuted, and mocked, and reiecte, and made a laughing-stocke, so as it shoulde seeme they were starke doltes because they had not the iolitie of this worlde: yet for all that, they ceassed not too bee accepted and allowed of at Gods hande, notwithstanding that the worlde deeemed the contrarie.

Beholde what we haue to remember in this sentence. But if euer any tyme required too practize this lesson: these dayes require it. For the worlde is full of the contempt of God. Verely a man shall see wylinesse inough, and that folks wittes are sharp and subtle inough in these dayes: but a man shall see few or none that regard God, the number of these is verie smal: nay rather, men walk so rashly and headily, as yee would say, there were no religion at all: all the worlde seeth it. Also we see that iniquitie reigneth extremely, euen in such wise as the most part of men are become shamelesse, and are no more ashamed to do euill. VVe see thinges thus confused, and yet, which are they whome wee esteeme to bee moste in Gods fauour? Euen the woorste, and such as are furthest out of square, conditionally that they be subtle and sharpe witted to bring their matters wel about: for if they be full of wiles and shifts, then behold they be wise and discrete men. But although the wicked bee had in suche estimation, and every man make much of them: yet let vs holde them accursed, bycause God is at oddes wyth them, and can not shew them any fauor. And herewithall let vs curse the euill men, yea and let vs doe it out of hande. That is to say, let vs not tarie till God lift vp his hande, and worke by some manifeste meanes: for that were to do him verie smal honour, and too make no further account of his justice, than wee see it in execution. But when the wicked men are in their brauerie, and are proud of their good fortune, as they terme it: then let vs take scorne of them and abhorre them, and let vs holde them for accursed whatsoeuer come of it. Specially wee ought to marke well that whiche Eliphas addeth: which is, That the children of them that despise God, shall fall downe in the Gate, and shall bee sette farrefrom saluation, and no man shall succoure them.

Hee dothe vs too vnderstande, that if God accomplithe not his iudgements heere, hee can well worke them vpon the offspring of suche as shal seeme too haue escaped his hande. Howe is that? There may be some that shall giue themselues wholly vnto euill, so long as they liue, and God shall suffer them too gather goodes, and too increase contynually, and too heape vp riches anewe, euen till their dying day: and yet notwithstanding ding for all thys they bee cursed, and their ryches and reuenues are cursed as well as they. Not that the curse is perceyued in the person of the father, but bycause it shall shewe it selfe in his children.

Hereby we bee admonished, that God hathe diuers manners of executing his vengeance, and therefore lette vs learne to walke in feare and aduisidnesse. Verely at the fyrste syghte it maye seeme straunge, why God shoulde punishe children for their fathers sakes: but yet thys doctrine is ryfe ynough in the Scripture. And besides this, it is meant heire, of suche as are like theyr Fathers. For God doothe well shewe hymselfe too bee the Sauioure of suche as are borne and descended of euyll auncesters, as wee see examples of it in hollye Scripture. But yet for all that, it falleth out mooste commonly, that the issue of the wicked sort is accursed, according also as God auoucheth, that hee will pursue his vengeance too the thirde and fourthe generation, vpon those that despize hym, and lifte vp themselves agaynst him.

And there is a double manner of punishing the wickednesse of the fathers vpon their children. For sometymes God sheweth mercie to the children, and yet notwithstanding cessest not to chaste the vnrightuousnesse of their fathers in the persones of theyr children. As for example: wee see a father that hathe gotten mucche goodes, howbeit by wicked bargayning, by suttletie, by crafte, and by crueltie: and yet will God haue pitie vpon the chylde of suche a man. And what will hee doo? Hee will ridde him quite and cleane of all those euil gotten goodes, because they woulde but bring him too confusion: according as it is sayd, that suche kynde of riches Esa.5,f:24. are as wood, whiche in the ende will kindle the fyre of Zab.5.b.4. Gods wrath. Therfore when our Lorde meaneth too saue the chylde of a wicked man that hath liued amisse: he bereueth him of all his euill gotten goods, as though he should let him blood to saue his lyfe, that hee mighte not bee wrapped in the mischife and corruption which his father had drawne vntoo himselfe.

Beholde, howe God punisheth the wickednesse of the fathers vpon the chylldren, and yet ceaseth not too bee the Sauioure of the chylldren, and too shewe them mercie. Sometymes hee passeth further, and because the fathers haue bene so farre oute of all square, as they haue ledde a stubborne frowarde lyfe, GOD forsaketh theyr offspryng, insomuche that the grace of his holie Spirite dwelleth not wyth them. Nowe when wee bee so destitute of Gods guyding, wee must needes runne into destruction, and needs must the mischief increase more and more.

Thus wee see that when the children of the vngodlie doo beare the synnes of theyr fathers, it is not only for that God forsaketh them, and leaueth them vp in the state of their owne nature: but also for that he gyueth Satan full power ouer them, and lette hym haue the brydle, too reygne in suche houses at his own pleasure. And when the diuell hathe ledde awaye the fathers, and caryed them too all naughtynesse: theyr chylldren shall also ouershoote themselues intoo excessiue outrage. VVe see then as now what is ment heire, that is too wit, that when the chylldren of wicked men are once destitute of Gods grace, and walke after their owne inordinate lustes: they muste needs come too greater confusyon than their fathers.

And thus yee may see why it is sayd, that they shall bee destitute of healpe, and that they shall fall downe at the gate: that is too witte, bycause they shall fall, not in a Forrest among thicues, but by open iustice.

Psal. 127. For in the Scripture the word Gate signifieth judgement, because mens eases were wont to be debated there, and it was the place where common assemblies were made, and finally it was the seate of iustice. And this is it that is ment in the Psalme where it is said, that the children of good men and of such as are blisfed of God, shall bee mainteyned in the Gate, and put their enimies to confusyon. Likewise on the contrary part it is sayde in this text that the children of the wicked shall stumble, and be crushed in peeces, yea euen by playne iustice. VVhereby it is the better expressed, how God persecuteth them openly, so as it is apparant to the eye, that it is he which layeth his hand vpon them. For he addeth immediatly, That no man shall succoure them. For when God mindest to put men so to destruction, hee leaueth them destitute of all meanes of help and succoure. In deede some do referre this vnto men: but it is to be vnderstoode, how it is God that hath bestriped them and left them destitute of all succoure, to the intent they should neuer be holpen vp agayne. But as for our partes, (according to that whiche I haue touched alredy) we haue so muche the more cause to cast downe our eyes, & to pray God to make vs walke aright in his obedience, and that although wee perceiue not his curse vpon vs nor vpon our childe, yet notwithstanding we may take it for a conclusion, that God hath meanes to vs incomprehensible, insomuche that when it shall seeme vnto vs that all things go well, and that wee haue prouided aforehande, not only for our whole life, but also for after our death, that our children also may be in good surenesse of welfare, so as it may seeme we haue set all thinges in good order, and nothing is amisse: we may consider that all this is nothing, and that assoone as God do but blowe vpon our determinacions and deuises, he shall turne them all vpside downe. VVhen wee knowe this, let vs not abuse his pacience: and if hee spare vs for a time, let it not make vs to oversleepe our selues and to sooth our selues in our vices: but let it learne vs to returne vnto him in due season, and to prevent this vengeance wherewith he menaceth al despisers in this place. But herewithall let vs marke, that oftentimes the good men and their childe may happen to be persecuted vniustly. Neuerthelesse the holy Ghost presupposeth that which is true, and which we also may sticke vnto as most certayne and infallible: whiche is, that in scourging and troubling of vs, God hath a respect to prouide for vs by it in the end: and when he hath sufficiently tried vs, and humbled vs, he will turne the euill to our benefite and to our welfare, as I haue saide. But contrarywise, whereas it is said that the race of the wicked shall stumble and be set farre from help: it is to expresse that whē God intendeth to punish the wicked, he proceedeth with it in such sorte, as men may perceiue hee doth it not to ta me them, that they might returne vnto him, nor to mortifie their fleshly affections, nor finally to cure them like a phisicion: but to confound them and to bring them to vtter destruction. Behold what the holy ghost presupposeth. Also let vs learne to discerne the chastizements that God vseth towardes his children to their benefite, from the punishments which he sendeth vpon the wicked, not to amend them, but to shew himselfe a judge against them. It soloweth, That the goodes of such men shall be devoured by the hungrie, yea euen to the picking out of their corne from among the thornes: so as not only their feelds shall be reaped by their enimies, who shall devoure al their substance: but also men shall scrape altogether that is betweene the hedges, so as if there be any thing hidden, (and it be but a two or three eares of corne among the bushes,) it shal be gleaned vp. Heereby Eliphias meeneth, that Gods iudgements vpon the wicked, are not lyke vnto the corrections which he sendeth too his children: but that he sheweth howe he hath vtterly cast them off, and that he pitith them not any more, and that hee will not haue them feele any more of his fatherly goodnesse, because he acknowledgeth them not for his. Lo what the effect is of that whiche is spoken here.

And heerepon wee haue now too call too mynde what I haue declared afore: that is too wit, that if wee be troubled, vexed and tormentid by the wicked: wee must paciently abyde Gods leasure till hee put too his hande to succour vs. And althoughe wee perceyue not Gods iudgements at the first pushe: yet notwithstanding let vs assure our selues, that hee will execute them in due tyme and place. Also when we see the execution of them, let the same make vs too stande in awe: and sith we see his vengeance is so horrible, let vs brydle our selues, and beware wee tempt not God, as saincte Paule also exhorteth vs. Lette no man abuse you (sayeth hee) with vayne woordes. For by reason of suche things, the vengeance of God is wont to come vpon the vnbeleuers and stubborne persons. Therfore when God doth so shewe vs his iudgements, lette vs quake at them, and lette vs stande in feare and awe of him, submitting our selues wholly too that which he sayeth and vttereth. And this is it that he addeth (howbeit, that it can not be expounded at this present) namely, that it becommeth vs too yelde our selues in suche wyse too Gods will, as we maye answere Sobeit too all that euer he sayth vnto vs, assuring our selues that things fall not out by chaunce in this world: nor that it is long of the earth, aire, or heauen that men are afflicted: but that men beare their bane in themselues. Then let vs acknowledge it, and when there happen any afflictions in the worlde, let vs bee sure it is the hand of God, which lighteth vpon vs for our sinnes, & that al the mischisf cometh of our selues, and that wee haue the verie welspring & groundwork thereof within vs. Let vs (I saye) acknowledge this, to the ende we may misselike of our selues in our vices, and therupon praye God to drawe vs too himselfe, and too make his graces whiche he hath put into vs, auayable to oure saluation, so that being maynteyned by his power whiche he hath openly shewed towards vs in the name of our Lorde Iesus Christ, we may be able to prosper through his blisshing.

Ephes. 5. 5. 6.

And let vs cast our selues doun before the presence of our good God, with acknowledgement of oure faultes, praying him to make vs feele the in such wise, as we may returne to him in true repenteance, and suffer our selues to be gouerned henceforth by his hand, yea after such manner, as his holie name may bee glorifyed by vs in all our whole lyfe. And so lette vs all saye, Almighty God and heauenly father, &c.

The nineteenth Sermon, which is the thirde vpon the fifth Chapter.

This Sermon conteyneth yet still the exposition of the sixth and seventh verses, and then as followeth.

8. But I vwill reason vwith God and turne my talke vnto God.
9. It is hee that dothe greate vvoorkes, yea euen vnsucheable vvoorkes, and vvhich doth vvon-derfull deedes vwithout ende.
10. VVhich giueth rain vpon the earth, vvhich maketh the wvaters to gush downe the streetes.

Began heretofore too tell what is meant by this saying, That trouble commeth not out of the earth, nor miserie out of the dust, but that man is borne to labour. For when wee bee troubled with any inconuenience, wee gaze about vs here and there, and searche all the corners of our wits, to fynd the cause of it out of ourselues, & yet of al the whyle we perceiue not that God scourgeth vs for oure sinnes, and that the fountaine of all the aduersities and missehaps that we indure here belowe, must be sought for in oure owne lyfe. Then are wee warned by this sentence, that when wee heare speaking of the miseries of mannes lyfe, and that ech one of vs also feeleth his part & portion therof: our wittes must not wander abrode, nor fetch long wyndlasses atoneside or atother: but every man muste enter into himselfe too searche out his owne sinnes, and so shall wee finde, that it is no maruel though we be beset round about with so many necessities, and our lyfe subiect to this so wretched state. VVhy so? For lyke as wood carryeth that nature and propertie in it, that hee receyuth fire and kindleth easily: so also standeth the case with vs. For we haue sin, which is as it were the wood and matter of all afflictions: wherevpon commeth the wrath of god, & so must we nedes be consumed. The sparkles therfore do flye aloft (saith Eliphias) and yet if there were not a secret operario in the steele when it is striken vpon the stithe, it is certain that no sparks would passe out. Euē so it behoueth vs to vnderstand, that the fyre of all our miseries is inclosed in our selues. And we shal haue profited greatly if we beare away this lesson. For although euery one of vs confesse, that God scourgeth vs iustly: yet doo we not enter into this foresayd consideration, but rather labour to shunne it as muche as we can. VVhensoever a man hath any aduersitie, God knocketh at his dore, and prouoketh him to thinke vpon his sinnes. But the man makes none account of it, yea rather (which worse is) he sleepeth soundly in his aduersitie, and fatereth it either vpon this thing or vpon that, and he will fynd some casuall chaunce or other, whiich he goeth to seeke a great way off, and neuer entreteth into the examination of his owne lyfe. Therfore wheras we be subiecte to so many miseries and wantes: let vs learne to take the whole burthen and blame of it vpon our selues, and not charge eyther heauē or earth with it. As for example, when we see the weather distempered, so as there commeth frost, or thunder, or hayle: lette vs assure our selues, it is not the aire that is so disposed of it self: or if there come a drougħt, it is not the heauen that is so hardened of it owne nature: or if the earth be barren, it proceedeth not of it owne kinde, but we our selues are the cause of all. And therefore when it is said that wee be borne vnto it, Eliphias presupposeth, that forasmuche as we bee borne too euill, and are wholly inclined to ouermanye vices: it is meete that we shuld be handled therafter, and that God shuld answer vs according as we come vnto him. But verily we bring all corruption with vs out of oure mothers wombe, so as we be naturally giuen to naughtinesse and sinne: and therfore must our state be suitable therenvnto: that is to say, forasmuch as God findeth vs to be such, he must also sende vs that whiche he knoweth to be conuenient, iust and ryghtful for vs. And so Eliphias meeneth not that God hath created vs of purpose to deale so hardly with vs: but he taketh man in his corrupt nature euer since he was turned away from God, and saith it is requisite that his estate shuld be such as it is, because we be not able to conceiue how God spreadeth oute his goodnessse vpon vs, and intreateth vs gently, as if we were obedient vnto him in all pointes. But forasmuch as men doo neuer humble themselues excepte they bee constrained thereto by force, but indeuer to strive against God: Eliphias addeth here another sentence, that is to wit, that he turneth himself vnto God, and purposeth to reason with him, as if he shoulde saye: Men can not abyde to receyue this doctrine, namely that it shoulde bee tolde them that they be well worthie to be scourged, and therefore that they must not strive against it, but take al in good worth, and not blame the other creatures for the miseries that they indure, but rather acknowledge theselues to be the cause therof. Men then can not stoupe to conceive that this is true, excepte they bee made too stoupe, by shewing them what the Maiestie of God is. And therfore vntill wee haue our sinnes layde afore vs, and be made to perceyue howe it is God with whom we haue to deale: there is not that man whiche will not holde himselfe a-loofe, or that hath not his answers readie at his tongues end, or that setteth not some colour vpon his misdoings. And though we be not altogether rebellious: yet notwithstanding there will be such a carelesnesse in vs, that what soeuer men say to vs, it is all one, and we are neither grieved nor moued at all at our vices. VVhat must wee doo then? VVe shall neuer learne true humilitie, vntill wee be made too vnderstand, that it is God too whome wee must answeare, that we bee cited to appeare at his throne, to feele him our iudge, and moreouer also that wee can not escape his hand, but that all our lyfe must be knowne and examined there. VVhen we be brought to this point that we must be fayne to looke vnto God: we begin after a sort too rouze vp ourselues, so as wee be no more so carelesse and drowzie as wee were: there is no more of this loftinessse and fonde ouerweening, too soothe and flatter oure selues withall: wee come to haue some feeling, and perceyuyng of oure mysteries: but aboue all, when Gods maiestie is sette before oure eyes, it is too make vs feele howe dreadfull it is: and when his greatnessse is sette afore vs, it maketh vs too tremble yet the more. VVee see it is no sporting matter, heere is no sleeping for vs, nor no bearing of our selues in hande with this or that. VVherefore? for there is no more roome for flatteries, when God, who is a consuming fire, appeereth, and maketh vs to come neere vntoo him, so as wee perceiue howe it is hee that maketh the mountaines to melt, and is able to make cleane riddance of all things. Therefore when wee knowe this greatnessse of God, needes muste wee sinke vnder it, and forgette all prydē.

Thus much concerning the intent of Eliphias. But now must we consider this doctrine, to applie it to our selues. Firste of all, as oft as we feele not ourselues sufficiencie wakened to condemne ourselues in our sinnes: lette vs vse the order that is sette downe too vs heere: whyche is, too haue an eye vnto God. Howe is that? VVe may see some man that is sufficiencie conuincid of his sinnes, who notwithstanding goeth on styll, and followeth his owne swyngē: and if he bee reproued, or else otherwysse feele remorse in hys owne conscience, hee passeth it ouer, and taketh no greate greefe for it, and why so? Bycause hee hath not his eye vpon God.

Thus yee see what maketh vs too continue in oure sinnes: ye see what is the cause why wee bee not caste downe with true humilitie: namely bycause wee perceiue not that God is oure iudge, and that it is hee wyth whom we haue to do. Then is there none other remedy than that which I haue spoken of: that is to wit, that first of all wee bee as it were wakened out of oure sinnes, for other-otherwise wee will never thynke of them too bee sorie for them. But forasmuche as it may fall out, that the diuell shall as it were so bewitch vs, that when we be constrained to perceiue that all goeth not well with vs, wee shall become as amazed at it: wee must come to the seconde point, to say: Alas poore creature, art thou able to scape the vengeance of thy God? VVlieal the world hath magnified thee, yet shalt thou not misse to be condemned for the same. So it is that al creatures perceiue thy shame, thou must be brought to shame before the little babes, 10 and euen vnto the beastes: thou canst not shift thy han-des of it. And what shal become of thee, when thou must be faine to come before the heauenly judge? Thynkest thou that he hath not a dreadful iudgement of damnation against thee, seeing that thou continuest so in naughtynesse? Thus see we the meane to waken ourselues when oure sinnes displease vs not inough, and when we feele not so liuely and earnest a soriness for them as were requisite.

Thus we see that we must reason with God and not 20 with men. For we imagine our selues to haue the better ende of the staffe so long as we abyde here belowe, and we traueil always to that end, according as our fleshe and our nature is ouermuch giuen that way. For, if a man be rebuked, he besirres him at him that speake to him, and sayth, Hast thou to doo with that? If thou looke wel vpon thy selfe, thou shalt fynde more to be blamed at home: thou art too hasty vpon me: thou seemest as though thou wouldest quarell with mee; it seemeth that thou wouldest deface mee. Behold how we snap at me if they 30 rebuke vs: Yea and wee will doo as mucche to God, specially if there bee no man to accuse vs: for then wee will not sticke to seeke still for such a startinghole. As howe? VVhen a man considereth himselfe, he perceyveth well that if God punishe him, he dealeth rightely with him: but then will he starte out to the examinynge of his ney-bours, [and he will saye in himselfe,] is not such a one worse than I? or at least wise as badde as I? and hathe not such a one deserued as greate punishment as I?

Thus wee see howe we labour alwayes to iustifie oure 40 own case by fleeing from God. And therfore it behoueth vs too marke well this lesson, that wee muste not reason with men, that is to say, we must not stay there: for wee shall gayne nothing by dooing so: but wee muste rather call home our wittes, and aduisedly saye: Alas, I see well that my God scourgeth mee, and therefore it behoueth mee too be heedful to consider his hande, and therewpon to prepare my selfe to humiliacie, as I haue sayde alreadie. Furthermore where as I sayd, that we shall be the better touched by thinking ypon God: my meening is, that we 50 must know God to be such a one as hee is. For so long as men beare themselues in hande with this or that, they disguise God by their false imaginacions, bending him as it were some rede; and dalyng with hym as with a little babie. Yea (which worse is) there is greater libertie vsed with God, than with a little babe. And whereof proceedeth such outrage, but of that we consider not his greatnessse? Therfore wee must not so surmyze of God, as to presume to disguise him, and to make him such a one as our fancie and lust can away with: but wee muste knowe him to be such a one as he sheweth himselfe too bee [by his word,] and we must also conceiue him after such a sort as he vittereth himself by his works. VVhen we haue wel bethought vs of this: it is certaine that our prattling will be well stinted: we wilbe no more so pert nor so rashe as too come and pleade against him, or too bear our selues in hande that he tormenteth vs without cause, and that we haue not deserued it. Such maner self flatterings muste be thrust downe, all hypocrisy must be doone away, and we must be abashed and dismayd at the sayd greatnessse of the maiestie which we shall haue concyued in our God. Thus then we see a seconde poynte which is wel worthie to be noted: which is, that we ought to know God truly and not faynedly. And here we see why Saint Paule sayth, that men vanisched away in their Rom.1.18.21. owne imaginacions: namely because they transourmed God. For inasmuch as they robbed God of his glorie, God also did put them too shame, so as he gaue them vp into a lewd mynd, by reason wherof, they gaue themselves ouer to all villarie and shameful doings, and cast themselves into suche dishonestie, as a man might be ashamed of their filthinesse. And why so? For (sayth he) they glorified not God, but did wrongfully as it were deface his maiestie, whē they so turned his truth into a lye, & transformed him in that wise. Seing then that this maladie is ouercomon, and euery man hath experiance of it in himselfe: therefore it standeth vs the more on hande, too marke well this doctrine here: that is to wit, that when we thinke of God, it must be done with all reverence to know him as he is, and not as we fally surmyze him to bee. True it is that God sheweth himselfe too vs by his word: but yet neverthelesse we are vñexcusable, if we consider him not in his works also, inasmuch as he hath not left himselfe without witnessē there, as sayth S. Paule in the.xvij. of the Actes, where he speaketh of the order of Act.14.17. nature, which is as it wer a glasse for vs to behold god in. S.Paule then saith expressely, that whē God maketh the Sunne to shine, when he sendeth raine, when he sendeth diuersitie of seasons, when he maketh the earth to yelde frute: herein hee leaueth not himselfe without good re-corde, but it is all one as if he should pleade his own case and say: VVheras men haue not knowne my glory and maiestie, nor perceiued that I haue all things in my hand to gouerne the things that I haue created: there is no reason why they should alledge ignorance: for by the verie order of nature, they might haue perceiued how there is one creator whiche disposeth all. So then, let vs but open our eyes, and we shall haue prooefes ynowe to shewe vs what the greatnessse of God is, to the end we may learne to honour him as he deserueth. Thus wee see what Eliphas doth here. And it is a lesson that will turne greatly to our profit, if we can practise it throughly. To be short then, let vs beare in mynde, that as oft as there is any communication concerning God: it is not moued vntoo vs to thinke, we haue but onyl the worde: but let vs marke that which is properly belonging vnto God, and whiche can not be separated from his being, to the end wee may magnifie him as he is worthie. VVere this once wel settled in vs, we shoulde no more be so much giuen to superstition as we be, neyther shoulde wee bee so worldly as we bee.

There are twoō vices that reigne and haue alwayes reygnyed in the worlde: the one is Contempte of God, that men care not at all for hym, but trample hym vnder their feete, as muchie as in them iyeth. True it is, that they bee not able too impeache his maiestie: Neuerthelesse there is suche a diuelishe pride too bee seene in men, that in steade of worshipping GOD, and of submitting themselves vntoo him, they coulde fynde in theyr hearte to throwe him vnder foote, and to triumph ouer him, and not suffer him to haue any kynde of authoriti: ouer them. Thus see we a maladie that is ouergreate and outrageous, and yet hath it bene in all tymes: that is too saye, that menne are so ouerheathenishe, as they knowe not the reverence, whyche they owe vntoo God. The other vice is superstition: whiche is; that vnder the shadowe of deuotion, men gad here and there, to seeke after foolish inuentions. And whereof cometh this mischiefe? even because God is not known rightly with that which is proprely belonging vnto him: for were it wel vnderstode what his mightinesse, iustice, and goodnesse are: it is certayn that men would not be carayed so awaye. For men forge too themselues vridergoddes: that is too saye, they forge idols in their owne heades: and assigne offices too them, as thoughte they woulde deale out the vertues that pertayne vnto God; 10 and are in hym alone, or as thoughte they woulde putte him too the spoyle, and euery one haue his share and boote of him. Now ye see why I sayd, that we must be so muche the more diligent to know God aright: natirally too the ende he be not robbed of his honour, and that no man bereue him of that which is his owne, and whiche resterh only in him: And howe may they doo that? I haue alreadie briefly tolde you, howe they neede no more but only to open their eyes: for God vttereth him selfe after suche a sorte in the order of Nature, as we are vtterly vnexcusale, if we yeeld him not that whiche is his. And this is that whiche Eliphias sheweth heere. For he beginneth to say, That Gods workes are greate, and vnable to be scarbed out, and that bee dote the wonderfull deeds without number.

Here Eliphias taketh a general sentence, and afterward specifieth that thing by particular examples, whiche he had spoken in a summe. This therfore is as a preface: as if he shold in one worde foreshew what he ment to say in this wyse: God doth exceeding great and incomprehensible things, his doings are wonderfull and without ende. When we vnderstand that Gods workes are exceeding great and incomprehensible: shall wee not be forced to lift vp our myndes, and to perceyue that wee must not disguise him, nor surmize any thing of him after oure naturall reason, but that wee muste mounte vp higher? It is certaine, that we be ledde therenvnto whether wee will or no. Thus then we see, what Eliphasis meaning is. When men looke vnto Godwarde, they be not touched with suche a feare, nor with such an humilitie as were requisite. What is the reason? It is because they thinke not on his woorkes: If Gods workes come in discourse, euery man thynkes himselfe a competent iudge to speake his verdite vppon them: yea and wee will bee bolde inough (or rather ouerbolde) too controll them. For if God woorke not after our fashion, we wil bee full of grudging, and wee will saye, wherefore did he not this, and why went suche a matter so? What is the cause of suche ouerboltiesse; that men are so saucie with God as too holde pleagaynst him, and specially as to make themselues his judges? It is because they haue not considered howe greate and incomprehensible his woorkes are. But if the workes of God bee incomprehensible: haue we a measure that is great enough to declare what is in them? What is oure witte? When wee haue stretched it out too the vttermoste length and breadth that maye bee: is it able too comprehend the hundreth part of Gods woorkes, and of his determination whiche is so highe as all of it is hidden from vs? Wee muste goe out of our selues, if wee mynde but only too taste the wonderfull and infinite wisedom that appeereth in Gods woorkes. Nowe if we must mount aboue all our owne wittes, too gette but a little taste of them: what shall become of vs when wee will inclaze all, and when wee will knowe all that is in them too the vttermoste? I pray you, can we attayne therenvnto? Wee see then howe men are worse than mad when they bee so presumptuouse as too desyre too determine of Gods woorks which are incomprehensible. For true it is that wee cannot gage the bottom of Gods woorks, too comprehend the reason of them: but yet God keepereth a good way to giue vs such a knowledge of them, as hee knoweth too be for our behoof. And so we note, that Gods woorks are incomprehensible in themselves: that is to say, that if we will searche out all that euer is in them by parcelmeale, wee shall neuer bee able too atteyne too the depth of them. Therefore wee must bee as it were whelmed vnder the sayd greatnessse, assuring ourselues that if wee take vpon vs too bee iudges of Gods woorks, wee shall fynd wherwith to stoppe our eyes, because wee cannot atteyne too the secrets that are in them. Furthermore when wee shall haue proceeded in such humilitie, knowing that wee bee not competent iudges too knowe the thing that is too hygh and too deepe for vs: lette vs pray God too giue vs the spirite of wisedome, that wee maye iudge arighte of his woorkes: and then will hee graunte vs the grace too perceyue so muche as is for our behoofe. Not that wee maye discouer and decypher all that is in them, so as nothyng shoulde bee vnowne too vs, and all shoulde fall oute after oure imagination: No, God will holde vs shorte of that, so as wee shall not knowe but in part: but in the meane season, the sayde knowledge muste suffyze vs, for as muche as nothyng shall be hidden from vs, that is good and conueniente for oure welfare. And therefore lette vs contente our selues herewith. For otherwyse what an vnthankfulnessse is it for vs too bee desirous too enter so intoo Gods secretes, as to reade therein, and that wee woulde not haue any thing to escape vs, but are so fonde and curious as to haue a desire to make him subiect to oure fonde braine?

Thus wee see the two poynts that we haue to marke heere. But if there be infinite wisedome in those works of God which are the smallest and basest: what is there in the greatest sorte, and in such as surmount all our capacitie. Specially when the case concerneth our redempcion, and when it concerneth Gods sealing vp of the corde of our adoption in vs by his holie Spirite: it is a matter that surmounteth the common order of nature. Chiefly when it is sayd that he hath chosen vs before the worlde was made, and that he hath chosen vs, not all in generall, but so many as he thought good, and that hee hath forsaken the reste: do we not see secretes that are too high for vs? What is to be done then? Let vs assure our selues we be too too vnexcusable, if in this behalf we walk not with feare and warenesse, considering that these are things incomprehensible: and if we thinke to attayn so high, our desire to stye vp after that maner aboue the skyes, hauing no wings, will make vs breake our necks. Moreouer, when we haue giuen the glory vnto God, and confessed not onely with mouth, but also in very deede: that his workes are incomprehensible, and as a bottomlesse pit to swallowe vp all our vnderstanding: let vs not ceasse to pray him to make vs perceyue them, so farre foorth as he knoweth them meete for our capacitie: and therewithall let vs also searche that which is shewed vs in the holie scripture. For God will not haue vs negligent: it is not for vs to say with the Papists, O wee muste not bee inquisitiue of Gods secretes. For why then was the holie Scripture gien vs? Gods wylly is, that every man shoulde seeke after him: but yet therewithall, his wyl is also, that then shoulde holde the way whiche he sheweth them: that is to wit, that they shuld with al humilitie, folow that which is conteined in the holy scripture. Now when we haue learned that whiche God teacheth vs in his schole, let vs hold vs to it: and if there come any toy in our head to the cōtrarie : so as our harts be tickled to seeke for more than is meete for vs to know: let vs beware that we haue the wisdome & modesty to say: Poore creature, is it meete that thou shouldest presume to haue a larger instrucciō, thā that which God giueth thee in the holy scripture ? So thē let vs wey well this saying, to the end we may hold ourselues in such sobrietie, as we iudge not rashly of Gods works. For byandby it is sayde, That God is he whiche doth wōderful deedes without end. VVhcre-as Gods works are called wonderfull, or secret (for so the word importeth : ) it is to bring vs to the reuerencing of thē. For Gods meening is not, that our knowing of such greatnessse in his works, shoulde be to astonishe vs, and to drieve vs further off from him : but contrariwise to draw vs to such a reuerence, as we should honor him, saying : Lord how mightie art thou ? Lord how great is thy power, thy goodnessse, thy iustice, and thy wisdome ? Vn-doubtedly Dauid knew wel the infinit greatnessse of gods works : and yet notwithstanding he ceaseth not to say, Lord thy works are full of wisdome and righteousnesse. He knew well what we haue to consider of Gods works: and yet he honored them neuerthelesse. Let vs learne then, not to conceyue suche a greatnessse in Gods works, as might make vs dull, like brute beastes, so as we should not knowe where to become, nor take any instruction of good learning by them : but so to conceyue of it, as the same may serue to reppresse vs, that our wits be not ouer-wandering, and that we play not horses that are broken loose, and so take libertie (as I haue tolde you) to say, I wil know how this and this cōmeth to passe. Not so : but let vs be modest. For our true wisdome is to be ignorant in the things that God will haue hidden frō vs. Thus we see how we must prepare ourselues to lowinessse & modestie. And furthermore let vs vnderstād therewithal that we must reuerence the works of God. And howe ? To comprehend the infinite wisdome, righteousnessse, and power that is conteyned in thē, according to our sinall capacite, assuring our selues that God doth not any thing without reason, no not although the same be not knowē vnto vs at the first dash. For God doth not always vtter a present reason in his works, so as mē may perceiue thē : and agayne, the sayd wisdome is so deepe, as it is named a bottomlesse pit. Therfore let vs learne to reuerēce gods works, although we perceiue not euermore the cause why he worketh so. VVe see well then in what wise Gods works are wonderfull. And he sayth expressly, that they haue none ende. VVhereby men are yet better humbled. For if we chaunce to come to the full vnderstanding of some one thing : O it seemeth to vs that nothing can go beyonde vs : we bee so cunning, that all questions which can be propounded vnto vs shal be assoiled out of hand. But put the case we be able to iudge of Gods works, as of two or of three, or of a hundred : VVhat is that ? it is rightnought. And why so? For they are without number. But (as I haue sayd already) the least of Gods workes is inough to ouerwhelme vs : and what then shall become of vs, whē we come to the sayd bottomlesse depth wher-of there is none ende ? Lo howe it behoueth vs to wey well that which is spoken heire generally in way of preface, to make vs to enter into better consideration of all Gods works than we are wont to do, that we may yeeld the honor vnto his Maiestie which is due to him. But (as I haue touched heretofore) after that Eliphās hath spoken so in general, he speaketh particularly also, saying : that God giueth rayne vpon the earth, and maketh the waters to gush down the streetes. This seemeth to be nothing to the purpose. For the matter in hand, is only that mē may perceiue theselues to be rightly punished, & that if God handle thē after his own wil, they must not stād p[re]leeding against him, for they shal gayne nothing by so doing, but must of necessitie be ouercome. And why thē is mention made here of the rayne? This shuld seeme to be a bymatter. But we must marke, that when we be put in minde of the cōmon order which god keepeth in gouerning his creatures: it is to the end that we should apply it al wholly to our owne vse. For whē we haue runne vp & doun, & trauersed frō one side to another, we must enter into our selues, we must waken vp our wits, and we must apply al this doctrine to suche vse as I haue spoken of, which is, that we may honor God as he deserueth. Thus yee see why here is mention made of the rayne. And no doubt, but that vnder one particular, Eliphās cōprehēdeth them all, as if he should say : VVe nbt on'y see that God hath created all things, and that there is such workmanship in the skies & in the earth, as all they that think vpo it must needs be astonished at it : but also we see how he guydeth and disposeth al things, gueth rayne and winde, and sendeth the cōtrarie also when he listeth. And thus much concerning this saying of Eliphās. Furthermore let vs mark, how it is not inough to yelde vnto God this honor and soueraintie to dispose of all his creatures [at his owne pleasure] but we must also consider the end, wherefore. VVhich is, that we shuld lern therby to submit ourselues vnto him, & to aknowlege him for our father & master. See wherat the holy scripture amēd : but we fayle therof in two poyntes. For first and formost we regard not god: whether he rayne, or whether he make fayre wether, we shet our eyes. True it is that wee be glad if rayne come when it may serue our turne : but in the meane while we passe, not to know how it is of Gods sending : our minds are so tied to the earth, as they can not mount vp thither. Also whē we haue fayre wether, so as we see the sunne, and are glad of his shining; yet notwithstanding we cōsider not how it is god that hath kindled such a Cresset to give vs light. Thus haue we no regarde at all of God, which is a very great & ouerbeastly vice. But let let vs put the case that God come into our thought: yet is not that all. For there are many that should say, God be praysed for this fayre wether, but in the meane while they forget all this, they neuer remēber to say, It is God that giueth vs this fayre wether to shewe him selfe a father towards vs. Therfore it becōmeth vs to be like minded vnto him, & behauie ourselues as his true children, and therewithall to bethinke ourselues thus : behold how all Gods creatures obey him, & yet what obedience hath he at our hād? Vn-doubtedly when we behold the order of nature : it must lead vs to a certen fear of god, & to the present tasting of his goodnessse, to the end we may be giuē vp vnto him, & wholly dedicated to his obediēce. Lo in what maner we must practize the sayd lesson which Eliphās sheweth vs heire : that is to wit, when God sendeth rayne and maketh the water too runne gushing thorough the streetes. VVe see also after what maner the holy scripture speketh therof. And I haue told you already, how it is good wisdome to know to what end & intēt the holy ghost setteth down these things vnto vs: which is, that therby we may lerne to feare & to honor our god, & to know what maner of authoritie it is that we graunt vnto him, and what maner of soueraintie he hath ouer vs: & thervpō come to his iustice also, to humble ourselues vnder the same. True it is that Eliphās misbehaueth himselfe in applying this thing to the person of Iob: neuerthelesse (as I haue said heretofore) the doctrine is good, & of the holy ghost, & we must not receiue it as the doctrine of a mortal mā, but we must say that the spirit of god spalte in him: & therefore no more remaineth for vs to do, but to haue the sayde wisdome and discretion of knowing howe too profite our selues in time and place, by that which is shewed vs heere. Then let vs not be like Eliphas, who wretched all things to the person of Iob. But when wee haue receyued this generall doctrine, and confessed the same to be true: let euery one of vs arme him selfe with it accordingly. Nowe then we see in effect what is shewed vs heere: that is too wit, that all the inconueniences wherevnto our life is subiect, must be fathered vpō our sinnes, and that wee muste not blame nother heauen nor earth, 10 nor any other creatures if wee prosper not as wee would wishe: but euery one of vs must condemne himselfe, and consider how we haue the woord within vs, which is the fewell that kindleth the fire of Gods wrath: and that forso muche as wee bee giuen to euill, euen from our birth, wee must not maruell though wee bee subiect to so many miseries and necessities. So then, if we be troubled in diuers maners, let vs not blame God for it, but let vs haue an eye too the welspring: that is too wit, that our sinnes are the cause of all the inconueniences which we endure 20 in this world. Let vs take heede therefore that we pleade not any more agaynst him as wee haue beene wont too doo: but rather let vs yelde our selues giltie, and let vs knowe that he is righteous in punishing vs, to the intent wee may learme too feare and honour him in all humblenesse as becommeth vs. Thus yee see what wee haue too remember vpon this text, wayting till the residue may bee layde foorth more fully.

Nowe let vs cast our selues downe in the presence of our good God, with acknowledgement of our offences, beseeching him too make vs knowe them better than we haue done: and aboue al things too holde vs in such awe vnder his maiestie, as wee maye bee touched too the quicke, and bee no more so dull as wee haue beene heretofore: but maye knowe after what maner wee ought too iudge of all his works, and therewithall haue an eye too that which is in them, according as he sheweth it vnto vs by his worde, too the intent that wee humbling oure selues vnder the greatnessse of his Maiestie, may desire nothing but too glorifie his name in all poyntes, not onely with our mouth, but also in very deede: and shewe that he is well worthy too reigne ouer vs, and that all things bothe great and small ought too humble them selues vnto him and too honour him. That it may please him too graunt this grace, not onely to vs but also to all people and Nations of the earth, &c.

The twentith Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the fifth Chapter.

- ii. It is in him too exalte the dispayred, and [too bring] them too safetie vvhiche are vexed at the heart.
12. He disappoyneth the thoughtes of the vvicked, in suche vvise as their handes doo not the thing that they enterprise.
13. He ouertaketh the vvise in their ovvne vvilynesse, and disappoyneth the determination of the craftie, 14. So as at noonetyde they vvalke in darkenesse, and gropeabout them in the brode daylight as in the night.
15. He plucketh avvay the oppressed from the svvorde, from the mouth, and from the hand of them that are too strong.
16. So is there hope for heereafter for the oppressed, and the mouth of vvickednesse shall bee stopped out

Heresas it is sayde heere, that God exalteth suche as are despised: it is a sentence well worthy to bee borne in minde. For hereby we be warned too repayre vnto him when wee see our selues so oppressed by the proude, as it seemeth that wee shall bee vtterly ouerwhelmed: specially forasmuche as it is sayde, that God plucketh him backe too safetie, which is vexed at the heart. If wee bee so tormented with aduersities, as wee bee in extreme anguishe: let vs learne to call vpon our God, sith he chalengeth it as his office to saue those that are in such distresse as they are able too indure no more. True it is that God can giue his seruaunts such prosperitie, as they shall neuer be disquieted: but he hath rightfull reason too moue him not too doo it. For we see the pride that is in mans nature, and although it appeare not fully, yet is the seede of it hidden there. God therefore must remedie it: and the meane thereof is to tame vs by affliction. Surely wee shall see diuers that will suffer many aduersities, and yet for all that bee neuer the more humbled. For like as a restie iade will suffer him selfe too bee beaten, and his belly to bee ript, rather than he will obey: so is it with them that are stubborne too the vttermost. But when it pleaseth God too tame men, he maketh the afflictions too bee of force which he sendeth too them, so as they serue for medicines too purge them of the sayde pride and presumptuousnesse, whereoutof they coulde not otherwise draw them selues. VVe see then howe it is not without cause that God dothe so exercise his children, as euen too suffer them too bee despized too the worldwarde, and too bee scorned, and too bee quite and cleane without authoritie or credite, and (to bee shorte) to seeme to bee vtterly forsaken of him. VVhy then dothe he so? Bicause they haue neede to bee in suche a schole. VVherefore sendeth he them so many aduersities, that they are fayne to sighe and grone, and wote not on which side too turne them? It is too make them too call vpon him, and too flee vnto him for refuge. VVe see then howe that by these afflictions we bee taught, first to knowe our selues, that we presume not any thing of our selues, nor bee puffed vp with pride and statelynesse: and secondly not too take too muche pleasure in our owne lustes, but rather too forsake all worldly things, and finally too call vpon God, which is the principallest poynt of all. For as long as men bee at 60 their ease, although they dare not say, that they can go beyond God: yet by their doings they shew themselues so fotted, as they haue no minde too call vpon God, nor too commende themselues vnto him. Ye see then why God suffreth his seruaunts to bee afflicted in such wise, yea euen as to bee pinched with anguishe of heart, that they wote not where to become any more. Therfore let vs beare this doctrine well in minde, considering that it is so is so muche for our profite: and furthermore aboue all, let vs aduise oure selues too practise it at oure neede. VVhen souuer we shall bee oppressed by men, and when it shall seeme that wee must needs perish: seeing it is declared heere howe it is Gods office too lifte vp them that are so oppressed, and too recomfort them that are so in sorrowe: let vs not doubt but he will performe his promise: for he hath not forgotten his nature: wee shall certenly finde that he will shewe him selfe too bee the same which he was at the beginning. And heere wee see 10 also wherefore he abaceth suche as are aduaunced too some dignitie or honor. VVhen some man beholdeth suche backtumblings, he thinkes it to bee but the wheele of fortune: the wicked sorte grudge that God shoulde play so with men as with a ball: but this happeneth by reason of the vnthankfulnesse of suche as are in highe estate. For they forget from whence their welfare commeth, and therevpon they bee so sotted with their greatnessse, that they wexe stoute agaynst God, and diuers wayes fall too outrage, and therefore God is fayne too 20 abate suche maner of pride. And so wee see the cause that maketh God too pull downe those whome he had exalted afore: namely (I say) because they cannot keepe them selues within the bounds of modestie, nor giue the glory vnto God, nor knowe what they are of themselues, and contrarywise the honor that God hath done vnto them, but forget themselues, and aduaunce themselues without measure. And therefore God is fayne to shewe them howe they bee nothing, and that they doo but beguyle them selues by their pride. And therefore let them 30 that are aduaunced too highe estate, beware that they walke in the feare of God, and in carefulnesse. Moreouer, suche as are bace and despized, haue inough where-with too comforte themselues (as I haue sayde) in that they haue this promise, that it belongeth too God too giue helpe too suche as are in distresse. Lo what we haue to marke. And although this bee not done alwayes apparantly to the eye: yet notwithstanding suche as are sorrowfull at the heart aright, (that is to say, which are so cast downe as they flee vnto God, and seeke no relieve 40 but at his hand) shal feele the operation of his doctrine. And certesse all of vs in general doo finde by experience, that God lifteth vp them that are despized: for what are wee by nature? In what plight doth God finde vs when he adopteth vs to bee his children: are we not plunged in all filthinesse and infection? And not onely so: but also he is fayne to drawe vs out of the gulfe of hell. By reason whereof it may well bee sayde, that doubtlesse of nature wee bee cursed caytifs, we bring nothing with vs but the image of death, there is nothing in vs but sinne. 50 and specially (as it is sayde in Exechiell) wee bee lyke a childe that is newly come out of the wombe of his mother, yea euen of a mother that is full of corruption, insomuche as besides the other miseries wherein hee is wrapped, he hath also al maner of filthinesse, gore bloud, and all maner of vncleanesse, as the Prophet speaketh there. VVe see then what our state is till God haue made vs cleane. And so seeing that every one of vs already knoweth in him selfe, and in his owne behalfe, howe God hath exalted vs, calling vs too the hope of the kingdome of heauen, and of eternall life, yea and that he hath plucked vs euen out of the bottomlesse pit of death, and clenched vs from our so stinking filthinesse: haue we not cause too hope for the like heereafter? And therefore aboue all things, when wee bee in suche distresse, as wee can beare no more: let vs then put vp our sute vnto him, that it may please him too succour vs, and too haue pitie of vs. VVe see then howe God regardeth suche as bee as it were the ofcastes of the worlde, too the ende too succour them. For it followeth immediatly, that he breaketh the determinations of the wicked, too the ende that their bandes shoulde not accomplish any of their enterprises. VVe see here yet one comfort more, which it behoueth vs too marke well, that we may be pacient in this world, notwithstanding that our enimies assayle vs on all sides. True it is that God spareth vs sometimes, and that he sheweth not open warre agaynst vs, and that the wicked haue not alwayes the power too persecute vs, but are otherwise letted, or else God dothe after a sorte brydle their rage, insomuch that wee haue not alwayes open warre with them. But yet it is impossible that Gods chil-dren should liue in this world, and not be in many perils continually. And why so? for they must walke in simplictie. True it is that they ought to be wise, and our Lord hath giuen them so muche wisedome as is requisite for them. But howsoeuer the worlde go, they must not mayntaine them selues by crafte and wylitesse, nor by wicked practises. Although they bee among wolves, yet must they bee as Lambes and sheepe: and although they bee among foxes, yet must they continue as doves, and they must keepe still the same simplictie whiche God commaundeth them. VVe see howe the worlde is fraught with naughtinesse: insomuch that if yee finde a right honest man, it is (as they say) a very fine seede and rare [too bee met withall.] Nowe then, if God should not worke too disappoynyt the purposes of the wicked, what should become of vs? Should wee not perishe an hundredth times aday? So then wee see heere a text whereof wee must make our owne profite: whiche is, that God watcheth from out of heauen, too disappoynyt the enterprises and practizes whiche the wicked sorte doo contrive agaynst vs. For first and formost it will bee a temptation too vs when wee see our selues watched and wayted vpon, and nothing else sought but too catche vs at auantage, and too winde about vs: I say, it will bee a tempting of vs to doo the like, [and to say in our selues] I haue to doo with a subtle foxe, and therefore I must bee fayne to keepe good watche. And howe? that is to wit, agaynst him that is wyly and double wyly, as they say in the prouerbe. Beholde howe we be giuen to decline vnto euill, and to make two diuels for one (as the prouerbe sayth) when we bee so assayled by the naughtinesse of men. But there is no way too holde vs in obedience vnto God, and too make vs too walke on in simplictie and soundnesse, but by acknowledging G O D too bee our buckler, and that he will prouide welynough for all mischeeues that are prepared agaynst vs. True it is that wee ought too defende our selues: yea verily so far forth as God giueth leauue: that is too wit, so wee steppe not aside from the vprightnesse which he commaundeth, and that howsoeuer the case standeth, wee vse not any guyle, nor practize any thing that is vnlawfull for vs to doo. VVhen wee proceede after this maner: let vs assure oure selues that God will welynough finde meanes, too dispatche all the enterpri-ses, of suche as thinke to catche vs as it were in a pitfall by their craftynesse. God then will prouide in such wise, 60 as he knoweth to bee profitable for vs. And furthermore there is nothing spoken heere, which we finde not dayly by experience. For if the children of God bee at any time deceyued: they knowe that if God hilde them not vnder his protection, to saue the from the snares and ginnes of suche as seeke nothing but to winde about them, they should bee ouertaken at euery blowe, not only in some small things, but also in all their whole life: we see this welynough. So then, seeing wee haue suche a proof of this doctrine, we ought to be the better confirmed thereby. As howe? When any man hath an eye to himselfe: we haue skill enough to say, that there is nothing but naughtinesse in the world, so as a man can not tell whom he may trust. On whiche side soever a man turneth him selfe, he is in danger to be deceyued: we become to suche a confusyon, as there is no faith nor iustynesse, neither in kinsfolke, nor in freends. Well then, sith that every man maketh suche complaynt, if wee bee not beguyled, let vs marke well how it is God that defendeth vs. For it is likely that we should be beguyled at every blow: and what would become of vs then, if God should not remedie it? Therefore let every man acknowledge that he is preferued by the hande of God, & that it is not without cause that God hath auouched it to be his office, to make the deuises of the wicked to vanish away, to the ende they shold not execute their attempts. True it is that although God giueth the wicked men strength to execute their deuices: yet he is well able to preuent all their practizes, and too ouerthrowe them everychone: for (as he sayth anone after) he ouertaketh the wise in their owne wylynesse. Sometimes God blyndeth them that weene them selues too bee very subtle and cunning, so as he maketh them to be naked. Lo here one way whiche he hathe too saue those that are his. But albeit that he let the wicked men runne vpon the brydle, albeit that they haue many deuices, and albeit that it seeme impossible that wee should by any meanes escape their handes: yet notwithstanding euen when God shall haue giuen them suche libertie, a manne shall see in the ende, that all this geere shall vanishe away, and that when they bee even at the poynt too set all their practizes abroche, and too say, wee see what wee haue too doo, yee see howe wee must proceede: even then all their deuices shall washe away. Therefore when they shall haue set all things in a readinesse, and when they shall haue concluded vpon their matters, so as there is no likelyhoode but their deuices shall come too effect: God will mocke them, and a man woulde wonder too see howe all things shall fall out cleane contrarie too that whiche they imagined. True it is that wee shall not perceyue howe this is done: and that is, to the intent wee should know how God worketh after a wonderfull fashion, and therfore that his gracious goodnesse must needes appeare the better thereby towardes vs. So then let vs marke well what is sayde hecre in effect: namely that God suffreth the wicked too haue store of wyles and subtle deuices, so as it may seeme that they shall vtterly ouerthrowe the whole Churche: or else that if they go about too oppresse some one man, or two, or three, it is likely that they can not by any meanes bee resisted. What is too bee doone in this case? Wee must flee too our God too say, well Lorde, it is true wee see our enemies haue store of guyles: if the matter come to encountering with them by subtle shiftes and policies, wee shall bee farre ouermatched, and vtterly vndone. But what for that? Nowe commeth thy turne too dashe all their deuices, and too make them flee away in the ayre, so as they may not haue any power in their hande too put them in execution. Beholde howe wee must haue recourse vnto God, and sticke too the promises whiche he hathe made vs heere. Therefore when God shall haue suffred the wicked sorte too debate what they liste in their mindes, and too vndertake this or that: he is able too holde their handes tyed welinoughe. It may bee that hee will giue them leaue too raunge farre enough: but yet therewithall when it commeth too the poynte of accomplishing the thing whiche they had debated, they shall bee disappoyned, and their handes shall bee tyed: and when they beleue that they haue all thinnges at commaundement, they shall bee destitute of all counsell and aduiseement, yea and of all force and power, forsomuche as God hath prouided for the matter after an incomprehensible maner. Thus much as concerning this strayne. But Eliphias proceedeth yet further, saying, that God ouertaketh the wyse in their owne wylynesse, and that the determination of the wicked is defeated, yea even in suche wyse as they stumble in the open lighte, as in the darke, and grope aboue them at noone dayes as in the night. Heere Eliphias not onely declarereth that God will not suffer the wicked too accomplithe that which they had conceyued in their hearts: but also addeth, that God ouertaketh them in their owne wyles, and in suche wyse ouerthwarteth their deuises, as they bee berefte of their wittes, and wote no more what too doo than little babes, so as their practizes become altogether laughingstockes. But wee must marke well these two thinges. For (as I haue sayde heeretofore) if wee see that God disappoyn特 not our enimies of their pollicies, and that on our side wee haue no great aduise, so as by all likelyhoode wee shall not misse too be oppressed: yee shall see vs overtaken with dispayre, bycause that too our seeming, if God ment too ayde vs, he woulde put foorth himselfe, & not make so long taryng. Therfore if he make delay, we are astonied & afrayd. But it is mete that we shoulde bee pacient, though God resist not the wicked when they confederate themselues in suche wyse agaynst vs, but rather giueth them leaue too debate vpon the matter. And wherefore? For he will come in due time too deliuere vs out of their handes, notwithstanding that they beleue certenly too bring their attemptes about too our vtter ouerthrowe. And yet neuerthelesse sometimes God tarrieth not so long, but pitith our feblenesse: and when he seeth vs in daunger too bee shaken, he preuenteth the matter, and maketh hast too succour vs. And howe is that? Beholde, our enimies are oversuttle and politike, and moreouer they bee so practized as a man woulde suppose that all the subtle shiftes of the whole worlde had passed throughe their handes: and good cause haue wee too bee afayde, when wee see they haue made tryall of suche manner of policies. But what for that? God is able too sorte them in suche sorte, as they shall become as beastes: that whereas they were thought to haue bene as handesome men as coulde bee, they become like little babes, insomuche that it is a wonder too see them consule of things, wherein there is neither ryme nor reason as they say. And howe commeth this too passe, GOD can well skill howe too sende men the spirite of drunkennesse, so as they shall stagger and reele without drinking any drop of wyne, Esay.19.c. according as hee declareth by his Prophetes. Like as 14.25.29. he is the giuer of witte and discretion too suche as are c.19. fliie Idiotes: so contrarywyse hee knoweth howe too blinde the vnderstanding of suche as thinke themselues too see farre afore them, insomuche that even at highe noonetide they doo nothyng but grope like poore fily blinde soules. Wee see then what Eliphias ment to shewe heere. And this doctrine extendeth it selfe very farre. For therby we be taught, that when we see our enimies practize all that is possible agaynst vs: wee may set light by them, assuring ourefelues that our God will make all their attemptes vayne, according as wee see howe the Prophet Esay speaketh of them in two sentences. Go your way (saythe hee) take counsell together: yet shall it come too nothing. And why? The Lorde will disappoint it everywhit. Go your way (sayth he) to make your your great deliberations, gather your selues together, and yet muste all of it be disappointed. And whyso? for God holdeþ his counsell in heauen, and will make all your naughtinesse and suttleties to be turned backe, yee shall win nothing againste him. Beholde also the greate force that was prepared against the Citie of Ierusalem: the poore king Ezechias is come to vter extremitie, in so much that he made no countenance to withstand his enemie, but when he sawe himself vnable to match him, he mynded to purchase peace for money, and therewpon spoyled himself of all his substance, and was contented that the temple of God should be fleeced, so as there was not left the value of one dodkin in the citie of Ierusalem, and his palace was quite empie of all riches. Behold here a poore king, who refuzeth not to pay what rosome soever a man would aske, so he myght scape from the lyons mouth. It was verye likely then that they should haue bin vtterly vndoone. But herewpon God sendeth his prophet, who mocketh his enimies, Go to, lay your heads together, and deuyse yee what yee can, yet shall yee bring none of your enterprisés to passe. And whyso? for the lord setteth himself against all your practizes, too maynteyne his people and his Churche. Thus you see why I haue sayd, that it behoueth vs to take heede that wee put this lesson in vre. Therfore when we be come to the poynt that we knowe not whither there be anye way out for vs or no, yea euen that it semeth we be vtterly vndoone alreadye: let vs flee to the goodnessse of God, who will easly fynd meanes vñknownen to vs. But aboue all things, when soever we see that the wicked persecute vs for the quarel of the Gospell, let vs not doubt at all but God will vter his power after a speciall maner in that behalf. Like as in thefe dayes it is true that Gods enimies are full ynough of subtle deuises, and they haue a mayster (that is too witt the diuell) which hathe his shope well furnished with such stiffe. If the Pope and all his adherentes haue not wyles ynow in them, the diuell will forge ynow for them. And still we see that all the mischeuous practizes that can be, are on their syde: we see how those whom men think to be of greatest skill, are there kept in wages to blasphemē God, to slauder the doctrine of truthe, and to make vs be hated of all the world: and finally they buy and sell vs on all sides, to the intent we should come too vtter decay. When all these things aforesayd come before our eyes: what haue we else too do, but o wayt with pacience, specially seeing we be sure that God can well tell how to hold their hand fast tyed, and that when they haue sought all the corners of their witts, and prodded about the whole earthe, yea and mounteþ aboue the cloudes, God will not suffer them to put any thing in execution, and furthermore that hee is well able too make those men dullards, which take themselues to be very politike and wyse me: I say he will make them so dull, as that euen the little children shall laugh at their beastlinessse, according as we see in verye dede. For if wee mark how Gods truthe is incurred now adayes by these clawebucks and by all the Popes vpholders, we shall see them so besotted, as it were not likely that men could come to such doltishnesse. Speccially if a man marke those whiche weene themselues to be cunningest; it shoulde seeme that they be cōfederate with vs, and that we haue giuen them wages to mocke Anti-christe their master: they wold fayne pleasure him, and they disgrace him more and more. And for proof hereof, if a man reade their books, hee wil say they speake in fauour of vs: and for my part I knowe it to be so. When of cometh this then? no doubt but God accomplisheth that thing in the which is spoken heere, and I knowe it manifestly. Sothen seeing that God sheweth in verye deed, how the thing which he hath spoken here is not in vayne: Let vs lerne to staye ourselues vpō him, not doubting but he is able to ouerthrowe all the practizes and deuyces of such as take themselues to be the cunningest, and that he will make them to grope about them at hygh none, as if they were blyndfolded in the dark. And he fayeth exprefly, That God ouertaketh the wyse in their wylinessse. When Eliphias vseth this woord wyse: he doeth it after the manner of men, who glorifye themselues in that behalf. Widsome is the singular gift of God, and a good and commendable thing: and in good soote frō whence cometh it, but frō the holie Ghost, who is the fountaine and welspring therof according also as the holie scripture sheweth vs? And we ourselues also doo knowe it to be so, if we be not to to vñthankfull. Seing then that wisdome is so excellent a thing, ca it be cōdemned? It is certeine that all the wittinessse and wylinessse which we see in the wicked and in the enimies of God, deserueth not to be called wisdome. But what? Forasmuchas they boaste of it, and are taken to be so to the worldward: Eliphias vseth the same woord, according also as it is ouercommon to say, behold yonder goes a wyse man. And what is ment by this wyse man? In effect a verye ciuelish creatur. For if a man will be taken for a wyse man: he must haue no loyaltie, no faythfulnessse, no vpright dealing, no conscience in him: he must be able too mocke the whole world, he must bee able to aduaunce hymself, he must haue manye faire coulours to beguyle and deceyue me withall. O this is a ma full of wisdome: and yet in the meane whyle he shall haue nothing in him but fraud and naughtinessse, hee shall haue nothing in him but hypocrisie and dissimulation. And if a man be mynded too walk in simplicitie and vprightnesse, and meneth not to do any man wrong: tush he shalbe counted a dolt and an idiot, yea and although he haue wit ynough in him, and that euen the wicked men themselues are inforced to confessē it, insomuchas they are fayne to say, ye see how such a man is wyse ynough if he listed to put foorth himself: but he is to carelesse and passeth for nothing but to welter in his owne ease without putting of himself in hazard. Behold how the world iudgeth of him. And whyso? Bycause that such a one giueth not himself to craftinessse & snatching as other me doo. Sothen, forso much as the world hath this woord wisdome in his mouth and vñhaloweth it, (for it is a holie thing howbeit falsly abused): ye see why Eliphias sayeth, very well, let vs put the case that these wyles were wisdome in deede, as they be termed, and as they be comonly taken too be, howbeit that they are not so, but I will graunt them thatyle: yet notwithstanding God knoweth well ynough how to disappoint them in their owne naughtinessse. For here it is shewed, that the sayd wisdome wherof the wicked vaunt themselues, is not woorthise of so honorable a tyle. And wherfore for whē all is sayd, it is but wylinessse. Thus ye see what we haue too mark in this text. But now must we receyue warning to be lowely, when we see God put himself here as principall partie against all such as practize any euill against their neyours, and seeke to wynd about them by suttletie. When we see how God setteth himself against them in that behalf, and sheweth himself, too be the aduersarie partie: I pray you ought we not to haue good hold of ourselues, notwithstanding that wee be tempted too vse craft and suttletie, and therewithall haue wit ynough to bring our matters about? As for example, it may oftentimes happen, that God putteth good men into our hands, whom we may beguyle and leade about by the noze as the prouerb sayeth: verye well, when such occasions are offered, wee ought to haue good stay, considering how God sayeth, eth, If ye vse deceynte and guyle, you make not warre against men, [but against me]. True it is that you may easily beguyle a silie soule : but [in verye deede] your leueling is at me, therfore I will step before you, and shewe you how it is mine office to dash & disappoyn特 al the vngracious practizes that wicked folk take in hand. Sothen, brag as much as you list of your owne wisdome, for I will put you to confusion, and every man shall laugh you too skorne. And wherfore? Because your enterpryses are against me, and yee beare yourselues in hand that yee bee able to compasse all things by your policies and wyles: but you shall fynd how there is no wisdome but in mee.

furthermore aboue all, when the cace standeth vpon walking before God: let vs looke that we rid and clenze ourselues from all hypocrisie : for the woorst wylinnesse in the whole world, is when men would beguyle God not that they say they will doo it, nor that they vse any such language, but so it is that they haue it printed in their hart. And it is not without cause that the prophet Esay Ezai.29. c. 15. sayeth. VVo be to you that dig caues vnder the earth, as who should say yee could hyde your selues in them: from whom? euen from God himself . And this is ouerryfe now adayes . VVhat is to be seene in all the world? for first of all what is it that men doo think concerning God?

There is not that man which thinketh not himself suffit ynough to scape out of his hand. And this is the verye cause why the wicked and the despizers of God doo run at rodot and beare theirselues in hand how it is but a beastlinnesse for vs to be afryd of the iudgement to come.

VVhen they see vs stand vpon the same, that is to wit, when they see vs exhort the people too feare the wrath and vengeance of God, and [shewe them] how it may bee prepared for vs : they make a mocke at it, saying : O:

see how these fellowes turmoyle theirselues in vayne :

but yet let vs not cease to make lustrie cheere : if we must needs come before God, well then the tyme is woorth the monie . Behold the diuelish blasphemies which a man shall heare: and although they passe not out of their mouthes, yet are their harts full fraught with them . Too be short, we see vngodlinnesse too be so vnreasonable and outrageous in these dayes, as it may well be sayd that men doo make their reckening to prouoke God to anger.

Let vs lerne therfore on our side to walk in such single-hartednesse, as God may not be compelled too lift vp his hand, to execute his dreadfull power wheroft mention is made heere : that is to wit, that we perish not, ne be ouer-taken in our owne wylinnesse . Thus we see what we haue to mark in this sentence. And consequently it is sayd, that God deliuereþ from the swoord and from the hand of them that are to myghtie, and that he which is afflicted shall haue hope berafter, and that the mouth of wickednesse shalbe stopped . This is added further for the comfort of Gods children. For what else is our state in this world than a tormenting with many greefs, and a troubling with many anguishses and annoyances? VVe are then in a continuall-battell. True it is that God sparcth vs now and then, as I haue sayd hertofore, because he seeth how we are weake and that if he should giue the brydle looce to Satan and his mates, we should be devoured at the first chop. VVel-then, our lord keepeth vs as it were brooded vnder his wings, and yet doth he suffer vs to be vexed and troubled, and to haue many hartsores giuen vs. And wherfore? To the intent we should be prouoked too desyre his help, and also to the intent we should lerne to take heede to ourselues, that we be not surprized by Satan : for there is no other cause of our decay but this negleage, which is, that we flee not vnto God in such wyse as wee be prouoked to call vpon him. Lo after what maner all of vs must be in this world that is to wit, we must be afflited. And in verye deede, the woord that signifieth Poore or oppressed in this place, signifieth also wel bumbled or brought lowe. And whyso? Because that pouertie is the true scholes mistresse to bring men to meeldnesse that they may not be to hyghmynded in themselves, nor haue the sayd ouerhardinesse and spirituall drunkennesse to aduenture too farre. But that they may walk according to their measure, assuring themselves that if God did not succour them every minute of an houre, they should bee vtterly vndone . Thus ye see (I say) how Gods children must bee fayne to be beset round about with manie afflictions in this world, if they purpose to be partakers of Gods kingdome hereafter . But we see little in this cace . For riche me are comonly puffed vp with statelinessse, and so daze-led in their pomps and pleasures, as it is a verye hard matter to make them humble. True it is that whensoeuer it pleaseþ God, he can saue the riche and greate ones as well as the poorest and mooste despzyed . But that is by brydling them, and by laying such afflictions vpon them, as they may be poore, I meene euen in the mids of their riches, and that they may knowe how their state is miserable, and therby be constreynd too seek God, and too hang wholly vpon him. Thus ye see in what plught God setteth vs at the first . But afterward it is sayd that he plucketh vs backe from the swoord, and that he deliuereþ vs from the throte and from the hand of him that is ouer-myghtie. At a woord, it is not Gods will that his faythfull ones should be mainteyned by ordinarie meanes, nor that they should always haue armyes in a redinessse to reuege themselfes when they bee assayled by their enimies, nor that they should haue greate fortifications, nor that they should be strongly alyed, and such other things: no: they shalbe vnprouyded of all such geere as to the worldward: or else if they haue them, it shal not bee to barre their enimies from being to strong and to myghtie for them, so as they should not bee able too stand against them by that meanes . VVe see then that we must not bee maynteyned by worldly meanes. But whensoeuer wee be hemmed in by such as are myghtier than wee, which seeke nothing else but to ouerwhelme vs: if we be rescowed frō them, it is to the end we should know, how it is God that defendeth vs, and which preserueth vs vnder his protection, & that wee be as it were brooded vnder his wings in such sort as he suffereth not the wicked to woork their malice vpon vs as they fayne would , and as they be redie to do, were it not that they be letted from aboue. Thus ye see what we haue to mark. And in deede we see a sufficient cleere mirrour of it in these dayes. For how goeth the world with vs? It seemeth that Gods enimies who are stark mad at his churche, should eat vs vp with one grayne of Salt as the prouerb sayeth. If a man make comparison of power, alas what power is there on our side?

VVe are as one little flocke of sheepe, and they are not only one herd of woolues, but as an infinite number of woolues. The whole world is full of such as could fynd in their harts to eat the verye bowels of vs . And they are not satisfyed with putting of vs to single death : but there is such crueltie among them, as a man may well perceyue it to be altogether hellish. Seing then that the power is so greate, I meene of them which seeke nothing but to destroy vs and to make cleane riddance of vs ; and yet ne-uerthelesse that, wee continue still [for all that they can doo]: if it be our chaunce to liue but one day, yet is it wel seenе thereby, that God executeth his office which is spoken of heere, that is to wit, that he deliuereþ him that is oppressed, out of the hand of him that is ouermyghtie.
VVe see then how we ought too be the better confirmed to trust

to trust in God, that as he hath begonne so he will continue to the end, and that if his poore churche be threatened or confpyred against, so as shee seemeth to be already as good as halfe oppressed: yet notwithstanding he both can and will remedie all things. And whysor? for he hath sayd it, and he hath not forgotten his cunning, he knoweth the meanes, howbeit that they be vnknowne vnto vs. Therfore let vs tarie his lesure paciently. And in conclusion he sayeth: That there shalbee hope for the afflicted for hereafter, and the mouth of wickednesse shall bee stopped. Here 10 is declared vnto vs for what purpose all that we haue herd hitherto hath bin spoken: that is to wit, to the intent wee should lerne to trut in God: for that is a verye hard matter to doo. True it is that every man will protest that he trusteth in God: but this trusting importeth much more than we can tell how to vtter: insomuch that euen they which shal haue studied this lesson all their lyfe long, shall haue profited well, if they haue lerned but half of it: that is to wit, too be throughly perswaded that God will not forsake them. VVhen this poynt (I say) is well settled 20 in our harts, it will be a greate forewardnesse for all our lyfe after. And it is exprely sayd, The hope for hereafter.

Rom. 4.d.17 And whysor? for we must hope against hope: that is too say, if we mynd too shewe that wee trust in God in good earnest, there must be no likelyhod of hope to the worldward, for vs to trust vnto, but death must hem vs in on all sides, & we must be so ouercast with darknesse in that respect, as there may, not be one spark of lyght to comforthe vs. Too bee short, we must haue nothing left vs save only the promis that God hath made vs, saying, I will be your 30 Sauiour, when as notwithstanding he seemeth therewithall to turne his backe vpon vs, and that he hath shaken vs off, yea and that he euen fauoreth our enimyes, and that he putteth the cudgell into their hand too strike vs with, and is altoogither against vs. I say when all this betydeþ, yet neuerthelesse must we trust continually in him. Thus ye see why it is sayd, that there is hope for hereafter for the oppressed. As if Eliphias should say, VVhe Gods chil- dren be come to the last cast: so as they wote not any more which way to turne them, that there is no way for them 40 to scape: yet let them not cease too hope that God will sheweth himself to be their father and Sauiour, and that he will neuer fayle them, condicionally that they rest them selues vpon the sayd promis that there shalbe hope for hereafter for the oppressed, and that they cease not too haue an eye to the lyfe that is prepared for them, though they see death before their eyes. Lo how wee ought too practyze this doctrine. Moreouer though our enimyes be not confounded at the first dash: yet will God woork in such wyse as shame shall lyght vpon them spygþ of their teethe. And this is it that is ment by this saying: That the mouth of wickednesse shall be stopped, which is as much to say, as the wicked shal not knowe how to reply against Gods iudgement. On our part it behoueth vs to haue our mouth open to glorifye God. For we must not resemble the wicked, who being confounded cease never a whit the more to blasphem God and too grynd their teethe at him, although they haue not what to reply against him. And this is the same saying whch clozeth vp the hundredth and seuenth Psalme, where Gods prouidence is spoken of. For Psa. 107.d.42. there it is sayd, that after God had punished the inhabiteres of the land for their sinnes, so as one sort of them were vexed with warre or sicknesse, and another sort suffered much inconuenience bothe by sea and by land: when he commeth to the diliuering of them, from all their miseries, the good men haue wherfore to glorifye him, and therwithall the mouth of wickednesse is stopped, that is to say, although the wicked dooers desyre nothing but to mocke God, and to cast out skoffs against him: yet must they be shet vp, that they may not knowe what to say, but be vtterly confounded for shame. By the report of this, wee knowe what Gods prouiderice is in gouerning things heere beneathe. And when we see his iudgements so manifest, let vs lerne too glorifye his holie name, and therwithall let vs flee vnto him in all our aduersities: and when he shall haue succored vs, let vs render thanks vnto him accordingly.

Now let vs cast downe ourselues before the presence, of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to voutsafe to make vs perceyue them better than wee haue doone, to the intent that wee knowing how vnwoorthie we are to be helped at his hand, may be so muche the willinger too resort vnto him for succour, folowing the way which he sheweth vs: that is to wit, that wee may come to our lord Iesus Christ too fynd grace by his meanes before the heauenly throne: and that we may come thither displeased with ourselues for our sinnes, beseeching him to clenze vs from them, too the intent that nothing may hinder vs of our resorting vntoo him, and of the obteyning of all our requests, according as he shall perceyue to be expedient for vs. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only vnto vs but also to all, &c.

The xxij. Sermon, which is the fifth vpon the fifth Chapter.

17. Behold, the man is blisſed vvhom God correcteth: Therefore refuze not thou the chastizement of the Almyghtie.
18. It is he that maketh the vvound, and vvhich byndeth it vp [It is he] vvhich smyteth, and vvhich bringeth lyfe.

Eretosore Eliphias hath declared what the power of God is, that wee myght be in the better rediness to receyue the doctrine which he addeth. For we see what the cause is why we be not so teachable as were requisite, namely, bycause we know not what the maiestic of God is, iat we nyght stand in awe of it. Therefore we haue neede to knowe, how God gouerneth the world, and to consider his infinit ryghtousenesse, power, and wisdom. Now if the wicked bee confounded bycause God sheweth himself against them, and so haue their mouthes stopped: what must become of vs? for God must not constreyne vs too doo him honour: it is ynough that he giueth vs occasion, and that he sheweth vs how there is iust cause for vs to do it, and wee must come to it of our owne good accord. Sothen, let vs beare in mynd what hath ben declared heretofoore: namely, that when Gods iudgements are layd afore vs, it is no matter to laught at, nor to dale with, but it behoueth all creatures to tremble at them. And now it is sayd, that the man is blisſed vvhom God chastizeth, and therefore that we must not refuze the corrections of the Almyghtie. If a man should tell vs that God dooeth men no wrong when he becommeth their iudge and vseth greate feueritie and rigour towards them: verely this ought too touche vs neere neere ynough: but yet wee would bee so astonished at this doctrine, as if a man had giuen vs a knocke on the heade with a beetle. What is too bee doone then? There must some sweetnesse bee mingled with it, that wee may take some taste of that which shal bee sayd vnto vs, assuring our selues that it is profitable too our saluation. So then, after that Eliphias hath set foorth Gods iudgements in generall, too diispose vs too feare him with all humilitie: now hee sheweth that God will bee louing vntoo vs howsoeuer the world go: and specially that when he chastizeth vs, he never vseth such sharpnesse towardes vs, but he will make vs feele his goodnesse and mercye therwithall, too the intent wee should approche vntoo him, and not bee dysmayed like those that are afryd too bee confounded. God then meeneth not that his maestic should bee so dreadfull too vs: but his meening is, too drawe vs vntoo him, too the ende wee should loue him, not only when he dooth vs good, but also even when he chastizeth vs for our sinnes. Thus wee see in effect what wee haue too gather vpon this sentence. But it should seeme that this sentence is contrarie too that which is written [elsewhere] in the holie scripture: which is, that all the miseries and aduersities which wee suffer in this earthly lyfe, procede of sin, and consequently of Gods curse. How can these things agree, that wee should bee blissted when God chastizeth vs, and yet nevertheless that all the miseries which come vntoo vs from his hand, are as many signes of his displeasure, and that wee haue offended him, and that he curseth vs? For whence come our happinesse and our ioy, but from God? And on the contrarie part, when God is against vs, wee see our lyfe is cursed. Againe when wee feele that God is angry with vs by his punishing of vs, it should seeme there is smal blisfenesse in that. But wee haue too mark heire, how Eliphias hath an eye too the intent and end wherat God ameth when hee chastizeth men. True it is that God dooth vs well too vnderstante, that hee abhorreth sinne, and in very deede the order which he appoynted at the making of the worlde, is troubled when he handlith vs not like a father. Yee see then how all the aduersities of this lyfe shewe vs some signe of Gods curse, too the end that thereby wee should vnderstand, that sinne displeaseith him, and that hee hateth and abhorreth it, and cannot beare with it, by cause he is the fountayne of all ryghtuousenesse. But yet for all this, after that God hath so declared the hatred which hee beareth against sin: he will also haue vs too perceyue how he draweth, exhorteth, and sommoneth vs too repentance. And so, dooth God scourge vs? It is a token then that he is loth wee should perish, and that hee dooth rather prouoke vs too returne vntoo him. For corrections are records that God is redye too receyue vs too mercye, if wee acknowledge our faults and ask him forgiuenesse vnfeynedly. Seing the eace standeth so, wee must not think it strange that Eliphias should say, that the man is happy whom God chastizeth. But wee must beare in mynd the two poyncts that I haue touched, wheroft the one is, that so soone as any aduersitie befalleth vs, the wrath of God must come before our eyes, so as wee may understand that he cannot away with sin: and therupon wee must consider the rigour of his iustice, so as wee may bee hertely sorie that wee haue offended. Behold at what poynct wee ought too begin. And therewithall also let vs moreouer take holde of Gods goodnesse, in that he suffereth vs not too runne intoo destruction without drawing of vs home again to himself, and in that his meening is too bring vs backe so often as he scourgeth vs. Thus yee see what wee haue too conceyue in all our afflictions. But there remayneth yet one hard poynt: for in the meane season wee see how afflictions lyght vpon all men without exception. God chastizeth those too whom hee is mynded too shewe mercie: and wee see also that he punisheth the castawayes, and yet shall the same turne too their greater damnation. What auayled all the roddes that Pharao felte, sauing that they made him the more vnxecusable, bycause hee continewd stubborne and vnable too bee amended, against God euern too his end? Forasmuch then as God scourgeth bothe good and bad, and wee see by experiance that afflictions are as fyre too kindle Gods wrath more and more against the castawayes: it foloweth therepon, that God chastizeth many folks which are not reckened too bee happie therefore. And herepon it behoueth vs too note, that Eliphias speaketh heire but of those whom God chastizeth as his children too their profit, as he declareth by that which foloweth, saying, that God byndeth vp the woundes whiche be bath made, swadling them, and laying playsters too them, and making them whole. Yee see then how Eliphias restreyneth this sentence too those in whom God maketh his chalcements too turne too true amendment. But this sentence wil bee somewhat with the darkeste, if it bee not layd foorth somewhat more at large, that yee may haue a sure and cleere resolution of it. Let vs mark how God woorketh toward the castawayes. True it is, that he exhorteth all men too re-pentance when he chastizeth the (as I haue sayd alredye) and it is all one as he should wake them vp and say, knowe your faults, and continew no longer in them, but returne vntoo mee, and I am redye too shewe you mercie. But yet for all that, it is well knowne that these sayd chastizements profit not all men, and also that he giueth not all men the grace too returne vntoo him. For it is not ynough for God too stryke vs with his hand, except he touche vs within also by his holie spirit. If God softene not the hardnesse of our harts, it will fall out with vs as it did with Pharao. For men are like vntoo stithies or Anuyls: the beating vpon them is not able to chaunge their nature, for wee see how they beate backe the blowes again. Euen so then vntill God haue touched vs too the quicke within, it is certeine that wee shall doo nothing but kicke against him and gather rankour more and more: and whensoeuer he chastizeth vs, wee shall gnash our teethe at him, and wee shall doo nothing else but storme at him. And in good soothe the wickednesse of men is so mischeuous, so headstrong, and so desparate, that the more that God chastizeth them, the more doo they spew out theyr blasphemyes, and shewe themselves too bee vtterly past amendment, so as there is no way too bring them vntoo reason. Let vs lerne then, that till God haue touched vs with his holie spirit, it is vnpossible that his chastizements should serue to bring vs backe to repentence, but rather they shall make vs too wex woorie, and worse. Yet can it not bee sayd that God is not ryghtouse in so dooing. And whyso? for thereby men are conuincid, insomuchas if God hid them not at a bay in that sort by punishing their sines, they myght pleade ignorance, that they never wist of it, and that they overshot themselues because God had not prouoked them too acknowledge their faults. But when they haue felte the hand of God, so as they haue bin fayne too perceyue his iudgements spye of their teethe, and have bin as it were sommoned, and yet notwithstanding haue not only gone onward from evill too worse, but also ben puffed vp with open open and manifest rebellion against God: Hereby wee see, that in effect they haue their mouth stopped, and that they haue not any more too say for themselues. Yee see then how God sheweth his justice as often as hee punishmenteth men, notwithstanding that the sinne bee not found too bee a correction too their amendment. Furthermore, when God chastizeth the castawayes, it is all one as if hee should out of hand begin too shewe his wrath vpon them; and that the fyre of it were alredye kindled. True it is that they are not vtterly consumed for the present tyme, howbeit they are tokens of the horrible vengeance that is prepared for them at the latter day. Yee see then that many men are touched with Gods hand, which notwithstanding are accursed. For they begin their hell alredye in this world, according as wee haue examples in all such as amend not their wicked lyfe when God sendeth afflictions vpon them, but a man shall see them take a corner and stande barking like dogges, and though they bee

Psal. 32. 18. able too doo no more, yet ceasse they not too shewe a continuall woodnesse. Or else they are like reslie iades as comparison is made in the twoo and thirtith Psalme: or finally they are altoogither ouersotted, so as they knowe not theyr owne harme, I meene as too consider the hand that striketh as the Prophet sayeth: They wil crye alas, and they shall feele the blowes. But what for that? they think never the more vpon Gods hand, neyther knowe they howe it is hee that visiteth them. VVee see then before our eyes, that many men are the more vnhappie for being chaste-30 zed at Gods hand, because they profit not in his schoole, nor yet take any good by his corrections. But heere is mention made precysely of those whom God chastyzeth by touching them with his holie spirit. Therefore let vs assure our selues, that when God maketh vs too feele his hand, so as wee are humbled vnder the same: hee dooth vs a speciall good turne, and it is a priuiledge which he giueth too none but too his owne children. VVhen wee feele the corrections which he sendeth vs, and moreouer are taught too mislike of 40 our selues for our offences, too sygh and grone for them before him, and too flee too his mercye for refuge: I say, when wee haue such a feeling of Gods chastygements: it is a token that he hath wrought in our harts by his holie spirit. For it is too hygh a poynt of wisdome too growe in the mynd of man: it must procede of the free goodnesse of our God: the holie Ghost must first haue softened the sayd cursed hard-nessse and stubbornesse wherevntoo wee are inclined of nature. Let vs vnderstand then that this present text is spoken precysely of Gods children, who are not stubborn against his hand, but are ouermaystred and tamed by the holie Ghost, too the intent they shoulde not stryue agaynst the afflictions which he sendeth vntoo them. But yet will this saying seeme straunge after the opinion of the flesh. VVhyso? VVhatsoeuer inconueniences fall out otherwyse than wee would haue them, wee terme them *Aduersitie*s. VVhen wee indure anye hunger, thirst, cold, or heate, wee say that euery one of these is an aduersitie. VVhyso? for

beguyled by flattering of our selues. Furthermore I haue alredye told you, not only that it is requisite for vs too consider, that Gods scourging of vs is bycause hee hateth sinne, and that his summoning of vs before him, is too make vs feele him too bee our iudge: but also that he had neede too reache out his armes vntoo vs, and too shewe vs that hee is redie too bee at one with vs whensoeuer wee shall come too him with true repentance. So then wee perceyue, that they whom God chastyzeth are happie, notwithstanding that wee shunne aduersitie as much as wee possiblly can. Also wee shall never consent too this doctrine too receyue it with our hart: vntill fayth haue made vs too behold the goodnessse that God vseth towards his seruants, when hee draweth them backe too himself. And that wee may the better comprehend this, let vs marke what becommeth of men when God leaueth them too themselues, and maketh no countenance of clenzing them from their sinnes. Looke vpon a man that is giuen too all euell: as for example, let vs take a despicer of God: if God let him alone and seeime not too chastyze him, yec shall see such a one harden himself, and the diuell shall carye him still further and further: and therefore it were much better for him, that hee had ben chastyzed sooner. And so, the greatest mishappe that can lyght vpon vs, is when God suffereth vs too welter in our owne wickenesse: for then must wee needs rotte away in it in the end. Verely it were greatly too bee desyred, that men would come vntoo God of their owne accord without spurring, and that they would cleave vnto him without any warning giuen them of their faults, and without any rebuking of them: this (I say) were a thing greatly too bee wifshed, yea and moreouer, that there were no faulthe in vs, and that wee were as Angels, desyring nothing but too yelde obedience too our maker, and too honour and loue him as our father. But forasmuchas wee bee so foward, that wee cease not too offend God: [and besydes that] doo play the hypocrites with him, seeking too conceale our taules from him: and forasmuchas there is so greate pryd in vs, that wee would haue God too let vs alone and too vphold vs in our lusts, and fynally would bee his judges rather than hee should bee ours, considering (I say) how wee bee so foward: it standeth God on hand too vsesome violent remedie too drawe vs vntoo him. For if hee should handle vs altoogither by gentlenesse, what would become of it? VVee see this thing partly euell in young children. For if their fathers and moothers chastyze them not, they send them too the gallowes. True it is that they perceyue it not: howbeit experiance sheweth it, and wee haue common prouerbes of it, that the more that fathers cocker their children, the more doo they marre them: and the moothers doo it yet much more: for they bee fond in flattering of them, and in the meane whyle doo bring them too naught: Herein God sheweth vs as it were small beames of that thing which is much more in himself. For if hee should handle vs myldely, wee should bee vtterly vndoone and past recouerie. Therefore he must bee fayne too shewe himselfe a father towards vs, and too bee rowgh with vs, sence wee are of so sturdie a nature, that if he shoulde deale gently with vs, wee should take no good by it. Yee see how wee may atteyne too the truthe of this doctrine, that the man is happie whom God chastyzeth: that is too wit, by considering what our nature is, namely how it is

Stubborne, how it is hard to be framed to order, and that if God shold never chastize vs, it were not for our profit: and therefore that it is needfull that hee shold hold vs short, and that he shold giue vs so manie lasshes with the whippe, as wee shold bee constreynd too regard him whither wee would or no. Then shall wee at length come too conclude, that the man is happie whom God chastizeth: yea verely if he addē the second grace vntoo it: that is too wit, if hee make his roddes and his corrections too auayle, and cause the holie Ghost 10 too woork in such wyse in the hart, as a man may no more bee hardened too aduaunce himself against God, but may haue the care too think vpon his owne sinnes, and be ryghtly tamed and humbled. Thus yee see why I sayd that the greatest benefyte which wee can haue, is too bee corrected at Gods hand, in so much that when wee haue cast our account too the full, wee shall fynd that the corrections which hee sendeth vs, are more for our profit than the bread that wee eate. For if wee starue for hunger, God will haue pitie vpon vs 20 in taking of vs out of this world. But if wee liue still heere bylowe, and ceasse not too prouoke the wrath of him that sheweth himselfe so good and liberall a father toowards vs: see yee not too shamefull an vnthankfulness? I pray you, had it not ben better that wee had ben borne dead, than that wee should so prolong our lyfe too our damnation? But if God preuent vs and vse chastyzements as [preseruatye] medicines, and tarye not till the disease bee too farre ouergrowne: is it not a greate benefyte too vs, and such a one as wee ought too wish for? Sot hen, as oft and so long as his corrections are hard and bitter too vs, and that our flesh prouoke vs too impaciencie and dispayre, let vs lerne too call this lesson too remembrance, that the man is happie whom God chastyzeth, howbeit that our imagination will not say so: for contrarily wee surmyze that nothing is better, than too bee spared and borne withall. But certeinly although wee knowe by experiance, how it is not without cause that the holie Ghoste hath vitred such a sentence: yet notwithstanding it is not ment thereby, that the corrections which wee haue too indure, are not euermore sowre and paynfull in themselues, according as the Apostle sayeth: and God also will haue vs too feele the prickings that put vs too Payne. For if wee feele no greef when God correcteth vs, where is our obedientnesse? And furthermore, how shall wee lerne too bee angrie with our selues for our sinnes? How shall wee bee afrayd of Gods iudgements too bee tamed aryght? Then behoueth it vs too bee greeued with the aduersitie which God sendeth vs. And although the aduersitie bee turned too our benefyte, and that God doo therby shewe that he loueth vs: yet is it requisite that there bee some pricking and painfulnesse in it, too the intent wee may perceyue the wrath of God, and bee displeased with our selues for our sinnes. But yet heere-withall wee must mount vp hygher, and when wee haue found how our nature is inclyned too all euill: let vs confess ourselues to haue neede that God shold vse some sharp punishment too purge vs withall, as wee see phisicions doo, who now and then put some kynd of poison in their medicines, after as they see the maladies too bee greate and deeperooted. The Phisicion feeth well ynough how it is too the weakening of a poore man and too the vnstrengthening of his veynes and sinewes: and specially when no gentler meanes will serue than letting of bloud, it is euen as much as too drawe the substance out of a mannes bodye, and yet must he needs vse suche

violent meanes, too remedie such a maladie: Euen so is God fayne too woork with vs, howbeit that the same bee an extraordinarie maner with him. For when wee say wee bee happie too bee chastyzed at Gods hand: it must leade vs vntoo lowelinesse, seing that God cannot procure our saluation, but by shewing himself too bee against vs. Is it not too bee sayd iustly, that there is a maruelouse corruptnesse in men, sith God cannot bee their Sauiour and farther but by handling them roughly? For his nature is too shewe himselfe gracious and gentle too all his creatures. And he foloweth the order which he would keepe as in respect of himself: he dooth nothing else but spred out his goodnessse vpon vs, in such wyse as wee should bee replenished with his grace to bee wholly rauished therat. But now, if hee handle vs gently according too his owne nature and inclinacion: wee are vndoone. And therefore hee is fayne as it were too alter his mynd: that is too say, too shewe himselfe otherwyse towards vs than hee would bee. And what is the cause thereof? Our vnrecoverable naughtinesse. And therefore wee haue good cause heere too bee confounded with shame, when wee see that hee is fayne (as yee would say) too disguise himselfe, if hee intend that wee should not perish. Thus much as touching this sentence. Howbeit forasmuchas wee cannot well apply this doctrine too our vse, without the adding of that which foloweth: let vs ioyne them bothe toogither. It is sayd, Refuse not the correction of the Almyghtie: for he that hath made the wound, byndeth it vp, and layeth conuenient playsters too it, and when he hath sent the maladie, he healeth it. Heere wee are exhorted, not too refuze Gods corrections. And the cause thereof is added byandby: that is too witte, because God will giue it a god issue. Loe wherin consisteth the sayd happinesse wherof Eliphas hathe made mention. Let vs learme heere, that when God purposeth too exhort vs too pacience, hee not only telleteth vs that wee cannot eschew his hand, that wee doe but lose tyme in rebelling against him, that wee must passe that way spyte of our teethe, and that wee cannot withstand necessitie: for that were but the pacience of a Lumbard as they say, when wee shold gynd our teethe after that maner, and therewithall list vp our selues against God as much as in vs lyeth, so as wee should not bee pacient, but perforce. Therefore if wee will bee pacient too Godward, wee must bee drawnen too him after another maner: that is too wit, wee must bee soone conforted as saynet Paule speaketh in the fifteenth too the Romaines, where he putteth these twoo things togither as inseparable: that is too witte, that too the intent wee may have pacience in all our aduersities, wee must haue a taste of Gods goodnessse, wee must reioyce of his grace, and wee must assure our selues that his scourging of vs is for our welfare. And this is the thing that is shewed vs in this streyne: when it is sayd: Refuze not the correction of the almyghtie. For it is hee that is the Surgeon of all your sores, it is he that will send you helth of all your diseases. God then sheweth vs heere, how his meening is not that mennes submitting of themselues vntoo him shold be too say: Seing wee can noneotherwyse doo, needs must God haue the maystrie of vs, for wee cannot exempt ourselues from his iurisdiction. The cace standeth not vpon comming too him so, but our lord sayeth: No: but bee ye pacient, humble your selues vnto mee, and take warning by my iudgements that yee murmure not against mee, ne stomack the matter: or otherwyse ye shal bee fayne too bee beaten downe by my hand, yea euen in such wyse as yee shal bee vtterly ouerouerwhelmed. But if yee hubly acknowledge your faults, and come to me to craue pardon : ye shall feele assuagement of your miseries, in suche sorte as yee shall haue cause to yelde mee thankes, even in the middes of your greatest troubles. Beholde (say I) what we haue to muze vpon, that wee may haue the true pacience. Seing then that of our owne nature wee be stubborne against God, and are angry with him if he do but touche vs with his little finger : seing also that wee haue suche a prouidenesse in vs, as wee thinke that God dothe vs wrong if he chastize vs : Seing (I say) that wee haue these two so greate vices : it is a very harde matter too purge vs of them. So much the more therefore must wee minde the lesson that is shewed vs here : that is too witte, that God by scourging vs meeneth to bring vs backe to himselfe, yea even to our benefite and welfare. Furthermore it behoueth vs to marke well the promisse that is set downe here : that is too wit, that God will heale the woundes which be hath made. True it is that this healing pertayneth not to all men, but onely to suche as receyue his corrections muckely. And by the way lette vs marke, that God will haue all menne put in minde to returne vnto him, considering the gentlenesse whiche he sheweth them. But what? There are many which taste not the thing that is conteyned here : and this also is the cause why we see so much impacience, so muche murmuring, and so muche blasphemie vsed against God. The corrections light on all through out, but where is the repentance? There is none at all. But we see how it seemeth that men had conspired to withstand God to the vittermost. VVhy is that? Because there are very fewe that conceyue this present doctrine, or that receyue the sayde promise to say, Lorde it is thine office too binde vp the woundes which thou hast made, and to heale the sore. And therefore lette vs remember well this lesson, specially seing it is so often repeated. For it is not onely in this sentence, that the holy Ghoste speaketh so : but also wee see howe it is sayde, the Lorde smyeth vs, and healeth vs againe the thirde day after : so that if he haue giuen vs any strype with his rodde, wee shoulde not therefore imagine that he will not bee mercifull too vs when wee come vnto him. VVhen suche exhortacions are made vnto vs in the Prophetes, it is all one as if God should say vnto vs, true it is that I haue scoured you for a whyle, but I will spredde out my mercie vpon you, and that shall bee euerlasting : so as if yee felte any anger or any signe of choler (as in a father that is displeased with his children,) it was not because I haue hated you, but because I haue bene fayne to make you feele the fruite of your sinnes, and to doo you to vnderstande that I hate them : neuerthelesse, in the ende yee shall finde that I purpose nothing els but to heale the woundes, and to cure the diseales which I haue sent. True it is that at the first blushe, to our seeming, it is not meete that God shoulde take pleasure, to wounde men first, and then to heale them. VVhy rather dothe he not lette vs alone in peace and prosperitie? But I haue alreadie shewed that the woundes which God maketh are as good as medicines too vs. It is then a double grace which God graunteth vs here. The one is that when God scourgeth vs, he procureth our welfare by drawing vs too repentance and by purging vs from our sinnes, specially from the sinnes that wee know not of. For God is not contented to remedie the inconueniences that are alreadie present: but he considereth also that there is much seede of sickenesse hidden within vs. Therefore he layeth holde on vs aforhande, he redresseth things amisse, and singular is the benefite that he dothe vnto vs when he seemeth too come against vs with naked swoorde, and pretendeth to bee angry with vs, and yet notwithstanding sheweth hymselfe a Philacion how soever the worlde go. Marke this for a speciaall poynt. Then foloweth the second grace which also is well shewed vnto vs : that is to witte, that God bindeth vp the woundes which he hath made, and healeth them. And this is it which I haue alledged alreadie out of Sainct Paule, how he suffereth vs not to be tempted 1. Corin. 10. c. 13. aboue our power, but giueth a good issue to all our miseries. So then although corrections bee profitable, yea and necessarie for vs, and that God is fayne to pronoke vs by diuers meanes to returne vnto him : yet notwithstanding he spareth vs, and looketh not altogether what our sinnes require, but what wee are able to beare. And here yee see why he sayeth that he will chastize vs with 2. Sam. 7. b. 14. a mans hande, that is too say he will not proceede according too his owne mighty power. For what would become of vs, if God should stretch out his arme against vs? Alas, what creature were able too stande before him? Verily he needeth no more but to shewe one angry looke, and beholde all the worlde shoulde perishe. And though he doo not so : yet let him but withdrawe Psal. 104. d. 29. his spirite, and all muste needes decay, as it is sayde in the hundred and fourth Psalme. But he handleth vs gently, and therewithall also withdraweth his hande when he seeth vs to sore oppressed, and spareth vs when wee bow vnder the burthen, condicionally that wee bee of a lowly and meeke minde. For wee knowe how he telleth vs Lewis. 26. d. 23. 24. in his lawe, that if wee fall to sturdinessse against him, he will be sturdie towards vs, as he sayeth also in the eighteenth Psalme, I will be stubborne against suche as are Psalin. 18. d. 27. stubborne. VVee make a fayre hande if we be stour, and stubborne, and fumish against God : let vs not thinke to compasse him by that meanes. For he will be frowarde with the frowarde : that is too say, he will be ouer terrible when he seeth men vse such an obstinate malice against him, and therefore needes must they bee vterly oppressed. But if wee bee of a meeke minde to submitte our selues too the mighty hande of God : it is certayne 40. 1. Pet. 5. b. 6. that wee shall always finde that thing in him which is spoken of here. Then let vs folow that which is shewed vs by the Apostle. Humble your selues (sayeth he) vnder the mighty hande of God. For who soever stoupeth downe with his head, who soever boweth his knee before God to honour him, shall feele his hande readie to releue him if he fall. But he that lifteth himselfe vp against God, shall bee sure to feele Gods hande against him. Desire wee to feele Gods hande vnder vs to ayde vs? Then let vs humble our selues. But who soever aduaunceth himselfe, he muste needes rushe against the hande of God, and feele the thunderclap that shall vterly ouerwhelme him. And so let vs beare well in minde this lesson when it is sayde, Refuse not the correction of the almighty. VVhen wee shall haue caught holde of Gods goodnessse, so as we know his fatherly loue: it will serue to sweeten the afflictions, whiche otherwise will seeme harshe and sharpe to vs. But in the meane while every one of vs muste apply this lesson to his owne vse. For it will bee an easie matter for vs to say, Blissed bee God for chastizing men so: and yet in the meane season, when we our selues be chastized, we do not prayse him, but rather grudge against him. Truly wee muste not deale so with him. But when soever wee our selues are scoured, lette vs receyue the corrections paciently, and let vs our selues take those things for incoragements, which wee can skill to giue for comfortes vnto others. Let vs vnderstand then how there is not that man of vs, which hath not many vyses, in him, and that the same are as many diseases, which God cannot heale but by meanes of the afflictions which he sendeth vs. True it is that if he listed too vse an absolute power, he coulde well doo it otherwise: but wee speake not nowe of Gods almightyngesse, wee treate onely of the meane which his will is too keepe towardes vs. For asmuch then as it is Gods will too holde this sayde order of remedying our vices by scourging vs: it behoueth every of vs to studie this lesson for himselfe, to the ende wee may all confesse

Psal. 119. with Dauid, Lorde it is too my profite, that thou haste 10 Ibith. brought me lowe. Dauid speaketh not there of other men, to say, Lord thou haste done well too chastyze such as haue done amisse: but he beginneth at himselfe. And so muste wee doo. And that is it which the holy Ghost sheweth vs here, saying, Behold the man is happie whom God chastizeth. And why so? For men cannot abide to bee gouerned by God, but they stiuie against him and continue alwayes vnamendable, and therfore it is reedefull and profitable for them to be chastized of God. And for asmuch as wee see Gods hand lifted vp now a dayes 20 bothe generally and severally: wee ought too bee the more touched with this doctrine. It is apparant into what enormities the worlde is come: and is it any wonder then, if God shewe suche rigour? And yet is it certayne that he beareth very muche with vs in doing thereof. True it is that a man may see he punisheth not the wicked as he doth vs, notwithstanding that they bee rebellious and obstinate to the vttermost, and will not yeelde themselues vnto God for all the warnings that a man can giue them. But what? He summoneth them by all the afflictions which he layeth before their eyes in the persones of other men, and specially by those which he maketh them too feele nowe and then in their owne persones. And he will condemne them of stubborne wilfulness because they continue so rebellious and obstinate. But on our side, lette vs pray him that he will not suffer vs too bee so hardened: but that assoone as he shall shewe vs the signes of his displeasure, he will worke in suche wise in vs by his holy spirit, as he may soften the sayde hardnesse of our hartes, that his grace may take place when he shall haue receyued vs to mercie, according as we haue neede thereof, and as wee may perceyue if we be not tooo ouerblockishe.

But let vs fal downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, beseeching him to make vs so to milike of them, as we may desire nothing so much as to returne to him to craue pardon, framing our selues wholy too his good will, according as he hath shewed the same to vs in his holy lawe, to walke all our lyfe long in his feare, to glorifie his holy name, and too honour him accordingly. And so lette vs say, Almighty God and our heauenly father, &c.

The xxij. Sermon, which is the sixth vpon the fifth Chapter.

19. Hevwill deliuer thee from sixe afflictions, and in the seuenth the euill shall not touch thee.
20. In the time of dearth he shal preserue thee fro death, & fro the syword in the time of vvarre.
21. Thou shalt bee hidden from the course of the tong, and thou shalt not bee afryd vwhen destruction commeth.
22. Thou shalt laugh in destruction and dearth, and shalt not be afryd of the beasts of the field.
23. Thou shalt haue league vwith the stones, and the vvilde beasts shall be brought to haue peace vwith thee.
24. Thou shalt perceyue that thy Tent is in suretie, and in visiting thy house thou shalt not bee greeued.
25. Thou shalt seethy linage increace, and thine offspring as the grasse of the ground.
26. Thou shalt come to thy graue, being full as a recke of corne gathered in due season.
27. Behold, vve haue inquired of these things, it is so: therfore herken, and marke it for thy self.

Esterday I intreated of the comfort that is set downe here for all the feithfull when God afflieteth the: which is, that their wounds are not deadly, because God will at length deliver them from their miseries, for so much as he is the Surgeon to cure their stripes. And truly he temporeth them with such measure, as wee are not vtterly oppressed, because he vpholdeth vs for pise of the feblenesse that is in vs. Therfore to be short, God by his wonderfull prouidence doth continually cause the issue of our afflictions to be happie, and ministreth matter of gladnesse vnto vs, considering how it is for our benefit and welfare, as Sainct Paule also speaketh in the eight too the Romanes. And nowe too Rom.8.f.27 confirme the same matter it is sayde, That God will deliver his chosen from sixe troubles, or daungers, and that in the seuenth the euill shall not come at them. Hereby it is signified vnto vs, that God will perchance suffer vs to endure many miseries, and when we be scaped out of one, we shall enter into another, and that it may be as a continuall exercise for vs all the time of our life, so as there shall be no respite for the poore children of God, but that they shal be tormentēd now after one fashion & now after another: Yea (which more is) it behoueth them & it is expedient for them to be so hadled, because of their sinnes: but yet neuerthelesse God giueth their afflictions a good end, notwithstanding that the number of the be infinite. Thus yee see in effect what is shewed vs here. And wee haue neede of this promisse, considering the vntowardnesse that is in vs. For albeit we haue felt by experience, that God haue ayded and succored vs in some aduersitie: yet afterward if we be in daunger againe, it seemeth to vs that there is no looking for succor at his hand. See ye not an ouer great vnthankfulness & frowardnesse? Yet notwithstanding, as oft as God helpeth those that are his, it is to assure the for the time to come, to the end they might alwaies haue recourse vnto him, reasoning thus with themselves: seeing that my God hath helped me & pitied me so at my neede, he will not forget me any more so long as I liue: therfore wil I call vpō him and resort vnto him for refuge, & I am sure he is ready always to remedie all the incoueniences that can happen vnto me. Behold then how God would assurē vs of his succor, & yet we cannot find in our hartes to trust vnto it. On the contrarie part, when he doeth vs good, wee imagine that he is werie to be overcloyd by vs, & that he would not haue vs to trouble him any more, or rather we forget his releueing of vs, so as we put no trust in him as he woulde that wee shoulde doo. W<sup>e</sup>e see then how wee haue neede to minde well this lesson, that is too witte, that God will deliuer vs out of sixe troubles : as if it had bene sayde, wee must not trust in God, onely for a day or twoo, or onely for one push: but for as muche as our life is full of many miseries, so as wee bee no sooner cropen out of one aduersitie, but there commeth another freshe in the necke of it, and so wee bee tormented with miseries out of number: therefore inasmuche as wee haue a continual battell, and shoulde bee ouerthrowne incontinently if God were not at hande too helpe vs : we must beleue it for a certaintie, that he will not fayle vs. Some expound this text more precisely, as though it were sayd, that God will deliuer vs from miseries all the time of our lyfe, and in the ende make vs to passe out of all, by taking vs out of this worlde. For like as the worlde was made in sixe dayes: so also mans lyfe is willingly comprehēded in that number, and then commeth rest when God strippeth vs out of this mortall bodie: for ye see how he then maketh an ende of all our labours, grieves, and battelles. But lette it suffize vs too haue the playne meening of this texte: whiche is, that although wee bee tossed with many miseries during this present life : God will continually make vs way out of them, and bring vs to a good hauen. To be short, mention is made here of seuen corrections after the common maner of the holie Scripture : for this sayd nomber of Seuen importeth a greate, and as it were an infinite quantitie. And here yee see why it is sayde

times a day and riseth againe. True it is that some men vnderstande this too bee ment of sinning: but Salomon speaketh onely of the mischaunces that we fall into. For wee be beaten with many roddes, one while there commeth some disease, and an other time some other aduersitie: now some man shal trouble vs, & anon another shal do vs some wrong. Yee see then the falles which Gods children fall into, so that in steede of holding them vp with strong hande, it seemeth that he letteth them tumble downe like little babes which haue no strength. But what? When wee be so falne, God dothe alwayes recueue vs: and specially (as he sayeth in another text,) he will haue his hande vnder vs, and will not suffer vs too fall oter harde. Then lette vs learne by thisstreyne, that we are warned first of al not to maruell though it behoue vs to come in many tribulations. And why? for God hath set vs in the worlde to the same purpose and ende: and therefore it is not for vs too promisse our selues this or that. And what shall wee gayne by bearing our selues in hande that wee shall haue that thing which is not in our power to haue? Also God will alwayes suffer vs to be disappointed of our expectation, when we be so foolish as too make our reckening without him, and submit not our selues to his gouernment. Therefore noman muste warrant himselfe a continuall reste, seing that God will haue vs to fight, and that it is his pleasure too exercise vs so. Furthermore, sith wee see that wee ceasse not too prouoke Gods wrath, and that there is suche store of faults in vs: is it meete that wee shoulde therupon desire too liue at our ease, and in pleasures, never too parte from them? were not that inough too make vs rotte in our owne dung, if God shoulde not skoure vs from them by afflictions? Lette vs learne then to prepare our selues too battaile, assuring our selues that whyle we liue in this worlde, wee are not here as in a Paradise, but wee be here to haue many miseries and troubles, because Gods will is so. And so wee knowe that aduersities are profitable for vs, yea and necessarie for our saluation, and that God is fayne to visite and quicken vs vp after that maner. Thus much concerning the first poynt, how the holy Ghost declareth here that the faishfull shall bee subiect too many infirmitiis. For he speaketh not but of Gods children, euen of those too whom he sheweth mercie: and yet notwithstanding he sayeth euen of them, that they shall bee tormented, not of one affliction alone, but of sixe or seuen. Nowe by the way after wee bee warned too bee pacient in all our aduersities: lette vs also beare in minde the presente conforte that is giuen vs here: that is too witte, that God will never fayle vs at our neede. True it is that he will not succour vs at euerie pinche, to exempt vs vtterly from all miserie: but yet will he succor vs in due season, and that shall bee inough for vs, although wee bee driuen too an afterdeale, and bee not ayded by him so soone as our desire would craue it. For our desires are as boyling as may bee, and God delayeth and letteth vs alone too trie our pacience. But in the meane season (as I haue sayde) lette that suffyze vs whiche God hath declared vnto vs: namely that we shall not bee disappoyneted of his helpe, so wee tarie his ley-sure quietly, till he see it good too deliuer vs. Thus yee see what wee haue to beare in minde. And in conclusion, whensoeuer God shall haue made vs too wade out of many miseries, so as he suffereth vs not too enter into them any more, but deliuereth vs out of them once for all: It is as much too say, as God will continually increase his goodnessse towards vs, and that if wee haue felte his helpe sixe times (that is too say many a time and often) in the ende he will shewe himselfe yet more fauorable towards vs, and his meening is, not onely to reach vs his hande at all times, too make vs way out of the miseries wherein wee bee: but also will take vs into his eternall rest, and make an ende of all the troubles where-with wee are encompassed as nowe. So then, all the benefites that God bestoweth vpon vs in this present life, doo guyde vs vnto this one marke: that is to witte, that in the ende our saluation shall bee perfect and full. God as nowe giueth vs a little taste of it: but lette vs tarie till he haue brought things to their true perfection, and then shall wee perceyue him too bee our Sauiour. Lo howe the benefites whiche wee receyue in this worlde, ought too giue vs a more large and high expectation of Gods goodnessse, the whiche is shewed nowe in parte, and not all wholly. But after he hath sayde so, he addeth, That yee shall bee deliuered in the tyme of dearth. Some are of opinion, that Eliphias declareth here the seuen afflictions wherof he hath spokēn. But this so curious exposition, hath no substantialnesse for a man too reste fully vpon. Therefore lette vs followe the naturall sence such as it is: that is too witte, that according as the miseries are infinite wherewith God scourgeth vs in this worlde: so muste our hope stretch our it selfe farre and wide, too the ende wee may continually wayte for the sayde deliuerance which he hath promised vs, what soeuer kinde of miseries wee indure. Yee see why here is men. i. in made of dearth, of warre, of wilde beastes, of stormes and tempestes, of fyre, and of other calamities, according as wee see howe our poore lyfe is besieged with so many sortes of aduersities as nothing can bee more. The thing then that is declared to vs in effect, is that God not onely draweth vs out of dearth, nor onely deliuereth vs from warre: but also that in what trouble soeuer wee bee, wee shall finde that he hath the issue of it in his hande, according as it is sayde that he hath the issues [or out- goings] of deathe in his hande. And this is a righte necessarie poynte. For wee see what the superstition of menne is: that is too witte, that they distribute

Gods offices vnto others, bycause that (too their seeming) they coulde not finde remedie for all inconueniences, if they shoulde resorte all too one place. Here yee see why the Papistes make one Sainct or twoo, or three, or fower to haue the charge of Agues, another too haue the keeping of the fruities of the earth, and a thirde too haue rule of suche a disease. And why is it? for they imagine that if they shoulde resorte vnto God when they haue the ague, or if they shoulde come too him for helpe when they haue the dropsie: he were not able too intende too so many things at once, and therefore it were better that eche seuerall office were committed too a seuerall Sainct, or els to twoo or three of them, and so consequently that the lyke shoulde bee done too this Sainct and that Sainct. Behold how men teare Gods maiestie in pieces by their diuelish superstitions, when they robbe him after that sorte of his operation, and put it ouer too his creatures. Also lette vs marke well this doctrine, wherein it is declared vnto vs, that if God keepe vs from the plague, he will also keepe vs from the swoorde, so as men neede not too go distribute his office too this man or that: for lette vs assure our selues that he will be our Sauiour, not onely in parte, but also throughout in all things. Therefore lette vs boldly haue our recourse vnto him, not onely in one kinde of aduersitie, but in as many as shall come vpon vs, assuring our selues that his power shall extende euen vnto all the deathes that can threaten vs, according as it is sayd, that he not only hath a way too deliuere vs from death, but also hath wayes which are incomprehensible too vs. VVhen wee be afflited on the one side, God will on thother side make vs feele that wee bee helped. VVhen wee bee locked vp so as there seemeth no way for vs to scape, God will finde one for vs, yea after his owne fashion, that is too say, aboue the vnderstanding and opinion of the fleshe. But by the way wee bee here new againe warned too prepare our selues to pacience, not onely for some one kind of aduersitie, but for all that euer can betyde vs, according as wee see howe menne are borne too diuers afflictions. And I say this, bicause that suche as are strong inough too indure some one aduersitie, will immediatly bee overcome of some other temptation. As for example, a man shall finde some that can indure pouertie: and yet one sickenesse will carie them away in suche sorte, as they shall frette against God and there shall be no meane too appease them. Other some can well away with sicknesse, or with this thing or that: but if a man doo them any wrong or iniurie, or if a man go about too deface them, in that case they haue lost all their pacience. Then may there nowe and then bee an appearance of vertue in a man, as in respect of some one kinde of temptation: but in some other he shall fayle. For this cause it behoueth vs too marke well what is conteyned in this streyne: namely that God will not commende a man for shewing himselfe stoute in some one poynt, if he bee colde and incontinently quayled in the reste. But our pacience muste reache further: that is too witte, wee muste yelde our selues peaceably in all that euer God shall sende vs. For when wee bee exhorted too bee patient, God setteth not before our eyes one miserie, or twoo, or three: but he sayeth that euary of vs must take vp his crosse or fardell. And what manner fardell muste this bee? wee muste not make our owne packet, too say, I will haue such a measure or suche a portion: but it belongeth too God too giue vs our burthen. And he aduertizeth vs, that when wee shall haue bene persecuted after one fashion, wee muste bee fayne too enter into a newe and farre diuers battell. Therefore wee must prepare our selues therenvnto. And here yee see also why afflictions are termed, A cup or drinking glasse. For like as when a Phisition giueth his pacient suche quantitie as he thinketh good, the pacient must bee fayne to receyue the drinke in suche portion as the Phisicion shall haue appoynted: or like as a father in cherishing his children, cutteth euary of them their pittance, and giueth them too eate and drinke after his owne pleasure: euen so muste God dispose of vs, and haue the authoritie ouer vs too charge vs, and to giue vs such portion of miseries as he shall thinke good. Seing the case standeth so, lette vs remember the doctrine that is sette downe here, how God wil deliuere vs from famine in the tyme of dearth, that he will saue vs from the swoorde in the time of warre, and that he will defende vs from wilde beastes: as if it were sayde, that menne shall not onely bee assayled, some by famine, some by warre, some by pestilence, and other-some by annoyances of wilde beastes: but also that as well the one as the other shall feele, that they may haue as many annoyances, as wee see there are meanes to trouble vs, and that they are as many enimies neere aboue vs, and that if our God haue not his hande stretched out continually too haue pitie vpon vs and too deliuere vs, wee see a hundred thousande deathes which threaten vs and incompaſſe vs on all sides. Yee see then howe it standeth euery one of vs on hande, too thinke well vpon the daungers wherein he is, and too knowe howe miserable our state is, too the ende he may bee the more earnest in calling vpon God. And herewithall lette vs also bee ready to indure paciently, not onely some one kinde of aduersitie, but also an infinite number of them, according as it shall please God to scourge every of vs. For it is not sayde, that God contenteth himselfe with exercysing of vs after some one sorte: but that wee muste bee fayne too passe through fyre and water: that is too say, wee shall not haue one sorte of affliction alone: but assoone as we be passed out of one aduersitie, wee muste streight wayes enter into an other. Yee see in effect what is signified vnto vs here. But it is sayde immediatly, That wee shall bee in league with the stones and with the wilde beastes. Pſal.66.c.12. Eſai.43.c.2. VVhereby Eliphas meeneth, that the things whiche are woonte too annoy and too trouble menne, (suche as the stones of the fielde and the wilde beastes are) shall not disquiet vs. And howe shall not the stones of the fielde trouble vs? Nother in walking, nor in tilling the ground. For wee knowe that the tilling of a grounde is the more painefull, if it bee stonie, and that it is the more laboursome for a poore man where his plough shall bee often-times in daunger of breaking, if he turne not away the stones. Lo wherefore our Lord telleth vs that the stones shall not hurte our walking nor our labouring in the fieldes: our walking (I say) to haue any vnhappy stumblingplot. Also he addeth the beastes of the earth: for wee feethat the beastes are against vs. True it is that the beastes ought of their nature too obey vs, because God hath giuen man dominion ouer all his creatures, and specially bicause he hath created the beastes too the ende they shoulde bee subiect vnto menne, and acknowledge man as the Prince that reigneth here beneath according as God hath ordeyned. But yet notwithstanding, nowe are the beastes fayne too rysse vp agaynst vs. And that is, bicause wee haue not done homage too God in respecte of the souerayne Lordship whiche he hath ouer all creatures, and whereof he hath made vs partakers. And lyke as if a man holding a fee of a Prince, and being his leuge man had committed some offence, as of treason or rebellion, the goods which he hath shal be excheated: Euen so dealeth our Lord. For, for our vnythank-vnthankefulnesse sake he hath bene fayne too bereue vs of the goodes that he had put into our handes, in so much that he hath armed the wylde beastes which ought too yelde vs full obedience, and he rayseth them vp dayly against vs. Behold whereof commeth the contrarietie, and as it were the enmitie that is betweene men and beasts. But here it is sayde that we shall bee in league with the beastes: that is too say, that God will restrayne the rage that is in beastes, so as they shall haue no desire too doo vs harme. Truely wee see that God hath not as yet vitterly bereft vs of the dominion whiche he gaue vs in Adam. For although that Horses and Bulles also bee beastes full of fiercenesse, so as it seemeth that they shoulde ouermayster menne: yet notwithstanding they bee commonly tamed, and menne bring them too their lure. And forasmuche as men haue their liuing in this worlde: it is Gods will that there shoulde still remayne some traces of his goodnesse, and that they shoulde in-joy his creatures in parte. But yet for all that, they haue not this sayde league in suche perfection as God promi-sith here, neyther were it conuenient for them too haue it. It behoueth vs too bee troubled and vexed by the beastes, too the intent wee may feele the fruite of our rebellion against God. Yet notwithstanding it is a speciall gifte which God giueth too those that are his, when they are vnder his defence and protection: that is too wit, that the wilde beastes are peaceable towarde them, as if there were a league [betweene them,] and that God had treated a peace, and were come betwixt them too say, True it is that the beastes haue hitherto bene enemis too you, but now I will that there shall bee peace and agreement betweene you. Yee see then what is promised here, yea euen as it were a singular benefite too suche as shrowd themselues vnder the shadowe of Gods winges. But the meane howe too obrayne suche priu-ledge, is shewed vs yet better in Osee, when he sayeth in his seconde Chapter, that God will cause a league too bee betweene vs and the wilde beastes, namely by our Lorde Iesus Christe. For in that place is expresslye handed the restitution of the Churche whiche was decayed and desolate. It is sayd that God will send peace throughout: and therewith it is added in particular, that he will cause vs too bee in league with the wilde beastes. And why so? Bycause that Iesus Christe is the vniersall heire of all creatures, and all things are giuen into his handes: and if wee bee his members, we shall bee part-takers of all the benefites whiche the father hath committed too him in all perfection. Yee see then how wee may walke through all the annoyances of this world without wounding: that is too witte, bycause Christe is our keeper, and ouerseeth our lyfe too maynteyne our welfare. Yet notwithstanding wee shall not ceasse too bee troubled: according as it is needfull that God shoulde chastyze vs in diuers sortes. But how soeuer the worlde go, wee shall finde howe it is not for nought sayde here, that God will make the wilde beastes too become as it were tame, so as they shal not ryse vp against vs with such rage as they haue bene wonte too doo, bicause that he will holde them shorte. And here wee haue a very profitable lesson: that is to witte, that wee muste not measure the assistaunce of our God by our eyfeight, but by the promise of succour that is behighted vs from aboue.

And why so? For yee see after what sorte God will bee honored by vs: that is to witte, he will haue vs beholde the daungers that are neere vnto vs, and when wee see howe there are alwayes as it were a hundred perilles for vs too fall into, wee muste not therefore ceasse to truste too the ayde of our God, [and say:] Beholde Lord, it is true that if wee looke no further but onely here bylow, wee shall bee totoo much confounded. But for asmuche as thou haste promised too helpe vs at our neede, our life muste nowe reste vpon thee, and wee muste put it into thy handes. Lo here a greate honor which wee doo vnto God, when wee can shette our eyes at all the daungers that threaten vs, and imbrace the promise that he hath made too maynteyne our welfare. And too shewe that the faythfull muste yelde themselues wholly into Gods protection, it is sayde that they shall laugh in the time of calamitie and famine. Not that wee shall bee senselesse, no nor that wee ought too be so: but this laughing here importeth such a boldnesse, as we be not afryde like the wretched vnbelleeuers, who know not what to say when they see themselues in any hazarde. Lette vs marke then that bothe the good and the badde shall feele the miserie that pincheth them, and conceyue the daungers too bee afryde of them. But yet in the meane season, if an vnbelleeuer perceyue any mischiefe towarde him: ye shall see him so caried away with fearefulnessse, as there is no comforting of him. And (which worse is) menne doo muze continually vpon their tormentes, according as Leuit. 26.6.

it is sayde that the wicked shall flee when noman folow-eth him. And in another texte it is sayd, that there nee-
deth but a leafe too fall from a tree, too affright those that haue no trust in God. Yee see then that if men trust not in God, and committē not themselues wholly vnto him, they shall bee so scared out of their wittes, as they can haue no reste, according as it is sayde in the Lawe, that their life shall bee hanging as at a threedē. In the Deut. 28. g. morning they shall say, is it possible that I may go forth vntill night? and at night they shall bee in perplexitie to knowe if they may see the morning. Yee see then how they that regarde not God, are in continual thoughtfulnessse: and not so onely, but also they are in so extreeme agonies, as they wote not whither they be alive or dead. But contrariwise, when Gods children haue perceyued the inconueniences, and haue sighed and bene attached with some feare: alwayes they come too saye thus: Lorde, into thy handes I commende my soule, Psal. 31. b.6. thou haste redeemed mee, thou arte soothfaste, thou wilt continue thy goodnesse towarde mee, euen too the end: euen so Lorde, therefore prouide thou for all my daungers. The faithfull having called thus vpon God, doo truste that he will heare them, and therefore they call vpon him without ceassing. And although they perceyue not that he helpeth them: yet notwithstanding they hold on still their course, warranting themselues that their welfare is assured, bycause it is grounded vpon Gods truth, which is infallible and vnaungeable. So then, yee see that by the Laughing whereof mention is made here, it is not ment that Gods children should become altogether senselesse too conceyue nothing, or that they should make a sport of it when God thretneth them with any aduersitie: for that were no manlinessse, it were rather a beastlinessse. The children of God then muste be afryde, and specially when they perceyue that God vi-fith them for their sinnes, they muste thinke of it thoroughly, yea and they muste haue a feeling of the miseries of their neighbours, too pitie them: but yet therewithall they shall also laugh, that is too say, they shall be able too despise all aduersities, according as wee see how Saint Paule speaketh when he triumpheth against po-uerie, against all diseases, against hunger, thirst, sword, Rom. 8. g. 34.
things present, and things too come: yea and specially when the cace concerned fighting against the powers aboue. And wherefore? For when we know that God hath taken vs into his keeping, and that he will bee our G.ijj. shield:

shie'de: wee may defie all the harmes that can come too vs from menne. And it is successiuely sayde, that the faithfull man shall visit his tent, and shall not meeete with any mishappe to greeue him. He shall see his linage increased, and the very breed of his cattell shall bee blisfed of God. Herein it is shewed vnto vs, that God, to shewe the loue whiche he beareth vs, is not contented onely too remedie our mishappes and too deliuere vs from them: but also blisfeth vs in diuers sortes, and maketh vs too prosper, too the intent wee shoulde feele his grace vpon vs. Thus yee see the summe of that whiche is conteyned here. But as we haue neede to consider Gods goodnesse thoroughly because he succoreth vs in our afflictions: so on the other side, in all the benefites which he bestoweth vpon vs, it behoueth vs too bee attentive to knowe the fatherly care whiche he hath of vs. And specially that when soever he shall take vs out of this worlde, wee may knowe that which the holie Ghost sheweth vs here, according as I shall set it foorth anon: and finally that in all caces and in all respectes God will bee the guyder of those that are his, and that although they bee fayne too indure things in this mortal lyfe, and are subiect too many chaunges and ouerturnings: yet God will preserue them, and his blisfing will bee sufficient too defende them euen too the ende. Yee see what the holy Ghost ment to shewe vs here by the mouth of Eliphas. But among the other graces whiche our Lorde promiseth vnto men, and whereby he will bee knowne too bee gentle and louing, one is when he giueth vs children.

Psalms. 127. For we knowe howe linage is a singular honor whiche 30 God doeth vnto men. And verily if hee will haue his goodnesse knowne euen in respecte of the beastes in that the beastes doo thriue and increase: If God (I say) will haue his goodnesse and fauour caught hold of thereby: what is too bee done then, when he createth children and formeth them after his owne image? for is there nota more excellent and greater dignitie in mans nature, than in all other creatures? So then, no maruell though God doo so often in the holie Scripture marke out this sayde blisfing as a precious thing. By the way, 40 if men bee afflicted by their children, lette them vnderstande that the same proceedeth of sinne, and that Gods order is reuersed in that case: Neuerthelesse wee may manifestly perceyue, that God could not tel in the world howe too vtter the loue that he beareth vs, nor his greate goodnesse towrdes vs, better than by giuing vs issue. Finally it is sayde, that the faythfull man shall bee gathered into bis grave, as a stacke of corne is gathered together in dewe tyme, and layde into the Berne: and also that a man shall come thither in abundance, that is too say, he shall haue liued his fill. Here Eliphas ment to say, that God will preserue his seruants from violent death, and guyde them after suche sorte in this worlde, that when soever they must departe, it shall be as if a man gathered corne in haruest time. And it is better that corne shoulde bee layde into a Berne, than that it should perishe in the fieldes: for what were it too leaue corne standing in the fielde after that it is dead rype? The graynes must needes shedde and come too naught: the birdes will eate some of it, and the rest of it muste rotte and bee troden into the dirte. But if it bee gathered into the berne a man may apply it too good vse. So then Eliphas promiseth that after that God hath made the faythfull too bring foorth fruite in the world, they shall come too full rypenesse, and he will gather them vp too himselfe as menne gather corne. True it is that he doth not thus alwayes: for wee see sometimes howe God suffreth his seruants too fall into violent death, and that he plucketh them out of this worlde in the floure of their age, yea and euen in their infancie. VVee see that Cain came too greate yeeres of age, and Abell was raught away by the swoorde. Howe is it ment then that God will preserue his faythfull ones euen till they bee full rype, as if a man shoulde gather corne into a Berne? wee muste marke firste of all that when the holie Scripture speaketh of these worldly blissinges: it intendeth that it falleth out so commonly, and not that it falleth out so continually. Furthermore wee muste make comparison betweene the greater benefite and the lesser. VVhen God suffereth his children too bee taken out of the worlde betimes: it is for their profite. For God prouideth better for the faythfull man when he calleth him too him at the age of twentie or thirtie yeeres, than when he letteth him liue till threescore. And specially when wee see the worlde flowing out into suche corruption, that all is confounded nowe a dayes: I pray you ought wee not too esteeme them more happie in that God hath drawen them away too himselfe, than if they had longer time too languishe here? It were a miracle if menne coulde continue here and come all too olde age. For wee see what snares Satan layeth for vs, and howe it is right harde too walke through so many outrages. Therefore if God pull away his children quickly: lette vs bee sure that he dooth it for their greater benefite. And specially wee haue herebypon too vnderstand, that although they bee bereft of this blisfing whiche is small in respect of that which God will give them: yet dothe he not ceasse too loue and fauour them by suffering them too fall so into speedie death, like as those that are persecuted by tyrantes, haue a moste precious death. For they offer vp a sacrificie whiche is moste acceptable too God: and it is an offering of sweete fauour when he seeth his woerde sealed vp with the bloud of Martyrs. So then, when wee compare the lesse with the greater, wee shall finde that this promise of feeling continually the fayde blisfing of God in sending them to their graue as corne that is gathered in his due time, is not in vayne towrdes the faythfull. For how soever the world go, he rypeneth them continually. If a faythfull man die at the age of thirtie yeeres, what doth he? It seemeth not that he is greatly sorie for it, he maketh no greate struggeling against it as wee see the vnbeleeuers do, yea when they bee euen as stale as earth, as the Prouerbe sayeth. Beholde a despyzer of God and a worldling, which neuer thought vpon death: and when it commeth too the poynte that God will pinche him in good earnest, it will make him grinde his teethe and frette with himselfe, weening too withstande death, and saying: Can I not prolong my lyfe one yeere longer? He takes himselfe too bee a peice of greene woode that crackleth on all sides. Contrariwyse when a faythfull persone dieth, although he indure muche, yet he betaketh himselfe vnto God, and conforteth himselfe in him: and although there bee stryuing seene in his bodie, yet hath he his minde quiet, and he desireth nothing but to frame himselfe to Gods good will, choozing rather too dye when God calleth him, than too liue here. To be short he desireth nothing but too obey his good heauenly father. VVee see then howe God dothe awyayes rypen his seruants before he call them out of the worlde, so as they bee fully satisfied when they come too their graues: and he that bringeth but twentie yeeres too his graue, is more rype than another that shall bring (as ye would say) a million of yeeres with him: according as we see how the vnbeleeuers do fret and chafe them selues against God when he calleth them, so as they bee never rype type nor olde ynglyng. So then let vs marke that God bercereth not his children of the thing that he promiseth them in this texte, that is too wittē, that how soever the worlde go, they shall come too their graue like corne that is through type, and meete too bee applyed to good vse. And therefore lette euery one of vs bee contented, when God hath giuen him the grace too liue in this worlde, seing wee haue recorde [in our consciences] that wee bee verely his, and that he will drawe vs to himselfe. And although it please him too keepe vs in this worlde for a time too exercise vs with many afflictions and miseries: yet lette vs not ceasse too taste continually of his goodnessse, which he maketh vs too feele so many wayes, and whereof we shall haue full fruition after this present lyfe, when he shall haue called vs too the eternall rest whiche he hath prepared for vs, and which is purchased for vs by the death and passion of our Lorde Iesus Christ.

And lette vs fall downe in the presence of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him too giue vs the grace, that in walking through so many daungers, wee may knowe howe our sinnes are the cause of it, and that wee haue needs too bee so beaten and chastyzed at his hande. And therewithall lette vs pray him too graunt vs the grace, that the corrections whiche he sendeth vs may not bee vnprofitable too vs, but that we may through them learne to feare his lustice, so as wee may be the earnest to call vpon him in our necessities: And also that he will giue vs the grace too walke togither in one right brotherhood, and thereby shewe how wee bee rightly his children, and that wee seeke nothing but too knit our selues togither in all goodnessse, whereas we see the vnbeleeuers conspyre too despise God and all right and reason. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also to all people and nations of the Earth, &c.

The xxij. Sermon, which is the first vpon the sixth Chapter.

1. Job ansyvered and sayd vnto them.
2. O that my distresse vvere vwell vveyed, and that my sorrowves vvere put into the balaunce.
3. It vwould be heauier than the sand of the Sea, vwherefore my vvoordes are svvallovvved vp.
4. For the arrowves of the almighty are in me, vwhereof the poyson drinkeþ vp my spirit, the terrors of God are directed against mee.
5. VVill the vvilde Asse bray vwhen he hath grasse, or vvil the Oxe lowv vwhen he hath fodder?
6. Shall that vwhich is vnsauerie bee eaten vwithout salte? or is there any taste in the vwhite of an egge?
7. But the thing vwhich my soule hath lothed to touche, is as it vvere the disease of my fleshe.
8. O that the thing vwhich I desire might happen to me, and that the thing vwhich I loue vvere graunted mee.
9. That is, that God vwould crushe me and break mee, and that he vwould cut mee as a bovve.

Ere wee haue to consider, what the state of a poore man is when God scourgeth him; and maketh him to feele such miserie, as it may seeme too him, that he hath God against him. VVee see there is no power in men, that can holde out when the eace is so. And it is very true that Job was never yet vtterly ouerthrownen, so as he should haue no pacience at all: but yet notwithstanding it was not without muche difficultie, that he could gather his wittes to him, to haue some comfort. By the way (as I haue sayde) wee haue to behold, in what anguish mortall man is, when God sheweth himselfe as his aduersarie partie. And it is greatly for our behoofe too minde this lesson, because wee be ouer negligent, yea and there are ouerfewe that thinke vpon this kinde of temptation. For when wee be spoken too of suffering any miserie, and of being pacient in aduersitie: we be fleshly, and we mount no higher than our sensualitie is able too comprehend: that is too say, that we may indure diseases, wee may bee put too some troubles, this or that may happen vnto vs. But the greatest mischiefe of all, whiche is able too ouerwhelme menne vtterly, is when God presseth them, and maketh them too feele his wrath, as if he were bente full against them to say, why haue yee offended mee so? Therefore when God sheweth himselfe so sore against menne: beholde, it is a temptation which passeth all that euer wee may indure in our bodie. And here yee see why I sayde, howe

40 it is good too trie that thing thoroughly whiche is conteyned here. Job then sayeth, that he would sayne that his distresse were well weyed, and on the other side, that his sorowes and greefes (that is to witte, the miserie which he indureth and suffereth) were put together with it into the balaunce. For then (sayeth he) it should be seene, that this miserie of mine is heauier than the sande of the sea. And for prooife hereof, God hath shotte his arrowes at mee, yea euen poysoned arrowes, in so muche that I am as it were fyred, my Spirit is as it were swallowed vp, or my spirit is as it were steeped in bitternes, by reason of Gods sayde arrowes whiche haue perced mee. Behold whereat he beginneth. But it seemeth here, that he frameth an vniuste complaýnt, when he sayeth that his miserie is so greate, as no sorowe can bee able too matche it or bee answereable too it. And this complaint draweth neere too that whiche Cain made, the whiche (as wee knowe) was not without blasphemie. For as soone as Cain herde the condemnation which God pronounced against him: it is certaine that he could not iustifie himselfe, (for his sinne was manifest, and he was conuincid of it:) but he accused God of crueltie or ouergreat rigour. My punishment (sayeth he) is ouergreat, I am not able too beare it, thou wilt chace mee ouer all the earth, I am not able to stande before thy face: how doest thou handle mee? wee see here that although this wretched caytife coulde not denie but he was punished iustly: yet notwithstanding he had his startinghole, that God punished him not vprightly, but passed measure in rigorouenesse Gen.4.6.13.

against him. I sayde it seemeth that Job doeth the like here. For he sayeth it is no maruell though he be in great distresse, bicause the affliction whiche he indureth is exceeding greate, and muche more heauie. As if he shold say, he could not lament inough, seyng that God handled him so roughly. But wee haue seene, howe he hath come alreadie euen too the cursing of his birth-day, and howe he woulde that he had bene borne dead. And not onely so, but he also banneth the day wherein he was borne. It seemeth then that Job mighte not bee excused. And in deede (as I haue tolde you alreadie) although he haue a good case: yet dothe he handle it amisse: and it behoueth men too knowe howe there is some faultiness in this respecte. Neuerthelesse he ceaseth not too speake truthe when he sayeth that the miserie whiche he indureth is so greate and so extreme, as euen his woordes are swallowed vp, in so much as in that behalfe he is as a man ouerwhelmed, whiche hath no lyueliness in him, so that all that ever he is able too say, is nothing in comparison of the affliction where-with God presseth him. Lette vs marke therefore, that wee haue here two things: the one is, that wee see what a poore silie creature is, when God presseth him with his iudgement, as I haue sayde alreadie: And the other is, that wee shoulde knowe, that in fighting against our temptations, although wee doo the beste wee can too withstande them, and too submitte our selues vnto God: yet notwithstanding wee swaye aside eyther one way or other through infirmitie, so as there is never sufficient strength in vs, except God holde vs vp and suffer vs not too bowe at all. And why so? It is expedient for vs too knowe, that wee bee not made of steele, nor that wee bee not as rockes of stone: but that wee bee mortall men, full of frayltie. It is behoofefull that God shoulde make vs feele this: Also although he asistvs in our afflictions, so as wee bee not ouercome: yet doth he make vs to bee wounded and too halte, that is too say [ he leaueth] always some feblenesse [in vs] which sheweth it selfe in the mighty operacion which he giueth vs. Thus yee see the twoo poyntes whiche wee haue to consider here. But first of all let vs call too remembrance that whiche I haue touched heretofore: whiche is, that if wee bee tempted, and when soever wee bee pinched with any aduersitie in our bodie: wee muste the more feare still this spirituall temptation, when God citeth vs too his iudgement and becommeth as it were our iudge, so as wee muste bee fayne too answere before him, and too render him our account. True it is that wee shall muche more perceyue that thing whiche toucheth vs in our flesh. And why so? For wee bee wholly giuen too that. So then wee see commonly that menne feare famine, pestilence, sickenesse, or death which is the vttermoste. If a man threaten vs with this, wee bee afayde: but if a man speake too vs of God, wee bee not moued a whit. And why so? Herein wee shewe our selues to bee dull, yea euen too the vttermoste, as they that differ nothing from Oxen and Asses, in that wee make so small reckening of Gods wrath, and of the damnation that is prepared for our soules, I meene of them that continue enimies vnto God: But if a man talke to vs of any thing that concerneth this present lyfe, wee are amazed out of measure. Neuerthelesse, in the meane time whyle other continue in their dulnesse, God ceaseth not too exercyse those that are his, after suche a maner as he maketh them too feele his wrath, and then (as I sayde) they bee tempted muche more without all comparison, than if they indured all the miseries that are possible to bee imagined. Sometimes wee shall thinke it straunge that the

faythful should speake thus: And what? God hath shewed himselfe as a Lyon towardes mee: he hath broken all my bones, I am on a burning fire, I wote not where too become, my soule is as it were swallowed vp; my bodie is as good as rotten, and there is nothing but stinche in mee. VVherefore is it that the faythfull speake so? It seemeth that they bee nice and womannish: and yet notwithstanding these are they that were moste strong and stedfaste, and whome wee haue seene gouerned by the spirite of God, so as they haue had an invincible courage. Had not Daviid a goodly pacience: God exerysed him very much: & yet we see he alwayes had the vpper hande, so as he was never caried away vnto wickednesse for all the trouble that befell him. Yee see here a man of armes, who hath bene practysed in all maner of battelles, not onely for a daye or for a yeere, but all his lyfe long: and yet for all his experiance, he complayneth as if he had never bene acquainted with any aduersitie, or as if he wist not what it were to bee afflicted. Yea verely. But (as I haue sayde) lette vs marke that he was not pressed with bodily harmes. And although he were sensible as other men are: yet had it not greatly grieued him too beare any sickenesse or to suffer any suche other like thing. VVhat is it then, that driueth him too complayne so? It is bycause he entereth into himself, and is touched in his conscience, as though God had not onely forsaken him, but also were become his deadly foe, and pursued him euen vnto hell, too say: thou shalte haue nother peace nor truce, but I will drowne thee altogether. Seing then that Daviid was so pressed with the feeling of his sinnes, and perceyued that Gods wrath was kindled against him: yee see what nipped him euen too the hart. Ezechias felte as muche. For God not onely afflieted him with sickenesse as may commonly befall vnto vs: but also besides that, he shewed him a token of his displeasure. Therefore it seemed vnto him, that God woulde repeale and disanull all the grace that he had graunted him before: and further that his death should cause Gods seruice too be quite ouerthrowne, which had bene stablished by his hande. VVhen Ezechias conceyued so greate and so horrible vengeance of God: there was good reason why he should be so dismayed. And so yee see why he made suche complayntes as are conteyned in his song. Therefore lette vs marke that when God afflieth vs in our bodies, wee can well take patiently the miseries that he sendeth vs: for, that is nothing in comparison of the anguishe which they indure, whom he maketh to feele his wrath and vengeance: and yet notwithstanding it is for our profite too come therevnto. And although it bee so harde and bitter a thing vnto vs: yet neuerthelesse wee muste bee fayne too come too it. And why so? For they that conceyue not their bodily tribulations, passe not too seeke helpe of the diseases of their soules, bycause they perceyue them not at all: and so consequently they passe not too seeke attonement with God, for they consider not his iustice. So then (as I sayde) it is more than necessarie for vs too bee wounded with Gods iudgement, that when we haue taken holde of it, wee maye bee constreyned too groane vnder suche anguishe, according as wee see it too haue bene in Job. True it is that euery man shall not haue like measure, and God also knoweth what wee bee able too beare. According as a man shall bee weake, and as God shall not haue indewed him with so greate a grace of his holy spirite: so verily will he make him to feele his iudgement thereafter: howbeit hee will holde him vp, and make him to taste of his mercie in the middes of his wrath, so as the same shall not vterly dismaye him.

But as for him that hath receiued a more singular streghth, and whom God hath fortified with his holy spirite : hee must be faine to sustain greater brunts, and farre rougher assaults, than such as are feeble like little children. And heere yee perceyue why wee see these spirituall battayles in Daviid, Ezechias, and Iob, which neuer a one of vs shall finde in himselfe. True it is that wee shall haue oure portion of them : for (as I haue sayde) without it wee would become dullardes, & it would bee a signe that we were fiersaken of God, so as wee shoulde haue our consciences rocked a sleepe too much. But when God presfeth vs with his iudgement, it is but for a small while if wee compare our selues with the holy persons that haue incountred agaynst the sorrowes of death and hell. And why so? for God had armed them, yea and he had so fenc'd them with his owne strength : that althoughe they were bowed, yet were they not vtterly beaten downe : and if they were beaten downe, yet did God lift them vp againe. And therefore it behoueth vs to marke well what is sayde vnto vs heere. Furthermoore when wee see Iob so sore pressed, euen Iob I say, who was the mirrour of patience : let vs learne to walke aduisedly. For if this happened too the greene tree, what shall become of the drie tree? VVe see that Iob was so hartburned with anguish, and wee see hee was so dulled with torments, as hee wist not what to speake : and what shall become of vs then, if God list to scourge vs rigorously? must we not needes quaile vtterly? But this must not astonie vs : neuerthelesse it standeth vs on hande too bee afraide. For we can bee hardie ynough while we be farre from blowes, as our ordinarie maner is : in so much as there is none of vs all, but he will make himselfe as valiant as can be, and it seemeth that nothing shall be able to daunt vs. Let vs rather consider what our feblenesse is, to the ende that we may not bee puffed vp with vaine presumption, but may vnderstante howe we be but poore creatures, and that wee cannot well holde out one minute of an hour, agaynst the assaults that may bee giuen vs on eyther side, except we flee to our God, praying him to strengthen vs. Yee see then what wee haue to doo, when wee beholde the example of Iob. Moreouer let vs marke well this woord when hee sayth, that the arrowes of God are in him, and that the venim of them bath drunke vp his spirite, or that his spirite hath sucked in the venim, for eyther of both wayes may be spoken. But the principall poynt that we haue to marke heere, is that Iob doth vs to vnderstand heere, that he hath not to deale with men, nor that the case standeth as when wee indure some afflictions in the flesh. I knowe (sayth he) that it is God which warreth agaynst me : and not onely so, but his arrowes also (sayth hee) are in mee: they haue striken mee too the hart and are runne quyte through mee. In the first place, Iob sheweth, that hee is sayne to indure battayles, as if God himselfe warred agaynst him. And what a matter is it when a mortall man who is a thing of nothing, should bee forced so farre, as too feele that God prepareth and bentheth himselfe agaynst him, and yet notwithstanding be able to oustante it? Howe shoulde that bee possible? Neuerthelesse (as I haue sayde alreadie) we must needes bee brought to that poynt, for our owne profite. And in good sooth wee profite euill vnder Gods scourges, if in the meane while wee beate our braynes, or reason with men, to see from whence the aduersities come vnto vs, and linger here still below: this is verie yll considered of vs. As for example, if one that is diseased thinke with himselfe: such an inconuenience is light vpon mee: Lo suche a thing is the cause: and that hee cannot suffer anye other affliction whereby God shall giue him occasion too feele his wrath: this man is farre from receiuing frute by the chasements which God sendeth him. I say, when we cease not to alledge this or that, to holde our seives still too the creatures: wee profitte verie yll. Therefore wee muste mount vp to this step: that is, that the aduersities come of God, and that they come vpon vs because of our sinnes: and heere withall let vs vnderstante howe it is as muche as if God had shott his arrowes at vs, and wounded vs. So then let vs bethinke vs well of this woord, when Iob sayth, that the arrowes of the almighty were let flee agaynst him. Yea and hee sayeth exprefly, that they sticke fast in him, and that his spirite is as it were swallowed vp. VVhereby hee meeneth, that his distresse commerh of the sayde fearing of God, according also as hee addeth, that the terrors of God are bent agaynst him. And for the better vnderstanding of this streyne: let vs marke, that God dooth oftentimes afflic those that are wilfull and harde herted. But what? Their minde is neuer the more humbled for all that. For they beate backe all Gods iudgements, as an Anuylle beateth backe the hammer. But God woundeth whome he listeth when he meeneth to humble them, in so much that they bee striken quite through, yea euen to the bottome of their hart. Thus ye see what Iob ment to exprefle. True it is that somtimes the like shall happen to the reprobates also. But when ful account is made: it is a speciall grace which God bestoweth vpon his owne children, when hee peerceth them so throughout, & maketh them to feele his vengeance within their harts, in such wise as they are as it were swallowed vp by it, and their harts are consumed by it. This will be verie hard for vs, and wee will flee from it if it be possible. But therby God worketh our welfare, & it is much better that it shoulde be so, than that we should bee blockish too beate backe all the concytes which God sendeth vs when hee purposeth to scourge vs for our sinnes, and too make vs feele howe it is a terrible thing too haue him agaynst vs. Beholde howe wee must profite our selues by such woundings, knowing that God intendeth to humble vs, to the ende wee shoulde not bee as the scorners, who doo nothing but mocke at his iudgements: and that hys making of vs to feele them to the quicke, is to the ende wee should quake at them. Furthermore wee see what neede wee haue of such a medicine, si the wee bee such dullards as to follow the lustes of our flesh. For what are we the better for Gods woord? howe are wee moued for all the threatenings that are made too vs? It seemeth that wee would holde our owne agaynst God, and spye him by our defiances. Beholde the pride which is to be seene commonly in men: and wee also should be subiect thereto, were it not that God clenzeth vs of it by shewing himselfe so rough towarde vs, as we might feele his arrowes in our hartes, and that all our courage might be swallowed vp by it. And likewise Iob sayth, that the terrors of God are directed [or leuelled] at him. And why so? For his wordes are as it were swallowed vp, or consumed. VVhereas he sayeth that the terriblenesse of God was leueled at him, he meeneth (as I haue sayd alreadie) that he hath not men too his enimies, but that it is God himselfe which warreth agaynst him. True it is that wee may bee assaulted at mens handes: and yet notwithstanding we must not ceasse too acknowledge that which is sayde heere: that is to wit, that God armeth his creatures agaynst vs, to the ende to shewe vs his displeasure. At a worde, on what side so euer the mischeefe doo threaten Iob, yea euen that he be wounded, he must acknowledge howe it is the hande of God that toucheth and presseth him. And this is the cause why he sayth, the terrors [or the terriblenesse.] Hee knowes well ynough that when

God scourgeth him, his intent is to haue him returne vnto him, and that God seeketh nothing but to receyue his seruants to mercie, and to deliuere them from the trouble which they indure. But in these sorrowes which he suffereþ, he is not able to take hold of the goodnessse which God intendeth too vse towrdes him. And thus yee see what is the cause of our impacieſce: euen for that wee are not touched as were requisite, too render GOD his due honour. For prooſe hereof, when we speake of calling vpon God, and of desiring him to haue pitie vpon vs: we do it but ceremonially vntill we knowe that wee are at the last cast, and that wee bee as poore damned soules and forlorne creatures: Vntill wee knowe this throughly to the quicke, it is certaine that oure desyring of God to haue pitie vpon vs, shall be but from the teeth outward. And therefore a man never honoureth God in good earnest, vnlleſſe hee bee confounded in himſelfe. For the matter consisteth not altogether in ſaying, that God muſt be ſuperior ouer vs, and wee ſubiect too him as all other creatures are: But wee muſt yelde hym this honour which is ſpecified here: namely that he oneſly is righteous, and that there is nothing elſe in vs but all maner of wickedneſſe, too the ende wee may haue our mouth ſhet, and bee deſtitute of all excuse, ſo as we may not make any account of our ſelues, but acknowledge that nothing belongeth too vs but shame, and that wee deserue too bee caſt away as ſtinking and curſed creatures. If wee bee not come too this poynþ, it is no honouring nor ſeruing of God, according as Saint Paule

Rom. 3.c.19. sheweth in the thirde to the Romanes. For in ſpeaking 30 of Gods infinite glorie, hee ſayth it becommeth vs too come before him with ſuch feare and lowlincſſe, as wee may bee lyke poore offendres with halters about theyr neckes, ſo as wee ſhoule go too hell, if hee plucked vs not back of his infinite goodneſſe. So then it is not without cauſe that God afflicteſt his ſeruaunts, and prefleſt them in ſuch wiſe as he bringeth them to this poynþ, too the ende hee may bee glorified in them. As touching that he ſayth, that his woordes are ſwallowed vp: it is as muſhe as if hee had ſayde, that hee ſpeaketh not Rhetorically as 40 wee ſee ſome men doo, who are eloquent in ſetting out their owne aduerſitieſ. As for thoſe that are Cokneys, if they indure any little aduerſitie, they neede no man of lawe to pleade theyr caſe, it ſeemeth (too heare them ſpeak) that there are none but they on whome men ſhoule haue compassion. But they that can ſo well pleade and babble, ſhewe wellynough that their aduerſitie did not ſo greatly grecue them: for had they beeene touched in good earnest, it is certayne that they woulde ſhewe that which is ſayde heere. And heere ye ſee wher-

Eze. 38.c.14. fore it is expreſſly ſayde in the ſong of Ezechias, that he had chattered lyke the ſwallowes, and that hee had no more had the voyce of a man to vtter his conceyte, but had beeene ſo ſhet vp at that tyme in ſorrowe, that hee wift not what to ſay, nor howe to couche his woordes to vtter what his mynde was. Let vs marke then that when God ſummoneth his ſeruautes in ſuch wiſe, hee ſheweth himſelfe too bee theyr iudge, and pincheth them ſo too the quicke, as they are even deſtitute of woordes, and confounded, and know not howe too expreſſe their meenings. Although (ſay I) that God workeſo, and that hee oftentymes deale roughly with vs: yet notwithstanding let vs call to minde the conuenient remedie, leaſt wee bee put too vtter conuſion. And this is it that Saint Paule meeneth when hee ſayeth that

Rom. 8.c.5 God by hys holye ſpirite greceth vs gronings whiche are intollerable. VVhen Saint Paule ſpeaketh of the prayres of the ſaythfull, (I meene of the better ſort:) 60

hee ſayeth that when God maketh vs pray earnestly, then wee grone: yea wee euen grone, but wee haue not a woerde at hande: for if a man ſhould demaunde of vs, what is it that thou ſayest? VVhat is it that thou deſireſt of God? VVee wift not what to ſay to hym. VVee muſt keepe that as a thing locked vp, ſo as wee cannot declare by woerde of mouth, what wee ment too ſay. Yee ſee then howe God remedieth that which is ſpoken heere: which is, that althoſh all our ſpeeches were swallowed vp, yet hee giueth vs a meane too finde him, and to get too him, which meane he alloweth: and althoſh that this kinde of language bee not vnderſtoode of men, yea and that euen the partie himſelfe whiche prayeth vnto God bee intangled, ſo as hee cannot vtter his woordes: yet doth God vnderſtande ſuche maner of ſpeeche. Nowe forasmuch as wee ſee that God heareth our gronings when wee bee ſo abashed that wee bee vtterly diſmayde in our ſelues: Let vs beare paciently the aduerſitieſ which hee ſendeth vs, ſeeing that hee giueth ſuſſeſſe as all of it redoundeth too our profit and welfare. Lo what wee haue to marke vpon this ſtraine. Heerewithall Job vſeth certaine ſimiliudes, too ſhewe howe it is not without cauſe that hee complayneth ſo. He ſayeth, will the wilde Aſſe bray when kee bath graſſe? no more will the Oxe when kee bath fodder. And furthermore, Can a man eat a thing that bath no ſaucer, as the white of an Egge without ſalt? By ſuſſeſſe Job meeneth, that both men and beaſtes are glad when thiſes fall out too them after their mynde or deſire. VVhat is the thiſ that the wilde Aſſe ſeeketh? Hee deſyreth paſture. Therefore when hee hath graſſe at will he careth not to tray or too grecue himſelfe. VVhy ſo? For hee hath the thiſ that hee deſireth. An Oxe likewyſe is contented when hee hath fodder given him. But contrary wiſe (ſayth hee) howe is it poſſible that a man ſhoule bee made too lyke of the thiſ that is agaynst him? Verely wee will not eat the meates that are vnsauerie. If a man ſhoule make vs to ſuppe off the white of an Egge, it were ynough too make vs ſpewe: for it were a thiſ that woulde go agaynst our ſtomacke. Seeing that thiſ woerde betokeneth an vnsauerie thiſ: what is to bee ſayde of a bitter thiſ that ſhoule ſeruo too choke vs? But yet muſhe worse are the miſeries wherewith Job was afflieted. And therefore hee concluſeth therepon, that hee woulde fayne haue his owne wiſhe: whiche is, that God woulde kill him at the first bloure, and not make him to pine away after that ſent. Yee ſee in effect what is meant here. And firſt of al let vs mark, that thiſ ſentencē is good and true, yea and that the doctrine conteyned therin is verie profitable: for it is expedient for vs to bee warned of our paſſions. There are whiche ſtande muſhe vpon the reputation of theyr owne vertues: and therefore it is good for vs to knowe that wee haue neede too haue ourfleſhly deſires repreſſed. VVhy ſo? Too the ende that if thiſes fall ouſe according too our mynde, wee may haue ſkill to ſay: Beholde, God greceth vs our hartes deſire, and therefore wee haue whereof too reioyce. And that if thiſes fall ouſe agaynst vs, wee may acknowledge and ſay, beholde, it is God that afflieth vs: VVherefore? Euen because wee haue offendred him, and hee will cut vs out our morselles. It is good therefore that thiſes things heere ſhoule bee knowne vnto vs, and that wee ſhould minde them, and that the remembrance of them ſhould oftentimes bee renewed. And ſpecially it is a greate shame for men that they haue no diſcretion, ſeeing that the brute beaſtes can ſhewe them howe that according to their meaſure they haue ſome diſcretion. True it is that that there is no reason nor judgement in an Oxe , nor in an Asse . Yet hath God giuen them a certaine witte, which leadeth them thither as their nature goeth . Nowe let vs consider what it is that God giueth vnto man who ought to haue iudgement . Because of the spirite which is imprinted in his soule . It behoueth him too haue discretion . But yet let vs note further , howe it behoueth vs in especially too fight agaynst our lustes . Howe so ? An Asse will leaue his braying when hee hath pasture afore him : so will not a man do , he will not content himselfe . Verie well . It is good that a man shoulde thanke God when he hath prosperitie , and that he shoulde know how hee is so much the more beholding to God : but he must not fall asleepe vpon it . Let vs learne then that heere are twoo things . The one is , that when God giueth vs meate and drinke , we bee worse than the brute beastes if wee make not account of such a libertie , but bee so blockish in our hertes , that wee consider not howe liberall and gracious God is towardes vs . Thus much for the first poynt . But we perceyue the cleane contrary in many men : yea after a maner in all men . For howe great is our vnthankefulnesse ? if God giue vs meate and drink , haue we the stayednesse that is in brute beastes , to holde our selues in quiet and contented ? No : we be like vnfa-tiable Seagulles . Howe fowle and howe excessiue are our appetites ? See howe an Asse eateth . Although hee haue trauayled with great paine , when he is put to pasture he satisfieth him selfe , and then layes him downe vpon it , hee is contented . But as for a man , though hee haue crammed in as much as foure or five men could swallow .

30 vp , he is not contented with it , he regardeth not what is meete for him , but hee will still bee heaping vp and gathering in of more . VVhen a man hath his Garner full , yet hath he a bellie to bigge for it . VVhen hee hath hys wine seller well stored , hee thinketh that that is nothing . VVhen he hath prouision ynough for a whole dozen of persons , yet will hee not be contented : hee is like a Sea-gulfe that can neuer bee filled . Yee see then howe men are caryed away by theyr lustes , so as they bee neuer satisfied : such is their vnthankefulnesse . And what iudge muste suche maner of folke haue ? Euen the Asses and Oxen . The Angels neede not to come downe from heauen to poure Gods condemnation vpon their heades . In the order of nature a man may perceyue , that there is much more reason and modestie in the dulnesse that is in these beastes , than there is in men who ought to haue a further cosideration . Beholde a speciall poynt whiche wee haue to marke heere . But on the other side also let vs learne , that wee muste not bee lyke the brute beastes in seeking nothing else but bellie cheere . For when 50 GOD sendeth vs prosperitie , wee must not holde vs there , that mustnot bee our butte to shoothe at . VVhat then ? Let vs vse the sayde prosperitie , passing continually still further , and preparing our selues too affliction if God list to sende vs any : to the intent wee bee not taken vnwares because we made reckening to haue liued alwayes at our ease . I say let vs beware we fall not a sleepe in such careflesnesse when God sendeth vs pasture , and that wee bee handeled as well as wee would wishe . But let vs continually quicken vp oure selues , that we may attayne too the benefite wherevntoo hee calleth vs . Marke thys for a speciall poynt . Nowe whereas it is sayde that wee cannot bee made too eat that which is without fauour , and that we cannot suppe off the whyte of an Egge without salt : Heereby wee may knowe (as I haue sayde) howe that before the blowe come , it is good too forethinke oure selues , that colde and heate , vnsa-uerie vittayles and all other suche things are as it were aduersities whiche wee shunne by nature . Verie well , needes must wee feel this geere , for we bee not sense-lese . But howesoeuer the worlde go , let vs make oure selues readie too indure paciently the thing that is vnfa-uerie . Let vs bee contented that God shall doo it for our profite . And therewithall let vs assure oure selues , that lithe hee ordyneth it , his onelye will muste bee a better taste vnto vs , than all the things that happen too vs by our owne good will . VVhat shall be our salt then too make vs finde good taste in all the aduersities that can befall vs , so as wee maye bear them paciently ? Obedience , so as wee acknowledge , and say , go too , I see heere howe God afflieteth vs . And why ? First bi-cause wee bee woorthie of it : and secondely bycause it is his will too aduaunce oure welfare by that meane . Beholde (I saye) what will make vs too finde good fauour in that whiche heretofore was (as yee would say) lothsome . This then is the poynt that wee must come vntoo , when wee bee desyrous too finde fauour in all our aduersities , that wee may paciently receyue all the corrections which it shall please G O D too sende vs ; and that wee maye frame our selues too his good pleasure , desiring nothing but that hee will accomplishe as he hath begonne , too the intent that beeing guided and gouerned by his holy spirit , we maye seeke nothing but to loue , serue , and honour him , and to hold all that for good and righfull , which it shall please him too sende vs .

And nowe let vs cast our selues downe before the face 40 of our good God in acknowledging our faultes , praying him to make vs perceyue them better than we haue done hitherto : and that when it shall please him too make vs feele his iudgements , although we be pressed out of measure to our owne seeming , yet notwithstanding wee may not cease to resort vntoo him continually , hoping that he will deliuere vs from all our aduersities , according as of his infinite mercie it is his will to reach out his hande too vs continually : and that althoughe that at the first wee perceyue not that he is minded to ayde vs , yet we may wayt paciently till tyme conuenient come too shewe vs that he hath alwayes beeene freendly and fauourable too vs , yea , truly by meane of our Lorde Iesus Christ , according as it hath pleased him to chooze vs in him , and to call vs to the knowledge of him , too the ende too make vs all members of his bodie . That it may please him to graunt this grace , not onely to vs , but also to all people and Nations of the earth , &c .

The xxiiij. Sermon, which is the seconde vpon the sixt Chapter.

8. VVho vvill cause my desire to come to passe , and that God may sende me my longing ?
9. VVwhich is , that hee shoulde breake mee in peeces , and that hee shoulde stretch out his hande and cut mee off .
10. For then shoulde I yet haue comfort : I shoulde reioyce in my grecfe : let him not spare me , and I vwill not denie the vwordes of the holy one .
11. VVhat is my strength , that I shoulde be able to indure ? and vwhat is mine ende if I shoulde prolong my life ?

12. Is my strength the strength of stones? or is my flesh of Steele?
 13. I can no more, and my might fayleth mee.
 14. He that is afflicted ought too haue a good turne of his friende: but men haue forsaken the feare of the almighty God.

Ee haue to go forewarde with the matter that I began alreadie: which is; that Job tormenteth him selfe heere, not for the miserie which he indureth in his bodie, but because God hilde him as a poore condemned person, and bycause he dealeth as a judge with him, and is altogether against him. Yee see then wherefore Job is more greeued than for all the rest that hee coulde suffer. That is to wit, because hee feeleth Gods hand heauie vpon him, as Dauid speaketh in the twoo and thirtie Psalme. And let vs marke thys well alwayes. For otherwise we shall not know to what purpose hee sayth, I woulde I were dead, I woulde God woulde kill mee, I would I were cut off from the world, for then shoulde I haue some ease, and I shoulde bee no more so sore pressed. And coulde there befall him any worse thing than death, specially than a death of Gods sending, wherein he should knowe that God would vtterly ouerwhelme him? And were not that the extremest of all miseries? and yet for all that hee sayth, that if God would dispatch him at one blowe, he could well bear it: but to linger pyning as hee doth, and too bee pressed so long a while, he sayth it is impossible for him too keepe measure, for it is all one as if hee were hilde in a burning fire. Then let vs marke well this diuersitie which is betweene a man that is ouerwhelmed at the first stroke, and another whom God holdeth (as it were) vpon the Rack, whom he scourgeth a long while without giuing him any respite, and which is not releued in his miserie, but must be fayne too abide it out continually. Let vs nowe come to the ripping vp of the cage that Job pleadeth here. First he sheweth that his cheefe desire shoulde bee to die and to bee cut off. True it is (as I haue touched heeretofore) that Gods children may well wishe death: howbeit to an other ende, and for another respect [than hee cloth heere,] like as all of vs must with S. Paule desire to be let looce from the bondage of sin wherein we bee hilde prisoners. Saint Paule is not moued there with any temptations of his fleshe: but rather, the desire that hee hath to employ himselfe in Gods seruice without let, driueth him too wish that he might passe out of the prison of hys bodie. VVhy so? For so long as wee bee in this worlde, we must always be wrapped in many miseries, and wee ceasse not too offend God, being so weake as wee bee. Saint Paule then is sorie that hee must liue so long in offending God, and this kinde of desire is good and holy, and proceedeth of the holy Ghost. But there are verie feawe that desire to go out of the worlde in this respect. For so long as we bee at our easse, we care not a whit what vyses and imperfections we haue, nor to be so forward in seruing God as were requisite: this geere toucheth vs not a whit. VVhat then? If there betide vs any trouble, if we fall into any disease, if matters fal not out as we would haue them: then we wish our selues out of the worlde, and there is none other talke but of oure weariness in despizing of our life. Yee see then what Jobs wiſhing was. It was not cheefly because he knewe what his state was: but because the miserie that he felt did nippe him, therefore hee was desirous too haue his request at Gods hande. For hee not onely desireth it [in his hart,] but also addresseth himselfe to God to make sute for it. And this is yet another mischiefe, that a man wiſhing death,

Phil. 1. c. 23.

as Job doth heere, shall bee as yee would say, shet vp and shrunke into himselfe, so as he shall not dare present him selfe vnto God to pray for it, though it so be that he haue committed a great offence before. For we must not presume to hyde our selues, nor to haue any backe nookes wherein to make wiſhes that are wicked and reieeted of God. But yet when a man shall come so farre foorth as to make such request vnto God: no doubt but he sinneth double. VVhy so? For it is an ouergreat rashnesse for vs to come to vnhallow the name of God. How is it then that we must pray? VVhat rule must we obserue in that behalfe? That wee request nothing which is not agreeable to his will, according as Saint John speaketh in hys 1. lob. 5. c. 14 Canonickall Epistle. And verely our Lorde Iesus Christ sheweth full well that wee must keepe the sayd modeſtie, when he setteth downe this petition, That Gods will be done. Yee see then howe Job vnhalloweth the name of God when he dareth make ſuch & ſo excesſive a requelt. Nowe then for the firſt poynt, whereas it is lawfull for men too wiſhe that God would deliuere them quickly out of this mortall bodie, when their life is besieged heere with ſo many wantes and miseries: it is not by reaſon of the troubles that we must indure heere, but because wee are alwayes ſubieſt to many vices. Marke this for a ſpeciall poynt. Let vs marke further, that when God afflicteſt vs, and that there happen things that are ſowre too vs: wee must not wiſh death therefore: but rather wee must buckle our ſelues to the combate, ſithe that the will of God is ſo. Thirdely, when we deſire too bee ſet free from this bondage of ſinne, and that God ſhould breake the bondes that holde vs as nowe: Let men do it meaſurably, ſo as we may be ready to bee humbled as much as ſhall pleafe him. And although it greeue vs, and that wee ſighe because we can not giue our ſelues wholly too doo what God commaundeth: wee must first haue this conſideration to ſay, VWell Lorde, if it bee thy will, that I being a poore ſinner and hauiing vices continually lurking in me ſhould ſerue thee: graunt me the grace to acknowledge my faultes, that I may ſigh before thee to craue pardon for them at thy hande. Beholde (ſay I) the meaſure which it behoueth vs to keepe. Furthermore let vs learne by the example of Job, that when we come before God, it is not for vs to bring thiſher our owne deſires and our owne luſtes, and to ſpeakē whatſoever commeth at our tunges ende: but our requeſtes muſt alwayes bee framed according to Gods promiſes, & according to that which he giueth vs leaue to demaunde of him. Yee ſee then whereat we muſt begin, if we will pray vnto God as becommeth vs. That is, we muſt not be rafh to threaþe this or that at his hande: but wee muſt conſider well what is lawfull for vs according to his will. For what honour do al those yelde vnto God, which craue whatſoever commeth in their minde, without foreconſideration? Their meening is to haue his heade vnder their gyrdle. Beholde (ſay I) an vntollerable presumptuousneſſe, when a mortall man will bear such ſway, as God muſt be ſubieſt to his demaundes. Besides this, wee haue ſhewed alreadie, howe God will haue vs yelde him ſuch reuerence, as to ſeeke to knowe no more than hee giueth vs leaue, and than hee thinketh good, and that he will haue vs too doo it with all modeſtie. Seeing then that Job hath happened to ouerſhoote himſelfe ſo farre, and too make ſuch a requeſt vnto God as is naughtie, & as we our ſelues would finde

Ende fault with : let vs be well aduis'd that wee be sober minded when we fall in hande with praying vnto God, and that we haue well considered aforehand what things God promiseth and permitteth. And by the way the remedie hereof is not, that we shoulde not pray vnto God, whē our flesh prouoketh vs to desire this or that: as there are some who (if a man tell them that it is a peruerting of true praier,to demaund any thing of God other thā he hath allowed:) I say there are some which will answe, verie well sir,I will not pray God at all , for I shoulde dis- 10 please him if I should make him subiect after that sort to my desires : but I may well ynough wish this or that, and yet all the while not bee mynded that God shoulde bee subiect to my desires: But we must not vse such byleapes . VVhat is to bee done then ? VVhen wee see such wishes, so foolish and full of vanitie, and which are not onely fonde, but also wicked : what is to be done? There is no seeking of any lurking holes. VVhat then ? Let vs rather lay open our harten before God,(as the holy scripture speakest thereof) so as we haue nothing wrapped vp 20 in them. But as soone as any desire comes in our minde, [let vs thinke thus:] Is it lawfull for mee too wishe such things ? Doth God permit me then ? Let vs fall to examining of our selues,that the thing whiche is entred into our hart may be layde open : and when we haue made God priuie too it, let vs dispose our selues to pray vntoo him according to his will. VVhen wee haue so done, let vs on our part consider, that wee must not come vntoo God with oure heade vpright, nor bee so bolde as too make so farre account of him,that hee shoulde do what- 30 soever wee haue conceyued in oure brayne : but wee must bee subiect too him in all poyntes, and in all respects. Nowe then if wee holde vs too this measure : yee shall see all oure euill lustes corrected and repressed, and our knowing that a man must not couet any thing which he might not be bolde to aske at Gods hande,will bee a bridle too vs. And wee must not presume too aske any thing, but that whiche God hath graunted by hys worde. If it bee so, we must needes bee restrayned, and our flesh must not ouermayster vs to cary vs away to this 40 or that. Lo what wee haue too marke concerning Job in this straine. Yet notwithstanding it is a lesson that is verie slenderly practized in all the worlde. For wee see howe one sort make their wishes without anye submitting of them vnto God at all : in another sort, there are such vaine and fantasticall mindes , as they desyre contraries : there is none other conceyete wthy them but of coyning and framing newe deuises in theyr heade, and neuer too pray vntoo God. Beholde heere an intollerable vyce. Howe so ? In that men wander awaye so, 50 whereas God allureth them familiarly too come vntoo him ? And whereas hee telleth them they may bee vnburthened , by casting all their cares vpon him : is it not a great wilfull frowardenesse that men will make them-selues such strangers and drawe backe from him ? Yet notwithstanding it is an ordinarie matter. Let euerie man search what is in himselfe. I pray you howe manie foolishe desires haue wee in vs, which mooue vs too sigh in oure selues, althoughe God were not priuie too them ? Another sort swarue asyde too a contrarie extremitie : whiche is, that they become like blockes before G O D, asking this and that, without knowing howe, and without hauing any rule or choyce. And hereby it is too bee seene , that this sayde lesson which I haue earst set afore you, is verie yll knowne,not onely of those that haue not beene instructed in Gods worde : but also of all of vs. And therefore so muche the better must wee marke this text, too the ende that euerie of vs may hold himselfe in awe, and learne too frame our desires better than we haue done : and to bring this to passe, wee must lay them open before God, assuring our selues that wee shall winne nothing by our slinking aside. For all things must come to account in their time. And therefore as oft as we shall be prouoked and minded to desire any thing : let vs learne to be at this poynt with God,that he may alwayes be made priuie to them. And for the doing hereof, let vs examine well all our sinnes,that we may condemne whatsoeuer we see is not agreeing to the will of him that ought to haue the whole dominion ouer vs. But let vs come backe once againe to that Job sayth,that his wishe was that God should flea him, and stretche out his hande to cut him off. I haue aitreadie breefly shewed whereto these wordes tende : that is to wit , that God shoulde at one stroke quite dispatche a man without making him to linger. Yea, but what gayneth hee by that ? Shall a man fare the better by that ? Yea, so it seemes to him. For we knowe that when wee must bee fayne too endure anye torment : it is a comfort to vs, when it is not long a doing. But Job hath heere a further respect: which is , that when God sheweth himselfe a iudge towardes vs , and we feele him too bee agaynst vs, it is an intollerable torment : insomuch that wee couldē finde in our harten,that Luk.23.8.39 the mountaynes shoulde fall vpon vs, and Iesus Christ also sayth : we coulde finde in our harten that the whole worlde shoulde bee turned vpside downe , and wee had much leuer that all creatures rose vp agaynst vs , that euerie of them shoulde bring oure bane , and that wee were too passe through infinite daungers : so we might not come before the face of God so dreadfull agaynst vs. Yee see then whereat Job had an eye. And true it is, that this is not knowne too many. VVhy so ? Because the more part are so blockishe, that there is nothing else but hardenesse and stulbornesse in them. If a man or a woman bee pinched with sicknesse : they crye oute alas. If they bee pinched with pouertie , or hunger,or any other thing : euerie man can complaine as hee hath occasion. But as for the torment of minde , wee can no skill of it, when God persecuteth vs and sheweth vs howe dreadfull his wrath is. And for prooffe heereof, our consciences are so rockt asleepe , that hardly can one bee founde among a thousande, that euer tasted what is ment by the hande of God so terrible as Job setteth it forth heere. But yet neuerthelesse we haue neede to be so much the better fēced,as we be of the leſſe power against such afflictions. For if God spare vs for a time,we know not that he keepeth vs for the ende. VVe see many that haue beene carelesse and haue made good cheere all the tymē of their lyfe : yea and euen when men haue laboured to make them feele God and his iudgement, they haue turned all into mockage : But whose iolitic God hath so abated when they drewe towarde death,that in steede of the iesting and sporting wherevnto they had bene giuen, they haue bene fayne as then to feele the terrors of hell, and were (as ye would say) locked vp in them , yea and vtterly ouerwhelmed of them, because God had cast his lightning vpon them.I say we shal see some come to this state. And why so ? God punisheth the pride wherwith they were puffed vp in their owne conceyete, too greeue him with. Therefore when the scripture speakest to vs of the dreadfulness which they conceiue that feele God to be their iudge : let vs learne,howe it is to the ende that euerie of vs should thinke vpon it. And certeinly the bodily harmes doo wey very much with vs,according as we bee wholly giuen too oure flesh and too this presentlyfe. But beholde heere the Scripture which speaketh to vs of a mischeefe that is farre more to bee feared , and which ought ought to astonish vs more : which is, whē he maketh vs to feele our sinnes and summoneth vs too appear before him. For then he toucheth vs much more, than if our bodie were torne in pecces, or if he should lay as many mi-series vpon vs as were possible. Sith the case standeth so, let vs feare God, and let vs not thinke our selues to haue made the better market when we shunne his iudgement: but let vs holde vs to it with our good will, and let every of vs come too this obediance of examining his life in such wise, as he lay the account of his sinnes open afore it. Ye see then howe we must deale when wee heare the wordes that are rehersed to vs heere. And Job sayth, that then hee shoulde haue comfort, and that hee shoulde warme himselfe (or rather be merrie) in his sorrow or greefe. For the Hebrew worde which he vseth in this place, signifieth to burn, or to be warmed, and some translate it to be merrie. To keepe the proper and naturall meening of the worde, let vs take, I shoulde be warmed in my sorrow. His meening then is, that hee shoulde haue ease if God would stretch out his hande to cut him off at the first blow: and that it greeueth him too bee pyned, and that God vseth not his force to ouerwhelme him at once, that his mis-erie might quickly bee at an ende. But yet surely they that are so dispatched vpon the sodaine, ceasse not too bee afflicted still. It easeth them not so farre, as that they feele no more any great Payne. But Job speaketh lyke a man ouerpassionate, that knoweth no more where he is: and therefore (too his seeming) there is no better comfort, than to bee vtterly razed out as soone as God layeth his hande vpon him. As howe? VVhen we haue any present passion: wee imagin that there is none other miserie in the whole worlde, but that. VVhen a man is pressed with a sorowe that is great and excessiue: he thinketh nothing at all of other mens greefes, those are nothing with him. If he be in a heate: he could finde in his hart too bee cooled, yea euen in yce. And yet if hee bee fornummed with colde, the same passion also will bee greeuous too him to beare, and as bitter as the heate that he shall haue indured afore. Yea verely. If a man haue eyther heate or colde, or any other thing that troubleth him in his bodie: yee shall see him so ouertaken, as hee shall thinke that all the contrarie miseries woule be an ease vntoo him: and that is because oure passions carie vs away. Lo how Job hath spoken. Let vs marke then, that when we fancie releeves and easements, it is not that they woulde bee so, though God shoulde sende vs all our desyres: wee shoulde fynde that wee did but fall out of one miserie into an other, and that there is none other ease, but to haue God fauourable vnto vs.

And for proof hereof, if it please him to giue vs pacience when wee lose but a finger: he can also well giue it vs when we lose the whole hande, yea and euen when wee shall be fayne to lose the whole bodie. Then must wee not thinke that the miserie is in the thing it selfe: but rather in our owne frayl. ie. For if we be weak and left vp to our selues: no doubt but we shall be vtterly confounded.
But if God haue strengthned vs with his grace: although wee haue a huge mountaine to beare: yet shall we well beare it out. And why? For Gods power shall be ynough in that behalfe. There needeth but one foote of water to drowne a man, and one other will drawe him out of the sea. Therefore if God reech vs his hande, although wee were plunged ouer heade and eares: yet might we scape. But if it please not him to deliuers vs: wee shall not fayle too come too vtter ruine. Sith the case standeth so: let vs not thinke too haue ease when God shall haue chaunged the kynde of mis-erie: but let vs assure oure selues that wee cannot bee eased, except God bee mercifull and fauourable to vs, and except hee haue pitie vpon vs, and shewe vs that hee hath forgiuen our sinnes. See heere the true rest.

Otherwise wee must bee fayne too liue in continual vnquietnesse, lyke as when a sicke man turneth and tumbleth hither and thither, he thinketh he hath some releefe, or if hee bee suffered to shift from one bedde too another, beholde too his owne seeming he is halfe whole. But when hee hath tossed and turmoyled himselfe throughly, hee seeth that his maladie is the feerer vpon him, so little or nothing at all is hee mended by it.
Euen so is it with all of vs. It seemeth too vs that wee shoulde be in better case, if God woulde afflict vs after another maner than he doth: but that would neuer a whit asswage our greefe. In this case it behoueth vs too flee vnto God, and too pray him too withdrawe his hande from vs: and when hee hath once receyued vs too hys mercye: then we shall see our selues rightly eased. As concerning that Job sayth that hee shoulde bee warmed in his sorowe: hee meeneth that his sorowe should be asswaged to his comfort: Like as when there is a great fyre vnder a pot, the flesh will by and by bee sodden as soone as the pot is throughly heated: otherwise the fleshe will lie saping a long while, and become vnsauerie. So then is it: It seemeth to Job, that when wee pine and linger in suche extremities, it is nothing else but too make vs rotte away in our miseryes. But yet neuerthelesse (as I haue sayde) men doo not then ceasse to shewe themselues vtterly desperate: that is to witte, not euen then when God forbeareth to make them to languish. But it behoueth vs to vnderstande, that if God list to prolong our miseries, it is synough for vs that hee giueth vs paci-ence: and that seeing he hath giuen it vs to day, he will continue it to morrowe. If God woorke after this maner: it is well, the aduersities will be easie to be borne, so as if he plundge vs ouer head and eares a hundred thousand tyme, we will alwayes remit our selues vnto him, so be it that he sustaine vs by his grace which he hath gi-uen vs from heauen, making vs to feele this comfort of the holy Scripture in our hartes: insomuche that if God touch vs, whether hee fillip vs with his finger, or stryke vs with his hande, whether hee giue vs great blowes with a beetle, or whether hee make vs too pine awaye by peecemeale, or dispatche vs out of hande: surely nothing shall happen without his will, and his will tendeth too oure welfare, and so seeing wee bee his children, there is no cause for vs to doubt. And when Job sayth, Let him not spare mee, I will not conceale the wordes of the bolie one: He maketh a protestation which hee was not able to perfourme. But hee speaketh after the maner of them, which are carryed away by theyr affections. Behold (sayth hee) though God haue so ouerpressest mee at the first blowe: yet will I not condemne him, specially I will not grudge agaynst him, but I will rather blisse his name, and confess him to be righteous: neuerthelesse sithe I am tormented so long, and can haue no ease: I lose my pacientnesse thereby. Lo howe men proceede according as it hath beene declared. And Job addeth, that bee car no more, and that his strength fayletb him, and that be which is afflicted ought too haue a good turne at his frendes bande.
I haue shewed alreadie, that Job ought too haue returned vntoo God, and too haue hilde himselfe there.
But what? He buckleth himselfe agaynst those that haue founde fault with hym: and it is a temptation whereof we ought to take good heede, according as the cause why the holye Ghost bringeth this storie too oure remembrance, is too the intent wee may vnderstande, that when men come too haue at vs, so as they scoffe vs,

at vs, and drive vs to dispayre, or at leastwise do the best they can too drive vs too it: wee must take good heede of our going, that we bee not intrapped by them. VVhy so? Beholde a man commeth to mee and sayes, thinkest thou that God hath a care of thee? Thou calleſt vpō him: but thou beguileſt thy ſelue in ſo dooyng: and ſurely if God did not as it were abhorre thee, thinkest thou that he would haue exerciſed thee with ſuch extremitie? Thou ſeefſt thy ſelue heere to bee a poore damned creature, and perceyuest thou not how God is agaynst thee? If a man come to me to whet me after this ſort, ſee what a deadly plague it is. But we muſt warde it off, ſpecially because we haue our eares beaten with ſuch temptations, as we may ſee them and ſay, beholde the diuill is come to ſet me on fire, to the intent I ſhoule fret and chafe agaynst God. But I muſt beate backe al his wyles, and gather my witteſſe aboue mee to conider that I haue not to deale with men, but with God. And therefore me muſt put vp oure complaints vntoo him, and ſay, Lorde thou ſeefſt howe this man ſeeketh nothing but to drive mee into dispayre: he is come hither to make mee fall quite and cleane away: vouchſafe therefore to receyue mee to mercie, and let mee vnderſtande, that all that euer I muſte indure, commeth not of man, but of thee alone. For although men be woorkers in it through vnaudiuſedneſſe, or rather through malicioſneſſe, and by craft and outrage: yet doth not any thing happen without thy will: but thy will is good, righteous, and for my welfare. Lo howe we ought too proceede. But Job hath miſſed in this poyn̄t, and his fault muſt ſerue for oure learning. And certeynly the holy Ghost hath ment veſtē well, in that this holy perſonage, (who is as it were a mirrour of pacience,) is ſet heere before our eyes too bee looked vpon, to the intent that the ſame thing may proſite vs, and that wee may thereby receyue a leſſon which we may applie to our owne behoofe. So then let vs vnderſtande that as oft and whenſoeuer there haſſeth any great inconuenience vntoo vs, wee muſt not make ſuſe excuses as theſe: yea I cannot abyde this preſent miſaduenture, but if God would handle mee af- ter ſome other maner, I ſhall well come too it. Let vs not ſet our truſt ſo: but let vs conider howe nothing ought too put vs oute of pacience, too turne vs aside from God, and to make vs vtter rebelles agaynst him. Then let vs condenme oure ſelues in oure owne vices, in whole and in part: and let vs acknowledgē, Alas, If God ſhoule exercise mee after any other ſort, then woulde the thing ſhewe it ſelue which is nowe hidden. There are a number of diſeases hidde within mee, whiche I knowe not of my ſelue, but God knoweth them. There- fore it ſtandest mee in hande to knowe my ſelue, and too pray him that hee ſuffer not the great number of vices which are in mee, too burſt oute at libertie too make battell agaynst hym: but rather that hee will purge them and correct them. Lo howe wee ought too do in this caſe. And in ſo doing, let vs not take this concluſion at aduēture which Job ſetteth downe here when he ſaith, I will not grudge though God ſpare mee not, I will not denie the words of the holy one. VVhat is ment by thiſ ſuppreſſing or concealing of the words of the holy one? It is ment of not giuing glorie vnto God in all poyn̄ts & in all reſpeſts. Then Job's meening in effect, is thiſ: when God ſhall haue ſcoured mee to the vttermoſt, yet will I not denie him too bee woorthie of all prayſe, and acknowledgē, Lorde it is good right that thou ſhouldest ſcourge me, I am thy creature, and forasmuch as I am in thy hande, diſpoſe thou of me at thy good pleasure. Job protesteth aſſuredly that he will do ſo: but he protesteth it, not knowing himſelfe. Then (as I haue ſayde) let vs learme to enter into our ſelues, and not to tie our ſelues vnto men. For aſſoone as we ſhal haue made ſuſh a pro- teſtation, God will laugh vs to ſcorne. It is nothing elſe but folly and fondneſſe for a man too ſay, if ſuſh a thing happen I will do thiſ or thiſ, Therfore if a man come to that poyn̄t, needes muſt God laugh his pride too ſcorne. And in good ſooth what is our ſtrength? whereof can we boalſt? So then let vs knowe that after what maner ſo euer God handle and intreate vs, we muſt alwayes haue the diſcretion too glorifie him, beſeeching him ſo too guide vs by hys holiſe ſpirite, as hee will giue vs the vertue of pacience thereaſter as it ſhall please him too affiſt vs. Thus yee ſee what wee haue too marke in thiſ ſtreyne. And heerewithall hee addeth: VVhat is my ſtrength that I ſhoule bee able too indure? Is my ſtrength the ſtrength of ſtones & or is my fleſhe as ſteele? Heere Job entreth into his complayntes, too ſhewe that hee hath iuft cauſe too chafe after that maner, althouȝe hee paſſe meaſure. And why ſo? For God (ſayeth hee) on his ſyde is too excessiue in chaſtizing. Yee ſee in effect what hee purpoſeth too ſay. And wee ſee that whiche I haue touched heeretoſore: that is too wiſte, that Job is ſo ouerpreſſed with the preſent paine, as hee hath no regarde of all the reſt, but is vtterlye blynde in it. And thiſ is a poyn̄t that wee muſt marke well. For yee ſee in what caſe wee bee, and expe- rieneſſe ſheweth the ſame. VVhenſoeuer wee haue a ny trouble, ſtraightwayes withoute regarding what it is, our eyes are dazeled at it, ſo as wee cannot diſcerne betweene redde and greene, but wee babble out thiſ and that too no purpose. So much the more then muſt wee marke what is conteyned heere. Job ſayeth heere, vbat is my ſtrength? True it is that hiſ ſtrength is nothing. But when hee knoweth it and stayeth vpon it, is it not the next way too make him more impaient than hee was afore? Job thinkes that hiſ ſtrength fayleth him not, ſauſe in the preſent miſerie that hee indureth. But contrarywife let men trie themſelues throughly, and ſearch well what is in them: and they ſhall finde that the leaſt inconuenience that troubleth them and pricketh them, is not without great greefe, I meene as touching the bodie. But thiſ is nothing in reſpect of that which Job indureth through his ſpirituall temptaſions whereof I haue ſpoken. He defyreth not too bee eaſed of hiſ miſerie, that hee might knowe hiſ infirmitie and humble hiſelfe before God, ſo as he might confeſſe it to bee goođ reaſon that he ſhoule be handled after that maner. VVhat then? He intendeth to ſhewe how God handleth him after an extraordinařie fashion, and that men are not woont too bee ſo ouerpreſſed. His meening theiſ is to enter as it were into the field of battel with God, and that God ſhould likewiſe take hiſ ſword or I wote not what. Lo how Job runnes a head. But we muſt de- maund and ſeeke what our ſtrength is: not in our ſelues, but in him that ſtrengtheneth vs. For we ſhall neuer finde any thing but vanitiſ in our ſelues. If we think our ſelues to haue ſtrength to carie but one fardel, we ſhall find our ſelues ouerwhelmed vnder it. For we are fayneſe of oure ſelues, and there needeth no aduerſtie too come from otherwhere to beare vs down. Our ſtrength then is none at all to Godward. True it is that to outward ſhew there may well ſeeme to be ſome ſtrength in vs: but the ſame i. deede is but a verie shadowe. So then foraſmuch as wee knowe howe oure ſtrength is nothing, let vs con- clude in generall, Alas, whatſhall become of me if God laye hys hande vpon mee? Ought I not too indure a farre greeuouſer torment, and yet notwithstanding not life

Lift vp my selfe agaynst him? Then although God affiſt vs as well in our bodies, as in our mindes: yet muſt wee not grudge agaynst him to condemne him, as if hee did vs wrong. But forſomuch as we knowe that oure strength in all cares and respects is nothing: ye ſee howe wee muſt learne to humble our ſelues before God, and beſeech him to ſtrength vs, affiſing our ſelues that it is hee which hath the ſpirite of ſtrength, and howe it be-longereth to him onely to giue it vs. For elſe if wee were not ſuytayned by him, and that yet neuertheleſſe it behoueth vs to indure a long time: what a thing were it? Let vs affiſe our ſelues we ſhould bee vterly beaten downe at the firſt blowe. God ſhould not neede to make the miserie indure long to deſtroy vs: for who is he that could warrant himſelfe to continue pacient one only day, or but one hour onely? Then needeth not God to prolong our miſeries to ſhew our feebleneſſe, &c to make vs to be conuicted of it: but let vs affiſe our ſelues that we cannot ſo much as begin any good thing, and much leſſe perorme it. And therefore ſo much the more muſt we be prouoked to pray God to mainteyne vs, and to lift vs vp euē when we be ouerthrowne. Lo in what maner wee muſt coniider our owne weakeſſeſſe wee muſt coniider it as Job diſ, to ſay that God keepeth out meaſure towards vs: but rather let vs marke that when wee haue diſpleaſed our God, and that he chaſtizeth vs: in ſtead of ame-nding vnder his rods, we become worse and worse. VVhy ſo? Because that when God toucheth vs, we fall to blaſpheming of his name, and beholde, that is the vttermoſt and full height of all euill. So then let vs learne, that if God will remedie our vyces, hee muſt abate this deueliſhe pride of ours, to make vs to knowe it. Otherwife we ſhall neuer profiſe by all the chaſtizements that hee can ſende vs. And when wee knowe the euill that is in vs: we muſt miſlyke of it and ſecke remedie of it, to ſay, Alas my God: true it is that I am ſo feeble and weake as there is nothing but vanitie in mee: neuertheleſſe if it please thee to strengthen mee, thou not onely haſt the ſtrength of ſtone or ſteele, but also thy ſtrength is infinite. Let all ſtones and rockes come rufe agaynſt thee, let ther be what ſtormes and tempeſtes there will, ſo as it may ſeeme that the whole worlde ſhall be funken to the bottomleſſe pitte: and yet is it certayne Lorde, that thy ſtrength is alwayes invincible. And therefore vouchafe to fortifie me with thy holy ſpirite, to the ende that althoſh I bee frayle of mine owne nature: yet I maye not ceaſe to fight agaynſt the temptaſions that come to affayle vs. VVhen wee ſhall haue done thus, wee ſhall haue profited greatly in this poyn特 of learning. And here-withal leſt vs vnderſtande on the other ſide alſo, that if God paſſe our meaſure, and ſende vs ſuch temptaſions as we may haue no leſſure to take breath: it behoueth vs to crie, alas. Then if God ſende vs ſuch a temptaſion, yea or euen a hundred of them: what will become of it? True it is that our nature will quaile in that caſe. But if God haue pitie vpon vs, and that we call vpon him too helpe vs in our troubles: that is the way wherby we may be deliuered yea and ouercome al through pacience. Then behoueth it all men to prepare themſelues by all meaſures to afflictions, that they may feele the hande of God: and if they will haue him to ſuccour them, that they may out-ſtand the cobarts that ſhal be put to them, they muſt haue recourse vnto him, praying him to strengthen them with the power of his holy ſpirite, that they may conſtantly paſſe through all aduerſities of this worlde, vntill they be gathered into the euerlaſting reſt, which is prepared for them in heauen, according as it hath bene purchased for vs by our Lorde Iefus Christ.

And ſo let vs caſt our ſelues downe before the face of our good god, with acknowledgements of our faults, praying him to make vs to better perceiue theſe than we haue done, in ſuch wiſe as we being conuincid of our wants, may haue our whole recourse to his mercie, beſeeching him to be our father in our Lorde Iefus Christ: and that althoſh we be not worthie to bee reckened among his creatures, yet he will accept vs for his children, ſo as wee may learne to taste of his loue and goodneſſe: and therewithal that he wil strengthen vs in ſuch wiſe in al the afflictions which he ſhall make vs to feele, as we may be able to withstand theſe all, euen till he haue drawne vs away to himſelf, to make vs iroij the victorie that is purchased by our Lord Iefus Christ, & the triumph that tarieth for vs in heauen. That it may pleaſe him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but alſo to all people and nations. &c.

The xxv. Sermon, which is the thirde vpon the ſixt Chapter.

This Sermon conteyneth the reſt of the expositiōn of the .xiiij. and .xiiiij. verſes, and then as followeth.

15. My brothers haue beguiled mee as a drie brooke, and as the vvaters that paſſe through the valleyes.
16. They be troubled vvith ycc, and are full of ſnowe.
17. And aftervvarde fayle through drought, and are taken out of their places by heate.
18. They turne aside by diuerſe vvayes, and vaniſh and periſh.
19. They that haue ſcene[them] vvayting in the quarters of Thema, come in Seba.
20. But being there, they vvere confounded: and hauiing hoped, vvhene they vvere come too the place, they vvere ashamed.
21. Behold hovv you be to me as drie brookes: for ye haue bene amazid at the ſight of me.
22. Haue I ſayd to you, bring hither, giue me of your goodes?
23. Deliuere me from the enimie, rescue me from the hand of Tyrants.

He first ſentence that we haue herd, tendeth to this ende. That the man whiche is preffed ſo as hee can no more, deserues well to be excuſed if he be exceilſive in his paſſions. And that is it that Job alleageth for hys excuse. Although I ſpeake out of meaſure (ſayth hee) men muſt not thiſke me much too blame, for the miſerie inforceth me to do it. True it is that this colour may be admitted among men: but as too Godward, it canþt be iuſtified if we alledge that the miſerie is ſo exceilſive, that we wote not what to do. For god is able to affwage it, if we deſire it at his hande. And furthermore wee cannot excuſe our ſelues after this preſent maner, but God ſhall by and by bee accuſed as if he had no regard of our welfare, or as if he had handled vs without anye aduysement. Verely men think not of this: and yet when we speake of God, we ought not so open our mouth but with all reverence and sobernesse. Now let vs consider whether God chastyze vs with discretion or no. VVhen it is once agreed vpon, that God knoweth why hee afflieth vs, and that he never passeth measure: the same must not go for payment when we come to excuse our selues: but rather we must yeld our selues giltie. So then, seing that Job hath fayled in this behalfe: let vs go the rather to the remedie: which is; that if wee bee combered with greate aduersities, wee should haue our recourse vnto God, praying him too voutsafe to succour vs. In so dooing wee shall fynd, that he will ease vs so much as shall bee needfull, and also that hee will not suffer vs too quayle. Although it shall seeme that our calamities are as gulfs to swallowe vs vp: yet will God vphold vs with his hand, and preserue vs in such wyse, as wee shall not come too the poynt to bee vtterly ouerthrowē. True it is that in respect of our selues, Gods intent is that our weakenesse should bee knowne, and that it should shewe it selfe to the intent wee myght not haue whereof to boast our selues, but rather that the foolish haultinesse that is in vs might bee beaten downe: but yet for all that, we shall bee succored by him in due tyme. Yee see then [what is to be sayd] concerning this sentence. And it is sayd: That a freend ought to doo him good which is afflited: But Job complayneth that men haue not the feare of God. This sentence ought too bee common among vs. For wee must not go to schoole to say, Let vs haue compassion vpon such as are in distresse: that is ingrauen in all men. There is no man but he can skill to say that: specially when wee bee in aduersitie, euery of vs will desyre men to haue pitie of him, and to think vppon him to his releef. Ye see here a lesson that ought too bee more than knowne to vs, and yet in the meane whyle no man pratelyzeth it: and therefore so much the lesse are wee to bee excused, as our common prouerbes serue vs to our condemnation. The veryest idiots and the ignorantest persones in the world, cannot say but they haue heard that which is common and ordinarie among all men. And if a man consider the prouerbes that runne abrode: he shall fynde record ynough to reprove such as would take couert before God, which say, I knewe not what it was, I was not learned it, I was not warned of it. For wee haue skil ynough to say, that a man ought not to grecue the afflited, but that he ought too pitie him: and yet for all that, wee consider not of it a whit. Ye see then that at the latter day God shall haue nothing to do to put in long indytemēts against vs for the crueltie which wee vse towards our neyghbours. And why? For every man can bee his owne iudge in this case. But let vs mark that when mention is made of compassion or gentlenesse, the same extendeth verye farre. For the case standeth not only vpon giuing meate and drink to a man when he is a hungred or athirst, or vpon giuing some bodily releef: but also vpon comforting of a man when he is troubled with sorowe and anguish of mynd. If a man be hemmed in with aduersitie, it is no comming to him to vex him more and more, and to put him out of hart altoogither, but rather, meanes must bee sought to comfort him. And so the curtesye whervnto wee bee bound by nature, lyeth not only in dooing some pleasure: but also in not being hardharted to shake them off that are in any aduersitie without regard of them. It is not to condemne the double, to the end that their miserie should be the greater: but rather to bee meeke and gentle to them, so as wee can fynd in our harts to mourne with them that mourne (as the scripture exhorteth vs) Rom. 12.15 and to bee glad of our neyghbours prosperitie. Yee see then what wee haue to mark. But it is sayd: that a man forsaketh the feare of God when he hath not compassion of the afflited. And truly if a man remember well the rule which is giuen vs by our Lord Iesus Christ: he shall well see how there is no feare of God in vs, when wee bee so shrunke away. And whyso? For yee see how our Lord Iesus Christ tellet vs, that wee ought to folowe Mat. 5.9. our heauenly father if wee will bee taken for this chil- 45.48. dren. The very heathen themselues could well skill to say, that there is nothing wherein a man dooth more resemble God to fashyon himself like vnto him, than in dooing good, inasmuchas it is a kyndly thing for a man to succour those that are in necessitie. And now yee see how God causeth his dayfunne to shyne bothe vpon good and bad. If I see my brother, if I see him that is as it were a mirror of myne owne flesh and myne owne nature pinched with aduersitie, and haue no care of him, is it not a token and proof that I think not of God and that I am ouerbeastly? And so it is not without cause sayd in this streyne. That such as haue no pitie vpon the poore wretched creatures which are in aduersitie, haue giuen ouer the feare of God. Yee see also why our Lord Mat. 23.5-13 Iesus Christ sayeth, that the cheef poynts of the lawe are judgement, ryghtuousnesse, mercie, and truthe. VVhen wee will shewe that wee feare God and desyre to serue him: wee must come to this present poynt, that wee walk in soundnesse among men, so as wee bee not giuen too' guylefulness and malice: and furthermore that wee render every man his ryght, that wee mayntaine good and ryghtfull eaces as neere as wee can, and that wee pitie such as haue neede of our help, in succoring them to the vttermost of our power. Yee see (I say) wherein wee shall fulfill Gods lawe. But if wee bee full of crueltie, so as every of vs think only vpon himself, and make no account how other men fare: herein wee shewe ourselues to haue no regard of God. And why? For if wee had God before our eyes, we would consider that he hathe set vs here to live togither and to communicate one with another: wee would consider that he is the father of vs all: wee would consider how he hath made vs all of one kynd, to the end wee should one of vs haue care of another, and none of vs drawe away by himself alone, considering that wee haue neede one of another. Therefore it is too bee sayd, that such as are turned away from this kyndhartenesse, haue also turned their backe vpon God, yea, and that they knowe not what thing manhood is. Then let vs beare well in mynd this sentence: That to proue our selues to haue the feare of God, it behoueth vs to labour to doo good to the afflited. True it is that for the obseruynge of the generall rule, wee be bound to do good to all men. Howbeit forasmuchas wee haue greate hardnesse of hart, wee must be softened by the syght of every one that is in distresse. And in the same is a good meane too breake and abate all the enmities and euill will that haue ben afore. A shew? If a man bee in prosperitie and aflore, and be hated, and afterward fall and haue some greate storne lyght vpon his head the sayd hatred which had ben afore, ceaseth: insomuch that they which had borne rancour against him and would fayne haue eaten his hart and his guttes (as they say) are somewhat appeased when they see what a chaunge is happened vnto him. And seing that affliction is inough to kill hatred and too make enmitie to cease: I pray you what shal it do when we see our neyghbours in aduersitie? Ought we not to be double moued to succour them? As for those that torment and fling

poore folk that are in miserie and heauiness, they are not only vnkynd bycause they haue no compassion: but also they excede further, for somuchas they come to increase the mischeef. If I see a man that mourneth and desyreteth succour of mee, and I turne my backe vpon him: I am cruell, and I shewe my self to knowe nother God nor nature. But if another come and laugh and mocke at him that desyreteth to bee some what releued, so as his comynng doubleth his greef: such a one is alfo double cruell. True it is that I haue delt churlishly on my behalf: but as for him that commeth to set his foote vpon the poore mannes throte, dooth not he shewe himself to be a wyld beast, yea and more than beastly? But such are Iobs frends of whom he complayneth. Therefore if we will proue ourselues to bee Gods children, let vs lerne, not to shake off the that are in miserie, assuring ourselues how it is the thing wherevnto God calleth vs, and wherby he will haue a record whither wee take him for our father or no: that is to say, if we vse brotherlinesse towards men. But in any wise let vs beware wee li't not vp ourselues against such as indure any aduersitie, and that we oppresse them not moreoever. For wee see how that is a greater despysing of God, than if wee made no reckoning of them. Thus yee see what wee haue too marke.

And heerevpon Iob vseth a similitude, comparing his frends too a drye brooke. Looke vpon a brooke (sayeth he) which runneth not at all tymes, but is sometymes drye. If there come anye great shot of water, and that it freze, a man shall see a great houge heape while the frost lasteth. And afterward if there fall a srowe, behold the waters come gushing downe, and the brooke is so swolne, as he can scarce keepe himself within his banks, but overfloweth: a man would think that it should continue so alwayes. But the brooke passeth. He goeth here and there (sayeth he) and in the end dryeth vp: so as if a man go to the way of Thema, or to the way of Seba, in hope to fynd water there, he shall be deceyued. Now these countryes were wyld in respect of the land of Lewrye, and there were deserts betwixt them: it had a drye way and in maner vntrauellable, and therefore it was a place that had the more neede of water to refresh men. Behold the trauellers (sayeth he), when they shall haue seene such a brooke, they bee glad and surmise with themselues, we haue a riuer that will giue vs some refreshing if we bee athirst, wee may drink water: for wee shall haue it continually at hand. But when they come too the drye places and think to refresh themselues and to haue water there when the heate is greate: they see themselues deceyued, and therefore they are abashed, and greeued, and angrye at the matter. Lo (sayeth he) even such are you. And it is not without cause that Iob alledgedh this similitude here. For we haue seene heretofore, that his frends which are come too comfort him, are men of greate countenance. And no doubt but they were honored and renoumed as wyse men. For euen ourselues may perceyue they were no common persone, but had excellent gifts of grace in them. As touching the matter Iob sayeth that all their wisdome was but as a blast of wynd. And whyso? For the cheef poynt in a man, is too haue an egall stedinesse, that hee bee not full of vaunts too fling intoo the feeld and too make greate florishes with his sheeld, and afterward too meene nothing in deede but only a brauerye, according as wee shall see some that make fayre faces, and byandby in the turning of a hand they are become other men, in somuch that at sometytimes a man would say: Behold yonder Angells: and anon a man shall see them wash away like water, so as there is no hold of them: Iob then in applying this comparison to his frends, sheweth that they haue not the sayd egall stedinesse, and the sayd hold of themselues, which is requisite aboue all things in men. Therefore wee haue a very profitable lesson to gather vpon this sentence: That is, that it were much better for vs to bee as some little spring, which shall not seeme too haue anie greate store of water in it, than too bee as greate brooks to bee dried vp at tymes. There may bee some little spring, and perchaunce it is well seene that it hath but one little hole, so as a man shall haue much a doo to drawe vp one pot of water: but yet notwithstanding the spring continueth alwayes still, it serueth ones turne, it keepeth his course, it dryeth not vp. True it is that such a one beareth no greate shewe, it is not much made of among men: the spring it self shall lye hid, so as a man may passe ouer it and not perceyue it, for the head of it is innermore, and yet it is much better for vs too haue this little trickling groope in vs, that holdeth out and continueth still from tyme too tyme, than too haue houge gushing streames that make a greate shewe, and at length drye vp. As how yee shall see some man that is a still man, and maketh no great talk: he is a laboring man, or he shall be some handycrafres man that is of no great reputation: but what soeuer he is he leads a blamelesse lyfe, he laboreth faythfully, and referring himself too God, he contenteth himself with the little that he hath: if God giue him children, hee bringeth them vp; hee is a good example too them, and he giueth no occasion of stumbling. Moreouer hee is sure hee can make no greate troubles nor royots: for his hands are not so long, as that he can stretch them hither or thither. But (as I haue sayd) he sheweth in his littlenesse, that he is able to help his neyghbour, for besyds his confirming of them by his good example, God dooth also giue him the grace to imploy himself for them in any small matters. Truly he hath no greate shewe too the worldward: but yet the case so standeth, as he may serue a mannes turne euen with his littlenesse. Yee see then how such a man holding himself after that sort in lowelinesse, and continuing his race, may be compared to a pretie spring which never drieth though it be but little. But there shall bee othersome that will woork wonders, it would seeme there were no mo men but they, and at the first blush yee would say, behold wee see woonders. But let a man looke throughly vpon them, and he shall fynd the same lacke in them that is spoken of here. There are that bee practized and learned in the scripture: yea for to talk of it, and to countenance themselues with it, and peradventure also there will bee some gay shewe of ir in their lyfe. See here the likenesse of a drybrooke that makes a greate noyse when the waters come downe togither: and when the snowes are melted into it, it should seeme that a whole doosen of greate springs fell intoo it and gushed through it with great violence. But what? Yee shall see a man that beareth a greate countenance: but let him be throughly viewed, that is to say let it be marked what he doorth at length, and he shall bee found to fayle and not to hold on. So that if he haue anye shewe of vertue, he shall haue so greate vyses matched with the, as it is pitie to see it, in somuch that a man shall see he seeketh nothing but to make himself well esteemed, where as he hath so ymreasonable faults in him, (backebytting one man and beguyling another,) that all the world shall bee ashamed of him, or rather laugh him to skorne. Yee see here the drybrooks that are well swolne for a whyle, but in the ende are dried vp. And for this cause I haue sayd that wee ought too bee well aduised, and too take take good heede every man to himself, and to pray God to make vs perceyue our owne infirmities, to the end that wee cast not our selues in that sorte out of our bounds, to purchace greate reputation among men: but that our cheef studie be to haue the liuing waters that are spoken of in the seuenth of saint John. True it is that our waters ought to flowe foorth, and that wee ought to make one another partakers of the gifts that God hath giuen vs: but yet in the meane season the headspring must lye couered within; and we must be satisfied with that which God hath giuen vs, and afterward deale thereof among our neyghbours, every man according too his abilitie. Behold here in effect, whervnto we must apply the comparison that is set downe here. But this extendeth very farre. For wee see how Job speaketh of his freends that made pretence to be redye to succoure him at his neede, and yet fayled in such wylle as he was deceyued of the hope that he had in them: according as David sayeth, that they are Tablefreends, but they shewe not their heads in the tyme of neede. VVe see then dayly the experience of that which is sayd here, how there are a greare sort of drye brooks in the world, that is too say, that there are a greate sort of howge waters that rore and make a myghtie noyze: but there is no certeintie in them, neyther haue they an euenslowing course to holde out too the end. But to the intent wee bee not shamed, forasmuche as God warneth vs of it aforehande, let vs consider that men are as it were dryebrooks, and although they seeme to bee maruelouse stremes for a tyme: yet notwithstanding they vanish and slippe away in such wise, as a man cannot tell where the water is become which they had trusted vpon. Seing then that God sheweth vs how it shal bee so, yea and that besyds his woord, we haue experiance of it also: shall wee maruell when the matter is come to passe? So then let vs beare well in mynd, that we must not gaze at men here bylowe: for in so dooing wee shall bee disappointed of oure expectation. Let vs rather learne to hold vs to the fountayne of liuing water as it is shewed vnto vs by the prophet Ieremie. For God blameth the vrthankfulnessse of men which dig themselves pits and cranyed cesternes that can hold no water, and in the meane tyme forsake him that is the welspring of the liuing water, wherwith they ought too bee filled continually. If one should make a man greate promises, there would be greate fault found if he should fayle him at his neede. Howe so? [it would be sayd] he hath promised mee mountaynes and mynes, I haue wayted vpon him, and in good fayth I haue indeuered myself to do him seruice, and now he giueth me the slip, he makes none account of me. Behold (say I) the complaunts that wil be made of ordinarie: But we mark not that God chastizeth vs, when we haue not leaned vnto him, as became vs to do: nor that it was not long of him that we were not succored as he hath promised, because we haue shrunk away to creatures, and put our trust more in them than in the creator, and therefore that it is good reason we should bee disappointed of our hope, and put to shame, and be brought vnder foote with those whom wee haue trusted vnto so foolishly. Thus ye see what wee haue to beare in mynd. Yet by the way, wee must abhorre such as are like drybrookes. For God hath ioyned vs one with another, too the intent that our continuing here, shoulde bee to comfort one another, and that every one of vs should take a peece of his neyghbours burthen. For if there bee nothing but gay countenances, and in the meane whyle wee haue no care one of another: see yee not a thing that tendeth to peruer the order of nature? So then wee must mislyke of them that make fayre protestations, and in the end d<sup>oo</sup> shrink in the wetting, in such wise as the waters which they made shewe of, were nothing else but too bleare folks eyes: for mennes wayting vpon them was in vain. Nowe if such maner of men deserue too bee condemned: what is too bee sayd of the brookes that defile all things [with their mud] and carye out all afore them? For it is much better that the brookes should dry vp still, than too haue such swellings too marre the feelds and the medowes by turning vp all afore them, according as wee see that when brooks overflowe their banks, they leaue nother land, nor house, nor trees, but sweepe all away afore them. And the damage thereof shal not bee for that one yeere alone: but sometymes the grounds feele it a good whyle after, yea euen after such a maner, as men shal not bee able too sowe anything vpon them, for all shall be turned too sande and grauell. And wee see many of these drybrooks, yea and wee must bee fayne too bee accustomed to them. They that are in authoritie and beare the mace of Iustice, ought too bee as a riuier too refresh such as are readye too faynt, and too succour such as are distressed. But what? They trample folk vnder their feete, they oppresse all ryght and equitie, and they maynteyne naughtypacks that would put all to haueocke, and lift vp themselues openly against God.

There needs no long examination of these things, they are apparent too the eye. They that are riche of the goods of the world, they that haue lands and possessions too liue of their rents, the merchants that haue good trade off traffick, these ought too bee as riuers, and too water the places where they passe through, with the abundance that God hath giuen them. But what? They overflowe their banks, and there is nothing else with them but of ouerthrowing one and of turning vp another, and thereafter as God hath giuen evry of them the more abilitie, so thinketh he himself to haue the more power to annoy and to greeue his neyghbours. Ye see then after what sort men doo through this default begyule those that haue wayted vpon them. For they haue a streme of water as it were a floud: yea [but that is] too destroy and turne vp all things. VVhen we see this geere, let vs assure ourselues that such men are enemies too nature, and woork spyte vnto God. But herewithall let vs also mark, that by this meanes God wakeneth vs and draweth vs too him, to the intent wee should learne too put all our trust in him. Furthermore (as I haue touched alredye) euery of vs is put in mynd of his duetie, which is, that when wee haue the sayd waterspring in vs, thereafter as we haue drawne of the sayd fountayne of liuing water, (that is to say of our God) wee must not keepe the sayd grace inclosed in vs, but it must bee a spring that never dryeth vp, and therewithall the waters must flowe out to our neyghbours also. And according to the measure that every man shall haue receyued: so let him studie to do that which may bee to the common profit and furtherance of others: according as it is not Gods will that the thing which I haue receyued should serue for my self alone, and that I should suppresse it: but his will is that I shoule deale it foorth to suche as haue wante, and that every man should indeuer to do the like.

Thus ye see what wee haue to remember in effect vpon this streyne. Furthermore wee must also wey how it is sayd, that when a man commeth too the way of Thema, and too the greate beate, the waters of the Sommerbrookes wil fayle him, notwithstanding that in wintertyme and in the moyster grounds there had ben a greate quantitie of water, and that it seemed too bee maruelous . But this is it that is commonly too bee seen in these jolly fellowes that stande so muche vpon their reputation, and that make so great noyse. VVhy so? for they holde not themselues in modeſtie, but they ouerflowe their bankes, and ſwell in ſuche sorte, as it ſhould ſeeme there were toto an invincible ſtrength in them. They ſpred out their wings, and when they bee at their eaſe they promis this and that. But when it commeth to the push, it is nothing ſo nor ſo . For as a riuere is more requyſite in the greate heate of Sommer, and in 10 a drye coaſt, than it ſhal be in winter & in moyſt groundes: ſo also muſt our vertuousneſſe ſhewe it ſelf when it commes to the true tryall . If God affliet a man : it is the thing wherein he ought to ſhewe himſelf pacient . And aſterward if it behoue him to imploie himſelf vpon his neyghbores: ye ſee wherein he ought to ſhewe hiſ charitic . Then let vs beare well in mynd that ſuch as indeuer to make them ſelues renoumed a farre off, doo ſhew themſelues to bee drybrooks in the end, whereas they that walk by meaſure and compaſſe, keeping themſel-ues in modeſtie, making no greate ſhewe nor greate noyſe, nor raunging farre to inlarge their borders, ſhall bee as a welspring that is couert and hidden: the which (as I haue touched heretoofore) wil not ceaſe too doo well, and yet (howſocuer it bee) we ſee it hath not any greate abundance, that a man myght ſay it were likely that it ſhould neuer fayle: howbeit this ſame is more commodious and bringeth more profit, than all theſe greate brooks that make ſo greate noyze in ouerflowing their banks. And ſo they that make their greate ſhewes 30 and muſters before hand, are nothing else but little apes toyes: and for our part let vs take them too bee ſo, that wee may ſhunne them . For Goduffereth this foolish vayngloriousneſſe that is in men ſo giuen to vanitie, to turne to a mockerie, and themſelues to bee put to shame.

It is certaine, that all ſuch as ſet ſuch ſtore by themſel-ues and would make themſelues renoumed, are led by vayngloriousneſſe: and if there were not ſuch wyndineſſe and ſwelling in them, they would be more ſtill and quiet than they be, and they would not hunt for ſo greate 40 reputation . But for almuſches they bee ſo haultie in themſelues, that is to ſay, for almuſches they bee diuen and led with vayngloriousneſſe: it is good reaſon that God ſhould make them reprochfull among men, and that in the end wee ſhould knowe how there was nothing but leaſing in their caſe . Yee ſee what ought too hold vs yet ſtill the more in awe, that wee become not drybrooks, but that euery of vs may reſerue himſelf till neede requyre . Although the world deſpyſe vs, yet notwithstanding 50 let vs like better to walk in lowelneſſe, than to make ſhewes and to ſay, I haue this and I haue that .
Nay, let vs reſcroe our ſelues to good purpose, to releeue the neceſſitie bothe of ourelues and of our neyghbores, and let vs not be lauifh for a tyme to laſh out all at aduenture and at one push, and afterward drye vp in the end . For if wee do ſo, wee ſhall bee like too the drybrooks . Thus yee ſee what wee haue to mark in this ſtreyne . And byandly Job addeth, That be bad not deſyred bis frendes too releeue him with their goodes, nor yet too bee bis borowe too reſcroe him out of the hands of bis enimyes, and yet notwithstanding in the meane ſeason they were drawne backe from him . VVhen Job ſayeth that he had not requested his frendes to giue him anything, nor to pay any raunſome for him: he meneth to apply the ſimilitude which wee haue expounded, to his owne purpose: as if hee ſhould ſay, when diſt. deſyre you too giue mee of your goods? If I haue doone ſo, then myght yee well withdrawe your-ſelues from mee . And much more reaſon were it that the waters ſhould be dryed vp by you: ye myght cut off the way to the fountain if I ſhould ſue to you to help mee . I craue nothing of you: and yet neuertheleſſe a man may ſee yee are as it were dazeled at the only ſyght of my miſeries . Therefore in ſo dooing yee ſhewe your ſelues well too bee drybrooks . Now let vs remember well this accuſation heere, that wee may profit our ſelues by it . For although wee haue ſome ſhewe, and that it ſeeme wee were as redie and as foreward as myght bee: yet if wee ſuccour not our neyghbores when they haue lacke of vs: therein wee ſhewe our ſelues to bee but drybrooks . And the matter ſtandeth not only vpon our ſuccouring off thoſe with our goods, which ſtand in neede: but alſo vpon hauiing compassion on them, without anye abatement of our ſubſtance . For ſith it costeth vs nothing, ſo much the more ſhall wee bee vnexcusable, if wee bee nigardly and haue no pi-tie vpon ſuch as are in diſtreſſe . Thus yee ſee wherein Job ment to ſhewe the ouergreat hypocriſie of thoſe, that haue had ſo fayre a glosſe for a little whyle, and yet had no ſtedineſſe nor firmeſſe in them . This therefore ſerueth to condemne ſuch as are of the ſame ſuite in theſe dayes according as wee ſee ſome ſo farre off from taking any of their goods too ſuccour them that haue neede of it, that althoſh nothing bee deſyred of them, yet is it a greef and peyne to them, to vnderſtand off the wants of their neyghbores: I ſay it is a greef too them, not that they ſygh for ſorineſſe, for a man cannot wreſt a ſygh from them, but rather they could fynd in their hartes that their poore neyghbores were rooted out: not that they would wiſh them dead for pities ſake or for ſorowe to ſee them in diſtreſſe: but rather of a ſkorn-fulneſſe which maketh them too ſhunne ſuch as they ſee are in neceſſitie . Is there any ſo greate an vnkynd-neſſe as this? Yee ſhall ſee ſome man that will bee a freend to the vttermoſt: yea ſo long as hee is in proſpertie . But if God lay his hand vpon him, wee voursafe not to regard him, as a creature made after the image of God: but wee would bee as it were in a new world, that wee myght haue no ſuch thing too meete with, inſomuchas wee are aſhamed only too ſay, ſuch a man ſpake with mee euen now, or I ſpake with him . Seing that the holie Ghoste dooth by the mouth of Job condemne ſuch extreme hypocriſie: let vs looke too our ſelues, and when we ſee the affiſtions that are eyther in greate or ſmall, let vs aſſure our ſelues that God ſummoneth vs, to make vs vnderſtand the louingkyndneſſe which we ought to put in vre towards thoſe that are ſo ioyned vnto vs . God ſhould prouide wel for all maſynd, if it were his good pleaſure that no man were in paine, but that every man were contented and well at his eaſe .

But what? His will is too ſend ſuch neceſſities, to the end that they which are not in ſuch want and neceſſi-neſſe, ſhould haue pitie on them that are, and that euery man on his owne behalfe and according to the abilitie that God hath giuen him, ſhould ſtreyne himſelf too help thoſe that haue neede . As for example . A maſperchaunce is well at his eaſe: but aſſoone as he ſeeth any poore bodye, he ſhall bee touched with carefullneſſe, it greeueth him to ſee him that is in neceſſitie, and although he distribute not all his goods, yet will he ſuccour a man or twayne, and not ceaſe to haue pitie vpon thoſe that are not ſuccored by him as he could fynd in his hart too do .
Such a man as this ſhall bee much more ſet by than another that ſhall be much richer, bycause he hath as it were a longing too giue meate and drink to ſuch as lacke it: and God alſo will cauſe men too haue pitie on him intyme

Mat. 5.4.7. intyme of his neede, according as hee promisseth that such as haue ben mercifull and pitifull, shall fynd the like.
Psa. 41.4.4. And when they happen too be pinched with any aduersitie, others shall pay them such measure as they haue measured vnto others. Yee see then what wee haue too beare in mynd: namely that when we see our neybour in aduersitie, we must frame ourselues too be moued and affectioned too releue them as well as wee can. Yet notwithstanding if we perfore not our dutie too discharge our selues in giuing of our goods too the releef of others: at leastwyse let vs shewe how wee haue not the sayd pryd, that we would cut off those from vs which are in such necessite and whom God afflyeth: but rather let vs knowe how it is the meane whereby God will trye if we haue any kyndely affection in vs. And in very deede wee must alwayes bee more warer of disdeyning those that are in pouertie and trouble: than of louing those that are in prosperitie and at theyr ease, or of soothyngh them vp in all respects bycause they beare a goodly port too the worldward. And whyso? For our charitie is not well grounded, if wee loue our neighbours but in respect too be helped by them, and too serue our owne turnes with their credit, or with their goods and fauour. Nay rather let vs haue regard too followe that which God commaundeth vs: that is to wit too shewe our charitie vpon those whom we kowe to haue more neede. And furthermore let vs extend this doctrine too ourselues: that is to say. Let vs not think it is ynough to blisse God when wee bee in prosperitie: but if God send vs any affliction, yet for all that, let vs not cease to glorifie him in all respects, and to put our trust in him. And although we be tossed from poste to piller with the miseries and greeuances of the world: yet neuerthelesse let vs assure our selues, that God is strong ynough to deliuer vs, and that he will also doo it, so wee refreue our selues wholly too his prouidence, too glorifie his holie name in all that it shall please him to send vs, as wel in prosperitie as aduersitie. This ye se in effecte what we haue to mark concerning this text. As touching that Job addeth, Teache mee if I haue doone amisse: it cannot be declared as now, and therfore wee will refreue it till to morowe.

But let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs perceyue them better, too the end that being beaten downe in our selues, wee may haue our recourse too his soueraine goodnesse, and not rest our selues any more vpon any of the vayne trusts and false imaginacions wherewith the world begyleth it selfe wilfully: And that whensoeuer hee shall suffer vs too bee afflicted in this world, euen by the meane of men and of other creatures, yet notwithstanding wee may acknowledge it too bee his hand that beateth vs, too the end wee may indeuer too returne vntoo him, and seeke the remedy and cure of all our maladies in his only mercie: and therefore that he will giue vs the grace that wee may neuer bee withdrawne from this consideration, namely that wee may all of vs one and other labour too bee brought therunto, too the end that with one comon accord wee may yeeld our selues wholly too his seruice, too walk after his will in feare and obedience before him, vntill hee haue taken vs out of this mortall bodie, too make vs partakers of his endless glorie. That it may please him too graunt this grace not only too vs, but also too all people and nacions of the earth, &c.

The xxvj. Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the sixt Chapter.

24. Teache ye mee and I vvill hold my peace, shew ye mee vtherin I haue doone amisse.
25. How stedfast are the ryghtuouse vvoords, vwhat is it that the faultfinder among you can find fault vwithall?
26. Frame your reasons too ouerthrovve matters, and let the vvoords of the afflicted go into the vvynd.
27. You vvynd about the fatherlesse, yedig a pit for your freend.
28. Turne ye againe and consider, and mark my reasons if I lye.
29. Turne ye againe and there shal be none iniquitie. Turne ye yet againe and my ryghtuousnesse shall appeere in that behalfe.
30. There is no vvickednesse in my toungh, and dooth not my mouth feele bitternesse?

T is a greate vertue in a man too yeeld himselfe teachable, that is too say, too submit himselfe too reason: for without that, men must needs overshoote themselues, as it were, in despite of God: for proof hereof the cheef honour that God requyreteth at our hands, is that whosomeuer we knowe too proceeze from him, be receyued without any gainsaying, that it be hild for good & rightfull, and that men frame them selues therunto. And certeinly all truthe and reason proceeze from God. Therfore let vs conclude, that God hath no soueraintie nor authoritie ouer vs, except men yeeld themselues fully to that which they knowe to bee true & reasonable. So then we shall haue profited greatly in all our lyfe, when wee shall haue lerned to humble ourselues so farforth, that assoone as the reason of a thing is knowne vntoo vs, wee make no more gaynsaying, nor shewe our selues stubborn and hard too agree vntoo it: but rather doo such honour to God as too say, Lord wee see it were to make warre against thee, if wee should stand any more in this case: for thy truthe is the true mark of thy diuine glorie: and therefore whensoeuer will worship thee, must obey thy truthe: for otherwyse, all must needs bee troden vnder foote. And this is the matter that Job treateth of in this streyne. For he protesteth, that if he bee taught, he will hold his tung: his desyre is too haue it shewed him wherein hee hath doone amisse. No doubt but Job dooth heere in his owne persone give a common rule too all the children of God. VVhich rule is, that when God shall haue shewed vs wherein wee haue doone amisse, wee must no more open our mouthes too alledge tryfing excuses, and too enter into defence of our doings, but wee must giue eare too that which shall bee told vs, without encountering it: and generally wee must receyue all good doctrine as soone as it is spoken, without asking whither it bee so or no, and when wee knowe it too

H.ij. be so,

be so, we must go through withit, without kicking against the pricke. And as I haue sayd that it is a greate vertue to bee so teachable: so also let vs vnderstand, that it is a verye rare vertue and not lyghtly too bee founde among men. Nay rather, wee see a foolish presumptuoufnesse, so as euerye man weeneth too bee wyse in his owne conceyt: and herepon groweth such a deuiliſh wilfulnesse, that although wee shewe our selues too bee more than conuicted, yet many of vs will neuer yeeld, but are rather so shameleſſe and brazenfaste, as they will maynteyne that which is against reaſon: for all is wellynough so they bee not foyled. So much the more ought wee too mark well what is sayd heere: for although Job treate heere of his owne vertuoufnesse: yet notwithstanding, Gods holie spirit ſetteth it heere before our eyes as a lookingglaſſe or an example for vs to followe. So then, let vs not be wedded to our owne fancies, that we ſhould not quietly her-ken too that which is told vs, yea euen when it commeth too the poynþ that wee muſt bee rebuked for our faults. For Job treateth thereof in especiall: And it is againſt the foolish ouerweening that is in men for when they bee conuicted to haue doone amisse, and too haue ouerſene themſelues, they bee not ashamed too caſt themſelues intoo a thouſand abſurdities, and too bee caryed away by them, ſo as they become like brute beaſts, facing out the matter as it were in deſpyte of God, and all their glorie is to be opinionholders, and to be men that will neuer be ouercome.

First therefore let vs mark, that when any thing 30 ſhall be propounded vntoo vs, wee muſt not be ſo wil-fulmynded as to ſay, looke what I haue conceyued, that will I stand vntoo. No, no: let vs beware of ſuch wilfulnesſe. For it is a deadly plague when wee ſhall be ſo headſtrong and wilfull in the matters that wee take in hand. It is all one as if wee ſhould ſhet the gate a-gainſt God, and ſay hee ſhall not come in, and that although hee viſt vs, and although he be deſyrons too ſhewe vs that which is greatly for our welfare: yet notwithstanding, wee will repulſe that grace. And this is 40 that I haue ſayd alredye: namely, that if wee will bee Gods children, we muſt haue the ſpirit of meekneſſe, that is to ſay, wee muſt haue a peafable and quyet mynd, and wee muſt ſuffer our ſelues too bee handed by him.

Behold also wherefore our Lord Iesuſ Christ likenneth his children too lambes or too ſheepe which folowe the voiſe of their ſhepherd, and herken vntoo him as ſone as he callith them. Therfore let vs leerne too bee reproud, and too receyue correction whensoeuer it is brought vs: and generally letvs leerne too yeeld our ſelues too all things that wee knowe to bee good and of God. Are wee taught? Then muſt wee followe. And as I haue touched alredye, as for thoſe that are ſo wedded to their owne opinion: it is certaine that God ſetteth them forth to bee a mockerie and reproche, ſo as he ſuffereth them not to haue any more shamefaſtneſſe and modeſtie, but letteth them bee as wyld beaſts, and ſo reuengeth himſelf of ſuch ſtiffeneckedneſſe when men cannot find in their harts too yeeld and too bow their necks in agreeing to his will. And this is it that Job meeneth by Holding of his peace or by bolding of his tong. For a man may teache vs, and we perchaunce ſhall ſay, It is true, yea and wee may perchaunce alwayes ſay, Amen Sobbeit. But yet peraduenture there may be ſome that wil hold their tong, and yet notwithstanding continue ſtill ſtubborn in their owne fancies whatſoever befall.
If yee ſpeakē too a man that is fully determined not too yeeld: he will bee mum, he wil not vter a woord, yee ſhall not get him once to open his lippes: and yet notwithstanding this his holding of his peace is not without ſtubbornesse. But when Job ſpeaketh of holding his peace: he meeneth that when a man is warned, it is not for that he ſhould encounter it, ſo as if a man giue him one woord, hee ſhould giue three to the contrarie: but that wee ſhould ſimply giue eare to that which is ſayd.

Thus yee ſee what the holie scripture meeneth by bolding ones peace or by bolding ones tong. For when wee bee commaunded to hold our peace vntoo God, it is too the intent wee ſhould not make any adoo, bycauſe that all our paſſions are as roarings, which make ſuch a noyſe as God can haue no audience nor bee heard of vs. And ſo let vs lerne to ſpeakē and to hold our peace when wee bee taught. First let vs learme too hold our tongs. That it to witte, that wee hinder not the grace of God when it is offered vs, but that wee giue eare, and keepe our mouth ſhet ſo as weereply not. And furthermore letvs alſo learme ſpeakē: that is to ſay, to confeſſe that Gods truþe is good, and that there is no fault to bee found in it, according as it is ſayd, I haue beleeued, and therefore will I ſpeakē: and not only let vs yeeld ſuch record vntoo Gods goodneſſe, but alſo in-deuer too drawe others to it. Lo wherevntoo our ſpeaking muſt ſerue: namely to the end that the ignorant may bee defyed, and that wee may with one common accord bee Gods true ſcholers, ſo as his doctrine may bee receyued whensoeuer he liſteth to play the ſchoole-maiſter among vs. And thus yee ſee what wee haue too mark vpon this ſtreyne. But if euer this doctrine were needful to bee practized: nowadayes is the tyme: for wee ſee what ignorance is in the world. I pray you in what darkneſſe haue wee ben? and if wee will needs hold vs too that which wee haue conceyued, what ſhall become of vs? VVee haue ben ſo lewdly taught, as there hath ben nothing but conuision in our whole lyfe. Now if God had not graunted vs the grace too giue him the hearing that is mentioned in this place: what a thing had it ben? And at this day wee ſee manye that continue in their ignorance, bycauſe they cannot abyde too heare paciently what is told them: and God dooth iuſtly puniſh them for this haſtineſſe of theirs in liſting vp themſelues againſt him. And furthermore wee ſee how things are ſo confuzed throughout, that if wee bee not weldiſpozed and ſettled to her-ken what is ſhewed vs in Gods name, and too apply the ſame too our behoof: it is certaine that wee ſhall bee like ſtraying beaſts: euety man ſhall wander here and there, and none of vs all ſhall keepe the ryght way. So then, ſeing wee haue ſuch neede to bee teachable: and to haue a meeke mynd to receyue what is ſayd vntoo vs: letvs leerne too repreſſe all theſe fond af-fectiones that auaunce themſelues, when wee ſee any vayngloriousneſſe in our ſelues, according as ſome bee deſyrous too ſet out themſelues, and too ſpeakē againſt the truþe which they knowe, of purpose too purcaſh themſelues fame: and otherſome are ſirie, and their wits runne at rouers in ſuch ſort as a man caſt neuer brydle the.
60 Seing that wee knowe all theſe vices too bee in vs: letvs learne to correſt them, to the intent there may not bee any thing too hinder vs from holding of our peace, and to keepe our ſelues quiet, till wee haue learned that which is good, and that which God teacheſth vs. Thus much cocerning this first veſte. And touching the residue, he ſayeth, Teache me and ſhewe me wherein I haue doone anyſe. By this he meeneth that although Gods children ought to bee meeke to receyue correſtio & good doctrine: yet not notwithstanding it is not ment that they should be without wiſdomē and diſcretion. For we ſee what is haſſened in the popedom vnder colour of being ſimple. Men ſay there, O we muſt walk in ſimplicitie. It is true: but their meening is, that men ſhould ſuffer themſelues too bee led like brute beaſts, without diſcerning betweene whyte and blacke. But it is not for nougħt that our Lord promiſeth his faythfull ones the ſpirit of diſcretion: It is to the intent they ſhould not bee led here and there to daunce at euery manes pype, nor be led about like poore blind men. VVhat is to be doone then? VVee muſt bee taught, and we muſt haue the knowledge and certaintie of Gods truthe, to followe and obey the ſame, and when any man ſhall haue ſhewed vs our faults, wee muſt take warning aryght, therby to followe the good and eſchue the euill. Thus ye ſee what is ment by this woord Teache which is placed here. And it is a verye profitable warning: For there are many folk which think it ynough to receyue whaſoeuer is ſayd to them: Yea cuen without any warrant that it is ſo, or without hauing any firmenesse in the ſame. But if we will haue a trive fayth: Gods truthe muſt bee ſealed in our harts by the holie Ghoste, ſo as wee may be fully reſolued of it according as ſaint John ſayeth; that wee knowe ourelues to bee the children of God. He ſayeth not, that wee ſuppoſe or weene it, nor that wee haue conceyued a confuzed and intangled opinion: but he ſpeaketh of a knowledge. True it is that this wiſdomē commiſſeth not of our fleſhly reaſon, nother can our owne wit and vnderſtanding bring vs to it: for Gods learning ſurmounteth all capacitiē of man. Yet neuertheleſſe it behoueth vs to conſider, what truthe is, and to be throughly reſolued of it, and not to receyue what ſoever men tell vs at auenture and vnder the shadowe of ſimplicitie without knowing why or how. But wee muſt diligenty inquire of the thing that is told vs, and when we vnderſtand a doctrine to be good, wee muſt determine fully with our ſelues to hold vs to it. For thenceforth there is no more replying, it is hygh treason wheri we will open our mouth againſt God. Thus ye ſee what we haue to mark here. Sothen, ſuch as are ryghtly taught concerning God, may well bee angrie with thoſe that would diſguyze Gods truthe with their leaſings: like as in theſe dayes it is verye requiſite for vs to bee armed with the example of Job, that wee may beate backe all the wicked flaunders, wherwith the enimies of God and of his woord labour, to ouerthrowe and turne away our fayth. Ye ſee how the Papiſts doo vs greatwrongs: inſomuch as it ſhould ſeeme wee are not woorthye that the ground ſhould beare vs. But in the meane whyle there is no talk of ſhewing why. It is ynough for them that they haue filled the eares of the ignorant ſort afore hand, [beaſting them in hand] that we ſpeake againſt the holy churche bycauſe wee wil not bee ſubiect to all the traditions which they haue made. Yea: but it is ſayd that Gods word is it that muſt be receyued: and therfore that whoſoever ſpeaketh, muſt not aduaunce himſelf to bring fancies, but muſt ſpeak in ſuch wyſe as me may knowe that the thing which he vttereth is godly and of God. Then muſt God be exalted among vs. Also when the Papiſts prye out and caſt vp their ſkum: it behoueth vs to be alwayes redye to be taught. Yea howbeit ſo as it be the doctrine, not of men but of the liuing God, and of him whom he hath appointed to be our only maiftre, that iſto wit our Lord Ieſus Christ, who nameth himſelf a ſhepherd, to the intent that we ſhould be his flocke, that his only voyce ſhould be herd among vs, and that we ſhould ſhake off the voyce of ſtranglers. And moreouer it is not againſt the Papiſts only, that wee muſt bee armed with this warning: But we are at this day in ſo miſerable a tyme, as the childre of God haue greate neede of iuiincible coſtancie to reſiſt ſo many and ſo ſundry aduersaries. In theſe dayes it booteſt not to find fault with the euill and to condene it: for every man ſupporteth it too maniſtely. In theſe dayes we be come to ſuſh a bottomleſſe gulf, that iſ there happen any wickedneſſe, euery man couereth iſ, yea and iuſtiſieth iſ: and iſ there be any good, O it muſt needs be condemned. And howſo' doo men feare this horri- Eſai. 5. c. 20. ble curse which God hath vttered by his prophet, Cursed be you that call euill good, and good euill! Truely ſo little doo men think of it, that (as I haue ſayd) the euill ſhal be borne withall, yea and borne out: and the good ſhal be borne downe. VVhen a man ſhall not only haue done amifle, once or twyce, but alſo proceeded ſo farre as to ſpyte God to the full: it is all one, ſo it haue ſome ſhewe of ceremoniousneſſe. A man ſhall come and ſay to him, ſee, thou haſte doone amifle: yea, but that is all [that is done to him.] This is like as iſ ſome ſeruant in a house haue conſederate himſelfe with the children to guzzle wyne and to play the gluttons in ſome corner, and to do all maner of naughtineſſe: and yet when the fault is eſpyed, the children ſhould make countenance to ſay, thou haſte done amifle: when as notwithstanding, they haue all of them with one accord compacted them ſelues together with them, to commit ſuch royoſt and vnrifthiſtineſſe. And men uſe the like ceremonies at this day, to mocke God withall, when the euill is as exceilſive as can be. Contrarily needs muſt they be cođemned that haue walked in ſimplicitie and vprightneſſe, and which haue maynteyned Gods quarel. Theſe muſt paſſe the pikes & be cođemned, whyle the wicked be bolſtred out, and fauored at al mennes hands. But what is there for vs to do? we may hardi- ly diſpife thoſe that mocke God in ſuch ſort, & take to vs this cudgell here, which wil ſerue to beate them downe, & to put them to confuſio before the heauenly iudge: that iſ to ſay, whaſoeuer any man ſhall teache vs [aryght:] let vs be tractable and quiet. But if we perceyue him to indeuer to confound Gods truthe, or to turne it into a lie: let vs abhorre all ſuſh maner of dealing, and let vs alwayes hold on our ownre race. And this iſ it that is ſayd conſequently, That the wordes of ryghtneſſe are ſtrong, and what faultfynder is there that can find any fault in them? Hereby Job meeneth to ſhewe, that when a man hath a good conſcience, he ſhall contineſt ſtedfaſt and neuer bee ſhaken for any thing that can be ſayd to him. True it is that the wicked will labour thioughly to ouerwhelme him: but yet ſhall he contineſt alwayes in his ſtedfaſtneſſe. And hereby we be warned to walk ryghtly before God, and to haue a good [inward] wiſneſſe that there hath ben no hypocriſie in vs. Haue we done ſo? Let men assayle vs on all ſids, and we ſhall haue wherwith to hold them tacke. True it is that we ſhall not ceaſe to be greeued: but yet ſhall the wicked neuer haue the upper hand againſt vs, if we haue this ryghtneſſe wheroft Job ſpeaketh here. And it is an ineſtimable priuiledge, that ſuch as haue kept on their way in this rightneſſe & ſoundneſſe, ca neuer be coſounded. True it is that to the worldward men may opprefſe the with false flaunders, & me may diffame the in ſuch wife as it ſhould ſeeme that they bee the worſt folk in the whole world: according as we ſee the frowardneſſe that reigneth nowadayes, ſo as there iſ nother right nor indifference remaying. VVe be come to the tyme whereof the prophet Eſai coſplayneth: namely that right is oþely opprefſed, and vprightneſſe and truthe are chaced out of the world. And beſides this (ſayeth he) although the miſcheſt be increased, & ouerfloweth his bounds more & more: yet hath there not ben any man that hath vttered one woord to cleere these things that are so confuzed: but rather it hath seemed that every man hath had a desyre to augment the mischeef. Behold at what poynt we be . But (as I haue sayd heretofore) yee see it is an inestimable priuilege that we can hold that thing for good which the world hateth, and that when men poynt at vs with their finger, when they spit in our faces, and when they trample all reason vnder foote . Although we see all this: yet notwithstanding we be not abashed so as wee should inclyne to any wickednesse, but doo alwayes continewe 10 fast rooted and grounded in the sayd truthe, which is myghtie ynough to maynteyne vs . And so folowing that which is shewed heere, let vs lerne to hold vs alwayes too the word of ryghtuousnesse, assuring our selues that God will euermore bee on our side, and that his truth will bee so myghtie, that in the end it will get the vpper hād. True it is that for somuchas men are fugitiue, and runne on so headily: the truth hath not alwayes his full scope, and it wi<sup>t</sup> seeme erewhyles to be vtterly ouerthrowne: but let vs haue pacience vntill the day of the lord do apeere as say- 20 eth sainct Paule. For that is it whervnto he calleth them, mocking at the ouerweening of such as iudge so awkly, ouerthwartly and confuzedly, in charging him with those reproches. But (sayeth he) I wil wayt for the day of the lord, till God at length discouer the faise flaunders wherwith I haue ben charged. For whē that day (sayeth he) beginneth to appeere, thē must ryghtfulnessse come abrode, then must slanderers bee conuictēd and then must all things turne to their confuzion. Now if God euen in our whole lyfe, graunt vs the grace too get the vpper hand of 30 all malicious persones that go about to trample vs vnder foote, when we shall haue walked vnfeynedly in truthe: muchmore shall we haue that preheminenſe when the case concerneth fayth and the seruice of God, & the doctrine of saluation, that is to wit, God wil giue vs such & so stedfast, a constancie, that when the diuell shall haue bent all his force against vs, he shall gayne nothing at our hands, according also as we haue a promis therof. VVherof is it long then, that wee be no stedfast now adayes, seeing the troubles that are in the woorld? whereof com- 40 meth it that wee see so many men giue themselues too naughtiness? Euē bycause they haue not this sayd ryghtnesse, and bycause they bee not fensed against the manifold assaults which Satan bendeth against them . Verey there are some of a good mynd: if a man warne them, they receyue chastytement quietly: if no man trouble them, it is well, they will hurt no man, neyther will they giue any cause of offence . But if they once see that iniuitie hath full scope, and that if a man meene too liue simply and vprightly, he shall bee pricked on the one 50 syde, and punched on the other: then he starteth a syde and boweth with all wynds. And wherof commerh such inconstancie? It is bycause they haue not the ryghtnesse that is spoken of heere wellrooted in their harts. Behold (I say) what is the cause why wee see so many wauering men, who are not sure of the truthe of the Gospell, insomuch that they be but as wethercockes that turne with every wynd, or as reeds that bow every way. And why is that? Euen bycause they never knew the power of Gods woord and his truthe . For it is certeine that the truthe is so strong, as the diuell may well assayle vs, and woork vs all the trouble that he can deuyse: but yet howsoeuer the world go, wee shall hold our owne, and wee shall abyde stedfast in our state. VVhat is to bee doone then? Let vs pray God to make vs feele the power of his word, wherof mention is made here, (that is to wit, how it is an invincible fortresse) that wee may knowe the same by experience: and in very deede wee be too blame if wee doo it not . And let vs not say as manye ignorant persones say, I knowe not on what syde too turne mee, for I see contrarieties in mennes opinions, one sayes this, and another sayes that . True it is that there are dyuerse opinions: but so must our fayth bee tryed, and God suffreth it, according also as Sainct Paule sayeth that there must be heresyes, too the intent that such as are of God, may be knowne by hauing this the constancie of cleaving continually vntoo Gods truthe, neuer to be turned from the same . Then if it be alledged that there are many encounters and disputations: it is true: but is that as much to say as our fayth must therfore bee shaken? for wherin shall the stedfastnesse of this ryghtnesse shew it self, that is too say, how shall a man knowe that the truthe is so strong, or where shall the power therof shewe it self, but in vs? Like as in verye deede when it is sayd that Gods woord indureth for euer, it is not ment that it is alwayes but in heauen only: but that it is also in the harts of the faythfull, according as saynt Peter sheweth vs, that al- 1.C.ii.d.19 though wee bee tossed, with many stormes and tempests 1.Pet.i.b.7. & 5.c.9. in this world: yet shall our fayth neuer be shaken downe: So then it is certaine that Gods truthe is myghtye ynough too withstand all assaults, according as it is sayd, the victorie that ouercommeth the world, is this; namely 1.Ioh.5.4. euē your fayth, as sainct John sayes in his canonickall epistle . And so, are wee desyrous too profit well in the Gospell and in the schoole of God? Then let vs lerne, not only too take and too followe that which is good: but also too answer therunto in such wyse as wee may protest, I will doo such a thing, not only because I hope too bring it too passe: but also because God will giue mee strength too withstand the temptations which the diuell shall prepare against mee, so as I shall neuer fayle whatsoeuer betyde: And where as it is sayd, which is the faultfynder among you that can fynd fault with any thing: it is too shewe that the enimys of God may well practyze, and well vse craftie conueyances and naughtinessse: but they shall neuer obteyne too suppressē the truthe . Not that they shal not streyne themselues to doo it; or that they shal not deuyse any thing that may serue to strengthen them withall: but yet (notwithstanding all this,) God will maynteyne the case of his seruants, and at length shewe that the truthe is certaine . I say the wicked shall do their indeuer, yea and somtymes they shall seeme too haue the vpper hand: but by that meanes God puniſheth the vnthankfulnessse of the world . And this is it that sainct Paule meeneth by saying that the wicked and such as annoy the churche shall go on and preuayle and increase . And how is that? Is it not for that God giueth Satan the brydle, and suffereth the diuels champions to aduaunce themselves in such wyse, as it seemeth that they ought to be lordes of all? But God suffreth it not without cause: for we see the vnthankfulnessse of the world . There are many that would willingly be deceyued, & which are greeued when men teache the in all purenesse: who could fynd in their hart that Gods word were so confuzed, yea euē in such sort as a man myght not knowe nor discerne aught, but that it had twoo faces [in one hoode] as they say . Othersome, although they can abyde to heare one say the truthe, yet they haue no greate care too bee thoroughly rooted in it: all is one too them . Now forasmuchas God seeth in the one sort such a maliciousnesse, and in the other sort such a carelessnessse, that it turneth euē to an open rebelliousnesse, and many men quenche the lyght that God setteth before them: do we maruell if he slack the brydle too the wicked, and too those that turne the truthe intoo lying, and vtterly deface it? But yet in the meane whyle it is certayne, that God strengtheneth and maynmainteyneth those to the end, whome he hath taught his truth. And so ye see wherefore it is said that the faultfinders maye well streyne themselues : howbeit in the ende they shalbe vanquished, and God will shew himselfe to be on that side where good right is. And this is spoken, not only of the doctrine of the Goswell:but also of al that euer concerneth the life of the faithfull. True it is that the doctrine of Saluation is one of the pretiosest things that God hath. And therefore ye see also that he wil shew the power thereof in such wise,as he wil destroy the wicked by the breath of his mouth, and they shall feele that the said word which they haue despised, is a sword to slea them with, and to drieue them into damnation. Then behoueth it God to vster his power in this behalfe aboue all. But yet in other doings, whensoever wee be wrongfully oppressed by men, and that whereas we ought to be susteyned, it shall seeme that all goeth cleane backwarde: yet let vs not cease to trust still in God. And why? For we may perhaps be little set by for a time, and we may be abhorred as if there were nothing but euill in vs: But let vs be contented to haue God and his Angells to bee good witnesses of our soundnesse. Let vs tary till God chasse away all droopicie darknesse, and make our innocencie too shine out, that it may be feene as the breake of the daye. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this streyne. And by and by Iob addeth, that his friends which came to him vnder pretence to comfort him, haue framed talke to confound his holy purpose(that is to say,to confound his right sayings) and haue let the woordes of the afflicted passe into the wind. Here Iob accuseth those of extreme spitefulnes, which proceede so eagerly against him. And it behoueth vs to marke well this poynte. For no doubt but the holye Ghost sheweth vs here, what we haue to beware of, if we be loth to displease God and wold not make as it were open warre against him. Behold(I say)a vice that is hatefull before God : whiche is, when we will be cunning to ouerthrowe a good matter:and specially when it happeneth that we aduaunce our selues against them that are afflicted to the worldward:and when there is suche presumptuousnesse in vs, as wee will prouoke them to cast themselues into despaire: and yet ther is no vice so ouer rife as this. And why so? Because no man thinketh of that which is told here:namely,that when men forge such inuentions,(that is to say,when they devise things to ouerthrowe all equitie(as much as they can)and to make such krinks as the truth might not be knowne any more, nor take place any more:it is all one as if they came to iustle against God, and tooke him to be their aduersarie partie. Now then, if men would thinke themselues to say thus, howe nowe, wee bid battell vnto God: it is certaine they wold be so afraid as their heare wold stand vp vpon their head, so as it would be a bridle to them to hold them in, that they shold not fling themselues out so at randon. But sith that we thinke so little of it:at leastwise let vs receiue that which God sheweth vs , seeing that he giueth vs warning in this streyne. Ye see then in effect what we haue to beare in mind: that is to wit, that when any man speaketh to vs, wee shold delay our answere vntill wee know what the matter is. VVe see there is some communication ministred: what is to be done? Let vs herken, and marke whither it be godly and true or no: and let vs pray God to giue vs the spirite of discretion, that we may vnderstād what the truth is. And whē we haue found it, let vs not replie against it. For(as I haue said heretofore) most men ouershote themselves vnaudisedly , bycause they knowe not that it is God against whome they set themselues. By meanes whereof they cease not to procee in it with an euill conscience. For although they be not directly minded to say, I wil go iustle against God: yet they see well ynough, that God giueth the not leauē to auance themselues after that sorte against goodness, to supprese a good case: they see that well ynough. And therefore it is certaine, that all they whiche yeld not simply to that which is good, cannot excuse themselues, but that they haue through a certayne maliciousnesse fought against God. But nowe, let triall be made, and it will bee found, that all me both great and small ceasse not to wage deadly warre continually against God, and to worke him spite. And for proofe hereof, shall euer any case be oueruled by iustice, wherein there shall not be vsed a number of slights to turne the good into euill? And yet notwithstanding looke vpon the holiest and best priuiledged place that is:and the same is as shamefully defiled, as none is more:there is such stinking beslinese, as evē the bawds of brothelhouses wold be ashamed of it. For me disguise things, yea and corrupt them in such sort, as it may seeme that they haue conspired to shet all equitie and vprightnesse out of dores. And yet notwithstanding in the meane while men make countenance as though they sawe no such thing, and would fayne couer the leawdnesse which is too too apparant and notorious. It is even like as if a man had cast vp a handful of ashes to darken the sunne, & should say that the day were at an end. The things are knowne as well as may be, and yet do me still aske what is it? And which worse is(as I said)the same is feene even in the seate of iustice. On the other side it is to be feene how the deuil possesseth all. The Temples of God which ought to be dedicated to the seruing and worshipping of God purely as he commandeth, are stuffed with ydolles, so as there is nothing but corruption and caneldirt wherwith to send silly soules to destruction. In effect we see that in all the life of man there is nothing but disguising of things, so as there is no more tidings to be hearde of the said soundnesse and vprightnesse whereof we haue spoken. And herewithall we haue to marke this saying, That the words of an afflicted persone,(or of a despised person) passe awaie into the wind. For ye see howe the cause why men auance themselues against God, is for that they set too much by themselues, and thinke there is no wisedome but in their owne brayne. Truly in all the affaires that men haue, euery man seekes his owne auayles. And therefore when a naughtipacke would eschue the punishment that he hath delerued:he wil by and by haue his faire flatteries and gloses at hand, to the intent it shuld not be knowne howe the case standeth, whither it bee a money matter or any other thing. Behold how men corrupt the truth and turne it into a lie, for their owne aduaantage sake. But if the case concerne the doctrine of faith, and the Goswell: what else is the cause of so many countersayings, and that we see so many Sophisters come now adayes to mock God flatly with their sophisticall suttleties, but the pride that is in those which thinke the selues to haue witte ynough to winne their spurres, and to reason Pro & con as they terme it. [that is,to reason of and on, or too & fro on both sides.] No doubt but Gods spirite ment to taunt here this pride and presumptuousnesse, to the ende that if we purpose to keepe our selues from being enimies to God in fighting against his truth: we should shake off this ouerweening, and not despise our neigboures to tread them vnder feete, but rather be contented to be taught euē by a little childe if God shal haue opened more vnto him than vnto vs:according as Saint Paule sheweth,that such as haue the spirite of prophecie, although god haue giuen them the grace to teach others, must notwithstanding not disdayne to giue place to any other vnto whome God shall haue giuen more knowledge than to them.* Ye see then what we haue too marke in this streyne. And finally Job concludeth, that those which pretended to be his friends, do nothing else but dig a pit, for such a man to stumble into, as ought to be hild vp: and that they seeke nothing but to wind about the fatherlesse. Hee vseth this manner of similitude, because a fatherlesse childe hath no meane to defend himselfe, but is left as it wer to the spoile. So Job(as on whom God scourgeth to the vttermost) sheweth vs that we shal not scape Gods hand and vengeance, except we laboure to succoure such as are miserable: that is to say, such as are worthy of pitie and compassion, as was sayd yesterday. Lo what we haue to marke in the first place. But in conclusion he exhorteth them, to turne agayne: and then (saith he) there shall be none iniquitie. Turne ye agayne(saith he once agayne). And my righteousness shall appeare in this behalfe. Job in exhorting the, sheweth well with what mind we must find fault with the euill and condemne it: that is to witte, to bring men backe agayne, if it be possible to atteyn to it. Therfore let vs thinke vpon it, to the intent that such as will take warning may not perishe in their sinnes: but rather that being sorie for them and ashamed that they haue offended God, they maye retourne vnto him with a greater affection. True it is that when we find that such as haue offended God are not touched with the feeling of his justice, &c of his vengeance, insomuch that if a man manace them, he shall win nothing at their hands: it behoueth them to bee touched too the quicke, to make them abashed, if he purpose to bring the to repentance. But howsoeuer the case stand, we must alwayes shoote at this marke which is shewed vs here: that is to witte, to drawe them backe according to the maner that Job vseth in this proceeding here. And as touching that he sayth, Turne ye agayn and there shall be none iniquitie: true it is, that a man may expound this streyn as if he sayd, There shall be no more iniquitie in you. But there is more reason to say, Retourne ye and there shall be no more iniquitie: Turne ye agayne and my righteousness shall be knowne heere, as if Job should saye, what hath bin the cause that you haue hitherto condemned me as a man whome God had cast away, so as to your seeming I shuld be the worst man in the world: what is the cause why I haue cryed out in my selfe, and haue not bin herd at your hands? It is for that you haue turned your backs to al reason, and therefore turne ye agayne, and my righteoufnesse will be apparent. This wil be the better vnderstood, when I shall haue applied it to our instruction. First and formost we be put in minde here, that whensoeuer wee condemne the good and allowe the euill: that commeth of our owne mere default, so as we cannot say, behold I haue bin deceyued, and I wist not what the matter ment. Let vs not alledge this nor that. For it is certayne that we shall alwayes be founde blameworthy if we condemne that which is good and allowe the euill: and God conuicteth vs insomuch as he declareth that we haue not voutsaued to open our eyes, and to see what he sheweth vs. Do men then followe lies in sted of truth? Are they so blind that they know not what is good? It is bycause they haue turned their backs vpon God, and for that there is in them some maliciousnesse, some hypocrisie, or some carelesnesse. Then if God suffer vs to haue our eyes so sealed vp as we cannot discerne betwene good and euill: it is bycause we haue not had so good regard vnto God as becommeth vs, when he was redy to teach vs familiarly ynough. Marke this for a speciall poynt. But whensoeuer we bee so caried away as we haue not the spirite of wisedome, but do euen allow of the euill, yea and cherish it: the remedy is for vs to returne, and that we be not wilfully bent to continue in the false opinion that wee haue conceyued: except we will fall into the bottomlesse pit whereout of there is no escaping for such as are so bleared and cannot abide that God should enlighten them: for such maner of men must needs come to the top of all confusion. Then let vs bethinke vs to turne head assoone as we shall haue knowne our fault. For when God sheweth vs the fauoure to giue, vs warning: if we giue care to him to heare what he saith, he wil not suffer vs to bee led astray by euill continually, but he will bring vs backe agayne into the good way. Herewithall it behoueth vs to marke well how Job addeth, Returne ye yet againe and my righteousness will appeare Here he betokeneth two things. The one is, that it is not inough for vs to come to it ceremoniously, to say, It is true, there is a fault: according as we see that they which haue fowly offended God, and which haue bin the cause of some such vnrecouerable inconuenience, the sore whereof required letting of bloud, insomuch that ther hath folowed some stumbling 20 and confusion in the Church: euen they which haue bin giltye of such a trayterousnesse, shal do no more but come and say: It is true, I haue done amisse. All this is nothing else but a mockerie. It is well seene with what zeale and with what affection they proceede in that behalf: namely that they are not minded to retourne vnto God, verely not to retourne in such sort as it may be knowne that they repent them. And this is it that Job ment to shewe, in that he contented not himselfe to haue sayde once, Turne ye agayne, but said Turne ye agayne the second time. The seconde poynte that we haue to marke here, is that when God shall haue discouered our iniquitie that wee haue conceyued some wicked imagination that hath turned vs away from the good: in the ende it behoueth vs to acknowledge our fault, that we may retourne vnto God. A shew: I sayd that by applying this to our owne instrucion, wee shoulde haue the easier vnderstanding of it. Some men are to be found, who for a time shall be estranged from Gods truth and from the right way. And why so: For they haue some scrupulousnesse, or some euill opinion, according as the deuill is neuer withoute thys slight, to trump one thing or other in our way, to the end that Gods word may haue no more fauoure in our tast, and specially that we may be weery of it. And verely whē such maner of folke retourne, there shall be no more iniquitie: that is to say, God is mercifull to them, so as he giueth them the grace to be no more gluttend and wary of his word, as they were before. Ye see then after what sort iniquitie celieth when men returne. Neuerthelesse, whē they be entred into the good waye, it behoueth them to go on yet further. And how? They must returne yet once more, that is to witte, they must bethinke them, Alas, I had ben a poore forelorne creature had not God had pitie on me: and now that it hath pleased him to take mee to mercy, I referte my selfe wholly vnto him, beseeching him to gouerne me henceforth according to his good will. Now when such men retourne double, then God maketh them to see that which they knew not at the first. And in respecte heereof, lette every of vs beethinke himselfe, that wee maye haue oure recourse vnto God, praying him that after he hath once instructed vs in hys truth, he will confirme vs after such sorte in the same, as we may neuer step out of the right way, and as the deuill may neuer thrust vs aside.

And now let vs cast our selues downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him to make vs feele them in such wise, as wee may walke according to his will, and always be confirmed more and more in the same grace which he hath giuen vs uen vs once already when he called vs to be of his house-hold. And forasmuch as we are so greatly inclined to go astray: let vs pray him to beare with our infirmities, vntill he haue quite and cleane rid vs of them. And so let vs al say, Almighty God and heauenly Father, wee acknowledge our selues, &c.

The. xxvij. Sermon, which is the first vpon the seventh Chapter.

1. Is therenot a time appoynted to man whiche is vpon the earth, and are not his dayes as the dayes of an hyreling?
2. As a bondman lōgeth for the shadow, and as an hyreling longeth for the end of hys laboute:
3. So haue I the wayne moneths, and paynfull nights are appoynted vnto me:
4. In laying me downe I say, when shall I rise? and being in my bed, I am cloyed with bitternesse euen vntill the euening.
5. My flesh is clothed with worms, & with dust of the earth: my skin is alto brokē & corrupted.
6. My dayes glide avvay like a vveauers shettle, and vvast avvay vvithout hope.

E know well that as long as we liue in this world we must indure many miseries, but yet we could finde in our harts that God should handle vs after our owne measure. And we be so tender and nice, that so soone as he laieth his hand vpon vs, we think it to be very much: yea and euen the pacientest of all are at that poynct. But when God proeedeth with afflicting of vs still, ye shall see our faintnesse bewray and discouer it selfe more. And this is the thing that we haue to handle at this time. For Job complaingning that his miserie indureth ouer long, saith that a man ought to haue had a time set him aforehand: as if he shoulde saye, God hath not set vs vpon the earth in such vnquietnesse as we 30 be, but that there should be sometime to make an end of our miseries. But I am in such plight, as I haue no release nor rest night nor daye. It seemeth then that my case is worse than all other mens, and that God is minded to afflict me beyond that which the state of mans life is able to beare. Lo what his purpose is. And we see how all this aunswere vnto that whiche I haue touched: that is to witte, that at the first sight we can well confesse it to bee good reason that we shoulde bee troubled, and that we should haue hartfores here in this world: but yet there-withall we wold fayne that God should spare vs, and as soone as he do:th but touch vs with the tip of his finger, we wold haue him streightwayes withdrawe his hande and that our afflictions should not be of any long continuance. It standes vs in hand to marke well this streyne. For in the person of Job, the holy Ghoste hath set oure frailtie before our eyes as it were in a glasse: I meane the frailtie of mind and not of body. It is certayne (as I haue sayd heretofore) that Job had suche a courage and constancie as is wonderfull among men: and yet a man may see in what taking he is. So the what shal become of those that haue nothing but infirmitie, & which haue scarcely receyued three dropes of couragiousnesse to susteyne themselues withall in the middes of their afflictions? Must not such me quayle out of hand when we see that Job was so beaten downe whome God had strengthened so mightily with his grace? But first of all let vs go forward with this lesson, to applie the same to our own vse: namely that a time is appoynted to man that is vpon the earth. For it is profitable for vs to comfort vs in our afflictions. And specially when it commeth to the seruing of God, and to walking in feare and awfulnessse: thys ought to come to our remembrance, according also as we see the holy scripture speaketh. True it is that Job misapplieth this sentence: but yet of it selfe it is good and holy, and (as I haue sayd alredy) it ought to serue vs for a very profitable instruction. As doubtlesse when saint Peter calleth vs that we must walke in feare, because God sercheth the bottome of mens harts and iudgeth without accepting of persons, and that we must one day render an account afore him, and that when we haue contented mortall men with some outward appearance, it is nothing worth, for he shall discouer all our affections and thoughts: in good sooth it should seeme to be a hard case, that Gods children should be fayne to liue here as it were in feare and vnquietnesse. For saint Peter addeth It is (sayth he) during the pilgrimage of our life. VVWe see how saint Peter foreseteth a time to the faichfull too walke after that sort: verely to the end to giue the some confort, and that they should take some courage by hauing an eye to the euerlasting rest that is prepared for them in heauen. Then may we wel profite ourselues by this sentece, when it is said, that there is a time appoynted vnto man vpon earth. And what a matter were it if our life should be prolonged without ende, and we still continue in such case: for there is no rest for men. True it is that those which shunne God and drag backe from him, hope well that they do themselues a good turne, yea so long as they may royst it out in their delights and pleasures: but yet in the meane while they must be faine to be inuironed with many miseries: we may haue faire wherwith to dispatch our selues, but yet doth God hold vs there as it were imprisoned. VVhat a matter were it then, if we should be in miseric without hope of anye deliuernace or setting free: It were ynough to set vs in a rage and to cast vs into despaire. As oft then as we thinke vpon the great number of greeuances, wants, and afflictions that are in this world, let vs marke that God comforteth and releueueth vs by saying thus: VVell, ye passe through this world, but your life is short, therefore indure ye patiently the afflictions that are so short, and in the end ye shal come to the rest that I haue prepared for you. Ye see after what sorte we ought to mind this doctrine, if we intend to take profit by it. As much is to bee sayd of all the chafizement that God sendeth vs. For that which I haue said hitherto, extendeth generally to oure whole life. But in particular, when soever we shall indure any aduersitie, verely god wil send an end of it according as we see how he speakest by his prophet Esay, when he commaundeth him to cōforte his people. Thine appointed time (sayth he) is at an end. He speaketh there of the captiuitie of Babylon. For his meaning is, that although he scourgeth his people for their sinnes, yet he intendeth not to consume them vtterly, but keepeth a measure in his correſtions, that anone after they may haue some release, and know that God hath had pitie of them, & will not punish them to the vttermost, & therefore that they ought to be thākful towards him for his goodnessse. VVWe see then how that in all the whole course of oure life we must be fayne to suffer aduersities here: howbeit God will not prolong them beyond their appoynted time.

But soothly it shoulde seeme that this is a common thing though God spake not of it: and euen the heathen men (I meene euen the most brutishe of them) haue alwayes had their recourse to that poynt. For in all the miseries that could befall them, they comforted themselues therewith, saying: well, there is no miserie so great, but it hath an end. See I pray you how they measured their passions. It seemeth then to be a superfluous doctrine when God to comforte vs with, declareth that there is a tyme foreset to men, and that their dayes are as the dayes of an hireling. Howbeit we haue to marke, that whatsoeuer men conceiue in their imagination: yet when God presseth them, they are abashed at it, and to their seeming they are in a bottomlesse gulf whereoutof they can neuer scape. So long as we be in rest we haue the skill to say, that when aduersities be great and sharpe, they are not of long continuance. But if God summon vs afore him, and make vs to feele our sinnes: his justice is so dreadfull too vs, as behold, we are inclozed round about with a maze, whereoutof we see no way to scape, so as it seemeth that he will make vs go euery day deeper into it than other. Ye see then howe men are astonyed when Gods iustice toucheth them in good earnest. And so much the more behooffull for vs is this doctrine, when God telleth vs that forasmuch as we must passe through many miseries while we liue in this world, we ought to consider that our life is transitorie: and so shall it not greeue vs to be vnder such a state, seeing that the end of it is appoynted beforehand. And afterward if God chastize vs, if he send vs any afflictions; well, he presseth vs now, but it wil not last so for euer. It is certaine that we be not able to hold out ouerlong: and therefore he keepeth measure, for he knoweth what is conuenient for vs. So then let vs abide patiently till he deliuere vs, and we shall not be disappointed of such hope. Verely if euery of vs haue an eie to himselfe, we shall find our selues to haue very greate neede to be put in mind of this gere. For although wee know it: yet we forget it and wote not what it meeneth whē we come to the putting of it in vre. And for prooef hereof, ther is not any of vs that sayth not, will this geare neuer be done? If we haue any affliction, so as one bee sicke, another pinched with pouertie, and the thirde tormented with some hartgrief that troubleth him without ceassing: we aske, shall we always be newe to begin agayne? will there neuer be end of it. Seing that our flesh and our nature is so inclined to storne and repyne, let vs assure our selues how it is not without cause that God forseteth the determinate time whereof mention is made here. And herewithall let vs marke, that (whereas it is said, is there not a time appoynted for men?) it belongeth only to God to forset vs the time. And this may do vs much seruice. VVherefore? For if God knew not what we bee, and what is good and conuenient for vs: we might well be sorie to heare that the time of our miserie is in his hand, and at his appointment. But forasmuch as he knoweth what we be able to beare, and perceyueth that if we should be charged ouer sore, we should sinke vnder the burthen, yea and be vtterly crushed and broken: forasmuch (I say) as God knoweth this, and therevpon declareth vnto vs, that he holdeth vs vp according as he seeth our feeblenesse doth require, and that if hee vphild vs not continually with his hand we should be in daunger to be broken all to peeces, but he knoweth well how to moderate the weight of the afflictions that hee sendeth vs: now seeing we haue suche promises, haue we not good cause to be glad of this foresefting of the time? And further let vs marke well, that inasmuch as we haue our time determinate here bylowe: we must thereafter make the comparison with Saint Paule, betwene the miseries that last but the twincing of an eye: and the [endlesse] glory of heauen. For the shortnesse of the afflictions of this worlde (sayeth he) must make vs to thinke them light. For when we haue an eye to the euerlasting and endlesse kingdome of heauen: it ought to outway in the balance all the worldly miserie that is possible to be deuised. Seing then that the case standeth so, as oft as we be tempted to ouerforowing, impaciēcie, or despaire: let vs haue recourse to that which is said here: which is, that the time thereof is foreappoynted, and let vs vnderſtād that God hath forefeene what is good for vs to indure, and that our afflictions befall vs not without his good pleasure. Furthermore also let vs vnderſtānde that hee handleth vs not only with vprightnesse and reason: but also with a fatherly louing kindnesse. Lo what we haue to marke. And this doctrine extendeth very farre, howbeit it consisteth more in experience than in talking vpon it. For we may reason of it long ynough [to no purpose] 20 but the chiefe poynt is that euery of vs regard to profite himself by it at his neede: as how: Surely our life wold seeme very ſhort vnto vs, if it were not ſubiect to ſo many wants: so long as we haue our owne wiſh and are at rest, euery of vs can confesse that our life is nothing, and that it is as ſhort as any thing can be. But whē we thinkē vpon the infinite miseries wherewith it is full fraughte, and that aſſoone as we be paſſed out of one miserie we muſt enter ſtreightwayes into another and begin continually new agayne: this long lingering makes vs starke weery. And therefore let vs haue recourse to that which is ſayde here: namely that God hath appoynted the time, and that it is in him to diſpoſe of vs [as he liſteth.] Thō muſt we contente our ſelues with the meaſure that hee hath giue vs, knowing well that he woteth what is meete and expedient for our feeblenesſe. And yet notwithstanding, it is not for euer that we ſhall be fayne to languiſhe here: there will be an end, at what time God ſhall take vs out of this earthly pilgrimage, yea euen to call vs to his euerlaſting reſt, and there ſhall be none end, there ſhall be 2. Cor. 4.4. 30 no time ſet. Furthermore when God viſiteth vs, and euery of vs in himſelfe indureth ſome neceſſitie, or ſome chaſtizement: let vs acknowledge thus: VVell, it is true that if this geare ſhuld laſt euer, we ſhould needs quale. But God knoweth the ende whiche he mindeth to giue vs: hee haſte promiſed that we ſhall not continue ouerwhelmed vnder the burthen: let vs tarie till he reach vs his hande in our aduersities, and let vs assure oure ſelues that hee will prouide for vs in due time. Lo howe wee ought to applie this lesson to our owne vſe. But in the meane while wee ſee that Job hath ill profitid by it: and therefore muſt we be ſo much the warer, that we abuse not a ſentencē when God putteth it into our mind, too inſtruct vs, by applying of it to the cleane contrary. And yet is it an ordinarie matter with vs ſo to do. VVhen we reade the holy scripture, if any comfort be giuen vs ther, or if it ſerue to affwage our griefe, what do we? O ye ſee here is a comfort that God giueth to his children: but I am vtterly bereft of it: it ſeemeth that God wold cheere vp his faithfull ones, to the end to caſt me into despaire: ſeeing the case standeth ſo, what can I thinke but that I am vtterly barred from all hope of his grace? Thus ye ſee how we deale commonly in that behalfe. VVheras God allureth vs as gently as can be, and whereas hee sweeteneth all our miseries and ſorrowes: we thrust it all from vs, and ſeeke nothing else but to nouriſh the malladie within vs, and to barre our ſelues quite from Gods fauoure, and to caſt it a great way off. VVe ſee that this befell to Job: and therefore let vs not thinke it ſtrange if we bo

we be subiect to such like temptation. But what we must remedie it, and praye God to giue vs the spirite of wisedome, that we may know how to applie to our own vse and welfare, all the warnings that he giueth vs. And now let vs come to treate of that which is said here. Job alledged, How now? is there not a time appoynted for man that is vpon earth? True it is that heere beneath, mē are poore and wretched creatures: but yet may they after some sort be glad, seeing that God hath not set them heere to continue so for euer. Lo heere a thing whiche for the most part is able to assuage all the greefes that we indure vpon earth. But now (saith he) God maketh none end of my torments. Behold how Job complayneth that his state is worse than all other mens: as if he should say, God scourgeth me out of measure, for hee sheweth not that hee is minded to ridde me out of the miseries that presse mee. And this is it that I haue touched heretofore: namelye, that generally wee can confesse well ynough howe it is good reason that wee shoulde indure manye aduersities while we be in this world: And every manne can say, yea we be borne vnder the same condition and to the same end: and we must not thinke otherwise but that man euen from his birth bringeth with him so many miseries, and so many wants, as it is a pitie to see. I say we can well acknowledge this, in general termes: but so soone as God smiteth vs, we thinke he hath no measure with him. And thus ye see at what poynt Job is. Also ye see why I saide that the appointing of the time must be referred to Gods discretion, and not to our lust. Had Job (withoute being caried away by his owne passions) considered well what he said: it is certaine that he had not spokē amisse. VVhy mans time is foreset. But Iobs misdealing is that he himselfe wold be the iudge, and by that meane he plucketh away the authoritie that belongeth vnto God. And heere we see what we our selues do in the same case. True it is that our intent shall not be to bereue God of his power, nor to usurpe the right and authoritie which he hath ouer vs, we will not say so. But yet in the meane while it is as good as if we did it, if we be not patient and that we hold not our affections in awe when we be afflicted, so as we can say, VVell Lord, we are in thy hande, it is not for vs to stint thee, nor to taske thee to the present time, too saye thou shalt do this or that: but inasmuch as thou hast told vs that thou canst ende oure miseries, yea and bring them to a happie and desirable end: Lorde we will paciently waite for that whiche thou hast promised vs. Now then if we haue our minds thus disposed, then shal God be honored as he deserueth. But if we be hasty, if we be fumish, if we cast foorth our complaints at randon to say, VVhat shall become of it? It seemeth that God will never make any end of our miseries: I say that if we do so, it is all one as if we would pluck God out of hys seate, and not suffer him to haue any more authoritie ouer vs. Lo how Job dealeth in this case. True it is that he is pacient howsouer the world go: but yet is that no let but that there is some faultinesse mingled therewith: for the pacience of the faithfull sort is not alwayes so perfect as were requisite. Seeing that Job hath missed in this behalfe, ought not we too bethinke our selues well who are fully as brittle or more? So then let vs marke well that as oftē as God shal scourge vs, although the miserie indure and be prolonged, and although we see not that he intendeth to deliuere vs out of hand: yet notwithstanding wee must not go after the manner of Job and saye, VVhat? God leaueth me here in continual torment, and he seeth that my miserie hath none ende. But let vs fecde our selues with hope, and (as I said) let vs call to minde that the determining of the time must not be by our lust, but that it is God that must order it according as hee knoweth it to be good. And if we perceiue not the end of our miseries at the first, but that it seeme we must indure yet more: let vs not cease to tast of the goodness which hee hath promised vs. For Gods promises will leade vs to the darkness of death, and therē giue vs light to the intente to put vs always in some hope that we shall one day bee deliuered from oure aduersities. And heere ye see why Saint Paule saith, that although we be haried heere and 2.The.1.x.7. there, yea and that we be made as it were the ofskourings of all things: yet shall wee not continue in that case, but God will gather vs vp to himselfe to ioyne vs with him, and to liue for euer. Behold how we ought to profite our selues by al the promises that God maketh vnto vs, that we maye tast of them in the middes of all our miseries. But now let vs come to that which Job addeth. He vseth similitudes to expresse what he ment by the appoynting of the time whereof he hath made mention. For (saith he) looke me vpon a poore bondman or slave (for hee speketh not of seruants, hinds, or seruing men as they be in these dayes: but of such as were slaues: and afterward he addeth couenant seruants (that are hired for wages,) looke me then vpō a slave how he longeth for the shadowe: that is to say, for the rest of the night, because hee neuer ceaseth labouring all day long: very well then, such a one desireth the shadowe. Agayne, he that is at wages, longeth to haue his dayes worke at an end: and if he haue a moorneth or more or lesse to serue, he hath an eye to the end of his terme, that he may haue some rest. But as for me (saith he) I haue nother rest nor release. VVhen I lay mee downe, I say, how shall I come to the morning? And when shall I rise agayne? VVhen I am vp in the morning, the day seemeth to me to be a whole yere long. Then seeing I am in this plight. It is well seene, that God is not contented to plague me after the ordinarie manner of men: but that he meaneth to thunder downe vpon me, that I may not know what to do nor what to say. This is the complaint that Job maketh, saying that his miserie is excessiue, and not common miserie, so as here is no cause why any man should saye to him, Thou seest that so long as men are in this world, they haue many miseries to indure, thou hast experience of it, and thou knowest after what maner God is wont to deale in that behalfe: but God (saith he) vittereth al his force against me, so as it seemeth he wil ouerwhelme me altogether: and whē I compare my selfe with others whome he correcteth, I see my selfe to be in the bottoime of hell, and them to haue yet some hope of helpe, that they shal be deliuered of their miseries. And heere wee haue too marke that whiche hath bin touched alreadye heretofore: that is to witte, that Job was not pressed wyth bodilye aduersite only, but that hys chiefe grieve was to feele that GOD was agaynst hym. And therefore addeth hee thys that infeweth immediatlye. Beholde (sayth hee) my fleshe is as it were clinged to my bones, and my skinne is alto broken and as it were rotten: I am in that behalfe as a poore forlorne kaytif, and yet notwithstanding my life passeth and glideth awaie euen as a weavers shetle, whiche runneth so swiftly as a man perceyueth it not, neyther can hee measure the nimblenesse of it. Euen so is it wyth my life (saith he) when I rise, I am vterlie abashed so as I haue nother ease nor rest day nor night. But although Job were smitten in hys bodye: yet the temptation of feeling G O D to bee as lyis iudge and to holde hym (as yee would say) vpon the tacke, was farre more greevous to him, than all the martirdomes that he fel in hys body. And heere ye see also why he tormenteth himselfe so farre: and it is a thing that wee ought too marke well.

For

For very fewe folke haue bin exercized in these spirituall battells: and therefore they wote not what it meeneth: it is an vnknowne language to them: and when God visiteth them after that manner , ye shall see them vtterly dismayd, bycause they haue no: tasted this doctrine in time and place. Then let vs bethinke vs of it, and let vs marke that if all the aduersities whch befall vs are sharpe and tedious to vs : yet it behoueth vs to knowe, that they are nothing in comparision of the anguylhe that they indure which are pressed with Gods iudgement when hee sheweth himselfe boystous towards them, and giueth the some token of his wrath and vengeance: by reason wherof ye shall see them so astonished, as there is no comfort that can cheere them vp,vnlesse God worke with an extraordinarie operation in that behalfe. And why so? For in all our miseries, if God giue vs leaue to returne vnto him, so as we may call vpon him with hope that he will pitie vs in the end : it is certaine that we can cast all oure cares & troubles vpon him as the scripture saith. So the, our afflictions will be sweete and amiable to vs when we can go after that sort vnto God. But if we conceiue a mistrust once, which slutteth vp the gate, and that we imagin God to be our enimie, and that he persecuteth vs, so as it is but lost time and a vaine thing to call vpon him: it is euuen as much as if we were alredie in the bottomlesse gulfe of hell. And to this pointe was Iob come in parte, but not altogether, howbeit that he had experiance of it. VVhen we see this, let vs assure our selues that God can well send yet more thā he hath done: and that if he spare vs, it is bycause he knoweth our weakenesse. For it was his will to trie Iob to the vttermost. If he vse not so rigorous trial towards vs, it is of his owne infinite goodnesse. Neuerthelesse in the meane while let every man prepare himselfe beforehand : that he may be able to withstande such temptation whensoeuer he shall come vnto it. And though we be tossed as it were with waues: let vs not lose our courage in the mids of such tempests , seeing that God hathe susteyned his seruaunt Iob, yea and plucked him backe againe euuen when he seemed to haue bin vtterlie drowned , and as it were swallowed vp into the bottomlesse pit. Therefore let vs vnderstand that whensoeuer wee shall enter into such gulfes , we shall be drewn out againe in the end, so we be hild vp by the hand of God. Thus ye see how it behoueth vs to be prepared to battell, that we be not out of hart when such temptations come vpon vs: and that although it seeme we shuld be beaten downe at every stroke , yet notwithstanding we may hope that God will aide vs: which thing he will do in conuenient time, as he hath done to his seruaunte Iob. Furthermore although we haue bin afflicted a good while togither , and yet God suffereth the afflictions to continue still, and specially if when we haue imagined that we should haue some end of them, things shal come to such a passe as they shall seeme to be cleane contrarie, and that we shal never be deliuerner from them: yet notwithstanding let vs resist such temptation as shall be cast before our eyes, assuring our selues that God knoweth well how to dispose the times and seasons, and that it belongeth to him to do it, and [therefore] that all things must be put into his hand and to his good will. Beholde (saith Iob) I looked if there were any end of my miseries.

VVell, we also may well looke for the same. For God is not so rigorous towards vs, but that he beareth with vs so far as we may lawfully say, vntil when, (or how long) shall this hold: according as we see that Dauid speaketh so a good sort of times. But when we haue looked whether there shall be any ende of our miseries, let vs learne also to beware we be not to hasty. For else we shall bee confounded. VVhat is to be done then? Let vs shet oure eyes at presente things, and let vs praye God to make vs behold the end which is hidden from flesh and from our owne opinion, I say let vs pray him to make vs beholde that: and let vs frame our selues wholly to his good wil. For this is the only remedy to nourish both hope and patience. Or if we see our miseries to indure long, and that God sheweth vs not after what sort he will make vs way out: let vs shut our eyes and say, well Lord, true it is that thou wilte hold me like a poore blind soule in darknesse. Yea: but where is my comfort in the meane while? My comfort is to pray God to giue me eyes, not only to beholde presente thinges, but also to know those things by faith which are hidden from me as now. Beholde (say I) how we must deale : not to say as Iob doth, I see there is no remedy left for me: for the man that speakest so, is after a sort in despaire. For we must not limit Gods power, though a thing seeme impossible to our selues. He sayth, VVhen I lay me downe, I aske when shall I rise agayne? And in the morning I say, when will it be night? Let vs note that this is set downe to shewe that a conscience whiche is pressed with Gods iudgement, is alwayes troubled and in an agonie. Behold after what sort Moyses speaketh in treating of Gods dreadfull vengeance vpon such as shall continue wilfully in disobeying of Gods lawe. Thy life (saith he) shall hang before thee as vpon a thred. In the morning thou shalt say, who shall make me to liue til the euening? But Iob speaketh here of the temptation that hee himselfe feeleth that is to wit, that he thought the nights too long, and the dayes too weeresome, according as hee said. One day is longer to me than a whole yeare, yea thā a mans whole life, I do nothing but pine away, not onely in some ordinarie miseries, but also in so horrible torments, that I faint vnder Gods hand. Now when we see that this temptatio is come vpon Iob: let vs haue recourse to the remedie which I haue touched: that is to witte, to call to mind that it is Gods peculiar charge to dispose of vs and of all our miseries. And therefore, doth the time seeme long to vs? Let vs praye God to make vs thinke well of all that he doth. For otherwise what else shall wee do but only prouoke God as Iob doth? Not that hee is willing to do so: but yet in the meane season he ceaseth not to be blameworthy for the words that haue escaped him so vnadvisedly, which he hath cast foorth agaynst God in such wise as if he ment to spite him. Thereforo let vs turne backe ageine and say, how now? Is it in thee to appoinete times? Is not that in the hande of thy God? wilt thou take his office from him? what intendest thou to do wretched creature? VVhicher goest thou whē thou takest vpon thee after that sort? Is it not euuen to breake thy necke, when thou wilst stie thus aboue the skies without wings? So then let vs learne to walke in humblenesse and pray God that we may take all for good which hee disposteth of vs, and that we may yeld therunto, and say, Lord thou arte righteouse and wise in all thy doings. And therefore graunt vs the grace not to cease to prayle thee, and to give thee this glory, namely to take in good worth whatsoeuer thou sendest, and to frame our selues to the same, notwithstanding that to the flesh it be hard and bitter to indure. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this text. Furthermore when he saith, That bis dayes are passed more swiftly than a weauers shettle: heere seemeth to bee some contrarietie. For he sayth that his life is ouerlong: and yet neuerthelesse he addeth, that his dayes slippe away as swiftly as anie thing. If anie man say that Iob was caried awaie with his ouerheadie passions: verie well, that is somewhat. But there is no contrarietie if we marke well how that according to the similitude whiche is put heere,

heere, the same is also well placed in the song of king Ezechias in Esay: and it serueth to shewe that when a man is pressed with the hande of God, hee woteth no more where he is. For although we endure many aduersities, yet notwithstanding we count still vpon our life. But if God pursue vs ouerhastily, then we become as it were dulheaded, we bee not after the manner that wee were wont to liue, we be vtterly dismayd saying: How now? could this time be passed so soone? Ye see then what this similitude importeth and what Job ment as now by saying, that his life passed swiftly away like a weauers shetle. And why so? For he felte Gods hand presse him so sore, as hee could not but sigh and lament and saye: VVhat? will there be no end? Ye see then how Job ment: and yet in the meane season hee ceaseth not too bee attached with such feare and anguish, that he was as it were plunged ouer heade and eares, bycause God hilde him as it were vpon the rack, and seemed too keepe no measure in chastizing him. Lo how we ought to applie this similitude. And heereby we bee warned to pray vnto God in our afflictions, that howsoeuer he keepe vs in them, we may haue soine rest to thinke vpon our selues and vpon him; I say, to thinke vpon our selues, to the intente wee may know our sinnes, and consider how much tyme we haue lost in our life, to the end that we may not thinke it straunge thought God scourge vs and vex vs. For wee passe the mooste parte of oure life in pampering of our selues, yea even to auaunce our selues against God. And therefore we haue great neede to pray him to waken vs, and to giue vs respite to examine well our faults. And moreouer lette vs also thinke vppon him. But that cannot bee done, but wee must haue some rest and bee somewhat cheered. For so long as wee bee in such hartburning as to chawe vpon our bridle: it is vnpossible for vs to come vnto God to comfort our selues in his goodnesse, which he is ready to make vs to feele. Therefore we must pray him to hold vs in awe, if we wil haue our minds to abide quiet and peaseable in the middes of the troubles that may befall vs. And this also cannot be done except Iesu Christ be at hand with vs, that we may haue some solace in him, according as he himselfe sayth, come vnto me all ye that laboure and are ouerladen, and I will refresh you, and you shall finde rest for your soriles. As oft then as God scourgeth vs, let vs determine to pray vnto him, that we may turne our heart and mind to our Lorde Iesu Christe, so as we maye in him haue the rest whereof hee speakest: and that when we haue founde the same, we may be hild in such wise by it, as we maye recceiu God's chaitizements and corrections, to humble vs before him, that we may leane vnto his good will, so as we may not doubt but that in the end he wil be helpfull to vs, and shew himselfe fauourable towards vs: Behold I say after what sorte it behoueth vs to be comforted in the middes of the miseries and afflictions whiche wee haue to endure in this worlde, wayting to enioy the blisst comforthe whiche God offereth vs nowe by his worde, and which we shall one day enioy in full perfection when he shall haue taken vs hence to himselfe.

And nowe let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God with acknowledgment of our sinnes, praying him to make vs feele them better than wee haue earst done: yea even in suche sorte as we may be ashamed of them presently, and come vnto him touched with suche a zeale, as feeing him to be our father and sauour, wee maye yelde oure selues wholy to his goodnesse, and hee strengthen vs more and more in the trust that we haue in him, vntill such time as he haue deliuered vs, not only from the miseries of the world, but also from the flauerie of sinne, and called vs into his heauenly glorie, which we possesse not now but in hope. That it may please him to graunte this grace not only to vs, but also to all people and nacions of, &c,

The. xxvij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the seventh Chapter.

7. Remember that my life is but vwind, and that mine eye shall see no more good.
8. The eye of the seet shall see me no more, thine eyes are vpon me, and I shall be no longer.
9. Like as a cloude pasleth and vanisheth avvay: So also he that goth dovvne into the graue shall not come vp agaync.
10. He shall no more returnde to his house, his place shall knowe him no more.
11. Therefore I vvill not spare my mouth, that I should not speake of mine anguish, and talke of my miserie.
12. Am I a Sea, or am I a vvhalefish that thou keepest meso in vyard?
13. VVhen I saye, my bed shall easfe me, and my couch shall comfort me: vwhen I speake in my selfe;
14. Then thou frayest me vwith dreames and visions.
15. Beholde my soule hath chosen the halter and death, rather than my bones.

14. 15.*
He holy scripture telleteth vs often times that god pitith vs in respect of oure frailtie: for wee must not thinke that he is moued with any worthinesse that is in vs: theré is no such thing. Then if God spare vs 60 and vse mercie towardes vs, it is more in respecte of the needinesse that hee knoweth too be in vs, than otherwise: according also as it is said, he considereth that men are but as grassle whiche fadeth out of hand and withereth away. Men are but flesh, (that is too say, corruption) and breth, that is to say a wind that passeth away and vanisheth without retournynge any more. Now seeing that the holy scripture witnesseth this vnto vs: we also ought to set it before vs in our prayers, for to that intent doth the holy Ghost speake it. Then let vs beare in mind, that if we will moue god to pitie, we must not alledge that we haue deserued aught at his hande, or that there is any excellencie in our persons or in our nature. All this gerte must be laid vnder foote, and there is none other way for vs to deale, but to acknowledge, Alas Lord, what am I but rotteness? I fleete awaye incontinently, there is no strength in me, my life is but a shadewe. VVhen we speake after this manner: it is a folowing of the warning that the holye Ghost giueth vs: But we must adise oure selues well, after what sorte and too what purpose we vse suche manner of speech: that is too witte, that all shoulde redownde too Godes

Gods glory, and to worship him by humbling our selues vnto him. For there are that can skill to say, Alas, I am but a worme, there is nothing in me but vanitie, my life is but a smoke that vanisheth away: and yet in the meane while they haue nother humilitie nor obedience, to abace the selues before God, and to acknowledge how it is he too whome they are beholding for all things: but cleane contrariwise, the same shall tend rather to make such complaint as this: How now? Seing that God hath authoritie ouer all his creatures, were it not meete that he shoulde iō give vs that which he taketh from vs: were it not meete that we should haue this or that? Then let vs marke, that when the scripture telleth vs that God pitith vs in consideration that we be so fraile, and that our life is lesse than nothing: it is not done to give vs occasion to murmur and fret in our selues bycause our state is so despizable, and nothing is in vs whereof we may vaunt oure selues, but rather all confusion: but it is done to the ende we should knowe howe we bring not any thing to God why he should shew vs fauoure, and that in the meane season if he seeke for any thing (I wote not what) that might prouoke him to loue vs: he shall not find aught at all, and so he shall shake vs off. VVhat must we do then? Forasmuch as God seeth that we bee more than wretched, he must haue pitie vpon our state, considering that there is nothing in our life but a shadow that slideth away, nothing in all our wisedome but only mere follie, and nothing in all our vertues, but only leasing and wickednesse. Seing then that we knowe that God bereueuth vs of all our glory: let vs be sure he will not haue vs presume to challenge any thing to our selues, that we shuld bring any worthinesse into his presence to say, yea Lord, why shouldest not thou shewe me fauoure? For I haue done this and that, and there is such a thing in me. But let vs haue our mouthes shut as in respect of al our worthinesse, and assure our selues that we must drawe licour from out of the only free mercy of God. Thus ye see with what an intent we must cal our miseries to remembrance: that is to witte, not to complaine, or murmur against God: but to humble our selues, and to abace our selues vtterlie, that God alone may be honored, and that it may be knowne that when he doth vs good, it is not for that we bring him on to do it, nor for that he findeth aught in vs wherefore he shoulde be bound to it: but it is bycause he hath compassion of vs for that he seeth vs to be so fraile, and that all our life is but a thing of nothing. But nowe let vs come to that whiche is conteined here. Remember that my life is nothing. This request is good, when Job saith vnto God, Lord, I am tormented here, O that it might please thee to giue me comfort. And why? for thou knowest what I am, and of what nature I am. VVhen Job protesteth this, it is a good and holy request: yea verely so the affection be right. Certaine it is that he had a right intent: but yet therewithall it could not bee said but that he overshot himselfe in going too farre, as we shall see better by the sequelle. And therefore let vs marke, that in alledging our frailtie before God, it is not ynoch to humble our selues, and to confesse that wee haue nothi<sup>n</sup>g wherein we may auaunce our selues: but we must haue the modestie to confesse that God is righteous, in making vs to be in such state, yea though wee perceiue not the cause of it: and that although he haue hid these secrets from vs, yet must not we pleade agaynst him, nor haue any hartburning in vs, as if we were ouersore pressed: but must bridle our selues with this, that God hathe had iust cause to set vs in suche state, as wee might be hedged in with all manner of miseries and afflictions. VVhy so? To the ende to hold vs in awe and subiection vnto hym, and that wee mighte not haue the sayde presumption and puffednesse of pride. And here vnto Job addeth, That bis lyfe is nothing, and that be shall not retourne agayne to see good, that is to say, to take pleasure of the things that God giueth men in this presente life. The eye (saith he) of the seer shall see me no more: that is to say, I shall be no longer heere. And in the end he likeneth man to a cloude. Ye see how a cloude vanisheth away, and a man cannot tell where it becommeth, and it returneth no more into his former state: And euen so bee that goeth downe into the graue shall come no more vp agayne. Job speaketh heere of the frailtie of mans life. And it is to the end that God shoulde not handle him with such rigoure, according as he will say anon in another streyne, what am I that thou shouldest stretch out thine arme against me? as if he should say, Lord wylt thou fight against a shadowe?

Job.7.12.20.

But a manne maye thynke it straunge, that Job speaking of death, leaueth no more hope nother for him selfe nor for all mankind, as who should say that in dying we do perishe, and are vtterlie dispatched for a doo, and shall never be restored agayne. For he saith that the man which is once layde in his graue, abideth there and never retourneth any more. It seemeth heere that Job speaketh like an vnbeleeuer, that hathe nother knowne nor tasted aught at all of the true religion. But we must consider that in this place hee speaketh of the deathe of me as it is in it selfe, like as the holy scripture also vseth the same maner of inditing very oftentimes elsewhere. And we must not thinke it straunge, that Job hath spoken according to the same maner that we be taught by the holy Ghost. The things that wee haue in these dayes were not yet written in the time of Job: but yet had God ingraven all those things in the harts of his faithfull ones, which are now written. Yea and God euen yet still at this day maketh vs to feele the same in our harts, and engraueth the same still with his finger, that is to say with the holy Ghost. So let vs come backe agayne to the article that I haue touched, which is, that the scripture speaketh of the battells which we haue in oure owne nature, without taking hold of Gods goodnes which is from aboue. As how? VVe haue alredy alledged some records where it is said, That a man is but a breath, or a winde that passeth away and returneth no more. It shoulde seeme that man is likened to the brute beasts. Yea and he shoulde bee like them in verie deede, if God did not put to his hand: For whence commeth the immortallitie of our soules, but of a speciall fauour that God beareth vs? Saint Paule sayeth that only God is immortall. VVe then are transitory, we do nothing else but fade away, and what are oure soules? Euen the very Angels of heauen should also bee mortall: howbeit forasmuch as God hath breathed hys owne power into them, they must needes continue in him. It is he from whence proceedeth the immortallitie (I say euen) of the Angells: and it behoueth vs also on our parte to drawe out of the same well, according as it is sayde in the Psalme, Lord in thee is the fountayne of life, and in thy light shall wee be enlightened.

1.Timo.6.6.

VVe see now howe men beeing considered in them-selues, haue nothing in them but deadlinesse, according as it is saide in another sentence of the hundred and fourth Psalme. Lorde, draw thou awaye thy spirite, and ali things shall decay, and come too nothing. Nowe when the holy Scripture speaketh after thys manner, it is not too take from vs the hope of the Resurrection: nother is it to make vs thynke that wee bee not immortall: but wee muste always beginne at this poynete, namelye too knowe what oure owne weakenesse is, and

and afterwarde mount vp by degrees to know what God hath put into vs. What are men then? A wind : a smoke. Howebeit forasmuch as God hath breathed a continuing power intoo vs: therefore wee bee immortall. Furthermore it behoueth God to stablishe that thing which he hath once put into vs: for if hee mainteyned it not by his grace, all would go too decay. And specially we must come to the Highest poynt, that is to witte, too the Resurrection which is promised vs. And where shall we finde that? Not in our owne nature. But wee muste stie vp aboue the worlde, and wee must vnderstande that there is none but onely Iesus Christ, whiche is the true mirror wherein to see that thing. There wee see that God will rayse vs vp agayne to glorie, thathee will plucke vs out of the corruption and rottennesse wherein we nowe walke, and wherein wee shoulde abide [for euer,] were it not for this extraordinarie remedie whereby hee helpeth the matter. Ye see then howe wee must bee fayne too come too Iesus Christ, to knowe whereat it behoueth vs to looke, when we hope to be raysed vp agayne at the last day. Verely Sainct Paule vseth certaine similitudes which hee taketh of the common order of nature, too shewe the resurrection: as when he sayth, ye see how the graines of corne and other seedes are cast into the ground, and there rotting do grow vp againe. Nowe (sayth hee) in that men sowe the bare corne, and afterward the same growtheth vp againe out of the rottennesse whereintoo it behoued it to bee first turned: ye haue a figure and image of the Resurrection. But yet is not this as much too say, as that we see our Resurrection there: It serueth onely to shewe, that the faythlesse are vnthankfull and ouerlewd to Godwarde when they dispute how it is possible that our bodies should rise againe after they be so rotted and turned into dust. If such as will be so wise in their owne conceypte, doo shoothe out their subtle deuises, and therewpon conclude that it is vnpossible for God to raise vs vpagaine: Sainct Paule sheweth that such folke are malicious, and that it is nothing else but their owne unthankfulness that turneth them away from the receyving of this power of God, whereby hee promiseth too set vs in perfite state agayne. And why so? For hee giueth vs certaine familiar likelyhodes in the order of nature, too assure vs of his good purpose. So then, when S. Paule vseth the forsayd maner of reasoning: it is not ment that our resurrection shall bee as a natuall thing: but it is too make vs vnderstande the infinite power of God, and too honour him, and to yelde him the praise that belongeth vntoo him: and therewithall too leoke vpon the promise which hee hath made vs: whiche is, that although it farre surmount all oure understanding, and bee a verie straunge thing, that GOD shoulde make vs newe agayne when wee bee turned intoo dust: yet notwithstanding hee will restore vs, euen when wee shall haue beene turned too nothing. Although (I say) that this be hard to be beleueed, yet must wee trust that God is neuerthelesse able to doo it, by his power, wherethrough hee is able too doo all things, according as it is sayde in another place too the Philippians. Nowe therefore let mennes wittes discourse what they can, let them raunge euen too the diuels in hell: and yet it is certayne that they shall not bee able too diminishe Gods power. Neuerthelesse when they encounter the sayde promise that is made vs of the Resurrection, which is the thing that surmounteth all our capacite, they go about too diminishe, yea and (as muche as in them lyeth) vtterly too abolishe Gods wonderfull power, whereby he is able to do all things. Nowe let vs come againe to that which is sayde heere: Alas Lorde,

I shall see no more good, The eye of the Seer shall see me no more, I shall no more returnde oute of my graue. VVhy speakest Job thus? Is he as a man in dispayre that casteth away all the taste which he had earst felt of Gods goodness touching the resurrection? No: but he setteth out man alone by himselfe from the graces wherof God hath made him partaker by his owne meere goodnessse. And euen so ought we to do likewise. Yea and it is a speciall poynt well woorthis too bee marked: for most men abuse themselues, and haue not the discretion too say: Beholde, our God hath done vs exceeding much good, but wee must consider that we bee beholding too him for all that euer we haue. And it is a right necessarie lesson for vs now a dayes. For how shal men be able to humble themselues, except they set before them, on the one side Gods gracious goodnessse, to say: This is not mine owne, I haue not this of my selfe, my possessing of it is but because he lendeth it me, therefore I must do him homage for it, and therewithall consider howe fauourable my God is too mee, and howe bountifull hee sheweth himselfe towarde me? Thus ye see that the meening of Iobs wordes, is to expresse what man is, if God leaue him vp to himselfe. And therefore he concludeth, I shall see no more good. The eye of the Seer shall see me no more: I must be fayne to continue in my graue. But now let vs learne to consider of our life howe flightfull and frayle it is, and likewyse too examin all the infirmities that are in oure mindes, so as we may conclude that we be worse than nothing, except god vphold vs by his goodnessse. Neuerthelesse it must not hinder vs from the magnifying of Gods gracious goodnessse, although wee knowe our state too bee vile and abiect. Howebeit wee must beginne at the poynt which I haue spoken of alreadie. Furthermore (as I haue touched) wee must alwayes bear in minde, that although Job were not so alienated from God, as too bee out of all hope, comfort and pacience: yet notwithstanding hee ceassed not too exceed measure. And hereby we bee warned too looke well to our selues, that we be not so swallowed vp of sorrow, as too bee cast into dispayre, by considering too much our owne frayltie. And it is a verie profitable lesson: for there is nothing that we ought to desyre so much as too humble our selues. And why so? For it is the onely wicket that wee haue too receyue all Gods graces in at. So long as men are forepossessed with pride, so as they weene themselues worth any thing, yee shall see them so locked vp as the grace of God can neuer enter intoo them. Then muste humilitie go before: and the cheepe of our studyes ought too bee too bethinke oure selues well what wee bee, too the ende wee maye haue no truste nor selfelyking in our selues. For beholde the craftynesse of Satan: the thing that is most profitable and auaylable for mennes saluation, hee taketh and maketh it a rancke poyson agaynst them. For hee findeth a way too make men as it were brutish, by knowledge of their miseries, insomuch as they become so woode that they cast themselues intoo dispayre. True it is that the Divell (if hee could) woulde continually sotte vs wyth the follie of Ouerweening, hee woulde make vs too beleuee woonders [of our selues:] hee will neuer suffer men too humble and abase themselues: he will hinder them from that as much as hee can. But when hee seeth that hee cannot hinder men from being abashed in themselues by knowing their owne state: then he goeth to the other shift. And here I see yee are ouermaystred: for hee will set his feete vpon mens bellies, (as they say) yea and vpon their throtes, and holde them still at that poynt, euen till hee haue forced them to dispayre. For this cause when wee enter intoo

the consideration of our owne wants, let vs bee well aduis'd, that after we haue bethought vs of them, wee bee not vtterly ouerwhelmed so as wee shoulde not in the meane while alwayes acknowledge the good things that God hath done for vs and put into vs, and which he bestoweth vpon vs continually, togither wi h the remedies which hee hath giuen vs to releeue those wants wherein we shoulde haue rotted, had not Gods extraordinarie goodnessse beene. Then let vs learne to know this, to the ende we may take our breath. Thus ye see what we haue 10 to marke in this streyne.

And it insueth, Seeing it is so (sayth Job) I will not spare my mouth, I must needs speake, I must needs make my mone, I must needs talke of my sorrowe and anguylce. Heerein we see that which I haue touched alreadie: that although Iobs consideration was good, and although the thing that hee alledgeth here be both holy and agreeable to the doctrine of the holy ghost: yethe ceaseth not to haue some temptation of excesse. For he sayth, Beholde I must needs speake, seeing I haue not past a moment to liue: for I am 20 overpressed with the hand of God: and therfore I must reuenge my selfe by speaking in my sorrowes, for I cannot holde my selfe. True it is that God giueth vs leaue to speake in making our moane. Howbeit, not in such wise as there should be any choler in it, or that it shoulde be to encrease our sorrowes, wheras we thinke to ease the by that meanes. VVhat then? It is permitted, to the intent we should returne vnto him, to vnburthen our selues by it. Sometime they that speake not at all cease not to displease God more greeuously through their impaciencie, 30 than they that blasphemē with full mouth. Doubtlesse it is a verye heytous crime when men dare open theyr mouthes to blasphemē God. But yet there are many also that will not vtter one worde, and yet are they full of rancor agaynst God, yea they bee much fuller of pride and bitterness than those that speake. Ye shall see some man that will chafe vpon the bridle like a Mule, and yet not speake one word. But if ye examin his hart, ye shall finde him redie to burst for spite, &c that there is as it were a firy rage in him: and if it were possible that hee might fight with God, he would do it. Another vnlodeth himself at the first dash, and many wicked woordes slip from him: but yet he hath not so much bitterness in his hart. But howsoeuer the world go, both of the be naught. VVhat is too bee done then? If our sorrowes oppresse vs too sore, let vs settle ourselues to pray vnto God, that it may please him too ayde vs in the middes of them, so as wee may not conceyue any moodiness against him, at leastwise which shoulde hinder the honouring of him. And heerewithall wee muste also labour and fight: for whereas as men are woont to harden themselves when they haue once conceiued any wilfulness & stomaking, and too nourishe themselves therein: it behoueth vs to knowe that we must withstand it. Then let vs restrayne our affections, and let them bee tied vp like wilde beasts. And when we haue so done our indeuer to represso our passions and to holde them in awe: then let vs assure our selues that wee can also discerne and say: Howe nowe! Shall a mortall man haue leaue to give himselfe the bri-dle, so as hee shall stand in contention with God, as if he woulde picke a quarrell too him? Then let vs keepe vs from such lycentiousnesse of murmuring agaynst God, as too haue our tongue vnbridled too say, how now? Is this of Gods dooing? VVherefore handleth hee mee after this maner? No: [let vs not doo so.] But let vs make our moane in suche sort as God may alwayes bee honoured at oure handes, and let vs confess that hee is righteous and vnpartiall howsoeuer hee deale with vs. Marke heere a speciall poynt. And moreouer therewithall let all our complayntes bee made vntoo him. For yee see wherin men ouershoote themselves ostentymes: that is, in shrinking awaie from God as much as they can when they woulde make their complaynts, or else in discoursing with theyr neighbours. And howe? I haue a misfortune (say they) and there is no man that indureth so muche as I: it shoulde seeme that God mindeth to torment me without ende or ceasing. Lo howe men doo alwayes grunt. And althoughe they vtter not suche murmurings with their mouth: yet is it sure that they keepe euer soinc store of such stuppe behind in their harts, and lay it not opē before God as hee requireth. Ye see then what we haue to consider when Job sayth, that hee will speake in his bitterness, and that hee will talke of it: that is to witte, that this is not the measure which hee ought too keepe, and that he taketh too much libertie. Now if this happened too the man that was as a mirroure of pacience: what shall betyde vs? Sothen let vs beare in minde the warnings that I haue giuen alreadie: that is too wit, that when wee haue any bitterness in oure hertes, wee come vntoo God too pray him too asswage the disease: and that when wee come too speaking, wee vse not our toungs too babbling, but that they maye bee refrayned to glorifie God withall, and that wee make all oure complayntes vntoo him, and go not murmuring heere and there with wayling and babbling: but that God may bee the witnesse of all oure sighes and grones, and wee resort right forth vntoo him for comfort. And after Job hath sayde so, hee addeth: Am I a Sea, or am I a VVhale, that thou shouldest sette (as it were) suche barres agaynst mee, and that I shoulde bee fayne too haue so greate lettes too stoppe mee? Job protesteth heere before God, that there was no neede why hee shoulde be stopped with so great violence. And why so? I am not like a Sea (sayth hee) whiche hath neede of Rampyres and letties. If a Sea haue broken ouer his bankes, a thousande or twoo thousand men muste bee sent agaynst it: there must bee bringing of timber, of earth, and of stones too make vp so great a breach. Also a VVhale will not suffer himselfe to bee caught without great ado: but great force muste bee vset too holde so strong and mightie a beast. But Job sayeth, I am no Sea, nor VVhale: Howe is it then that God proceedeth with so great violence agaynst mee? Heereby hee meeneth that the miserie which hee indureth is ouergreate, and that God hath no neede too punishe him so. And heerein hee sheweth that hee had not suche stay of himselfe as hee ought too haue had. True it is (as I haue sayde afore) that hee ceassed not too bee pacient: howbeit his pacience was not continually perfect: but it had alwayes some storminesse mingled with it. And so what haue we too gather vpon this sentence, but that by bewayling oure selues, wee shoulde knowe so muche the better what wee bee? True it is that forasmuche as wee bee frayle, wee may well say, I am no VVhale, no Lyon, no Beare, nor other wilde beast. VVell: But herewithall, if wee looke vpon oure lustes, if wee looke vpon the rebelliousnesse that is in vs agaynst God, if wee looke upon the number of vyses whiche wee haue whole: they bee lyke feendes of hell, not onely in bursting out of theyr boundes vntoo all euill vpon earth, but also in mounting well nere into heauen. VVhen we resist God through our lusts, I pray you do we not mount vp aloft as it were to make warre with God? And so there is neither VVhale, nor Lyon, nor any other wilde beast vpon earth, that of his owne nature hath so great a violence, as haue the the wicked affections of a man. Therefore if God vse violent remedies agaynst vs, and that he hamper vs more roughly than we would he shoulde, let vs not say as Job sayeth, Am I a VVhale, or am I the Sea? wee be muche worse: God must be fayne to hold vs chayned by force, as if we were Lunatike, or more than Lunatike. Nowe when we shal haue knowne that there is such gainestriuing in our wicked passions, then wee will confesse that if God afflict vs and vse euuen violent remedies agaynst vs: the same is not without cause: and therefore wee cannot accuse him that he is excessive, but we must gloriifie him, considering howe the case standeth. Nowe wee see that men ought too haue a double knowledge of themselues. For on the one side it behoueth them too knowe howe there is nothing but rottennesse and corruption in them, too the intent they may obteyne fauour of God, and moue him too vse mercie and pitie towardes vs. And when we knowe this: let vs also consider that wee bee but too strong vntoo euill: in case as when a madde man flingeth and tormenteth him selfe, and yet for all that hath never awritte of iight strength. Euen so standes the case with vs. As in respect of good, wee are vtterly weake: but as touching euill, wee bee like Gyants, there is too huge a force in vs. Then is it requisite that God shoulde stretche oute his arme, and smyte vs with greate strokes, yea and thunder more vpon vs than vpon the wylde beastes. For althoughe the wylde beastes holde all of crueltie, and suffer not themselues too bee easily maystred: yet notwithstanding if wee compare them with our selues: wee shall finde that men starte muche further ouute of their boundes. And therefore whensoeuer God shall presse vs neuer so sore, let vs bee sure hee hath good cause to doo it, and let vs not repyne at it. For when we haue pleaded our best, wee shall gayne nothing by it, there needeth but one woerde too put vs too confusion. Thus much concerning this streyne. And hee addeth, If I say, my bed shall comfort mee, beholde my cowche burneth mee as I take too my selfe. Thou frayest mee with visions of the night, and thou afrightest mee with dreames. True it is that this present saying is expounded diuersly, where it is sayde, that when Job purposed too haue refreshment in hys bedde, hee founde a burning heate in his Couch. The Hebrew worde that is put here, betokeneth sometymes to burne, according as wee shall see it againe in another sentence: But moreouer it signifieth to withdrawe, or drake backe, and by a similitude it signifyeth to leaue or forsake. Neuerthelesse the signification of burning agreeth verie well heere: and howsoever a man expounde the woerde, the sentence and the doctrine remayne all one still: that is too wit, that Job complaiynth of beeing disappointed of his hope, in that hee looked too haue had some refreshment by hys bed, and yet founde more heate there, insomuch that it was as burning fire too him when hee talked too himselfe. Heere we see that which hath beene shewed alreadie heeretofore: namely, that Job was in horrible torments, and that hee was not pressed onely with bodily paine: but also that hee was in battels of the mynde, feeling God agaynst him as his iudge, and being payned in such sort as if he had beene in a burning laake as it were in the paynes of hell. And wee muste always call the same too mynde: for (as I sayde) it is good for vs also to thinke oftentimes vpon it. True it is that wee ought too put oure selues in good readinesse too battell, sith that God afflicteth vs, and that wee shall not feele any thing saue that wee indure too the worldewarde: but the cl. e. e. f. is s. t. h. we knowe wee must come to a reck-

ning before God. For if hee make vs feele our sinnes, by shewing himselfe a rigorous iudge: beholde, that is as it were the depth of hell, and the gulfs that are open too swallowe vs vp. VVee must haue bethought vs of these things before hande, that wee may knowe howe too humble oure selues, and that this conceytc also doo not vtterly confounde vs. And heere yee see why Job (who was a man of such vertue and exceller tie) was notwithstanding so pressed. And wherefore? For by his example God ment too shewe howe it is no small matter too come before his Maiestie and before his iudgement seate too answe for our whole lyfe. Then let vs applie our selues to receyue the warnings which God giueth vs of our sinnes, notwithstanding that wee haue verie roughe assauutes. And let vs beseech God to holde vs vp, that putting our trust in the grace that is offered vs in our Lorde Iefus Christ, wee may not ceasse to continue and holde out to the ende, yea euuen till hee haue humbled vs as hee knoweth too be needfull for vs. And specially let vs mark well this circumstance: VVhen I haue thought that my bed should giue me rest, I founde a burning fire in talking to my self. True it is that we may well hope that God will releue vs: but it is not for vs to appoint him either time or place: that must bee put ouer wholly to his good will. Then must we not seke our rest, neither in our bed nor in any other thing: but let vs cast vp our sighes vnto God, that it may pleaue him to refresh vs of our sorowes. But by the way (as I sayd) it is a straige case that Job shoulde feele himselfe so burned by talking to himselfe. I haue tolde you how this circumstance is well woorthie to be marked. For whereas men doo commonly babble so much in making their moane: their talking of this and that dooth but set them more on fire. VVhat is the cause that wee overshoote our selues after such sort in our passions? It is because euerie of vs flingeth out at randon and deceyueth himselfe: But Job sayeth heere, howe it was contrariwise with him: that is to say, that he spake in himselfe. Howe then? VVhen a man shrinketh intoo himselfe, and striueth too keepe himselfe from passing his boundes in woordes for feare of resisting God, and represseth his affections: is that an occasion too set him on fyre? Yea surely sometymes: according as it is sayde in the twoo and thirtie Psalme, and in suche other texts. But yet notwithstanding it is not as muche too say on the contrarie part, that wee shoulde therefore bee lauishe of oure woordes and complayntes too euerie bodye too fynde ease of oure greefe, and too quenche the fyre whereof mention is made heere: but rather let vs enter into our selues. True it is that sometymes oure passions kindle by talking so too our selues: but yet notwithstanding God wil loone after doo his office in quenching the fire that shall be kindled by him. As for example: looke vpon a poore man whome God scourgeth. And why? the man oftentimes knoweth not why, and yet notwithstanding in the ende God will turne it too good. But if the poore man continue still in his anguishe, what shall hee doo? Let him enter into himselfe. How? [Let him say,] hath thy God forsaken thee? Or else [let him say] looke well vpon thy selfe, poore creature, needs must thou haue offended God greeuously, seeing he executeth such rigour vpon thee. But in the ende the holy Ghost will still make him too take l olde, to taste, and to applie too his owne vse, that the holye Scripture in speaking of the roughest assaualte, doth i euerthelesse set forth to vs the infinite goodnessse of our God, to the intent that in the mids of our greatest afflictions we should bee assured that God will deliuere vs out of all our aduersities.

uerities in tyme conuenient. Ye see then how Job hath beeene exercized. But yet neuerthelesse he presently protesteth, that he felte himselfe in the greater heate when he had mourned and muzed in himselfe. And he ought too acknowledge, Very well my God, I haue not yet ynough: true it is that my miserie is verie great in respect of my ablenesse to beare it: but it must yet increase more. Lo what Job ought too haue considered, and it had beeene a poynt of true wisedome. But seeing that hee did it not euen he which was of such a courage as a man may see: so much the more behoueth it vs too stande vpon oure garde, and too aduise our selues well that we pleade not, agaynst God when hee afflieth vs, for feare least hee put vs to such reproch as we shall not know where to become. And hee sayeth, that it is God that troubleth him in visions by night, according as wee haue seene alreadie heeretofore, that hee had not too doo with men too feele paine in his bodie onely: but that aboue all he was faine to abide temptations as if God were agaynst him. Herevpon he concludeth, that his soule had chosen the halter: that is to say, that hee wished the miserablest death that could bee, and that he had leuer to be hanged than to be in such case. And howe so? Those are the wordes of a man in dispayre. But let vs marke that Job in speaking so, sayeth not that hee had hilde himselfe there nor that hee had that purpose settled in himselfe: but he protesteth onely that in making comparison of hys life, with the worst death that coulde happen vnto him, he was so dismayde with it for a tyme, as hee looked no further afore him, than too the feeling of the sorrowe that pinched him. Heerevpon then let vs consider, that if God haue not spared his seruant Job, it may fall ouute that wee shall bee tormented as hee was. True it is that God knowing what wee bee able too beare, will not suffer the temptations too bee so great, as they haue beeene in man, who had receyued more strength of the holy Ghost than wee: but yet must euery of vs bee visited by the hande of God in such sort, that sometime oure lyfe shall bee more miserable than the death of hym that is hanged. I saye wee must bee fayne too come thererunto, and therefore it standeth vs in hande to bee throughly in a readinesse. But let vs learne too fence oure selues with that whiche is shewed vs in the holy scripture: namely, that wee shall haue matter of gladnesse ynough, when wee shall haue increased and profited in Iesus Christ as well too death as to life. Are wee then ioyned to Iesus Christ? Although our lyfe be more than miserable: yet shall it turne to our profite, so as if wee haue troubles in this world, the same shall be as many helpes to our saluation. Therefore whensoeuer it shall seeme that we be vtterly forlorne, let vs not therfore ceasse to call vpon our God, hoping not only that he will in the ende turne all our troubles into ioy and glory: but also that he will continue his goodnesse towrdes vs vntill he make vs feele it in all perfe~~E~~nesse.

But let vs cast oure selues downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to humble vs in such wise, that being ashamed in our selues, we may be sory and giue him the glory that is due vnto him: and yet notwithstanding, that in the meane while we may not cease to returne towards him seeing he allureth vs so familiarly, being sure that he will receyue vs at al times: & that we may know which is the way whereby he will lead vs thither, that is to say, our Lorde Iesus Christ, so that after we haue once knowne howe there is nothing in vs but a bottomelesse gulf of all confusion, we may neuerthelesse continue in stedfast trust that we shall be acceptable to this our good God, seeing we be clothed with the righteousnesse of his only son, & that our sinnes be blotted out by the merit of his death and passion, and by the purenesse of the obedience which he hath yeelded vnto him. That it may please him to graunt this grace, &c.

The xxix. Sermon, which is the third vpon the seauenth Chapter.

This Sermon conteyneth the rest of the Exposition of the xv. verse, and then as followeth.

16. I am vvery, I shall not liue alvvays: take thy selfe avvay frō me, for my dayes are nothing.
17. VVhat is man that thou so magnifiest him, and that thou hast care of him?
18. Thou visitest him in the morning, thou hast an eye vpon him euery minute.
19. Hovve long vvill it be ere thou let me alone? Thou vvilt giue me tymeto svvallovve my spittle.
20. I haue sinned: vvhat shall I doe to thee, O thou keeper of men? vvhy hast thou set me ouer against thee, to be a burthen to my selfe?
21. VVhy dolte thou not take avvay my sin, and vvhy doste thou not pardon mine iniquities? for I shall be layde in thedust, and if thou seekeme in the morning, I shall be no more.

Eere Job goeth forwarde still with the matter I touched yesterday, that is to say, with his lothing of his life: not that he sayeth hee resteth resolutely vpon that poynt, as though he tasted not Gods goodnessse a whit to comfort himselfe withall, but he considereth what this lyfe is so long as God holdeith him in such rigour. And therevpon he concludeth that it were much better if God would kill him, yea after what sorte so ever it were, for I haue sayde alreadie that when men looke no further than too their present state, they may bee tempted to such a misliking of it, as they shall be vtterly dismayde by reason of their exceeding miserie: and specially it seemeth that God is mynded too execute a singuler rigour towrdes his fathfull, and that he handleth them in such wise as they be more afflicted than the wicked. Then may wee bee caryed away with a hopelesnesse so as wee shall bee wearie of oure lyfe, and had leuer too bee deade. There is nothing that comforteth vs, but oure knowing that euen in the middes of our sorrowes wee bee still beloued of God, and that in the ende hee will haue pitie of vs, and giue vs saluation and life by meanes of our Lorde Iesus Christ. VVithout this, it is certaine that oure life wyll bee weirisome and bring nothing but lothisomnesse, yea euen to repynng agaynst God. Let vs marke then that Job ment not heere to expresse what affection he had: but onely that God had hylde him vp. And that is the cause why hee now addeth. That bee is weery, that bee shall not live euer, and that his dayes are but vanitie, and therfore he woulde haue God to go awaie from him, as if he

he shoulde say, Alas Lorde, wherefore persecutest thou mee? Thou seest heere a poore soule that can indure no more, except thou haue consideration of him: and as for his lyfe it is nothing, it is but vanitie. VVherefore then doost thou not gette thee awaie from mee? This is according too that whiche wee haue seene alreadie: that is too witte, that God ought not too vtter his full force agaynst mortall and transitorie men, because they bee not rockes, nor yet so boystous beasts that he shoulde bee fayne too inforce hymselfe so much agaynst them. 10 Job therefore confirmeth still the same matter, as a man that is in anguishe and cannot make an ende of his groanings. And hauing sayde so, hee addeth: VVbat is man that thou so magnifyest him? VVbat is hee that thou visitest him a Mornings, that thou settest thy bart vpon him, and bast so great care of him? Some expounde this sentence, VVbat is man that thou makist so mache of hym, as though he Job ment heere as it were too rayle at God, that hee lifteth vs vp as if wee were littie kinges, and that hee seemeth too haue a fatherly care of vs, and to preferre vs aboue all creatures: and afterwarde throweth vs downe as men in the picture of the wheele of fortune. Thus ye see howe some take this streyne. Otherscime thinke that Job ment too make comparison betweene himselfe and all mankinde: as if hee had sayde, Alas Lorde, Thou art so good vnto men, that thy mercie filleth the whole earth: there is not the man that feeleth not howe thou art his father, and that thou bestowest manye benefites vpon him: there is none but my selfe alone too whome thou art vnkynde. VVhat 30 meeneth this? VVWhy shall not I bee in the same ranke that other men are? But when all things are well considered: Iobs plaine meening is too say, yea Lorde, why art thou so greeued agaynst men? Thou settest verye great store by them. Then dooth hee not speake of Gods benefits: but rather meeneth that it is not a conuenient thing for God too bee greeued at men. As for example, If a great Prince shoulde take pritch agaynst a poore Labourer, it were not for his honour: for men woulde say, why matcheth hee not himselfe wyth hys 40 equall? He doth himselfe great wrong in that he knoweth not who hee is. Yea and cuen the proude sort of this worlde can well ynowe saye, if suche a one were my matche, I woulde shewe him who I am. Ye see then after what sort men commonly vse to shewe token of disdeyne. If men (who are but woormes of the earth) can well skill to alledge, that it is not comely for them too beare malice to those that are farre their inferiors: there is farre greater reason too thinke that God seemeth too magnifie men ouer much, when hee matcheth himselfe agaynst them. For who are they? VVhat is their state? God therefore ought too set light by them, [and to say:] Tushe, well yee are but woormes, yee are but vermine: and shall I chalenge you too go fight with you? That were greatly too the defacing of my glorie and Maiestie. Ye see then what Iobs cheefe meening is. Furthermore wee haue too marke, that this present sentence is not like that of the eight Psalme, where it is sayde: Psal.8.4.5. Lorde what is man that thou makest so much of him. Yee see heere howe the woordes are set in their proper signification: but in Iobs saying, they bee taken cleane contrarie. For in the said text of the Psalme which I haue alledged, Dauid recounteth Gods infinite goodnessse, in that he thinketh so vpon his creatures, and that he vouchsafeth to haue a care of them too guide them, and to gouerne them. If ye looke vpon man in himself, ye shall see so poore a creature, as it may wel seeme that God ought not too haue respect of him, or too cast his eye vpon him. Nowe then when we see that God not onely vouchsafeth too gouerne men, but also maketh them Lordes of all his creatures: according as it is sayde there, that he hath made both the beastes of the feelde, and the byrdes of the ayre, and the fishes of the sea, too serue our turnes withall: seeing he hath so dispozed all things to serue vs, and to succour our necessities: it seemeth that God beareth vs suche a loue, as hee putteth all that he hath vnder our hands, saying, I withhold nothing from you. Ye see then that the wretchednesse and poorenesse of men, yeeldeth a greater beautie to Gods goodnessse and mercie, than if we had any thing of oure owne that coulde prouoke him to do vs good. Thus ye see Davids plaine meening. And this thing is specially fulfilled in the person of our Lorde Iesus Christ. For although he be the onely sonne of God: yet notwithstanding, so it is that in respect of his manhood he was the sonne of Abraham, and was fully like vs in all poyntes, sinne onely excepted. And so when we see that God hath made much of him by giuing all things intoo his hande, too the ende that wee shoulde recouer that thing in him, which wee lost in Adam: therein God hath shewed the great and infinite treasures of his mercie. And verely Iesus Christ is the true looking glasse of Gods grace, which afterward is spred out vpon all his members. And so after the example of Dauid, wee haue good cause too exalte the goodnessse of God, when wee see that hauing begonne first in Adam, and afterwarde in Iesus Christ, (by whom all is made whole againe that was beaten downe and defaced in Adam) hee continueth still at this day in doing vs good, and we bee made partakers of all his riches. Herein wee haue good cause too maruell and too saye, Alas Lorde, what are wee, that thou visitest vs, that thou visitest vs so familiarly, that wee bee as thy children, that thou holdest vs as in thy lappe, and that thou shewest thy selfe so bountifull towardes vs. Lo what wee ought too do. But in this place Job taketh all too the flat contrarie. VVherein wee see that when mennes mouthes are out of taste, nothing can like them: in case as if a mannes stomacke were squeynishe by meanes of sickenesse, the best and the finest meates that coulde be brought vntoo him, should haue no sauour with him: but should lothe him, and prouoke him as it were too vomiting. So standeth the cace with vs: when wee bee yll disposed, and haue not a right and well ruled iudgement, Gods graces shall haue no taste nor sauor with vs. Is there any thing that ought to prouoke vs more too loue God, than when wee knowe that hee commeth downe after that sort vntoo vs, and that hee dooth (as ye woulde say) put 50 the meate into our mouthes as a mother dooth too hir yong babes, and that hee hath his wings spred out too receyue vs [vnder them] as it is sayde in the song of Moyses? VVhen wee see God too haue so familiar a care of vs, is it not ynowgh too rausishe vs oute of oure wittes? Ought not the consideration therof to suffize vs throughly? But as for them that are forweeryed and full of anguishe, they come so farre short of tasting this too their profite, that they coulde finde in theyr hartes that God were a great way off from them: according as wee 60 see it is hapned vnto Job, at leastwise in respect of hys fleshly affection. No doubt but he resisted it, and had patience, howbeeit that the same were secrete and hidden within him: neuerthelesse it behoued the same passion to shewe it selfe whatsoeuer it were, and God ment too humble him thereby. VVee see then howe Job turneth Gods prouidence quite upside downe, and that in steade of cōforting and cheering himself therewith, he would fayne that God were farre of. VVhat is man (sayth hee) Deu.32.b. 11 I.ij. that that thou makest so much of him? Yea verely. But if God chasteze vs whē we do amisse, must we therfore say he aduaunceth vs to much, and that he doth vs wrong? It is not with him as it is with mortall men. For if a man bee offended with me, he wil holde scorne to match himselfe with his vnderling, but will bende himselfe agaynst his equall. And wherefore? For the matter standeth vpon reuenging. But if God chasteze vs for the faultes that we haue committed, it is not too auenge himselfe of vs, hee passeth for no such thing. VVhat then? For twoo reasons. The one is that wee muste bee fayne too take him for our judge spye of our teeth, when wee haue despized him [neuer so much.] And the other is, that hee woulde not haue vs too perishe, and therefore he correcteth vs too the ende wee shoulde come backe againe too him, and he calleth vs by that meanes to repenteance. VVe will not say they are vncomely things for God too punishe vs and too preache so vpon vs too the intent too plucke vs backe from our sinnes, and too shewe himselfe too bee our judge, and that we should learne to bee subiect vnto him. VVe see then howe thankelesse men are, sith they turne the good turnes vpside down which God doth to them. And moreouer let vs vnderstand, that if it befell vnto Job to be so tempted as he wished God away from him: the like temptation may well happen vnto vs, not onely to shake vs, but also to put vs to such a plunge, as wee shall bee quite ouerthrowne. Then must men be well aduised too fense themselues [aforhande] and (accordingly too that which I haue declared) wee must acknowledge that God bindeth exceedingly much vnto him, in that he vouchsafeth to visite vs, and (as it were) to keepe watch and warde ouer our life, and to haue a fetherly care of vs: as we can neuer magnifie his grace too muche. Yea, and when hee punisheth vs for our sinnes, let vs assure our selues that his chastening of vs is not for that wee be worthie of it: there is no cause why hee shoulde once put to his hande, but that hee shoud let vs go for such as we are. Then, in sending vs punishmentes God sheweth both his goodnessse and iustice. And why so? For by this meanes he calleth men to repenteance: and afterwarde he maketh them to feele him too bee theyr iudge, that they may humble themselues. He chastezeth them to their profite, if their vnthankfulnessse hinder not their profitting. Lo what we haue too remember in this streyne. Howsoever the worlde go, let vs keepe our selues from saying too God. And what is man that thou magnifiest him, so as thou visitest him a mornings? Let vs not be greeued if God set sure watch vpon vs all: no, let vs not do so. For that is for those to do which woulde haue the bridle layd looce in their necke to runne at rouers, to the end that God shoulde not chasteze them at all. But if it were so: what shold we gaine by it? Let vs put the case that God did shet his eyes, and that he did let vs runne at randon all the feedes ouer, so as wee gaue oure selues to riot, and he passed not of it: what shold become of vs? Beholde, the diuell would ceaze vpon vs, and we shold be his pray, and he woulde carie vs euen into destruction. So then let vs know that there is nothing better for our welfare, than that God shoulde haue his eies open continually, that he shold see all that we do, and specially that he shold gage the bottome of our thoughts, and that we shoud not remoue one fingers breddth, nor step forth one pace, but he shold note it and mark it, assuring our selues (I say) that it shold not be for our profit, if he did otherwise. Thus ye see what we haue to gather vpon this text. And by and by Job addeth, Howe long will it bee ere thou let me alone, and withdrawe thy selfe from mee till I haue swallowed in my spittle? Heere Job declareth his passions wherewith he had bene tempted. By the way wee haue to beare in minde what hath bene sayd heretofore: that is to wit, that Job felte alwayes some comfort, and that God forsooke him not for a full doo. Job then sheweth heere after what sort he was affectioned as in respect of the flesh, to the intent his freendes might know, that hee made not so great complaint without cause. And the better too expresse the anguish wherein hee was, he turneth himselfe to God, because hee sees he shall gaine nothing at mens hands. But yet for all that, he ceaseth not to regard men, yea euen too much. For had hee beene well gathered into himselfe, and had he made his prayer vnto God: it is certaine that he had behaued himselfe more quietly, and he had shewed a greater token of sayth and pacience. VVhat is the cause that Job martereth himselfe in such sort, as it may seeme at the first blush, that hee is a desperate person? It is for that hee hath an eye too the reproches that are offered him, and hee is not able too beare them, too passe them ouer, and too haue an eye vnto God. And this is it that I sayde heretofore, namely that if men come too molest and too fling vs, wee muste not looke vpon that, wee must not cast our countenance thithe warde: but forasmuch as wee perceyue that Satan laboureth to bring vs by that meanes to confuzion: wee must come streyght vnto God, wee must mourne before him, and we must assure our selues that hee will cause vs too feele the auayblenesse of his chasteizements the better, and that wee cannot bee thrallt ouer of the way, as when men were the marke that wee ame at. But yet neuerthelesse, Jobs purpose in thys streyne, was too expresse the vehemensie of his affection on the better, by turning his talke vnto God, as if hee had sayde: VWell, yee understande nothing at all, I see yee perceyue not the spirituall battell wherenvnto God hath put me, and therefore I must talke too him that is my iudge. To be short, it is all one as if Job had sayde, This that I speake is no counterfeyte stuffe: but it is as if God himselfe were heere. And hee sayeth (as hee had touched afore) that his lyfe was nothing but vanitie, insomuche that God ought too take himselfe awaie from him, vntill bee had swalloured in his spittle, according as wee may saye too take his breath. Heereby Job meentheth that God pursueth vpon him ouerroughly: and it seemeth that hee woulde pleade agaynst God as hee hath done heretofore. But I haue tolde you alreadie that hee dooth but expresse the passions of the fleshe. And truely whensoever God giueth men the grace too frame themselues vnto him, and too beare their croesse and afflictions patiently: it is not in suche wise as they shold bee altogether without feeling, it is not that they shold bee vnmoouable and vnproufitable when men trouble them and torment them: But it is too the intent they shold fully settle themselues too beare all this with pacience, and that they shoulde conclude: It is meete that my God shoulde haue the maystric, and that I shoulde frame my selfe too his lure, and therefore yeld my self ouer vnto his good pleasure. But howsoever the worlde go, none is able to do it without encountering. Job then expresteth heere his owne passions in such sort as hee felte them, and in the meane while Gods grace is as it were buried for the time: not that it was vtterly quenched, for (as I haue sayde) God vphilde him. But it will come to passe that when the first passions assault the saythfull, they shall (as a man woulde saye) bee harried awaye in suche manner, as it maye seeme that God gouerneth them not any more, and that they play the horses that are broken looce. Nay but it is as if a man were vpon a horse: and very well, ye see the horse flingeth & kicketh and and dorsh all that hee can too escape and too runne ouer all the feelde: but anon the man that is handsome can tell well ynough howe too tame him, hee will reyne him vp with the bridle, and bring him too a good pace.

Euen so is it with vs, that wee shall oftentimes bee caried away headlong by our ouerheadie passions: but yet for all this, God will not let vs alone so, but wyll rather reyne vs vp and drawe vs too him, according as we shall see how he worketh towrdes Job. But (as it hath beene declared heeretofore) it is true that we may well alledge vnto God the frayltie of oure lyfe, when wee woulde obtaine some mercie and release at hys hande. But Job speaketh heere excessiuely, as a man that is oute of hys wittes, and knoweth not to whom hee ought too direct hys woordes. Euerie faythfull bodye will lightly saye, Lorde my dayes are nothing but vanitie and smoke: therefore haue pittie vpon so miserable a creature. This request is good and holy, and God accepteth it in good woorth bycause wee be taught by his holy spirite too speake so. But Job steppeth too him after another fashion, and wyth another maner of style. Howe? my dayes (sayeth he) are but vanitic, and commest thou heere too set thy selfe agaynst mee? VVilt thou not giue mee respite too swallow downe my spittle? VVhy doost thou not gette thee from mee? Hee is of opinion that if God woulde drawe away his hande from him, hee shoulde haue some ease. Yea, but what woulde become of vs if God should let vs alone? Should we haue power to swallowe downe our spittle? Howe coulde wee breathe, if the spirite that giueth liuelynesse too all thinges shoulde forfike vs?
Do we not see that we shoulde needes decay? But (as I haued declared alreadie) Job is an amazed man that hath no consideration but of his miserie. And this serueth vs for a good and profitable warning. For wee see what it is too bee ouerpresse with our owne passions: namely that wee forgo all wisedome and pacience, and become as dull as brute beastes. Verely it will not seeme so too vs. But if we marke mennes passions a farre off, what they bee: wee shall finde that they make vs alto-ther blockishe so as wee haue no knowledge at all. Againe wee haue not holde of our selues too be competent judges, and it is too bee seene that all our wittes are confounded at our neede. Let euerie of vs marke men when they be cumbered with vehement passions, or else let vs consider howe wee oure selues fare if God pinche vs with any aduersitie that is ouerroughe for vs: we bee so daunted, as wee haue no hart too call vpon God, wee cannot bethinke vs of the promises that are conteyned in holye writte, and then what remedie is there for our miseries? Nowe then (as I haue sayde) there is such a headiness in oure passions, that if God shoulde not ouermayster them from aboue, yea euen by the woon-derfull power of his holy spirite, in suche wise as wee might knowe his maiestie therein, and that there is more in it than man can skill off: it is certaine that it were ynough too mingle and confounde heauen and earth together at euerie blowe. But yet neuerthelesse (as I haue touched alreadie) Job had a farre other consideration with him, in asmuch as Gods spirite was in him: but if God remedie it not by the grace of his holy spirite, there is no question but yee shall fynde man in his owne naturall kinde, and ye shall fynde his passions such as they are according too the fleshe. Get thee from mee, sayeth Job. And what shoulde become of vs if God shoulde let vs alone, so as wee shoulde abyde withoute his ayde and assistence? It is in him that we haue our beeing, our 17f.28 giuing and our mouing as the scripture speaketh and as wee our selues doo see the experience. Can we swallow downe our spittle, if God shoulde giue vs vp? That is much like: as who woulde say, there is more power in vs, than in the Angels of heauen. For if God shoulde leaue them too themselues, what woulde become of them?

Beholde they are immortall creatures, and are alreadie in the glorie of heauen, and beholde the maiestie of God: and yet neuerthelesse they shoulde vanishe away and bee brought to nothing if God shoulde withdrawe himself from them: and can we that are full of corruption haue more force? Therefore whyle God giueth vs some leisure, let vs learne too thinke vpon our infirmities which are so excessiue in vs, and to knowe that there is nothing better than that God shoulde visit vs, looke to vs, and dispose of vs: for else wee shoulde decay euerie minute. Thus ye see what wee haue too marke vpon this streyne. And it is certeyne that in the persone of one faythfull and pacient man, God intended to giue vs a mirroure of oure inordinate affections, too the ende wee shoulde beware of them, and seeke too feele the succour and refreshment that are shewed vs heere. And howe shall wee feele it? There is no better way than too call vpon him that hath all power in himself, that he may restreyne vs and not suffer vs too start asyde when wee bee chastized after that sorte by his hande. Nowe hee addeth immediately, I haue sinned, what shall I do to thee?
O thou the keeper of men! Some men expounde this, as though Job disputed agaynst God, saying: I can do none other but sinne, wherefore hast thou made mee such a one? If thou bee the preseruer of men: why shouldest thou condemne mee so, seeing it lyeth in thee too saue mee? But a man may well see that this is not the naturall meening: and such as take it so, never knewe the intent of the holy Ghost as touching this streyne: & more-ouer they haue yll considered that which is witnessed to vs concerning Job, how he was pacient howe soever the worlde went with him. VVhat is it then that Job ment? It is as if he shoulde say, well, I confess my fault, & I cannot scape the iudgement of God. VVhy so? He is the Keeper of men. But this worde Keeper, hath bene misconstrued: formen haue taken it for a preseruer of mankind, and for one that sheeldeth them vnder his protecciō. It is cer-tayne, that (as the Greeke translater also hath well marked, which thing hee is not commonly woont too doo) Job ment too say, that God wayteth vpon vs, that hee watcheth vs, and that hee knoweth all, as if a man shoulde watche one too spie and marke all that euer hee doth and sayeth. Yee see then in what sense Job applieth this tytle vnto God, That is the Keeper of men. True it is that God dooth well preserue vs, that hee hath vs in his hande, and that oure lyfe continueth by him. But yet is thys no let that hee shoulde not bee called oure Keeper, in respect that hee seeth and beholdeth all that wee doo, so as wee can not hyde oure selues from him: according as all the scripture sayth, that he sercheth men, Psal.7.c. 10.
Iere.17.b.10
Heb.4.d.13.

examineth theyr thoughtes, discouereth all things, and nothing is hidden from him in all our life. And it appeareth that Job ment so: for why and to what purpose saith he, VVhat shall I do to thee? if it be not because he must be fayne to yelde himselfe giltie? Lorde (sayth hee) I can gaine nothing at thy hand by starting aside, I confess my det, I haue sinned: but by the way what shall I do to thee?
For I must be faine to passe that way: and why letst thou me not alone? Although thou see heere a poore creature cast vnder foote, that hath neither strength nor power, yet neuerthelesse thou followest vpon him wyth thy rigour still. I acknowledge my selfe too bee indettered to thee: and yet thou holdest mee still vpon the racke, as I.iiiij.

if a judge should holde a malefactor vpon the racke and say too him. Tell mee thy fault , and that the malefactor should answe, I will so , I haue committed such a murther, yea twoo or three, and suche and suche are accessaries . Too what purpose shoule the ludge holde him still vpon the racke after such confession ? Beholde heere the like cace concerning Job . Truth Lorde (sayeth hee) I haue sinned , thou needest too torment mee no more, nor too racke mee too make mee confess my faultes . For sith I haue graunted thee thy det, wherfore doost thou persecute mee ? Thou art the keeper of men , thou knowest all. If thou needed too make inquisition nowe of a thing that were hidden from thee : verye well : thou mightest say , I will holde thee heere till I haue gotten the knowledge of all thy faultes . But thou knowest them (sayeth Job , ) thou art the keeper of men : and admittit that men knewe not themselves: yet knowest thou what they bee . Then seeyng the cace is so , why doost thou not drawe thy hande awaye from mee withoute pressing mee after suche a sort ? Thus yee see the naturall meening of this sentence . And heere wee see howe men fare when they will measure Gods Justice by theyr owne witte and capacicie : for it will seeme too them that God passeth measure at euerie blowe , and that hee vseth ouer great rigour . Although our intent bee not too accuse God of crueltie with full mouth : yet wee ceasse not to frette and chafe agaynst him , like as Job hath beene tempted too doo . VVhat is too bee done then ? Let vs consider that God is the keeper of men : that is too say , that wee are heere within his sight : wee maye well fynde fayre colours and lurkingholes before men, but all our hipocrisies cannot keepe God from seeing vs or from discerning all , even too our verie thoughts . VVhat got oure father Adam by couering hymselfe with leaues, when hee was summoned before God ? Hee shoulde haue appeared , and his sinne shoulde haue beene layde afore him spye of his teeth . So then let vs consider that Gods Registers are full of our woorkes , woordes, and thoughts . And although that as nowe wee read not our

Dan.7.d.10 Indytements as they bee framed: yet shall Daniels saying bee fulfilled , which is, that when the iudgement is settled, then the booke shall bee opened . Yee see then that the thing whiche wee haue too marke in the first place , is that God is mennes keeper: wee maye well iette heere bylowe , and take leau to leape lyke frogges without order , and ( as the Prouerbe sayeth ) playe the Meece in the chaffe , so as all things may bee confuzed too manwarde : but yet will God marke and beare away all . VVhen wee knowe this , let vs learne too walke in feare and carefulnesse : and seeing that our God looketh vpon vs, let vs walke as before him . * And if wee haue this lesson well printed in our hertes : wee shall bee sure too haue one care more than wee had before . VVe shall be ashamed afore men , so as wee will not doo oure naughtinesse in the open day nor in the open streeete . And why so ? Because the eyes of men will let vs . Beholde also how God and his Angels are witnesses of our lyfe : ought not that too make vs walke in farre more awe a great deale ? This knowledge then must holde vs in awe , too the ende wee thinke not that our sinnes shall scape vnpunished : but that forasmuche as God knoweth them , hee will also giue iudgement agaynst them . For hee gouerneth not after the common order of men: he hath other maner of eyes than wee haue : althoughe wee haue confessed oure faultes , hee knoweth that which is hidden within and that which is vnknowne too our selues . VVhen an offender hath acknowledged his crymes and euill dooings before an earthly judge , a man demaundeth no more at his hande : but God is a spirituall iudge, and will bring vs too the inward knowledge of our sinnes . Then is it not ynough for vs to say, I haue sinned : but wee must condemne the sinne in our selues, yea even in such wyse, as euerie of vs may be his owne iudge , and learne to abhorre sinne : according also as yee see why GOD holdeth vs as it were so locked vp therein , that nowe and then wee pyne away lyke poore soules in dispayre . Ye see wherefore he trieth vs: name-ly too the intent that euerie of vs should knowe himselfe, not onely too say yeaverely I perceyue well that I am a sinner : but also too haue a liuely feeling of our sinnes, that wee may bee vterly ashamed of them before him . And finally Job sayeth, VVbefore hast thou set mee full ouer agaynst thee ? VVbefore doost thou not take away my wickednesse ? VVbefore doost thou not pardon my sinne ? For I am in the dust , and if thou seeke mee , I shall bee no more . Heere Job returneth too the matter whiche hee had glaunced at afore : that is too witte , that hee desyred but too haue some truce or release till he had swallowed hys spittle . Nowe therefore hee sayth, why hast thou set mee full oueragaynst thee , that is too say , as a white for a man too shoote at . For hee coulde wel haue founde in his hart , that God shoulde haue let him alone as hee was : as if hee shoulde say , who am I ? And at whom doost thou bende thy selfe ? For I am a poore woorme of the earth , and thou settest mee as a whyte too shoote at : must thou needes trie thy strength vpon mee ? as he will say too him anon . For Job returneth oftentymes to that complaint , and renueth the same oft . True it is that when God setteth vs full butte agaynst him , we bee not able too abyde suche a force : but yet for all that wee muste not shrinke awaye from him : For it cannot bee but that wee must needes fayle as soone as God turneth his backe vpon vs . Then , are we desirous too stande out and too continue in good state ? The meane thereof is not that God shoulde turne his backe vpon vs , but that wee shoulde bee as a marke in a Butte for him to shoote at , and that hee shoulde beate vpon vs as muche as hee listeth : yea verely so hee asswage the greefe of the woundes that hee hath made , by causing vs too feele his goodnesse : so wee may knowe that in the middest of his anger hee forgetteth not his mercye , according as it is spoken in the song of Habacuke .

Habac.3.4,2

Thus yee see why thys persuation of Jobes is sette out vntoo vs: It is too the intent wee shoulde learne not too desire God too let vs alone as wee bee , for then shoulde wee bee drowned even in damnation . But let vs praye God that when hee chastizeth vs, wee may not make outleapes in hope too scape his hande; but that wee may holde him our backes too receyue his strokes , so bee it that hee giue vs the powre too beare all his corrections paciently : and therevpon also that hee make vs to taste his mercie , that wee bee not destitute of comforthe in the middes of oure aduersities . True it is that wee muste followe Job heere in confessing that if God looke vppon vs from Euening till Morning , wee shall bee no more : no verely if hee leau vs destitute of his grace , and forsake vs wyth his looking vpon vs . But if wee returne too him with a harte affection , we shall feele him alwayes at hande wyth vs , and that hee will not fayle vs , but assynt vs continually , yea even till he haue taken vs vp into his heauenly glorie to continue with him for euer :

And now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him that wheras we prouoke his wrath so many wayes, he wil

not suffer vs too continue stubborne in our vices, and plunged in our owne filthinesse, but that hee will drawe vs out and make vs cleane, yea and that in the meane while he will so moderate his roddes, as wee may not be vtterly past hope, but may comfort our selues, in that he hath promised to be our God and to assit vs to the ende, and therupon returne vnto him, knowing that it is his office to chaunge the worlde to better, and therefore pray vnto him to increase his graces in vs, that wee may alwayes fashion our selues more and more like vn-

to our Lorde Iesu Christe: and that in the meane time he will so gouerne vs by his holie spirite, as wee may no more prouoke his wrath against vs as we haue done hitherto: but rather that by his making of vs to feele his sweete and fatherly hand, we may euer haue so much the greater occasion to magnifie and glorifie him in all our life. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to all Nacions of the earth, bringing baek all poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage of errore and darkenesse to, &c.

The xxx. Sermon, which is the first vpon the eighth Chapter.

1. Baldad the Suite ansyvered and sayde.
2. Hovv long vvilt thou holde such talke? the vvoordes of thy mouth are as a yehement vvinde.
3. VVill God peruert Iustice? vvill the almighty deface the right?
4. Thy Sonnes haue sinned, and he hath made them come to the place of their misdeedes.
5. But if thou retorne to God betimes, and pray to the almighty:
6. If thou be pure and right, he vvill avvake vnto thee, and make the tent of thy rightuousnesse peaceable.

He better to profite our selues by that which is conteyned in this present Chapter: wee muste beare in minde what wee haue declared afore: that is to wit, that Iobs friends vndertaking an euill case, haue notwithstanding good arguments and good reasons. True it is that they misapply them: neuerthelesse the doctrine is in it selfe both holy and profitable. So, if wee take the things generally that are spoken here: wee shall finde good sentences. And in very deede ye shall see that the principall matter that Baldad pretentheth, is to maynteyne that God is rightuous in punishing men, and that there is no cause to find fault with him. And without question, all this doctrine is not only good, but also one of the chiefe articles of our faith. There is none other fault in it, but that Baldad will needs apply it to the persone of Job. For as wee haue seene heretofore, the intent of that holy man was not too blame God, nor too lifte vp himselfe against him: but he maketh his moane that the miserie whiche he had indured was to grieuous and heauie for him considering his feblenesse, & yet for all that he ceaseth not to glorifie God still. And so let vs marke that Baldad had an euill case: but yet in the meane while, that which he setteth downe here is good and rightuous, and it behoueth vs to receyue it, because it is fitte for our edification: Like as when he sayeth, that such as pleade after that sorte against God, do turmoyle themselfes like the winde in the ayre. True it is that we must leaue the persone of Job as I sayd afore, and take the thing generally that is contayned here. VVe heare how the wicked and vnbeleuers do spew out their blasphemies in rayling at Gods Iustice, and it seemeth that they shoulde thunder and lighten. But what? All their woordes are but winde, and they washe away, and they can not reache so high, with them as the maiestie of God sheweth it selfe therein. And so in this sentence we haue to marke, firste that when we heare these blasphemies against God, we must not be dismayed therefore, so as wee shoulde not alwayes glorifie God. For he cōtinueth whole and sounde as he was, and men cannot abate his maiestie: though they rayle at it with full mouth, all is but winde and vanitic. Thus much cōcerning the first point. As touching the second, let euery of vs learne to speake of God soberly, and with all reverence and humblenesse, so as we cast not foorth suche a winde as is mencioned here. For althoough we be not able to preiudice God by any maner of meanes: yet will not he fayle to take vengeance of them that indeuer to lift vp themselfes after that sorte against him by casting forth proude and presumptuous woordes. VVhat is to be done then? If wee haue once settled that thing in our hartes which the holie Scripture teacheth vs: the same will hold vs in true stedfastnesse. And afterward when we speake after the meaure of our fayth, wee shall not onely cast foorth godly blastes, but God shall be exalted and magnified in all our talke. But now lette vs come to that which is set downe here for the principall. VVill God peruert Judgement and right? will the Almighty ouerthrowe Justice? Here we be put in mind to yelde God the honor of being the fountaine of all equitie and right, and that it is impossible that he shoulde doo any thing that is not good and rightfull. Some can well finde in their hartes to graunt that God is Almighty, but in the meane while they acknowledge him not to be rightuous as they ought to do. For the one of them must not be separated from the other. VVe muste not imagine that there are things in God which can bee deuided one from another. True it is that it behoueth vs to put a difference betweene the wisedome, and the goodnessse, and the Iustice, and the almightynesse of God: but yet notwithstanding, in respect that he is God, all these things must needs be in him at once, and they must be as it were himselfe or his very being. Then let vs beware that wee surmyze not a lawlesse power in God, as if he gouerned the world like a tyrant, and vsed excesse or crueltie. But lette vs vnderstande whereas he hath all things in his hande, and is of endlesse power and doeth al things, yet notwithstanding he ceaseth not too be rightuous. It is true that this rightuousnesse of Gods is partly hidde from vs, so as we comprehend it not: but yet neuerthelesse, it is of his mightiness also: and for prooife thereof, are we able to measure it by our wit and vnderstanding? It is certaine that wee cannot. And therefore when we heare speaking of Gods rightuousnesse or Iustice: let vs marke, that although the same bee not fully knowne and manifest vnto vs: yet wee muste honor and reverence it. It is sayde that his deuices are a bottomlesse Psal.36.b.7. pit, and that he dwelleth in vnapproachable light, so as we Rom.11. d.33. cannot reache so high as to know what is in him. But yet 1. Tim. 6. d. neuerthelesse, we must be fully perswaded in our selues, 16.

that it is the propertie and nature of God to do al things in perfect vprightnesse so as there is no faulthe to bee founde. Now then wee see what opinion wee ought to conceyue of God. VVhen worldly folke speake of God, they can well say that he is the soueraine Creator of the world: but yet in the meane season they acknowledge not the thing that is propre vnto him, nor him in suche wise as it his will to manifest himselfe vnto vs: that is to wit in his Justice, in his goodnesse, in his wisdome, and in all things whereby we may take taste to loue him, to honor him, and to serue him. And this is the principall poynt that we must take heede vnto. For what shall wee haue gayned by knowing curiously what the Beeing and what the glorious Maiestie of God is: if in the meane tyme wee vnderstande not that thing of him which wee ought to feele by experience, and which he declareth vnto vs? as when it is layd that he dwelleth in vs, and that we live in him & haue our mouing & being in him, that his mercie filleth all things, that wee be susteyned by his goodnesse, that we haue so much light as he giueth vs and

c. 10.

no more, that it is in him to remedie all our corruptions, and that we cannot haue so much as one grayne or one drop of righteousnesse, except we drawe it out of him who is the welspring thereof. Now if we know not these things, what shall it auayle vs to knowe that there is but only one God, who contayneth all things, and to haue some feeling of his maiestie? VVherefore so much the more behoueth it vs to marke well what is sayde here: that is to wit, that we must take it for a grounded principle, that Gods nature is righteous, and that it is no more possible for him to turne aside from right & equitie, than to say that he can forgo his being, and cease to be God. For it is no lesse absurdite too say, that God doeth any thing vnauidedly, than to say that he is not at all, or to say that his Beeing is diminished. And here yee see also how saint Paule reasoneth in the third to the Romanes, where he taketh away the flaunder that might be inforced against the doctrine that he brought: how men are always full of venim to speake euill of Gods pure truth, and to stande checking and replying against it. Sainct

Paul therefore sayeth, Is God unrightuous? How should it be possible, that he to whom it belongeth to iudge the whole worlde, should not performe all right? He sheweth there by this woerde Judge, how all of vs ought to bee fully persuaded, that God is so chare of right dealing, that all that he doeth and all that commeth from him is compassed aboue with that rule. VVe see then that the sayde sentence of Saint Paules agreeth with this of Baldads. For vnder this terme God, Baldad comprehendeth Justice and rightdealing, and so doth he afterwarde vnder the woerde Almighty. And it is as much as if he had sayd, Can we spoyle God of that thing which is so knitte into his being, as they cannot by any meanes bee put a funder. It were as much as to abace him vtterly, and to pull him out of his seate, and to bring him to nothing, if a man woulde pleade against him as though he were not righteous. In steade of setting downe the woerde God alone, or of ioyning the title of Almighty too it: Saint Paul alledgedeth the office of him: that is to wit, that God is the Judge of the world. And he is not a Judge after the maner of those that are brybed and corrupted, as wee see mortall men are, who being well aduauced to great estate and authoritie, do notwithstanding abuse the same full ost: But it is not so with God. And why? For, his being Judge of the worlde, is not by good happe, or by election auenture, or by sute, or by purchace: but it is incident to him by nature, he is no sooner God, but he is immediatly judge therewithal. Seing the that the cace stādeth so, let vs not cōceyue ought of him but al righteousnesse being well assured that his will is the soueraine rule therof. Furthermore (as I haue sayde) this righteousnesse cannot be so knowne vnto vs as we should be able to decypher what is in it, that when soever God shall worke ought, wee shall see the reson why. And doubtlesse it is no reson that it should bee subiect to vs, or that wee should desire to haue it an vnderling too our capacite. Then if wee finde not that thing to be good whiche he doeth, whither shall wee go? what a presumptuousnesse shall it be for mortall creatures, (I say) for poore wormes of the earth, to be desirous to compell God to make them to knowe what his workes are, and to giue their verdict of them? But cleane contrarie, although God conceale the reson of his doings from vs: and that wee thinke his workes straunge, so as it seemeth to our vnderstanding, that wee haue cause to pleade against him: Yet muste we honour his secrete and incomprehēsible iudgements, and gather our wittes too vs in all humblenesse, too say, 20 Beholde, it is true that as now this seemeth too vs to bee able to preuayle against God. And so without any further replying, we must holde it for a sure conclusion, that God is righteous. For asmuche then as wee see nowe but in parte, yea euen as it were in a glasse and darkely: lette vs wayte for the day wherein we shall see Gods glorie face to face, and then shall wee comprehend the thing that is hidden from vs as now. Yee see then after what manner it is Gods will to exercise our faith: that is to wit, he will haue vs to confess his righteousnesse to be such as no mans witte may finde fault with it or carpe against it. I say he will haue vs to confess this, although wee perceyue it not, nor haue any full knowledge of it, and although every man haue his reson to dispute with God why he doeth so. Albeit then that wee see not the things with our eye: yet must we haue the humblenesse to yeeld vnto God that which belongeth to him. And if wee do otherwise, it is all one as if wee would (so farre as in vs lieth) bring his euerafter Beeing vtterly too nought.

But if wee haue this well printed in our hartes: it will be a good beginning aforehand to submit our selues in such wise vnto God, as although he scourge vs and handle vs roughlier than wee would bee: yet notwithstanding wee shall be patient in our aduersities. VVhy so?

For he that fretteth at his aduersitie, muste needs bee made to know what it is to lift vp himselfe against God. And he cannot take pritch against God, but he must also set himselfe against all right and equitie. And what els shall bee the ende of such a cace, but confusion and decay? Beholde then a brydle to holde vs still in pacience:

50 namely the knowledge which we ought to haue of Gods righteousnesse. For by standing so against all right and equitie, wee fight to our owne damnation. And when we chafe at our aduersities, wee wage battell against God, and would ouerthrow his Justice and bring it to nothing, as neere as wee can. Yet notwithstanding it behoueth vs to go on further, if wee will bee rightly pacient. And why so? because wee shall bee neuerthelesse tempted to despaire though wee haue knowne the righteousnesse and Justice of God. Looke vpon a poore sinner that feeleth himselfe pressed too the vttermoste: well he will confess (yea euen vnfaynedly) that God is righteous in punishing him: but yet it seemeth too him that he shall perish, and that there is no forgiuenesse to be looked for in his cace. Yee see then how he which is visited by the hande of God may fall into despaire, notwithstanding that he acknowledge God too bee righteous. And in good fayth wee see what is happened vnto Job. True it is that he was not vtterly destitute of pacience:

pacience: but yet he ceassed not to bee tormented with horrible passions, as we haue seene heretofore and shall see hereafter. And certainlye, he doubted not at all that God was righteous: but he had an eye to his owne infirmitie, [saying in himself:] Lorde I am frayle, and yet neuerthelesse, thou vterest thy strength against me: and what am I? It seemeth that thou arte minded here too thunder against me sillie creature whiche am lesse than a worme. Yee see now wherewi. h Job found himselfe grieued and vexed: namely, that he coulde not (at the firsfe brunt) taste howe God succred him in the middes of his rigour: and afterwarde would giue him a happie ende of it, so he taried his leasure. Verily Job had some feeling hereof: but yet he is so combered with heauinessse, as he coulde not ridde and dispatch himselfe of it at the firsfe brunt. Yee see then that Job is partly vnpacient: And notwithstanding that he bee set forth to vs as a mirrour of pacience: yet are his afflictions so vehement, that he quayleth. VVhat is the reason? It is because he hath not suche a sauour of the fatherly care that God hath of him, as is requisite. For this cause I haue sayde, that to knowe Gods rightuousnesse and to be fully persuaded of it, is a meane to b:ing vs too pacience: howbeit that wee must matche another article with it, that is to witte, wee muste alwayes thinke that God in afflicting vs doeth not ceasse to loue vs, yea and that he will procure our saluation what rigour soeuer he vse towardes vs, so as all our afflictions shall be assuaged through his grace, and he will give them a gladsome end. And after that Baldad hath spoken so, he addeth, Tby children haue sinned, and God bathe sente them too the pl.ce of their iniquitie. But if thou returne to him betymes, he will make towardes thee, or he will make prosperitie come againe. Hereby he meeneth that God hath set a fayre lookingglasse before Iobs eyes, to the intent he shoulde not aduaunce himselfe any more, nor play the horse that is broken looce, seing that they which are stubborne against God doo come to confusion, and must be plundged into perdition for euer. Secondly there is a promise, that God doth still wayte, and wou'd fayne drawe him backe to repentance, and therfore, that he ought to make haste whyle time serueth for it. Thus then yee see the two poyntes that are couched here by Baldad. But I haue tolde you before, howe he misapplieth it to the persone of Job. VVhy so? It is an euill cace well handled. Therfore let vs take the same for a generall lesson, to the ende that every of vs may applie it to himselfe in his degree and according to his necessitie. It is sayde here, that God punisheth suche as are stubborne against him: and hereby his meening is too humble vs, that wee might not give the brydle too the infirmitie of our fleshe, as our maner is too bee too licentious. VVhen wee come too taking a stomacke against God, wee make lesse difficultie in it than if wee shoulde encounter with our inferiour or with our equall.

Behold (say I) the diuelish boldnesse that raigneth all the world through: which is, that the partie which will be afryde of a mortall creature, and would bee loth to offend him, will anger God boldly and without remorse of conscience. And therefore lette vs remember well this lesson that is shewed vs here: that is too witte that when soeuer and as oft as God punisheth the wicked, or executeth any horrible vengeance, it is to the intent that wee should stoope with our heades, that bothe great and small should haue their mouthes shet, and that wee shoule no more presume to come pleade against God, but assure our selues that it shall happen vnto vs as it did vnto those whom we see to perishe after that sort, if wee follow them. And here yee see why it is sayde in the holie Scripture, that God teacheth men rightuousnesse by executing his iudgements. Herby the Prophet Esay sheweth that so long as sinnes abide vnpunished, men do harden, themselues and make a sporte at i:: they thiuke they bee scaped out of the iudges hande: to be shorte there is nother feare nor modestie in them. But so soone as God sets himselfe downe in his iudgement seate, and sheweth examples of his iustice, wee be out of conceyte, and wee conceyue suche a fearfulnessse, as wee sinke downe vnder it, and that serueth too bring vs backe agayne. Lo howe the iudgements which God executeth vpon the wicked ought to serue for our instruction, too the intent that euery of vs yeelde himselfe vnder his hande. And this is it that is sayde likewise in this texte. Truely wee ought not too determine whether Iobs childre were reprobates or no; and it is a more likelyhood that God sente them onely a temporall punishment, too sauе their soules for cuer. For wee haue seene heretofore the concorde that was betwixt them: and the Scripture speaketh not of them as it doth of the sonnes of Elie. On the other side we see that Job made I.Sam. 2.6. soleinne Sacrifyzes when the course of their feasting was come out: and there is no doubt (as it hath bene declared) but they were counsellel too aske forgiuenesse at Gods hand, and doubtlesse they would haue ioyned with their father in so doing. So then wee cannot determinately say of Iobs children, that they were reprobates, and wee knowe that ofteentimes God taketh euen the cheefe of those out of this worlde by violent meanes, whom he hath chosen and ordeyned to saluatō, howbeit that he hadleth them after such a fashion, as the chastisement which he sendeth them turneth to their welfare. Also mennes bodies muste perishe for a time, that their soules may bee saued for euer. Therefore it may be that the like befell to Iobs children. But (as I haue sayde alreadie) wee must not haue an eye to persones here: wee must not onely receyue the doctrine: which is, that as oft as God stretcheth out his arme too punishe the sinnes of the worlde, there is none of vs all but he ought to tremble. And whensoeuer we shall haue misbehauid our selues vnto God, knowing that he chastizeth vs by other mens harmes, and there beholde and after a sorte feele how terrible his wrath is vpon all such as auaunce themselves too resist him. And here yee see why Sainct Paule turning his speach too the faythfull, sayeth: Bee yee not Epb.5. b.6. deceyued by vayne wordes: for by reason of these things is Gods wrath wonte too come vpon the vnbeleeuers. True it is that men flatter themselues by discountenancing of their sinnes, according as we see how these diuelish skoffers and lesters do cloke them at this day, so that now a dayes if a man speake of Lecherie, it shall be made but a tricke of youth. O, it is of nature: and if a man speake of drunkennesse, [answere shall bee made,] God giueth wyne, and will he not haue vs too bee merrie with it? Yee see then after what maner men become brutishe and spewe out their blasphemies against God, and how they seeke nothing else but shifftes to flatter theselues in their owne faults and euill doings. And for this cause Sainct Paule sayeth, My friends lette not men deceyue you wi: h suche Heathenish talke. He sayeth not, for the wrath of God shall come vpon you, you shall bee ouerwhelmed by it: but he sayeth, learne to knowe that which God sheweth, ye haue very fayre mirrours. As oft as God chastizeth the whoremongers, the vnbeleeuers, the disobedient, the stubborne, and al such kind of folke: he meeneth to shewe you that no euill escapeth vnpunished. So then preuent ye his vengeance, and tarie not till all he fall vpon you, but profit your selues by the instructions that he giueth you a farre of. Thus much concerning this sentence, wherein the correction that God sendeth is set afore vs, to the ende we might know that God sendeth all Rebelles to the place of their iniquitie. And true it is that some are to be founde so foolish and mad-braynd, as they could finde in their hartes to mayntayne the cace of the wicked against God. But so soone as God shall lay his hand vpon his creatures, let vs learne to confess that he is righteous, notwithstanding that we know not wherefore he doeth it. And this is according to that we haue declared more at large alreadie, namely that if any notorious sinnes be punished before our eyes, wee must understand that God warneth vs, and setteth them before vs as lively pictures, according as Sainct Paule speaketh in the tenth Chapter of the firste Epistle to the Corinthians: so as if we see a man that is full of blasphemies, and a despicer of God, that wil by no meanes abide nother yoke nor discipline, but is altogether awelesse: if we see a worldling, a lechour, a riotter, or a persone of lewde and loce life: if we see a drunkard: or if we see a naughtie packe that seeketh nothing but to deceyue one and to spoyle another of his goodes: & if God performe and execute [vpon such a one] the vengeance that he declareth in his lawe: let vs assure ourselues that it is a good warrant that wee muste not dally with him, nor surmisse that the things which he hath vttered with his owne mouth are but scarebugges for little babes, seing that the effect of them is matched with them. And if we see not an apparent and visible cause, let vs neuerthelesse vnder-stand that if God vse neuer so great rigour, yet must not we therefore be inquisitiue and say, why doth he so? wee know not, nother must we presume to know, so long as we be in this world. Ye see then what we haue to marke and to beare in minde: that is to witte, that when we see the calamities and afflictions which God sendeth in this world, wee must looke if there be any euident signes, to the ende we may learne to yelde our selues conformable vnto God, and too submit our selues vnto him, yea and that euery of vs may examine himselfe, that he bee not wrapped in the like condemnation. Now let vs come to the second poynt: which is, that if God visit vs in this worlde, and make vs to pine away: although wee be oppressed so mighty that our life shal be more tedious and bitter to vs than a thousand deaths: yet notwithstanding he still giueth vs time of repentance, and if wee returne vnto him out of hande wee shall finde him throughly redie to receiue vs, and that he will make the dwelling place of our righteousness pleasible: yea verily if we come vnto him with prayer, and bring a pure, and rightmeening hart with vs. Beholde a very good and profitable lesson. For thereby men are put in minde to acknowledge the gracious goodnessse that God doth to them and the fauour that he sheweth them in that he suffereth them not to be quite cut away at the first blowe: but lette them alone still in this life. True it is that such a languishing as Job was in, will be far harder and grieuouser than death: and we see also that when Job looketh no further but to his owne state, he could finde in his harte to be hanged (for ye see he hath so spoken:) but in the meane season if wee cast our eye vpon the ende that God ameth at, and vpon the marke that he setteth before vs also: then shall wee finde that all our sorrowes are assuaged. And why? wee shall feele that he hath yet still pitie vpon vs. Put the cace that a man feele here as it were his hell, and that in steade of being comforted, he haue the horrible terror of feeling God to be against him and to be his mortall enimie, and that herevpon he haue as it were a fyre burning in his minde: well, when a poore man feeleth such anguish, and therewithall do in his persone suffer on the oneside slaunder, and on the other side so greate paynes and assaults as shall bee intollerable: true it is that this sayde poore man may at the first brunt wishe and desire death, in somuch that he would require no better than to passe through fire, water, and swoorde: according as wee see how our Lorde Iesus Christe sayeth, that such as are overtaken with this dread of God, would haue the mouaynes to fall vpon them, and that the worlde should bee turned vpside downe to ouerwhelme them. But what for that? If we enter into consideration to say, I perceiue that my God doth here offer me his mercie, and that his meening is that I should drawe neare vnto him: that as oft as we bee scourged at his hand, he calleth vs to him with sweete and amyable voice, incoraging vs to come to him, with assured promise that he wil shewe himselfe gracious and pitifull towards vs: that is a sufficient thing to assuage all our heauinessse. Then seing the cace standeth so, that in our griefes wee haue still some hope left vs: ought we not in such wise to accept the good that God doth vs, as we may feele some ease of the burthen of our miseries, though it bee neuer so excessiue, and that it seeme that our shoulders are no more able too beare it? VVee see now howe profitable this lesson is to vs, when wee haue the witte to make it our owne: that is to wit, that in the ende wee know that God doth still leauie vs a remedie to serue our turne with, so as our diseases shall not be incurable, at leastwise if wee haue recourse vnto him. Herevpon wee muste gather a generall sentence: That is to witte, that God doth still pitie men when he chastizeth them for their sinnes, and that he neuer vseth so great rigour, but that his mercie is continually mingled therewith. And why so? for they be as it were summonings to make vs appeere before him, too the intent that in feeling him to bee our judge, we should flee too his infinite grace and mercie, not doubting but that he will shewe himselfe a father to all such as shall haue their recourse vnto him. And hereby a man may see the vngatefulnesse of the world. For the afflictions are vniuersall, and there is not the man that hath not his portion in them after his rate: wee passe not through this present life, but that God chastizeth vs many wayes: I say, euery of vs seuerally and ali in general: we see how God visiteth vs: And yet in the meane whyle who is he that thinketh vpon his returning vnto God? The number of them is very small and thinne sownen. Then know wee how vnthankfull we bee, that although God call vs to him and be loth that we should perish: yet wee be so stiffe-necked, as we shake off all the warnings that he giueth vs. But this doctrine must also profit vs further to make vs trust in God, that although we be persecuted in this worlde, yet notwithstanding he leaueth vs not here bylowe, without calling of vs continually vnto him. And he will not haue vs to be disappoyneted when we shall be come to that poynt, so our comming thither be to haue al our recourse vnto him. So then let vs hardly trust that our God will be mercifull to vs, and lette vs thanke him that he hath not taken vs out of this present lyfe at the first blowe, but hath giuen vs lesure to berinke vs of our sinnes that we may be sorie for them and returne vnto him. But now let vs come too the comfort that is set downe here. If thou come to him betymes, and seeke him with prayer, if thou be right and pure: he will awake to thee. This is added purposely because men continue stubborne, and although God prouoke them to returne into the way of saluation, yet they passe not for it. Lo why it is purposely sayde that wee muste not kicke so against the

Psal. 32. c. 2. pricke, as wee shoulde play the restie iades or become blockishe. To bee shorte wee must haue the forwardnesse which God commaundeth, according as it is sayde that wee must come to him betymes: that is to say we must make no delay by driving off the time, as wee see these vnthrifites doo, which mocke at God. O (say they) there needs but one good sighe. As who should say they had their lyfe in their sleeue, and that they were warranted a certayne time too liue in the worlde, and moreouer, as though repentance were in mans power and that he could turne againe at his owne pleasure when he listereth, and that the same were not the speciaill gifte of God. But [in deede] it is so holie and precious a thing, as it behoueth vs not too let it go so good cheape. Then let vs consider that the worlde goes alwayes backe, and would play the euill detters, who when they haue gotten any long daye of payment, sleepe without care till the terme bee come. Euen so (I say) play the worldlings: when God lengtheneth their liues, wayting that they shoulde repent: they will neuer thinke vpon it till the 20 hourre come that they perishe with shame. To the ende then that wee may not doo so: it is sayde that wee must returne vnto God betimes. To be short, here are three things whiche wee muste marke well. One is, that so soone as God visiteth vs, wee muste returne to him out of hande, and not tarry from too day till too morowe. Marke this for one speciaill poynt. The seconde is, that wee muste come too him with prayer, condemning our selues in our offences, that wee may obtayne forgiuenesse and mercie at his hande. The third is, that our 30 prayers muste not bee made in hypocrisie, but that wee must bring a pure and rightmeening harte. Thus ye see the three things that are propounded too vs here. True it is that wee cannot dispatche them all three as nowe: howbeit too the intent we may haue an abridgement of the whole doctrine that I haue declared, it behoueth vs too haue these sayde three poynts well imprinted in our mindes. To be short, let vs learne to humble our selues vnder the mightie hande of God, as the Apostle exhorteth vs. And herepon lete vs consider that he is righteous, yea euen in suche forte, as when he shall execute the roughest of his iudgements vpon vs, wee may not cease to confess that he doeth all things rightfully and vnpartially, so as wee may haue our mouth shet, and not alledge any thing against him. And not onely let vs acknowledge this righteousnesse or justice too be in God: but also [let vs so doo it] as wee may take profite by it: that is too wittre, when he punisheth the rebelles, and the despizers of his Maiestie, and suche as are vtterly paste mendment: Lette vs assure our selues that he calleth vs home vnto him. Therefore it behoueth vs not too tarie till he smyle vpon vs. But lette vs take this for our learning and let it teache vs righteousness, according to that which I haue alledged out of the Prophet Esay. And specially when it shall please God to stretch out his hande vpon vs and too smyte vs, let vs not be wearie of his correction, as the Apostle sayeth in the Epistle to the Hebrews. But aboue all sith wee know that God calleth vs, 5. lette vs come vnto him yea euen bytimes, and therewithall let vs bring vnto him a pure and rightmeening hart, beseeching him to forgiue all our faultes: and after the Psal. 51. a. 4. example of Dauid, let vs desire him too clenze vs from all our spottes, according as it behoueth vs too be washed by him that we may present our selues before his face in such purenesse as he commaundeth.

And nowe lette vs fall downe before the Maiestie of our good God, with acknowledgement of the innumerable offences which wee ceasse not to commit dayly against him, praying him too make vs feele them better than wee haue done, that wee may bee sorie for them, and that in returning vnto him, we may giue him the glorie that belongeth too him, so as wee may bee confirmed more and more in his holie grace, and in the obedience of his law. And so let vs say: Almighty God, &c.

The .xxxij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the eighth Chapter.

This Sermon contayneth the rest of the exposition of the fifth and sixth verses, and then as foloweth.

7. Although thy beginning vvere small, thy last state shall bee greatly increased.
8. Inquire (I pray thee) of the former age, and dispose thy selfe too bee taught of the fathers.
9. For vvee are but of yesterday, vvec bee ignorant, because our dayes are but a shadowe vpon earth.
10. Shall not they teach thee playnly, and vtter vvordes out of their hart?
11. VVill a rush grovve but in moyste grounde? or can the grasse of a marish grovve vwith out vvater?
12. Although it bee in his freshnesse and vncutdovvne: yet shall it vvither before any other hearbe.
13. Euen so is it vvith all such as forget God, and the hope of the hypocrite shall perish.

Irst wee haue to gather the summe of that whiche hath bene expounded alreadie: whiche is, that when wee haue done amisse, and God chastizeth vs therefore: he will alwayes bee ready to shewe vs mercie, if wee call vnto him. And it is expressly sayde, that wee muste make haste too come too him, least wee abuse his pacience, as wee see these mockers doo. And afterwarde there is added that wee must sue vnto him with a right meening and in purenesse. This Suing importeth that we must confess our sinnes: and the woerde purenesse betokeneth that it muste bee done vnfaynedly. Now then we see, that by this promise God allureth vs to himselfe, and is desirous too drawe vs to him, as if he should say, will men needs perish wilfully when as I am ready to receyue them to mercie, notwithstanding that they bee in the high brode way to damnacion? Therfore let vs marke well that sith God openeth the gate so vnto vs, we be double worthie of damnation, if we come not vnto him. VVee know well inough that despaire is the cause of the hardening of the molt parte of such as giue themselues too vnthriftnesse, and makes them too play double or quit (as men say:) but when as

God sheweth vs that his mercie shall alwayes be readie for vs, ought not that to moue vs? Then lette vs marke well the promise that is contayned here, and therewithal make haft, seing it is Gods will that we should not drue of, nor delay our coming vnto him. VVhen God prouoketh vs to thinke vpon our sinnes, let vs not delay our repentence till to morrow. And aboue al, when this voice of God (Come) soundeth from heauie: let vs not harden our harts, as it is sayd in the Psalme: but rather let vs do as is sayd in the Prophet Esay, Seeke the Lord while he may be found, cal vpon him whyle he is neere you, and let the wicked man leaue his owne wayes. For as it is sayd againe in another text, Behold [now is] the fit time, these are the dayes of sauing, when God exhorteth vs to repentance. If we forslow: the occasion will slip away, and it shal abash vs when the gate shal be shet against vs. Ye see then how it behoueth vs to put this Hasting in vre. And lette vs marke well that in our coming vnto God, we shall gayne nothing by bringing our excuses. For if we haue but one woerde to lay for our selues, God (as we shall see hereafter) shal haue a hundred, yea a thousand articles against vs to cōdemne vs. Then let vs come to God with prayer, as it is sayd here that we must sue vnto him. And this importeth a playne and pure confessing of our sinnes: that is to say, that with our cōfession (when we shall haue sayd I haue sinned,) there muste also follow repentence. For we shall see many that will never sticke to say that God hath done rightly in punishing them, and that their faults are as grieuous and grosse as any mens: but yet they will fall to their old byasse againe strayt wayes. If God holde their nozes to the gryndstone by some sicknesse or by some other crosse: then they make fayre promises. But assoone as Gods hande is withdrawn from them: they shewe playnly how there was nothing but dissimulation in them. Therefore whereas wee are here commaunded to confesse our faults: let vs marke well, that wee must haue the sayd purenesse and vprightnesse, which is to cōdemne the euill, in reconeyling our selues vnto God. And here is shewed the fruite [that insueth] when wee shall haue obtained grace: which is, that God will make the dwelling place of our rightuousnesse too prosper: as if Baldad shoulde say, that when God is at one with men & receyueth them to mercie, he leaueth them not there: but maketh them to feele the effectualnesse of his mercy and loue. God pardoneth not after the maner of such as protest that they forgiue the faultes that men haue committed against them, and yet in the meane whyle (if they be able to reuendge) sticke not to cracke their credite, when they spye occasions: saying, Hath such a one too doo with mee? and he shall finde that he hath done mee displeasure. Here yee see an euill maner of forgiuing. God deales not so. But when he telleth vs that our sinnes are forgiuen: immediatly he addeth the effect of his forgiuing, by making vs too feele his goodnesse in blissing and prospering vs. And here is expresse mention made of the habitation of our rightuousnesse, for two causes. The first is that Gods grace may be the better vttered, so as it shall shewe it selfe not onely towards our persones, but also towards all our house. If God hauing pitie of a man, doo cause him to feele it bothe in bodie and minde: it is very much alreadie. But if God extende his goodnesse yet further, so as a man is blissted in his children, in his catell, and in ali his household: doo yee not perceyue yet a larger prooef of his goodnesse? Yee see then howe it is sayd here, that God maketh that mannes dwelling to prosper, which returneth speedely vnto him. And this dwelling is called the tent of Rightuousnesse, to the intent to put vs continually in remembrance, that when we come vnto God, it muste be with the sayd rightmeening and purenesse whereof mention hath bene made erewhyle. And on the cōtrarie part, when we see that God persecuteth vs: let vs know, that we haue the wood within vs to kindle the fire withall, and that we (I say) haue heaped vp the matter of it within vs by our sinnes. And why so? For if rightuousnesse were dwelling in our houses (that is to say, if bothe wee and our houses were well ordered:) it is certayne that Gods grace would preuent vs, so as wee should feele nothing but all goodnesse and rest. Therefore if God scourge vs and sende vs afflictions: we must blame our sinnes for it. Thus ye see in effect, what wee haue to marke here. And moreouer, that which he addeth, serueth yet further to confirme this present matter: that is to witte, That if our beginnings bee small, God will increase them more and more. This is added for the nonce, that men should not measure Gods grace by that which they perceyue. For here ye see what the cause is that maketh vs faintharted, and to haue a slender hope: namely because wee haue an eye to the worldly meanes, and therepon make our conclusion what shall become of vs.

Beholde, if a thing bee in suche state or suche: such a thing or such a thing shal be the meane of it, & we consider not that it is easie for him to helpe vs, we are of opinion that the thing is vnpossible. Now then wee see how the holie Ghost ment to correct the froward iudgement that is in vs, in that we imagine of Gods grace after our owne capacitiē, and by that which we are able to see. Contrarywise it is sayd, that God hath wōderfull meanes & incōprehensible to vs, to augment that which seemeth to be very small: and notwithstanding that wee were as good as at deathes doore, so as it might seeme we should never bee plucked out of our miseries: yet shall God well finde some good way out of them. This cannot be perceyued at the first: his intent is also too bring vs low, too the ende wee may learne too flee too him for resuge. For what would become of vs, if that were not? How shoulde our fayth bee exercyzed? If wee make our reckening too say that God will worke according too that which wee conceyue by the inferiour causes of this worlde: wherein shall Gods power be knownen? wherein shoulde his sayde grace bee so wonderfull, as to make vs amazed at it? As in deede it is sayde in the Psalme, that when God guydeth his in sauing them, it is as it were in a dreame: and the matter is so straunge, that euerie man is astonied when he beholdeth that which was not looked for. So then lette vs marke well, that when our sinnes shall haue sente vs downe to the bottomlesse pitte, so as wee may thinke our selues vterly shet vp in despaire: wee must fight against our owne vnderstanding, and conclude that God can well skil to increase the things that are small. For (as the Scripture sayeth,) it is Rom. 4.c.18 his office and peculiar propertie to call that which is not, as though it were, to the ende too giue vs a newe being which wee haue not. Lo what wee haue to gather of this streyne. Now to giue authoritie to his talke, Baldad sayeth, Aske the yeeres of olde tyme, and dispose thy selfe too inquyre, of the fathers. VVhereby he doeth vs too vnderstande, that the thing which he hath spoken, is knowne to be true by al experiance of long time. Inquire (sayeth he) not onely of them that liue at this day: but of those that are departed long ago. Search from age too age, and thou shalt finde, that God never reiecteth such as come vnto him: & that their expectatiō was never superfluous nor vnaulable, verely if they sought him without dissimulation. And afterward he addeth, VWee are but of yesterday, we are vnskilfull, for our dayes are but a shadow.

But the fathers will answer thee, and speake in the strength of their heart, that is too say, in such wise as thou shalt haue a full resolution, and a stedfast grounde and reason which shall not come from the tip of the young, but from a wel foreconsidered vnderstanding. VVhen Baldad speaketh here of the fathers: no doubt but he meneth the former experience of all times, as we haue touched alreadie: and he speaketh not only of the old men that liued at that time, but also of such as were alreadie dead. A man will perchaunce demand how [ it should be done? ] was it possible for Job too go to bee instructed at their handes? The answe is easie: namely, that it is not ment of the men, but of the thinges that had beene done in the time of them, accordingly as their stories doo witness vntoo vs. Beholde, Baldad ment to say thus: I bring thee not an vnknowthe doctrine, for when thou shalt haue made a long backsearch, euen from the creation of the worlde, thou shal find that God hath awlays wrought after the same maner: that is to wit, that so soone as men haue returned from their iniquities, God hath reached them his hande, and the gate of saluation hath bene opened vntoo them: this (sayth he) shal thou vnderstande. Also this instruction is verie profitable for vs: namely, that we must not shette our eyes agaynst that which God sheweth vs, and hath shewed vs in all times of the worlde: but rather we must consider the things that haue bene done in former times, that wee may applie them too our owne vse. True it is that as men give themselues to vanitie, they cannot gather their wittes, vnto them, to applie them to such a studie, except God compell them therenvnto. And 30 heere ye see the caufe why Dauid protesteth, that when he was afflicted, hee called too remembrance the former yeares of olde time, and bethought himself of them. And therefore we must lay this for a grounde: namely, that we bethinke vs well of Gods workes, and not onely of those which we haue scene in our owne time, but also of that which hath bene reported to vs of olde. It hath awlays bene gods wil, that there should be stories to the ende that the remembrance of things might be preserued by that meanes. And notwithstanding that men take pleasure in reading of stories: yet is it but a vaine sporting of themselues, because they applie not the matters of all former tymes too their instruction, which are a true schoole to teach vs to rule our life. For there we beholde Gods judgements: there we beholde howe hee hath assisted such as fled to him for succour: and specially how he hath confirmed his gracious goodnesse, insomuch that although all men were faythlesse, yet hee reserved some men to the knowledge of his truth, howbeit that the full time was not yet then come. To be short, if our eies were cleare & cleane, and not so dimmed as they be: we should see that Gods workes are a deepe sea and bottomlesse pit of wisdome. Then if we minde to bee well setled in good doctrine: let vs learne, not only to looke a foote or twain before our nozes (as men say:) but also to stretch out our wits to that which happened before we were borne. And aboue all things, we ought to bee moued so to do, forasmuch as we se it hath pleased God, that there should be as it were a glasse, wherein wee might beholde, after what maner he hath in all times preserued and mainteyned his Church since the worlde was made, by strengthening the good men to fight agaynst all assaults: and finally how he hath chastized his owne children, yea and double corrected them when they became hard herted: insomuch that when he hath admonished them by his prophets, & they haue continued in stubbornesse: they haue bene faine to feele a greater and more excessiue rigor. Insomuch then as we see these things, and that God hath so provided by.

his prouidence in this behalf, that the thing which might haue bene buried, is now laid afore vs for our insuertio: I pray you ought not we to exercise our selues thurh the more earnestly? Then let vs beare in mind, how it is said here, that we must aske of them that haue liued afore vs: howbeit not of their persons, for we haue no access to the dead, neither is it lawfull for vs to seke to them for counseil: God hath not ordeyned them to be prophets, further forth than by the seruice which they did in their owne time. S.Peter, S.Paule and the rest of the Apostles, & the Prophets speake vnto vs at this day: but that is by theyr writings which are immortall. As for their persons, God hath withdrawne them from our companie. Yet must we aske of the time wherein they liued, and we must also follow the records which they haue yeeded of gods works, and thereby learne to be stablished in his feare. But the reason that must moue vs most of all herevnto, is added when Baldad sayth, That we be but of yesterday, and are ignorant, because our life is but a shadow. True it is that this present text may be expounded twoo wayes. There are which think that Baldad ment to say, O I know thou wilt not esteeme that which I can bring of mine owne: thou wilt say I am not so old, that me shuld give ear to me as to a wise man. VWell, put the case that my saying be nougth worth, because my person is not agreeable therenvnto: yet shalt thou finde, that the olde men will tell thee as much. And I set downe this interpretation, because it may go for good. Howbeit if all things be neerely looked to, it will appeere that the plaine meening of this text is, That Baldads mouing of Job to inquire of the time past, was bycause that if we looke no further than before vs, it shall be to small purpose. True it is that the verie same which God sheweth vs from day to day, is ynoch for our instruction: so as there shall neede no other processe too make vs vncexcusable, than that which we shall haue perceyued in one yea or in twoo, yea or euen in one day. God sheweth vs so many things, as there remaynes no more excuse for vs, neither can we alledge, I never wist of this, God never gaue me knowledge of this. I say we see 40 yonough before our eyes for our instruction. But such is our slothfulnesse, as God had need to chawe our morsels to vs beforehand, and yet shall we haue much adoo to swallowe them downe when they bee so chawed, as the proverbe sayeth. Lo heere wherefore hee giueth vs knowledge of the tyme past. As for example, If wee dispise all that is come to passe before our birth, and say, O I shal be wise ynoch by considering the things that we see of our owne life: was it Gods wi. that the presidents which hea giueth vs of the time so far past, should be to no purpose? 50 VVhen the scripture tellet vs, that euer since the creating of the world, God hath gouerned me, chastized them for their offences, pitied the, & with his goodnesse continually surmountid the naughtinesse of those that had don amisse: and that aboue al things he had defended those that were his, & succored the in their afflictions: seeing that God fro age to age discouereth things so greatly for our behoofe: wil we haue eueriwhit of it despised, & thrust vnder foot? do ye not see to vilaynous an vnthankfulnessse, when we thrust farre from vs, the thing that is more tha profitable for vs? Let vs mark then that this is the very thing wherunto he that speaketh (namely Baldad) hath pretended to bring Job. And therfore shall it greeue vs to inquire of the things that are for our welfare? Let vs consider a little of our owne age. VVhat are wee? VWe are of yesterday. VWhen men haue cast vp their account throughly: they are but as snayles, which vanish away out of hande. True it is that a man may liue fiftie or threescore yeaeres, but yet must we come backe to that which is sayd in the song of Moyses,

Psa. 90.4. Moyes, namely that before God, a thousand yeeres are but as one day, and therefore that a mans lyfe is but as a dreame that is past alreadie. If wee considered well the shortnesse of our lyfe, how it glideth away as a shadow: it is certayne that wee would be so much the more diligent to inquire after things past. And why? For we are ignorant if we looke no further than to the sayde shortnesse of life. But Gods will is that the things which haue bene done before we were borne, shoulde be as it were present with vs by stories, and by that which is left vs in them. Ye see then how gracious God hath shewed himselfe towards vs, in that he hath gathered all times together, and brought to passe, that a man whiche liueth but fiftie yeeres in this worlde, may bee able to comprehend fife thousande yeeres that were before him, and to dispose them, put them in order, and knowe them. Yee see howe long time slipped away afore the fludde. Very well: howe went things then? how hath God wrought since the fludde? when it liked him too prepare himselfe a Churche, after what maner did he gouerne it? Howe did the faithfull behauie themselves which were persecuted for witnesing the truthe? Afterward, when faulkes were crepte in, howe did God redresse them? Againe, howe did the Churche continue in hir state, after it was set a flote? I say wee may see all these things as it were before our eyes, and yet notwithstanding there are aboue fife thousande yeeres passed. It is true. But (as I haue sayde) it is a grace of God w<sup>t</sup> ike cannot be pryzed sufficiently. And surely i<sup>t</sup> is ought to spurre vs well forward, not onely to looke before our feete: but also to caste our eyes further of, knowing that God hath set vs as vpon a stage, where he will haue vs to discouer the time, not onely of an hundred yecres or more, but also euer since the beginning of the world. Now wee see what was Baldads intent, and also in what wise wee ought to apply this sentence to our owne vse: that is to wit, that seing we are but of yesterday, and that our life is but a shadowe, (that is to say, that wee abide not so long time in this worlde, that the things which wee see here may suffyze vs:) it is good to looke further of, accordingly as God giueth vs meanes to inquire of the time past. And so (in effect) we be warned, to consider well all that euer God sheweth vs of his workes past, and not to wey them as things that belong not to vs, but as things that are brought to our remembrance, to teache vs. So then, let vs apply all the stories of former times to our instruction, that they may leade vs to put our whole trust in God, to call vpon him in our necessities, and to feare him and honour him as requireth. Lo what we haue to beare away in this streyne. Now it followeth that as Rushes grow not but in moist places, and also that as the grasse in moorish grounds cannot ikerish it selfe without water: in so muche that when such herbes florish, they wither away of themselves without cutting vp: Euen so the hope of the hypocrites shall perish, and likewise the hope of all such as forget God. This is cleane contrarie to that which we saw afore. This sentence was alleaged alreadie at the beginning of the Chapter. But Baldad had added, that God will bee mercyfull to suche as returne too him, notwithstanding that they had runne royst for a time. And now he returneth to that which he sayde afore: namely that God will roote out the hypocrites and wicked doers. He vseth a very fitte similitude, saying: Can the weedes of marris-gounds (as rushes and suche other like hearbes) growe but in a moist grounde? There are many hearbes that will grow well inough without water vpon mountaynes, yea euen where there shall not bee a whit of earth, but bare rockes, and yet neuerthelesse wee shall see some hearbes to growe there: but they haue that propertie by nature. The rushe and such other hearbes cannot grow but in a marris. For their nourishment is of water: the grounde must bee always moyste, or else will this geere wither by and by. Then like as a rushe or other moorish hearbe, cannot growe but in a moist place: euen so the man that hath not his sap of God, muste needes perishe with all his fayre shewes, and quite wither away. This similitude is not set downe in this texte onely: but it is also very rife in the reste of the holy Scripture, as wee knowe. It is sayde in the firste Psalme, That the man Psalm. 1.4.3. which setteth himselfe wholly too the minding of Gods lawe, is like a tree planted by a riuers side: and that because his roote is continually soaked, the tree doth never wither nor die away, but continueth still in his freshnesse. And why? It is too shewe that God never suffreth good menne too perishe. For his grace floweth alwayes vpon them, too maynteyne them too the ende, yea and too maynteyne them without ende. For we bee wated, not onely too be maynteyned here for a certaine time: but for too come too euerlasting life. Yee see then that suche as ycelde themselves wholly vnto God, are as a tree planted by a riuerside, so as they flourishe for euer. But this is yet better expressed in the seventeenth Jeremy. 17. of Jeremie: bycause the Prophet compryzeth bothe the partes there. Cursed (sayeth he) is the man that trusteth in man, and setteth fleshe too bee his hope or strength. He shall bee as grasse or as the heatli that shooteth vp a little among the sande in the wildernes. VVell, it is true that there shall bee some freshnesse in it, howbeit the same shall bee scorched incontinent by meanes of heate, in so muche that suche a shrubbe shall bee burnt vp by and by of the Sunne. Euen so standeth the cace with all suche as are frische and greene, and put not their truste in God, but eyther trust in themselves, or els haue their eyes vpon creatures. But happie is the man that trusteth in God: for what soeuer heate of the Sunne he haue, though he seeme too bee burste vp: yet shall he bee so wated, and God will give him suche nouishement, as he shall not decay. And although that the Prophete Jeremis, by setting downe these two comparasons too give light the one to the other, doo sufficiently exprefse that whiche is sayde here: yet notwithstanding there is yet more in this texte. For here Baldad hath chozen a kinde of hearbe that cannot bee nourished without water. In the Psalme it is sayde, that the Psalm. 129. wicked shall bee like the grasse that groweth vpon the house toppe. VVe see that some weedes growe well vpon house toppes: But the good hearbes shall bee tramped vnder foote. Men will walke vpon a medowground: neuerthelesse when the time of the yeere commeth, yee see that the hearbes of the meddowes doo growe and florish. And althoough the medowe be mownen, yet doeth the grasse spring, and become freshe againe. But what commeth of the weedes vpon a house toppe? can they stande a man in any steade? No: but it is sayde in the sayde texte, that a man may well fill his armes full of them, but hee shall finde no foyzon, he shall finde no fruite in them. And verely when a man sees the house toppe ouergrownen with weedes, hee sayeth not, God blissteth these hearbes: but contrarywise it were a good turne that they were plucked vp, and the Sunne also burneth them vp before they bee ripe, so as they come not too any perfection. Yee see then that although the wicked be exalted, and bee had in more estimation than those that are blissted of God: yet neuerthelesse they dry away after such a sorte, as they bring forth no frute: how fayre shew socuer they make, there is no substantialnesse in

in them. And thus ye see what is ment heere by speaking of rushes and moorish weedes. To be shorte, let vs note, that if we will profite well, we must draw our sap from God, and we must bee neere vnto him, and he must not ceasse tod water vs, but must bee as continuall water too quicken vs and to giue vs lustinesse, without whiche it is impossible that wee shoulde indure one minute of an houre. Ye see in effect what is conteyned here. Nowe, were we throughly settled in beleefe of this doctrine: it is certayne that wee shoulde seeke God with another manner of affection than we do. But what? Euery man holdes him selfe too that whiche he hathe, and yet wee consider not from whence the good is giuen vs. By meanes wherof euerie man feedeth him selfe with winde as it is spokē in the prophet Osee: that is to say, men beguile them selues wittingly and willinglye. It seemeth to them that they be rich and want nothing: and yet all is but wind, that is to say, nothing but foolish ouerweening. As to outward appearance we may well be freshe and flourish, and men may commende that which is in vs: but when all comēs to all, it is starke nothing. Neuerthelesse we be so dazled [in our owne conceit,] that euery of vs weeneth him selfe too bee better than God, when there is any goodly shewe in vs, so as wee neede none other folks too deceiue vs: for euery of vs beguileth him selfe through his owne fond folies. But by the way let vs marke well, how God plucketh vs backe too him selfe, shewing vs how we be too much blinded in trusting to our selues, or to that which is not. Let vs 30 marke well then that God procureth our welfare by this meanes when he saith, I am the fountaine of liuelie water, I am the true riuier, it standeth you on hand to be watred continually with my grace, or else there wyll be nothing but drinessse in you: and although ye loke green yet is it nothing, ye must wither away. And this is it that Baldad meeneth heere. Although (saith he) that men cut not vp those herbes, yet will they drie away if they haue no moysture. Yea it shall vtterly amaze men to see howe they shall be quite withered, euen in the middes of their greatest pride. Euen so is it with the hope of hypocrites. Heereby we be done to vnderstand, that although men put not to their hand, God will consume vs by a secrete and vnknowne working, so as we must be faine to come to naught, except it so be that we haue trusted in hym, and haue taken deepe and liuelie roote in him. True it is that somtimes God rooteth vp the wicked in punishing them by mans hand: yea and hee matcheth them one against another in such sort, as they deface and destroy them selues. And oftentimes we see with our eyes, that God vndermineth those that haue presumed so muche, and taken vpon them so maruellously. VVe see (I saye) that God consumeth them, no man knowes how: and they melt away as snow against the sunne. Men thinke it strange [saying] howe is it possible that this shoulde come to passe? how happeneth that this man is in suche plighe? But we consider not of what force Gods curse is. Then let vs marke well, that God without seruing of histurne by men, can make, not only men to fade away, but also their greare castles with them, and whatsoeuer other possessions, Lordships and riches they haue. All must needs perish when God bloweth vpon them, according to that which is precisely expressed heere, namelye that although such weedes be not cut vp, yet they shall not fayle too wither, bycause they haue not moysture to ripen them withall.

But we must also consider well how it is said, that the hope of hypocrites shall perissh. And this bringeth vs agayne to that which I haue touched already: that is too witte, that suche as haue nothing else but smoke and vntruth in them, ceasse not to be freshe and greene, yea to theyr owne seeming, and after the opinion of men. And so yee see heere what it is that deceiueth vs. For we be naked of all goodnesse, and yet we be so brutish, as we weene our selues to be very rich, and therefore God is nobody with vs. Lo why Baldad hathe spoken heere precisely of the hope of hypocrites: as if he had said, True it is that hypocrites will make faire showes, and not onely they will like well of them selues for this goodly outward countenance of vertue: but also it seemeth that God dandleth them in his lappe, and fauoreth them in all poyntes. But yet shall they wither and drie away, so as it shall be a wonder to see how they be vndermined and vtterly ouerthrowne. So then let vs not wilfully beguile our selues: that is to say, although we haue some worldly prosperitie for a time: yet let vs not sleepe vpon it, nother let vs be tied to the riches and pleasures of this world, which hinder vs in looking vnto God: but let vs rest our selues wholly vpon him, according as he is the welspring of all our welfare and prosperitie. Yee see the what is imported in this word Hope, whereof mention is made in this place. Finally we haue also to marke, that Baldad describeth the hypocrites, saying that they haue forgotten God. Yea doubtlesse. For although hypocrites prate neuer so much of God: yet for all that, they haue quite forgotten him. But the true remembraunce of God is, to feele that all our welfare lieth in him, that we must not seeke for saluation otherwher than at him alone, and that without his goodnesse and mercy wee muste needs go to destruction. Ye see then what is meant by forgetting God: namely, when men haue a selfeliking of their owne vertues, insomuch as they thinke the selues able to aduaunce and maintaine them selues, and in the meane while come not to God to seeke remedie of their miseries at his hand, whereas we ought to haue recourse vnto him, not only for one time, but as often as we shall haue neede of helpe. Then do we not forget God, when we acknowledge that we must receiue al goodnes at his hand, bycause we be vtterlie voide of it as in respect of our selues. But they that trust in their owne vertues, they that imagine to purchace estimation by their owne policie, they that prelume vpon them selues in what wise soeuer it be: those are the men that forget God. And why so: for they haue pluckt his office from hym, and vsurped it to themselues. Also, do not they forget God, whiche are giuen too their wicked affections and fleshly lusts: VVe see that such as liue at their owne ease cannot be tamed by any manner of meanes: there is no talking with them of making them to walke in the feare of God. As for him that hath this worlds goodes, if a man tell him he must humble himselfe: he shall never bring it about. And why? His riches haue made him hornes too dosse with against God. A whorehunter that is plunged in his villanie, if a man go about too drawe hym backe by counsell and correction, amendeth not, but rather appayreth. Then all suchie as are so caried awaie by their owne affections, are as wilde beastes, and calē them selues wilfullie into destruction, and a man cannot bring them backe agayne to the righte waye. And why? They haue forgotten G O D, and consider not, that to walke aright, it behoueth vs to haue God continually before our eyes.

And in very deede heere ye see the title whiche the holy scripture giueth too the faithfull, namely that lyke as it islaide that the hypocrites forget God: so on the contrarie parte when God intēdeth to marke out those that are his, and too shewe whiche is the chiese poynte that he requireth at their hand: it is said, beholde, such a one is as it were in Gods presence: he walketh as before God. So then let vs learne too exercise our selues heerein, and to acknowledge Gods benefites throughly, to the end we may thanke him, and call vpon him too succoure vs in our necessities: assuring oure selues, that if we come to beg of him, he will so moysten vs with his grace, that although we feele greate heates, (that is too say, although wee haue sore afflictions in this worlde) yet shall we never drie away. And why? Because that 10 when we haue once taken sure rooting in God, he wil not suffer vs to quayle, but will maintaine vs continually, vntill he haue taken vs vp to him selfe to make vs partakers of the heauenly life: yea and he will water vs with his grace in this present world, and make vs feele the same so farforth as shall be needfull for vs.

Now let vs fall flat before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of oure faultes, praying him not too looke vpon our offences, to punish them as they deserue: but that wee maye learne too be our owne iudges in condeming our selues, and that we may come vnto hym, as to the phisition of all oure diseases, and that hee will so heale vs of them, that beeing at one wyth hym, wee may walke in all vprightnesse: that by that meanes we maye bee partakers of that which he hath promised to his faythfull ones: and that in thyd world wee enjoying the recorde that hee gyueth vs of his fatherlye loue, maye growe more and more in the affection whiche hee gyueth vs too loue and honoure hym, vntill such tyme as hee haue brought vs into the glory that he tarrieth for vs in heauen, and which we posse alreadie by hope. That it may please him to graunte this grace, not only vnto vs, but also vnto all people and nations of the earth. &c.

The xxxij. Sermon, which is the third vpon the eight Chapter.

13. Such are the vvayes of the hypocrite, and of al those that forget God.
14. Their hope is cut off, their expectation is a spiders vweb.
15. He shall leane vpon his house, and it shall not hold: he vwould hold hym by it, and it shal not stand.
16. If a tree be planted in the sunne, his braunches vvill spread ouer the garden.
17. It shall reach about the fountaine, and it shall spread out it selfe to the house of stone.
18. It is plucked vp from his place, so as a man may say to it, I knowv thee not.
19. His ioy shall be to be planted agayne in another place.
20. Euen so God vvill not cast avvay the sound man, nother vvill hee reache his hande too the vvicked.
21. Vntill he haue filled thy mouth vvith laughter, and thy lippes vvith gladnesse.
22. That thine enimies be confounded, and the dwelling place of the vvicked shall not stand.

Hauing declared heretofore what is ment by forgetting God: which thing it standeth vs in hande too marke well. For vnder that worde is comprised mens hipocrise, that is to say their vanitie. VVill wee then haue such a holynesse as shal be acceptable and allowed afore God? Let vs looke that we walke as before him, euen as though hee were present with vs: and in all our wayes let vs assure our selues that we are in his custodie, and that it belongeth vnto hym to guide vs and to order vs. Therefore when wee haue such a remembraunce of God: we shall no more be given to suche manner of vanitie, as the holy Ghost tearmeth heere by the name of hypocrisie. And too expresse this the better, he saith: that the trust of such is like the cobweb which the spiders weave. I know that the spider weaves a web, but there is no strength in it. Euen so is it with them that build vpon vayne hopes. They beare them selues in hande, that it shoulde continue to the [worldes]ende: but God auengeth him selfe of suche presumption.

Heere we see cleerely what it is to forget G O D. If wee considered well howe God reserueth too himselfe the honoure of maintaining vs and of blissing vs al our life long: it is certayne that we should not be so foolish nor so forte ouerseene, as to beare our selues in hand with this or that. For we know that mens abusing of the selues with vaine hopes, commeth of nothing else, but bycause they yeld not God the honoure which he requireth, and which is also due vnto him of right. Let vs marke well then, that there is but one onely meane and remedie to drawe vs from all our vanities, and to make to ouerthrowe all that we laboure to builde vp : we must rest whollie vpon his goodnesse , power , and grace . And then shall we haue no spiders webbes, but an abiding stedfastnesse . On the contrarie parte, if we glorifye not God as becommeth vs: it is certaine that the thinges which we see with our eyes to fall vpon the hypocrites, may well be all fultfilled in vs , forasmuch as we profite not our selues by such examples . But now let vs come to the similitude that is added heere . Mention hath bin made heretofore of a rush that is in a drie place . VV<sub>10</sub>e knowe that the nature of it is too growe in a moorishe ground . Then if a rush, or such other like herbes growe in a drie and moysturelesse place : it must needes be seared vp before his time . And rhough no man put hand to it too plucke it vp , nor eyther cut it vp or mowe it : yet must it go to destruction . But contrariwise it is said, that the tree which hath taken deepe and liuelie roote, and is planted by a fountayne : shall spred out his braunches and boughes, yea euen too a house, or else it shall bee as strong as a house of stone . Agayne ye see some tree that is well planted, and yet notwithstanding the master of the garden will take it vp, not of purpose to destroy it altogether, for the tree is good of it selfe, and well rooted : but bycause it is not in conuenient place , and therefore the master takes it vp to plant it agayne elsewhere . Now if a man set it in a larger place, where it shall haue no impeachment, and where it may finde good batling and moysture: ought the tree to complaine of it ? Is the state of it impaired ? No : but it is rather a cheering of it . Not that trees haue any vnderstanding to be glad of it: but because the cace is heere, to shewe that the tree is not appayred at all, when it is so remoued from one place too another . But this similitude must bee applied too those whome God plucketh not vp for a doo . He taketh them vp for a time, but he preserueth their roote, to the intent that being new planted agayne, they may spring a newe and bring foorth frute . This is done dayly at such times as God chastizeth vs, yea euen with such roughnesse, as it may well seeme at the first, that he will vterlie ouerwhelme vs, so as there is no more hope for vs: but anone after, he giueth vs the grace to returne vnto him . This is as if a rich man that hath greate possessions, shold dig vp a tree in his garden, and set it in a field where it might burnish better . The Sunne cherishest it, and the ground where it is planted is fitter for it to take deeper roote, so as the tree waxeth big, and is able too gather greater strength . After the same sort worketh God with those that are hys . And therefore if wee bee scourged by hys hand, yea euen so hardlie, as it seemeth to be as it were a kind of death : yet must we not be quite out of hart for it, bycause wee knowe that God can well set vs in good state againe, so as we shall flourish, and he will set vs in prosperitie as before . Ye see what is declared heere in effect . And for a conclusion Baldad addeth, That God wil not take a wicked man by the hand to fauoure him, nor forsake the good menne, but will rather fill their mouthes with laughter. True it is that heere he speaketh of Iob . And in his person he meenith to do vs to witte, that all such as returne vnto God, shall finde him gracious and fauorable towarde them . In fine he saith, The tent of the wicked shall not be able to stand: but God will put all good mens enimies to shame. And he will not only shewe him selfe fauorable too their persons : but if they bee troubled or greeued, hee will put himselfe betwixte them, and shewe that he hath them vnder his defence and protection .

And heere we see a sentence that is well worthie too be noted: that is too witte, that we be like trees that are taken vp out of some one place to be planted agayne in another . I speake of the children of God . For the wicked may well bee taken vp by the rootes also : but that shall bee too continue without hope too bee planted agayne, as wee heare the threatning that is made by oure Lorde Iesus Christ when he saith, that euery tree which bringeth not foorth frute shall bee hewen done and made firewood . Lo heere what horible blowes God giueth to the wicked . And why? for he seeth them too be vtterlie reprobate and giuen vp to damnation : and therfore he must stub them vp for euer . Also he saith likewise, that euery tree whiche is not planted by the heauenly father, shall be plucked vp by the roote . But we shall see many, who for a time will make faire countenance, and it will seeme that they be euen of those trees which God hath set in his garden, and in his owne possession: for there are hipocrits mingled with the faithful . They wold fayne be of that sort that is most aduaunced in the Church . But what for that? They be not planted to haue any good and sure roote : and therefore in the end God must stub them vp . As much is to be saide of the vine, namely that oure Lorde Iesu Christe is the stocke of the vine, and we the braunches that were grafed therein . If we bring foorth good frute : the father manureth vs, and we feele that hee hath his had always vpon vs, too make his graces available, and to multiplie them . But if we beare euill frute, or if we be altogether frutelesse, so as God may make this complaint which he maketh by his prophet, (My vine, what haue I done to thee that thou bearest me nothing but bitterness?) I haue looked for some sweetnesse at thy hand, and it seemeth that thou woldest choke thy master : VVhat shall I then do, but plucke thee vp? this oughte too make oure heare stand vp vpon our heads, for (as I saide) we are as good as quite stubbed vp . And in deede all the afflictions that light vpon the despisers of God , and vpon suche as are past mending, are as many stubbings vp . True it is that they wither not at the first blowe : for if God punishe a wicked man hee will yet giue him leasure to bethinke himselfe and too come home agayne: neuerthelesse, the enimies of God cannot feele any one chastizement in the worlde, but God beginneth already to stub them vp, and the same tendeth too their finall destruction . And wherefore? [Because] they be so farre off from amending at Gods scourging, that they rather appaire and sharpen them selues agaynst him . And heerein it is to be seene, that their naughtinesse is vnrecouerable . And so let vs marke, that as ofte as God lifteth vp his hande agaynst the wicked, it is alredy as it were a stubbing of them vp . But as for vs that are adopted too be his chil-<sub>50</sub>dren, (yea verely if we haue receyued that grace without dissimulation) let vs marke that if God scourge vs in thys worlde, it is not to make our state the worse . Therfore it doth no harme, but rather we be renewed [by it] and we feele what a care God hath of vs . Thus ye see an inestimable comfort to the children of God . And therewithall we see also what neede we haue to flee therenvnto for succoure . VVhy? It is pitie to see, to how many calamities our life is subiecte .

Dayly it seemeth that G O D would plucke vs vp, and that we should perish . Thys is generall to all men, but yet the faithfull are more afflicted than the other . And heere ye see why Saint Paule sayth, that if our hope be but only in this world, so as it resteth heere beneath: then are wee the wretcheddest creatures , and the unbelieuers haue a better time than we , and their state is farre happier .

Forasmuch then as it seemeth that wee shoulde bee plucked vp every day , and that we should be so muche Kij. afflicted afflicted: what shoulde become of vs, if we had not the comfort that is set downe heere? But in very deede (too speake properly) we be not plucked vp, when God beateth vs with his roddes too humble vs: but it seemeth so too oure vnderstanding, specially when we be pressed with miseries. For if God send vs any meane affliction, such as maye happen vnto vs every day, as some sicknesse, or some wrong, or some losse of goodes, or some other affliction: thys is no plucking of vs vp, I meane as oure affections take it too bee: but it is as if a man shoulde shred off dyuers of the boughes of a tree, when he sees there is too manye of them. And well maye a man cut off the one halfe of a tree, and yet shall it continue still howsoeuer the world go, and afterwarde sproute out new braunches. Euen so is it with vs, when God vseth some meane corrections, and falleth not too extreame rigoure. But if God list to trie vs to the vttermost, (as it maye come too passe that wee shall bee brought euen to the graue, and too oure seeming there shall not bee lefte one onely sparke of life more,) so that the faithfull are in a pecke of troubles when the hand of God lifteth vp it selfe agaynst them: and they looke about them heere and there, and finde no way too get out of their afflictions: but the mischiefe purseweth them, and it seeneth that God is full bent neuer to gyue them any release more: when the afflictions are so great and excessiue, (ye see what is meant by plucking vp or by stabbing vp) what is to be done then? As ofte as God chastizeth vs, after what manner so euer it be, let vs not be astonied though the correction seeme greeuous too vs in respect of our owne nature. And why so? For our desire is to continue still, and that our state shoulde not be diminished. Thus ye see what we couet. But if God cut off any braunche from vs, there must needes be some gainestriuing and some gainesaying: yea verely in oure naturall vnderstanding. But yet neuerthelesse, let vs looke that we take hart when the affliction greeueth vs, and let vs enter into the account that is set downe heere. Yee see it is true that if a man cut off any parte of a tree, he abateth the beautie of it for one yecere after: but yet it is certayne that when a good labouurer, that will further hys owne profite, and playe the good husbande, shreddeth a tree, he meaneth not to make it to impaire, but that the tree should thriue the better. Then sith the case standeth so: let vs put our selues into Gods hande, and pray hym too dispose of vs: for hee knoweth howe he may make vs to beare frute. Therefore let vs suffer hym to cut and shred off some boughes from vs, and let vs fight agaynst this natvie griefe, and against their sorrowfulnesse that we conceiue at the firste brunt. Let vs fight (I say) against it, yea euen in suche wise as we bee subdued to say, very well, seeing it pleseth God to shred off some part of vs, hee knoweth wherefore he doth it.

But we must passe yet further. For it is not ynough for vs to shewe our selues patient in some small or common aduersitie. But if God bring vs too deathes dore, that is to saye, if he vses suche extremitie in chastizing of vs, as it may well seeme he intendeth to destroy vs, and that when we shall haue debated the matter off and on, we cannot but condemne our selues and be vtterlie abashed: yet notwithstanding we must still continue stedfast, as shall be said heereafter: so that although God kill vs, yet must we trust still in him. For he is the phisicion that can heale, not only our wouds, but also death it self. And therefore it is sayde in the Psalme, Although I shoulde walke in the shadowe of death, so long as I see the sheepehooke of my God, (that is too saye, so long as hee sheweth him selfe to be my sheperde) I shall comfort my selfe therewith. Then let vs learne to fighte agaynst this temptation which prouoketh vs to despaire when God (to our seeming) presseth vs out of measure, and when we are able to abide no more, yet let vs stande vp and say, are we plucked vp? And will not God plante vs agayne? If a husbandman may remoue a tree from one place too another, shall not God haue more power? Then let vs trust in him, and let vs not doubt but that whi it pleaseth him to haue pitie vpon vs, we shal be restored to better state than we were in afore. Yea verely, but the meanes thereof shall not bee after mans fancie.

Also it becommeth vs not to measure Gods grace and power after our reason: let vs not do him that wrōg: but let vs assure our selues, that for all the power whi ch he hath giuen to mortall men, there is no whit abated from him selfe: but he hath much more and withoute comparison, so as he cannot be letted to ayde vs in our greatest aduersities. VVhen oure calamities shall bee vtterlie deadlye, then will hee restore vs agayne in such wise, as we shall haue whereof to reioyce in hym. But now remayneth that this be applied to our owne vse. As I haue touched afore, we see what the state of this present life is. Euery man ought to looke to him selfe, there is not that man whiche cannot skill to complayne, and whiche maketh not his moanes, or at leastwise whiche though he vtter it not with his mouth, doth not keepe it locked vp in sorrowe, [so as hee saith in him selfe,] Alas, suche an inconuenience is besafne me, I am the worse for that God hathe diminished me so much. VVe can skill well ynough to bethinke vs of all these things, and the devill also will not misse to put them in oure heads, that wee mighte be greeued and tormented, yea euen to fret and fume against God. VVhat is too bee done then? Behold heere the meane too beate backe suche temptations: that is to witte, too consider that if God worke after such a manner towardes his: all shall turne to their welfare, they shall make their profite euen with aduantage, of that which seemed to tend too their destruction.

And heere ye see why euen that kind of temptation is set before vs, whiche at the firste blush seemed most straunge and grisly: that is, when mention is made of plucking vp by the roote. For then ye see the tree is dead, it is quite and cleane dispatched. For wherein consisteth the life of the tree? In the roote. Then after that the earth is taken away from it, there is no more life in it. So is it with vs: for if God take from vs that which belongeth to the present life: ye see we bee plucked vp by the roote, there is no more hope of vs. And why? For we imagin that our life consisteth in the hauing of goodes, and in the hauing wherewith to sustaine and cherish our selues. And yet we do not as the trees. For a tree is contented with the hauing of so much roome as his roote is able to occupie. But a man hath an insatiable lust: we bee gulfs, in somuch that we thinke the whole world is not ynough too finde vs. For suche as haue both fieldes, and houses, and vineyards, and other heritages, are afayde still that they shoulde wante earth. They that haue money in their purse, are afayde and in doubt, yea and are continuallye martyred with feare, least God should disapoynt them of their pray, and abate their portion. Seeing then that our desires are reached out so farre off: we are not only as the roote of a tree, but also without stint or measure. And for proofe hereof, are we so sobre as too hold our selues ther wher the holy ghost calleth vs? It were greatye to oure behoofe. So then lette vs marke well, that although it seeme that oure life life cannot cōtinue without the ordinarie meanes which God liath allotted to it: yet notwithstanding he is able to send vs meanes wherethrough we shall escape, and hee can giue vs them to day or to morrowe. True it is that a thing shall not seeme easie vnto vs : neuerthelesse it is y-nough that God can prouide for it, yea and that he will set it in such order as we shall haue cause to magnifie his infinite power and wisdome, for working in such maner as is to vs incomprehensible. Ye see (I say) how it standeth vs in hand to practise this sentence: that euery of vs, whē 10 he findeth him selfe in such perplexities, may saye, Alas what must become of me? I see my goodes are minished, I see I am shut out from such meanes as I had. And how? my trade is diminished of this or that. VVell, God hath cut it off: but yet must I needes say, that that whiche hee hath cut off, was superfluous to me, it behoueth me too profite my selfe thereby, I sawe not that it behoued me to pray vnto God, and now he sheweth me that it is so. For wee must alwayes conclude, that it is not withoute cause, that he so cutteth off the things which he knoweth to be superfluous in vs. But in the meane while, let vs prepare our selues to be plucked vp, for that is the chiefe poynt. There are many that can away with meane afflictions: and if God diminish them, they shew themselues constante, insomuche as a manne shall see there was no outrageouse vaineglorie in them, they had no ouervnru-ly courtofnesse in them, they take that which is lefte, and holde themselues contented with it, thanking God and keeping them selues quiet. But if they be pinched somewhat more neere the quicke, specially so as it seeme that God is minded to make cleane riddance of them : then shall ye find them vtterlie out of their wittes. And why? Because they are not prepared as they ought to be, to endure the battell that is spoken of heere : that is too witte, to be vtterlie plucked vp. Then is it not y-nough for vs to suffer God to cut off the boughes and to shred off the braunches and twiggs which he knoweth to bee superfluous in vs: but also to plucke vs vp by the rootes. For hee hath that authoritie ouer vs, and we shall gayne nothing by resisting him. But yet neuerthelesse it is too 40 our great profite, that wee should hope that he will plant vs agayne. And why? For by that meane we giue roome to his mercie. And on the contrary, we withstande Gods grace so as he vouldest not to set vs vp agayne, when he sees that his scourging of vs makes vs to thinke oure selues vtterlie forlorne, and past recoverie of any freshnesse agayne. It is all one as if we should cut of Goddes hand, to say that he planteth vs not agayne. True it is that his power shall not be lessened through our vnbeleefe: but we be not worthy to feele and to enioy so great a benefite. Ye see then whereto we must come: that is too witte, euery of vs must dispose him selfe to be plucked vp by the roote : that is to say, if God smite vs in parte, and afterward it please him to smite vs in the whole, both in our persons, and in our wiues, and in our children, and in our honoure, and in all that euer we haue, in such wise as we become (as ye wold say) wretched darknesse, so as we haue not so much as one sparke of life : Yet neuerthelesse wee must abide it quietly. Beholde a thing that surmounteth all worldly power. I confesse, and there is no doubt, but menne inforne thermselues therenvnto of their owne accord. But we must desire God to worke in vs, to the intent hee may in such wise dispose of oure life, as we may be redy both to liue and dye at hys pleasure. Therefore wee must pray hym too giue vs suche manner of strength : and then no doubt but the thyng that is written heere shall bee fulfilled. For God meante not to disappoynte vs of our hope, when he likened vs too trees that are planted, and afterward taken vp, and in the ende planted agayne in a better place. Howbeit it is true that wee shall not alwayes bee planted agayne, as in respecte of thys worlde. It maye well bee that wee shall continue plucked vp, yea and that it shall seeme, that God hath euen cast vs away. And if we will iudge by oure state, wee maye saye, farewell my good dayes, for if God were minded to haue pitie vpon me, hee woulde not haue lingered and drijen off so long time: for somuche as I see hee letteth me rotte heere in my miserie, it is a token that hee wyll neuer set me vp agayne. Lo what wee maye saye. Neuerthelesse, let vs call too minde, that God meeneth too trie oure faythe by holding vs in the hope of the heauenly life, whiche is hydden from vs as nowe. For although God blisse hys seruauntes, and giue them some prosperitie in thys worlde : it is not too bee sayde that their last state is not better for them, for his planting of vs in his Churche, is too the intente wee should liue in hys kingdome euerlastingly without end.

Now then, what is our true resurrection and renewement? Euen that God shoulde reserue vs and set vs in hys kingdome: that when hee hath made vs to wayfare through thys worlde, and to passe through fire and wa-ter and all other afflictions: we maye in the ende be ex-empted from all the miseries of thys world, and be made partakers of hys lyfe and glorie. And so let vs beare in mynde howe sainte Paule sayth vnto vs, that our life is hydden in Iesus Christ, and that wee shall not see the true and perfect manifestation of it, vntill our Lord Ie-

sus come from heauen. To be short, let vs marke one o-ther similitude which we ought to bee well acquainted with. Truly in winter time the trees seeme to be dead, we see how the raine doth as it were rotte them, they are so swolne that they bee readie to burst, and thus ye see well one kynde of rottennesse: Afterwarde commeth the frost, as it were to seare them, and to drie them vp. VVe see all these thynges, and wee see not so muche as one floure: and thys is a cutting vs off. Beholde heere a kynde of death, whiche lasteth not for a daye or twayne, but for fourre or fife moneths. Neuerthelesse although the life of the trees be vnseene: yet is their sap in their roote, and in the hart of the wood. Euen so is it with vs, that our life also is hidden, howbeit not in our selues. For that were a poore kynde of hiding. There should neede no great frost to sterue it vp, nor greate wet to marre it. For we carrie fire and frost y-nough in our selues to consume it. But our life is hidden in God, he is the keeper of it and wee knowe that Iesus Christ is the partie from out of whome we drawe all our life. So then let vs content our selues with the saide hedelinesse. True it is that if a man take vp a tree and purpose to set it againe, hee had neede to make hast. For if a tree tarrie anie long time aboue the grounde, it will neuer take roote anie more, though it bee planted new againe. But G O D hathe another manner of power, than the labourers of the earth haue. Neuerthelesse we see sometimes that men are cunning, and can well keepe a tree aliue for a time. They will laie it in a shadie place where nother winde nor sunne shall come at it to drie it, so as the sap shall alwayes bee kepte close in it: men will finde some meanes or other, and althoughe they cannot sauie the lyues of trees for euer, yet will they helpe them in some sorte. And let not vs thinke that when G O D li-steth too keepe vs vnpanted a long tyme, hee cannot for all that preserue vs, yea euen in such wise as it shall not bee harde for him too make vs take roote newe agayne whensoever it please hym. Ye see then what e-

haue too beare in mynde. And it is the thyng wherein euerye one of vs must exercise hym selfe, and gyue hys whole mynde too it, that wee maye profite oure selues by the similitude that is spoken of heere.

And for too conclude with, and too confirme thys matter, it behoueth vs too marke well what is sayde heere:namelye, That God will never lend his bande to the wicked, but contrariwise, will put the enimies of goodmen too shame, and haue pitie of the good men continuallye. Verelye if we shold put God too hys stint, to saye that (in respecte of thys presente lyfe) hee shoulde behau hymselfe in sucheforte towardes vs, as wee shoule alwayes be blissted at his hande, and continue alwayes in prosperitie: this doctrine were false.

And also wee haue recordes ynowe in the Scripture, that God will not holde anye suche rule heere, as that they whose father and sauoure hee is, shoulde liue at their ease and rest: and in verye deede, it were not expediente for vs. As for example, if in these dayes the good menne were handled gentlie at Gods hande, and had allthings at their wishe and desire, and that the wicked were punished roughlye: where were the hoping for the latter daye? we shoulde fall so sound asleepe in that case, as nothing shoulde bee more needfull, than that oure Lorde Iesus Christ shoulde appere too iudge the worlde. And why so? Gods iudgements shoulde bee altogether apparaunte, and there shoulde bee none other hope of saluation.

VVe see then that although God suffer thynges too bee confuzed in this worlde, so as good folke are tormented to the vtermost, and wicked folke aduaunced in triumph: yet wee bee so drouzie and so dulheaded, as wee cannot be moued to come vnto God, and to consider what he saith to vs:namely that oure life is hidden as yet, and that wee must tarrye till it bee reueled by the comming of Iesus Christe. VVe cannot attayne too thys consideration by no meanes, no not although God prouoke vs and drawe vs to it as it were by force. VVhat woulde wee do then, if God disposed mans life in such wyse as all were well ordered there, and no man indured any aduersitie, but that men might say, Beholde how God aydeth the good, therewithall shewing himselfe an enimie to the bad, and that he cannot beare wyth them nor suffer them. It is certayne that we would make our heauen heere, and we wold conclude, that it were a fondnesse to waite for the comming of Christ, and that it were not to be looked for. So then we see it is not for our profite, that God shoud as now vphold vs after an ordinarie and vnpartiall manner, too shewe hym selfe fauorable too the faithfull, and to punishe the naughtypacks: but rather that he shoud seeme to dissemble for a time, when the wicked ouer shooote themselves, working him displeasure, and nothing else but mocking hym. VWell: it seemeth that God is asleepe, or rather that hee is not able too represse them: the wicked must ruffle it out, and haue the better hande for the tyme. And on the contrarie, when the good are troubled and tormented, God must not succoure them: they must sigh after him, and crie vpon hym: and all this seemes too be in vayne: for if they were heard, the effect would shewe it. It is good therefore that things shoulde go so. And why? If there were none other reason than I haue alledged alredy, were it not ynough? And heere we must also reherce other texts of Scripture: as when it is sayde I.Pet.1.b.7. that oure fayth is muche more precious than corruptible mettalls: so that if golde and siluer must passe through the fire too bee fined from their dross: oure fayth must also bee tryed so much the more thorow-

lie, as it is more precious before God. And howe shall this be done? by afflictions. Marke then what wee haue to note, that we may fare the better for this text: whiche is that God lendeth his hande to the wicked, fauoring them and shewing hym selfe too bee their friende; and that on the contrarie, hee will not shewe hys loue towards the faithfull, at the first, but suffereth them to languish in sucheforte, as they be trampled vnder foote, and there is no likelyhoode that euer they should be set vp agayne. God then may well do all these thynges: and yet in the meane whyle he ceaseth not to fulfill that whiche is conteyned heere, that is to witte, that he reacheth not hys hand vnto the wicked. And why? For all the goodes whiche they haue, and all that euer they delighte in, or glory of, must euery whit of it turne to their confusion. But we perceiue not this, excepte wee giue eare to that whyche is spoken too vs in the holy Scripture. VVhen we shall haue herkned to heare what God vittereth: then will he giue vs eyes to behold that which is hidden from vs. How is that? Behold, our sauoure Iesus Christe crieth, wo bee to you that laugh nowe, for ye shall weepe. VVo bee to them that ruffle it out, for they must likewise be tormented: so that they shall pay verye deere for all their ioyes. Lo how the Scripture auoucheth it: and it behoueth vs to receive that which is spoken there, and to be throughly resolued of it. And when we haue done God the honoure to give credite to his worde: then will he make vs to vnderstande that which other men perceiue not:namely that in the middes of their greatest aduersitie and heauiness that can betide vs, we haue still cause to laugh: that is to say, too comfort and cheere our selues, bycause we haue an eye to the happie ende which God promiseth, notwithstanding that the same cannot be perceyued by our earthlye eyes and vnderstanding. Neuerthelesse it is certaine that God fauoreth not the wicked. And why? Bycause that although they haue never so much prosperitie, and althogh they flourish never so much to outward appearance: yet is all of it turned to their ruine and confusion. And contrariwise, though the faithfull be scourged and tormented many wayes: yet notwithstanding forasmuch as they be vpheld by the hand of God, they never miscarie, and all turneth to their welfare and profite. And heerein wee see that thyng accomplished, which is conteyned heere. To bee short, we see what wee haue too marke vpon this texte. So then let vs learne, not to put our trust in thys world, nor in any of the inferioure meanes heere belowe. But let vs leane vnto God, seeing that hee hathe gyuen vs oure Lorde Iesus Christ, too the ende that beeing graffed in hym, wee maye drayne suche strength and sap from hym, that although oure lyfe bee hydden, so as wee bee euen as it were in death: wee maye not cease to continue stille, and too bee maintained in good and sure state, waiting tyll thys good G O D haue deliuered vs out of all worldlie miseries, and out of all the troubles whyche wee bee fayne too suffer heere, vntill hee call vs and bring vs into the kingdome of heauen, and into the glorie which he hath purchased by the preciouſe bloud of our Lord Iesus Christ.

And now let vs fall flat before the presence of oure good God, with acknowledgements of our faultcs, praying him to make vs perceiue them better than we haue done, and that therewithall we may haue our ecourse vnto him, knowyng how it is he only that can amend vs and all our euill affections: and therefore that it maye please him too drawe vs backe in sucheforte, that forſaking our selues and all that is in this worlde, we maye laboure for the heauenly life, vntill such time as hauing overcome ouercome all the aduersities of this present life, and being come too the end of all the battels wherewyth we are assayled: we may fully enioy all the victories whiche he giueth vs now by the grace of his holy spirite. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to all people and nations.&c.

The xxxij. Sermon, which is the first vpon the ninth Chapter.

Iob aunswerved and sayde.

2. Of a truth I knowv that man shall not bee iustified to Godward.
3. If he vwould dispute vwith him, he shoulde not aunswvere him one poynt of a thousand.
4. He is vwise of hart, and mightie in strength. And vwho is he that shall set him selfe against him and haue peace?
5. Hee remoueth the mountaynes, and they feele not vwhen hee ouerthroveth them in hys vvrath.
6. He remoueth the earth out of hir place, and the pillars therof do quake.

Lthough men be enforced to confess that God is righteous, and 20 that there is no fault to be founde in hym: Yet notwithstanding their passions are so outrageous, that if any of them be afflicted, a manne shall heare those that are so smitten, not only grudge against God, but also blasphemē him with full mouth. And yet for all that, their torment is neuer the lesse: but it seemeth to them that they revenge themselues after a sort when they can so rayle against him with whomē they haue to do. So much the 30 more therefore behoueth it vs to bethinke vs of Gods righteouſenesſe a great while aforehand, to the ende that when he scourgeth vs, we may alwayes abide in the lowlinesse to know him as he is, that is to witte, that hee is righteous and vnblamable. Neuertheleſſe the whole matter consisteth not onely in confessing generally that God is righteous: for we haue ſene heretofore, howe Baldad mainteyning the ſaid caſe that God is righteous, wretched it after an euill fashion, in ſtaying vpon thyſ poyn̄te, namely that God puniſheth men according to 40 their deſert. But (as we haue ſene already) that rule holdeth not continually alike. God doth ſometimes ſpare the wicked, and beare with them: and ſometimes hee chaſtizeth thoſe whomē hee loueth, and handleth them much more rigorously than thoſe that are vtterly paſt amendment. Then, if we will deeme that God chaſtizeth every man according to hys deſerts: what ſhall become of it? when men couet to mainteyne his righteouſnesſe by that meaneſ, they take a wrong way. Ye ſee then heere is a fault: for when men will take vpon them to meaſure 50 Gods iuſtiſe, and to ſay, he puniſheth no man but for his ſinnes, yea and looke in what manner and quantitie euery one haſthe offendē, thereaſter muſt God pay hym home in this world: then do they not take Gods iuſtiſe as they ought to do. In this reſpekte, Job treateth nowe much better of the manner of Gods iuſtiſe and how it is to be knowne, than Baldad hath done: That is to witte, without haſing reſpect to one ſinne or other, but onely taking menne as they be from their mootheres wombe, yet notwithstanding the whole world muſt needs bee 60 condemned afore God: and it is apparent that although the afflictions ſeeme rough, yet notwithstanding God cannot be reproued. Then let vs marke well, that they be two diuerſe maners of ſpeech to ſay, God is righteous, for he puniſheth men according to their deſert, and too ſay, God is righteous, for howſoever hee handle men, yet muſt wee alwayes keepe our mouthes ſhet and not grudge agaynſt hym bycause we cannot gayne any thing thereby. If wee ſee a wicked manne puniſhed at Gods hande, (as I haue touched afore:) then is it Gods meening that menne ſhoule knowe the particular iudgement whiche hee executeſ, too the ende that menne ſhould be warned by it. And the holy Scripture ſpeaketh after the ſame manner. VVee ſee that God puniſheth whoredomes, cruelties, periuries, blaſphemies, and ſuche other lyke thynges: Yea verilie, eyther vpon mens perſons, or elſe vpon countries, or vpon ſome place that ſhall haue bin giuen to ſome crime. VVhen God layeth his hande vpon ſuche, therein hee ſheweth a mirroure to instruct vs, according as Saint Paule ſpeaketh 1. Cor. 10. b. when he ſayth, that God puniſheth the ſinners too the intent that euerie manne ſhoule beware. For when hee puniſheth rebellions agaynſt hys woordē: it is too make vs walke in feare. VVhen hee puniſheth wicked luſts, it is to hold vs in awe. VVhen hee puniſheth whoredomes, it is too the ende that wee ſhoule walke in all cleanlinesse both of bodye and ſoule.

Thus yee ſee then howe it is Gods will, that menne ſhoule beholde and conſider hys iudgements, ſpecially, when they bee manifest. A man may well ſaye ſometimes that God is righteous. And why? for he hath puniſhed ſuch a one, yea even bycause hee was a man of a wicked and diſſolute life. Hee haſthe executeſ hys vengeance vpon ſuche a countrie. And why? for it was full of all fiſthynesſe and vncleanliſſe. VVee maye well ſpeakē after thys manner, and ſo oughte wee too do: howbeit not alwayes. For (as I haue ſayde already) hee holdeth not on all by one rule. VVhat is to be done then? VVe muſt come vp higher, [and ſaye] that God is alwayes righteous howſoever hee handle men. And thys is a poyn̄te well woorthie to bee noted: for in theſe days wee ſhall ſee ſome beaſtes, who notwithstanding wyl weene them ſelues too bee clearkly fellowes, when they ſhall haue mainteyned Gods iuſtiſe by their owne reaſon and phantaſticallyl witte. They woulde that God ſhoule bee ceteemed righteous. And why? for han‐dling every man according to their deſerts, as I touched afore. And too bring thys to paſſe, they are fayne to grant me a free will, and Gods election muſt be ouerthrownē and broughte to naughte. For to ſay that God choſeth whomē he listeth, and calleth them to ſaluation through hys owne free goodneſſe, and that he forsaketh the residue: they thynke it very ſtrange too be ſpo‐ken, bycause they cannot comprehendē the reaſon of it.

And heere yee ſee why theſe roguēs that counterfayte too be greate clearkes, ouerturie the foundations of oure fayth too proue Gods righteouſnesſe even after theyre owne fancie. And whye is that?

Because they cannot mount so high as to know that god is righteous in comparison of men, whatsoeuer they be. True it is that it standeth vs in hande to beware of another extremitie which is faultie. For we shall see some of as slanderous conuersation as may be: who if they perceyue their leudenesse to be discovered [fall by and by to saying] As for me, I am an honest man, (yea too the worldward) I confess euerie man is a sinner to godward: and so will he shrowde him selfe vnder the common cloake. Looke vpon a whorehunter that hath haunted the stewes halfe a score years: Looke vpon a blasphemer that ceaseth not to raile at God and to spite hym: Looke vpon a villaine that despiseth God and all religion. Looke vpon an vnthrifte or an vnconscionable person that seeketh nougnt else but to be catching withoute faithfulness or honest dealing: and such doggs will saye it is true that they be sinners before God, for no manne is righteous. They go no further with their faults but so, which are so hideous as may be, but shrowde themselfes vnder the cloake of naturall infirmitie, saying that there is no manne that can bee equall with God. They thinke they haue doone very muche in yelding such a confession.

But I haue shewed alredy that it behoueth vs to haue both these two poynts. The one is, that we must acknowledge God too bee righteous in respecte of the whole worlde, and that men must not pleade nor dispute wyth him, whosoeuer they be or whatsoeuer they be able too alledge: but must be abashed both greate and small. Lo here one speciall poynt. The other is, that ech man should haue an eye particularly to himselfe, and that every man should be sorie for his faults, and abhorre them, and condemne them: and that herevpon we should also consider the vengeance and punishmentes whiche God sendeth vpon sinnes, to the end we should learne to fare the better thereby. If we be beaten with his roddes, let every of vs say, it is good right, I haue well deserued it. If God teach vs at another mans cost, so as hee chastizeth other men before our eyes: let the same touch vs, and let vs applye such examples to our owne instruction, to the intent to preuent the matter, that God be not compelled to fall vpon vs bycause we haue not profited by the chastizementes whyche hee hathe shewed vs in the person of others.

Thus ye see the two points which we haue to mark & to put in vre. Now let vs come to the laying foorth of that which is said here by Iob. I know for a trutb (saith he) that man shall not be iustified with God. So it is set downe: but this word with importeth as much as to Godward. And it is a doctrine of great weight if a man know it wel. VVhat is the cause that men iustifie themselues so boldlie, that is to say, that they presume so much of them selues, that they set so much store by themselues, and that they be so full of pride? VVhat else is the cause of it, but only their staying here bylow, that euery man compareth himselfe with his neigboure? Ye see then wherevnto we runne. And ye see also why Saint Paule sendeth vs to the great judge, saying that euerie man shall beare his owne burthen. As if he had saide, my friendes, men beguile themselues when they make suche comparisons as these: VVhat? I see other men liue no better than my selfe, and if I haue faults in me, so haue other men in them too. Ye see then what is the cause that men condemne not themselues as they ought to do, but rather sooth themselues in iustifying theyr owne case. But heere it is exprefly sayde that man shall not be iustified with God. VVhat must wee then do? As ofte as any man speaketh to vs of our sinnes and laith them afore vs, let vs learne to know that we must not hold our eyes here belowe, but looke vp to the iudgement seat of our Lord Iesu Christ, where we haue oure accounte to make: wee must know the incomprehensible maiestie of God. Therefore let euery man thinker thereof, and then shall all of vs be wakened, to withdrawe our selues out of our follies, and wee shall haue no mo of these vaine imaginacions and dotages that haue bin wont to rocke sinners asleepe. Had this bin obserued: there shoulde be none of the debates that are nowe adayes in christendome about the righteousness of faith. The Papists cannot bee perswaded of this that we say, namely that wee become righteous through the meere fauoure of God in our Lord Iesu Christe. And why? what shall become of the merits (saye they) and of the good wörkes wherein the saluation of men consisteth? And why do the Papistes stand so vpon their merites, and why are they so besotted with them, but because they looke not vp to God? They dispute in theyr schooles, whether good works deserue recompence and wages, as well as euill works deserue punishmente: for they be things flat contrarie. If mens sinnes deserue to be punished, then must there also be some reward for vertues: for otherwise Gods iusticie shoulde not bee indifferent: yea to our seeming, and so might men dispute vpon a shadowe. But ye see that the Papists fall asleepe vpon this disputation, and yet in the meane while God ceaseth not on his behalfe, to play the judge, not in iudging according to their lawes, but in behauing himselfe according to his owne maiestie: that is to witte, in fineing out that thing in men whiche we cannot perceyue. But if oure vertues were godly in deede, that is too saye such as mighte go for paymente before God: that were somewhat. But what? when we shall haue prised them to the vttermost, they shall be but smoke: If they come before God, all this must be layde downe. Then let vs remember well how it is said heere, that man shall not bee found righteous to Godward. And to the intente wee may take warning heereby: as ofte as any man speakes to vs of our sinnes, we must not rest here bylowe, but rather every one of vs must summon himselfe before God, that we may knowe what manner of iudge he is. For so soone as we take vpon vs to pleade against him, we must needes be confounded, and as it were ouerwhelmed. And Iob addeth immediatly, That if a man would dispute with God, he shoulde not answere to one poynt of a thousande. True it is that thys maye well bee verefied of G O D: for wee maye pleade fayre, and tell a long tale, whereas there shall bee a thousande poyntes that God will not once voutsafe too open hys lippes to replie vnto. And that is verye true: For all the coloure that wee shall pretende to iustifie oure selues, maye well beare some countenaunce afore menne, bycause they see not so cleerelye as were requisite: but when wee come vnto God, all of it vanisheth awaye to nothing. Let vs not thinke then that God is amazed at our long and greate babling: for when wee shall haue cast oure skum, and when it shall come to the poynte of excusing our selues, and to giue credite to our vertues: peraduenture it wyll seeme that G O D oughte too yeelde vnto vs. Yea: but in the meane whyle hee dooth nothing but laughe and mocke at all the vayne brags that menne can alledge: For all is nothing woorth.

Thus ye see a good and holye sentence: whiche is, that if wee alledge a thousande articles, G O D wyll not aunswere so much as one of them. VVhat is the reason? It is bycause it is nother here nor there in hys sighte. It may well be made accounte of before men: But what for that? God will not be moued with it awhit.

Never-

Neverthelesse the naturall meening of his place is, that when we be come vnto God (that is to wit in way of encountering against him) we shall be so combered, as we shall not be able to answer one only article of a thousand that he shall alledge against vs. Surely we be so hastie, that we will needs fight with God, before we can drawe our swoord as they say. And we see it is so. I pray you will we not more streyne curtisie too aduenture vpon a mortall man or vpon a creature that is nothing, than vpon the living God? If we intend to make defiance to any man, 10 we will forecast thus: Is he able to make his parte good? how may we compasse our intent? This may turne vs to trouble or displeasure. VVhen we shall enter into dealings against men, we will make many discourses: but if we be mynded to rush against God, wee will step too it bluntly. VVe see then hereby what rage, (yea euen diuelish rage) there is in men too match themselues so against God. But whē we come the to push, we shall fynd by experience what it is to iustle against him, and that it is no dalyng with such a Prince. Thus ye see what Job sheweth here. For first he setteth downe mennes boldnesse as it may be percyued: and afterward on the contrarie part, he setteth downe the comberāce wherein they be when God maketh them to feele that he is ryghtuous and confoundeth them. Then let vs mark well that men are desyrouse to pleade and dispute with God as we see, and yet notwithstanding, that when they be once entred into the chalendge, they must needs be ouerthrowē, and God will make them feele that they must be confounded spye of their teethe. This is a verye needfull 30 thing. For I haue shewed alredye, that the foolish ouerweening wherewith men deceyue themselues, proeedeth of this, namely that they regard not God, but make their discourses thus: yea verely, I am no worse than other men, and besids that, if I haue vyses, I haue vertues also to recompence them withall. The cause then why men do so oversleepe themselues, is for that they knowe not what Gods Maiestie is, nor haue any liuely feeling of it, to submit themselues therunto. Sith the cace standeth so: let vs mark well how it is sayd here, that men are de- 40 syrouse too stand pleading and disputing against God. And why is that? For we be so blind, as we cannot see to our selues to say, Hownow! Behold, God is able to ouerwhelme vs, and to thrust vs downe to the bottomlesse pit of hell, and yet shall we go set ourselues against him? But we neuer think of that: and therefore it is no maruell though we be so blynd. Howbeit let euery man bethink himself well, and he shall fynd that that is the reason. If any man speake to vs of pleading against God: nature it self teacheth vs that wee ought to abhorre it: I say euен 50 the wickeddest of vs. VVe see of these Scoffers that haue nother conscience nor feare of God, and yet notwithstanding there remayneth some kynd of feeling ingrauen in them by nature, so as they bee abashed and ashamed when it is sayd to them, wilt thou pleade against God? Neuerthelesse eu'en they also that seeme to be good and discrete men, will sometyme fall into such maner of talk, so as there is not that man which playeth not the horse that is broken looce, in making protestation against God. VVe see that eu'en the prophets haue ben assayled with such temptations. True it is that they haue resisted, as it behoued. But this kind of conceyt hath somewhat combered them, so as they haue bensorie now and then to see Gods iudgements so straunge to them, and that their owne reason hath as good as caryed them away. Seing then that wee bee so inclyned too pleade against God, so much the better ought this doctrine too bee printed in our remembrance that wee may bee restreyned at such tymes as wee be tempted in that wyse too reason against God, assuring our selues, that wee can gayne nothing by ought that wee can doo. And if we be warned hereof, we shall not be so greatly offended, though we see many leape after that sort out of their bounds. For this stumblingblocke troublēth the weake. VVe would fayne that every man confessed God to bee ryghtouse, and that his mercie filleth the whole world, and that we ought to glorifie him for the same. But whē it happeneth that wicked men rayle at God, and other some blasphemē him: and men dare not open their mouth to reprove and rebuke them, insomuch that they haue full scope, and triumph too the worldward: when this is seene, the weake are greeued, and it seemeth too them that the myghty power and ryghtousenesse of God are defaced thereby, and so they cannot yeld him the glorie that belongeth to him. But we see how it is as it were a naturall thing in man too pleade after that maner against God: and although it be a monstrous thing & such a one as we ought to abhorre exceedingly: yet is it an ordinarie vice. Sith the cace standeth so: let vs not be ouermuch disquieted, when it happeneth. Thus ye see what we haue to beare in mynd. And it behoueth vs too mark well what is added here for the second poyn̄t: that is to wit, that if God charge vs with a thousand articles, we be not able scarsly to answe one. Here we be admonished, that when wee haue serched out our vyes to the vttermōlt, that wee shal not come too the knowledge of the hundredth part, no nor to so much as one of euery thousand. True it is that if men examine themselues w̄ll without hypocrisie: they must needs find themselues wrapped in so manye euills, as they may bee ashamed of themselues, and vtterly dismayed, specially wee. For though a man picke out them that bee the holiest, yet mult they raunge themselues in one rank with Dauid, who hath confessed that no man can atteyne to the true knowledge of his sinnes. Now if the holiest and such as seeme Angells, are altogether confounded in their sinnes, Psal. 13. 4. 13. bycause the number of them is infinite: I pray you what is to be sayd of the common sort? For wee must neuer take ourselues to haue profited so much, but that we bee still farre behynd them that I speake of. So then, if men examine their lyues throughly, they shall find such a bottomlesse gulf of sinnes, as they shall be vtterly dismayed. But is this all? we atteyne not yet the knowledge of the hundredth part, in such sort as were requisite. And whyso? Ye see that Dauid, who entred his faults, cryed out, who is he that knoweth his owne sinnes? He confesseth then that he knew exceeding much: and afterward he addeth, Lord clenze mee from my secret sinnes. And why sayeth he so? How calleth he them secret sinnes? for it behoueth 1. John. 3. d. 20. vs to knowe our sinnes, or else we cannot confessē them to be sinnes. The answer is, that Dauid wist well that God seeth more cleerly than we do. And so seeing oure owne conscience vpbraydeth vs, what shall we say to the iudgement of God? Ye see then the order that we haue to keepe: that is too wit, that euery of vs enter into himself, and serche out his owne vyses throughly, so farre as he can come to the knowledge of them. And haue we sifted the out? well, behold, our conscience is our judge: and what maner judge is it? Truly it is a judge that is greatly to be feared, but dooth not God see farre more cleerly than a mortall man? My conscience accuseth mee of a thousand sinnes: and if God enter into reckening with mee, shall he not fid manye mo? So then it standeth vs in hand to wey well what is sayd here: that is too wit, that of a thousand points wee can hard and scarsly answe vnto one: and that when wee shall haue espyed one fault by our selues, God passeth farre further, for he seeth the sins that we be not priuie to. Now then following that which is sayd here, let vs lerne to bethink vs of our faults in such wyse, as we may be fully resolued in ourselues, that God contenteth not hi: self with that which commeth to our owne knowledge, but will iudge according to that which he himself seeth and knoweth, and not according to that which we can find, for we will leape ouer the quicke coles as it is sayd in the proverbe: but God plundgeth vs in them ouer head and eares. It is he to whom it belongeth to serche the heart, as the scripture attribute vnto him. And besides this, wee discerne not so well betweene vices and vertues as wee ought to do. That poynt therefore must be reserved vnto him. And wherfore deserue wee them not? If wee will iudge wel and rightly of all our works, it standeth vs in hand to know what perfection is. For without perfectnesse there is nothing good before God: that is to say, all is but filthinesse [where there wats perfection.] And who is he that deserueth to be allowed of God, if this perfection shewe not it selfe in him? But now how shall we know what perfection is, considering that our eysight is so dim, and that we see but as it were in the twylight? Although God inlighthen vs, yet haue not we so pure and cleane a sight, as can vse the brightness which hee sheweth vs. True it is that the worde of God entreth into the bottome of oure heartes, and perceþ through our bones and the marie, and all that is in them. True it is, that it is a burning cresset, true it is that Iesus Christ is called the daysunne, and that he shineth ouer al: but yet for al that, our eysight ceaseth not to be dim still. Therefore it standeth vs greatly in hand to knowe what perfection is. And heereby we be put in mind, that when soever we take thyngs to be good, and perceyue not any faulfe in them, yet are they not therefore withoute faulfe, for we knowe not the perfection that God requireth. To be shorte, there is none but only God that knoweth what perfection and soundnesse is. And why? It is in him, he knoweth it, and we be too feble to attayne vnto it. That is the cause why it is sayde that wee may well set a fayre face vpon the matter, but we shall not be able to aunswere one poore poynte of a thousand that shall be alledged and layde afore vs. And I haue told you already, that men are warned, that if they will pleade with God, they shall awayes find themselues confounded to theyr damnation. Howbeit all to late. And this warning is verye profitable for vs, what is the reason? To the intente that before the blowe come, every man should hold himselfe within the bounds of sobernesse and modestie to say, Alas, what a thing is it for vs to go to law with our God? Thinke we to get the vpper hande of hym? nay, cleane contrariwise God shall overwhelme vs. And behold, the only way to be acquit at his hand, is for every man to condemne him selfe. But if we fall to sturdiness, God will punish vs for such pride. It maye be that at the first push he will not shewe vs our confusion, but at the length we shall be so snarled in it, as we shall not winde our selues out agayne. Ye see then into what a maze God casteth all the presumptuous sort which vndertake to stand against him, and enterprise the combate that is spoken of heere. True it is, that God is so gracious to some, as that hee daunteth them, and they at length do fal in aray: but that must not bee taken holde on, to say that he worketh continually all after one fashion. VVe shall see some that are full of pride, whiche trust in their owne righteousnesse and would bind God vnto them: well, God ouermastreith them, and tameth them, he casteth them into vtter confusion, and afterwarde plucketh them out agayne. VVe see that God worketh not awayes after one rate. Neuerhelesse it behoueth vs awayes to understande what the scripture telleth vs: namely that God will stretch out hys hand agaynst the proude, too destroy them. And beholde how he proceedeth therin. I say the hypocrits are so puffed vp with pride and presumptuousnesse, as they thinke verely that their vertues deserue to be receyued, yea and to haue reward and recompence. VVell, they stande in their owne conceite for a time, and God letteþ them alone there. On the other side Sathan eggeth and inticeth them and maketh them to set much more by themselues. They gaze at their owne gay fethers like Peacockes, saying, I haue done this and that, and they beare themselues in hand that God ought to hold himselfe coteted with it. But anon after whē they haue takē pleasure in theselues, and in al their vertues: if God cal the to account, and proue to their faces, that al that which they esteemed as vertue was nothing but vice, yea & stark filthinesse & abomination before him: then are their combes cut, and good right they shuld be so: insomuch that whē they haue beguiled not only the worlde, but also theselues, by trusting in things that haue a gay shew & countenāce outwardly: the thing must awayes bee manifested which is spokē in S.Luke, namely that the thing which is excellēt & highly esteemed amōg mē, is abominable before God. Then Lu.19.4.15. let vs beware that we presume not so farre as to fighte against God, and to go too lawe with him to iustifie our selues. For else will our God confound vs, and so rushe against vs, as we shall be oppressed and ouerwhelmed of a thousand crimes, and we shall not be able to aunswere any one of them, and when we be accused of a thousande deadly sinnes, (that is to say of an infinite number) if wee intende to cleere our selues but of some one only poynt, we shall be cast in our owne turne. I say let vs beware we come not to that poynt. Now to the end we may be touched the better, it is sayde, That God is wise of bearte and mightie of strenght. This poynt of doctrine hath bin touched already heretofore. Neuerthelesse it is not for nought that it is spoken of heere new agayne. For it is a lesson whiche we ought to mind day by day. I haue tolde you already that mē beguile the selues and wanze away in their owne fonde imaginations, bycause they thinke not vpon God, but rest vpon themselues. Beholde heere one inconuenience. But let vs on further. If men thought vpon God, should they not be touched liuely, to acknowledge him according as he declareth himselfe vnto them? should they not be moued to such a feare and reuerence as they would glorify him as he is worthy? But they do it not at all, what is the reason? It is bycause they conceiue not God to be such a one as he is. VVell, we can skill to say God, God, that word runnes roundly vpō our tunges end, & yet in the meane while, his infinite maiestie is not perceiued awhit. Al that is in God to our respecte, is as a dead thing. And in very deede it is wel seene by mennes blasphemies, periuries and suche otherlike things. If men had any feeling of Gods maiestie, shuld we haere so holy and sacred a thing so, rent and torn in peeces? If mē be in a chafe, God must be faine to abie for it, as if he were their lacke. Like as whē a master is angrye, (if he be a fumish & hafty mā) he wil give his seruāt a buffet with his fist, so wil a testy mā do to his wife, or else to his horse if he displease him. Euē so play we with god. Now whē we see mē cast vp their choler at God as if he were their vnderling, may it not be wel said that we be toto dultheaded? yea & they come to that point without being chafed. For wee see these doggs make no bones at all in tearing the name of God. And although ther be no cause to prouoke the therunto, yet ceasse they not to sweare blasphemously at euery word, whiche is a monstrous thing and agaynst nature.

nature. Therefore it is a good token that we knowe not the maiestie of God, though the word fly never so roundly out of our mouthe. Also there are store of forswearings. It is a horrible case now a dayes, that a man cannot wring out one woord of truthe, and let there be never so much solemnite vsed to bring on those that are called to witnesse, yet is it seene that they be all forsworne, insomuch that of the whole number of such as are deposed, a man shall hardly find one among halfe a score that will say the truthe. And in dede it is a common bywoord among them, that the case goes wholly with them when there are no witneses: which is as much to say, as there is not one that wil speake the truthe. And thus ye see how they spyte God. Also I pray you what talk will men hold when communication is ministred about the holie scripture, about the whole religion, and about so holie things as we haue at this day? It were meete that men should hold themselves in awe in such cases, according as it is sayd that the true mark of Gods childe is to tremble at his word. But we see that men will boldly reason of God: there is dis- coursing, and prating of him and of all the secrets of his maiestie, euen as it were in spost: and are not these sub- stantiall proofs that we knowe not what God is though his name be ryse in euery mannes mouthe? Then let vs 20 mark well that the thing whch is added here, (namely that God is wylle of bart and myghtie of strength) is no more than needeth. And it is true that these woords seeme not too bee so pithily spoken as they myght haue bin: but if they be well weyed, there will be found a sufficient force to make vs shrink in our hernes. For when it is sayd that 30 God is wylle of bart: it is not ment of worldly wisdome, nor of such wisdome as our wit is able to comprehend. And whē it is sayd that he is strong: it is not that he is strōg as if he were a Gyant or a Mountayne: but we must glo- rifie him in such wise as wee must assure our selues, that there is no might, no strength, no power like his in all the creatures that we see: but that all is nothing which we can see here beneathe, and that we must seeke all strength & power in God alone. Lo what this speeche importeth. Verely this thing cannot be so well gone through with, at 40

this present as it ought to be: but yet it was requisite that we should touche it, too the end we might see the maner of Iobs proceding, or rather of the holy Ghosts preceding who speaketh by Iobs mouthe, too shewe vs what maner of righteousnesse Gods is. VVill we then vnderstād well what we be? wee must take this for a generall conclusiō, that when there shall no open crymes be found in vs, so as we liue not loocely, but walk honestly and vnblamably to the worldward: all this is nothing. VVhyso? Of what sort soever the creatures be, God can condemne them and continue ryghtuous himself. And if we attempt to reply against him, it is true that in our oyne opinion we may well find what to say for a tyme, and God will wink at it, and not withstand it at the first brunt. But in the end we must be fayne to stoupe too receyue the sentence of damnation: and when men shall haue clapped their hāds at vs, yea and quit vs cleere, we shal not fayle to be condemned for all that, and to be confounded when we shall come before the greate iudge. For he sees more clearly and sharply than all the men in the world. And so let vs assure ourselues that, there is none other meane to obteyne fauour before God and to haue our sinnes couered, (no not euen after we haue frankly confessed that there is nothing but filth and infection in vs) but by fleeing for refuge to our Lord Iesus Christ. For there shal the full and perfect ryghtuousnesse be founde, by the vertew whereof we shall be acceptable to God, and find him mercifull to vs.

But now let vs cast our selues dowlie before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him too wype them out in such wise, as we may come to him looking him in the face, yea howbeit not presuming of aught that is in ourselues, but vpon his graciouse fauour which he hath shewed vs in our Lord Iesus Christe, and wherof it hath ben his will to make vs partakers. And that moreouer he will clenze vs frō day to day, and so purge vs of all the corruptiōs that are in our flesh, as we may be ryghtly sanctified to appeere blamelesse before him at the latter day. And so let vs all say, Almyghtie God our heauenly father &c.

The. xxxijij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the ninth Chapter.

This Sermon contayneth the rest of the exposition of the fourth, fifth and sixtē versēs, and then as foloweth.

7. It is he that commaundeth the Sunne that he shyne not, and the Starres are shut vp by him as vvith a Seale.
8. It is only he that spreadeth out the heauens, and vvalketh aloft vpon the ſea.
9. He made [the starres] Arcturus, & Orion, and the Pleiades, and the chābers of the midday.
10. He doeth maruelous and incomprehensible woorkes, & vvordeſtfull things vvithout end.
11. Behold, he goeth before mee and I ſee him not: he paſſeth to & fro and I perceyue him not.
12. If he catch and ſnatch, vvho is he that ſhall plucke it out of his hands? vvho is he that vvill ſay vnto him, vvhat dooſt thou?
13. God vwill not vvithdravve his vvrath, and the mightieſt helpeſ ſhall ſtoope vnto him.
14. VVhat can I do If I enter into talk, and make choyce of vvordes vvith hem?
15. Although I vvere rightuſe, yet could I not anſvver him, but I ſhould humble myſelf to my iudge.

If we had the wit to know God accor- dingly as he vittereth himſelf, there ſhould neade no lōg proceſſe to be vſed: for euery of vs ſhould be able to diſcern the things that are ſet afōre oureyes. But forasmuchas we be ſo vntoward in that behalf, God had neade to vpbrayd vs with our vnthākfuſuſe by telling vs of his woorkes. And to this purpose maketh that which is ſaid here: namely that whē God liſteth, the ſkie ſhalbe cov- ered with great & thick clouds, ſo as the Sun ſhal not be ſeene: & contrariwise that whē it pleaſeth him to ſēd light, the cope of the ſkies appereſh, & that faire pavilliō which is the heauē of his maiestie ſhewceth it ſelf: he walketh a- loſt vpon the ſea, that is to ſay, his power ſhewerh it ſelf throughly there alſo: & he ſetteth the ſtarſ of the ſkye iii order order, according as they be certain in number. This (I say) is rehersed to vs, to the end we shoulde knowe our duetie the better, and apply our myndes to the considering of Gods woorks, that we may honour him as he deserueth. And although that God hauing cast vs in the teeth with this vyce whiche is in vs, myghte leaue vs there for such as we are: yet notwithstanding his intent is too instruct vs to our welfare. And the twoo points that wee haue too mark in this streyne for our owne profit, are these. The first is, that we shoulde vnderstand how there is not any of vs that thinketh vpon Gods wisdome and power in such sorte as he ought to do. In deede we can confesse ynoch with our mouthe, but the same entreteth not into our hart, which thing we shewe by our contēptuousnesse. For (as it was touched yesterday) if we were thorowly perswaded that all the wisdome of manne is but vanitie, and that all the strength which we see in creatures is nothing: God shoulde hold vs in such awe as wee shoulde be (as ye would say) reyned vp hard too it with a short brydle, and none of vs all shoulde once be so hardie 20 as to think, speake, or do any thing that were not according to Gods good pleasure. Seeing then that wee bee so negligent, and that euery of vs beareth with himself, and that we giue brydle to our wicked thoughts, and nourish them without any remorse of conscience, insomuch that they burst out euē into outward deeds: thereby we shewe that we never knew Gods maiestie aryght, or rather that we never tasted aught of it to anye purpose, or else that the taste thereof was so vnsauerye, that it dyed out of hand. Doo we then heare what is said of Gods wisdome 30 and myghtiness here? Beit knowne that this is spoken after that sort vnto vs, because wee bee so vntowarde in applying our myndes to that which is moste for our profit. And in good sooth, is it not a greate shame for vs that whereas wee liue here in this world as in a goodly large lists where God giueth vs the syght of all his creatures: the same crosseth afore our eyes, and yet we forget him that is the founder of them, euen him whose will is that heauen and earth and all that in them is, should be as mirrours of his glorie, according as it is sayd that by the vissible things we may see the things that are inuisible: nowthen, seing he hath put vs into this world, and we make none account of all this geere, must it not needs bee sayd that we haue a verye naughtie mynd? Verely we be stark blynd: and whensoever God is too be deit with all, wee conceyue nothing of him except he giue it vs. He must be fayne to inligheten vs, or else there shall bee nothing but darknesse in our witts. Howsoever the eace stand, we cannot excuse our selues by ignorance, when there shall haue ben anye wilfulness ioyned with it: but we shall be conuictid that we haue not regarded God, yea and that it hath greeued vs, to think of him, as if it had ben some matter of heauinessse. Yee see then that (first of all) our lord accuseth vs in this streyne. Howbeit, there is an instruction ioyned with it, wherein we perceyue his inestimable goodnessse. He myght condemne vs, and leaue vs there, as I haue sayd alredye. True it is that hee condemneth vs: howbeit, that is to make vs feele our sin, that it may be corrected in vs. And herevpon he dooth the office of a good schoolemaister, to the end we shoulde lerne the thing that wee knew not before. Therefore let vs take good heedle to that which shall be shewed vs here. I cofesse that the text speakeith not any thing which euery of vs knoweth not: the things will seeme too bee common and familiar to vs, and therefore it wil bee sayd that it is but superfluous talke. Some (I say) will peraduentre surmyze so. But for somuchas we referre not things to their ryght mark: must not God be fayne to play the

schoolemaister, in repeating our lesson too vs often tymes? Ought not wee to seeke our owne profit by that which God dooth so lay afore vs? It is no verye dark matter, that God maketh the sunne to shyne when it pleaseth him, and that therewithall the whole cope of heauen should appeere like a greate pauilion, too the intent that we myghte knowe what oddes there is betwyxt the maiestie of God, and the pomp of earthly Princes. VVhe earthly Princes indeuer to aduaunce themselues, what doo they with all their policies and councelles? Much a doo haue they to set vp one Pauillion of thirtie foote hyghe, yea and though it were two myle long, yet what were that in comparison? Ye see the sky is endlesse, God hathe streyned the same out, and the earth is but his fooste stoole. Therefore when we see such things, although we knowledge them to be so, yet is it nothingwoorth if we go no further in that consideratiō. Alwayes we must come backe to this point, namely, that when we see the heauen, we must the better bethinke vs of Gods maiestie which is incomprehensible, so as wee may be mooued to honour him, and to submit our selues vnto him as we ought to doe. Nowe then we perceyue it is no superfluous matter when it is sayde here, that the Lorde commaundeth the sunne that it shall not shyne out, and the sunne shall be hidden in the cloudes, in such wise, as it may seeme that God draweth a Curtaine afore it, and that afterward hee vnfoldeth the heauen as he listeth. As much is ment by that he sayeth, That he walketh vpon the waters of the Sea. Surely we see him not walke vpon it: but were it possible for the sea to continue in such state as it dooth, if it were not restreyned by a woonderfull power? we knowe that it is the nature of water to sheade abrode. And yet we see that the Sea which swelleth vp in likenesse of mountaynes, is besette with bounds (as we shall see in the eyghtandtwentith chapter) in so muchas if that were not, the earth should needs be couered ouer out of hand. VVheras wee haue drye ground to dwell vpon, let vs not think that that happeneth through anye other cause, than for that it is Gods will to lodge vs here. During which tyme he holdeth the sea within barres and bounds, not of stone or timber, but of his owne only power. Although the sea haue so greate a violence, as it may seeme that nothing is able to holde it backe: yet notwithstanding God holdeth it backe still euen vntoo this day, by the only woord that he spake, which is, that there shoulde be some drye ground for men to harber in. Then ought wee too bend all our witts that way, but we do not. And therefore let vs mark that it is not a superfluous or needless doctrine when it is sayd that God walketh so vpon the Sea. Afterward here is mention made of the starres. True it is that the number of them is infinite, according as it is sayd in another Psalme, that is to wit, that there is so greate a number of starres, as would requyre a long discourse. But vnder these fewe names here, I ob ment to put vs in mynd of all the whole beautifull hoste of heauen. Besydes the Planets, we see the starres that are in the firmament, and wee see they serue all of them to mark out something, that wee myght the better consider the woonderfull woorkmanship that is in the mouing of the skyes. VVe see well that the Sunne keepeth one circuit every day, that after hee is risen he goeth downe againe, and that he turneth about the earth as well beneathe as aboue. Men see this. Also we see how the Sunne hath another cleane contrarie course. How? whereof commeth winter, whereof commeth Sommer, but of the Sunnes approching too vs, or of his returyng away from vs, and of his keeping of a hygher or lower gate in respect of vs? For according as he goeth he goeth further from vs draweth neerer to vs : thereafter maketh he the diuersitie of seasons. VVe see this, I say euен the rudeſt and moſt ignorant of vs all . True it is that they perceyue not how the Sunne walketh a cleane contrarie course to that which he maketh in keeping his dayly course : but the experience thereof is knowen by the effect. For we haue nother winter nor sommer but by the Sunne . But although wee knowe this:

yet doo wee not ſufficiently conceyue after what ſort God ordeneſt this walk of the Sunne . On the other 10 ſyde there are the Starres that Job nameth to vs heere, which informe vs of other things . Like as wee ſee the wheeleſ of a charyot turne about hycaufe there is an Extrie ouerthwart, whervpō are the twoo naues by mea-nes wheroſ the wheeleſ go: Euen ſo God hath ſet theſe twoo Starres to be as naues in the wheele of a Charyot, about the which the Sunne is ſeene to turne . VVe ſee then that by the knowledge of theſe things, Gods inef-ſimable wiſdome may the better be perceyued, or at leaſtwyſe men ſhall haue ſome taste of it whereby they ſhall bee prouoked to magnifie him, ſaying, Lord how excellent is this thy woorkmanſhip! Verely, the thing that Job touched here cannot be fully vnderſtood, except a man haue ben conuerſant in lerning . For here he toucheth Astrologie : he is not contented to ſpeake of that which the rudeſt idiots do ſee, he paſſeth on further, and toucheth cunningly certayne particulares, to the intent that we ſhould knowe the woorkmanſhip of the ſkies. How-beeit, althoſh that all men be not Astronomers, yet is there not any man that can excuse himſelf that God giueth him not ſufficient knowledge of thoſe things, if we ſhet not our eyes when the Sunne ſhyndeth . The ſhep-herds of the countrie can well ſkill to ſpeake of the Star-res, yea and they giue them names . Howbeeit in naming them, it is certayne that they darken the glorie of God : and whereof commeth that? muſt not the euill be imputed to men? There are twoo Starres that are named here: And the Poets haue feyned many fables and fond things of them. VVhereof commeth ſuch vnreaso-nableſteſſe? Of the vaynneſſe and naughtineſſe of men. 40 They haue ſayd that ſuich a Starre was the crounet or Garlond of a woman, or elſe the woman hirſelf . Lo here a cow, [lo there an ox,] Lo here this, and lo there that: to be ſhort, Lo a ſort of dotages. Neuertheleſſe we haue to mark ihat theſe dotages are ſprung out of Sarans ſutleſt wylinesſe . For his deſyre was (ſo farre as was poſſible for him) to deface this fayre lookingglaſſe wher-in Gods will was to bee ſeene and knownen . It is ſayd by Moyses, that God garniſheth the heauen with all the hoſts thereof. Moyses termeth the Starres (as well the 50 Planets as the residue) the Hoſte of heauen . And why-ſo? for they be the furniture of the heauen: the ſkies ſhould bee without beautie or faſhyon, iſ it were not ga-rniſhed with Starres: and this was performed in the creation of the world, as Moyses declareth it . But ſee how the diuell beguyleth men to make them forget the record that God hath giuen them by his woorks, and too make them beleue that the Starres are come from this place and from that . Yea and men haue intermingled them with villanies and filthineſſe: there was nothing 60 elſe with them but the whoredomes of their Idolls when they ſpake of the Starres of heauen. And like as the Pope canonizeth ſaynts whom hee liſteth: So the Idolaters canonized the Lemians of their Idolls, and would fayne haue had heauen infected with their filthineſſe as well as the earth. Yee ſee then how Satan hath ſent his illu-ſions into the world to abolish the knowledge of God (iſ it were poſſible for him) and too darken it in ſuich wyſe, as men myght wander after their owne follyes, and haue no feeling at all of the pure truth, as were requisite.

VVhat is to be done then? Let vs mark well that Iobs intent here is to teache vs to be Astronomers, ſo farre as our capacitie will beare, that we may referre all to the glori-fyng of God, ſo goodly order in the heauen as wee ſee.
As touching the firſt point. I ſayd that God intendeth to make vs Astronomers, yea ſo farre forth as eche manes capacitie will beare it . For to decypher particularly how manie Starres there are, and therewithall to tell of the other Skylyghts which men call planets, to wit, what diſtance there is in hyghneſſe and lowneſſe, how long and large they be, and what respects they haue one too another: in good ſooth we cannot all comprehend that geere, were it not that wee ſee by experience that the Sunne is hygher than the moone. And how is that? It is bycause that whē the moone cometh full betweene our ſight and the ſūne, behold there is made an Eclipse: wher-by (I ſay) we perceyue that the Moone is the lower. Thē may we well perceyue ſuch things. But yet notwithstanding in the meane whyle we knowe not the ſpace nor the reaſon how it cometh to paſſe that the Moone paſſeth ſo betweene the Sunne and vs . Therefore every man cannot knowe this . Howbeit we haue ſome kynd of concocyngs of it, which ought to be ynough to humble vs, that we may conſider the works of God. And in the meane whyle, our Lord would that the groſſer ſort, (I meene thoſe that haue not the meane to follow lerning) ſhould haue ſufficient occaſion and be wiſe ynough to glorifie him, in that it is ſayd by Moyses, that there are twoo greate lyghts, the one to rule the day and the other to rule the nyght. Not that the Moone is bigger than the other Starres or Planets, for it is certayne that there are Starres in the ſkye which are bigger thā the Moone. And why cannot we ſee them ſo greate? Bycause of their farre diſtance from vs . For they are exceeding hygh in reſpect of vs, inſomuch that they ſeeme not ſo greate as they be, by reaſon of the greate diſtance that is betweene the ſkies and vs . And God ſpeaketh vnto vs of theſe things, according to our perceyuing of them, and not according as they be. VVhyſo? It is as if he ſhould ſay . True it is that all men atteyne not to ſo ſharp vnderſtanding as too knowe how big the planets are, what is the proportion of the Starres, and how they be diuided: euery man (I ſay) knowes not this: buſt open you your eyes and looke vp, and ye ſhall ſee the Sunne which is a lanterne of light, yea and the greate light that lighteneth the whole world, and ye ſhall ſee the ſhyning of the Moone . Then if men had no more but this: it is ynough to make them glorifie the infinite wiſdome of God. According also as it is ſayd, that God hath cut off all excuse, to the intent they ſhould not raunge at alauenture . Bycause they bee no greate clerks, he ſayeth no more buſt open your eyes without haung any further ſkill, and ye ſhall be conſtreynd too honour mee, and to woondre at my wiſdome and power, and at the goodneſſe alſo that I vſe towards you, in im-ploying ſuich creatures to your ſeruice. And al the matter lyes in our referring of theſe things to their right end: wherin we ſee the foundneſſe of mannes wit . The Philosophers diſplayed the greate Treasures of Gods wiſdome, as in reſpect of Astrologie, for it is a thing that ſur-mounteth all opinion of man, to ſee how they could ſpye out that thing that was ſo hidden. True it is that ſuich as ſhall reade Astrologie, may well comprehend and knowe any thing that iſ ſpoken thereof in books. But the wonderousneſſe is of them that did first wryte them. I ſpeak of the ryght Astrologie, and not of the baſtaſtrologie which the ſoothſayers and forcerers vſe in telling men their

their good fortunes and such like things. I speake of the lerning of that science wherby men knowe the order of the skyes and this goodly furniture which men see. And certesse a man shall see woondfull things, so as he shall be abashed to heare the Astronomers speake. True it is that they imagin things that are not in the skyes: but they imagin them not without reason: for they doo it to shewe by certayne degrees and measures, the things that myght be to hygh and to deepe to comprehend. VVe, and haue the Philosophers disputed much of this matter? Hathe God giuen them a greater grace than can bee beleueed, to note and marke out Gods secrets that are onhygh? yet haue they missed of the principall poynt. For they haue not knowne God, ye see how they bee wanzed away in their owne thoughts. But euill haue they profited to whom God hath ben so gracious as too lift them aboue the skyes, in such wise as they haue measured them as a man myght measure a plat of land, or a house, to say, it is so many paces or so manie foote. Then like as a man myght measure some place here by lowe, so haue the Philosophers measured all the spaces that are betweene the Planets, and also the Starres them-selues. To be short it is a thing that hath alwayes ben atteyned vnto. And yet in the meane whyle, how haue they knownen God who sheweth himself opely in all his creatures? So little hath their knowledge led the to the glorifying of him, that haue rather darkened his maiestie by it. VVe see then that it standeth vs in hand too take another way: and wheras here is speaking of the Sunne, and of the Planets, and of the Starres: it is not to the end 30 that we should only knowe these naturall reasons too rest there: but to the end wee should bee guyded vntoo God to honour him and to doo him homage when wee behold the glorie thathee sheweth and vttereth vnto vs in his visible creatures. Thus ye see what wee haue too mark in this streyne. But what? VVe see that now a dayes mens witts wader and become fond as at all tymes heretofore. And that is not only in the thing that is shewed vs here. For although we speake not of the Starres: yet we neede to go farre to perceyue what God is. Let 40 vs abyde still in ourselues as saynt Paule sayeth in the seuententh of the Acts: let vs but looke every man into himself: and [we shall find that] we haue not any mouing, nor any power in vs, but only by Gods dwelling in vs. And yet for all that, we comprehend him not. If wee say, O I haue no eyes, wee neede but too grope (sayeth saint Paule, for he vseth the same word) as a blind man that goeth groping in the dark: though we ca but grope with our eyes shet, yet will God (spight of our teethe) make vs feele what his power, his wisdome, his goodnessse 50 and his ryghtuousnesse are. But what? we continue blockish and beastly and vtterly witlesse. True it is that we be sharpwitted ynough in vayne and tryfing things: but in the eace of our saluation, there we fayle: there wee bee worse than the brute beasts that haue not one drop of good wit. So much the more therefore behoueth it vs to mark wel these sentences, wherein our Lord sheweth vs, that if we looke vp to heauenward, we ought to bethink vs thus, behold it is God that hath giuen vs eyes to perceyue this goodly order. And if we looke downward, 60 [we ought to thinke] what is it that sheweth it self every where? let vs assure ourselues, that it is God, which sheweth himself opely, to the intent that we should think vpon him. Thus yee see how wee may profit our selues by this text. To bee shrt, let vs bee well aduyed to occupie our selues in this studie, vntill wee haue comprehended the power and wisdome of God, that wee may be put in mynd to honour him. I say to honour him as he is woorthie. For men acquit themselves lightly, and when they haue doone some ceremonie vnto God, they think he ought to hold himself contented with it. But the honour that he requyret and which is due vnto him, is that we should quake vnder him, as oft as we heare him spoken of: and that we should acknowledge him to bee our iudge and be abashed, assuring ourselues that he is able too sink vs which one only loke, and that he is able too make the mountaynes too melt away as wax doeth against the Sunne. Then what shall become of vs that are so frayle? First let vs be abashed at the maestie of God, and afterward let vs also take hold of his ryghtuousnesse as it behoueth, saying that nothing hath any being but of him, for he is the fountayne of all benefits: when wee feele after this sort what God is, fearing him earnestly and trembling at his maestie. It is the profit that we must make of it. Howbeit forasmuchas wee bee yet very faire from that point: let every one of vs lerne to recorde this lesson. And thus ye see what we haue to beare in mynd concerning this text. Furthermore, it is not requisite to go seeke the stories, whither any mountaynes haue ben sunken into the deepe or no. But when it is sayd heere, that God remoueth the mountaynes and they feele it not at all: it serueth too shewe that like as hee hath once settled the earth and builded it as it were vpon verye deepe foundacions: If it please him he can chaunge all in such wyse, as the mountaynes shall be turned into valleyes. Job then recyteth not a thing alredy come to passe, in some certayne tyme or place: but sheweth how it is a thing that God can doo, according as it is sayd in another text, when it pleaseth him, the mountaynes: melt away before him as wax doeth at the heate of the Psa.97.4.5. Sunne. And so this serueth to do vs to vnderstand that he can doo it so often as he listeth. Ye see then what we haue to mark cheefly. This doone, wee must compare them with our owne fraynesse. For what are wee in comparison of a mountayne? how greate firmnesse is in it? All the artillerie in the world can doo nothing to it: and as for vs, there needeth but one little finger to ouerthrowe vs. Now if Gods looke bee so terrible and dreadfull, that heauen and earth shake at it, (as the scripture sayeth): shall a mortall man be able to stande before him? VVhen wee shall haue knowne our owne frayltie, and throughly digested Gods myghtie power, we shall haue donee verye much. Howbeit forasmuch as we think very feeldome of it, let vs hardly lerne all our lyfe long, and let vs study this lesson, and let vs alwayes bee scholers. Now after that Job hath spoken so, he addeth that God passeth before him, and he seeth him not: and that he goeth to and fro, and he perceyuetb him not: wherein he doeth vs too wit, that although God vtter himself vnto vs, yet shall he be inuisible. How is it that God vttereth or sheweth himself vnto vs? By his works, and not in his substance: for in his substance wee shall never see him. Neuerthelesse we knowe him after such a sorte, as we be constreyned to see that his hand hath passed that way. Thus ye see the recorde which he yeldeth vs of his presence. God then passeth before vs, that is to say, he maketh vs to perceyue his power which spredeth it self in such wyse through all the whole world, as it is hard at hand with vs: and yet notwithstanding he is inuisible, that is too say, although the sayd vttering and shewing of himself be according to nature: yethauie not we the full knowledge thereof, nother are we able too comprehend it by reason of the small capacitie of our wit: but wee stand astonyed at it. As for example: If I see the ground bring foorth frute: behold, I am put in mynd of the goodnessse and power of our God. In the spring-springtyme when we see the earth open hir bowels and vster hir ryches: behold, God sheweth himself and passeth by vs. Againe, when one whyle the sunne shyneth and another whyle it rayneth: Then doeth God passe by, on eyther side of vs: he maketh his walke to and fro according too the varietie that he sheweth, and it is as much as if he went from one place to another, to the intent that men should vew him the better. For were he settled in some one place to abyde there, as it were in a chayre without remouing: we should not perceyue him so well. But now he walketh vp and downe, verely too the intent to gather vs the better to himself. VVell then, is God shewed vnto vs so: that is to wit, if we conceyue the sayd power or vertue that sheweth it self in trees, in corne, in Herbes, in Vynes, and in all things? no: we may well haue some vnderstanding, and wee may well perceyue some thing: how bee it that is but in part: Sothen God shall neuerthelesse passe to and fro, and yet we shall not see him. Now if in these things which are so bace and which seeme to be of no greate value, God walk before vs and we perceyue him not as he is, but only very little: what shall we do when we come too his hygher woorks that are more secret, and when God intendeth to woork after an extraordinarie maner? like as sometymes he executeth his iustice, yea euē in such wise as we are astonied at it, and cannot perceyue how it commeth to passe. Now if we be astonied at the things that God sheweth dayly, and which may be comprehended by the order of nature: must we not needs fayle and be vtterly at our witts end, when we shall come to those woorks of his that are faire 30 greater? It is certaine that we needs must. Therefore let vs mark well how it is sayd here, that when God passeth by vs, we shall not perceyue him. Hereby we be warned, not to stand in contention with God, too say, how shall this be doone? or how shall that come to passe? For his power is infinite. Yea and although it shewe it selfeuen in the smallest things, yet can it not be comprehended by reason: although it be there, yet do not we perceyue it but in part. I haue told you alredye that this must not be expounded of the substance of God, but only of his woork, wherby he vterereth himself vnto vs: and yet whē he sheweth himself there, and is come neere vs so familiarly, if we se him not then: how shall we do in comparison when we purpose to come vnto himself and to enter talk with him to surmount him? Shall we be myghtie ynough to do it? Sothen we see what the ouerweening of men is, when they mynd too match themselves so with God, as they weene themselves able to stye aboue the clouds. Alas: we see what folly, or rather what madnesse is in them. Then let vs mark well to what purpose this sentence is placed here as I haue layd it foorth. After this, Job treateth of Gods power and strength, saying that God c. a. beth, and who is he that wil plucke it out of his fist? who is he that dare say vnto him, why doest thou so? Verely it seemeth that Job graunteth heere an absolute power to God, and such a one as hath nother ryght nor reason in it. But let vs mark that he pursueth still the same poynyt that was declared yesterday: that is too wit, that Gods iustice consisteth not only in punishing of transgessors, when their crymes be noterious. VVherin then? Euen in that when God woorketh so straungely, as he seemeth vntoo vs to haue no reason in his doings, but to doo vs wrong, so as euen the very vnbelieuers take occasion too grudge against him: euen therein specially wee must acknowledge his ryghtuousnesse. But in this streyne it is sayd, that God will snatch. And doeth he snatch? No: but hereby it is ment that if God vse anye terrible power that maketh vs afrayd, as if he were a Lyon (as oftentymes he likenneth himself too the wyld beasts) in such wyse as he ouerwhelmethall, and turneth the earth vpsyde downe (as they say): when God thundereth after such a sort, so as we be amazed at it: yet may no man say vnto him, wherefore doest thou so? and much lesse may he plucke the pray out of his fist. That is to say, it is not for men to plead with God, for they shall but lose tyme. True it is that men think they haue a good cause too make complaints: yea and they are so senselesse in that behalfe, that when they haue spewed vp their blasphemies, they think they haue gotten the victorie of God. But in the end they must be condemned whensoeuer God listeth too reply against them, and to make them feele his power and myght: not a tyrannouse power, as they haue imagined, but yet an infinite power which sheweth not it self to our vnderstanding, to say whither God be ryghtuouse or no, according to that which wee perceyue of him. No, no: But God is ryghtuouse euen then when wee would condemne him: accordingly as it is sayd in the one and fiftith Psalme, Thou shalt be found rygh- Psal.51.b.6. uouse, euen when thou haste condemned men. Then may men well stryue against God: but yet in the end all mouthes shall bee stopped, and God shall bee found ryghtuouse. And why doeth the prophet David vse that maner of specche there, but bycause men are so presumptuouse as to make God to stoupe to their lufe, and make no bones in condemning of him, to iustifie themselves?

Ye see then after what maner this sentence of Iobs must be expounded. And now we see in effect how he hath confirmed the matter that we delt with yesterday: that is too wit, concerning the power and strength of God. Are we desyrousto knowe the power and strength of God? Then let vs settle our witts to the consideration of the order of nature as we see it in heauen and earth, that the same may serue to bring vs vnto God, yea and that we may so conceyue of him, as we may humble our selues before him to yeeld him all honour. Is not this ynough for vs yet? Then let vs go on further. Surely it is ouergreatte brutishnesse in vs, that heauen and earth and all the whole order of nature suffizeth vs not to shewe vs what God is. For ye see the booke is written in litters big ynough, and therwithall there is so greate store of diuers instructions, that when we shall haue profited in a thousand, there shall be a hundred thousand others wherat we ought to lerne somewhat more: But if we be so dull, as that nother heauen nor earth can profit vs: let vs come to our selues. Let vs bethink vs, well then, doth God come so familiarly vnto vs, as well in his woorkes, as in all things that we see in our selues? Though we cannot knowe him as he is, yet at leastwyse let vs perceyue him whē he worketh so familiarly in vs. But it is certaine that we fayle in that behalfe: and therfore we must conclude that we haue no wit to know God. Now then when we shall haue inquired of Gods presence and power, let vs lerne to humble ourselues according as Job addeth here for a conclusion. Behold (sayeth he) whensoever I shall come to answer before him, I wil never attempt to iustifie myself, but I wil submit myself to my iudge to intreate him. Now we see wher-vnto all leaneth that Job hath spoken, although his talke be disordered. Verely we may gather a good lesson of it, though we haue no more but the generalitie that hath bē declared heretofore. But now when Job sheweth vs the mark that he shooteth at: it is certaine that that will profit vs double. So then let vs mark well this woord, how that after that Job hath spoken of Gods power and wisdom, and giuen here some mirours & presidēts of it: he sayeth, what what is to be done then my freends? Ye see God is our judge. When euery of vs hath looked into himself, put the case that we be no euill doers that haue led altogether a wicked lyfe: put the case we haue ben no whoremongers, no murtherers, nor Theeues: put the case that God be not able too charge vs that wee haue liued naughtily and wantonly: yet notwithstanding who is he that dares be so bold as to open his mouth too say, I am ryghtuouse and I deserue well that thou shouldest receyue mee to mercie? where is he that dares presume to be so bold? what is too bee doone then? VVee must come before our judge to intreate him by fayre meanes. And this woord Intreate importeth that we must pleade guilty: that is too say, that wee must knowe how there is nothing but matter of death and damnation in vs: that there is nothing but sin and wickednesse in vs: and that wee haue none other refuge but only too his mere mercy. Thus ye see what the woord Intreate importeth. And so as oft as there is any speaking of presenting our selues before Gods maiestie, let vs mark well that he caintot be glo:ifid at our hands as he ought to be, except wee bee brought vterly vnder foote, so as all mouthes be stopped and the whole world confesse themselues indetted vnto God, as saynct Paule speaketh in the third to

Rom.3.c.19. the Romanes. Therefore when we come to make intrestance before our judge, let it not be with a mynd to iustifie our selues, for we shall get no good by so dooing. Also let vs not imagin that the honour which God requireth of vs, consisteth in ceremonies nor in braueries, nor in any other like things: let vs not stand vpon apish toyes, as the Papists doo, and vpon I wote not what other gewgawes that men haue brought in of themselues. I say let vs not think that God will be serued and honored at our hands with such geere. But let vs bend our witts to dedicate our selues wholly vnto him, framing our selues after the rule that he hath giuen vs in his woord, assuring our selues that if wee doo so, hee will dayly increace his gracie gifts more and more in vs, vntill he haue brought vs too saluation, notwithstanding that wee be vnwoorthie of it.

And now let vs fall flat before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of the innumerable faults which we commit dayly against him: beseeching him to make vs knowe them better than wee haue doone, that we may be touched with true repentance, and desyre him to guyde vs in all our wayes, leading vs by his holy spirit, and receyuing vs as his children whom he hath adopted in the persone of his only Sonne: and that he will make the preciouse bloud auayable which he hath shed for our redemption: to the end that being confounded in our owne sinnes, and in the offences that we haue committed against him, we may flee to his mercie for refuge: and that in the meane whyle it may please him too susteyne vs in our infirmities, and not suffer vs to be giuen ouer to worldly vanities, but that we may couet the heauenly things, and apply all our witts therewnto. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs but also &c.

The xxxv. Sermon, which is the third vpon the ninth Chapter.

This Sermon contayneth still the exposition of the xij. xiij. and xv. verses, and then the text that is set downe here.

16. If I call vpon him and he ansyver mee, yet vwould I not think thah he hatt heard mee.
17. He hath smitē meedovvne vvith a vvhirle vvynd, and he hath vvoūded me vvithout cause.
18. He giueth mee no leyture to take breathe, but he filleth mee vvith bitternesse.
19. If man go to strength, behold he is strong: and if a man deale [vvith him] by Iustice, vwho is he that may cope vvith him?
20. If I iustifie my self, myne ovne mouth condemneth mee: If I alledge myne vptyghtnesse, he shall eiteeme mee froward.
21. If I say I am sound, yet knowve I not I my soule, and my life mysliketh mee.
22. Behold one point vvh herein I am resolued: that is to vvit, that God destroyeth the ryghtuous and the vnryghtouusealyke.

Esterday: we treated of this poynyt, namely that although wee knowe not our sinnes sufficiently: yet notwithstanding it behoueth vs too come vnto God with intrestance. That is to say, euery of vs must acknowledge himself a wretched sinner, and assure ourselues that all of vs haue neede of the mercie of him that can condemne vs with good ryght,

Rom.3.c.19. according as Paule sayeth that all of vs are runne in arreages him. And whyso? because (sayeth he) we be destitute of Gods glorie. As to menward we may well gloriſe ourſelues, and it may ſeeme vnto vs that wee haue good cauſe ſo to doo: But come we once to the greate iudgementeate, there we muſt all of vs ſtand conſounded. And here ye ſee why it is ſayd, that if God withdrawe not his wrath, all ſtrong helpeſhall bee beaten downe by him: and when we ſhall haue gathered togither all that may ayde vs, God ſhall ouerturne it euery whit, except he be pacified: that is to ſay, except that he of his goodneſſe receyue vs to mercie. For there is no hope at all that wee ſhould preuayle againſt him. Therefore it behoueth vs to fall to ſome agreement. And how may God be ſet at one with me? Is it by making payement of theſelues? or is it by ſhewing themſelues to be ryghtuouſe when he maketh inquiftion? No, but by making intrestance according to that which I haue ſayd alredye. Then let vs mark how it is in vaine too ſeeke meanes heere and there too withstand Gods wrath, or to ſtop it that wee ſhould not be conſumed by it. It behoueth vs to keepe the way that is ſhewed vs here: that is to wit, the wrath of God muſt be pacified. Thus much concerning that point. Now I obadeth that it were but loſt tyme to make choice of wordes with God. VVhereby he doeth vs to wit, that men may like well to vſe retorik, according as there are many that beſoite themſelues with their owne woordes, and like wel of them, and are of opinion that like as they bleare the eyes of them that are not verye cleersyghted: ſo God ſhall be beguyled with theſe alſo. But Iob ſayeth here, that when we ſhall haue chozen our wordes, and told a goodly payn-painted tale that might amaze our hearers, God will not passe a whit for it. Then must all babling and all retorike ceasse when we come before the heauenly throne. For

Dan. 7.c.10. tungenes are not heard there : Mens thoughts muste come Apoc. 20.c. to light there : these bookees must be opened there . God

12. will make none other inquisition, than the bringing forth

Rom. 2.c.15 of our owne cōsciences, which may as now hide and excuse themselues in many startingholes : but as then they must lay themselues open, so as all must be knowne and apparent. So then let no man beguyle himselfe with that which he can alledge afore men . For all that geere must be ouerthrownen, when God summoneth vs before him.

And hereby Job meeneth in effect, that wee muste not measure Gods righteousnesse by the righteousnesse of men . And why ? If wee pleade after the maner of men, then no doubt but that our case will go on our side: yea as wee suppose . But when the whole worlde shal haue quitte vs and iustified vs, yea and clapped their handes at vs, and that wee on our side shall haue liued in such sorte as no fault may bee found in vs : yet shall wee stop short when wee come vnto God : the chaunce shall bee quite chaunged . Lette vs learne then, that all the aduaantage that wee can haue now to the worldwarde, shall bee nothing but vanitie . And so, will wee stande before God ?

wee must first marke well what he is: wee muste call to minde his mighty power, whereof mention hath bene made heretofore : and then shall we be bereft of all glo-

Self as it were in a gulfe, so as it hath no light in respect of naturall vnderstanding, nor in respect of aught that wee can see : in so much that when we haue debated the matter throughly, wee can conclude none otherwile but that God is against vs, that God is our enimie, or at the least that God hath set vs in that plight as a pray giuen vp vnto Satan, so as there is no more hope nor meane of recouerie. Yee see then to what plundge God putteth vs, howbeit but only in respect of our fleshly vnderstanding, according to our owne reason, & for aught that wee can see by nature. But God giueth vs as it were a sparke of brightnesse, and he giueth vs some feeling of faith, howbeit that we nother know it nor can discerne Rom. 8.e.25 it. And here ye see why S. Paule sayeth, that the sighes and gronings which God stirreth vp in vs too make vs pray vnto him, are vnutterable : that is to say, they cannot be expressed. Beholde a faithfull man that prayeth vnto God, he sigheth and groneth, and after what maner ? Behold (sayeth S. Paule) when the faithfull persone maketh supplication vnto God, he knoweth not what he doeth : it is a thing that outreacheth his mind & all his thoughts, not that wee become like brute beastes in praying vnto God : not that we be voyde of vnderstanding : S. Paule meeneth not so : but his intent is to say, that God worketh after a straunge fashion when wee be so ouercombered with our owne passions, as we note not what too say, nor see not any likelyhood that he wil be fauorable and merciful to vs. Now then when we be insuch a pecke of troubles, although our insight be so dimme as we cannot perceyue that God will supply our infirmities : yet 30 neverthelesse let vs tarie his leyisure till he worke in vs, yea euē by some meane that is vnknownen too vs and to high for vs to atteyne vnto. Lo how Job pretendeth that he beleueed not that God had regarded him, nor heard him, although he answered him. To bee shorte, he doeth vs to vnderstand, that this present temptation was so vnruley and excessiue, as he forwent the whole taste of Gods goodnesse, yea and that his faithe was as good as quenched as in respect of his owne naturall reason. Not that it was vtterly perished : but because it was as a little 40 fire vnder the Ashes, it was as good as choked. If Job were ouerwhelmed with his temptation : alas, what shall become of vs ? If he whom the holy Ghost hath set before vs for a mirrour of pacience was brought so lowe, asto be falne into so deepe a pit of dreadfulness : I pray you, if God touch vs to the quicke, must not we needes be more swallowed vp to that whirlpoole ? So much the more neede then haue we to pray God to strengthen vs. And though we light now and then into such temptations : let vs not be out of hart, it is no token that God hath cast vs away, nor that we be destitute of his holy spirite. And why so ? For he vseth a wonderful fashion in gouerning & rescuing those that are his, notwithstanding that in respect of their owne nature they haue conceyts and imaginacions which dismay them and plundge them ouer head & eares yea euē downe into hell, so as there remayneth nothing for them to say, but that the Diuell holdeth them as his slaves. But what ? They haue their eyes so troubled for a time, as they are not able to loke at him, but they are as it were dazeled at it : neverthelater he leaueth them some feeling of his maiestie to holde them alwayes backe, that they should not vtterly despayre. Thus ye see how the effect that we haue to marke, is that in the middes of these great temptations, where the Diuell shall haue wonne so much at our hands as that it shall seeme vnto vs that wee must be vtterly ouerwhelmed, and that there is no shift to get out of it : we must continue in calling vpon our God, yea euē till such time as he haue giuen vs the light againe which was as it were ouercouered in vs for a time. Not that it was quite quēched, as I haue sayd: for what shoulde haue become of vs if God should haue left vs vp for altogether? but God suffereth the sayd brightnesse of faith and of his holy spirit which he hath put into vs, to be as it were stifted, after the same maner that I haue already declared by cōparison of a litle fire ouercouered with ashes, in which case the fire may neverthelesse be kindled againe in time. Euē so is faith smouldred after such a sort, 10 as it sheweth not one sparke, vntill God kindle vs againe, & chace away the darknesse wherewith we were possessed and ouerwhelmed. And after that Job hath vttered this sentence, he addeth : Eebold be bath smitten me downe with a whirlwind, and wounded me without cause. VVhen Job sayeth that God had strickē him down with a whirlwind, it is to signify that it is no wōder though he imagineth that God is so sore against him that he cannot by his natural reason hope for any fauour at his hād. Do ye thinke it straunge (sayeth he) that I should say, I cannot suppose that 20 God doth heare me, whē he shal haue answered me? for I haue an eye to this present affliction, wherewith I am so wholly possessed, as nothing may assuage my grief. This is it that I haue touched already, namely that the woundes which God maketh, when he sheweth himselfe as our enimie, & when he cyteth vs to iudgemēt & we see nothing but an angrie cōtenāce: are very sensible. Therfore when we come to that poynt, it is certaine that we be so ouerwhelmed with sorrow, as nothing may cōfort vs nor giue vs paciētneſſe. Now we see what Iobs meening is : that is to wit, that for that present tyme, Gods wrath & the feeling that he had therof bereft him of al mean of cōforting himselfe, & of all herkening to the declaration that could be made to him to comfort him withall. But we must alwayes bear in mind what hath ben declared heretofore, that is to wit, that God never sheweth himselfe so angrie towardes his owne, but that he maketh them to feele his goodnesse in some wise or other, howbeit not so as they alwayes perceyue it. And it is a thing not easie to comprehend, that this should be so. Neverthelesse it behoueth vs 30 to wayte for it, if we wil be Gods childre : but yet we shal haue much ado to perceiue it but by practise. Some poore nā being assaulted with these temptations [shall perchance say,] how is it ? doth God regard me ? No : for behold I pine away, & I cal vpon him, and yet I find no cōfort, and therfore it is a signe that he hath shaken me off. Afterward his sinnes come to his remēbrance, and the Diuell stirreth vp store of such stuffe as are horrible. Thus ye see a poore creature that is vtterly ouerwhelmed. VVhen this is past, then cometh God to make al whole againe, the cōscience that was so tormentēd afore, becōmeth quiet: looke where was nothing but darkenesse before, there doth he nowe shine, there sheweth he a sweete & amiable cōtenāce after the maner of fayre weather. That is to wit, though the partie were in such temptations for a tyme, did God suffer his sayth to perish and to be vtterly disfeated ? No, it is impossible. For faith is an vncorrupiiblē seede in our soules. Howbeit (as I haue sayd already) as in respect of mans whole naturall wit & reason, we must needes be as blind, vntil God shew vs his fauor. And it behoueth vs to 40 mark wel these wordes when Job sayeth, that God smiteth him with a whirlwind : for his intent is to vtter an extraordinarie maner of dealing . It is not as though God layd vpon mee with a cudgell, or as though he had giuen me a stripe with a swoord : But he hath affrighted me (sayeth he) as if he had caste downe some thunderbolte or some whirlwinde vpon mee. The blowes that wee receyue here bylowe, are not alwayes so deadly : but if thunders light vpon vs from heauen, wee bee but dead men. Job

Job therfore meeneth, that the wouds which he hath receiued are as if he were sunken into the bottollese deeps. And why? For (sayeth he) lightning and whirlwinde are falne vpō me frō heauen. And this is worth the noting. For it is one of Satans policies to drive vs to despoyre, by bearing vs in hand that God hādleth vs with vnaccustomed rigour: for Satan will tell vs in our eare, what meenest thou? It is true that God chastizeth sinners, and afterward pitith them: God visiteth his owne whom he loueth: but that is after a fatherly maner, and he always moderateth his rigour. But as for thee, doth he hādle thee so? He thundreth against thee, and how canst thou perswade thy selfe then, that he will shewe thee mercie? It is impossible. Now then when the Diuell beares vs in hand that God vieth an accustomed rigour against vs: he maketh vs to conclude, that wee shall thenceforth haue no more recourse vnto him, nor muste not trust any more that euer he will receyue vs to fauour. So much the more then behoueth it vs to marke this text wherin Job sayeth that he was smitten with a whirlwind. Nowe if he haue passed that way, and yet for all that we see that God did succour him neuerthelesse: Let vs wayte for the like in our sekies. And furthermore let vs marke well how Job speaketh here according to his affliction: he was not senselesse. God then not onely thundred vpon him, but also gaue him the knowledge to feele that God thundered. It had bene ynough to haue ouerwhelmed him: but in the meane season he had a secrete remedie, as I haue sayd. Therefore let vs hope for the lyke. As concerning that he addeth that God b̄th giuen him many wounds without cause: it seemeth very rude geere. For that God shoulde torment men after a sort without cause, it is not only simple vniustice, but such a crueltie as he were not to be taken any more for iudge of the worlde, but rather for a tyrant. It seemeth that Job blasphemeth God here in saying that he was smitten and wounded without cause. But if we remember what hath bene sayd: we shal know his meening and what he speaketh. For the holy Ghost hath guydeth and gouerned him in his tung, to the intent that wee should haue an instruction that might be much to our profite. Job then first sayeth here (according to his naturall vnderstanding) that God smiteth him without cause. And afterward moreouer let vs marke that these wordes without cause haue respect to the apparant & opē knowledge of men. I haue told you heretofore, that Gods Justice is knowne two wayes. For sometimes God punishest the sinnes that are notorious to the worldward. Ye see that God chastizeth such a one. And why? for men haue knowne him a shameful whoremaster full of filthinesse & dishonestie: men haue knowne him to be a blasphemer and swearer: men haue knowne him for a drūkard & ryotter: men haue knowne him to be giue to raking, to extortiōn, and to al vnfaithfulness. VVell, when God executeth his Justice vpon such a one: there is no man but he seeth it, behold, God is a iudge when he suffereth not crimes to scape unpunished. Also Gods iustice is knowne in his secret iudgements, when wee see God smite and torment such folke as had no notable faults in them, but rather they had some vertues in them. Ye shal see sometimes that a whole Citie or a whole Countrie is put to hauocke: yee see all is put to the fire and swoord, yea euē the little babes in whom was nothing to bee seene but innocencie. VVell, yee see things that to our seeming are straunge. In this case we must glorifie God, yea euē though the reason thereof be not open vnto vs. God will not shewe vs at the first day, why he suffreth and ordeyneth such things. May wee dispute with him, and aske why he doth it, or demaund the reason of it? Yee see then what Job ment by these wordes without cause: his meening was not that God as in respect of him selfe doth punish men without cause. For (as I haue sayd afore) that were an vniuste Tyrannie. But he taketh these wordes [without cause] in respect of that which we perceyue. And herein it is included that we must reuerence Gods Justice. Although it be hidden, and ouercast with darke and thicke cloudes: yet must we beleue that there is nothing but right and indifference in it. And although that to the seeming of our naturall reason we finde no Justice in God, but rather that his Justice is as it were transformed into vngiustessee: yet muste we glorifie him neuerthelesse. Thus yee see what Job ment by sayng that he was wounded without cause: that is to wit, as if a man shoulde haue demaunded of him, knowest thou any euident cause in thy selfe why God punishment thee? I see none. For Job was handled after a very straunge fashion. VVee haue seene how he was as it were a mirrour of a castaway, and how it might seeme that God was minded too vtter all his anger and wrath against him. Job therefore sawe not to what ende God did this: there was no reason in it, as to his knowledge. That is true: for he speaketh not in hypocrisie. And in deede God did it not in that respect, he punished not Job as who should say he was a wicked man, and therfore ought to be punished more than other men. VVherefore did he it then? It is bycause the Diuel accuseth him, that he had nother vprightnesse nor soundnesse in him, and God ment that he shoulde come to the triall and that men should knowe what a one he is. Gods intent then was not to punish Jobs sinnes in lyke measure as he had offended. For in the meane whyle he spared many wicked men and dealt not so roughly with them. And so we see now that Job blasphemeth not at all when he sayeth, that God woundeth him without cause, forasmuch as that woerde is ment simply as he speaketh it: that is to wit, that he knewe not any speciaill cause why God punishment him so, according as of truth he knewe none. But out of all doubt, if God shoulde vse all the rigour that were poſible, against a man that were like the Angels of heauen, and walked in all soundnesse and perfection: [I say] if God shoulde vtter al his rigour against him: yet shoulde he be iust and righteous still. Yea verily: and yet were that without cause. True it is that if we take coſtell of our own brayne, if we discusse the case as it commeth too our owne fleshly vnderstanding, wee shall say, it is without cause. But without any inquisition, or without running a head, it behoueth vs to conclude, that forasmuch as God is righteous, he knoweth why he doth it. VVee see no cause: but yet must we glorifie him. Lo in what plight Job was. And he addeth, that God giueth him not respit to take breath, but feedeth him with bitterness. Here Job sheweth that besides that his miserie is greate and excessiōn, it doth also hoide on still, and the chiefe piece of his temptatiōn is that God feedeth him with bitterness, that is to say, that he filleth him in such wise with anguish, as he cannot finde so much as one little scrappe of his goodnesse to refresche him with, that he may take courage. And here yee see yet better, how God doeth now and then cast his seruaunts euē to the bottome of their graue. And it is a thing that we ought to marke wel. For there is not that man of vs, whiche shall not finde himselfe sore combered when God turneth his backe vpon vs, or if wee perceyue him to haue a terrible countenance so as he shewe himselfe to be as it were angrie with vs. For then alas, euē the boldest and most aduenturous are so quayled, as they see nothing but death before their eyes. Howe shall wee doo then who are yet so weake and feeble? So muche the more therefore doth it stand vs in hand to marke wel these textes: that is to wit, that when God not onely hath giuen poore creatures some signe of his anger, but also holdeth them lokked vp there, so that when they would take winde and draw their breth, in hope to haue some litle smacke of his fauour to alay their grieses withal, God cometh on stil to increace the miserie. Seing that Job hath bene in such extremitie, why should not we be so to. Therfore whensoeuer wee be in any meane aduersitie, let vs prepare our selues to receyue grieuouser when it pleaseth God to send them, vntill that he haue remedied all our miseries. Thus ye see what we haue to marke vpon this text. But Job bewrayeth himself more opely anon after, in saying: If yee speake of strength, who is like unto God? If the matter must come to Justice, who is he that can summon him? Or who can finde any matter that we hold plea with him as if we stode vpon euuen ground with him? There is none at all. I conclude then (sayeth he) that God consumeth the righteous and the vnrighteous all togither. There are two wayes for vs to recouer our right, when men shall haue taken ought from vs that is ours: for we go about it eyther by force or by way of Iustice. Princes maynteyne their quarelles with bloudshed: and priuate persones would do as much, if they might be suffered. Alwayes they would begin by way of deedes, and hardly can they withhold themselues from it, what punishment so euer be prepared for them. And there is also the ordinarie meanes of Iustice, Job taketh both these things here, as if he should say, True it is that I find my self torméted with extremitie, and yet notwithstanding, howe shall I withstand my God? For if I fal to violence, what shall I gaine by it? I am no egall match for him. If I go to it by way of Iustice, will he receyue me? who shall take vpon him as Judge or vmpar betwixt vs? whereat shall I beginne my plea? To be short, I see that God consumeth both the righteous and the wicked. This talke seemeth yet more straunge than that which we haue set downe: howbeit if we looke well into it, we may after a sorte make them both one: which thing will be very good, and very fit to serue our turne. VVhereas Job sayeth there is none that can match God in strength nor that can holde plea with him in law, bicause he wil not be so much at comauement: he meeneth not hereby to impute vnto God such a lawlesse power as to do what he listeth and to deale vnjustly. True it is that we ought to aske none other reason at Gods hād, than his own good wil: but yet therewithall we must hold it for a certaintie that Gods will cannot be otherwise than iust & rightfull: no though we see it not to be so, but rather the flat contrarie. Here then Job taketh his grouē vpō that which I haue discoursed afore: that is to wit, That Gods iustice cōsisteth not in the knowledge that wee haue of it, or that can enter into mans brayne. VVherein then? It consisteth in it selfe, so as wee must say, hath God done this or that? It is well done. Hath God willed this? his will is right and rightfull, there is no faulce to be founde in it, And how may that be? If we examine Gods doings, wee shall finde there is no reason in them, and that they be cleane awake to that they should bee: and shall wee therevpon acknowledge him too bee righteous? Howe is that possible? This is it that I touched afore, namely that Gods righteousnesse or iustnesse consisteth in it selfe, so as it needeth not to borroewe allowance. And lette vs not thinke it straunge that God requireth this confession at our handes, that wee should all of vs assure our selues that he is righteous how vnindifferent so euer he seeme to be in his dealings. And why so? I pray you what is our wit? Shall mortall men dare say that they are able too comprehend the measure of Gods righteousnesse? what a folly were that? But for asmuch as our eyesight is dimme, and that we haue much a do to discerne one foote length afore vs, as yee world say: let vs acknowledge our owne measure and what we are able to beare. True it is that our eyesight is hild within boundes and can see no further than this worlde: but there are imaginacions and fancies in vs, which are more nimble to runne euerywhere. Neuerthelesse, when wee shall haue stied aboue the heauens, yet shall we neuer attayne so high, as to the maiestie that is in God: And certes seeing we cannot abide the brightnesse of the sunne, without dazelinge of our eyes: Alas, how shall we attayne so highe as to reache the heighth of Gods righteousnesse, so as nothing might be hidde from vs that shoulde not passe through our examinacion? Then let vs mark well, that Job hath not spoken here of Gods strength and righteousnesse after the maner and meening aforesayd, howbeit that he vse an excessive forme of speach. VVho is he that shall go to lawe with God? For God will giue no eare to him. It insueth then, that God will bee of ful and sufficient credite, and will haue men tied vnto him, and too that which he shall speake in his owne case. But lette vs come backe againe too this conclusion, that it were a fonde and vnreasonable matter, yea and euен against kinde, that God shoulde as it were be raunged in the ranke among men, and that he shoulde not be righteous furtherforth than he maketh vs priuie to it. For then should he abace himself to be our fellow, he shoulde forget himselfe, and he shoulde strip himselfe out of his owne Godhead. So then it is good reason, that Gods righteousnesse shoulde haue this preheminence, that whereas he will not come to account before vs, whereas he will not yelde vs a reason of his doings, yea and euен when he doeth all things contrarie to our vnderstanding and reason: yet notwithstanding wee muste assure our selues that his righteousnesse continueth whole and sounde. And why? Because (as I haue sayd) it consisteth in it selfe. And herevpon Job concludeth, that then God consumeth both the righteous and the vnrighteous. Howe now (sayeth he) is it meete that for asmuch as Gods righteousnesse surmounteth all capacite of man, therfore he should mingle the good and bad so togither as it were in one vessell, doth not goodness proceede of him? VVhy then doth he not know it? why doth he not auow it? why is he not favorable to it? now if God do so consume the good and badde alike, it shoulde seeme that he hath no more righteousnesse in him. And in deede, yee see also howe Abraham reasoneth with him in the eighteenth of Genesis. Lorde (sayeth he) it is not seemely that thou shouldest destroy the righteous with the vnrighteous: that is impossible. How is it then that Job speaketh so? VVe must alwayes holde this grounde, that Job doth not here take the righteous and vnrighteous, as they bee founde to be before God. For where is the righteous when wee come there? But he taketh righteous and vnrighteous according to our perceyuing. Yee see then that a man shall bee righteous, that is too say, he shall leade a good and honest lyfe, he shall walke in the feare of God, and in all purenesse and soundnesse with his neyghbours: and yet when he commeth before the heauenly Throne, the thing that we see not must needes bee discovered there. Thus to our vnderstanding we see both the righteous and the vnrighteous to perish, & that God striketh as wel the one as the other, & that their plages are indifferent, as it is sayd in Salomon. But shall we therefore blasphem God? No: but we muste alwayes beare in minde, that if Gods iustice bee apparent vnto vs, that is to

is to say, if he shewe it openly by punishing the wicked and deliuering the good and suche as haue serued him faithfully: it is well, wee haue too gloriſe him in that behalfe. But if Gods Iuſtice bee not knowne too vs, ſo as it ſeemeth that he confoundeth all togither, and that according to our imaginacion he puniſhe the rightuous and vnightuous togither: yet let not vs therefore ceaſe to acknowledge and confeſſe that he is rightuous in him ſelue, and that it becommeth vs to gloriſe him in all caces and in ali respects. VVhen wee take this way: although 10 things ſeeme vtterly confuzed vnto vs: yet will God giue vs ſuch a wifedome, as wee ſhall acknowledgē that there is nothing done without reaſon: yea and the thing which ſeemeth preſently too be againſt vs, ſhall bee turned too our welfare. Lo what the exercyſes of Christians are: herevnto muſt we apply our indeuer vntill God haue called vs home from all warres. But the chiefest aſſault wherewith he will exercise vs, is that wee may giue him glorie, notwithstanding that it ſeeme he is minded to thunder downe vpon vs.

And nowe lete vs fall flat before the presence of our good God with acknowledgment of our faultes, prayng him to make vs ſo too enter in the examination of our finnes, as when we ſhal haue knowne them throughly, wee may not doubt but that he hath vs at a great aduaantage, and therewpon humble our ſelues both great and ſmall, and all of vs confeſſe our ſelues to bee indereted too that greate iudge. And if that during this mortall lyfe, he handle vs more roughly than wee would, and ſende vs afflictions that are ouersore and contrarie to the fleſhe: lete vs beſeeche him too affwage them, and that although he abate them not at the firſte dashe, yet neuertheleſſe he will alwayes ho'de vs vp with a ſtrong hand, and not ſuffer Satan too inuegle vs too blaſphemie, but that wee may acknowledge his rightuousneſſe and honour it, vntill he make vs feele his goodneſſe in giuing vs full fruition of our ſaluation: too the ende wee may not onely ſende vp our ſighes to him whyle wee be here beneath, but also crie out vnto him with open mouth as to our father. That it may please him too graunt this 20 grace, not onely to vs but also to all people and Nacions of the earth, &c.

The xxxvj. Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the ninth Chapter.

23. If theſcourage kill out of hande, ſhail he laugh at the temptation of innocents?
24. The eart is giuen into the hande of the vvicked, he couereth the faces of the iudges. If not: vvhile is he, or vwho is he?
25. My dayes are paſted more ſvviftly than a Poſte, in ſo much that I haue ſcene no good at all.
26. They be ſlipt avvay ſooner than a ſvvift ſhip, or than a flying Eagle.
27. If I lay in my ſelte, I vvill forget my complaýnt, I vvill appeaſe my vvrath, I vvill comfort mee.
28. I am afraide of my miſeries. For I knowv thou vvilt not iudge me innocent.

Hat wee may fare the better by this doctrine, wee muſte call to remembrance what hath bene ſayde heretofore: namely how Iobs intent was too ſhewe that Gods luſtice appeereth not alwayes vnto men, nor is ſo knowne, as it can be ſayde, that men may touche it with their finger: but rather that God worketh after ſuche a ſtraunge fashion, as it ſeemeth vnto vs that there is nother reaſon nor inifferencie in him, and that he maketh a hotchpotch of al things. But I haue tolde you afore, that Gods Iuſtice doth ſometimes ſhewe it ſelfe, and that there are certaine markes for vs too diſcerne it by. If God puniſh a wicked man, there is none of vs, but he thinketh vs all too 50 haue warning by ſuch example, and wee bee compelled to gloriſe him, according as it is ſayde in the hundred and ſeventh Psalme. If God deliuere any one that calleth vpon him, and hath walked in his feare: we will ſay, God is rightuous. But he keepeth not all one rate too doo continually ſo. For he hath his ſecrete iudgements, whiche are incomprehensible to vs, in ſo much that wee cannot but be abashed and amazed when God ſhall doo things that ſeeme too bee quite againſt reaſon. Yee ſee then howe Iobs meening is, that he findeth himſelfe as it were amazed, bycauſe God ruleth him not after his owne minde and fancie, but hath another maner of doing of his workeſ, which is vtterly vnkowne vnto vs. And here yee ſee why he ſayth, If the whip ſmyte to kill, how ſhall God laugh at the temptation of good men? Bycauſe this ſentencē is darke, and ſhorte (whiche cauſeth darkeneſſe:) it hath bene expounded diuers wayes. But when all is thoroughly conſidered the very right meening is this: namely that if God ryſe vp agaynst the wicked, howe doeth he laugh at the trouble of the good? for he that ſpake afore, (that is to witte Baldad) pretended that God vttereth out his chaſtizementſ openly, ſo as when ſoever men haue deserved it, and whenſoever they haue done amifle, God puniſheth them for it. To be ſhorte, he ſeemed (by his ſaying) that men were already come too the latter day, and that iudgement and Iuſtice were ſet in ful perfection. Howbeit, God reſerueth many things: And ſo yee ſee why God ſeemeth to gouerne things confuzedly to this day. For if he ſhould puniſh all the finnes of men, we would thiñke the end to be come alreadie, & we would no more hope that our Lord Iefus Christ ſhould gather vs vp to himſelf. So then it is needeſful for vs, that God ſhould leaue many faultes vnpuniſhed, & alſo it is needeſful that the good ſhould be afflieted, and ſeeme to haue lost their labour in ſeruynge God. But now let vs come to Iobs wordes. If the ſcourage (ſayeth he) doo ſlea immediatly: that is to ſay, if God make no delay of his corrections, but lift vp his hande to ſmyte men as ſoone as they haue ſinned, and do vnto every man according to his woorthineſſe and deserutings: why ſhould he then laugh at the affliction of good men? for we know that Iuſtice and vprightneſſe conſiſt of two partes: wherof the one is the puniſhing of euill folke, and the other is the releeuing of good folke and the mayntayning of them in their rightuous and ſounde conuerſation. Therefore if God puniſh the wicked: he muſte also on the contrarie part maintayne the good, ſo as he keepe them vnder his tuicion, and ſuffer them not to be troubled or tormented, but that they may feele his ſuccour ſo ſoone as they crie vnto him. Howbeit (as we ſee) the good are puniſhed, not for a day or twoo, but with lingering paynes all their life long.

long so that in stead of shewing any signe that he is minded to help them, it seemeth that God taketh vengeance of them and is purposed to plunge them into the bottolleſſe fit. Then let vs conclude, that he is not hauie to puniſh the wicked oer of had, nor bringeth them at the first brunt to the poyn̄t that men may ſay, Such a one hath done amifle, and therefore he muſte be puniſhed. For it were conuenient that both theſe two things were ioyned together. And the reaſon that Job vſeth here is good. For it is the ſame that S. Paule alſo ſetteth out in his ſeconde Epiftle to the Theſſalonians, ſaying that it beſongeth to Gods rightuousneſſe to puniſh thoſe that trouble the good, and to giue relieve & rest to ſuch as ſhall haue bene oppreſſed wrongfully for a time. The one of theſe points (ſay I) cannot be ſeparated from the other: that is to wit, that if God be riightuous and minde to ſhew it perfectly in this world: on the one ſide he muſt haue his eye vpon al ſuch as do anifle, & not ſuffer them to ſcape his hand, but make the come to a reckoning: and on the other ſide when good men are diſquieted or haue any wrōg or violence offered them, he muſt pitie them and ſhew how he hath them in his hand. Ye ſee (I ſay) how theſe two things ought to maſh together: otherwiſe there ſhould be but the one part of iuſtice in God, and his iuſtice ſhould not be whole and perfect. VVe ſee then that Job hath good reaſon to ſpeakē ſo. And yet for all that, it is not to be ſaid that he liſted vp himſelfe maliciouſly againgt God. As I haue declared heretofore, his intent is to ſhew, that Gods riightuousneſſe is not alwayes apparat, and that we muſt not take it for a generall rule, that as ſoonē as men haue ſinned, God hath his hand bent to puniſh them, & on the contrarie part he wil at the first brunt ſhew himſelfe a preſeruer of the good, by ridding them out of all their miſeries: we muſt not come to that point. And why? Because it is not Gods wil that his riightuousneſſe ſhould alwayes be knownē vnto vs, but rather to ſhew how it is not for vs to enter at any time into his iudgements, but that it behoueth vs to hūble our ſelues whensoeuer he vſeth any maner of dealings that ſhal be quite contrarie to our ſancties: & we muſt not preſume to murmur againſt him for it, but we muſt reuerence theſe great ſecretes which are far aboue our capacitie, vntill ſuch time as we may comprehend that which is hidden frō vs as now. Ye ſee then what Job's meening is. True it is that he ceaſed not to be tormented with an excessiue paſſion. Therefore let vs learne hereby, that it behoueth vs to hūble our ſelues before God, & that although he deale after ſuch a ſtroune faſhiō with vs, as we perceiue nother equitie nor vprightneſſe in it: yet notwithstanding we muſt caſt downe our eyes. But if we haue any inclination to murmur againſt God, when he doth things that we comprehend not by our own reaſon: the ſame wil then ſpecially ſhew it ſelf, when he ſcourgeth vs: then are we ſpurred to repine againſt him, ſaying, what meeneth this? where am I? why doth not God pitie me? Lo how men wexe wood when God handleth them otherwiſe than they like of. But yet ſo it is, that Job fought againſt ſuch temptations. Let vs marke then that Job knew how God is riightuous, & was fully perwaded therof in generall. But when he came to the encounter, & that the miſchief preſſed him: then was he driuen backe and inforced to chafe againſt God. Furthermore there is this reſtingpoyn̄t wherof I haue ſpoken, that ſuc' as wil coſfort themſelues in their afflictiōs, muſt alwayes haue an eye to the rule that Job taketh here: which is, I am not ſcoured at Gods had because I am an euill doer: for God puniſheth not me according to their deſerts. It beconieth vs not to taskē him ſo to our ordinarie maner of proceeding, for he hath iudgements that are incōprehensible to vs. Ye ſee then how Job ſpeaketh. And to coſfirme his matter, he ſayeth: we ſee the good pine away & God helpeth the not: he ſuffereth the to continue in anguifh a yeere or two, yea or all the time of their life: he maketh no coūtenance of coming towards them, they be as poore forlorne folke. Now if God leauē good folke after that maner in their neceſſities: why ſhould it be ſayd that the whip ſtriketh out of hid, that is to ſay, that God is hauie in puniſhing mens offences and ſinnes? VVe ſee 10 the cleane cōtrarie. And herevpo we gather, that we muſt not thinkē our ſelues to be ſcaped frō Gods hand, when (having done our neighbours a ſhrewd turne,) wee be at our eaſe for a time. Let vs beware we flatter not our ſelues when God beareth with vs, but let vs vnderſtand that by that meanes he meeneth to draw vs to reſtance. Abuſet thou Gods pacience, ſayeth S. Paule ſpeaking to ſuch as Rom. 2. 6. were wilful in their naughtineſſe. True it is that God wil haue pitie vpon ſuch as returne vnto him and aske him forgiueneſſe of their faultes: but yet doth it not therfore followe, that he will caſte away all those whom he ſcourgeth in this worlde. Let vs marke then that God puniſheth not men as ſoonē as they haue done amifle: and yet it followeth not that they are therfore acquit, and ſhall neuer be called to account. Nay rather, it is because God giueth vs reſpite here to returne to his mercie; and to beſeech him to receiue vs to mercie. Therfore if we ſee the wicked triumph, and ſcoffe at God, and yet that they are not preſſed by his hand: let vs not bee miſgriued therat, as though God had giuen vp his office and were no longer the iudge of the worlde: but let vs wayte till the time be come. Our Lorde may well delay the correſtions that he intendeth to ſende, and on the other ſide the time may ſeeme long vnto vs: but yet muſt we reſtreynē our mindes, and holde them ſhort, knowing that God wil not puniſh all the ſinnes of the worlde preſently, and he knoweth why: there is reaſon good ynoough why he ſhould do ſo, as I haue ſayd alreadie. For his meening is to holde vs alwayes in ſuſpence, that wee might worſhip him and call vpon him, vntill all things be ſet in order and good ſtate. Thus yee ſee why there is ſo greaſte ſtore of miſlings ſo long as the world indureth. It is bi-cause God intendeth to exercyze vs in faith and hope, to the ende we ſhould wayte for the comming of our Lord Iefus Christe, at which time he ſhall ſet vp all things full and perfectly which are now ſo intermedled. As touching that Job addeth, that God laugheth at the temptation of innocents: he ſpeaketh after the vnderſtanding of man. For we muſt not imagine that God ſporteth himſelfe in the affliction of good men. VVe know what loue he beareth vs: he cannot exprefſe ſufficiently how tender the ſame is, but in ſaying that we be vnto him as the apple of his Deut. 32.b. eye. Then let vs not thinkē that God is ſo crueliſt towards 10. vs as to laugh at our torments, howbeit that we can ima- Zech. 2. c. 8. gine none otherwiſe after the fleſh. Yea [we thinke thus with our ſelues:] Lord, thou knowſt the miſerie wherin I am, I cal vpo thee, I ſigh to thee, I feele how frayle I am: & yet thou letteſt me alone ſtil, and I perceiue not that thou intendest to he p me by any meanes. These things coſidered, we coſclude in our ſelues, that God doth nothing but laugh at vs in heauē. But it behoueth vs to vnderſtand by faith, that whē God doth ſo diſcoūtenance the matter, he ceaſeth not to haue pitie vpon vs. True it is that he ſhoweth it not out of hid: neuertheleſſe it ought to ſuffiſe vs, that being a father to vs he loueth vs as much as wee can wiſhe. For (as Iefus Christ ſheweth) if our fleſhly fathers who are euill by nature, do loue their children: what ſhal God doo who is the fountayne of all goodneſſe? Then lette vs not thinkē that God laugheth at vs: but lette

vs rather too consider that his discountenancing of the matter is for nothing els but to exercise vs, and that he in the meane time ceaseth not to watch ouer vs to succour vs after such a maner as we knowe not of. Thus much concerning this sentence. And Job addeth, That the earth is deliuereed into the bande of the wicked, and that the eyes of the Judges are turned aside: that is to say, that such as ought to redresse the troubles, offences, and misorders that are committed, are guiltie of all. If not, (sayeth he) where is he and who is he? In effect Job sheweth here, that during this present life, things shall be so mingled together, that men shall not (as they say) know white from blacke. The Earth then shall be deliuereed into the hands of the wicked, that is to say, men shal see the wicked haue their full skope here, that such as are moste vntruly, most looce of lyfe, fighters, seditious, and full of all vngraciounesse, so as there is nother vprightnesse nor humanitie in them, shall haue all things at their will. Therefore when wee see God giue bridle to the wicked after suche sorte, what is to be sayde? There is but one onely remedie, which is, that those which beare the warden of Iustice should reppresse such as vexe good men after that fashion. But contrariwyse, it is to be seene that they be so giuen to themselues, that they lette all go too hauocke. What is to be sayd, but that the magistrats which ought to yeeld euery man his right, suffer the wicked to do the worst they can? A man shal finde no reliefe at their hāds, but when he shal haue wayted to haue them do their dutie, it is to no purpose they are but Idols. And what is the cause of all this? And who is to blame for this (sayeth Job) but God? For is not God the gouerner of the earth? Then ought not all the wicked to bee rooted out of it? Or els if he beare with them, and lay the raynes of the brydle in their necke to vexe & trouble good men, without stopping them of their purpose: may it not be sayde that God doth all this geere? On the other side is it not sayd that it is Gods office too gouerne such by his holy spirite as walke in his feare and in modestie? Moreouer he telleth vs how he hath stablished the Ciuell state of the world, and that judges can haue nother wisdome nor discretiō, but at his hand. Seing then that God leaueth magistrates so blind, that they be as Idols, and so lazie as they haue nother courage nor inclination in them to mayntayne good and to punish euill: no bodie is to be blamed but God as it is sayd here by Job. True it is that this sentence may be expounded otherwyse. But wee muste not stand here vpon diuersitic of expositiōs: we must haue an eye onely to the naturall meening. Thus ye see in effect what Job ment to say here. Vpon this verſe we haue a good lesson to gather: which is, first that when we see things so disordered, that the wicked triūph, weltring in their pleasures, inioying abundance of goodes, no man gainsaying them, & working their excesses and outrages without touche of brest: we muste consider how it is no new thing, that we should be greatly astonished at such a temptation. For it is good, yea and needefull for vs to be armed against such imaginacions. VVee see how our owne minde driueth vs thercvnto, so as if things fall not out according to our fancie, it seemeth to vs that althings are turned by fortune, and that God regardeth no more the worlde, or rather that he forsloweth his dutie, or that he is as it were asleepe, or els that he regardeth neyther good nor euill. Lo what fancies runne in our heads; if we be not restreyned, according as the Scripture telleth vs that wee ought not to thinke it straunge though the earth be deliuereed after that sorte into the hānde of the wicked. And why? For our sinnes deserue that the wicked should haue full power ouer vs. If we obeyed God as becommeth vs: it is certaine that things should be ruled here after such fashion, as wee should be contented. But for asmuch as we be stubborne against our God, and play the horses that are broken looce: it is good reason that he also should giue the wicked scope, to the end that we might be chastized by the hād of them. And why so? for our vnthankfuieness deserueth well that God should bring forth his roddes and make vs feele them with al rigour. Therfore when this is knowne to vs, wee think it no straunge sight to see things so cōfounded here bylow, as we may say that the earth is deliuereed into the hāndes of the wicked, or that wee should sigh at the comming thereof to passe, because that God giueth vs warning of our sinnes. And verely we haue good cause to sigh, seeing that the wicked and the despizers of God, must not onely defile the earth, but also haue their full scope. God hath created men after his owne image, and put all things into their hānde, to the intent they should be as his lieutenants here. But behold, the wicked and such as seeke nothing butto offend God and to deface his maiestie and glorie, displace his chilđre whom he hath appoynted here to be his owne heritage. VVhen wee see all things thus turned topsitoruie, must we not needs grone? and must not this prouoke vs to pray God to vouchsafe to set all things againe in their right state? Furthermore when it is sayde that God is he that shutteth the eyes of the judges, let vs marke how it is as much to say, as that they which haue the administration of Iustice committed vnto them, cannot haue the minde to do it, except it be giuen them from aboue? For a man is not able to gouerne himself: and how shal he then gouerne a whole realme? Furthermore it is a matter of greate preeminence to execute Gods office in this worlde: and therefore God must be fayne to worke in those, whom he hath sette in high estate and authoritie. And as for the parties themselues that are in it, they muste be so much the earnest in calling vpon God, that it may please him to guide the and helpe them. For if a man thinke himself to be of sufficient abilitie when he is set in the siege of iustice, & trust in his own wisedome and power: God will laugh him to scorne, and make him a very blockhead. They therefore whom God choozeth must humble themselues so much the more, and not presume vpon any thing that is in themselues, but must crave the spirite of wisedome, the spirite of stoutnesse, & the spirite of vprightnesse, that God may giue them the power and abilitie to discharge their duties faithfully. Thus ye see howe Magistrates ought to betake themselues vnto God in all care and feare. And we also that are vnder them, muste all of vs on our parte doo the like. For if there bee no Iustice among vs: behold, the curse of God is vpon vs, and the Lande muste bee defiled so farre till God poure out his vttermoste wrath vpon vs: and in the meane whyle wee our selues must bothe suffer and see good men suffer, and none of both to be maynteyned as they ought to be. Seing then that it is for the welfare of a whole Realme, when God giueth his spirite to Princes and Magistrates and men of Law: it is for vs to call vpon him, that he suffer them not to be blinded and vnable to discerne aught, and blockish as though they saw not the euil doings that are comitted. And like as we must sewe for the grace and goodnessē of our God, that it may please him to graunt his spirite vnto Magistrates: so muste wee also pray him to giue vs such strength and stoutnesse, as wee may not bee out of hart when wee see things go amisse (as wee see them go too much) yea and from euill to worse, so as the Magistrates in steade of ryng vp when they see neede, and of being readie at hand to maynteyne the right, knowing theselues to be ordeyned of God for the same purpose: do fauour and maynteyne the euill. Let vs assure our selues that God hath forsaken them, and thereby sheweth that he hath withdrawen himselfe from vs, because wee be not woorthe to haue him sit among vs as he hath promised to do among all such as are conformable vnto him. Thus yee see the fruite of our disobedience and of all our sinnes, which is, that God shall suffer all ciuill order too be ouerthrowne among vs, that all things may be confounded as wee haue well deserued. And so when wee

Esay. 19. c. 14. But yet must wee not murmur against God, assuring our selues that he doeth not any thing without cause although wee cannot perceyue it. And this is it that Job meeneth by saying:

If not, where is he? and who is he? It is to shewe that when wee haue sought all the reasons why there is so much euill done in the worlde: wee must euermore come vnto God. For when the Scripture sayeth that God doth bothe good and euill: it meeneth that all things proceede from him, whither it be prosperitie or aduersitie, lyfe or death, light or darkenesse as it is sayde in the Prophete Esay: in somuch that whatsoeuer the Diuell doeth (as I haue sayde afore) or what soeuer the wicked sorte doo attempt, wee muste take the same as at the hande of God. For vnlesse he gaue them the brydle, they coulde not attempt any thing: and what soeuer they devised, they coulde never bring it to passe. So then it were a fayre martyring of a mans selfe to leaue God and to seeke the inferiour meanes. For it belongeth to God to governe, and if he had not soueraine dominion ouer all creatures, all would go too wrecke. And although men seeke nothing but too rell against him: yet doth he serue his owne turne with them spye of their teeth. This is it that Job ment too vtter in saying,

If not: where is he, and who is it? VVhen there happeneth any mischiefe, let men searche it out, saying: who hath done this? True it is that when any euill happeneth, we can well skill to make our discourses, and to seeke some ground of it here beneath. If wee bee in a Countrie where a King or Prince reigneth tyrannically, men will say, behold, the King fleeceth and deuoureth his people; and moreouer maketh none accout of ministering iustice; he hath officers like himselfe, who seeke but to intrappe men: all is ouerturned and out of order: it is to be seene that there is none other shift but the realme must come too vtter decay: and who is to bee blamed for all this?

what complaints shall be heard herevpon? It is not marke that men are all toghether frowarde and naughtie, nor that they haue prouoked Gods wrath against them, and that they be folke giuen to all lewdnesse, despizers of God, and looce of lyfe in all poynts and respectes, so as it should seeme they are desirous to kindle the fire of Gods wrath to burne vp all. Men then may well alledge the lewdnesse of gouerners, when a Nacion is so misorderd after that maner: but yet muste they mount vp hygher: For let vs not thinke that God is asleepe in heauen, and hath forgotten the worlde: but rather let vs assure our selues, that he worketh with his owne hande, and that the sinnes of the people are the cause why the officers and men of law are wicked, and that for the same cause God also is fayne too shake them off, and to make them as it were mirroors of his wrath and vengeance. So then let vs so consider the inferiour causes and meanes, as wee may neuerthelasse perceyue in our reason and vnder-

standing, that God abideth continually all the whyle in his souerayne dominio, & as we may know that al things come of him. But yet notwithstanding, wee shall not alwayes knowe the cause why God worketh so. VVhen wee shall haue searched to the vttermost, and made great circuities and discourses: in the ende wee shall be dazed and not see any reason why God doth this or that. VVhat is to bee done then? wee muste honour this iustice of God which is vnknowne to vs. True it is that sometimes God worketh in suche wise, as his Iustice is fully apparent and men may see it with their eyes: and sometimes also it is hidden. And in this case wee haue no more to do but to honour it, and to say: Alas Lorde, Psal. 36. b.7 thy iudgements are a bottomlesse pit wherevnto wee bee not able too atteyne: but yet will wee not ceasse to confesse that thou art rightuous, although we perceyue not the reason why. Howbeit wee multe not surmyze as men do that are not well practized in the Scriptures, that things are done here bylowe by Gods sufferance without caring for them or medling with them. For that were as much as to cut off his power, and it were all one as if he were asleepe in heauen, and lefte the ruling of the worlde here beneath, eyther to Satan, or too men. It were (I say) an vtter defacing of Gods maiestie. For it is meete that he should order all that he hath made, and that the same should proceede of his will and good disposition. True it is (as hath bene sayde) that wee see not alwayes how God is rightuous: but yet muste wee acknowledge him too bee so; and wee muste walke in all sobernesse and modestie, and then in the ende God will make vs to know that which is hidden from vs as nowe. Lette vs come to that which Job addeth: he sayeth, that his dayes are gone away more swiftly than a poste or a shippe vnder sayle. There is also Flying: And this woerde is set downe too expresse the better, that Job speakest not of some great ship that is full fraughted: but of some little pinnesse that may serue to make sport and pastime vpon the water, which turneth nimblly here and there and goeth away apace. Therefore he likenneth his life to a litle pinnesse that is light and glydeth swiftly vpon the water: and therewithall he compareth it also to a Poste: and finally too an Ægle that soreth in the ayre too seeke his prey. Here Job sheweth howe sore he was carryed away in all his passions. And it pleased the holy Ghost that this president should be giuen vs, to the intent that eury of vs shoulde in the persone of Job beholde what may happen too himselfe. Then howe fare wee when God scourgeth vs? Lo here a temptation to drive vs too despaire: which is, when wee forget all the gracious goodness that God hath done for vs. If wee could bethinke vs of the benefites that we haue receyued at Gods hand, as wee haue seene Job say heretofore: it is certayne that the same woulde make vs to forgette all our sorrowes. VWell then God doth nowe smyte mee: but what for that? I haue receyued as much good at his hande, and he hath shewed himselfe bountifull towrdes mee: was it not to the ende I shoulde alwayes taste of his mercie, and that I shoulde trust to it, and flee therevnto for refuge? we cannot eate one bit of bread, but the same is a witnesse vnto vs of Gods goodnessse, and that he will alwayes bee our father and Sauior: Beholde here an ineftimable remedie too sweeten all our sorrowes wheri soever wee bee afflieted: whiche is by calling too minde the benefites and gracious giftes: that wee haue receyued at Gods hande. :But Satan who feeth well this, vseth a cleane contrarie policie: whiche is, too make vs forgette the good that God hath done vs and bestowed vpon vs, too the ende wee might haue nothing in vs but anguish anguishe to set vs in a fretting, and that there might bee nothing but bitternes, nor nothing that might cheere vs or comforte vs in oure troubles. This is it that Job sheweth vs nowe. My dayes (sayeth hee) are slipt away, like a little Pinnisse that will go swiftly vpon the wa- ter, or else as an Eagle flying in the ayre, or as a Lackey that goeth poste. Heereby hee dooth vs too witte, that hee remembreth no more how God caused him to be borne intoo the worlde, nor that hee had giuen him so manie tokens of hys fatherly loue, as he might well haue wher-with too comfort himselfe: yea, if hee had had suche regarde and consideration as were requisite. True it is that Job kept alwayes still some tast of Gods goodnesse, so as hee was never in dispayre. And verely althoughe he were tormented and tossed too and fro, yet had he alwayes such vnderstanding, and was still hilfe in suche awe, as hee knewe God to bee righteous, and also wayted too bee deliuered of his miseries. Nowe when we see suche temptations in him, it behoueth euerie of vs to haue an eye too himselfe, and too beholde himselfe heere. And indeede although God shewe vs the fauor to make vs taste continually of his goodnesse: yet notwithstanding we know not sufficiently fully how well he loueth vs: but rather if hee trouble vs, wee quite forget the good that he hath done vs, and too our seeming we never receyued any benefite at his hande. Nowe then sith wee see that such a temptation befell vnto Job, so much the more behoueth it vs too bee fenced before the blowe come: Let vs take warning (I say) as oft as God shall sende vs any trouble: and let vs thinke thus: Yea, but did God never doo mee any good? Is the good lost that hee bestowed vpon mee? If I beare it not in minde: too what purpose shall all this serue mee, but too procure double punishments for myne vnthankefulnesse? Lo what wee haue to marke. And further forasmuch as our lyfe is querbrickle: let euerie of vs inforce himselfe the more to thinke vpon the gracious goodnesse and benefites of God. If wee fall into any aduersitie, we must by and by runne too the remedie: which is to pray vnto God too strengthen vs, and to withholde vs from mur-muring agaynst him, yea whatsoeuer tribulations wee bee dryuen too indure, fully assuring our selues that if wee bee of his Church, and of the bodie of our Lorde

17.1

Iesus Christ, we must bee made like vnto his Image, and that the glorie which is prepared for vs aboue in heauen, is ynough too recompence all the tribulations that wee can indure in this worlde: and this bethinking of things will serue well too asswage all oure sorowes. Finally Job concludeth, that if bee say bee, will forget his complaints, and refresh himselfe of his sayde greefe and torment: bee cannot: VVhy so? For (sayeth hee) I am afraide because I know thou wilt not leave me unpunished; or that thou wilt not holde mee gilesesse. In effect, Jobs meening in this sentence, is that forasmuch as hee hath to do with God, hee can finde no releefe for his aduersitie and heauiness: and that although hee purpose lo to doo, yea and inforce himselfe too bring it to passe: yet dooth God holde him shet vp so as he cannot haue any rest in himselfe. It is a verie notable sentence. For(as we haue earst sen here-fore) if we haue to do with men, we may stil haue some startingholes, and we may slink aside intoo couert, to say, I will finde some meane or other too shift my selfe out of such a mans hands: although he be a Lion and gape with open mouth to devoure me: yet for al that I may stil scape from him. So then if we haue to deale but with men, we may still finde some scapingplace: but if God shew him to bee our aduersarie, and that he holde vs at the staues ende, and make vs to say, no, beholde it is God that punishest me, beholde, it is God that troubleth mee: wee may peraduenture wrythe our selues hither and thither, and make all the fetches in the world: and yet when we haue stedyd aboue the cloudes with our skill, God is still Psa.139.b.8 Am.5.9.a.2 higher and higher aboue vs: and if wee go downe to the bottome of the deepes, his hand can well reach thither to vs: and if we passe ouer the Sea, his hand shall stretch yet farre further. Therefore let vs learne to knowe that wee must seeke no startingholes when we haue to doo with God, but muste appeare before him when he cyteth vs, and we shall gaine nothing by delaying. Also let vs learne Psa.62.b.9. not to flatter our selues as we are woont to do. For behold the vse wherevnto this doctrine ought to serue vs: is that when wee see the hypocrisie that is in men, wee shoulde come right forth afore God without disimulation, too discouer our hartes there. For it is meete that hee shoulde search vs too the quicke, and wee cannot hide any thing for ought that we can doo. Therefore if wee will bee at peace with our God: let vs beware that we vse none of the fonde toyes wherewith wee are woont to beguile our selues. But let vs walke in feare and carefulnesse before him, & let vs pray him that if it please him to scourge vs, it may be with such measure, that when he maketh vs to feele his displeasure, we may not ceasse for all that too taste of his goodnesse, that the same maye serue vs too asswage our sorowes, so as we may not doubt but that he is at hande with vs, to deliuere vs, when he shall perceyue it to be for our welfare & profit: yea euē because we haue called vpon him. Thus ye see after what sort wee ought to put this lesson in vre. The residue (God willing) shall bee discoursed to morrow.

And now let vs cast our selues downe before the Maiestie of our good God with acknowledgement of oure faults, praying him to make vs feele them in such wise as we may be instructed to lowlinesse, yea even too glorifie him in all our tribulations, beeing well assured that wee haue deserued a hundred thousande tymes mo miseries than he sendeth vs. And specially that we may know that hee holdeth vs vp and spareth vs continually, even by his fatherly goodnesse. To the intent therefore that this may leade vs to glorifie and magnifie him, and too walke in the feare of him, vntill suche time as hauing withdrawne vs quite from all the troubles and hinderances that holde vs backe as now: hee make vs attaine to the knowledge of the things which are to depe for vs as yet: let vs pray him to guyde vs in such wise by his holy spi-rite, as we may honour his secretes till he give vs the full sight of them, and make vs feele by experiance, that he hath beeene our father and Sauour, when wee shall haue obeyed him as true children. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to all people and nations of the earth.&c.

The xxxvij. Sermon, which is the fift vpon the ninth Chapter.

This sermon treateth still vpon the xxvij. and xxviii. verses, and then upon those that followe.

29. If I bee vvicked, vvhyl labour I in vaine?
30. If I vvashe my selfe in cleare vvater, and make my handes pure and cleane, 31. Thou vvilt plundge mee in the myre, and mine ovne clothes shall defile mee.
32. For hee is not a man as I am, that I might bee bolde to ansyvere him, and that vvee might go too lavve together.
33. VVho is the vmpet that vwill put his hande betvvixt vs?
34. Let him take his rod away from mee, and let him not fray me any more.
35. And then vwill I speake, and not be afryd: but I holde me still bicaus he is not so.

Hauē begonne alreadie to expound this sentence where Job sayeth that hee hath no rest because it is God that pursueth him, by reason wherof hee is the more dismayde in his aduersities. For if we suffer any trouble at mens hands, wee may finde some meanes too resist them. But if we knowe that God is agaynst vs, ye shall see vs so incombred, as wee maye well seeke heere and there for remedie, but wee shall finde none till God bee at one with vs. And bicause it had beene layde too Iobs charge, that he ment to iustifie himselfe before God, and it had beene tolde him that he should gaine nothing by so doing: hee addeth: VVell then, I am wicked, & why then do I trouble my selfe in vaine? Heere Job pleadeth giltie, howbeit not in such wise as his freendes had tolde him of, who spake as then in effect as enimies. VVhy so? They intended to haue hild him as a condemned caytife, as a despizer of God, and as a castaway. Howbeit Job graunteth not that, but hee sayeth hee is an offender if it were ment that Gods secrete judgement shoulde bee entered into, as if he should say: I haue a fayre pleading of my case: for when I shall haue iustified my life afore men, yet shall I alwayes be condemned afore God, if hee list to enter into his rigour agaynst mee. For wee must alwayes turne backe againe too this grounde whiche wee haue spoken of heeretofore: that is too wit, that God may well allowe of vs, as of them that shall haue serued and honoured him: and yet notwithstanding, that when he shall bring vs to his secrete justice, which is the rule of that righteousnesse which he standeth too and accepteth: wee shall bee nothing, and all that euer is in vs must needes be vtterly defaced. This requireth a larger declaration, for otherwise it will not bee vnderstoode. Truely according to the rule which God hath giuen vs in his lawe, there is not any mortall wight that can bee founde righteous: for where is the perfect loue that is required there? I say wee loue not God with all our hart, and our neighbour as our selues. Forsoomuch then as we fayle both in loue towards God, and in charite towards our neighbour: we be condemned by Gods law. And heere we see why Saint

Deut.27.d. Paul alledging this text, Cursed is he that perfourmeth not all the things that are conteyned in the law: concludeth therupon, that there is no more any righteousness among men, nor any hope of their salvation, if they rest vpon their owne woorkes. VVhy so? Doth it followe that bicause the transgessors of the lawe, are cursed, therefore all men shoulde bee so? Yea verely: for are there any too bee found, which haue walked according to Gods lawe? No: I meane in full perfection. For if we haue missed in any one poynt we bee giltie in all: bicause that (as Saint Iames sayeth) He that hath forbidd-

den to murther, hath also forbidden to steale. VVhen we shall haue offended Gods Maiestie, and haue wrought agaynst his righteousnesse: must wee not needes come shorte of righteousnesse? Marke then a speciall poynt: 20 which is, that if God enter intoo account with vs according to the rule that is conteyned in his lawe: hee shall not finde so muche as one righteous man in the whole worlde. Yet notwithstanding in the meane while there are that walke in the feare of God, howbeit not through their owne nature. For howe fayre shewe soever wee make: it is certayne that till God gourne vs with his spirite, all the holynesse that men perceyue in vs, is but hypocrisie and vntirth. But if God touch our hartes, and write his lawe within the same: then shall we obey him: howbeit not throughly, nor with such perfect soundnesse as we may come boldely before God to bee acquit. Neuerthelesse there is great diuersitie betweene the despizers of God, and the saythfull. For although the saythfull man haue many infirmitiis in him, and cannot walk so right as hee sayne woulde: yet notwithstanding hee hath a desire to serue God, hee laboureth in it, and hee inforceth himselfe too it: whereas the saythlesse taketh scorne of al goodnessse, casting God off, and making none account of him, but is giuen to his owne sensualitie. So 40 then we see, that some may be called righteous, who deserue not to be accepted so before God. There is no finding of any perfect righteousnesse heere in men, neyther is it to be sayde, that God is beholding to them, and that they may go to law with him, or that they haue deserued well at his hand, and that he cannot find any fault in them or in their lyfe. No: but wee speake of another righteousness whiche God accepteth of his owne free goodnesse: and we speake of a righteousness that is but halfe a one: which may be rightly condemned, howbeit it is not condemned, bicause God imputeth not the faultes and imperfekteions that are in his saythfull ones. And Job doth not heere tearme himselfe a wicked man, after the maner of a lawlesse and awlesse person. Ye shall see a whoremonger that shall bee giuen too all filthinesse, and mocke at God to the full: yee shall see a cruell man giuen too extorcion: yee shall see a blasphemēr or swearer: and these maner of men are wicked in their conuersation. For their naughtinesse is so farre oute of square, as we ought of good right too holde them accordeed. Job graunteth not himselfe too bee such a one: for then had hee lyed, as wee shall see hereafter, where hee protesteth himselfe too haue beeene the fosterer of the fatherlesse, the succourer of the widowes, the eye of the blinde, and the bearer vp of the feeble and weake. To bee short, he had in him an angelical soundnesse, if it be compared with other men. Howe then, and in what sense doth hee condemne himself for a wicked man in this sentece? For he doth it not of hypocrisie.

As I sayde afore, it is bicause that if he enter into the secret iustice of God, there he must needes be cast: and he shall doo well to alledge, Lorde, it is at thy hande that I haue receyued this grace of yeelding my selfe to thy seruice: & although I haue not walked so perfectly as I ought to do: yet notwithstanding, it was the marke that I amed at, & I haue applied mire indeuer that way, so as my mind was none other, but to haue gien my selfe wholly thereto. True it is that I am blame wortbie in many things: howbeit I haue not shrunke away from thee at any time. 10 Job might wel haue protested all this. But what for that? In the fayd rigorous iustice he must needes haue had his mouth shlet. For although men may well shewe themselves to haue had some desire to do well: yet is all that nothing worth. Thus ye see what Job ment by this sentence. And therefore let vs marke well, that whensoeuer wee shall haue any fayre shewe (I meane not before men, but euen before the Angels of heauen) although we haue labored to serue God without dissimulation: yet is not that ynough to iustifie vs. 20 VVhy so? For if we enter into accounte with God, all the rightucusnesse that wee can haue, muste needes washe awaye and come too naught. Sainct Paule speaking of his charge onely, and not of his whole life, sayeth, that hee hath not ought whereat his conscience may repine, or for the which he might bee blamed iustly, and yet notwithstanding that hee woulde not iustifie himselfe. In that place he speakeith but of one thing: namely that he had preached the Gospell with a good zeale, and yet for all that he confesseth, that he shall not bee iustified for it. And why? For 30 God can fynde faultes ynowe in him, which he himselfe wist not of. Nowe if Sainct Paule speaking of the office of Apostleship, stooode vpon that poynnt because he knew well that God could condemne him in many things that were vñknowne too himselfe: howe shall wee do when we come to the examination of our whole lyfe? Howe shall wee do when God shall enter action agaynst vs, not for some one matter, but for all matters, yea euen for oure woordes and thoughtes, and not alone for oure woorkes? Neuerthelesse we must alwayes come backe 40 too this poynnt, namely, that Job speaketh not alone of the rigour of the lawe, which is vnable too bee borne, and serueth to ouerwhelme vs euerie whit of vs: but also mounteth yet higher too the sayde iustice whiche is vñknowne vntoo vs. Notwithstanding, when hee addeth, VVhy labour I in vayne? Thereby he sheweth himselfe too haue an excessiue passion. Not that hee yeeldeth wholly vntoo it (for it is certaine that hee hath resisted it:) but hee speaketh of the affection that was in him after the fleshe. His saying then is, verie well I 50 yeelde my selfe gyltie, I confess I am a sinner, I confess I am wicked: But why take I this paine too no purpose? For God persecutes mee heere: and though I condemne my selfe, yet am I neuer the more eased: Is it meete that God shoulde ouerwhelme mee at the first blowe? VVhy am I not wiped out of the worlde? why dooth God take pleasure to holde mee so in long pyning? Seeing I acknowledg my selfe wortbie too bee condemned, what woulde he haue more? Lo how Job speaketh heere as a man in a rage. But (as I haue tolde you heeretoofoore) although the faythful do fight agaynst their temptations: yet mysse they not too bee shaken, and too feele such assaultes as they wote not where they bee. And that is the thing which Job confesseth and verely hee is the more prouoked herevnto, by the temptations of those that galled him, as though hee had gone abour to make his part good against god. And that which he addeth immediately after, conteyneth a more certaine declaration of it. For he sayeth, If I wylsh my selfe in water, so as I make my selfe throughly cleane, God shall cast mee into the myre, I shall be plunged in filtbiness, insomuch that mine owne apparell shall defile me. That is too say, when I shall haue clesned my selfe well, the same cleanness of mine which at thi present beareth a goodly shewe, shall bee but dung and filth afore God. Here Job continueth still in his matter, to shewe that when wee haue well examined our lyfe, it shall bee founde that our fearing of God and our obeying of him proceeded [wholly] of the grace that hee gaue vs, and yet that the same dooing of ours, is nothing. For we must alwayes beare in minde, that Gods Maiestic is hidden from vs, and that in the same Maiestic there is a certaine rightfulness whiche wee comprehend: not. True it is that God hath well gien vs a paterne and image of rightfulness in his lawe, howbeit, that is but according too our capacitie. But it behoueth vs too knowe, that oure reason is so grosse, as it can not mounte so high, as to conceyue perfectly what is in God. So then the verie rightousnesse whiche is conteyned in Gottes lawe, is a rightousnesse that is bounded within the measure of mans capacitie. 1.Cor.13.d. VVee doo rightly call it perfect rightousnesse, and so maye wee name it: yea and the Scripture tearmeth it perfect rightousnesse: howbee it but in respect of vs, that is too saye in respect of creatures. I meene not in respect of vs as wee bee sinners, and as we bee all cursed in Adam: but in respect of vs as wee bee Gods creatures: yea and (too take away all difficultie) euen in respect of the Angelles. This rightousnesse then is suche a rightousnesse, as Angelles and men ought too yelde vntoo God, by obeying him and pleasing him, yea euen inasmuche as they bee his creatures. But yet for all this, there is another higher rightousnesse in God: that is too say a perfect rightousnesse, wherevntoo wee bee not able too attayne, neyther can wee bee able too come any whitte neere it, vntill wee bee made like vntoo him, and haue the function 13. of the glorie that is hid from vs as yet, and which we see not but as it were in a glasse and darkely. Forthen shall wee bee a farre other thing, than wee bee nowe. Thus yee see why Job tellet vs heere, that though hee wash himselfe, yet shall hee bee founde vncleane neuerthelesse.

And although he speake here of VWater, and of Snowe: yet notwithstanding, by a resemblance hee meeneth all the cleanness that is in men, according as is sayd, I will washe my hands in innocencie. When Dauid spake so, he had an eye too the Ceremonie of the law, forsoinuch as it was Gods will that men shoulde make themselves cleane when they came into the Temple too pray. And what was the reason? Bycause wee bee sulyed and full of all fylthe: therefore it behoueth vs too bee made cleane when wee present our selues before God. And howe maye that bee done? Can water bee a spirituall washing for oure soules? No. Then muste wee take the Ceremonie of the lawe, as a figure of the thing that muste bee in our schules: that is too wittie, that wee must renounce all lewde affections, and haue a pure and cleane harte: wee muste renounce all wicked woorkes, and dedicate all our members too serue GOD perfectly: and that is the washing whereof Job speaketh heere. To bee short, his saying is, that if hee shoulde inforce himselfe to serue God, yea euen in such wise as hee shoulde become as whyte as Snowe: yet shoulde God fynde somewhat wortbie of blame in hym. And why? Hee wyl plundge mee (sayeth hee:) te' olde heere a straunge maner of speaking, that God shoulde Psal.26.1.5 plundge plundge him in the myre. And howe is that? For it is not the propertie of God to put any soyle into vs: we know hee is the fountain of all holynesse: yea and when wee bee full of filthinesse, wee flee too him for helpe too bee purged and made cleane by him. VVherefore is it then that Job sayeth, that God will plundge him in the myre? His meening is, that God will discouer an vncleanness in him which was not perceyued afore. And howe will hee discouer it? Not onely after the lawe. True it is that the onely lawe of God is yngough too condemne men, as I haue sayde afore. And heere yee see why the lawe is called the message of death: namely bicause that if we haue no more but the doctrine that is conteyned in the lawe, we shall be vterly ouerwhelmed afore God, and wee shall bee cast away without any remedie. Then if God indite vs but according to the forme of the lawe, he shall discouer filthinesse yngough in vs. But Job steppeth yet further: that is to wit, that although we had the sayde purenesse according to the lawe, that is to say, althoughe wee had performed all that euer God commaundeth there, which is impossible for men to do: yet can we not stand before him. But let vs put the case, that Job were as an Angell, and that he were able too go through to Godwarde according too the righteousnesse of the lawe: yet shoulde he alwayes finde himselfe behinde hande in respect of the secrete rightfulness that is in God. For it is sayde that the verie Angels are not able too stande afore him, if he listed to enter into reckening with them. Job therefore in this sentence meeneth, that euen when he shall bee as pure as pure may bee, (I meene according too the righteousnesse of the lawe) all shall be but dung and filth when it commeth afore God. And beholde heere a lesson which ought to make al flesh to stoupe, when we shall haue weyed well the thngs that are conteyned therein. True it is that the ordinarie doctrine of the holye scripture is, that when men looke vpon themselues too see whether they haue fulfilled Gods lawe or no: there they shall finde themselues all condemned. Beholde (I say) wherenvnto the holy scripture bringeth vs backe. And wherefore? For we knowe what pride and hypocrisie are in vs. VVe bee so proude that we wil not stoupe to God, except we be compelled. Then if oure Lorde presse vs with his secrete rightfulness whereof mention is made heere, what a thing will that bee? But we play the horses that are broken looce, and wee set vp our hornes too dosse agaynst God as wee see the vnbeleuers doo, who blasphemie him with full mouth: and althoughe they bee conuictid, so as theyr owne conscience reproueth them, and they knowe not what to say for themselues: yet notwithstanding, their mouth is still open too rayle at God, too grudge agaynst him, and to spyte him at their pleasure. And therefore it is requisite that God shoulde haue a way to condemne vs peculiar to our nature, to abate the pride and hypocrisie that are in vs. Heere ye see why God bringeth vs to the lawe, and tellet vs that we be vtterly forlorne: as if hee shoulde say, well, I see that euery of you sootheth himselfe, and standeth too much in his owne conceyt: yee cannot be brought to any reason nor made to submit your selues. I will not sew agaynst you my selfe, but I giue you a looking glasse in my lawe, and I would haue eueryone of you to beholde himselfe there: looke there whether ye be fayre or no. Come we once too the lawe of God, there euery man sees his owne filthinesse: and whereas erst there was (to our seeming) nothing but life and welfare, and woondersfull stuffe in vs: nowe we be starke deade as Saint Paule speakest. Yea verely if wee understande Gods lawe as wee ought too do. For there are many that haue the vayle still before their eyes, who beare themselues in hande that they haue serued God well: and so long as the lawe is layde aside from them, they thinke themselues to haue performed it to the full, and yet they never came neere it. Such folke haue a scarffe before their eyes. But if we consider what Gods lawe is, wee shall finde that there is nothing but filthinesse and iniquitie in vs. Yee see then wherefore God toucheth vs after such a maner. But beholde there is yet a higher meening in this sentence, (according also as Job speakest it for the perfecter sort:) that is to wit, that never any righteousnesse of the lawe shal be able to stande afore God, if hee list too deale rigorously with vs. And heere a man might cast a doubt, and say: will God condemne men when they shall haue performed all that he comandaundeth and appnynteth them? No, the matter is not what God will do, but what he may do. For surely hee will not doo it. Then let it suffice vs, that when wee haue ruled our life well according to Gods lawe, we shall bee accepted for righteous before him. This is certaine. For it is sayde, hee that dooth these things shall live in them. The premise is not to deceyue vs with vruth. But howsoeuer the case stande, this is alwayes a sure grounde, that when wee shall haue obeyed Goddes lawe too the full, and attayned the sayde purenesse so great as is required, (which is an impossible thing for mortall men to doo:) yet notwithstanding, God needeth not to content himselfe with it, except he list: that is to say, hee can finde such a perfectnesse in himselfe, as all that we bring to him, shall be nothing to it: but yet hee doth not so, as I sayd afore. And this is it that Job ment by saying that God will plundge him in the myre when he shall haue washed himselfe: that is too say, God will finde meanes to shake me off as a wretched and vnperteite creature: and althoughe I haue giuen my minde too al purenesse, that my life might bee ruled by his lawe and by his ordinance, and that my woorkes might Lee good and Holie: yet notwithstanding, all the sayde purenesse shall be but filth, if Gods rightfulness passe vpon it. And I haue sayde alreadie that this present lesson ought well to astonishe vs. For though wee were as pure as the Angels: yet were we not able to stande, but by the grace of God, and so faire forth as hee vpholdeth vs as his creatures, without vsing his rigour agaynst vs. For if he listed to hande vs as we deserue: howe should we do? Now then if god may ouerwhelme vs though we were like the Angels: alas is there any cause why we shoulde auaunce our selues, seeing we drinke sinne as a fish sucketh in water (according as it is sayde in this selfe same booke) seeing we ceasse not to go agaynst the rule that he hath giuen vs, and seeing we peccyue, not some one condemnation but a hundred thousand, yea and an infinite number of condenmations before vs? Alas, what shal become of mans pride? Herby we see what rage or rather furie hath beeene and still is in the Popedom, in all dging their owne merits. For the wretched folke are so puffed vp with prude, as they weene themselues able to purchase Faradise. And if they do attisse in any poynt, they haue meanes of their owne too recompence God, they haue their satisfacions, and they haue their woorkes of ouerplusse or supererogation as they terme them: and all these are payments to discharge themselues with against God. The ceul muste needes haue bewitched men, when they coulde so beare themselues in hande, that they were able to binde God to them by their woorkes. And so let vs wey well this doctrine: but by the way let vs repreisse our affections and holde them short, that we come not to the same poynt that Job was at. Not that he rested

rested vpon that poynt (for that had bene a blasphemie:) but hee confesseth himselfe to haue beeene tempted, and too haue beeene prouoked too say, Go too, if God were a man as I am, that I might bee bolde to answere him, that we might go to law togither, and that some body might take vpon him to bee vmpet betwixt vs: then would I speake freely, and not bee afryde. If God woulde giue me leauue to holde plea with him, and suffer a iudge to be set ouer vs both: then coulde I talke boldy agaynst him. Beholde here a right daungerous temptation: And (as I sayde afore) if Job had concluded therevpon in himselfe: it had beeene a cursed blasphemie. Therefore he sheweth that he was tossed with that temptation, howbeit that he withstood it all the while. And it may happen that we also shall be in such troubles at times. For vnto mans vnderstanding it is a verie straunge thing, that when wee shall haue kept Gods lawe, (that is to say, if it were possible to bee done) yet wee shall not bee discharged before him. Men haue alwayes somwhat to replie in this cace: and at least they will lament their state and make their moane, 20 saying: is it possible that God shoulde deale so rygorously with vs, as that our fulfilling of his lawe shoulde bee nothing woorth? Men then haue a cace which they themselues shall thinke too bee verie worthie of fauour, and so shall it seeme too bee to the worldewarde. But when we be egged after that sort, we must holde our selues in awe, and learne to knowe that Gods rightfulness (the which wee cannot comprehend as nowe) is hidden from vs, to the intent we shoulde honor it. For wee haue two wayes to magnifie God. The one is according to the 30 maner of his manifesting of himselfe vnto vs. Yee see howe God doth in his lawe shewe himselfe a iudge too condemne vs: and in his Gospel! he sheweth himselfe a father to acquit vs. That is to say, whē he commaundeth vs to do the thing that is good and righteous, and therewithall threatneth vs that if we haue fayled in any thing, wee must be accused: when God sheweth himselfe after that maner: we haue wherefore to glorifie him, and to acknowledge that hee is righteous howesoever the cace stande. For if wee perishe, yet haue we no cause to 40 grudge at it. Againe, if God call vs to himselfe, offering vs his grace in our Lorde Iesus Christ, and shewing that he desyreteth nothing but to be at one with vs: ye see yet a greater cause too glorifie him in his rightuousnesse, forasmuch as hee hath pulled vs oute of hell, and reached vs his hande. Yee see then by this, how we must glorifie God in double wise, when hee vtereth himselfe vnroo vs by his woerde. As muche is too be sayde of his woorkes. VVhen God beareth with vs by hys mercie, let vs vnderstande that he coulde thunder downe vpon vs, and that it is of his speciall fauour that he doth it not. Againe when hee chastizeth vs for our offences, of purpose to drawe vs to repentance: see ye not howe he ministreth as many causes to sing his prayses vnto him? Yes verely. And so inasmuche as God sheweth himselfe to bee both good, and righteous, and wise, as well by his woerde as by his workes: we haue wherefore to glorifie him. But haue we done so? we must mount yet higher: that is to wit, we must glorifie God though hee hide himselfe from vs, and shewe not himselfe too vs, 50 neyther by his rightuousnesse, nor by his goodnessse, nor by any other thing whiche might cause vs too say that the sayde glorie were due vnto him. As for example. VVhen the scripture speaketh too vs of his election, that hee choozeth whome hee lyketh, and casteth awaie the residue: and that hee disposeth of mankind at his owne pleasure: and likewise when hee scourgeth the good, and leaueth them oppressed, and wee see that all things are confounded in this worlde: in these caces God hydeth himselfe, that is to say, he sheweth not himselfe to vs after such a fashion, as our reason may be able to take hold of his rightfulness, goodnessse, power, and wisedome, and yet must we yeld him his due glorie. Thus yee see what we haue too marke vpon this streyne. And in so doing wee may well correct and beate backe the temptation whereof Job speaketh heere. Hee sayeth, Let God go to lawe with mee, and giue me leauue to plead agaynst him: and I will do it boldely. Alas, and how shall we bee able to bring our matters to passe? As I haue touched afore, Job ment to expresse heere, that he was tempted to repine against God in that wise: but he resisted that incounter. And euen so must we do. How is that? Because that (as I haue sayde alreadie) although God shoulde giue vs the sayd libertie of pleading agaynst him: yet shoulde we bee confounded: but Job did yll remember that: and that was because his mynde was bewrapped in suche anguish as hee wist not what hee sayde. Nowe if so perfect a man as he, (who is set foorth to vs as a mirrour of pacience) was so incombered: what will become of vs? So muche more then behoueth it vs too marke well what is sayde heere: that is too witte, that if God vttre himselfe to vs, we must glorifie him for so doing: and if he hyde himselfe, we must reuerence his secrete, which are incomprehensible too vs: and so wee must euerye way haue our mouth shet, and not say, If I might reason the matter, I shoulde preuayle in the cace. But wee shall somtimes see in the scripture, how God sayth, Come on, let vs pleade togither, according as it is sayde in the Prophete Esay: Beholde, I am contented that there bee a iudge betwixt vs, too see whither of our caces is best. To what ende sayth God so? It is to stoppe the mouthes of wicked folke, who were full of rancour agaynst him, and thought themselues to haue gotten the gole, if men had allowed them. Yea (sayth the Lorde) to the ende yee alledge that I vse a tyrannicall power agaynst you, and that ye bee oppressed without cause or reason: Come on your wayes, I am contented to be musterred in the rank among men, and to bee taken as a creature: I will forgo mine owne right, and the souereine dominion and Maiestie that are in mee. I am contented that for this present cace, yee shall haue no regarde too none of all that geere: and yet for all this, yee shall bee condemned neuerthelesse. Yee see howe God is well contented too enter intoo accounte with vs: but when hee speaketh so, it is agaynst the dispyzers which spite him, and are vterly rebellious agaynst him. And as for those, hee shall finde ynoughe in them too condemne them. Among whiche sort dooth Job put himselfe? Among them that haue beeene desirous too serue GOD, and haue walked vnder the obedience of his lawe. Yea verely: howebeit hee deceyueth himselfe very muche. For there is no man so perfect in whome God findeth not muche faultinesse, euen by the selfe same rule that he giueth vs in his lawe. But by the way, we haue another poynt too marke: whiche is, that Job sheweth vs, howe the sinnes which hee had committed, were not the cause that God handled him so roughly: and this is a true poynt. For Job was not so grosseheaded, but hee knewe wellynough hee shoulde bee found faultie before God, if his lyfe were examined by the lawe. Job might know that wellynough. True it is that in his greefe hee was caried away, and became as good as blinde: but howsoever the world went, yet knewe he well, that God shall euermore finde giltinessse in all men. VVhy then doth he say that he will speake boldely? He turneth his talke to those that had accused him, and this present discourse is rather zat' ter agaynst the men, than agaynst the mater. If Job had spoken without an aduersarie : he would haue sayd, Alas, I confess my self indeitd vnto God: and although it were possible that I might be quite and clere out of his dette according to the law : that is to say, although I were able to discharge my duerie too the full : yet shoulde I bee fayne too make my recourse too his meere goodnessse. Lo howe Job woulde haue spoken. But forasmuch as it was layde too his charge, that hee was so punished for his offences sake, as it hee had beeene a dispyzer of God : hee sayeth, no, no : I durst bee bolde too pleade in that respect. And in saying I durst be bolde too pleade, it is true (as I haue sayde) that he was caried away by his passions : howbeit forasmuch as he hath an eye to his aduersarie parties, hee meeneth none otherwise than we haue declared alreadie. Thus much for the meening of this streyne. Nowe let vs consider how we may profite oure selues by it. I haue tolde you heerctofore, that when we haue done all that euer God commaundeth vs, (whiche is impossible for man too doo:) yet is the cace such, as hee can still finde some meane or other too condemne vs, yea and yet shall hee himselfe continue righteous all the whyle. VVhat haue wee then to do, but onely too humble our selues? And furthermore let vs learne too knowe, that God vselth a double goodnessse towardes vs, when he both giueth vs his lawe, and also plucketh vs out of the damnation wherinto the same casteth vs. Yee see (I say) one poynt of Gods goodnessse when hee speaketh so familiarly vntoo men as too say: Go too, I owe you nothing, and you bee indetted and bounde vnto me as much as you are woorth: I can deale with you as I thinke good, and yet in the meane while it shall not be for you to say vnto me, pay vs: for in asmuch as yee bee mine, it is good reason that all that euer you haue should be dedicated to mee. Neuerthelesse, I will beare with you so farre as too bee contented, that if you fulfill my lawe, I will giue you euerlasting life in rewarde, notwithstanding that I mighte require it at youre hande withoute recompence. Seeing then that God speaketh thus in his lawe: doo yee not see his great goodnessse alreadie? For this righteousnesse which hee requireth at our handes, is such as is too bee required of pure creatures, such as the Angelles of heauen are. For there is no respect too bee had too our owne nature as it is nowe sinfull and corrupted : wee muste alwayes beare that well in mynde. But seeing that God had spoken so: wee shoulde all of vs be confounded and damned, were it not that hee goeth on further, and setteth l is mercie before vs. Otherwyse wee shoulde all abyde accursed, notwithstanding that wee had performed all the things that are conteyned in his lawe. Howebeoit, forasmuch as oure good God holdeth vs vp, notwithstanding that we haue both the wayes done amisse: that is the thing which draweth vs out of the curse of the lawe. So then let vs remember, that God dooth well giue vs cause too come vntoo him: not too pleade with him, nor too iustifie our case: (for all mouthes must be stopped:) but too acknowledge oure selues by all meanes indetted vntoo him. And verely euen oure owne mother witte dooth vs to vnderstande, that we must needs bee condemned: yea and thought hee speake not one worde, yet is itynough that we haue the sayd iudgement ingrauen within vs, so as there is not any of vs that care not or at leastwise ought not too bee his owne iudge, if our owne hypocrisie letted vs not too knowe it: for our owne conscience miest spye of our teeth reproves. Lo heere a speciall poynt. And furthermore, insteede of vmpers too heare oure matter debated: let vs seeke too Iesus Christ that hee may bee our vmpet to take vp the matter. Let vs nor desire too haue a iudge too lay hande both vpon him and vs: but let vs beseech him, that there maye bee some meanes of attonement betweene vs and his Maiestie. Yee see howe God is estrangend and separated from vs: and what is the cause of it? Our sinnes, sayeth the Prophete Esay. For God dwelleth in vs by his power. Howe haue wee our beeing, our mouing, and our lyfe? Howe haue wee any continuance at all; but by reason that his power is spredde out through all things? And yet for all that we ceasse not to bee separated from him through our sinnes and iniquities. VVhat must we do then? VVhat remayneth more? That Iesus Christ put himselfe betwixt vs: Iesus Christ muste bee fayne too bee our dayesman, not too passe in iudgement vpon the Maiestie of God, nor too set God at the barre with vs: but too bee the meane too reconcyle vs vntoo God, and too drawe vs after him as oure heade, too knit vs in such wyse vntoo God, as wee may bee all one in him, as the Scripture speaketh. And heere vpon let vs learne too humble our selues and say, Lorde d. 21.22. wee come vntoo thee, not too pleade, nor too presume vpon anye thing that is in vs or in our owne persons: but because thou art fauourable too vs, and because thou art willing too receyue vs: for thy sonne Iesus Christes sake. That is the thing whereof wee vaunte our selues. Not that wee muste not continue confounded as in respect of oure selues: but that forasmuche as it please thee too make vs feele thine infinite goodnessse whiche thou hast set forth in thine onely sonne our Lorde Iesus Christ whome thou gauest too death for our sakes: wee will not nowe doubt but thou wilt receyue vs, notwithstanding that we be too vnworthie of it.

But nowe let vs fall downe before the Maiestie of our good God, with acknowledgement of the innumerable sinnes which we ceasse not to commit dayly against him, beseeching him that forasmuch as wee bee full of filthinesse and infection, it may please him to purge vs, and to rid vs from all our spottes, and specially to correct this hypocrisie of ours wherenvto we be much giuen, to the ende that we misliking the faults and offences which we haue committed heerctofore, maye desire nothing so much as too retorne vnto him with true repentance, assuring our selues that we shall not fayle to get pardon at his hande, at leastwise so we come to him in true soundnesse of heart, praying him moreouer to gourne vs in such wise by hi. holy spirite: that although wee bee full of many infirmities, and bee so many wayes defiled: yet it may please him to receyue vs, and not to vs rigour and extremitie towardes vs. That it maye please him too graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also too all people and nations of the earth, &c.

The. xxxvij. Sermon, which is the first vpon the tenth Chapter.

MY Soule is cut off in my lyfe: I vvill leauue my complaynt vpon my selfe, I vvill speake in my bitternesse.

2. I vvyll saye too God, condemne mee not: shewc me jvhy thou pleadest agaynst mee.

3. Is it good for thee too do me vvrong, or to cast avvay the vvorke of thine ovyne handes, and to cleere the deuice of thevvicked?
4. Hast thou eyes of flesh? lookest thou after the maner of men?
5. Are thy dayes as the dayes of men? are thy yeares as the yeares of a mortall man?
6. That thou shouldest ferche out mine iniquitie, and make inquirie of my sinne?

He things that are spoken heere by Iob, may well bee spoken by euery of vs so farre forth as they be good 10 and holy prayers made vnto God, and as he will allow them. And first of all, if wee bee pressed with anguish, wee may well say that wee shall get no good by aduauncing ourselues agaynst God in going too lawe with him. Secondly, wee may desyre him too make vs feele our sinnes. For the cheefe condemnation that hee shall pronounce vpon vs, shall boote no whitte to our saluation, except we bee touched to bee ouerthrowne in our selues. For a man must become his owne iudge and condemne himselfe, if hee will bee quit at Gods hande. Also we may well make all the shewes that are added immediately, that is to witte, that it is no reason that God shoulde give the wicked short occasion too lyke of their blasphemies and lewde dealinges: and that on the other syde hee is no earthly creature that hee shoulde bee desirous too reuenge himselfe: and finally that wee bee the worke of his handes. Lastly [wee may well say] that hee neede not to put men to the racke too hoult oute their misdeedes, for all is knowne vn- 30 too him. So then wee may well vse the wordes that are reported heere, in good sort. But wee see how Iob vetereth his passions wherewith hee was earyed away: not that hee resisted them not (as I haue declared afore:) and yet for all that it is not too bee gathered but that in the meane while he was combred with them at the first brunt. And hee confesseth heere, that hee was in suche bitterness, that although hee shoulde gayne nothing by it, yet coulde hee not but strengthen himselfe in hys complayntes, or rather give them their full scope. For 40 the Hebrewe woerde that is put there, signifieth both to leave or let loose, and also to fortifie or strengthen. Therefore let vs marke well that Iob speaketh heere as a man ouerfull of passions. Neuerthelesse hee knoweth what the nature of God is, and restreyneth himselfe, neyther laboureth hee to make his owne case good by accusing God. But contrariwyse hee confesseth that hee is amazed, and as it were out of his witte, as men say. And therefore hee resorteth too praying vnto God, that (before he condemne him) hee shoulde shewe him wherfore he goeth to lawe with him, and that before he bring him downe to that poynct, he should make him perceyue the reasoñ why he indureth it. And now let vs go through with these matters from woerde too woerde. He sayeth, My soule is cut off in my life. The Hebrewe word signifieth oftentymes too mislyke, as if hee shoulde say, my soule is wearie of my life, or I am lothe too liue anye longer. But the truer meening is too saye, My soule is cut off in my lyfe. And why so? For althoughe hee were a- lyue: yet notwithstanding hee confesseth that his state was suche as hee was even as good as deade. Beholde (sayeth hee) my lyfe is no lyfe. For I liue in death. And thus yee see that hys meening was so. And heereby hee confesseth himselfe too bee as it were past hope: yea verely as in respect of Gods handling of him. Hee had still a hope in God: howebeit, too trusste ther- vntoo, it behoued hym too go oute of his owne person. And this is a poynct whiche wee ought too marke throughly. For if wee looke but vpon oure presente state, what can wee doo that wee shoulde not bee vt- terly ouerthrowne by it? And for proofe hereof, al- though a man bee at his ease, yet hath hee no conti- nuance too beare out the inconueniences of this lyfe: and if hee looke vpon his owne frayltie, hee is besee- ged with a hundred deathes, and hee hath but a sha- dowe of lyfe. But specially when God scourgeth vs, and sheweth himselfe as our aduersarie, so as it should seeme hee will thunder vpon vs, so as on the one side we consider oure sinnes, and on the other syde haue an eye too this so perfect and highe righteousnesse which is in God: it is certaine that wee cannot conceyue anye hope of saluation in our selues. Notwithstanding, they that suffer themselues too bee ouercome by such tem- ptations, doo well shewe themselues too be ouerdull, that is too say, that they haue not any suche feeling of Gods iudgement as they ought too haue. For whosoever is touched rightly and too the quicke, shall feele himselfe as it were in hell when hee bethinketh him of his sinnes, and specially if God sommon him before his seate, and make him feele howe gyltie hee is. It is not for noughe then that I tolde you that Iob confesseth himselfe too bee as it were paþhope, yea verely as in respect of himselfe. Neuerthelater, so it is that hee tasted Gods mer- cie and fathery loue wherevntoo hee always had hys recourse. That was the thing whereby hee was sus- tayned, and ouercame so great a temptation. And it is for vs also to do the like. For after we haue considered our sinnes and bee sorie for them: wee must harken too this sweete and anyable voyce, whereby God calleth vs too himselfe, for he promiseth not saluation and life too the Angels only and to such as are able too shewe themselues righteous: for if it were so, there were not that man in the worlde which should not bee shet out from life and saluation. But God declareth that hee will be fauorable to sinners, which are vtterly cast downe in themselues, so as they knowe not where to become. Ye see then how it is not in our selues, but out of our selues that we must seke comfort whē we haue sorowed at the sight of our sinnes. And when wee feele suche troublies as wee see nothing but hell open before vs too swallowe vs vp: then muste wee lift vp our eyes aloft, to looke vpon the inestimable godnesse of our God, whereby he is willing to call vs to saluation, notwithstanding that we bee as good as dam- ned alreadie. Thus yee see what wee haue to note vpon this first place. Now whereas Iob sayeth, that seeing it is so, He will take leaue to talke agaynst himselfe or vpon himselfe: therein he declareth that hee meeneth to bewray the passions wherewith he was turmoyled, which of them- selues were euill and damnable. Neuerthelesse Iob in- tended to lay them forth, to the end men might know that he was oppressed with heauiness, yea euē with such heauiness as he saw no remedie, but was faine to make his moane so, beeing a frayle man. But the holye Ghost had yet a further foresight. For he intent that Iob should bee a Prophete and teacher vntoo vs, too giue vs war- ning what our affections bee. For it behoueth men to knowthemselues, and to be warned of their infirmi- ties, that they may take heede to themselues and brydle themselues, forsoomuch as if they let themselues at libertie, they they shall keepe neyther meane nor measure. Lo howe we ought to applie this lesson to our instruction. Neueruerthelesse it behoueth vs too marke well this speeche where Job sayeth that he will take libertie to make complayns agaynst himselfe. As if hee shoulde say, I knowe I shall gayne nothing by standing in contention wyth God. Yee see then that the Preface whiche he vseth, importeth a verie profitable lesson. For men are of opinion that they shall discharge themselues well y-nough, if they maye frette and grudge agaynst God. 10 And heere yee see wherein the wicked comfort themselues: For beholde, it will seeine too them that they are well eased of their burthen, when they haue spewed oute some blasphemies and vttered theyr impaciencie: and yet for all that, it bootteth them nothing at all, they make their case muche worse than it was. If wee haue any thing that ouerlodeth vs, well, if wee can cast it too the grounde, we bee vnburthened: it is true: but If I haue a great burthen vpon my shoulders or betwixt mine armes, and I woulde cast it vpon myne heade, 20 and make a great striuing too doo it: that were the next way too breake my necke. And what haue I gayned by that? Euen so is it with vs, when wee will pleade with God: it is all one as if wee woulde hoyse vp a burthen vpon our heade, and it must needes fail vpon it for anie thing that wee can doo, for which way soeuer wee flie it shall light vppon vs. VVee see then that men doo nought but destroy themselues when they vomitte and spewe vp their murmurings and blasphemies after that fashion agaynst God. And thus ye perceyue why I sayde 30 that this lesson is greatly for our profite. True it is that God woulde haue vs vse this homelinesse of vnburthening our selues intoo his lappe. But the maner of proceeding therein is verie diverse, as it is sayde in the Psalmes, and in many other places of the holy scripture: the maner is, that wee shoulde consider that God will prouide for all, and that forasmuch as it is his office too gouerne the worlde, he can well remedie all our needes, and will give vs releefe when wee bee ouersore oppressed. Lo howe wee may say all our cares and greefes 40 in Gods lappe, and he wil take charge of them, whereby wee shall bee eased of them, yea, if wee come too him with prayer and supplication. If wee haue any heauiness or greefe that nippeth vs, [let vs say,] well Lord, it is in thee to succour thy faythfull seruants when they pyne in Payne. I comie hither not knowing what shall become of mee, if thou prie mee not. Nowe therefore when wee shall haue requested God after that sort, and hee shall haue yeelded vs recorde that hee hath not beene deafe to our desires, but that wee are sure hee hath heard them: that is a good discharge: for God commeth still before vs, and receyueth our burthen whiche we deliuere vnto him. But as for those that harden themselues in their prude, and are puffed vp with it and caried away by impaciencie: what do they? They bend themselues agaynst God, as if a man woulde shooote an arrow at heauen: and the same must needes fall backe vpon their owne heade: or as if a man shoulde cast vp a stone, and the same should light vpon his owne pate also. Therefore when we make our complayns, let vs be well aduised that the same be done with all lowlinesse, yea, and that we rest wholly vpon Gods prouidence, grounding our selues vpon the goodnessse & fatherly loue whiche he hath shewed vs, and going vnto him with praier and supplication. If we do so: then shall we be vnburthened and God will prouide for all. But if wee thinke to amende our case by grudging and by casting foorth some bitter talke, it is certaine that thereby we shall bring our selues

in worse plighe than wee were afore. Yee see then what we haue to consider vpon this text, where Job confesseth that if he giue his excessiue passions head, the same must needes rebounde backe vpon himselfe or agaynst himselfe. But in the meane season hee declarereth, that hys intent was not too lift vp himselfe agaynst God, but to acknowledge that all the complayns thathee shoulde make, came of the greefe that hee indured by hys aduersitie. Therefore let vs acknowledge our faults: but yet when we haue acknowledged them, wee muste also seeke the remedie of them. Do wee perceyue that our fleshe is vnable too beare the afflictions which God sendeth vs? Let vs runne vntoo him that hath the spirit of strength, yea not for himselfe, but too deale it abrode to suche as haue neede of it. Nowe when men knowe their infirmities: what haue they too doo? Behold God telleteth them that hee is able too helpe them, and strengthen them. Seeing then that wee are warned so of our diseases: why go wee not to the Phisition? But what? It seemeth too mooste men that it is a sufficient discharge for them too say, it is true that I haue sinned, but I am a man of fleshe and bloude, I am neyther of yron nor steele, if any misfortune happen vnto me, I must needes feele it. All this is true. But in the meane while wherto serue all the warninges that are giuen vs in the holy scripture? Serue they not both too shewe t' at when God warneth vs of our sinnes hee woulde haue vs to bee sorie for them, and that euerie of vs should hate himselfe seeing himselfe to be such a one? Againe, wherto serue the promises also whiche he addeth, but too mane vs too come streyte vntoo him, praying him to performe them in vs, and that wee may not doubt, but tht he is ready too succour vs whensoeuer hee seeth vs dryuen too necessarie? Yee see then that the thing which we haue too doo, is not onely to acknowledge our faultes, but also to come vnto God that he may amende them by his goodnessse and by the grace of his holy spirite. And Job saith, that hee will erie vnto God, saying: Condemne mee not, but shew mee wherfore thou pleadest. Here Job speaketh still as a man troubled in his wittes. For he is verie loth that God shoule proceede with him by the sayde secrete and hidden iightfulnessse whereof I treated yesterday: but he woulde haue God to examine him after his ordinarie maner. I sayde a fore, that God hath giuen vs a sure rule in his lawe: and that if we be iatreid according to our offences, we behelde Gods iightuousnesse which is set forth there, and our inditement is giuen vs and layde afore vs in writing, insomuch that we see there the Articles that are proued agaynst vs, yea and so wel proued, as they suffize to cast vs. Therefore when men are scourged at Gods hande for tht: it sinnes: then see they in the law, not onely their sentence of condemnation, but also all their whole inditement. There the matters are so layde foorth from poyn to poyn, as they be faine to cast their heades intoo their bosomes. Howbeit forsoomuch as God scourgeth not Job after the ordinarie maner, but had graunted Satan leaue too trouble him: Therefore Job sayth, Condemne me not till thou hast first commenced thyne action against me. And this is sayde, because Gods secret iustice is very straunge for vs to know: for our wits cannot attaine thervnto. And why so? For we are alwayes desirous to knowe the reason why God worketh so: we would haue him accountable to vs. And when God scourgeth vs, and leitteth vs not know wherfore therupon we are amazed, and we are angie at it. How so? Is not God righteous? Then must not all that he doth needes be ruled by reason and vprightnesse? Yes, but I see it not to be so, but rather the flat contrarie. See how men are puffed vp to pleade against God, They make discourses within themselves, yea euē discourses of hartburning and fumishnesse . Thus yee see what Job seeketh in this sentence . But yet for all that, God was able to shewe him playnly, yea say I, and to make him perceyue that how ryghtuous so euer he had ben , it was good reason that he should bee chastized for his sinnes . And wherefore doeth he then make such protestation: for he seemeth to beare men in hand that his case is good, if God would chastize him by the rule of the lawe . No no : But he rather hath respect to the purpose of God: which is that he shoulde confess himself vnfaynedly to bee a sinner, and that although God had good reason to punish him so greeuously : yet notwithstanding he did not punish for his sinnes sake . And for proof thereof, he sawe many wicked folk in the world, who were spared whylest he was punished : and as for his owne part, he had always indeuered to serue God too the vttermost of his power.

VVherfore thē was he so scourged, but bycause God had some other speciaall consideration? yee see then when Job pretēdeth heere: that is to witte, to obteyne that God shoulde handle him after an ordinarie manner, to the end to make him perceiue his sinnes . And heerewithall wee haue to apply this present lesson to our owne instructiō, and it will stand vs in great stead . The applying of it is, to pray God to shew vs wherefore he entreteth processe against vs, and why he calleth vs to iudgement . For without that, all the chastizements that wee can endure, are to no purpose : according as we see that the greater part of the world do harden them selues against God . VVe see how Gods scourges do beate both gret and smal: and in deede, euery man crieth, Alas that the wretched world is no better now adayes : but in the meane season where is the re-pentance? what auaille al these chastizements? It seemeth that men haue conspired to withstand God, and to beate backe his blowes: insomuch that if God giue them neuer so great strokes with a hammer, we see their harts are as stythes: and so farre off are they from softning, that they rather harden at it . VVhereof commeth this, but bycause wee want the wisdome and discretion to knowe, why God pleadeth against vs? So then it is a very profitable petition for vs when we desire God that he shoulde not simply condemne vs, but rather make vs to vnderstand wherein we be guiltie, and enlighten vs by his holy spirite, that we may enter into the examining of our own consciences, and when wee haue well considered oure sinnes, we may mourne for them, and not haue any other intent than to returne vnto him, and to yeld our selues confounded in them, that he may haue pitie vpon vs . Lo 50 heere a speciaall poynt . And besides this, there is yet another seconde request: which is, that Gods punishing of vs may not be to oppresse vs vtterly: but that he will deale with vs after suche a sort, as we may haue leysure to bethinke vs of our sinnes . And this present request differeth from the other . VVhy so? If God should come with so great and headie violēce at the first brunt, as we might be vtterly dismaide at it: what wold become of it? VVe shoulde not haue the stomacke to acknowledge, Alas, God is my iudge, and yet he neuer ceasseth to be my father still . But as a miserable offender that is condemned, is as it were dulled when he is drawen to the gallows, and is like as a blocke of wood vnable to receiue cōfort though it be offered him: euē so ye see that we are in the same taking, when God doth by the said horrible extremitie begin to shew him selfe against vs . For [out of hand] we conceiue eternall death, which is so combersome to vs, as it ouerwhelmeth vs with suche darknesse, that we haue not so much as one little sparke of good comfort to come vnto him . VVe bee forepossessed with suche a fearefulness, as we haue not the witte to say, alas my God, yet giue thou space of repentance to thy silly poore creature which presenteth him selfe before thee . Therefore wee haue great neede to returne vnto God after the example of Job, praying him to indite vs before he condemne vs: that is to say, to deale so mildly with vs as we may haue respite to bethinke our selues . And heere ye see why Ier.10.4.24 Ieremy likewise saithe, Lorde chastize thou me, howbeit with measure . For he saith welynough, that if God listed to deale rigorously with vs, we shoulde be vtterly ouerwhelmed, we were past recouerie . Therefore he beseecheth God to chastize him with measure: that is to say, that the chastizement may be tempered and moderated in such wise, as he may reade and quietly examin his faults, to be sorie for them; and that therupon he may also take hart to returne vnto God in hope of forgiuenesse at his hand.

Ye see then how it behoueth vs too do: and it is more than necessarie for vs to do it . For wee see howe Gods scourges are continually sent abrode through the whole world: and the cause of the mischiefe is the same which I haue shewed alredy: that is to witte, bycause men consider not why God scourgeth them and beateth them after that fashion . Agayne we see men are besotted with such a presumptuounnesse, yea and with such a foolish rage: as they thinke themselves alwayes able to iustifie themselves before God . Then seeing that this pride is so deeply rooted in our nature: we ought too bee so muche the more prouoked to make the said petition which I haue spoken of: that is to witte, that God shuld shew vs wherfore hee sueth against vs: that is to say, that he shoulde make vs to feele our sinnes in such manner, as we might be driuen willingly to confess our selues guiltie, and afterward be taught to returne vnto him . But yet for all this, whensoeuer it shall please God to shew men wherfore he pleadeth against them, there is not that mā which hath not his enditerment throughly framed alredy (no not euē the rightvoulest man vpon the earth) I say cuen 40 according to the rule of the lawe, so as God needeth not to bring vs to his high iustice which is incomprehensible to vs: but only that we looke vpon our owne life on the one side, and on the other side considering what Gods lawe requireth, comparing our works with the rule that God hath lenth vs: and then shall wee be driuen to vtter confusion . VVherefore is it then, that men presume so much both vpon their works, and vpon their vertues, and vpon their merites? It is bycause they neuer knew what Gods iustice is . For wheroft cometh this hypocrisy in the popedom, that mā shal preach free will, merits, & satisfaciōs, & set vp their bristles in such wise, as bearē theselues in hand that they may come perking before God, yea and preache thither like shamelesse strumpets . They be ful of filth, and vncleannessse, and yet notwithstanding they preache their owne merites: and they bearē theselues in hand, that when they haue done amisse, they can well quit themselues againe by satisfactions . And wheroft cometh such pride, but bycause they were neuer rightly cited before the saide iudgement seate to feele how guiltie they be?

Therefore lette vs marke well, that when wee desire God to shew vs wherefore he pleadeth against vs: the iustifying and quitting of our selues must not be the markes that wee must shoote at: but rather we must yeld our selues guiltie that we may be receyued to mercie . For behold the onely remedye whiche is lefte vs, is too desire God to pitie vs, bycause that we for our part can bring nothing to him but our owne confusion . Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this streine. But by the way Job addeth, Is it good for thee to do me wrong, and to cast away the worke of thy hands, and to make the determination of the wicked to shone? Or [is it a pleasure to thee] to bee priarie or of counsell with the wicked? Heere Job speakeith of the nature of God, euen to the intent to obteine his request. As I haue touched heretofore, God suffereth vs to vse such maner of speech as this, when wee come vnto him that is to wit, [he giueth vs leau]e to speake familiaritie. neuerthelesse, this must be done with all lowlinesse. For when God is so frendlie as to abace him selfe to the intent we shold not alledge that we be set to farre off from him: it is not to giue vs boldnesse to ouer-shoote our selues so as we should come scornefully too him and disdayne him. No: but it is to the end that oure sorowes should not ouerwhelme vs in suche sort as wee shold not be able to take breath, and be out of all hope that God will regard vs. Thus ye see the meane that wee haue to find some easement when it shall seeme that we are vtterly vndone as in respect of our selues: whiche is, that we ceasse not for all that, to lay open our harts so familiaritie vnto God, and to make our moane vnto him as a little child gets him to his fader, seeing he giueth vs leau so to do.

Ye see then how the saith of Gods chidren may bee well stablished, not in pride and ouerweening, but in true lowlinesse: And now lete vs come too that whiche Job saith: Shalt thou gayne any thng by doing me wrong? or by casting away the worke of thy hands? Gods righteousnesse is tried by this, that he is not like men who are led by affection. VVhereof commeth it that men do wrong, or harme, or some other annoyance by guile or malice to their neigbour? It is bycause it profiteth them selues. VVherefore is it that a iudge is brybed: VVherefore wil he oppresse good men, and support wicked men? VVill he be led by credite or fauoure? It is bycause it seemeth to be for his profite, or to win the good will of some person, or else to avenge him selfe. But none of these things can fasten vpon God. VVe see then that his righteousness is procued on the one part. For when God scourgeth men, doth he bend him selfe against his enimies? No: he addresseth him selfe to his creatures: for wee are the worke of his hands, he hath created and fashioned vs. VVill he then destroy that which he hath made? No: And therefore it behoueth vs to conclude, that God cannot vse eyther wrong or crueltie towards vs. He cannot vse any wrong; verely bycause he requireth not any thing at mens hands, but that which is due to him. And they are comiuted thereof. For although they bee malicious and stubborne: Yet haue they alwayes some respect vnto him. True it is that some are so ouerbold in naughtinesse, and giue themselves so wholly vnto it: as they thinke not at all vpon God. Notwithstanding, (as I haue said) euuen nature imprinted alwayes this vnderstanding in men, that if they know it not to be for their commoditie and profite to do extorcion and wrong to their neighbours, they will not do it. Then if men being euill of themselves, do no euill but to their owne profite: can God who is the fountaine of all goodnesse, and the rule of all righte, bee moued to do vs harme and to punishe vs wrongfullie, without hauing any profite by it? So then we see heere one prooife of Gods righteousnesse. Agayne it is manifest that he can vse no crueltie against vs: we are his worke-manship inasmuch as he hath fashioned vs. It is certaine therefore, that forsomuch as we be his workmanship, he will not destroy vs without cause. VVe see that when a workman hath made a peece of work, he wold haue the same to be preserued still. But God hath put vs into this world: and we be as it were the record of his power, righ-teousnesse, goodnesse, and wisdome. VVill he then de-stroy vs without cause? It is a doctrine greatly for our be-hoofe, if so be that we be able to applie it well to our in-struction. Yea: for Satan will tempt vs at all assayes, to be offend with God as who should say he vseth ouergreat rigoure towards vs as if he were vnrighteous. But wee must haue the stay to say, how now wretched creature? against whome bendest thou thy selfe? imaginest thou that thy God doth thee wrong? is it possible for him to do any? thou art full of sinne, thou art full of malice, craf-tiness, and deceit: and yet notwithstanding thou hast an eye to thine owne profite wher thou dost any man harme. If thou annoy or impeach any man, it is too further thy selfe by another mans losse and hindrance. And can thy God gayn any thing by thee? VVilt thou make him co-partner of thine vnrighteousnesse and sinne? Then if we can consider thus faire: it is certaine that we shall be horribly afraide to treate after that sort of Gods righteousnesse, or by any meanes to bring it in question. Furthermore if we consider our selues and say, how now? God hath set thee in this world, and he hath spred out his gracie gifts and the great treasures of his goodnesse vpon thee, whiche if thou marke in thy body, thou shalte haue matter ynough to rauish thee into wondering: Must thou not needes be very vnsensible, yea and possessed with the deuill, when thou shalt charge thy God with any crueltie, who hath shewed him selfe so gentle and louing towards thee? Ye see then howe wee must practice this lesson, that we may haue skill to profite ourselues by it. But the saying that is added is yet more to be practized. For there is nothing more rife with vs, than to bee out of pacience when we see the wicked and the despizers of God to be in their ruffe, as though they had the world at will: and to make thir triumphes in skorning of God and of the Gospell, and of vs that professe it. As how? God afflieth his Church: and by and by see the wicked are in suche triumph as they thinke they haue wonne the goale, and it seemeth that God fauoreth the. 40 Afterward ther commeth some trouble: things go cleane backward, and where as we ought to be confirmed more and more, that the number of the saithfull shall increase, and whereas we ought to be strengthned in faith and in all goodnesse: we see that many whiche made pretence too beleue the Gospell, slippe their heads out of the collar, and become much more wicked and outrageous than the open enimies. VVe see other things also whereof there is no hope at all that they shall amende to the better, and this is it that grecueth vs.

And howe is it (say wee) that G O D suffereth this geere? It seemeth that hee is minded too aduaunce the wicked heere, and that hee is willing too open theyr mouthes that they may spew out theyr blasphemies agaynst him: It seemeth that he is altogether agaist vs, and that it is a pleasure to him too haue vs vexed and made a laughingstocke to all men. And will God so cleere the deuises of the wicked? VVill hee take theyr part? will hee bee a partner of their corruption and filthynesse?

Loe what geere maye runne in oure heades. So muche the more therefore behoueth it vs to bee fended agaisthe suche temptations, according as job setteth downe both twayne of them in this sentence. For on the one syde hee confesseth that it came thus too hys imagination. Howe nowe? it seemeth that G O D taketh the wicked mens part, and that hee hath made a compacte with them too gyue them so muche the more boldenesse. Job then confesseth, that thys tempta-temptation came in his head, howbeit that he withstood it. For hee confesseth it too bee impossible that God should not bee utterly against euill, because he naturally hateth it: otherwyse he should bee fayne too deny himself. So then for somuchas God is the iudge of the world: he must needs hate all vnryghtuousnesse. VVherefore let vs assure our selues, that he will neuer eleere the intent of the wicked, that is too say, hee will neuer shewe himself too allow it. VVhat will he doo then? He will exercyse our pacience in the meane whyle. Therefore let vs be armed against all stumblingblocks. VVhen we see the wicked, the enimies of the truthe take occasion to skorne at God, and at vs, by reason that things are so confounded in the world: Let vs say, well, yet is not God on their side for all this, for in the end they must bee confounded in their prude: But it behoueth vs too looke further. Behold now is the tyme of darknesse, as our Lord Iesu Christ termeth it, when the diuell hath such a libertie too doo mischeef, that the wicked haue the reynes of the brydle looce in their necke. He sayeth it is the kingdome or reigne of darknesse when things are confounded as it were in the dark. But God wil chace away the darknesse, and giue vs lyght at length, according as we haue most certaine promis of it. Then let vs tarye, and bee quiet, and conclude that it is impossible that God should fauour the deuises of the wicked, howsoever he seeme to dissemble the matter in the meane whyle towards vs. And therefore wee must bee pacient too the end. For in tyme conuenient he will shewe vs that wee haue not ben deceyued in wayting his leysure. Lo what we haue too note concerning this text. Now as touching that which Job addeth: that is too wit, whether God haue such eyes as man hath, or else whether his tyme bee as the tyme of a mortall man: it is too shewe that God needeth not too make long inquests against vs: as if he should say, Lord, thou knowest all things, yea and they were present with thee before the creation of the world. Therefore thou needest not to vse the ordinarie course of earthly iudges, who make long processes whyle they hold offenders vpon the racke. For they doo so bycause of their ignorance: but thou haste no neede too doo it. So then, wherefore handlest thou mee so rigorously? Job speakeith verye well of Gods nature, but he concludeth verie ill. For he bewrayeth his excesse passion as I sayd afore. But the cheef poynt is that wee should consider how too apply this lesson too our owne vse. VVhereas Job desyreteth too be eased bycause God hath not the eyes of a mortall man. Let vs vnderstand that when God scourgeth vs, he doeth it not to boulte out the certaintie of aught that is vnknowen or concealed from him: but to make vs to vnderstand it. VVhy doeth God suffer vs to pyne away by processe of tyme, seing he can make cleane riddace of vs at the first blowe? Hee doth it too the end we should bethink our selues the better. And heere Job is contrarie to himself. VVherein we see that mennes passions are so diuers, that oftentimes they speake against themselves. Euen as we see the waues of the sea doo breake one another wth their violence: euen so doo our passions which are contrarie and repugnant one against another in vs. VVe see it not awhit. But if we would shre vp our eyes, wee shoule fynd there is such contrariousnesse in our selues, as we speake one whyle one thing, and another whyle another.

And behold what happened vnto Job. He sayd euen now, condemne mee not, but shewe me wherefore thou fewest mee. VVell, God ment to shewe him why, but he on his side knew it not. Howbeit he sayeth that he is pressed ouersore: not that he had not pacience continuallie (as I haue sayd) but the same was not so perfect as were requisite. So then whensoever and as oft as wee shall happen to bee smitten by Gods hand, and that as sone as we be escaped out of one wo, wee enter into another, so as wee continue in lingering paine, and see no end of our miseries, but when wee think too plucke the one foote out of the myre, the other sinketh further in: Let vs acknowledge that God afflieteth vs, not bycause he taketh any pleasure profit or aduaantage by it, but bycause it is his will to drawe vs to him by that meane. And so let the same make vs to think those afflictions sweete and amiable, seing wee perceyue them to tend to our saluation and welfare. In any wyse let vs not bee out of hart, when he scourgeth vs divers wayes. And when he hath giuen vs one stripe, if he turne againe and strike vs twyce or thryce more: Let vs say, well Lord, seing it pleasest thee to hold vs as it were vpon the racke. Suffer vs not too bee rooted in naughtinesse as wee should grynd our teethe against thee though wee bee conuictid of our sinnes: but make vs too come with ryght meekeenesse to sue for thy mercie, that we may find thee fauorable and pitifull towards vs.

Behold (I say) how wee ought to doo. And bycause wee haue none acesse to God but by our Lord Iesu Christe: let vs repayre vnto him, praying him too put vs in such redinesse, as we may bee receyued at his hand. And although wee must be fayne to indure manie troubles and miseries during this present life: yet if wee beare them patiently, let vs not doubt but all shall turne to our welfare, and serue vs in stede of salues and medicines.

And now let vs present our selues before the maiestie of our good God, in acknowledging the innumerable faults whereof we be giltie in his sight: praying him that after he hath made vs too perceyue them, hee will also withdrawe vs from them, and so gouerne vs by his holie spirit, as we may fyght in such wyse against the temptations of our flesh and of the world, that when we haue ouercome them, wee may come to the triumph of glorie which is prepared for vs in heauene. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heauenly father wee acknowledge in our selues, &c.

The xxxix. Sermon, which is the second vpon the tenth Chapter.

7. Thou knowest that I cannot doo wickedly, and that no man can deliuere mee from thy hand.
8. Thy hands haue made mee, they haue fashyoned me vvholy round about, and doost thou destroy mee?
9. Remember that thou haste made mee as of clay, and that thou shalt bring mee into dust againe.
10. Haste not thou poured mee out like milk? haste not thou set mee togither like cheese?
11. Haste thou not clothed mee vwith skin and flesh, [and] knit mee togither vwith bones and sinewes?
12. Thou haste giuen me life and grace, and thy visitation hath preserued my Soule.

13. These thinges hast thou hidden in thee, and yet notwithstanding I knowe that it is so with thee.
14. If I haue sinned, thou vilt imptison me: thou vilt not suffer me to scape vnpunished.
15. If I haue done amisse, vvo is me: If I haue bin righeteouse, yet shall I not lift vp my head, seeing I am filled vwith shaine, and knowving mine affliction.

Ob going forward with that which was declared yesterday, telleth God heere, that he needeth not to make iugis: iugis after the manner of earthly judges. V Why so? Thou knowest (faith he) that I can do no euill, and that no man can deliuier me from thy hand. If men haue an offender in ward, they will bee afryde least he should do worse than he had done afore, if he escape, and specially they laboure to reuenge themselves of that which is past. And that is the cause why men are sayne to kill those in whome there is no hope of amendment afterward. But Job saith that it is not so with God. VVherefore? Thou knowest (faith he) that I can do no euill, and thou knowest that although thou deliuier me from this punishment, I am alwayes subiect to thee, whensouer it pleasest thee thou canst bring me agayne to this wretched plighe wherein I am now. Seing it is so; what should prouoke thee to put me to so many torments? As I haue said alredy, all these requests may well be made vnto God, so it be with al lowlinesse, that we stand not in contention as though wee wold blame him for handling vs to rigorously, or else alledge some reason in our owne behalfe to iustifie our eace withall. VVhen we come not after that manner, but with a settled purpose and mind to say, Alas Lord, as in respect of thy selfe I know thou proceedest not after the maner of men: for what should leade thee to do so? Thou knowest what I am, thou knowest what is in my hearte: againe it is in thine owne power to bridle me: though I were the wickeddest caifar in the world, yet could I not escape: what shall I gayne then by striuing against thee? For who am I? I am but dust, I am a poore mortall creature. (Lo heere a speciall poynt.) And moreover, if thou do but blowe vpon me, I shall be right nought at al. Lord I know therefore and conclude, that thou art not led by fleshly affection when thou scourgest. VVhat remayneth then? Make me to feele thy gootnesse. VVhen we bee well assured of Gods righfulnesse, and therewithal haue this full purpose to incline our selues to stedfast trust in him: Let vs not imagin that he heareth vs not, or that he will not shewe vs mercie. Thus ye see how we may vse lobs talke. And after he hath said so, he addeth: Thy hands haue made me, they haue fashioned me wholly round about, and yet for all that wilt thou destroy me? Heere he returneth to that which was declared yesterday. For this matter hath bin touched afore, and nowe hee confirmeth it new ageine, and not without cause. For it is a matter that ought to comfort vs greatly, that if God vse rigoure towards vs, he doth it not of any crueltie. VVhy so? for hee hath a regard of his owne worke and of the thing that he made. Therefore as oft as God striketh vs, we must alwayes thinke thus: VVel then, I made not my selfe, God listeth not him selfe vp against a straunge thing, I am the worke of his owne hands. And sith it is so, it becommeth me to say that he hath good reason to deale thus with me. For he is not cruel: it is certaine that he acknowledgeth his owne work. God doth (as a man might say) looke vpon him selfe, and behold him selfe in men as it were in a glasse: and it is not without cause that he looked vpon all that he made and found it good. But man is his principall work, and the excellentest of all his creatures.

It was his will to vtter that thing in him, which he had put but in small portions both in heaven and in earth, and all living wights: in somuch that man is termed as the little worlde, wherin wee see so many wonderful things, as a man must needs be astonied at them. Sith it is so: we must always beleue, that God beholding hys owne workmanship in vs, will bee moued and inclined to do vs good and to mainteine vs. For we know what is attributed to him in the holy scripture: namely, that he preserueth that whiche hee hath made, and bringeth the thing to perfection which he hath once begonne. Then seeing the eace is so that he hath vsed so singular fauour towards vs: there is no doubt but he will continue the same to the end. Now we see that this matter (that is too say, this our considering that God made vs) ought & can stand vs in great stead, if we applie it to good vse. And heere yee see also why Job maketh a larger discourse of it. In this verse he saith, Lord, wilt thou deuoure me, (for so signifieth the hebreu word which we translate vilt thou destroy me) seeing thou hast fashioned me wholly round about? He meeneth that ther is no fault at al to be found. For one may well make a goodly peece of work, but it shall not be so perfectly polished alike throughout, there will be some part of it wherein he hath not vised the like cunning. If a man make a peece of faire tapistrie, ther shal be no more but the outside of it bewtiful to the eye, that which is out of sight shall be altogether il fauored. But as for man, we see he is polished through out from top to toe, so as there is one orderly workmanship in him throughout, (yea according to the order of nature) & ther is no exception to be taken in him euen to the tippes of his nailes. Job therfore ment to expresse heere the infinite wisdome of God which vttereth it selfe in the shape of man: as if he had said, Lord, wilt thou destroy so excellent a work wherein a man may see thy wisdome, thy power, and inestimable goodnesse to thy glory? VVilt thou take pleasure so, in defacing thine owne glory which appereith and shineth in men? Now we see what his meening is: howbeit hee addeth that which I haue touched: that is to witte, That God bath made him as clay, and shall bring him to dust agayne. As if he shuld say, Lord, were thy workmanship taken out of me, what shoulde remaine? for my beginning is of the mire of the earth. True it is that ther is none but Adam that God made frō ouf of the earth. But hereby ye see frō whence we haue our first beginning. VVe must al of vs come backe thither. VVhe we bethinke vs frō whence me are come, & wherof they be made, that is to wit of the earth: let vs assure ourselues that the same is vertified vpon vs al in generall. Now seeing that god hath made vs of the earth: let him take away that which he hath put to vs, (that is to say, let him withdraw his power, wisdome, & goodnesse which he hathe shed out vpon vs:) and we must needs retorne: from whence we came. The eace then standing as it doth, wil God destroy vs? were it not as much as to deface his owne glorie? Yes, if he did it without reason why. For when he destroyeth the wicked and unrighteouse, it is bycause that (as much as they could) they haue blotted out the image that was printed in their nature. And in deede Moyses declareth that God was sorie whē he saw that mē were corrupted after that fashion. Behold (sayth he) God repented that ever he made man. Not that ther is any is any chaungeablenesse in God too repente him of his dooing: for he had well foreseen all things before the world was made. But Moyses sheweth there, that God misliketh men when they bee so peruerter and turned away from the soundnesse and rightuousnesse which he had put into them. Hereby then we see that God doeth alwayes acknowledge his woorkmanship in men: howbeeit that therewithall he doeth alwayes vterly mislyke of their sinne, the which proceedeth not of him, nor can be fathered vpon him. And after this Job addeth: 10

Haste not thine powredmee out like milk: Here he speaketh of mannes begetting, which is a woondershull thing whereat all our witts are confounded. For to say, that of mannes seede there should ingender a liuing wight, a wight so polished as there should appeere such an orderly disposition in him, as might rauish mannes myndes and make them sonished at it: ought not God to bee magnified therein? what difference is there betweene the originall of a man and the making of a cheeze? For wee see, that of milk, after it is set toogither and curded, folk 20 make cheeze. But who can say that a liuing creature, a creature that beareth the image of God in it, a creature that is so well framed, shall proceede of that which is the groundwoork in the begetting of men? Forsomuch then as there seemeth to be no likelyhode that a man should be formed out of mannes seede: so much the more is it too be seene that Gods intent is to be glorified therein. Therfore let vs bee as it were rauished too say. Lord what a workman art thou, that men should be compafted after such maner of dung and filthinesse, and yet notwithstanding 30 become so excellent a thing? For when wee looke vpon a man, we must needs be abashed whither we will or no. And whereof commeth that? Of a shamefull thing and such a one as men are loth to speake of. Ye see then that God hath so abaced vs in our begetting, as he will haue his power, ryghtuousnesse and wisdome the better knowne therby. Lo what Job hath vttered here. And for the same cause he addeth, Lord thou hast clothed me with flesh and skin. Now, doo these things proceede of mannes seede? It is nothing but infestio[n] and filthinesse, and 40 yet notwithstanding behold how skin, beholde how flesh, behold how sinewes [come thereof,] which are things whereat all the world may be amazed. Seing then that God hath packed so many miracles toogither in one body, and sheweth vs there so faire and liuely an image of his maiestie: haue not we cause to say, Lord, here are things that farre passe all our witte and reason? But after that Job hath spoken of mannes begetting, he addeth: well then, Thou hast giuen mee life and grace, and thy visitation bath preserved my soule. Herein he sheweth how God 50 thought it not ynoch to haue fashyoned him in his mothers womb and to haue giuen him so excellent a shape. But besides this (sayeth he) thou hast giuen mee life and grace! By this woord life, he meeneth the liuelinessse and power that is in the Soule. For the bodie of it self hath no moving: it is but a dead thing. Thou therefore o Lord hast quickened mee: that is to say, the shape of my bodie is not the cheef thing that ought to bee magnified in thy woork: True it is that euē in that, a man may see thy woondershull power and wisdome: But the Soule is yet more, that passeth. And herewithall, the Soule hath not the commō life, such as is in the brute beasts, whose soule hath power to feele and moue, to eate and drinke, and to go and come: not only these outward senses are in ma, but also there is reason, and vnderstanding in him, and there is truthe in him. For we see what a nuber of things the mynd that is in man doeth comprehend. Lo why Job matcheth the word life with the woord Grace: meening therby that the brute beasts are not partakers of the life that is in men, but that there is in men a dignitie farre greater and of much more value. And successyuely hee declareth that God is the continuuer thereof. Thy visitation (sayeth he) [or thy looking too it] bath preserued my soule. For when God hath set vs in good state: yet can we not co inue vnlesse he haue his hand alwayes reached out ouer vs. VVhat is too bee doone then, that we may continue in the state wherein we be once stablished? God must be fayne to breathe his power into vs without ceasing, and be continually at hand with vs. Thus ye see why Job vteth this woord visitation [or looking to]: as if he shold say, Lord, were it not that thou lookest vpon mee with a fatherly eye: it is certaine that I shold bee vndoone every minute of an houre. But thou lookest to mee continually, thou knowest my needes, and thou proudest for them. Lo how I am preserued and maynteyned. And in the end he addeth: Although these things be hidden in thee, and thou keepest them in thyne owne mynd: yet knowe I wel that it is so with thee. As if Job shoud say, Lord I knowe these things are so hygh, as I cannot reache them at all: but yet notwithstanding, needs must I haue some ayme of them: I knowe it is so with thee: that is to say, I haue not so perfect a knowledge as were requisite: but yet neuerthelesse, I knowe it is so. I haue some taste of it on my part: which susfazeth to make me conclude, that thou hast layd foorth the so greate treasures of thy wisdome, goodnessse, and power in mee: as it is impossible for mee to value and esteeme them as they deserue. But now I see how thou handlest mee. For I am unhappy, thou haste shet mee here in prizon, and I shall neuer be able to get out. And whyso? I looke vpon the trouble wherein thou hast set mee: and bycause I see no: the end of it, behold I am so abashed, that although I were rightuouse, yet durst I not looke vp to excuze myself before thee. I am vterly barred of all [plea]: like as when a iudge will not admit any allegations, but barreteth the partie of his plea, then must the partie needs be condemned, notwithstanding all his replicationes. Euen so is it with mee, sayeth Job. For I see that although I perceyue not my self to be faultie: yet notwithstanding thou haste punished mee grecuously as now. But this is spoken in respect of the excellent hartgreef whereof wee haue treated: and yet neuerthelesse he acknowledgeth therewithall, that if he shold come to the sayd rightfulness of God which is incomprehensible vnto vs: there hee would not think it straunge to bee handled so. True it is that he could not conceyue that thing in his owne naturall vnderstanding: and yet neuerthelesse whe he shall haue considered all things well: hee must needs resist the sayd temptation. Ye see then in effect what is touched here. And now wee haue to consider and beare in mynde, what Job declareth here concerning the creation of men, and concerning Gods grace whereby they be mainteyned in their state. Then mark it for a speciall point when he sayeth, That God hath created vs as of clay, and that we must bee brought to dust again, when he shall haue withdrawen his grace which he had spred out vpon vs, and this must teach vs lowelinessse. For we see how me set much by themselues, and every one of vs could find in his hart to be aduaunced aboue the clouds. VVhyso? he that knowes him self wel, setteth little by himself. But men through desyre to purchase estimation, do shet their eyes, and forget themselues, and passe not to cōsider what they be, nor what their state is. It is a woondershull that wee should loue so well to beguyle ourselues: and yet we do so neuerthelesse. So much the more must we mark this lesson, which bringeth vs backe to that point which we' 60 would not come at by our good will: that is to wit, too knowing that God tooke vs out of myre and dirt. Behold what we be. Let men go vaurt themselues, and say they haue some woorthiness and vertue in them: yet must they be fayne in the end to knowe that it is but dirt and myre. And will not this serue too make vs stoupe? we must returne to the same state againe. Not that God will leauue vs there, for wee hope for the resurrection: but I speake as now of that which is in our owne nature. I say that all that euer is woorthie to bee made account of in our bodie, is but as a building of mud. If we haue any liueliness in vs as now: soothly, it is but as the greenesse of grasse, as the prophet Esay sayeth.

Ezai. 40.b. 6.7.

VVee florish awhyle: but our florishing fadeth out of hand. So then, if we looke but to the order of nature: deare dispatcheth all that euer is of any woorthiness in men, in so much that all returneth intoo myre, and dirt, and earth. Sith the case standeth so: let vs lerne to record this lesson oftentymes, that we may shrink in our hornes, and not be puffed vp with vayne ouerweening as most men are, but take our selues too be behoden vnto God for all that we haue, and hold it of him, and doo him homage for it, without lifting of ourselues vp against him. For we should bewray too villanouse an vnthankfulness in vs, if we should take vpon vs the honour that belongs to God, or vsurp the thing wherein wee haue no part at all. So then let vs be fully resolued of this: namely to know from whence wee came, and whither we must returne. The thing is meete common of it self: howbeit forasmuch as we practise it so slyghtly: therefore the holy scripture speaketh often of it. Furthermore on our part also, let vs lerne to consider Gods infinite goodness towards vs, better than wee haue doone, because wee bee so defyled. For if wee looke vpon the metall whereof men are made, and vpon the shape that is giuen them, and compare the one with the other: the same will give the greater glosse too that which God hath put in them. If God had made vs of the substance of the Sunne, or of the Sturres: or if he had made some heauenly substance to take men out of: truly we myght haue cause to say that our beginning was honorable, and thereby the grace of God should also bee somewhat disgraced: but when men bethink them of dirt and myre, who will regard that?

Behold a thing that importeth reproche: men will scarce vouchsa'e too cast their eye vpon myre. If we haue any dirt hanging about vs, yea euen vpon the hem of our garment, we be defiled: if wee haue it on our hands, we cannot abyde that: but if wee haue it on our face, that mislike vs woorst of all. And yet what are we? we are all wholly of clay. VVe haue not so much as one rag of our garment, or heele of our hose, or peice of our shooesoles, but it is clay: wee are nothing else but dirt and myre bothe within and without. And yet notwithstanding, when we come to the considering of the wonderfull woorkmanship whch God hath put intoo vs (as I haue sayd alredye) therein we haue occasion to acknowledge Gods goodnessse, power, and wisdome so much the better and clearerly. Ye see then that when men behold from whence they came, they ought to cast downe their heads, and vtterly to abace themselues. And again considering who they be, and to what state and degree of honour God hath aduaunced them: they ought to be rauished vnto woondring, and to magnifying of God, acknowledging themselues so much the more bound too him, for that he hauing taken them out of so base and despized a kind of matter, hath notwithstanding put intoo them his so preciose, hygh, and noble grace, that of force (euen spye of their teethe) they must needs confesse. Behold here how God vttereth himself to the full. And so, as oft as we think vpon our selues, let these two things come to our remembrance: namely the matter whereof wee be made, that the same may rid vs of all prude and bereuee vs of all loftinessse: and also the woorkmanship that God hath put into vs, to the end wee may the better knowe, how much wee be behoden and indeted to him: and let euery of vs crye, Alas Lord, we be not able to comprehend the hundredth part of the benefits which thou bestowest vpon vs.

I thus ye see what we haue to remember for the first place And herevpon it behoueth vs also to consider what Job addeth here, when he sayth: Thou hast poured me out like milk, thou hast fashioned me like a chefe in setting me together, and thou hast clothed me with skin and bones. Truly his phrasse of speeche seemeth somewhat straunge at the first blush. And howso? Had the holi Ghost no fitter things to say? had he no better kynd of speeche to expresse what the begetting of men is? These are things that seeme not answerable nor agreeable too the maiestie of God. But it is not for nought that Job speaketh so. For (as I haue sayd heretofore) men must be alased be they neuer so loth, or else they would always be so puffed vp with prude, as they could neuer come too this consideration (which notwithstanding is needfull) too think, what is it that God hath put intoo vs? and what would become of vs if he shoud withdrawe his grace, and quyte separate him self from vs? Men will neuer come so farre, but by force. And therefore it behoueth vs to be brought to this myre and dirt, that are spoken of here. True it is that they which are subtle, (that is to say, which weene themselues to be wise in their owne brayne) will take exceptions heere, that this maner of speeche (too their seeming) is not such as they would haue wissht it. For if yee ask the philosophers: they will speake after another fashion. But God knewe what could edifie vs best. For the matter standeth not vpon disputing of subtle schoolepoyncts, nor vpon making of vs philosophers: but vpon lerning how much we be bound vnto God, and vpon the exercysing of our selues in the twoo points that I haue touched: which aie, that on the one side we shoud be ashamed of our selues, and of all that is our owne, and be abashed by beholding what our owne nature is: And that on the other side wee should be rauished with the knowledge of Gods goodnessse and grace, in making vs such as wee bee, and of so godly and excelleit a woorkmanship.

This (I say) is the thing whervnto it behoueth vs to apply our indeuer: and not to be curieus in inquiring by peecemale for the causes reasons and meanes that are in the begetting of men. For why? can our wit attayne to them? Verely when the philosophers disputed of these things they sayd that Gods working in the begetting of men must needs be extraordinarie. For there is no apparent reason how he shoud take so perfect and excellent a work as mannes bodie is, out of a thing that is so base of it self. And although the philosophers say well, that if a man will haue any thing in nature, it must begin of corruptiō: yet notwithstanding ye see it is a fayre beginning, & that is cleane contrarie to mannes reason. It is true. But it was Gods will to shewe them, that euen the wisedome of them shall be graueled, when they come to the beholding of his works. Neuerthelesse God graunteth to the philosophers in the meane whyle, too vew and consider many things, which shal not be vnderstood of the comon peop'e & the vnlerned sort: but Gods meening here, is not to call vs to such a schole. VVhat therē he metto shewe the thing that is auay-auayable for our saluation : which is, that we should first knowe what we our selues are, and of what metall we be made : and secondly, that in respect of the woorkmanship that is in vs, we should behold the shape that God hath giuen vs to gloriſe him withall, to the end that none of vs, nother greate nor ſmall, lerned nor ignorant and ſimple, ſhould haue any excuse at all. For if God had treated of things ouercunningly: the greate clerks would haue ſurmyzed that they had atteyned too ſuch knowledge by their owne ſtudie, or by reaſon of their greate discretion aboue other men. But God ſetteth downe things here in ſuch a ſenſe, as there needeth no deſcating vpon them afterward, nor any ſuch greate ſpecula‐tion, as the vnlearned myght ſay, I neuer went to ſchoole. There needeth no greate leſning nor ſkill too under‐ſtand what is ſayd heere. Yee ſee then that the greate clerks ſhall be the more blame woorthie, if they perceyue not the things which the ignorantefte perſoneſ ought to knowe. And they alſo which haue not gone to ſchoole, ſhall haue no excuse too cloke themſelues withall, by‐cause the things that God ſetteth downe here ought to be knowne to vs all. Thus ye ſee how wee ought too inure ourelfes to the ſpeeche which the holiſte Ghoste uſeth here by the mounte of Job, when he ſayeth, that God bath clothed man with ſkin and flesh, and kutt him too‐gither with bones and ſinewes. For it ſerueth to expreſſe better, what hath ben ſayd afore: that is to wi, what diſ‐ference there is betweene the ſeede of man, and that which we ſee in mannes bodie. Ye ſee the ſeede is but filth and corruption: and ye ſee the flesh is liuely: ye ſee there is 30 ſkin, there are ſinewes, there are bones. Let vs con‐ſider a little what maner of woorkmanship there is in mannes ſkinnes. The very heathen were forced to ſay, that ſuch as knew not that there is a ſoueraine Godhead, myght be conuictid thereof even by one o.nely nayle of a man without going any further. Ye ſee our nayles are as it were ſuperfluouse in our bodies: and yet notwithstanding, if we looke well vpon our nayles, we ſhall ſee a wonderfull woorkmanship in them. For they ſerue to arme the fingers, that they may be put to woork, and 40 hold what ſoeuer is neceſſarie by bowing of the fingers. Therefore it is certaine that a mannes nayle which is but a ſuperfluitie, is a looki gglaffe of Gods prouidence to vs, ſo as in the ſame we may perceyue, that he hath wrought in ſuch wyſe in vs, as it is vniſpoſſible for vs to knowe the hundredth part of the woorkmanship that he hath put in vs. Ye ſee then what is vttered here: namely that there is greate oddes betweene the ſeede whereof men are begotten, and the things that are to be ſeen in mannes bodie. But yet the cheeſe thing is the Soule. And that is the cauſe why he ſayeth, Thou baſte clothed mee. For hereby Job meeneth, that the cheeſe part of men conſiſteſt not in the ſhape that is ſeen with our eye, but in that which dwelleth within it. For what im‐porteth this maner of ſpeeche, and what is ment by ſaying, Thou baſte clothed mee? It muſt needs be ſome queſt that is lodged in our bodie. And who is thi gweſt? It is the Soule. VVe ſee then that the cheeſe part of men is the Soule which God hath put into them. There is ſo excellent woorkmanship in the bodie: as we muſt needs be aſtonyed at it: and what is to be thought then of that which ſurmounteth it, and is farre hygher, and of much greater woorthineſſe? Behold the degrees which wee haue to remember. So then although this maner of ſpeeche (as whereby God ment too teache the veryeſt idiots) be rude and groſſe: yet notwithstanding we ſee things ſtill in them which are able to moue vs throughly to ſet our whole mynd vpon diem, though we were the ſharpeſt witted and fineſtheadeſ in the world. But yet Job expreſſeth further what the excellencie and woorthineſſe of the Soule is, when he ſayeth, Thou baſte giuen me life and grace, and thy viſitation bath preſerued my Soule. VVhen he ſayeth, thou baſte giuen me life: he ſheweth that the bodie were nothing (no though it haue ſo goodly and woorderfull woorkmanship in it) if it had not the liuelineſſe that is ſhed into it. For ſomuch then as God hath quickened vs: therein he hath vttered his greate goodneſſe, and we ought to gloriſe him the more therin, and to acknowledge ourelves bound vnto him beyōd all meaſure. True it is that wee haue muſch more in vs than common lyfe: and if there were no more but that ſame mouing: it were muſch of iſelf. Let vs beholde the brute beaſts. It is a great matter to ſay, beholde a beaſt ſhall come of ſeede, that is too ſay of corruption: and althoſh it haue not that which is in man, (I meene even as touching the bodie) yet hath God put this mouingneſſe into it. VVe ſee that in the nouriſhment of beaſts, when they haue eaten graffe, the ſame turneth into blud, into milk, and into fleſh, and afterward when the beaſts be killed, they feede vs lykewyſe. VVhen wee beholde all theſe things, even that verye Beastlyfe (as a man may term it) beate witneſſe of Gods moſt exel‐lent power and wiſdom. But there is muſch more in men than life. And that is the cauſe why Job ſayeth expreſſly, that God had giuen him life and grace. For hereby he doeth vs to wit, that the lyfe of men is matched with underſtanding and reaſon. And therefore it Iob.1.4.4. is ſayd in the firſt chapter of Sainct John, That lyfe was the light of men. VVhen John declareth that all things are quickened by the woord of God, and that the ſayd eternall wiſdom which is in God is the wellſpring of life and power: he ſheweth that men haue not only life, ſo as they can eate and diink: but (ſayeth he) there is alſo a light ſhyning in them. By this woord lyght, he meeneth that the image of God is imprinted in vs, be‐cause we haue underſtanding and reaſon, be‐cause wee diſcerne betweene good and euill, and be‐cause men are borne too haue ſome order and common ſocietie among themſelues, ſo as euerie manne hath a conſcience of his owne to tell him what is euill and what is good.

Ye ſee then how God hath graunted men a preroga‐tive which is, not only that he hath giuen them life: but also inlyghtened their mynds, in ſuch wiſe as they iudge and diſcerne, yea and take hold of eternall life. Then if we conſider well what is in men: it is certaine that wee ſhall woondre. But there is nothing whereat wee ſhall bee more aſtonied, than at the reaſon which God hath put into vs. For yee ſee that if a man heere of things that he neuer ſaw, he conceyuth them in his mynd. VVhen men looke aforēad vnto things that are too come, and compare them with things past, they com‐mit all of it vnto memorie. And againe when any thing is red or reported too them, they alſo iudge of it.

Thus ſee you how God hath indewed men with a grace that cannot bee valewed ſufficiently. And therefore let vs lerne to conſider well what God hath giuen vs, and wee ſhall haue cauſe enough to gloriſe him, yea and we ſhall not neede to paſſe out of our ſelues for it. And heere alſo ye ſee why Sainct Paule in that goodly Sermon which he made in the citie of Athens, ſayeth that men neede not too go farre too lerne too knowe God. For (ſayeth he) it is in him that wee haue our being, life, and mouing. And if we bee blinde, let vs but fall too groping, and grope with our hands as a poore blind man doeth in the dark. For although he ſee nothing at all: yet he gropeth abouthim, and thereafter

M.iiij. taketh

taketh his way. Therefore if we be blinde (sayeth Sainct Paule) yet may we grope out Gods works, inasmuchas he hath giuen vs wit and reason: so that we bee vtterly vnuexcusible if we make not this grace auayable, whereof mention is made here. And in conclusion wee must also mark well how Iob sayeth heere, It is thy visitation o Lord, that hath preserued my Soule. Hitherto he hath spoken of that which wee may see in our creation or begetting. VVhen any of vs is begotten: then doeth the myre shewe it self: that is too say, wee be full of infestation and filthinesse. And therewithall appeereth also the sayd woorkmanship which God hath put intoo it, bothe in respect of bodie and soule. But what for that? If God preserued vs not, wee should needs perish every minute of an houre, as it is sayd in the Psalme: Lord, when thou sendest forth thy Spirit all things are renewed: and when thou withdrawest it, all things go too wrecke and decay. God then must bee fayne too maynteyne vs, too looke vnto vs, and to bee alwayes at hand with vs: or otherwyse wee bee vtterly vndoone.

Behold heere a poynt that is well woorth the weying: namely this visitation of Gods in looking too our Soules. And the Soules are spoken of precysely by name. VVhyso? If he had sayd, Lord thy visitation preserueth my bodie: my bodie shall not go to the graue at the first brunt, and whysso? euen bycause thou maynteynest it by thy power: if there had ben no more but that sayd, it had ben much: but it is farre more without comparision when Iob speaketh of the Soule. And why? For it seemeth vnto vs, that our Soule hath of it self the power to quicken our bodie, and to give it liueliness. And this is partly true. But it behoueth vs to vnderstand moreover, that our Soules are not immortall of their owne power, nother is the lyfe of them inclosed in themselues as though it had his roote there. VVhere is their lyfe the? In God. So farre foorth then as God, putteth any droppe or spark of life into mēnes Soules: so farre foorth haue they liueliness in them, and not otherwise. Thus ye see what wee haue too mark vpon this streyne. And specially let vs hearken what the holy ghost ment too expresse by this woord visitation: which is, that God mainteyneth vs continually, & looketh to vs to preferue vs, or else we should go to wrecke. The philosophers can well say, that God hath created and fashyoned vs, & that we haue our being of him: but therewithall they are of opinion that after God hath set vs in our race, evry man goudeth & gouerneth himself. Lo how they deface the goodness & power of God: and vnto the same leudnesse are all men inclined. So much the more then standeth it vs in hand, to mark well this woord visitation: which importeth as much to say, as when God hath put vs intoo this world, he letteth vs not alone there, as if hee should say, walke ye evry one as ye can: but hee abydeth with vs continually, and hath his hand alwayes stretched out to breathe his power into vs, to the intent we shold not misarie. Therefore seing we cannot continue, except he haue his eye alwayes vpon vs to visit vs and looke to vs: we must lerne to rule our lyfe in such wyse, as if wee were euermore in his presence. And forasmuchas the same assureth vs of Gods infinite goodness which he sheweth towards vs: let it make vs too walk in the feare of him, to magnifie him, and to yeeld him his due prayse.

And nowe lette vs caste our selues downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults: praying him to make vs perceue them better, that we may bee sorie for them, and bee so greeued, as we alwayes seeke the remedie of them, which is, his reforming of them by his holie spirit, that like as he hath created vs mortall men, so he will make vs members of our Lord Iesus Christ, that we may bee repayed after his image, and that he looke not at that which he hath put intoo vs by nature, but at that which hee hath put intoo vs by grace, which surmounteth all, specially seing he hath vouchsaued too make vs new creatures to inherit his heauenly kingdome. And [ further let vs beseeche him ] not only to continue the good that he hath begonne in vs, but also too increase the same till it bee come to full perfection, and in the meane tyme beare with our infirmities, that although wee bee giltie before him, yet he will not condemne vs with rigour, but receyue vs as his children, accordingly as he hath vouchsaued too adopt vs in the name and by the meane of our Lord Iesus Christ. That it may please him too graunt this grace, not only too vs, but also too all nations of the earth, &c.

The xl. Sermon, which is the third vpon the tenth Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the xiiiij. and xv. verses, and then vpon that which followeth.

16. Let it increase, come thou as a Lyon and shew vnto thy selfe maruelous vpon mee.
17. Thou renewest thy plagues against mee, thy vvrath increaseth about mee: the syvoorde of chaunge and the multitude are vpon mee.

Esterday we saw how God preserueth vs in the state wherin he hath set vs: and that it is not ynoch enough for him to haue created vs at the firste, nor too haue giuen vs liueliness: but that he must be fayne to continue it also. Now if this be to be acknowledged in respect of this present lyfe: mucche more reason is it that God should be prayzed for renewing vs by his infinite goodness, for repaying his image in vs, and for leading vs as it were by the hande, vntill suche tyme as wee haue finished our course. For it behoueth him too woorke with a greater power in that behalfe, than in the order of nature. Therefore let vs lerne to magnifie Gods gracious giftes in such wise as wee perceyue them to bee. And further let vs marke well, that if Iob hauing felte that God had bestowed so many benefites vpon him, ceassed not to be so greeued, as he was fayne to bewray his excessiue passions: the same may mucche more befall vs, when wee shall not haue minded Gods goodness as becommeth vs, and the gracious giftes which he dealeth out too vs dayly. For (as I haue declared heretofore,) the true remedie too aswage all our miseries, is too feele how bountifull God is vnto vs, and what riches of his goodness he poureth out vpon vs. If wee knowe this throughly, it is ynoch too remedie remedie all temptations, in suche sort as we may be able to take courage to call vpon him, euen when we shall be as it were in hell. And well did Job knowe these thyngs, howbeit that this affliction was so great and terrible, as it ouermastered him. Therfore let vs bethinke our selues well, and let vs marke that God will punish vs for oure vnthankfulness, if we make not account of the benefits which he dayly bestoweth vpon vs. And there shal neede no great tribulation to ouerthrowe vs : but we shall be dispatched out of hand as soone as we feele any little aduersitie. And for prooef heereof, let vs come too that which Job addeth. If I haue sinned (saith he) thou wilt imprison me, and thou wilt not let me go unpunished. As if hee should say, Lorde, thou holdest me as it were vpon the rache. For he matcheth imprisonment against soone sondaine punishment, which God mighte lay vpon him, and which should be easier for him to abide: at leastwise too his owne seeming. VVe knowe that the present harmes are greeuousest to beare. He that indureth bitter colde, could find in his hart to be broyled with heate : and if he be hote, he desircth extreme cold. So then, Job beeing pressed with such violence by the hand of God, as there seemed not to be any hope of recoverie: wold fayne that God shoulde haue killed him out of hand, and that he might not haue pyned any longer : like as when a wretched offender is condemned and seeth he cannot escape, and yet is let alone vnexected : his miseries are encreased in that he feareth to be put to torture, and that hee shall be charged with new matters from day to day. Job being in such case, complayneth that God persecuteth him, and saith he oughte too take him out of the worlde without any more ado. Heereby we are admonished, that if God moderate not his roddes whien he mindeth to chastize our faults, or to exercise our pacience: we are so dismaide, that in sted of profiting vnder his correction we shall do nothing else but storne, and there shal be nothing but turmoylng and rebelliousnesse in vs. Job was patient, and yet for all that, he fayled not to make a great broyle, as though he had bin minded to stade at defyance with God: And his infirmite had driuen him therento, if God had not preserued him by the grace of his holy spirite. Sith the case standeth so: let vs marke well, that it standeth vs in hand to pray vnto God, that whensoeuer he shall be minded to chastize vs, or to trie our pacience, it may please him to vse suche mildnesse towards vs, as we may learne chiefly to know his hand, and to profite our selues thereby, and not to be caried away by our ouerheady affections: and further, that although God suffer vs to be tossed too and fro, and our owne flesh to carrie vs away: yet neuerthelesse it may please him to succoure vs, and that we may haue wherewith to fence our selues, that we giue not head to our affections. And in the meane while, let vs not be out of hart when we feele turmoylng in our selues, though it seeme to vs that we be skirmishing against God, and that it is vnpossible for vs to returne vnto him to yelde oure selues vnder his obeysance. VVe see heere what happened vnto Job: and therefore let vs call vpon him that is able to set vs vp agayne, when we be vterlie ouerthrowne. And thus ye see what we haue to marke in this streine. But now let vs come to the wells head. If I be wicked (saith Job) who is me. If I be righteous, yet may I not lift vp my head, seeing my trouble and being filled with reproch. Job goeth on foorth with the matter which I haue expounded already heretofore. For he considereth, that if he be wicked, the lawe of God shal condemne him: and that if he be righteous, there is yet another righteousness aboue that, whereby he shal not misse to be condemned. That is a thing which is not so well knowne as this: and no maruell. For al- though God haue told vs in his law, that we are al damned, and the thing is manifest of it selfe: yet shall wee hardly find one of a hundred, whiche commeth to that point. And why so? For hipoocrisie hindreth vs, and blind-foldeth our eyes, yea and vterlie blindeth vs, so as wee cannot knowe that whiche ought to be best knowne and most familiar vnto vs. Behold, Sainte Paule confesseth that although he had bin trayned vp from his childhood in the lawe of God, andone of the order and companie of the doctors in great reputation. Yet notwithstanding he vnderstoode not what was the meening of gods law, but flattred him selfe, so as he was puffed vp with pride, supposing him selfe to be righteous. I liued (saith he) that is to say, he thought him selfe righteous before God, and had an ouerliking of his owne merites. And why so? Bycause he had not the power to enter into his owne hart, and to say that God hath giuen vs the lawe for e- very man to view him selfe in, that all men might know how there is nothing in them but vnrighteousnesse, and be ashamed thereof. Saint Paule was not come so farre forward. If a man that had bin trained vp in Gods lawe, and therewithall liued a blamelesse life, was neuerthe- later dazeled with pride: what shall come of vs? VVhat shall become of such as haue no care at all to thinke vpon God nor vpon his word, but are sapid in their vi- cies & leade a lawlesse life: or what shall become of those that vaunt them selues and yet haue no cause at all? Ac- cording as at this day we see these monks, and these hy- pocrites, and all these chaplaynes of the papacie: and as we see the whole rable of these superstitious cloysterers which haue their gay deuotions: and yet in the meane whyle, some of them shall be whorehunters, some drun- kards, some full of crueltie, and othersome full of trea- son and enuie. So then they ceasse not to recken them- selves for righteous, and they haue merits to sell and to depart with vnto other folkes. Therefore we must not thinke this straunge, seeing that Saint Paule was so abu- sed in that behalfe. And hereby ye may see, that there is so grosse hypocrisie in men, as it is a wonder how God should be so patient, as to beare with them so long as he doth. But if this condemnation which God setteth out vnto vs in his lawe, be vnkowne vnto vs: how should we attayne to the coēciuing of the iustice which is higher and traunger than that: when it is said vnto vs, Thou shalt loue God with all thy hart, with all thy mind, and with all thy strength, and thy neighbour as thy selfe: there is no man but he confesseth it to be good reason, that we shoulde keepe this rule. For very nature teacheth vs, that we be created to the end we should mainteine the common societie that he hath ordeyned among ma- kynd. These then are things that ought to be commonly knowne euen vnto little children. But let vs come to the comparing of our life with that whiche God com- maundeth in his lawe, and we shall find that every one of vs is guiltie for his owne part. And we come so farre short of performing all that God appoynteth vs: as wee be not able to performe any one point, no not euen so much as to thinke to do good. For (saith Saint Paule) we are not able to thinke a good thought: and we find it ouermuch by experiance. VVhen we haue made this co- parison, yet do we continue dull stille. VVhich of vs fee- leth himselfe wounded with so deadly a wound, as too saye, Alas I must be faine to come before my God, hee must be my iudge, and I haue nothing to alidge, but I must be driuen to confesse that I am more than conuic- ted. VVho is he that thinketh thus: No man. Although men haue not done any deede that is to be condemned 2.Cor.3.b.5. M.v. . or to or to be blamed: yet notwithstanding, they cease not to be giltie inasmuch as it is saide vnto vs, Thou shalte not lust. God hath not only forbidden vs to be murtherers, theeues, whoremongers, blasphemers, and rebels against his word: but he hath also forbidden vs to consent to any euill. VVhosoeuer shall but cast aside an vnchaste looke: the same is a lechor before god. VVhosoeuer shal haue slaundered his brother, or rayled vpon him, or priuily hated him. behold, he is a murtherer. VVhosoeuer wisheth other mens goodes, although he never go about to take them: yet is he a theefe already. And God hathe not only forbidden the desire to do amisse: but he passeth yet further. For he hath forbidden lust, that is to say, if we be but tickled and stirred vp to any euill desire or liking, foorthwith we be transgressors of Gods lawe. But finally do men consider this as I haue said heretofore. Seing we bee so blockish as to haue no regard of oure selues, and that the lawe is so cleere and large a looking gasse for vs to behold our selues in: I pray you who is he that can boast him selfe to be righteous, and that he is able to perfourme all that is in the lawe, and all that God commaundeth? Therefore we must not thinke it strange if me cannot clere themselues of that which is contayned there. And furthermore, that we may take profit of this doctrine, it behoueth vs to call to remembrance what we haue declared afore: namely that Gods lawe is a sufficient perfect rule whereby to liue a good and holly life, that is to wit, in respect of vs. Let vs marke then that the righteousnesse which is contayned in the lawe, may well bee termed a perfect righteousnesse: yea in respect of men, that is to say, according to their capacite and measure. But this righteousnesse is not answerable to the righteousnesse of God, nor equall with it, it commeth farre short of it. As how? This will bee better knownen by the Angells. Ye see the Angells haue no lawe written, and yet they frame them selues to the obeyng of God. And heere ye see also why we say in our prayer, Thy wil be done in earth as it is in heauen. For there is no gaynsaying, God is obeyed fully, and he reigneth in Heauen. Then do wee desire to be conformable to the Angels, and that ought to be ynough for vs: for then shal we haue such a perfection as ought to be in creatures. Yea but is that as much to say, as the Angels haue a righteousnesse that may fully match and be compared with the righteousnesse of God? There is as great oddes betwixt them, as there is distance betweene heauen and earth. Although the righteousnesse of the Angels be perfect in respect of creatures: yet is it nothing but smoke when it commeth beefore the infinite maiestie of God.

Thē let vs marke wel, that the lawe which was giue vs, is a full and certaine rule wherby to liue well. And when we can once do and performe that which is inioyned vs there: then shall we be taken and reckened for righteous before God in all perfection and goodnessse, but yet for all that we shall not be so righteous as to say, there is any worthinesse in vs, so as wee might deserue any thing at his hand. And why? It is of his owne free sauoure that he saith, he that doth these things shall liue in them. For God might exact what he listeth at oure hande, and yet notwithstanding we can never say that we be not in his dette. For wee bee his, and what soever we bring vnto him he will not accepte it excepte he list. Although wee take it to be as righteouse as any thing can bee, and that (to oure seeming) there bee no faulce in it. Yet will not God voutsafe to cast his eyevponit, except he list: that is to saye, excepte his owne meere grace and bountifulnesse do moue him to do it.

Leuit. 18. 4. 5.

Now then wee see, how there is a double righteousesse in God. The one is that whiche is set soorth to vs in the lawe, wherewithall God contenteth himselfe, because it pleaseth him so. And there is another secrete righteousnesse, which furnounteth the wit and capacite of all creatures. In this respect Job faith heere: If I be wicked, wo vnto me. VVhy so? For it is said, cursed be hee that performeth not all the things that are contayned in this booke. Cursed bee hee that worshippeth not God. Cursed be he that breaketh the Sabbath. Cursed be hee that honoreth not his father and mother. Cursed be hee that stealeth other mens goodes, or taketh them away by force. Cursed be hee that killeth or hurteth his neighbor: and all people must answer Amen. That is to say, all of vs must confesse, that we haue rightly deserved to be cursed and cast away at Gods hand. For albeit that the lawe (perchance) were not written in Iobs time, (as we knowe nothing thereof.) yet was this record ingraven in mens harts. Then do ye see wherefore hee saith, that he is unhappy if he be found wicked, that is to saye, if hee shall haue withstoode Gods will, and led a loose life. And secondly he addeth, Although I were righteous, yet will I not lift vp my head. VVhy so? Bycause (saith he) I see mine affliction, and am filled with shame. VVherby he meeneth, that Gods increasing of his afflictions, is as much to say, as he hath soueraine authoritie ouer all men: and that although they be righteous, yet may he execute such rigoure vpon them, as may be thought straunge: and yet that howsoeuer the case standeth, men shall gaine nothing by checking against him: they may well pleade and alledge this or that, but yet must they be fayne to be confounded, and God must haue the maistrie of them. For this cause Job saith, that he wil not lift vp his head though he be found to be righteous. But by the waye a manne might aske a question heere, how Job meeneth that hee should be found righteous. For that is impossible. Hee skarce knew himselfe if he meant to chalendge such a perfection as were the true fulfilling of Gods lawe. And why? As I haue said heretofore, so long as men continue in their owne nature, they are so farre wide from discharging their duetie to Godward, or of anye parte thereof: that there is nothing else to be found in them but rebelliousnesse: according as Saint Paule saith, that Rom. 8. 8. all the affections of our fleshe are enimies vnto God. Shall we then follow our owne nature? Then go wee cleane aukē to Gods will, and we haue n̄t so muche as one thought but the same is wicked and damnable. And so vntill God reach vs his hand, we shall never come vnto him. But bath he begonne to giue vs that grace? Yea partlye: and verely so farforth do we laboure towards hym, as he draweth vs vnto hym, and as hee guideth vs: and yet for all that, we come not to him so fast as were requisite. For we may haue some good inclination: but the same shall be but weake: we shall limpe and make many false steppes: we shal stumble, and oftentimes start aside out of the right path. Ye see then in what plighe men be.

But let vs come too the highest degree of this righteousnesse. Let vs take Abraham, or the other holy fathers that haue walked in suche perfection, as if they had bin Angels. Is it too bee sayde that these men haue fulfilled the law? No. There is none of them all but hee shall fynde him selfe blameworthie when hys lyfe is examined before God.

And how is it then that Job saythe heere, that if hee bee righteous, yet wyll hee not lift vp his head? True it is that God accepteth them for righteous whiche are not righteous: that is to saye, when hee hath gyuen vs the

the grace to walke according to his will: although there be faults in vs: what then hee passeth not for that, nother will he be rigorous towards vs. Though we haue not performed our duetie in al poynts to the full, hee shaketh vs not off, but beareth with our weaknesse, allowing and accepting that thing for good in vs which is not good. Ye see then how God dealeth with his faithful ones. But in this place Job hath spoken of an impossibilitie, as if he should saye: True it is, that I am not so righteous as that I maye come before God to saye, let vs fall to account, and let my life be well tried, and it will be found that I haue not offended awch, but haue fully discharged my selfe from one side to other: this were impossible: But although I had fulfilled the lawe, yet durst I not lift vp my head. And wherefore? I see beere mine affliction, I am filled with reproch, as if he should saye, God holdeth me in such awe, as I wote not what to do, and if I replie, I shall gayne nothing by it. Herein Job bewrayeth his p. s. ion. For he should haue confessed: well, God is righteous, and not only his lawe will serue too bridle me, but also I know there is another higher righteousness, than that which is knowne to vs by his will and by the record of good and euill which he giueth vs to rule our life by. I knowe then that God hath another higher righteousness than this, and therefore it behoueth me to submit my selfe vnder him. Job oughte too haue spoken so: but he bewrayeth, that it is as it were by constraint, that hee acknowledgeth a higher righteousness in God, than the righteousness of the law. For he saith, I see mine affliction, I am filled with reproches, and therefore I will not speake a woord. If this befall to such a person as he was, what shall become of vs? Then let vs inure our selues to consider well Gods true and peculiар righteousness which is incomprehensible to vs, and let vs honoure him in all his secrets, and let vs not conceiue the things that are in him, after our owne witte: for we see our owne smalnesse. And to be short, what must we do? Truly, for the condemning of our selues, wee neede not to climbe so high as to say, God hath a righteousness whiche cannot bee comprehended by creatures, and wherevnto mans witte cannot reach. VVee haue not too do with this for the condemning of oure selues: for the lawe will be ynochful for that matter, as hath bin shewed already. As often then as a man shall be so proude as to thinke he can maaintaine himselfe before God by his owne works, let him bethinke him selfe well, and looke vpon Gods lawe. For it is not for vs too say, we be righteous bycause we seeme so to our selues, or bycause men find vs to be so and allow of our doings. No, but the triall must bee made by the lawe of God. VVhen all the world shall haue canonized vs for saints, it shall nothing boote vs if the heauenly iudge condemne vs. For God will not haue vs to go any whither else than to his lawe: he will not bow norther one way nor other. And therefore as oft as we bee tempted, eyther with pride, or with hypocrisie: let vs bethinke vs what the lawe saith to vs, and we shall find so great and so horrible shamesulnesse in our selues, as there shall remayne nothing for vs but euerlasting death.

Thus ye see how wee ought to practize this lesson. VVeto vnto vs if we be wicked: For then shall wee not neede to come to the second poynte, That if we be righteous, yet dare we not lifte vp our head. And why? For where is he to be found, that is righteous? Furthermore let vs marke well, that when we be righteous, that is to say, when we be not vtterly wicked and out of al square: all the righteousness that is in vs, shall be but a franke and free acceptation. As how? True it is that the faith-full are called righteous, not only bycause God forgiveth them their sinnes, and receyveth them to mercie: but also bycause he liketh well of their life. It is said that Simeon was a good and righteous man: and Zacharie and Elizabeth his wife were righteous also. And why? Bycause they walked in Gods lawe and commaundementes. The same is said also of the holy patriarchs. Yea but let vs marke, that it was bycause God of his owne free goodness receyued them, and layed not theyr sinnes too theyr charge. VVhen wee saye that men are made ryghteous by fayth: it is as much too saye, as God forgiveth theyr sinnes, and cleerely acquiteth them for our Lorde Iesus Christes sake.

Luke.1.1.6.
Gen.6.b.9.
G.2.d.25.
Likewise it behoueth vs to understand that wee are righteous in oure woorkes, bycause God accepteth vs too fauoure. For oure woorkes deserue too bee alwayes refuzed at hys hande. I speake not of the works whiche men do of their owne power: for in them there is nothing but all vilanie and rebellion. But euen when a man is gouerned by Gods spirite, and by hys grace doth walke in good woorkes; yet are all hys good works vnperfecte, and God myght call them off: yea and they are so farre off from any worthynesse or deserving (as the Papistes imagin:) as there is nothing but fylthyneisse in them. Neuerthelesse yet God receyued them. Yea euen as a father receiuesth that whiche commeth from his child, though it bee nothing woorthe. So then, although we be righteous, that is to say, although wee haue some lykelyhoode of righteousness: let vs marke well that the same deserueth not to be accepted so before God. And why? Bycause it is written, cursed be he Deut.7.26. that performeth not all the things which are conteyned in the booke of the lawe. Nowe, there is no man that performeth so much as any one thing, I meane that performeth it with a pure and perfect mind.

And therefore it foloweth that God maye damage vs all. And so, wee must be fayne to holde downe oure heades, yea euen without going any further than to the lawe: and yet is that nothing if we come to Gods righteousness whiche is incomprehensible to vs. Let vs put the case that a man behaved him selfe in all poynts as became hym: what might he do? might hee therefore pleade agaynst God? No: he must come short of that. And why? For God owteth vs nothing. That is Leui.18.2.3
true: but he hath promised that whosoeuer doth those things shall liue in them. Yea, but we must understande, that he hath made that promise of his owne free bountifullnesse. VVe see how our Lord Iesus Christ saith, that Luke.17.6.7 when a servant shall haue done all that he can for hys master, (he speaketh of the servants that were in those days, that is to witte, of slaves that were in bondage too be bought and sold:) then if a slave do all that he can for his master: shal his master rise from the table and say, I will nowe serue thee ariother whyle? No. For it is the servants duetie to serue his master, and no: that the master should abace him selfe to his servant, or bee bound vnto him in any thing. Euen so (saith Christ) whē ye haue done al that is commanded you, assure your selues ye are still vnprofitable servants. And in so saying, Iesus Christ meeneth not that there was cuer any man found, or that any can be found to haue performed all that God commandeth: but he putteth the case that it were so. So also must we do. Let vs put the case that a man had fulfilled the lawe yet behoueth it him to reuerence God with all humilitie, saying, Alas Lorde, I will still submit my selfe vnder thy hande. for I knowe well that all that I haue done is of thee, and that there cannot so muche as one droppe of goodness proceede out of me.

And although thou accept me : that is not bycause I am worthy, or bycause I haue deserued it:but it is of thyne owne free fauour. Lo how we ought to deale. Furthermore let vs be well ware of the excessiue passion that was in Job. It behoueth vs to conceiue the soueraine-righteousesse of God in such sort as I haue said. And that must be to the end we may be the more induced to humilitie:and not to say, If I be righteous , yet will I not lift vp my head,seeing mine affliction. For it is certayne that God will perfourme whatsoeuer he hath promised, 10 yea euen in that he hath said, he that doth these thynges shall liue in them. And certainly, if we be ab'e too perfourme the lawe to the full:let vs assure our selues, that God hath his reward redy to reward vs with. Then must we not say as Job doth,that seeing our reproch, and seeing he scourgeth vs:we be confounded by a power that wee knowe not off, and that although the same be faire out of measure, yet we dare not grudge against it, bycause we shall win nought by so doing. No : let vs not be caried away so farre, but let vs thinke that God neuer chaffizeth his servants without iust cause, yea though hee haue no eye to their sinnes, as it is certayne that Job was not punished as a wicked offender. True it is that God had iust cause to pun' sh him an hundred times more:but god had not that respect and meaning with him. VVhat then:his intent was to trie his pacience, and to c'are him of the slander that Sathan made of him in saying, Job obeyeth God bycause he is in prosperitie:and therefore God meant to shewe the contrarie. So then when wee speake of Gods soueraine justice, let not our talke be to thinke that he presseth vs out of measure, nor to auance our selues against him by force : but let it be to honoure him in his wonderfull secrets, yea euen in suche wise, as we may be suily resolute to say in our selues, Alas, it is not for vs to alledge, that though we be righteous, yet we will not be so bold as to lift vp our head: for wee haue good cause to hang downe our heads continually. For although God set not him selfe downe in his throne to condemne vs:we haue our iudge within vs. Cannot every man condemne him selfe ? hathe not every man the witte to perceiue him selfe to be more than blamable ? Let vs marke then that there needes none other cōdemnation for vs, than that which is conteined in the lawe, wherewith both great and small ought too be well acquainted. And after Job hath spoken so, he addeth, that he wold fayne that his plague were increased. Yea but what then: Although it increased (saith he) yet wilte thou come vpon me as a Lion, and wilst shew thy selfe maruellous against me. Heere as before Job treateth of Gods secrete iudgements, which man cannot reach vnto, by reason that the same do farre passe his vnderstanding and wit. And that is the caafe why he calleth God maruellous. True it is that we shal alwayes find Godslawe straunge , bycause it wakeneth vs vp beyond our imagination. And we our selues also see, that when the wisest men do speake of soundnesse and perfection,they come short of the rigour of Gods lawe. Also when God teacheth vs by his word, he doth it stil aboue our ordinarie capacitie. But when we haue once bin taught, to know how the matter goeth: we be fully convicted that it is so. If God haue laide the bridle loose in oure necke, so as we haue not bin at hys schoole to learne his will by his lawe : we be well neere as good as brute beasts in that behalfe. But whē we once know that a man must loue God with all his hart, with all his mind, and with al his strength, and his neighbour as him selfe:then we see that God requireth nothing at our hands, but that which we owe him. And why ? For we are his, and we haue not any thing, whiche we have not receiuued of him. Thus ye see how we shall find nothing straunge if we referre all to Gods word:but [contrariwise] that all Gods doings are according to reason and equitie. But when we come once to the righteousesse that is vñknowne,to say that although we had performed the whole lawe to the full,yet had we done nothing in respect of the righteousnesse of God:that is yet a farre straunger thing, in somuche that we knowe not what to say, but all our wittes faile vs, and are amazed at it. And that is it whiche Job meant in saying, thou wilt shew thy selfe maruellous against me. Now although God be maruelouse in his wonderfull iudgements,yet must the faithfull sort learne to thinke it nothing strāge. As how ? Let vs take example in Gods election, in hys prouidence, and in all the things that he doth aboue our vnderstanding. Behold a part of Gods secretes which are as a bottomlesse pit vnto vs ward. God choseth whome he listeth to bring to saluation, and forsaketh the residue. He findeth vs all alike, so as no man can vaunt him selfe to be better than his neighbour. And wherefore then are we so sholed asunder, as to say that God choseth the one sort to make them inheritors of his kingdome : and forsaketh the other sort to make them go to destruction: what is the cause heereof but only his will ? At the firste blush we thinke this very straunge,saying:How now ? is it any reason, that whereas we bee all of vs Gods creatures, and there is no difference betwixt vs as in respect of our selues, but one of vs is as lightly preferred as another:yet notwithstanding God hath pitie on whome he listeth, and forsaketh the residue ? Is there any reason in so doing:Lo how men shal be tempted to grudge against God. But good reason it is that this shoul'd be wonderfull to vs. For if it were not wonderful, we would alwaies haue our wittes intangled in many questions, and in the end we wold spew out blasphemies as we see these pruie repiners do, who are alwayes arguing and making phantasticall discourses, and could find in their hart too condemne God bycause he worketh not as they would haue him. Then if man speake to vs of Gods election, it must needes be a maruellous acte:and yet we must not be astonished at it. And why ? to the end it may prouoke vs to honoure him, and to say : Alas Lorde, wee cannot reach so high as to enter into thy secrete purpose and to know what is inclosed therein:but i: becometh vs to reuerence that which is vñknowne to vs as now. The must we confess that thou art righteous and good , yea euen though there appeare no reason of it: vnto vs. VVhen we be come to that point:we shall not fling out rashly and at all aduentures to judge of Gods secrets after our owne fancie, but we shall do as we see the faithfull of all times haue done. Verely when they dispute of Gods election, they do it soberly and modestly, and they crie out with Saint Paule, O howe wonderfull are thy iudgements. They be rauished at them, and they inquire not curiously of this and that, but they thinke well, as now we knowe Gods doings but in part, but the day will come that all shall be revealed vnto vs to the full. Lo how the faithfull haue alwayes reasoned of Gods election, and not rauinged abrode to inquire of things curiously. Certes they thought it very straunge and it was maruellous to the : but their so doing was to yelde God his due honoure, knowing it to be too greate a loftiness for his creatures to presume to attayne so high. And in so doing they continued quiet, they were rauished with wondermente; these doings of God were maruellous vnto them, and yet they were not ouerstrange to them. They were maruellous too them, bycause they knewe that: in them there are secretes which surmount all capacitie and vnderstan-derstanding of man. And ageyne they were not straunge to them, bycause that by their election they knew Gods goodnesse and mercie in that he had chosen them too saluation, by calling them vnto himselfe, and by casting off the rest. Behold what we see in Gods election. As in much is to be said also of his prouidence. It is said that God disposeth all things in the worlde. VVell then, is it possible that when warres come, they shoulde bee of Gods stirring vp: or that God shoulde guyde them that are tossed with outragious passions, such as the princes bee that are full of ambition, couetouse, bludshadens, rakers, extorcioners, in somuch that there is as it were a hellish con'uzion, and they that serue them in that behalfe, make no conscience nor sticking at all to flea, rob, and kill?

Ye see then that menne are as illas wilde beastes, and much worse. And should God vse such instrumentes? Howe shoulde that be possible? Ageyne we see that the Church it selfe is turmoyled: ye see what persecutions it is put vnto: and who is he that raiseth them vp? Furthermore we see that the doctrine of the Gospell is as it were troden vnder foote by the tirannie of wicked caytifes, so as lies reigne in stead of truth. And who is it that maketh such troubles? It is the rightfull vengeance of God. VVe see not the reason of it, we see not how nor in what wise it worketh: but wee must perceiue hys hand by faith. This is strange to vs, and so must it needs be, to the end it may humble vs. But when wee shall haue bin instructed in Gods word, although wee knowe not the reason of his woorks, yet shall we customably magnifie them, assuring our selues that hee doth not aught without iust cause. Ye see then how it standeth vs in hand to practize this sentence wherein it is said, Thou wilst shew thy selfe maruellous against me. But Job passed measure: that is certaine: hee sheweth heere that he was tempted of an outrageus passion. For he saith, thou wilst shew thy selfe maruellous: [whereby] he declareth and confesseth that for his owne part hee was vtterly dismayde, and thought it very strange that God should scourge him so. But we must beware that he be not maruellous to vs after that sort. True it is that when we perceiue Gods marueilouse and secrete dealings, we may well be so abashed as to say, Alas Lorde, we see our owne weakenesse and rudenesse, in that wee thinke the woorks of thy hands to bee strange. But what for that? Thou shalte enlighten vs by little and little, vntill we be come into thy Sanctuarie. VVe haue one foote there already: truly we are but at the courtins, wee see thee but aloofe: but the time will come that thou shalt giue vs amore familiar knowledge. And therefore let it not greeue vs that God shoulde haue his secrets in such wise, which surmount our capacitie. But yet dothe this amaze vs: for a man maye alledge, and how so? doth not all our welfare and happinesse consist in the knowing of God and of his will? Yes verely, so farre foorth as is expedient for vs.

But let vs marke, that God hath giuen vs a way too know him, which is conuenient and fit for vs. He could well giue vs the full and perfect light at this day: but he seeth it is not for our profit, and therefore hee giueth vs but a certaine portion, and he applieth him selfe vnto vs. And therefore, let it not greeue vs too haue this knowledge of God as yet by measure, as it is giuen vs in the scripture, and to wait till he haue bereft vs of this mortall body, and specially till he haue wholly reformed our mindes that they maye bee no more so wrapped in these worldliness, and earthliness, and specially in the sinfulness that proceedeth of the sinne of Adam. And by and by for a fynall conclusion, Job declareth, wherein God shewed him selfe maruellous agaynst him: that is too witte, In that he will renew hys stripes and fall to changing. True it is that the hebreu worde whiche is put for Stripes, Woundes, or plagues: signifyeth as much as Recordes, Witnesses, or witnessings: and not without cause. For the plagues whiche God sendeth vpon men are as it were witnesses broughte foorth agaynst them, and proofes that God maketh to bring things to knowledge. But in this place Job speakest of Stripes, wounds, or plagues, whereby he mee[n]eth the chastizementes that God had layd vpon him. Therefore hee saithe they were renued, in somuche that he had new chastizementes layd vpon him. This is a thing well worthy to be noted. For although we find Gods woorking to be straunge to our vnderstanding: yet notwithstanding there is nothing that hindereth vs more from the knowledge of Gods righteousnesse, than this temptation doth. That (I say) is the thing wherin men find themselves most hindred. True it is that as oft as any man alledgeth any peice of scripture to vs, which is not to our liking, the same greeueth vs, and by and by we fail to arguing against God. But specially we shewe our stubbornesse when wee bee smitten and beaten by the hand of God, and we cannot be broughte to confess that God is righteous in all his chafizementes. Beholde (say I) a thing wherevnto we cannot be made to agree. And so yesee why Job hauing spoken of Gods wonderfull woorking, addeth, Thou doublest thy plagues against me. But forasmuch as this matter cannot be discoursed at length to day: let vs marke that there is nothing else for vs to do but to flee vnto God, praying him to giue vs suche a tast of his word, as we may quietly receiue whatsoeuer is conteyned in the same: and yet that whensoeuer it shall please him to vse rigoure towards vs, he will so moderate his roddes, that although he make vs feele the smart of the, yet we may not cease to haue recourse vnto him as to our father, to the ende he may awytes receyue vs as his children.

And nowe let vs kneele downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying hym to make vs knowe them in suche wise, as we may not anye more be blinded with hipocrisie, or with pride, or with the fonde folies whereof oure heads are full: but that beeing vtterly ashamed, wee maye awytes haue recourse too the remedie that is giuen vs, whiche is to embrase the redemption that is purchased vs by the death and passion of oure Lorde Iesus Christ: and that wee knowing the same too bee the only meane whereby wee may bee reconciled vnto god, may come to it with assured trust that he wil haire vs: And therewithal that it may please him so to aide vs with his holy spirit, as he may make vs to walke in the feare & obedience of him, vntill he shal haue restored vs fully, and that there remaine no more sinne and corruption in vs. That it maye please him to graunte this grace not onely to vs, but also to al people and nations of the earth, &c.

18. VVhy hast thou broughte mee out of the womb? O that I had died before any ey had nesse.

E must cal to mind what was spoken yesterday concerning Gods changing of his plagues: that is to witte, that when God scourgeth men, he hath diuers meanes to do it: and when hee hath vised one kind of correctiō, he hath another a. wayes in store. Therefore let vs not thinke we be scaped his hand when he hath deliuered vs from some one trouble: but let vs prepare our selues till it please him to shew vs mercie. For behold, the only meane to set vs at rest, is to stand in Gods fauoure. Otherwise he wil make vs feele that which is conteyned in the song of Moyses, Deut.32.e.34. namely that he hath diuers sorts of chalizements in his cofers and storehouses. But in the meane while we see that Job being sore pressed, desireth God to put him to death out of hand. VVe haue seene the same sentence heeretofore. And heere he confirmeth his matter therewith, as if he shold say, it is not without cause that I wish so, seeing that God persecuteth me so sharply, as I haue no ease nor respite by any meanes, but am utterly confounded. And whereas Job saith, VVherefore hast thou taken me out of my mothers womb? no doubt but he sinned in so saying. For it is a poynct of vnthankfulness in men not to acknowledge them selues very much behoden to God in that he hath made them and fashioned them, notwithstanding that they liue never so miserably in this world. And is it a small thing, that God hath put vs into this world to reigne therein, to haue the fruision of all his creatures, to beare his image heere, to knowe him to be our father, yea and to fynd him to be so by experieēce? Ought we to hold skorne of such an honoure as he doth vnto vs? VVe see then that Job is not altogether to be excused, whē he wisheth to haue bin caried from his mothers womb to his graue, or rather not to haue bin borne at all. True it is that he made not this conclusion to rest fully vpon it: but that he bewrayeth the passions wherewith he was moued, although he consented not to them. But the popish doctors say, that that is no sinne, but so to say is a great beastlinesse in them. They hold opinion, that if a man be prouoked in himselfe to vengeance, or to robbery, or to any such other things, the same is no sinne so hee rest not vpon it, ne fully purpose it in his hart but rather they esteeme it as a vertue bycause they say they be such battels as a man outstandeth. Verely they graunt, that before baptim it is sinne: so as if a Turk or a heathen man be tempted to do euill, he is forthwith giltie before God: But they say, that all such sinnes are so skoured out of vs by baptim, as wee rather deserue praise afore God for not consenting to such temptations, than to be esteemed as sinners and to haue done amisse. But(as I erst said)it is to brutish a beastlinesse For too whome doth God speake when he saith, that men must loue him with all their hearte and with all their strength: Speaketh he not to the Iewes who were of his Church? And doth not the same belong vnto vs at this day? Is it not a rule common to vs all: If we be bound to loue God with all our strength and with all our minde, and [On the other side] if it be so that looke with howe many lewde affections we be combered, so many striugings and enmitis we haue against the loue that we owe vnto God: we must needes conclude also that they be as many sinnes, or else that it is no sinne at all to rebell against God and to haue transgressed his commaundements. Ye see then a thing against nature. True it is that our sinnes are not layde to our charge: but yet it enseweth not therefore that we be not woorthie to be punished before God, were it not that he of his owne meere goodness doth take vs to mercie. Let vs understand the that whensoeuer oure fleshe tempteth vs vnto euill, although there be no resting or determining vpon it: yet may God iustly punish vs: neuerthelater he of his owne free goodness spareth vs so as the same commeth not to account. Job therefore did amisse. And on our side let vs know, that God may cal vs to iudgement and account, if we haue a temptation that doth but make vs to swarue alittle: and although we bring not the same to effect, nor be ouercome of it, yet are we already gone astray, and it behoueth vs to confess our fault: but yet notwithstanding it behoueth vs also to settle our selues vpon the free mercy that God graunteth in forgetting and buryng all those things. And now let vs come to Iobs talke. He saith, VVherefore hast thou taken me out of my mothers womb? Verely if we looke no further but too the life of man, we shall always be fayne to come to this prouerb which is common among the heathen, or at least wise among the most parte of them:namely,that it were good for men never to be borne, or else to die out of hande. They that haue reckned the miseries and inconueniences whereto we be subiect while we liue heere bylowe: haue thought, how now: It were better for men never to be borne. For what else is the beginning of their life but weeping and wailing? The little babes before they haue any vnderstanding, do shewe there is such a seagulse of miseries in vs, as it is a pitie and terroure to behold: and afterward as we growe in yeeres, so do our miseries increace in nomber and quantitie. Therefore it were better for men that they might never be borne: and if they must needes bee borne, it were good for them too die quickly, that they might haue no long iourney to make. And this talke liath partly some reason, howbeit it is not without vnthankfulness. And why so? For although the miseries be innumerable wherewith men be oppressed: yet must we wey them in the balunce with the honoure that that God doth vs in making vs Lords ouer his creatures to haue dominion ouer them heere bylow, as his childre, wheme he maketh to feele him as a father towards vs, and moreouer bycause his setting of vs heere in this world is to aduance vs aloft, that is to witte to the heauenly life, wherof he giueth vs some perceyuerance and feeling afore hand. If this be throughly knowne, surely it ouercommeth all the miseries and troubles that can happen to men in this world. And thus ye see why I said that this sentence (namely that it were best for men not to be borne at all) might seeme to be grounded vpon some reason, and yet it was not without vnthankfulness. For we must not forget what God giueth vs to recompence it withall. But so farre off is Job of comming to that point, that he had leuer not to haue bin borne at all. And why? Because he was so combered, his mind was so amazed, and his hart was so seized and forepossessted with griefe, as he could not consider that God had neuerthelesse created him after his owne image, that hee had kept him in the world as one of his childre, and that he made him taſt of the euerlasting life wherevnto men are allured. Job could not come to that point. And why? His hart was so closed vp with sorrowe, as he had none eye but to his miserie.

And therefore lette vs marke well, that if our afflictions bee greate, wee are alwayes subiect to this fault whiche Job bewrayeth in him selfe: whiche is, that we forget Gods gracious benefites: and that although we be put in remembrance of them, yet we fynd no taſt nor sauour in them, they touch vs not to our comfort, or to asswage our sorrow that we might take breath to say, Lord although I be beaten by thy hand, and that it be too heauie a burthen for me to beare; yet notwithstanding I consider on the other side, that thou haſt bin so good vnto me, that I perceiue thee to be a mercifull father to me, and that is it that checreth me vp and comforteth me. Ye ſee the hewe the thing that we haue to marke in the firſt place, is, that we ſhould know that this vice is naturally rooted in vs, so as if God did not ſuccoure vs and giue vs the ſaid comfort to ſweeten our ſorrows with, we ſhould not miſſe to bee diuen too ſuche an afterdeale, as there ſhould be nothing but deſpaire in vs, and we wolde wiſh that we had neuer bin borne. And nowe Job addeth, Or that I bad bin caried from my mothers womb to my graue, and that I had bin as though I had neuer bin. This is the ſecond part of the proverbe whiche I ſaid was uſed among the iſtſels: namely that when men be borne, it were good for them to be ſoon diſpatched and rid out of this lyfe. But as I haue touched alredy, that wer a ſmal regar- ding of the honoure that God doth vs in giuing vs ſuch dignitie and preheminenſe ouer all his creatures. And if there were no more but this, that he as it were muſtreth vs in the rank of his children and heires, were not that an inestimable priuiledge which ought to appeaſe all the grefes that can betide vs? ſpecially let vs mark to what purpose God will haue vs to liue heere in this worlde. For if we die in our childhood, we haue nother underſtanding nor reaſon: but as we grow in yeares, ſo leарne we that which was uknowne vnto vs: namely that god hath made vs after his owne image, and giuen vs underſtanding to knowe, not onely that wee muſt paſſe away heere bylow, but also that there is a continuing life in heauen, and that that is the thing whereto he calleth vs. But if wee be taken out of the world as if wee had neuer bene, we be diſappoyneted of this great benefitte of knowing that God will bee our eternall ſaviour, and that he gyueth vs alredy ſome tokē of his fatherly loue while we be in this earthly wayfaring. Therefore ye ſee it is an intolerable vnthankfulneſſe when men wiſh to haue bin rid out of the way as if they had neuer bin borne. For wee muſt not thynke vpon the lyfe of manne ſimpye in it ſelfe: but wee muſt ſet our eye vpon the ende wherevnto it tendeth: which is, that we ſhoulde bee led too the hope that is as yet hidden vp in heauen, wherof G O D gyueth vs ſome taſt alreadye, ſo faire foorth as oure rawneſſe is able too compiehende the ſame.

Also heere is too bee noted in what wiſe wee maye wiſh to die, and in what ſorte we muſt not onelye bee willing too liue, but also cheere vp oure ſelues, though wee lyue in lingering payne. As it hath bin shewed heeretofore, wee maye defyre deaþe in reſpekte that wee ceaſe not too offend God: and for alſomuche as wee bee compassed about with ſo manye corruiptions as is lamentable too ſee, wee may well mourne and defyre God too deliuere vs from ſuche bondaſe; and thys is not onely lawfull but alſo requisite for vs too doo. For if Gods ſpirite gouerne vs, wee muſt hate ſinne and all euil. Neuertheleſſe ſo long as man is in this worlde, hee ceaſeth not to diſplease God. I ſay, take even the vertuousell man that is, and there ſhall alwayes bee ſome fault too bee founde in him. Therefore in hating oure naughtineſſe and ſinne wee muſt needes be weerie of our life. And why? Because it holdeth vs in the thralldome and priſon of ſo manye infirmities that are contrarie to Godswil. Ye ſee then how the faythfull are alwayes weerie too lyue and linger in this worlde ſith they cannot ſerue God fuli-ly as they would wiſhe. And I ſay that this is not onely lawfull but alſo needfull for vs to do.

VVee ſee alſo how Sainte Paule ſayth not that hee Phil.1.6. 23. could haue done ſo: but declareth that it was best for him that God ſhoulde take hym quickly out of thys world, if he had had no further reſpect but to him ſelfe. And ſpeciallye when hee ſaiþe, wretche that I am, Rom.7.4. who ſhall delyuer me, hee confeſſeth that if hee lookeſt not further than too hys owne preſente ſtate, hee was vnhappye. And when hee diſyreth too bee delyuered from hence, he ſpeaketh it not through humaine paſſion: but of zelousneſſe wherewith hee was driven by the hollye Ghost, and of a ſingular regarde that hee had to gyue him ſelfe to godneſſe. For hee ſawe that that coulde not bee done till hee were quite and cleane rid of this fleſh. And that is the cauſe why hee was weerie of his life.

And heere ye ſee howe wee ought too proceſſe in that behalfe: that is to witte, that our miſliking of oure life muſt be bycause we knowe our ſelues to be ſinfull. Howbeit for ſo muſche as men cannot atteyne therevnto, G O D is fayne too pinch them, to make them abhorre ſinne. And forſomuche as wee bee fayne to be driuen to it by force: ye ſee that this is one fault in vs: And agayne althoſh God chaſtize vs, and that by ſuche corrections wee bee warneſt to miſlike of our ſinnes: yet wee hate them not, excepte hee continue in making vs too feele the ſmart of them. For if hee withdrawe his hande, we fall to our olde byaffe, and wee could find in our harts to ſit ſtill in our owne woorkes if he would let vs alone.

Yee ſee then heere the ſecond vice. And further, oure hating of this preſent life is bycause wee cannot lyue heere, after oure fleſhly luſtes, whyche notwithstanding are wycked and corrupte. VVee woulde haue God to giue vs leaute too offend him, yea, if wee coulde make ſuch a bargaine with hiſn, our life ſhuld be ſweete, and we wold deſire nothing but to tariſſe heere.

VE se then that the cause why men are weerie of their liues is for that they cannot compasse their desires. They hate not the euill that is in them, nor the corruption of their nature which intangleth them: but yet they besorie that God giueth them not full scope to do what they lyste, ne suffereth them to take their delights and pleasures heere after their owne inclination. Againe there is yet one other thing too bee condemned, which is that wee keepe no measure: and that although we haue good reason to hate our life: yet if wee fall to mislyking of it, it is done too farre out of square. But Saint Paule in the place that I alledged afore, leadeth vs to the cleane contrarie. For althoughe hee call himselfe wretched or unhappy, & desire to be deliuered out of the pryon of his body. Yet he commeth backe to this poynte, that he contenteth himselfe with the grace that God giueth him. Beholde (saythe hee) I thanke my God throughe Iesu Christ. For he knewe well that God woulde not leaue him without helpe: hee knewe that God woulde gyue him power to withstand the euill; and finally that the infirmitie which was in him was buried befor God so as it shuld not be layd to his charge. S. Paule then misliketh not his life as a man that stomaked at it, and were impaient, neither dothe he cast himselfe into suche outrage as to checke against God: but cleane contrariwise he yeldeth himselfe vnto Gods good wil. He contenteth himselfe in that God layeth not the euil to his charge, and in that he holdeth him vp with a strong hande that hee bee not vanquished by Sathan nor by sinne. And euen so ought we todo, but we do it not. Thus ye see how it may bee lawfull for vs to hate this present life, bycause (say I) that God holdeth vs in the bondage of sin. And again it behoueth vs to holde this measure of languishing vnder Gods hande so long as it shall please him too holde vs in this worlde, knowing that it ought to suffise vs that he is neare at hand with vs to helpe vs at our neede. But wher as Job sayth, I would not bene borne, or that I had ben carryed from my mothers wombe to my graue: it is an inordinate manner of speach, and although he rested not vpon that poynt for a doo: yet he offended God. And here ye see good cause to marke well that which is sayd here. For we shall never keepe any measure and euen hand in hating this present life, except we consider howe it is giuen vs of God to the ende to make vs passe further by maling vs too feele his fatherly loue. This present life is a witnessse, that God by shewing himselfe good towrdes vs, doth alreadie warrant vs that which wee see not yet, namely the immortall glorie which he hath layde vp for vs. But wee thinke not of that: wee couet not to liue for that: we passe not for seruing of God, nor too doe as is shewed vs in the examples of the holy fathers, namely

Esa. 38. d. 20*

I will liue to sette foorth the prayse of the Lorde: I will liue to come to the temple to magnifye my God. VVee haue not that regarde with vs, and no maruell at all, for wee bee vtterly corrupted, and haue forgotten the excellencie of our fyrste creation. VVhat then? Our desiring to liue is through a brutishe affection, too bee at our owne ease, to eate and drinke, and to fulfille our owne lustes according as euerie mannes complexion leadeth him. Loe how men are straitened in themselves without hauing eye vnto God, and it is a poynt of vtter wickednesse, if our beeinge weerie to liue bee but bycause wee liue not at our owne ease. It is not for that wee bee heere hild in sin: but bycause God pleaseth vs not, and bycause we haue not whatsoever our flesh desireth. For we could find in our hearts that God should be subiect to vs: and bycause he wil not be our vnderling, so as things fal out cleane contrarie: beholde, it greeueth vs, stingeth vs, and tormenteth vs, and wee caste foorth our choler euery where. And therfore so muche the more must we mark this lesson: whiche is, that wee muste honor this present lyfe, bycause God hath set vs in it, to the intent it shoud be as a recorde to vs, that he taketh vs for his children, & wil be our father: And secondly that we so consider what is in our selues: namely that we be corrupted in Adam, as we are always hild there as Satans prisoners and ceasse not to doo euill: vpon the knowledge whereof we must euen in the midst of our weeringesse prouoke our selues with a good and holy affection to retume alwayes vnto God, assuring our selues that he will remedie all our inconueniences, and that when he hath once made vs feele his fatherly loue, hee will continually increase his gracious giftes more and more, and throughtly bring too passe that which he hath begonne. Howbeit forasmuch as wee bee so sore inclined to repine against God, let vs be wel ware that we haue his benefites alwayes throughly printed in our mynde, that wee fall not into the temptation 15 that is spoken of heere, which is, too wilche that wee had never had life. True it is, that it were better for the castawayes to haue bene borne dead, or too haue bene swallowed vp into the earth, or that they had never bene begotten: as our Lord Iesu Christ speaketh of Iudas. But yet in the meane whyle wee muste holde this rule, that the life of man is in it selfe so precious and noble a gift of God, as it deserueth wel to be had in estimation. For we must alwayes come backe to this poynt, that God never createth man, but he imprinteth his image in him. True 20 it is that this image is defaced: neuerthelesse, as in respect of the order of nature: the goodnesse of God taketh alwayes the vpper hande, and ought to haue such preferment and preheminence among vs, as too magnifie and acknowledge the same accordingly. Nowe let vs come to that which Job addeth. He saith, that if bee badde bene carryed after that sorte from his mothers wombe too his graue, no eye badde seene him. That is yet one other vnthankfulnessse. For this life ought too bee well lyked of, not onely bycause euerie of vs knoweth vpon what condition and 25 to what ende he was created: but also bycause God ought too bee glory fied in vs. VVhen wee looke vpon a creature whome G O D hath sente into the worlde, haue wee not therein as it were a mirrour of his goodnesse? Then as often as we may behold a man with our eyes, we must make the same to serue vs to glorifie God in that behalfe. But Job woulde haue bene deade at the fyrste dashe, and that was as muche as too darken Gods glorie: whiche thing was not without a smacke of vnthankfulnessse. And soe wee see howe hee overshotte himselfe in all thinges, and that hee hilde not the measure whyche hee oughte too haue doone, and therefore haue wee the more cause too bee well aduised. For if this temptation befell vntoo suche a manne as hee was, howe muche more shall wee bee carryed awaye beeinge soe frayle as wee bee? Immediately hee sayth: O that God woulde withdrawe his hande from mee, and gette him awye a whyle, that I myghte haue some respite, before I goe downe into the darke countrey, into the shadewe of death, where is nothing but confusion. VVee see heere howe Job is still carryed awaye, that is too witte, bycause Gods iudgemente laye sore vpon him. And this is it that I sayde afore, namely that hee not only felte the bodily aduersities as euerie of vs shall feele them: but that his chiefe greefe was that God was agaynst him, as if hee hadde beene at deadly fewd with him. Thus yee se what did pinch Job with such distresse & what tormentéed him in such wise, as he was not so patient as was requisite. To be short, when god bringeth vs

to these spirituall battels: then doth he proue vs and trie vs to the quicke. And it is a thing well worth the noting. For we take our selues for stoute men of warre and too haue beene tried too the vttermost, when wee haue indured some sicknesse, or some other aduersitie: and wee thinke then that God ought not too begin newe againe with vs, but that we be quite discharged, and are become stout champions. And yet notwithstanding, all the bodily afflictions that wee can indure are nothing in respect of the distresse that a poore sinner is in when he perceyeth 10 that God is as it were a partie agaynst him, and persecuteth him, so as hee can finde no meanes to come too attonement and agreement with him. Therefore when our sinnes come after that sort before vs, and the diuell maketh vs too feele Gods wrath, and againe on the other side oure owne conscience reproueth vs, so as God see meth too be vtterly angrie with vs: that (say I) isa farre greater and dreadfuller anguish, than all the miseries are, that we can indure in ourflesh. And therefore let vs prepare oure selues too suche spirituall battelles, praying 20 God to strengthen vs, for wee see how all mans strength fayleth in that behalfe, so as wee shall bee quickly ouerwhelmed if wee bee not propped vp from aboue, and lifted vp by GOD when wee bee falne, and set a gayne in too the right way when we bee stepped out of it. By the waye when Job sayeth, Let him get him from mee awhile: VVee see yet better howe misera ble the state of poore sinners is, when they haue this conceyte that God persecuteth them and is agaynst them. For wherein lyeth all oure welfare and all our 30 ioy, but in that GOD is neere at hande too vs, and in that wee feele howe his gracious fauour is neuer separated from vs? But cleane contrarie, when a poore sinner is so scared with Gods iudgement: he desireth nothing but too hyde himselfe, and too finde some secrete nooke, that God might see him no more, and that hee might not make him feele his hande any more. And so the greatest benefite that poore sinners could haue when they fele theselues so tormented with Gods iudgement, is too preace neerer too him, too craue helpe and succour at his hande: and their vtter vndooing is to shrinke away from him. VVe see then what men are when God sheweth himselfe angrie with them. For they haue none other shift than to heape wickednesse vpon wickednesse, and to enter into hell. For it is a very hell when we bee shrunke away after that sort from God. And yet notwithstanding when God holdeth them at that poynt, beholde howe all poore sinners wilhe that hee would make them perceyue how there is nothing in him but his wrath and curse. But heereby we must bee prouoked too pray God, that whatsoeuer vengeance wee haue deserued for our sinnes, yet we may not forget this grace whiche hee offereth vs, namely that wee shoulde always haue recourse too hisgoodnesse, and that although he haue good right too bee angrie with vs, yet neuerthelesse we may assure our selues that he ceaseth not to allure vs too him. For his goodnesse surmounteth the rigour of his iustice which is due to vs for our sinnes: and thereby let vs bee comforted, vntill hee haue withdrawne his hande from vs: Then let vs not shrinke backe when hee absenteth himselfe from vs, but rather let vs say, Lorde withdrawe thine anger, for if thou shewe vs thine angrie countenance: it is all one as if wee were drowned alreadie in hell. Lo what we haue too marke in this strayne. And therefore let vs bethinke vs too profite our selues by it, that we quayle nor when God liliteth too trie vs and too proue too the quicke what our strength and constancie is in such temptations. And heere ye see howe we may say with Sainet Paule, neyther things present, nor things to come, nor life, nor death, nor any thing else is able to separate vs from the loue of God, That is too say [no-thing can disappoynyt vs] that wee shoulde not always feele his fatherly loue which he vseth towards vs, too aswage and to sweeten our sorrowes withall. Sainet Paule setteth downe things to come, as if he shoulde say, true it is that men are subiect to infinite miseries, as we can neyther number nor measure them. The miseries that are in our nature, are as it were a maze: and yet for all that, if wee holde our selues by our Lorde Iesus Christ, who is the bande betweene God and vs, and looke vpon him as the partie that knitteth vs too God his father: There shall be nothing to hinder vs that we shoulde not bee always merie. Lo what we haue to desire at Gods hande, when wee knowe in what plight wee bee. Nowe in the ende Job speaketh of the state of suche as are departed, saying, Before I go intoo the darke countrey, and intoo the lightlesse pitte, where there is nothing but confuzion and disorder, and where is night when the day ought to shine. Heere Job speaketh like a man that hath no beleefe, eyther of the immortalitie of the soule, or of the resurrection that is promised vs. VVhere is hee become then? Let vs marke that in this place he expresseth the passions of a wretched sinner, whiche feeleth nothing but Goddes wrath, as I haue touched heeretofoore, but yet haue we neede too bee put oftentimes in mynde of it, because it is for our behoofe. Job then is brought heere to such a hell [of mynde, as hee thinketh that] God is his iudge, and himselfe as a reprobate before him, so as there is no hope of grace or forgiuenesse for him. Lo wherefore in speaking of death, he feeleth nothing but confuzion. And howe so? For death serueth too turne Gods order vpside downe, like as sinne had turned all things vpside downe. For when God created man, it was not too the intent he shoulde haue beene mortall. True it is that wee shoulde not haue liued euermore in this worlde in the same state that Adam was in. For God would haue chaunged vs intoo glorious immortalitie. But yet notwithstanding, wee shoulde not haue beene fayne to haue dyed, neyther shoulde our mortalitie haue needed to haue beeene renued. The state of Adam should haue beene suche, as when hee had liued [his full tyme] in thys worlde, hee shoulde haue had his everlasting heritage with God. But sinne stepped in, And beholde, God added death out of hande, yea euen a death wherein there is nothing but confnzion. And why? Forthereby man coulde perceyue nothing but Gods curse vpon him, which hath after a sort cutte off man from the number of creatures. Ye see howe God who hath settled vs in this worlde to liue heere as his children, taketh vs away when hee bereaueth vs of this life, whiche is all one as if hee shoulde drie vs ute of his house, and shoulde shewe howe hee myndeth not too recken vs any more in the number of his creatures. See ye not an horrible confuzion? And so the cace standeth, that when wee haue no further knowledge but of our sinnes and of Goddes iustice, wee muste bee faine too rest there. So then wee must not thinke it straunge, that Job speaking of death, should say, that men go into a darke coast, where there is nothing but darkenesse and disorder. And why so? For hee matcheth sinne and Gods curse togither with death: and so long as God holdeth him locked vp in distresse, there is as it were a certaine hartburning, so as hee seeketh not the meane of grace, which is the true remedy to shew vs that there is light euen in death, and some order also in darkenesse how darke soever it be, because that after we haue once beeene brought too dust, wee shall bee rayzed Ron.8.g. 37.38.

vp agayne. Job perceyted not this. And why? Bycause it behoued God first too make him feele hys sharpe and sore rigour, and afterwarde to comfort him againe. And it is a text which wee ought too marke well. For if wee mynde too receyue the grace that God giueth vs, and offereth too vs continually in oure Lorde Iesus Christ: wee must first feele what wee oure selues are, and in what plight wee bee. Are wee desyrous (I say) too taste what the heauenly lyfe is? First wee muste knowe too what ende wee bee borne, yea euuen according as wee bee sinners in Adam. And in good sooth it

1.Cor. 15.f. is not without cause that Sainct Paule sayeth, that that

46. which is corruptible goeth formost. For hee speaketh not onely of the order that God holdeth in nature: but also of that whiche it behoueth vs too consider on oure part. Therefore wee must vnderstande that although wee bee borne into this worlde, and be as noble and excellent creatures of God as any can bee: Yet notwithstanding by meanes of sinne, death hath as it were abolished and razed out that noblenesse, in so muche that 20 God mislyketh vs, and disclaymeth vs, as thoughe hys hande had not fashioned vs, bycause wee bee disfigured and the Deuill hath sette his markes and stampes vpon vs, and furthermore beeing subiect too the curse that was pronounced vpon Adam, wee are as good as banished oute of the whole worlde, so as there is neyther heauen nor earth, but it abhorreth vs. This (say I) is the thing that wee haue too marke in our selues. But if wee enter intoo that battell, it is certayne that wee shall bee confounded vtterly. Yee see that the cause why men 30 stande so muche in their owne conceyte, is for that they cannot bethinke them of Goddes iustice as they ought too doo. But yet must wee come too that poynt. Howebeit when wee shall haue considered howe wretched oure lyfe is, and that death is yet more wretched, bycause it is the great gulfe that serueth too shewe vs of what importance the curse is which God pronounced agaynst vs with his owne mouth: I saye when wee shall haue considered that: we must also beware that wee bee not vtterly swallowed vp of heauinessse. And what remede is there? The remedie is too turne our eyes too our Lorde Iesus Christ. For the meane whereby God inlighteneth vs in the middes of darkenesse, is howe our Lorde Iesus Christ offereth himselfe vntoo vs, in whom wee haue the true daysunne of righteousnesse. Nowe then if wee haue that regarde with vs: no death can bee dreadfull vntoo vs. And heere yee see why David sayeth, that Gods sheepooke shall comfort him in the shadowe of death, and in the darkenesse. VVhen as he speaketh of Gods sheepooke, hee meeneth that hee shall bee afraide of nothing so long as God sheweth himselfe a sheepehearde towardes him. And howe shoulde he shewe himselfe a sheepeherde, but in the person of our Lorde Iesus Christ? Sothen let vs first consider of what mynde Job speaketh heere. He knoweth that if men bee considered in themselues, it is their verye nature too haue nothing else but all maner of confuzion both in their lyfe and in theyr death. Howebeit seeing wee haue the sonne of God, although oure state seeme never so wretched, insomuch that wee bee but as poore woormes subiect too corruption and rottennesse: yet come wee too the tasting of the benefite whiche God gaue vs, when hee made light to issue out of the middes of darkenesse, according as it is sayde in the creation of the worlde, that God turned the darkenesse intoo light. Seeing wee knowe this, wee haue too rejoyce, 60 in that by the meanes of his onely sonne, hee hath cauſed his goodnessse and grace to shine foorth in our death, yea euuen more than in our lyfe. For when it seeneth that wee shoulde enter intoo the dungeons and gulfes of hell: Then dooth God open vs the gate of hys kingdome: and euuen then hee maketh vs too enter into the dwelling place, whereoutof wee bee nowe after a sort banished. And Christ inlightneth vs, not onely in death, too the intent that the darkenesse which is there should not darken vs and quite ouerwhelme vs: but also in our life. This present worlde (as the Scripture telleth vs) is full of darkenesse, and wee bee poore blinde soules in it: and yet in the meane while Iesus Christ ceaseth not inlighten vs by his Gospell. VVee haue the lawe and the Prophetes, which are as burning Cressettes too vs. And wee haue the Gospell, which is yet a farre greater light, yea euuen as it were the light of high noone. Yee see then howe oure Lorde Iesus Christ will bee a sufficient light for vs both in lyfe and death, so we looke vntoo him: But as I haue touched heretofore, wee must first feele what disorder and confuzion inuironneth vs rounde aboue, vntill suche tyme as Iesus Christ haue reached vs his hande. Furthermore, when Iesus Christ hath inlightned vs, so as wee shall haue walked in hope of the euerlasting lyfe while we bee in this worlde: althoough God take vs hence, and death be before our eies: yet let vs not therefore ceasse too call vpon God, and to tarie his leysure till he comfort our soules in his owne Kingdome. For they bee always incombered and haue not theyr perfecte ioy, so long as they dwell in oure bodies and till that God take them vp to himselfe for a doo. True it is, that if wee thinke vpon death alone by it selfe, without lifting vp oure selues anie higher, God maye now and then bring vs to the same point that he brought Job. Job had both faith & hope of the euerlasting life: & yet for a little while he was ouerraught with such a feare, as hee conceyued nothing else in death, but all confuzion and disorder. For when hee looked too his graue, hee sawe hell open to swallow him vp. And the hauing of such conceytes greeued Job muche more than all the torments that he coulde indure in his bodie. But like as God did plucke him out in the ende, and give him victorie agaynst suche temptations: so will hee doo too vs lykewise. Neuerthelesse wee bee warned heereby, that wee had neede too walke warely, praying oure good God, that when it shall please him too call vs too acconte in his iudgement, it may not bee too handle vs rigorously, and according as wee haue deserued: but that it may please him too make vs feele the favour whiche hee vsyth custonably towards his: and that wee may always come backe too this poynt: namely that althoughe wee muste bee fayne too walke in thyss worlde, as it were in the middes of darkenesse and of the shadowe of death: yet wee may not bee afraide seeing wee haue Iesus Christ before our eyes, who is the true daysunne of righteousnesse: and that the same may cause vs labor toward the heritage of heauen, wherunto God calleth vs to make vs partakers of his glorious immortalitie.

Nowe therefore let vs fall downe before the Maiestie of our good God, with acknowledgement of oure faultes; praying him too make vs perceyue them in such wyse, as wee may thereby bee prouoked too sylfe and grone continually, beseeching him of pardon: and that wee maye not bee so astonyed at hys iudgements as too fayne at them, but that beeing condemned by them (as wee bee woorthie of ryght too bee condemned) and beeing ashamed in our selues, wee may returne too our good God that hee may make vs too taste of his inestimable loue, which he vsyth towards vs by shewing himselfe himselfe to be our saviour in the persone of our Lorde Iesus Christ his sonne : so as we may be stablished in the hope which he giueth vs of our saluation, and grow in it more and more, vntill such time as hauing incountred a gaynst all the assaults that we haue to indure here bylow, we may come to the euerlasting rest which is prepared for vs in heauen. That it may please him too graunt this grace not onely to vs, but also to all people.&c.

The. xlj. Sermon, which is the first vpon the. xj. Chapter.

And Zophar the Naamathite ansvered and sayd,

2. Should not men ansvere a man of much talke, or shall a babbling person preuaile?
3. Verely thy wordes shall make men holde their peace: and vwhen thou hast mocked no man shall do thee shame.
4. Thou hast sayde, my dealing is rightfull, and I am cleane in thy presence.
5. But I vvould that God vvould speake to thee, and that he vvould open his lippes against thee:
6. That hee vvould discouer vntoo thee the secretes of vvisdonie: for his iudgement is double rightfull, and God hath forgotten thee for thine vnrightuousnesse sake.

Hat we may the better profite our selues by this doctrine, wee must call too minde what hath beene sayd heeretofore: namely that the matters which are set downe here, are true in themselues, notwithstanding that they be misapplid to the person of Job. Thus see ye an instruction that is good and profitable for vs, so bee it that wee haue wisedome and discretion to knowe howe to vse it aright. And in effect we be done here to vnderstande, that whensoeuer we debate after what maner man may stand before God, wee must not alledge our owne prittle prattle, nor thinke too preuayle by vayne rhetorike: but we must be beaten downe and dismayde by considering the Maiestie of God. To bring this to passe, let vs assur our selues that it is not possible for vs too serch out that wisedome which wee cannot comprehend, but that all the worlde must humble it selfe vnder it. Thus then ye see in effect what is shewed vs heere. And had this doctrine beeene well hilde and praelized, wee shoulde not at this day haue such disputings as reigne in this worlde, in what wyse men may bee iustifyed and fauored before God. VVhy so? For they that stablish any deseruings to purchase fauour in Gods sight, and too make men beleue that they maye fauor themselues by their owne power, knowe not the Maiestie that is spoken of heere, but brabble aboute fonde trifles. For if the eace stooode vpon dealing with men: there woulde not be so muche boldenesse as we see vsed in debating what the meane is whereby wee might stande before God. To bee short, men haue beeene so besotted, as they wist not what iustice, or judgement, or any thing else is, when it came too debating after what maner God loueth vs, and is mercifull towrdes vs, and after what sorte wee might present oure selues before his Maiestie too finde fauour at hys hande. And therefore so muche the more standeth it vs in hande too marke well this doctrine, when it is sayde, Should not men ansvere a man of mucke talke & or shall a babbler preuayle? Heere wee see howe mens talkatiuenesse is dashed, yea though they like well of themselues, and haue store of their vaine and fonde Rhetorike. For beholde what beguileth them: namely that they can iustifie themselues before men and beare the countenance of Angelles, whereas there is nothing but want and filthinesse in them. True it is, that they may haue some apparant reasons that men shall like well of: for in verie deede, according too mans reason, when it is demaunded what righteousnesse is: it will bee answered, that a man muste liue vnblameably, hee muste discharge his duetie, hee muste doo euerie man right. Yee see then what righteousnesse is. If it bee sayde that a man is righteous before God though hee bee a wretched sinner, and that his sinnes are forgiuen hym: beholde that is a straunge thing and suche as cannot sinke in mans fleshly vnderstanding. Howe so? Too say that I am accepted for righteous, and yet that the same righteousnesse is all the whyle out of mee: that I muste bee fayne too borrowe it of another: and that although God knowe mee too bee a wretched and damned creature, yet notwithstanding hee will fauor mee: To what purpose is it? Therefore when the Sophisters and Hypocrites stablishe mens merites, and beare them in hand that wee bee able too winne Paradise by oure owne power: it hath somewhat a fayre colour, and is easily receyued by the moste part of the worlde. And heere ye see what causeth them to harden & ranckle so muche the more. For too their seeming, in asmuche as men take their sayings in woorth, and accept them for good, God also ought too holde himselfe contented wyth them. But wee shall not further our eace therby: and although that for a time God suffer vs too tell many a fayre tale, insomuche that it seemeth that wee haue ouercome all: yet in the ende all must be fayne to come downe againe. For when God appeareth in his seate, then must all these disputings bee fayne too ceasse, wherein men foade and vaunte themselues somuche nowe adayes. VVhat muste wee then doo? VVhen wee debate after what sorte men maye stande before God: wee must not alledge lykely reasons, and suche as the worlde receyuet: but every of vs must enter intoo himselfe, and into his owne conscience. That is the poynct whereat we must beginne. This will bee yet better vnderstoode, if we lay foorth the matters in some familiar order. I haue tolde you alreadie that when men come too debating, in what wise we become righteous: by and by, according to mans reason, it will be sayd, that we must liue righteouslly. True it is that (to speake properly) righteousnesse is when mens lyues are well ruled, so as there is no fault to bee founde in them, and that they performe Gods law and all that hee commaundeth them too the vttermost. Yea, but (as shall bee more fully declared) wee muste proceede further too haue another righteousnesse, because wee come short of this. But in the meane while, when menne perceyue that it behoueth them too perfourme theyr duetie, and too walke after God and hys woerde: they fall too imagining thus wyth themselues: VVell then, it standes mee on hande too fulfill Goddes lawe: And they are of opinion that they shall bring it about. And notwithstanding that they be vnable to stirre one finger: yet it is a wonder to see how they beare themselues in hande that they be able to carie great mountaynes vpon their shoulders, when as they be not able to lift so much as one straw. Neuerthelesse they be so full of fonde ouerweening, as they strayne themselues to perfourme Gods lawe by their owne free will. Verie well, in the ende they must bee fayne to perceyue their weakenesse by their owne experiance. True it is, that for a tyme they puffe 10 ute their blastes: yea, and there is another vice, namely that men surmize themselues well able too make themselues rightuous without fulfilling of Gods lawe. As howe? By their foolish deuotions, as wee fee that in the papacie when men are desyrous too become holy and rightuous, there is no mention of framing their life too the commaundements of God. VVhat then? Every man takes vp a toy of some good deuotion in his owne heade, then shall Ceremonies, and then shall Superstitions reigne vnder the name of Gods service. So they heare Masses every day, so they mumble much, so they fast often, so they doo this and that: the poore hypocrites beare themselues in hande that they haue well quite themselues before God, yea and they take him to be bounde vntoo them for it. And heerein they sleepe for a tyme: And if a man tell them it is but lost labour, they are feare vpon him, and it spyteth them, [saying:] Howe so? Can so goodly a thing be vnprofitable? Or can God be vnrightuous? Then must hee needes accept the service that I offer vnto him with such payne and carefulness. Lo howe the Idolaters pleade agaynst God: and it seemeth to them that he doth them great wrong, if he doo not accept and take in good woorth all their pelting trash wherewith they beguile themselues. Lo what a dozenesse reigneth in mens braynes for the tyme: but yet (as I sayde earst) in the ende they muste bee fayne too graunt that all this is nothing. And when God presfleth them and putteth them to tryall, then they shall bee faine to acknowledge, Alas it is to little purpose to haue heaped vp so manie Ceremonies after that sort: and (whiche more is) when I haue done all that I can, yet dooth mine owne conscience reproue me, that if I haue serued God well in any one poynt, I haue missed in manie others. Men then beeing reprooued by theyr owne consciences, doo therewpon seeke for remedie, saying: VWell I see that if God shoulde enter into accounte with mee, I shoulde bee verie sore indaungered vntoo him. Howe shall wee doo then? VVec-fall too finding out of Satisfactions: lyke as in the Pa-pacie euerie of them will confess that no man living is able to fulfill Gods lawe, and yet in the meane while they ceasse not to sleepe still, because these wretched Hi-pocrites beare themselues in hande that they are able too make God amedes by bringing him some b; payment. True it is (say they) that in this behalfe I haue done amisse, but God will bee contented with mee when I shall haue made him amedes after such a sort, or such a fort. And heere yee see wherevpon grewe the inuention of all their woorkes of ouerplus or supererogation as they terme them, that is too say, the woorkes which they yelded vntoo God ouer and besydes his due.

VWhen men doo so, they thinke not that euer they must come to account before such a judge, but that they may easily say, VVhat? VVe do all that wee can: for wherefore take wee suche paynes but too serue God? And shall wee thinke that all this geere shall bee rejected at his hande, and that hee will make no reckoning of it?
Moreouer althoughe wee bee weake and that there bee faultes and imperfections in vs: yet if wee labour too make amedes for our sinnes, God must needs haue regarde vntoo that. After suche sort will men prate, supposing themselues too bee throughly well discharged.

And (as I sayde afore) they conceyue rancour and hart-burning agaynst all warnings. Nowe wee see what the holy Ghost condemneth heere: that is to wit, that men doo so flatter themselues and rocke themselues asleepe in their vaine imaginations, as it seemeth too them that they haue gotten the goale when men like well of their dooings. But all this is nothing. For when wee come before the heauenly throne, none of these pedling tryfles shall take any place. VWhat muste bee done then?
VWee muste knowe, yea and wee muste firmly beleue, that all the rightuousnesse of the worlde is but abho-mination, and that God maye reject it as filthinesse: and so in verie deede, although hee haue graunted vs the grace too labour vntoo goodness: yet are wee not as yet come vntoo it. For althoughe wee trauell thither-warde, yet is it with such feblenesse, as wee bee ouer-muche too bee condemned. And wee muste call too mynde howe it hath beene declared hecretofore, that if wee bring but one poynt for our selues, God will haue a thousande too confounde vs with. Yee see then what wee haue too marke in this streyne. Yee see also why I sayde that the matter standeth not vpon babbling, nor vpon the alleaging of some reason that maye carie a fayre colour before men: but in especially that euerye of vs enter intoo himselfe, and examine oure owne life howe wee bee cyted before God: and then will all babbling ceasse, and every man will thinke more neerely vpon himselfe, knowing that wee haue none other meane too bee quit before God, but by condemning our selues and by being vtterly abashed. But for the better vnderstanding of this matter, let vs nowe come too that which he addeth: Thou hast sayd my dealing is iust and rightfull, and I am sounde in thy presence. Heere Zophar sheweth what the babbling is which hee condemmeth. Verely (as I haue warned you afore) hee misapplyeth this matter too the person of Job, and hee doth him great wrong by accusing him vniustly: neuerthelesse the doctrine in it selfe is good, holy, and profitable. Let vs marke then that all suche as minde too iustifie themselues and to bee seen without blame, haue nothing but vaine babbling, no though they be taken for wise folke too the worldewarde. And it is a poynt that wee ought too marke well. For if men come not too the applying of it, it will bee too small purpos to say, well, there muste bee no babbling when men come too treate of Gods secretes, and of his worde: it is too holy a thing for men to dale with at their p'leasure, they must go too it with all sober-nesse and reuerence. Verely this may be a good warning.
But Zophar sayth heere precisely, that all such as minde to aduaunce the power of men, and too perswade that there is nothing in them but rightuousnesse before God, are no better but babblers, how fayre a shew souer they make. And therefore let vs learne that there is no doctrine so well settled and grounded, as to be able to stande before god, saue only that which viterly defaceth men, & sheweth how they haue not any thing whereof they may make their boast, & (to be shor) which cōfoundeth the in such sort, as they haue none other refuge but only to the meere goodness & mercy of God. Herewithal we haue heere two articles to marke. The one is, that whenoeuer we talk of the holy scripture or of any thing that perteyneth too religion, wee must learne too speake soberly, and not let oure toungs runne vpon partis too dispute thereof at pleasure. I say, let vs keepe our selues from such vnaudisednesse: for we see that this vice hath bene gl

the cause that Gods truth hath bene vtterly peruerted and turned into a lye. And for prooфе hereof, what els is the Popish Diuinitie than a heathenish fashion of vtter scoffing and rayling at all the Secretes of God? For in poperie it is lawfull for men to babble as if they were tolising of some tennisball. And in good sooth the Papistes say very true when they vse this bywoorde, That the holy Scripture is too them as a noze of waxe. Lo hove they blasphemē God, and are not ashamed too set it downe in their bookeſ. Yea and when they meane to proue that men ſhould not holde themſelues to the holy Scripture, and that we haue no assurance of our beliefē by Gods word, but that we ought to receyue that which is decreed by men, Seeſ (say they) is not the holy Scripture a noze of waxe? True it is that in respect of themſelues they haue made it a noze of waxe, by turning and wreſtſing it foreward and backwärde to make a playne mōkerie of God & his truthe. And how is this come to paſſe, but because they haue not knowne, that Gods vttering of his wil vnto vs, is to the intent that euery of vs ſhould enter into hiſelf and examine wel our owne conſciences, and apply to our owne vſe & iuſtruction all that is conteyned in the holy Scripture, affiuring our ſelues that God ment not to feede our curiositie, nor to tickle our eares, but to edifie our ſoules, yea and that as might bee moſt for our behoofe. So let vs beare in mind this article, that is to wit, that when we ſpeake of God, we muſt do it with al reverence and feare. But in especially let vs come to that whiche is ſpoken here: namely that whosoeuer will magnifie men to acquire them and to iuſtifie them before God, is but a babbler, no though he can alledge neuer ſo fayre reaſons. Let vs marke then that all ſuch as are puffed vp with presumption to allow of mens merites, were neuer yet throughly wakened to know what God is, and howe much wee be indetted to his iudgement. And why ſo? For whosoeuer ſhall once haue examined his owne conſcience well, muſte needes haue his mouth ſtopt, and he cannot but knowe that al mankinde is out of order, and that wee haue nothing but cursedneſſe in vs. And herevpon wee may boldly ſay, that all the teachers in the papacie are vtterly besotted, and become ſcorners of God and despzyzers of his rightuousneſſe. And why? VVee ſee how they be bolde to aduaunce Freewill, too magnifie the strength of men, and too make vs beleeve that wee bee able too deserue this and that: ſo as if wee haue committed any ſinnes, yet may wee well purſue our ſelues forgiuenesse of them by our owne good woorkes. For alſmuch as they talke ſo, there needeth no more but the ſaying that is ſet heere, to ſhewe that they bee despzyzers of God, and bauling cures, that neuer had ſo much as one remorse or ſcruple of conſcience, but are vtterly blinded by the Diuell. And why ſo? For had they any feeling or incling of Gods iudgement, certainly they would not babble ſo too aduaunce their owne merites, whiche are but pelting trash. But on our ſide, lette vs leарne too go to a better ſchoole, if wee intende too ſtande vp before God. And why? For (as it is ſayde heere in the ende) wee ſhall haue ſuſhē as ſhall ſerue too ouerwhelme vs vtterly. If in theſe dayes wee ſharpen our beake too vaunt our ſelues of our owne rightuousneſſe, and be puffed vp with this vayne opinion (or rather outrage) that wee bee well able to ſtande afore God: in the ende he muſte bee fayne too anſwere vs, yea he muſt be fayne too anſwere vs after ſuſhē a ſorte, as wee ſhall be confounded therewith, according as it is ſayde heere, ſhall a babbling perſone preuayle? VVee may perchaunce weene it: but wee ſhall bee beguyled. And why? For

(as I haue declared afore) he that will make himſelte rightuous in Gods ſighte, is but a vayne babbler: that is to ſay, he bewrayeth that hee was neuer touched too the quicke, that his conſcience is ſtill a ſleepe, that hee knoweth not what it is eyther too doo well, or too liue well, that he taketh holde of the shadow in ſteade of the bodie, and finally that he hath not conſidered that God muſte be his iudge. And thus yee ſee what cauſeth men too recken ſo without their hoſt, as it is ſayd in the Prouerbe. But nowe lette vs come too that which Zophar addeth. Yea I would fayne (ſayeth he) that God would ſpeakē againſt thee, and that wee woulde open his mouth. Beholde howe menne are reproued to their conuſion: that is too witte, when God openeth his mouth. So long: as wee reaſon but with men, well, euery one of vs may thiſke his owne halfpenie too bee good ſiluer: but as ſoone as God openeth his mouth, wee haue nothing to reſplic. All that (ſay I) which wee beleeue to bee as ſubſtantiall ſtuffe as any can bee, muſte needes go too the grounde, and washe away, and all our reaſons ſhall bee but froath. There may be great bubbling and boyſling, but yet doth it washe and vaniſh away by and by. Therfore lette vs wey well this ſentence, that God muſte bee fayne to ſpeakē, to put men to ſilence, and to make men vtterly tungtide in this behalfe, namely that they may not presume any more too alledge aught of their owne fanatiſies. And after what forte ſhall God ſpeakē? He hath already ſpoken ynough in his holy Scripture to humble vs withall. For there wee ſee how all men are condemned, and cursed in Adam, (marke that for a ſpecial point) and therevpon that it behoueth every one of vs peculiarily in hiſelf to yeelde hiſelfe tootoo biameworthie, ſeing that God ſheweth vs that our ſinnes are ſo horrible, as wee cannot miſlike ynough of them, and that althoſgh a man be greeued in hiſelf, and lothe hiſ own life: yet knoweth he not the hundred parte of the cuill: that is in him. God telleteth vs this: And wee ſee how S. Paule putteth all men vnder shame, ſo as when we reade Rom. 3. 6. . . that teſtē of hiſ, our heare ought too ſtande vp vpon our headeſ, to ſee how wee be condemned there too all naughtineſſe, and that although euery one of vs bee not guiltie alike in fact, yet al of vs haue the ſeede thereof within vs. Yee ſee then how God hath giuen ſentence of diuination vpon al men. And this ought to be ynough to make vs ſhuinke downe our headeſ, and too make vs vtterly tungtide as I ſayde afore. But what? men are ſo ſtately, as they cannot ſtoupe, though the Scripture conſoude them, according as wee ſee, that notwithstanding this, men thiſke ſtill to iuſtifie themſelues before God. And that is the greatest diſference that is betwixt vs and the Papisteſ: namely that if it bee demauded what is the meane of our ſaluation, the Papisteſ will haue nothing but their owne freewill, merites, and ſatisfactions: and on the other ſide wee ſay, that man being vtterly voyde of al rightuousneſſe, and hauing not aught in hiſelfe but cursedneſſe: muſt flee for ſuccour too the onely mercie of God, and ſecke that thing in our Lord Iefus Christ, which is not in our owne perſoneſ. VVee ſee then that all the things conteyned in the holy Scripture concerning our ſinnes and the humbling of vs before God, are not able to ouermayſter vs, nor to take away this pride and preuuptuousneſſe of our fleſh. And therfore God muſt be fayne to ſpeakē after another fashion: that is to wit, he muſt make vs feele that by expeſience which is conteyned in the holy Scripture, to the ende we may knowe howe it is vnto vs that he telleteth hiſ tale: and ſpecially that he take from vs the towell of Hypocracie which keepeth our eye faste ſhet and clozed vp:

For when wee reade in the holy Scripture, that there is net one which seeketh God, but all are giuen too euill, and all are filthie and infected with their sinnes and corruptions: and therewithall that there is nothing else in men but vanitie, that al their wisdome is but foolishnesse, and that al their thoughts and affections are but wickednesse and enmity agaynst God and all righteousness: when we heare this: (we say in our selues,) Tush, this is spoken of the wicked, I am none of that number, euerie man exempteth himselfe. Furthermore, wee surmyze to that wee haue I wote not what goodness in vs: and if there bee but one poore drop, we stretch it out farre and wyde, so as we beare our selues in hande that we be able too content God throughly. And therefore must God come take away the sayde towell: that is too witte, that wee may not imagyne or surmize our selues to haue any abiitie, but assure our selues, that all the curses whiche are conteyned in the Scripture, doo agree and pertaine vntoo vs, and must needs wound vs as mortall plagues, that wee may knowe our confusion. Thus ye see what 20 wee haue too marke in this strayne. So then whensoever wee desire too knowe what righteousness is, that is too say, howe wee become righteous, and howe wee maye obteyne fauour in Gods sight: wee must consider well that the eace standeth not vpon seeking that which shall seeme good before men, or which may bee allowed by mans reason, or by all that euer may bee alledged before creatures. VVhat then? Let vs heare God speake: that is to say, let vs receyue the holy scripture, and let euery of vs submit himselfe therenvnto: let 30 God speake, and let vs holde our peace without making of our accustomed replies. Furthermore forasmuch as there is the sayde Hipocrisie in vs whereof it behoueth vs too bee clenzed: let vs consider also that Gods iudgement must bee dreadfull too vs, and that wee muste bee astonished at it. And therefore let vs beseech him that when hee hath spoken terribly vnto vs, hee will comfort vs therewpon, that wee may take some taste of his goodnessse. VVhen we once know this: it is certayne that we shal not make much disputing about the sayd article, 40 nor bee curious in serching after what sort men may become righteous. For firt of ailit behoueth vs to vnderstande, that there is nothing but alleuill in vs, and wee heare howe it is sayde, that euen hee that dareth vaunt himselfe most, shall finde nothing but cysenesse in him, from the crowne of his heade to the soale of his foote. Againe, though God should find vs throughly well dispozed too walke in his feare: yet what is that too the purpose? VVee shall bee always vperfект neuerthelesse. But the mischeefe is, that whatsoeuer God sayeth in his woerde, yet wee continue always still at one poynt, wee haue oure eyes still shette: and it seemeth too vs that howesoeuer the worlde go, there is awayes somewhat in vs, and that wee may warrant oure selues by our owne workes. God therefore muste bee fayne too set himselfe in this eace before our eyes, and to shew vs that there is nothing in vs whereof wee may be proude. Howe shall men do then when they bee so confounded? It is certayne that they are never a whitte hindered thereby to runne vnto our Lorde Iesus Christ. But if we be puffed vp with pride, wee shall haue no lust to do so: it will be with vs as when ones stomacke is full of winde, whereby it is so weakened as it cannot receyue any thing. Contrariwyse if wee be cleare from all presumptuousnesse, wee will be a hungred, and wee will desire nothing so much as that God should remedie our diseases. So then, all they that haue hearkened vnto God with a good will, (that is to say, which haue first sought that which is shewed vs in the holy Scripture, and afterward labored to applie the same to their owne instructiō, assuring themselves that it is vnto them that those holy wrytings speake:) all such(say I) do easily consent to this doctrine, namely that we haue no righteousnesse in our selues, sauing that is giuen vs by the grace of our Lorde Iesus Christ: and that although God finde vs cursed, forlorne, and damned sinners, yet he redeemeth vs out of the sayde confuzion, whereof the raunsome was payd when Iesus Christ sheaded his blod for our redemption and saluation: and that nowe henceforth forasmuch as the obedience which Iesus Christ hath yeelded to God his father, is set ouer vnto vs, it is all one as if wee our selues had fulfilled the whole lawe. Thus ye see how wee may doo our selues good by this lesson. To bee short, a man shall neuer knowe what is ment by beeing iustified by sayth, vntill he haue heard God speake, yea and that his hearing of him hath made him too humble himselfe and to bereue himselfe of the sayde foolish haughtiness, wherethrough men take so much vpon them, and wherwith they are so besotted. Lo what Zophar ment by saying, O that God would speake and open his lippes against thee. And he sayth exprefly, that God openeth his lips. Indeed it is an Hebrew maner of speaking, and it importeth a vehemensie of speach, like as when a man treateth earnestly of a matter, so as hee not onely speaketh a worde or twaine at a glaunce, but layeth it forth at large, so as he maketh a full conclusion of it. But I haue tolde you that this must bee throughly well weyed because we see howe men hearken vnto God but by halues. True it is that peraduenture we shall well heare every worde: but what for that? That is no matter of great weight so long as we holde not all that God sheweth vnto vs too serile our selues throughly in all that he sayth to vs. Therefore it is not ynough for vs to haue yeelded the one eare vntoo God, and to haue heard euerie woerde that hee shall speake vntoo vs: but wee must bee heedfull to follow all that he sayth throughly in all poyntes. Then if hee shall haue once opened his lippes to condemne vs, we wil be no more giuen to babbling: that is to say, we will bee no more so presumptuous and ouerhardie, as to bragge of our owne righteousness: for wee shall bee vtterly ashamed of our selues. It is sayde afterwarde, That God will reueale the secretes of wisedome. Verely in saying so, hee sheweth that Job might well haue beene punished double: that is to say, that hee might haue had twice as much iustice executed vpon him, and God might haue forgotten him for his iniquities sake, or else might haue scolded him, for the Hebrew worde signifieth to Exalt, and some tymes also too requyre an account, and such other lyke. And therefore a man might expounde it, that God was able to charge him with such things as hee shoulde perceyue himselfe to be double in his daunger: and al commeth to one ende. But firt of all, whereas it is sayde that God will reueale a wisedome, that Job wist not of before: it is to shewe vs, that the knowledge which we haue of our sinnes, & of the inestimable goodnessse of our god, passeth al our capacitie, & is a wisdom that can neuer be attayned vnto by mans reason, but must come to vs fro aboue out of heauen. I haue warned you alreadie, that this geere is misapplied vnto Job: & indeed he knew welynough that men muste not measure Gods righteousness by their owne wit. Job hath well opened that poynt himself, and (as I haue shewed) he had a good eace, howbee it that hee handled it amisse. But the lyne that wee must go by, is this:namely to take this preset doctrine generally, that we may be profited by it. Behold then a speciall poynt:which is, that the things whiche the scripture tellet vs of the righturighteousnesse by fayif, are a higher secret than men can attaine vnto. VVhat is to be done then? God must reueale it vnto vs. And that is the cause why the Papists cannot assent heerevntoo. For they hold themselues continually to their owne imaginations. They know what is rightuousnesse after the maner of the heathen Philosophers. For if a man aske an heathen Philosopher what rightuousnesse is: It is a life wel ruled in al vertuousnesse, will he answe. And euen so also do the Popish diuinies reason of it. VVe say that the same is true in it selfe: but wee must steppe yet further: that is too wit, to another rightuousnese which is not in men, and wherof there is not one drop to be foud there. Then must they be fayne to haue an other rightuousnesse, which is, that hauing condemned vs in our owne persons, should take vs too mercie for oure Lorde Iesu Christes sake: that by his meane we may be acceptable and holy to him, forasmuch as the obedience which Iesu Christ yeelded vnto him, is set ouer vnto vs. But (as I saide) this geere entreteth not into mans brayne. And heere ye see why they that take themselves too bee most wittie, put their trust in their owne strength, because they purpose to comprehend it by mans reason. But what? Let vs not thinke it straunge, seeing it is sayde that it belongeth onely vnto God to reueale his owne wisedome. As if it were sayde, True it is that so long as men tye themselues to the i[n]aginations of their owne witte, and will needes iudge after theyr owne lyking, they shall never understande what it is: too bee rightuous before Ged, they shall doo nothing but babble: and when they haue set neuer so many fayre colours vpon the matter: all of it shall bee but smoke. And why so? Because that too knowe after what sort wee become rightuous before God, is an inestimable wisedom, and hidden from mans reason, vntill such tyme as God haue spoken vnto vs, and disclozeth too vs what is oure confusion, and vntill he haue made vs perceyue that we be not able too stande before him, but are vtterly cast away as cursed creatures, and that there is none other meane for vs to haue accesse vnto him, but only by comming vnto him in the name of our Lorde Iesu Christ his onely sonne. Then till such tyme as God haue shewed vs this, wee shall awaies be giuen to babbling: that is too say, wee shall bee giuen to this sondrie presumptuousnesse wherewith we be moued and tempted. And therefore God must bee fayne to reueale vntoo vs the wisedome which we are not acquainted with, to the ende wee passe not our boundes and the things that we ought to know. Ye see in effect what is touched heere. Let vs learne then as oft as we be tempted with the sayde ouerweening, that our owne vertues ought to beare iorne sway, and that we may well satisfie God by oure owne deseruings: let vs learne (I say) to returne too that which is spoken heere, namely, that it belongeth onely vnto God to disclose his owne secrete vnto vs, and to teach vs his wisedome. And so farre are wee off from beeing able too attayne to such knowledge through our owne power, that wee flit it as much as is possible and blindfolde our owne eyes, to the intent wee might put away all perceyuerance and feeling of Gods iudgement from vs. So muche the more therefore behoueth it vs too marke well the rigour that Zophar speaketh of heere in the name of God, as a messenger or Herault sent by him, too summon vs to his iudgement seate, that wee may knowe what maner of rigour the same is, that is too witte, that it is intollerable whensouer God listeth to vse it towards vs. VVhat must we do then? VVe must learne to know what we be, and to humble our selues, that wee may returne to our God with hartie repentance, who defyeth nothing but that we shold come to him in the name of our Lorde Iesu Christ. Then let vs go to him mourning for our sinnes, and so wounded with the inward conceyt of his iudgements, as we may desire nothing but that he shoulde take vs too mercie, and receyue vs vntoo him, not onely too forgiue vs our sinnes past, but also to amend in such wise for the time to come, as we may walke in his obedience: howbeit that the same walking must not bee to the ende to pay him with our merites and workes, but to make vs returne into his fauoure, and too beseech him too govern vs in such wyse by his h[oly] spirite, as we may continually call vpon him and sue too him as too oure Father.

And nowe let vs cast our selues downe before the presence of our good God and father, with acknowledgement of our sinnes: praying him that his making of vs too feele them, may bee too amende vs in such wise, as wee may not desire any thing so muche as too come neerer and neerer vnto him, vntill we bee come thither in ful perfection. And so let vs all say, Almighie God and our heauenly father we knowledge and confesse in our selues, that we are not, &c.

The xlij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the. xj. Chapter.

7. Shalt thou finde God in seeking him? Shalt thou finde the full perfection of the almighty?
8. It surmounteth the height of the heauens, vvhat vvilt thou doo? It is deeper than the bottomlesse depthes, hovve vvilt thou comprehendē it?
9. The vvydencesse of it is broder than the Earth, and the largenesse of it is greater than the Sea.
10. VVhen he moueth himselfe to shet vp or to leaue out, vvhō shall let him?
11. And seeing hee knoweith that men are vaine, and seeth that they bee of no force shall he not perceyue?
12. That an emptie man is indued vvith hart, and a man is borne like a vvilde Asse?

Orasmuche as it is no easie matter for vs too conceyue howe too humble our selues: therfore ye see how God standeth the more vpon this doctrine, to the ende wee may haue so much the more occasion to put the same in vre. Yesterday we sawe that if God punish vs, wee must not replie agaynst him: for in the ende we shall finde that hee hath borne

60 with vs alreadie, and that hee might of right vse greater rigour towradess vs. And if he heare vs not, it is because our sinnes haue separated him from vs, and wee are unwoorthie too bee heard, but are forgotten at his hande by reason of oure sinnes, according as it is sayde Psa. 18. f. 42 that the wicked shall gayne nothing when they thinke too haue their recourse vntoo him, as in verie deede they go not to him vnfaynedly. And as for the good if God heare them, it is not oute of hande, or at least-

wise he suffereth them not too perceyue it, because it is good that they shoulde be meekened. After the setting forth of this article, that it is not lawfull for men to iustifie themselues before God: now in generall it is sayd, that we labour in vain if we go about to seeke out his wisedome. VVhy so? For it ouerreacheth the Heauens, it is deeper than the bottomlesse pittes, and the wydeneſſe of it stretcheth through all. Let vs haue an eye too our owne meaſure. Beholde howe man who woulde ouerreache the whole earth, needeth no more than ſixte foote to cover him. Man is defyrous too incloſe the whole ſea in his imagination: and in the meane while hee himſelfe is nothing. Hee woulde fayne ſurmount the heauens: and howe ſhall he come thither? Hee woulde gage the bottome of the dcpthes: and what meenes hath hee to doo it withall? Neuertheleſſe let vs put the caſe that mans mynde were able too ſtyle aboue the heauens, and that nothing coulde bee hidden from it: yet ſhould wee come ſhort of Gods wifedome, because it is infinite: It cannot bee compared eyther with the deepes or wyth the heauens: for it farre outpaffeth them all. And therefore let vs affiſe our ſelues that our presumption is fooliſhe when wee go aboue to knowe the reaſon of Gods doings. Thus yee ſee in effect what is ſhewed too vs heere. VVhcrefore let vs marke, that this woerde Vifedome, is taken heere for Gods purpose, determination, or intent, which wee bee not able to comprehend. True it is that wee may well taste ſome little portion of Gods wifedome, like as when wee beholde his creatures, there he ſheweth himſelfe vntoo vs, howebeit but part- 30 ly. Let vs no more but take a braunche of ſome herbe, and wee ſhall ſee after what ſort and with what cunning God hath wrought there: The ſame is a verie looking-glaſſe of his wifedome. Then is it much more reaſon, that when wee come too his greater and choicer workeſ, we ſhould there perceyue that Gods wifedome is a wonderfull thing, if we haue any taste at all of it. But by the way, the perfectneſſe thereof is ſpoken of heere: that is to wit, that if we will neeſes knowe why God doth all things, or if a man be defyrous to ſee what end God ſetteth afore himſelfe, and what cauſe moueth him thereto: wee muſt neeſes bee vtterly conſounded. But heere first of all we bee admoniſhed of the rawneſſe of our wit and vnderſtanding, to the intent wee paſſe not oure boundes, nor play not the horſes that are broken looce, as wee ſee that the ouerweening and prude of oure nature driueth vs therenvntoo. But heereby wee haue alſo too conſider the goodneſſe of oure God, who applyeth himſelfe vntoo vs, and to our feebleneſſe, that wee at leaſtwyſe taste of that whiche is incompreheſi- 50 ble vntoo vs: and althoſ we conceyue it not throughly, ne taste it fully: yet hee ſheweth it to vs, and makeſ vs to feele it ſo farre forth as is for our proſite. Thus ſee you twoo articles which are well woorthie to be marked. As touching the firſt, I haue tolde you howe it behoueth men to conſider how rawe and how weake of vnderſtanding they bee, that they preſume not to thrust themſelues too farre forwarde too make inquifition of Gods workeſ, more than hee willett them and giueth them leaue to do, I ſay more tha he willett the, & giueth them leaue to do. For (as I haue touched alreadie) God of his goodneſſe doth not vtterly barre vs fro hauiing any perceyuerance at all of his wifedome: but it behoueth vs to keepe meaſure. Then let vs be well aduized that euerie of vs haue an eye to his owne habilitie and too marke howe ſuttle and ſharpe witted wee bee, and howe great- ly giuen too this ouerboldenesſe wherevnto oure owne nature eggeth vs continually. How is that? VVe woulde alwayes bring God to account of all his doings. VVhen wee meeete with any ſtrouge thing, and men ſay vntoo vs, ſuch is Gods good pleaſure, because he hath ordeyned ſo: and therefore we muſt not pleade agaynst him: yea ſay wee? But why dooth he not otherwyſe? Forsuſe an inconuenience will infue heerepon, and the matters may drawe quite and cleane awke from that which might bee for our proſite. Thus we ſee howe that at every push we woulde fayne haue God to yeeld vs a reaſon why he dooth thiſ or that. Moreouer althouſe wee haue not any thing too alledge: yet woulde wee that God ſhould not conceale any thing from vs, but that wee myght enter into the greateſt ſecretes that hee hath. And wee ſee howe ſore our hartes are tickled in this reſpect. True it is that ſome bee more ſharper ſet than oþerſome be, but yet it is a common vice wherewith we be all of vs infected from the greateſt too the leaſt. Therefore let vs marke well howe it is tolde vs heere that Gods wifedome ouerreacheth the heauens, and is deeper than the dcpthes, and alſo that it is in vain for vs to deſire to comprehend it in our brayne. For that meaſure is farre too ſhort: inſomuche that if a man had a hundred tymes more underſtanding than hee hath, yet could hee not atteyne to the hundred part of Gods wifedome. Seing then that wee bee nothing, and Gods wifedome is a bottomlesſe depth: haue we not ſo much the more cauſe to hold our ſelues ſhort, and not to followe our owne fanciies in ſeeking more than God giueth vs leaue to do? Then let it come to our remembrance to ſay, whither goest thou thou poore creature? thou entreft into a bottomlesſe pit, wheroutof thou canſt neuer escape. This is the warning that we haue to follow in this ſentence. But by the way let vs alſo bear in minde that which hath ben declared concerning the fauour that God ſheweth vs in applying himſelf to vs, and in ſhewing vs his workeſ, ſo farre forth as it is for our behoofe and proſite to knowe why he doeth thiſ or that. And Gods applying of himſelfe after that ſort vntoo vs, is not bicause he his bounde to vs: (for what bonde can there bee? or howe can wee chalenge him to do it?) But in ſo doyng hee ſheweth howe greatly hee loueth vs, ſeeing hee commeth neere vntoo vs ſo familiarly. VVe heere howe oure Lorde Iefus Christ Iohn.15c.15 ſayeth too his Disciples, I will no more call you my ſervants, ye bee my freendes by reaſon of the ſecretes that I haue ſhewed you: for I haue familiarly tolde you all that I had in commission from my father. And ſo ſeeing that God commeth ſo familiarly vntoo vs: wee haue a great and ſinguler recorde of his loue. Therefore let vs learne to inquire of Gods workeſ no further than hee himſelfe leadeth and ruleth vs ſo to doo. And this is well worth the marking: for we ſee men incline continually too ſome extremitie. I tolde you alreadie that there is ſuſe a pride in mans heart, as hee woulde fayne knowe all things, ſo as nothing might ſcape him: and that every one of vs is giuen to that vice. VWell then, God ſheweth vs that wee muſt not bee too wyſe, and that wee muſt with soberneſſe [content our ſelues] to know that which he diſclozeth vntoo vs. Now hope we to keepe our ſelues from that vice, and therwithall enter into the coſtrarie extremitie, ſaying: then muſt we ſhet our eyes & inquire of nothing. Nay: there is great diſference betwixt a meaňneſſe and nothing at all. For God hath not made vs after his owne Image too haue it ſayde, that we ſhould become brute beaſtes by his coſtent, & that we ſhould haue ſo little regarde of the light that he ſheweth vs, as it ſhould be quite quenched in vs: but let vs learne to know ſo much as it pleafeth him to teach vs. If God be our ſchoolemāſter and we giue eare to his ſpeech, he is able able to giue vs wisedome and discretion to comprehend his learning, and wee cannot do amisse in it. But if our Lord shet his mouth, we also must shet vp our wittes and holde them in prison, that wee take not libertie to say, I would know this, or I would know that. For God will not haue vs to know more than he hath shewed vs. Seing then that these two vyses reigne in the world: it standeth vs so much the more in hand to marke what I haue sayd: that is to wit, that we shoulde vse the grace and priuylidge which God giueth vs when he sheweth vs that which is for our profit to know. Some will vse the common Proverbe, That Gods secretes are not to be searched. True it is that they are not to be searched, sauing so farre forth as he maketh vs priuie to them, and then are they no more secretes.

As how? Ye see howe S.Paule calleth the Gospell a wonderfull secrete which hath bene hidden in God, yea in somuch as the Angels haue bene rauished and amazed at it, and highly honored it. And yet neuerthelesse the same is an easie doctrine to vs. For there God vttereth his wil vnto vs, yea and (as ye would say) so forecheaweth our foode, as there is nothing for vs to doo but to swallow it downe: he boweth vnto our rudenesse, & sheweth himselfe exceeding homely. VVe see then that the Gospell is in it selfe so high a wisedome, as wee [of ourselues] can neuer atteyne vnto it, seing that the Angels comprelinde it not: and yet notwithstanding it is such a doctrine as ought to be knowne vnto vs, yea euen to the rude and vnlearned sort, (according as Saint Paule sayeth in another place) that is to wit, for somuch as God hath there applied himselfe vnto vs. But there are other secretes which are hid from vs, and wherevnto God giueth vs no leaue to atteine as yet. True it is that at the last day, we shall know all things: but as now wee muste be thinke vs of that which S.Paule sayeth, that is to wit, that we know now in part yea and darkely: so as God giueth vs some foretaste of that which shall be reuealed perfectly vnto vs when we be fully transformed into his image and glorie. So long therfore as we be clothed with mortall flesh, let vs acknowledge our owne small capacitie, and content our selues with what soever it pleaseth God to giue and disclose vnto vs. There are then some secretes of God, which he will keepe priuie from vs during this mortall life, like as we cannot know what he hath determined to do with this man or with that. As for the faithfull, they haue a sufficient witnesse that God hath chosen and adopted them to be his children and to inherite saluation. But yet for all that, they cannot see the registers of heauen, to know whither they be written there or no. It is ynough for them that God hath giuen them a good copie of their election to looke vpon in our Lord Iesus Christ, insomuch that being his members they doubt not but God will auow them to be his children. Howbeit we know not who be the companie of the chosen: wee know not who be the castawayes as yet: wee know not wherefore God doth one thing or other: and if we discourse of Gods prouidence and of the things that we see through the whole worlde: wee shall be confounded in them. For that streyt and secrete ordinance of God is to high for vs to atteyne vnto. Yee see then that as concerning the secretes that are hid from vs, men muste learne to vse modestie in them. To be short our wisedome must be to herken vnto God, and to follow simply that which he sayeth without going any further. There are (say I) two things wherein the true wisedome of men consisteth: That is to say, To heare God speake, and without gaine-saying to follow whatsoeuer is conteyned in his woord, so as the same may haue authoritie to make vs feare God and too humble our selues vnder him. Lo here a good

meane to become wise. But like as it behoueth vs to obey God, and to follow that which he sheweth vs: so also must we not desire to know more than is contayned in his woord. For when me wil needs be wise against God, they become starke mad. VVe see what befel to our forefather Adā, yea euē in the time that he was most pure & soōd, being created after the image of God, when he was in far more excellent and noble state than men be now adayes: for the image of God is so darkned in vs, as there is no more light, nor almost aught els than darkenesse in vs. Adam could not content himselfe with that state, but was desirous to haue a higher perfeccion: and whereinto is he falne? Into so foule a sinke as we ought henceforth to be ashamed of our state. Now (I pray you) if we climbe still to the sayd highnesse wherwith Adam was tempted, and the wretchednesse whereinto we are falne or rather tumbled cannot meeken vs: must wee not be punished double? Therefore lette vs learne not to couet to knowe more than God sheweth vs, as I haue sayd alreadie. Yet notwithstanding let vs not cease to searche the secretes that are conteined in the holy Scripture, neither let vs do as the Papists do, who say that their forbearing to know aught, is bicause the doctrine of the holy Scripture cannot be throughly comprehended of all men, and bicause men are in great daunger to be intangled in many errors and heresies: and bicause they see how all the confusednesse of the world springeth of this, that men are caried away with a fonde desire of knowledge (as they terme it) and haue not the modestie to content themselues with an ouerwrapped faith of beleevung simply whatsoeuer is hilde by the holy Church. It seemeth at the first blushe that this hath some colour: and yet all is but cursed blasphemie against God. And why? for (as I haue sayd alreadie) although the doctrine that is in the Lawe and the Gospell be so high as our mindes are notable to reache vnto: yet hath not God published his Lawe in vain, neyther is it for naught that he hath comauanded his Gospell Marke. 16. to be preached to all creatures, yea euen to the ignorantest sorte, for he disclozeth himselfe there after so louing and gentle a fashion, as there is no man but he may be familiarly acquaynted with that which is shewed there. So then let vs not be vnrthankfull to our God, let vs not accuse him to haue spoken out of the bottom of a bottle. For he protesteth by his Prophet Esay, that he calleth vs Esay. 45. c. 19. not to him in vayne, and that he hath not spoken in huderudder: but that his voyce soundeth lowde & cleere, so as it ought to be heard of all men, and all of vs ought to receyue it. Then sith the case standeth so, let vs hardly studie Gods worde, let vs applie all our wittes therevnto, and our labour shall not be vnprofitable. And furthermore let vs vse the sayde sobernesse that I haue spoken of. And here ye may see why S. Paule meening to correct the foolish and rashe curiositie that is in men, sheweth them whereto they ought to apply themselues: that is to wit, to know throughly what the loue is which God hath shewed vs in our Lord Iesus Christ, so as wee neede to do nothing els all our life long, than to seeked diligently the sayd grace that is shewed vs in our Lord Iesus Christ, as how we be rescued from Satans tyrannie, and set free from the bondage of sinne and death: howe that whereas wee were vtterly damned by nature, and wretched and lothely sinners before God: wee be now become righteous before him, so as he receyuethe vs and liketh well of vs: How wee be gouerned by his holy spirit, to the ende wee should fight against the lustes of our owne flesh: and how we be preserued vnder his hande and protection, so that although the Liuell practice to ouerthrowe vs every minute of an hower, yet wee may Epb. 3. d. 18.

be able to druike him backe, because we be in the shewe-John. 6.d.37 folde and keeping of the good shewepherd Iesu Christ, 39. & 10.e. who hath promised that he will not suffer any of them to 28. 29. perish whom the father hath put into his hande. Therefore let vs get the knowledge of these things, and further also how we ought continually to preache vnto God, how it is lawfull for vs to call vpon him with open mouth, because he hath giuen vs a mediator who maketh vs way vnto him, and how that Iesu Christ beareth woorde for vs, so as God doth out of all doubt heare vs when wee pray to him in Christes name. If wee know these things well: then is our time well beloued. For this cause S.
 Paule addeth what is our height, our depth, and our bredth: and (to be short) he willeth men to beholde how they may bee pefectly wise: namely by knowing thoro-wyl the grace that is vterred and wrought vnto them in our Lord Iesu Christ: Herewithal let vs learme too know that wee must not indeuer to clymbe so high as to vnderstante what the wisedome of God is in it selfe. For it is a deepe gulf: and who is he that can attayne to it?
 Let vs be sure that all our strength wil be shorte of it.
 Therefore men must humble themselves. And so lette vs beare in minde what S. Paule sayeth to vs, namely that when we shall haue stedyd vp aloft above the heauens, we shall not attayne to know aught else than the fathery loue of our God, assyning our selues that therein wee shall haue the perfection of all wisedome, whiche shall stretch out it selfe high and deepe, farre and wide, and on all sides. In these wordes S. Paule taunteth these curious heads that are fisking here and there, desirous to stie vp aloft, and to sinke downe low beneath, & to search things ouer and ouer: and yet in the meane whyle there is nothing but vantie in them, and the nimbleness is there in them. S. Paule therefore checketh men for making their discourses so fardly, and therewithal sheweth them that if they were giuen to the holding of that whiche is for their profite, they would contynent themselves with that whiche is shewed them simply in the Scripture. And here yee see also why Moses after he had published the lawe, sayeth: Ask no more questiōns, saying, who is he that shall climbe into heaenen: who is he that shall go ouer the sea? who is he that shall go downe into the deepe? For ye haue the woorde in your mouth and in your harte. S. Paule applieth this saying to the doctrine of the Gospele, and not without cause. For the Lawe is in it selfe very darke, and could not haue entreated men nor giue them that which was need-full for them, if God had not sent them to Iesu Christ.
 But now haue we that which the fathers of oldtyme had but in part. For God putteth his woorde into our mouth and into our hart, not by giuing vs some little taste of it, but by filling vs with it to the full, if so be that our owne lustes were not insatiable, according as mennes lustes are verie gulfs, I meane in all things. For when wee come once too inquyring and searching: behold what an un-measurable gulf is i:vs, so that wee could finde in our hartes too swallowe vp the whole maestic of God, and to packe vp his glorie all in one little fardell, and that he should deserue nothing to himselfe. Seing then that we be such: lette vs remember wel Sainct Paules saying, and let vs apply al our studie that way as long as we lyue, and let vs profit more and more in the knowledge of our Lord Iesu Christ, too the intent that when he hath once graffed vs into his bodie, he may increace his giftes in vs from day to day, vntill we bee throughly filled wi: them.
 Lo what wee haue too marke in this streyne.
 Forthwith it followeth: who is he that can let God, if he list too shet vp? If he list too let loose, If he list too remoue all, If he list to make anewe order: who is he that can disa-point his purpose? VVho shal set himselfe against his good pleasure? After it hath bene told vs that we ought not to bee ouer inquisitiue of Gods wisedome, further-forth than he giueth vs leaue and licence: Here the same knowledge is declared too vs: namely that it is not law-full for vs to grudge against his doings, as though it were in our power too restreyne him. The reason is for that wee ought too like well of all that euer God doth, although wee knowe not why he doth it, but that he lyde it from vs: not that he is loth to haue vs conceyue the reason of his workes: but because it behoueth vs to haue him trie our obedience, that wee may know what we be.

 If God shoulde giue vs a full declaration of his workes here as nowe: who should bee able to indure our prude? what would wee thinke our selues to bee? For although wee see our wile to be so weake, that we feele our selues to be wrapped in darkenesse or cloudes, and that our understanding wil not reach threefoote afore vs: yet a man may see how wee easse not to auaunce our selues aloft: and therefore what would become of vs if God should not reyne vs short? Moreouer what honour yelde wee to God, when wee will comprehend all his doings? It should seeme that we would bee hayle seilewe well met with him. For wee see what prude is in vs alreadie. And therefore it is good that God shoulde trie our obedientiness, too the ende wee may learme to glorie him in all our doings, yea euen though they bee things too vs un-knowne, and though we find them so strange at the first pushe as they make vs to say, by all likelihood this ought to go otherwise. But icite vs say, seing that Gods good pleasure is so: it behoueth mee to yee'd thereto. VVhen men are once comme to such a discretion, then haue they greatly profitid. Yee see then what the cause is that God sheweth vs not why he doeth this or that. Furthermore whereas here is mention made of Removing, shetting vp, and letting out: it is as muche as if it had bene sayde, If God should chaunge and transpose all that euer we see: yet ought not wee to gaynesay it, nor presume too striue with him, or to alledge any thing against him. True it is that when wee beholde the order of nature that God hath set alreadie, wee ought of right too glorie him for it as it is. And certaintely God hath set vs in this worlde as on a great stage, too beholde his workes, and to con-fesse: that he is wise, righteous, and mightie, yea euen after a wondersfull maner. For it behoueth men not one-ly too be taught too giue him glorie with all reverence: but also too bee throughly rapted aboue all their senses and vnderstanding to acknowledge and cry out with Da-P. 10.4.uid, that it is impossible to atteyne to this wisedome of God, which appereth in his workes: and that although God should chaunge all the orderliness wherein it is his will that wee should beholde him, and wherein it is his will to keepe vs occupied at this day: yet neuerthelesse it should behoue vs to submit our selues therenvnto, [and to say] that he doeth it not without cause. If we thinke it strange: then (as I sayd afore) let vs learme to say, yea: but who art thou wretched creature? I pray you if a man haue gotten great vnderstanding and skill, and yet knoweth not himselfe: will men say he is wyse? I say if a man haue applied his minde too learning, yea and haue practiced himselfe in affayres, in somuch that he is able too giue another man good counsell, and yet in the meane while is as a starke foole, and vterly witlesse in things that concerne himselfe, and which touche his owne personne: will not men say, that such a one hath no witte?
 True it is that he hath witte and remembrance for other men: but he hath no discretion for himselfe. Euen so is it with those that would restrayne Gods mighty power to their own fancie. And why? For they thinke theselues able to cōprehend all : & they fayle in the cheefe poynt: that is to wit, in that they know not theselues. For he that entreth into himself, & looketh vpon himself throughly: shall find himself to be vtterly vnskilfull, and as weake as can be, & therfore that he hath great neede to walke modestly and humbly before God. Ye see then how men are carried away and haue neither reason nor discretiō, when they go about after that sort to cōprehend Gods mightie power by their own cōceyts. So much the more therfore behoueth it vs too marke well this lesson, that whether God shet vp or let out, or chaunge al: we must not therefore cease to honour his mightie power after such maner as he sheweth the same vnto vs: And that although we know not the reason why he worketh in that wise: yet notwithstanding wee muste learne to gloriſe him in all points, saying, Lord it is good reason that althings should be lawfull to thee, & that thou shouldest vſe thy creatures as it pleaseth thee, so as thou mightest pul down the heauēs and rayse vp the earth aloft. To be short, whensoeuer thou dealeſt as thou listest with thy creatures, thou passeſt not beyond thine owne right, neither vſurpeſt thou any other mans right. For all of it is thine own due. Behold (I say) after what ſort me ought to gloriſe the goodnesſe & mightie power of God. But yet for all this, we must not ſather a lawleſſe power vpon God, as the Popiſh teachers terme it. For that were a cursed & diuclish thing to doo. They cofeſſe in their Schooles that God miſt of his abſolute power thundere vpo the Angels & damne the: but they call this abſolute power of Gods, a wrongful & ty- rannous power. Let vs take good heede that we furmize not God to be as a Tyran: for he doth al things with in- diſſerēcie & vprightneſſe. Neuertheleſſe he hath his own purpose which is hiddeñ frō vs: and therfore it becometh vs to honor his rightuousneſſe though it be vnuſknowne to vs, and that all our wittes and vnderstanding be vnable to attayne therevnto. And tis iſ it that we haue to remeber in this streyne. Seeing then that the eace standeth ſo, as it is not for mortall men to lift vp theſelues agaſt God, to withstande his mightie power, or too finde fault with his rightuousneſſe, no though it ſhoule please him to alter the order of nature, and too remoue and ſhift all things: I pray you muſt we not neeſes be vnthankefull and frowaid if we murmur againſt God in this preſent orderlineſſe which we ſee to be ſo beaſtiful, and wherin there is nothing to be foind fault with. Let vs put the eace that God turned the light into darkeneſſe, that the Sunne tumbled downe into the deepe, that the earth mounted vp on high, and that all things were coſounded togither: yet oughe we to gloriſe God, & to ſay, Lord it is ſo that we are aſtoniſhed; & theſe things are right ſtrange to vs, but what ſor that vouchſafe thou to hold vs in awe, vntill thou haue ſhewed vs that this is good. I thus yee ſee what we haue to doo. But nowe there is ſuch an orderly diſpoſition in the world, that ſpite of our teeth we be forced to ſay, that it is ſuch a workmaſhip as no creature is able to atteynie, vnto: and muſte not our mindes then be ouermalicious, when wee cannot gloriſe God with all lowlineſſe? True it is that we ſee ſome confuzion in the preſent order of nature: and whereof commeth it that God diſpoſeth not things as it were to be wiſhed, but it ſeemeth that all ſhould be turned vpside downe? wherof cometh that? Of our ſinnes: we are the cauſe that God continueth not things in the ſame order that he had ſet them at the beginning: for wee make many confuzed medlies. Yet neuertheleſſe wee muſt in this eace deeme God to be an vpright iudge. Herewithall let vs beare in minde that he conſouđeth not the order of nature in ſuch wiſe, but that he maketh vs to feele his fatherly goodneſſe and mercie continually: and therefore ſo much the more ought we to be inducēd to humilitie, when we ſee that the greatness of his goodneſſe and mercie paſſeth the hougenesse and enormitie of our ſinnes. Thus much concerning this ſentencē. And he addeth alſo, That God knoweth that men are but vanitie, and that men are nothing worth; and þerthen ſhould be not vnderſtand that man who is borne as a ſilie wilde Aſſe, knoweth not iſimſelf, and yet thinketh himſelf able to maſh his mightie power? This is the conclusion of the doctrine that wee haue heard. Discouerſe hath bene made concerning Gods mightie power which reacheth aboue the heauens, and iſ deeper than the deepeſ: and therfore when men take vpon them to be too inquiſitiue of it, they muſt vnderſtand that they be as it were swallowed vp of it: and if they will neeſes give their curiouuſneſſe the bridle, to ſearch the bottome of Gods power: he muſt be fayne to ſhew them that it is not lawfull for creatures, to lift vp theſelues againſt him whensoeuer he do. Thus ye ſee now a declaration which ſerueth to apply this generall doctrine to the preſent purpoſe: which iſ, that God on hiſ ſide knoweth what iſ in men: and on the other ſide that men are no ſuch things as they ſhould haue cauſe to aduaunce themſelues to call God to a reckoning. For what are we? Let vs a little conſider our birth. Men are like wilde Aſſes, that is to ſay, they haue none vnderſtanding except God giue it them. As touching the firſt poynt, it is not without cauſe that he ſayeth, that God knoweth that men are but vanitie, & that they be nothing worth. For it is to the ende wee ſhould learne not to value our ſelues by our own reaſon, and after our ordinarie maner. When men value themſelues, it is after their owne fancie: they beleeue this and that of themſelues, and thererafter do they give their verdit. But all this is nothing worth, wee muſt eſteeme our ſelues according to that which God hath ſpoken. For there is none but he alone that may be a coſpetent iudge to know what wee be, nor that hath authoritiē to ſay it: which thing wee ought to marke well. For when men haue valued themſelues by their owne imagination and opinion, what ſhall they haue gayned by it? It is like as when a foole calleth himſelf king of ſome countrie, and in the meane while euery man laughs him to ſkorne for his labour. We be double fooleſ when we weene our ſelues to be any thing, and therewithall God ſheweth vs how there is nothing but vanitie in vs. Then let vs beare in minde, that when me are deſirous to know what they bee, what their ſtate iſ, and of what estimation in effect they be: they muſte turne them to God, ſaying, Lorde thou knowest vs, for thou haſt made vs. And at his hand we ſhall haue a ſhort and reſolute anſweſe. We ſee how the Scripture ſayeth that all the wiſedome which men ſuppoſe themſelues to haue, is ſtarke follie: the wiſer they weene theſelues to be, the more dullardes are they: God laugheth their fondneſſe to ſkorne: when they thiſke to climbe vp a high, then withdraweth he himſelf frō them, and they muſt be faine to wanze away in their own imagiňatiōs. Lo what the Scripture pronounceth. And ſo let vs affiſe our ſelues that there is none but only God that knoweth vs, and can truely tell what wee bee. And that is the cauſe why it is ſayde that God knoweth. It ſeemeth at the firſt bluſhe, that this is but a common thing: for every man wil eaſily coſfesse that God knoweth me too bee but vanitie: but yet for all that, wee conſider not the ſubſtance which thoſe woordes import, because men haue their eyes ſtopped, they knowe not themſelues to be full of vanitie, and therefore God is fayne to make them them feele what they bee, that they may learne to humble themselves. Thus much for the first poynt. The second is, That the emptie man shall bee indewed with harte; and shall be like a wilde Asses colt. Here wee bee brought backe to our birth, to do vs to vnderstande that all the wit which we haue is Gods gift besides our nature. And why? Let vs looke vpō the power of men. VVhen a little babe commeth out of his mothers wombe, what wisedome bringeth he with him? Verily some Philosophers haue well supposed, that all the vnderstanding which we haue of our selues is but onely memorie: and that it was requisite for vs to haue one fense inclosed in vs aforehand. But yet is it too be seene, that a childe hath lesse wit than the silliest beast that is. Let a man looke throughout all and he shall not finde any beast so brutish nor so vnpurueyed of reason & vnderstanding as men are at their coming into the world. Yee see then that man in himself is as it were the sole of a wilde Ass. Lette him make as great account of himselfe as he listeth: but yet wee see what he is neuerthelesse. And howe is it that wee haue the spirit of vnderstanding when wee come to full age? God must be fayne to giue it vs. And so yee see why it is sayd, that the emptie man shal be indewed with hart. For in the Scripture, this woerde Harte importeth vnderstanding. Let vs marke then how it is shewed here, that when we haue any wit or reason, the same commeth not of our owne nature, nether doo we possesse it as though it grew vp with vs: but it behoueth vs to know that is an excellent benefit which God bestoweth vpon vs. Seing then that we haue it at his hande, what an vnthankfulnesse is it of vs to abuse it against him? Therefore let vs acknowledge his benefite in giuing vs wisedome and discretion when we come to age, to know both him and our selues, and to honour him. Let vs learne then to holde our selues in humilitie, and according as it pleaseth God to giue vs vnderstanding, let vs acknowledge the same to come of him: and let vs pray him to make vs to apply our wittes to such vse as we may alwayes walke after him, and hold our selues vnder his awe, vntill that being set free from this bondage of sinne, we be conueyed into the heauenly glorie, to behold him perfectly as he is.

And now let vs cast our selues downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs perceyue them, and to graunt vs the grace to apply all our wittes and indeuer to consider what we be, that is to wit, wretched vayne and vnonprofitable creatures, vnable to do any thing of our selues; so as he must be fayne to furnish and strengthen vs, or els wee must needs vterly quayle. And that such knowledge of our owne weakenesse and feblenesse may prouoke vs to retorne with greater desire to the grace whiche our good God offereh vs, seeking nothing but to be filled with the same, to the ende we may honour and magnifie him in all respectes, vntill he haue broug̃t vs to the perfection wherevnto wee be called, without swauing one way or other, for feare of turning out of the right way of saluation. That it may please him to graunt this grace not onely to vs, but also to all people and nations, &c.

The xluiij. Sermon, which is the third vpon the eleuenth Chapter.

13. If thou prepare thine hart, and stretch out thy handes vnto him, 14. If thou put the iniquitie from thee vvhich is in thy hande, and that no vnrighitousnesse abyde in thy tent:
15. Then mayst thou lift vp thy face vwithout spotte, and thou shalt bee sure, and shalt not bee afraide.
16. For thou shalt forget thy miserie, and shalt no more haue it in remembrance, than the vverters that are passed by:
17. And a tyme shall spring vp more bright than the noone day, so shalt thou shine and bee as the morning:
18. Thou shalt be safe, because there is hope, thou shalt dig a pit and lay thee dovvne safely.
19. Thou shalt rest thee, and there shal bee no man to make thee afraide, and many shall sue to thee.
20. But the eyes of the vvicked shall fayle and forgo their refuge, and their hope shal be [turne] into anguish of minde.

Ee haue seene heretofore the lowelinesse that ought too be in menne when they thinke vpon Goddes woorkes: that is to witte, that they muste not presume to iudge of the after their owne fancie, but they must understand that forasmuch as Gods wisedome is infinite: therefore they cannot comprehend the reason of his doings: and that forasmuch as he is able to doo all things: noman ought to presume to let him, but to give him leaue to do what he thinketh good, and all men ought to stoupe vnto him. And now behold a second poynt which Zophar addeth: which is, that if we be desirous that God should be fauorable and mercifull to vs, we must seeke him with a pure and right meining minde and without hypocrisie. Thus yee see in effect what is declared here. And afterward for a conclusion he addeth, that suche as are smitten with Gods hande, cannot excuse themselves (howsoeuer the case standeth,) that theyr owne sinne should not be the cause of all the miserie that they indure. But verely such things are misapplied too Iobs persone: and yet notwithstanding, the same ceasseth not to be good for vs: Therefore let vs bethinke vs to profite our selues by it. And first of all, whereas it is tolde vs, that God will be gracious to all such as seeke him vnfaynedly: the same is often ynoch warrantied vs through all the holy Scripture, and God allureth not me vnto him to deceyue them when he sayth, Turne vnto mee, and I will turne vnto you. Hereby he declareth that he is alwayes willing and readie too do vs good, if we let him not on our side. So then, let vs mark, that whensoever wee seeke God he will be at hand with vs, yea euen with all grace and blissing. But wee muste also marke the meane of seeking God. For we see how men beare themselves in hande that they haue desired nothing but that God should be mercifull to them, and that they haue bene desirous to yeelde themselves vnto him, and that their cheefe desire is to honour him: and yet

yet for all this, they drawe quite and cleane backewarde. But in this text is declared in what wise God will be serued, and what he requyreh and alloweth. And therefore he sayeth that first of all, wee must settle our hart and stretch out our bandes vnto him, and afterward, put all wickednesse out of our bandes, that none may dwell in our houses. Behold (I say) how men may obey God, and not turne aside from him: namely by beginning with the soundnesse of the hart, because God abhorreth all dissimulatiō. But contrarywise we see how hypocrisie reigneth in such wise in our nature, as our hart shrinketh alwayes backward, & we make many cōtēnāces & many apish toyes and mowes, so as it shoulde seeme wee be altogether on fire with zele to Godward, and outwardly all shall be full of Ceremonies & apparāt pretences, wheras notwithstanding there shal be no truth nor right meining inwardly in the hart. Yee see howe wee haue so much the more neede to marke what is sayd here, namely that such as go about to seeke God, do not any thing that is aughtworth, but in steede of going forward, draw backward, except their hart be disposed that way: that is to say, except they haue a pure and single affection, and not a double hart. But for our better confirmation in this lesson, wee muste bethinke vs of other textes of the Scripture where God auoucheth that he is not like too mortall creatures, who rest vpon the outward shewes of things. Because we be fleshly, wee make much of that which seemeth gay: but God is not such a one. Therefore wee muste not measure him by our metyard. But forasmuch as it is his peculiār office too seache the bottome of mennes priuie thoughts, and all must needs be layd open before him: Therefore his eyes looke vnto faithfulness and truth, as it is sayde in Ieremie. To be shorte, the seruice of God ought to be grounded vpon the singlehartednesse wherof the Scripture speaketh so oft in saying, Thou shalt be sound before mee. And not without cause did God giue that rule to Abraham, but he gaue it to the end it should bee generall to all the faſtfull: and the often repeating of it, is to shew that whē God mindeth to shoale out his owne children by some certaine marke from the hypocrites: alwayes he setteth downe the sayde soundhartednesse. Therefore let vs marke well, that forasmuch as God is the truth, he will be serued in spirit and truthe.

Ier.17.b.10.
& 5.a.3.

Cm.17.a.1.

24.

Now seeing that Gods seruice is spirituall, all fayning and vntruth must be farre from vs: or oþerwise, although our workes please men, and be never so much commended of the worlde, they be no better than dung and vanitie: and God will reiect all that we haue, if wee haue not first indeuered to put our harte in order. True it is that the Papistes take holde of this text to prooue their Freewill: and it seemeth to them that they haue a fayre colour to say, sith men are exhorted to order their hartes aright, therefore it is in their abilitie and power so to do. But it is to fonde and trifling a reason to measure mens power and abilitie by the things that are commaunded them. For when God sheweth vs what we haue to do, he respecteth not what wee are able too do, or what is in vs: but he respecteth what we be bound vnto and what is our duetie. VVhen he willeth vs to loue him with all our hart, with all our strength, and with all our powcr: is it because he findeth any man liuing that is able to yelde his whole hart to the sayde loue? VVe see the flat contrarie. For our nature is fully bent against God. So then if God ment to requyre nothing at our handes but that which wee were able to performe: he should let vs go streight to destruction. But let vs not thinkē that God lozeth his right because wee haue not wherewith to pay him. For put the case a man were in dette, were it reason that his creditours should loze their right because he is falne in pouertie by wafting of his goodes in riot and excesse? True it is that they shall not be able to recouer it at his hande: but doth the dette remayne alwayes vpon his head. Seing the case is such, doo wee thinke that God wil bee disfeated of his duetie because men be altogether leude and froward, or because the Diuell holdeth them in bondage, and they be giuen ouer to all mischeef and wickednesse? Then must we not conclude that men are able to dispose of their owne harts and of themselues at their pleasure through their owne motiō, because God commaundeth them so to do. He doth but onely shewe that we be bounde to do so, and that all that euer we bee able too attempt shall not be esteemed nor receyued at Gods hande vntil such time as wee haue the sayd purenesse of hart whereof mention is made in this place. But now let every man examine himselfe, and we shall finde our selues to haue hartes of stone, so as there is nothing in them but hardnesse, nother reigneth there any thing in them but naughtinesse, and such a continuall stubbornesse as can by no meanes be bowed to obey God. Sith the case standeth so, God muste be fayne to put to his hande, as he hath also promised to do. For he sayeth he will giue vs fleshy hartes that shall be soft and plyable, so as we may serue him. He sayeth he will ingraue his law Deut.30.b. after such a sorte in our hartes and in our bowels, as wee 6. c. Iere. shall giue our selues to that which he alloweth, so as there 24.c. 7. c. shall be one conformitie and agreement betwene all our 31. f.33. c. desires and affections, and betwene the righteousnesse Ezech. 36. that is conteyned in the lawe. That (say I) is the peculiar f.26. worke of God: & therfore it behoueth him to dispose vs to the seruynge of him, because we are vnsit for it on our behalfe, drawing altogether backe from it, and hauing not aught in our lustes but contrarietie to all goodnessse. Lo how it belongeth to God to apply vs vnto himselfe, and to make vs fitte and able to serue him, seing we haue not any abilitie nor meane in our selues to do it. Now after he hath thus spoken of the purenesse and rightfull meining of the hart, he sayeth that wee muste stretch out our bandes vnto God. This importeth very much. For vnder one particular, Zophar ment to comprehendē in effect the cheefe poyn̄t of Gods seruice, and of the first table of the Lawe. For what elis prayer than a recorde of the sayth that wee haue to Godward? For by calling vpon God without hypocrisie, we witnesse openly that all our welfare lyeth in him, and that he is the onely partie too whom we ought to flee for succour: and (to be shorte) by calling vpon God wee yelde him the glorie that belongeth vnto him, and whiche he reserueth to himselfe.

40 And so let vs marke, that vnder this one particular poyn̄t of calling vpon God, Zophar ment to comprehendē the whole contents of the firſte table: which are, that God telleth vs that he onely must be worshipped of vs, and cannot abide to haue any copartener, and that we must not abuse his name, nor vnhallowe it: but that wee must render him the honour which he is worthie of, and followe the order which he hath appoynted in his Church. Then if all things be throughly considered, it is certaine that by calling vpon God we protest that we haue none other Gods but him alone, and that we renounce all Idolatrie and superstition, shewing that our trusste is settled vpon him alone, and declaring that all righteousnessse, power, and life are al wholly in our God, that he is the fountain whereout of it behoueth vs to drawe, and that wee bee so greatly bounde and indetterd vnto him, as it is impossible for vs to discharge our selues towardes him. Beholde after what sort his name shall be honored? Againe, the yelding of our selues ouer to him and to his prouidence in

in our prayers, is the very meane to obserue the spiritual Sabbath or rest. Besides this, prayer importeth a confessio of our fayth. Also we not onely desire God to vouchsafe to succour vs: but also we yeeld him thanks for the benefites that we haue receyued at his hand. And so wee see, that vnder our calling vpō our God, is cōprehended whatsoeuer pertayneth to his honour. But hereby we see that in Popcrie, the seruice of God hath not onely bene peruerterd and marred: but also as good as vtterly abolished. True it is that men wil easily say that they ought to pray vnto God: but after what maner? Before we come thither (say the Papistes) we must runne and roote from Sainet to Sainet: the virgin Marie must be the mother of mercie and the treasurie of saluation: every Sainet must haue his office, & thither must men haue their recourse, there must they repose their trūt. God must haue but a little spriakling, iasmuch as he shal hardly be knowne in so great a number. And wee must not in any wise begin at him, for they beare themselves in hand that if they go not first to the Heesainets and Sheesainets: God shaketh the off. Of Iesus Christ there is no speaking, nor of seeking vnto him as to the mediator, that he shoule make our way too God his father: of all this geere they haue no skill what it meeneth. Seing then that the principall poynt which pertayneth to Gods honor, is not obserued there: let vs assure our selues that it is euē so with all the rest that are inferiour. And therefore let vs thanke our good God for drawing vs out of these horrible dumgeons, and for shewynge vs that it is he to whom we must hold cur selues, & whom we must call vpō as our father, that we take heede to keepe the way wherby he sheweth vs to come to vnto him, namely by assuring our selues that his seate is not terrible vnto vs to make vs shunne it, but rather amiable for vs to come vnto, iasmuch as our Lord Iesus Christ reacheth vs his hand: & that his office is to make intercessio for vs: & that God also hath opened vs the gate, desiring nothing of vs frō day to day, but that we should come vnto him. Lette vs (I say) acknowledge, that the same is an inestimable benefite vnto vs: & therewithall let vs haue pitie vpon these blinde wretches which go astray after that maner, in somuch that if it come to the poynt of calling vpon God, they wote not at which end to begin. And verely hereby it appereith, that their state is most miserable. For wherin lieth at the welfare of men? wherein is al their happiness, but in that (as I haue sayde) they haue their recourse vnto God, according as it is sayd, that whosoeuer calleth vpō the name of the Lord shalbe safe? But the case standeth so with the wretched Papistes, as they wote not what the calling vpō God is. Therefore it must be concluded, that they must needs be bereft of al hope of saluation, and banished out of Gods kingdome, seing they know not what it is to call vpon God. And it appeereth: for they come not to it but with doubting & trembling: and therewithall they haue a thousand windlasses before they come at God, because they haue not Iesus Christ to their guide and foreleader. So then let vs marke well this streyne wherein mētion is made of stretching out our handes vnto God. VVhy so? For iasmuch as we cannot stye vp into heauē by reason of our infirmities, it behoueth vs to haue some signe that may serue to make outward protestatio of the inward & secrete doing. Yē see our hantes cannot be seene [of mē.] But if we pray vnfainedly, our hart lifteth it self vp aloſt, & that is as much as if we came before God to lay forth al that euer we haue within vs. This doing (I say) is invisible. Neuerthelesse, by holding vp our hands vnto God, we declare that it is he to whom we haue al our refuge. Thus we see why Prayer is betokened by the signe of it,

*Ioel.2.g. 32.

in the holy scripture: not that the same signe is the whole or the principall poynt of prayer. For the Hypocrites can skill wel ynough to stretch out both their handes & their armes too: and it seemeth that al that euer is in them were burning fire: & yet for al that there is nothing but faſhod in them, and they do but mocke with God. Therefore it behoueth that this signe be true, & the scripture also presupposeth it to be ſo. And here ye ſee alſo why it is ſayd, that our Hart muſte be diſpozed. If Zophar had ſayd no more but Stretch out thy handes vnto God, men might haue alledged that God is contented wiſen they come to him but with Ceremonies. But when as he ſayeth, that aſfore all things, our hart muſte be ſeured ſo as there be no wrything nor crookedneſſe in it: it is alſmuch to ſay, as the ſame muſte be layd as a foūdacion wherevpo to build. And hereby we ſee that the lifting vp of our handes vnto heaven is nothing, vntil our hart go before it, ſo as the handes may be a true recorde of that which is in the man, and of that which God himſelf knoweth to be there. For as concering the residue of our life: peraduenture mē will regard vs, and we may haue ſome regard of the. But verely that muſt not be for deſire of any prayſe: for if we deſire to be allowed of creatures, we receiuſe our wages, as ſayeth our Lord Iesus Christ. Yet notwithstanding let men ſee vs in al the rest of our life: but when we pray vnto God, euery man muſt retire & ſhrinke into himſelf, that he may ac- knowledge, behold I am before God, behold I am at the throne of his maieſtie: and ſo of al the doings of our life prayer muſt be remoued furtheſt off from hypocriſie & vntruthe. But in the meane while this is very ill put in vre. Forlet a man marke how the hypocrites in the Papacie play mockeholiday with God: there ſhalbe ſtore of liplabour: and that is the thing wherein they bewray themſelues moſt. Though there be hypocriſie in all their other things: yet is there moſt of al in the prayers of the Papists. And on our ſide, would God there were the like corſideracio as I haue ſpokē of: that is to ſay, that every of vs retyred into himſelf when he cometh to praying vnto God, & that we were (as it were) locked vp in that behalf, ſo as we had no reſpect at al of the world. The ſhould there be another maner of perfectneſſe in our prayers than there is: & thoſe that haue no feare of God durſt not be ſo bold as to call vpon Gods name with full mouth as they do. How? They cal vpon him before men: to their ſeeming it is ynough if the world thiſke they haue a good will to returne vnto God: & in the meane while God ſeeth no ſparke of ſuch good will in them. Furthermore, although it behoue vs to be withdrawne [into our ſelues] when we pray vnto God: it is not ment that in our comon prayers we ſhould not stirre vp one another by our example. For then were it ſufficient that euery man prayed in his own chamber, or in his lodging. But God will haue vs to pray together in comon, and as it were with one mouth, to the end there may be one ſolemne confeſſion of our faith, & euery man may be edified by his neighbour. Neuertheleſſe our open praying muſt be after ſuch a ſort, as we may be withdrawn into our ſelues, and euery man haue his eye vpon God aboue, as if we were there before him. Thus much then concerning theſe woordes, of lifting vp our handes. And by and by after, Zophar cometh downe to the ſecōd table of the Lawe and ſayeth, That we muſt put away al iniquitie from our handes, and that it muſt not dwelle in our houses. It is a maner of ſpeaking riſe ynough to ſay, VVe haue cleane handes: for by our handes we meddle and deale with the matters that are betwene vs & our neighbours. And therefore he that robbeth his neighbour, or doth him any violence or any annoyance, hath foule hands: like as on the contrarie parte it is ſayd, that the chil- Psal.:6.b.9 dren dren of God do wash their h̄ads when they keepe equitie and vprightnesse, so as they giue not th̄selues to misdealing, but rather haue a regard to serue every mans turne. And Zophars meening in this place is, that the man that wil be blisſed of God, & prosper, must withhold his hand from al vnrightfulnesse, or driue away all vnrightfulnesse from his hands. Haue we then called vpon God? haue we protested that it is he onely at whose hands we looke for ſaluation and al welfare? haue we glorified him as becometh vs? Then there remayneth that we communicate with our neighbours also without doing any man wrong, so as nomā may complaine that we haue put him to loſſe or hinderāce: & that we be cleere frō al violence & guile. If we liue with our neighbours after this maner: behold, God wil alſo draw neere vnto vs. Thus ye ſee how wee ſhall perceiue that he is readie to beſtow all good things vpon vs that we can deſire, and which are meete for our ſaluation. But for alſmuch as men do willingly beare with th̄ſelues, yea and that to excuse our ſelues in euill doing, we ſeeke ſo many ſhifts and ſtartingholes as it is horrible to behold: it is ſayd that miſdealing muſt be chaced & banished out of our tentes: that is to ſay, men muſt not only do none euill direclty ſo as it might be caſt in his teeth to his shame: but alſo he muſte beware that none euill be done vnder his shadow. As for exāple, if he be the master of a household, let him holde his wife, his children, & his ſeruants in awe, & let him take good heede, that there be no wrong done to any man, by ouerthwart meanes, or by wicked dealings. Thus ye ſee why it is precisely added, That miſdealing muſt not dwell in our Tentes. And now haue we in effect that which is ſayd here. But now remayneth that every one of vs thiſke better of it than we haue done. For this doctrine conſiſteth not in woordes, but muſt be put in vre by every mā, and every of vs muſt thiſke vpon it throughly. There is nothing here which ought not to be very comon and familiar to vs, and why then are we ſo farre off from it? Euen because the more parte of vs are contented to heare ſpeakē of it, and yet notwithstanding leauē the cheef point of it. To the intent therefore that we may be touched the better & the more to the quicke, let vs marke firſt that we muſt not go about the buſh with God, but keepe the right way that is ſhewed vs here. My ſaying of this, is to drawe vs out of all the ſuperſtitioſes & fond Apes toyes wherewith men beguile th̄ſelues tooſoo wilfully. For as for theſe general principles men can finde in their harts to confesse them welynough: namely, That it is good reaſon that God ſhould be honored and ſerued: and that without we do ſo, he wil curse vs and caſt vs away: and that it ought to be no wonder though he puniſh vs and coſume vs with aduersities in this world. For ſeing that we worke ſpite againſt God, muſt not he neeđes ouerwhelme vs? Every man (ſay I) will well confesse this. Againe for the ſeconde poyn̄t, it will not be denied but that God will haue pitie vpon vs when wee turne vnto him: and that if we ſerue him as we ought to do, he will not deale ſo hardely with vs but we ſhall finde him by experience to be both a father and Sauiour to vs. Men will well ynough ſay ſo. But when it commeth to the deede doing, it wi. be well perceyued that there was nothing but hypocriſie in all theſe goodly proclaiſatiōſ, and that men were very farre of from God, ſo long as they thought to content him with their fonde fancies. Then let vs leарne that the true turning which God alloweth is not a tormenting of a mā ſelfe in vaine and ſuperfluouſ things: but a comming vnto him with a rightmeening ſoundneſſe. But let vs now looke vpon the lurkingholes of our hartes: I ſay let every man examine what is in hiſelfe: let vs not flatter our ſelues to make our ſelues beleue that blacke is white: for we ſhal winne nothing by ſo doing. Seing then that we haue ſo many ſtartingholes in our ſelues, we haue good cauſe to fight againſt th̄. For it is no eaſie matter to haue a cleere hart and ſuch a ſoundneſſe as God requireth. VVhen men haue indeuered th̄ſelues therunto all their time, it is much if they come to the middes of their iourney before they die. Yet neuertheleſſe we muſt trauell ſtil, and deſire God to ſtrengthen vs, that we may compaſſe our intent by the power of his holy ſpirite. Marke that for a ſpeciall poyn̄t. And for the bringing hereof to paſſe, let vs take heede that we bee angrie with our ſelues as oft as we feele any hypocriſie or feynedneſſe in our ſelues. For if every man looked neerely to hiſelfe, it is certaine that we ſhould ſigh a hundred times in a day, wheras now we be falne aſſleepe, yea and will mightely and ſloutly iuſtifie our ſelues. There are many that would fayne haue men to thiſke that they ſeeke God with a pure and freeharted affection, and that they apply all their indeuer thereto: and yet in the meane while if they ſearched th̄ſelues throughly, they ſhould ſee that which the other men ſee. For it would be manifeſtly perceyued, that they be ful of hypocriſie, and that there is not one drop of good zele in them. Seing that the worlde findeſt this in them, ought not they rather to finde it in th̄ſelues, if they did not beguyle th̄ſelues wilfully? So then, if euerie of vs (as I ſayd) examine hiſelfe as he ought to do: it is certaine wee ſhoulde not fall a ſleepe, but rather that wee ſhould be pricked and prouoked to proceede more and more in the right way. And let vs make ſpeeđe while God calleth vs to him, and giueth vs leauē & boldneſſe to ſtretch out our handes vnto him. And let vs not abuse ſuſh a beneſſe, which is inestimable. For if God preuented vs not with his infinite goodneſſe & gaue vs not way vnto him: which of vs durſt preache vnto him? And in very deede wee ſhould be ſhaken off. For it were a Diueliſh malapertneſſe, if a man ſhould of hiſ owne ſelfe & of hiſ owne head preache vnto God, and hauing no leauē of God. A man durſt not come neere a mortall Prince who is but a dead carkeſſe: and how ſhall we preache before the maieſtie of our maker. Yea verely, conſidering that we are his mortall enemys, and that wee cannot come thither but wee ſhall bring as much ſinne as can be: he muſte neeđes abhorre vs by reaſon thereof, and it ſpiteth him to ſee vs, according alſo as he renounceth and diſclaymeth vs to be his creatures in reſpect that wee be ſinners. Therefore he muſt be fayne to giue vs leauē, and to call vs, and to tell vs that wee ſhalbe welcome, and to open vs the gate: and it behoueth vs to know that it is neeđfull for vs to be dealt with as I haue ſayde afore: that is to witte, that we ſeeke to our God for refuge, affiuring our ſelues that wee be deſtitute of all goodneſſe, and as neeđie and wretched as may be: and furthermore that wee may well ſeeke here and there for that which we lacke, that we ſhall finde nothing but emptineſſe in our ſelues, ſo as we ſhaſe famiſhed, & ſuſh as weene to ſupply their want by ſeeking remedie at the handes of creatures, doo but feede th̄ſelues with winde. Then let vs go to our God and ſeeke the meane to come to him: which is, that our Lord Iefus Christ make interceſſion for vs, & cauſe vs to finde fauour there. For in our owne perſones God muſt neeđes hate vs, yea and of good right alſo holde vs accuſed. But we please him and he is fauorable to vs in that we come to him in the name of our Lord Iefus. And if this thing were ſayde vnder the Lawe when the ſhadowes were yet ſo darke: ought wee not to bee much more affectioned now adayes, ſeing that the veyle of the Temple is rente afunder? If this preſent doctrine ſerved

Math. 27. serued for the time of the Lawe, when the people abode f.51. in the porche of the Temple and stooede aloofe, and had the veyle also to hide al things from their sight: how earnestly ought we to pra&ize it at this day? True it is that Exod. 28. b. the high Priest bare the names of the children of Israell 12. & 29. vpon his shoulders and vpon his brest: but now, behold, Iesus Christ hath rent asunder the veyle of the Temple, and opened the way in such wise as wee may shewe our selues before God to looke him in the face. For the way Hebr. 10. d. is continually open by his bloud (as the Apostle sayeth) 10 20. so as there be no busshes nor brambles to let vs, nother is the way so rough nor so shrubbe that wee shoulde be fayne to leape ouer many lettes. No no: but the way is now altogether playne and leuell, so be it that we go it by the bloud of our Lord Iesus Christ. Thus much concerning this poynct. Furthermore let vs marke well also, that to call vpon our God purely by shewing that we make a true confession of our faith, and yelde him his due honour: we muste also communicate with our neighbours by al maner of vpright dealing. For if our neighbours be made like vnto the image of God, and yet notwithstanding we fleece one, and eate vp another, and every man is giuen to himselfe: I pray you do we not spitte at God as far as is posseible for vs to do, when we worke any annoyance to those that are shapen after his image? If our ney-bours be members of Iesus Christe, and wee offer them wrong & violence, so as we haue no eye but to our owne profit: is it not a renting of Iesus Christes body a peeces?
And will he after that sorte leade vs to God his father to make vs finde fauour there? Lette vs marke then, that if 30 we will haue accessse vnto our God, wee muste liue with our neighbours in all vpright dealing. And here is expresse mention made of the hands, to the end we should know which is the meane whereby God proueth what maner of Christianitie is in vs. For every man will inable himselfe with his tung: there is none of vs al but he will be a good seruant of God, if we may be beleueed vpon our woerde. But when it commeth to the deede doing, there a man shall see the cleane contrarie. He that hath preached of Charitie, and spoken maruelous well of it, 40 will shew that he is wholly giuen to himselfe when it commeth to the point that he must ioyne with his neighbors.
As in good sooth there are none so shamelesse, but they wil alwayes be speaking of Charitie. They haue bene accustomed to haue so much charitie vsed towards them: as they preach none other thing. But if a man aske them that which they owe: he shal get none other reason of the but charitie, charitie. And how? They make no remorse to pill and poll other men of their goodes, and to do what they list, so as they be blameworthie both before God & 50 man: & yet they are not ashamed to preach charitie. Yea, but that shall be to pilfer other mens goodes. Therefore here is expresse mention made of the hands. For behold, the true triall whither we loue God to honour him as be-cometh vs, is by making it knowne that there is vpright-nesse and equitie in vs, and to be short, that there is kind-nesse in vs, so as we liue after such a sort with our neighbours, as every one of vs according to his state & abilitie do employ himselfe to succour those that haue neede, to the intent that by this meanes the league & alliance that God hath set and cōsecrated among vs may be obserued.
Thus ye see what we haue to marke, in that it is sayd we must cast al iniquitie far from our hands. Is one a handycraftes man? well, let him do his businesse faithfully and content himselfe with an honest gayne of the woorke of his hands. Let him that buyeth thinke thus with himself: I must haue another mans labour: seing my brother tra-uels & takes paine for me, it is no reason that he should lose his time. Otherwise it is all one as if I should go plucke the bread out of his mouth. For God hath set his sustenance in the labour of his handes. If I do him wrong, it is as much as if I sucked the bloud out of him whome God hath cōmended vnto me, and whom I am bound to releeue. Yee see then how euery man ought to haue an eye to his estate: and I haue alleaged examples, to the end that euery one of vs should lay it forth by peecemāle, & that according as any of vs haue to deale with our ney-bours, we should behauie our selues in such wise, as wee might giue noman occasion to complaine of vs: and furthermore also that euery man should haue an eye too his owne household. For before God it is not ynoch for a faithfull man to forbeare euildoing directly himself: but also he will haue al crooked wayes to be faire from vs, and specially that we haue a care to gouerne our houses, that God may be honored both of the childe, and of the husband, and of the wife, and of the master, & of the mēser-uants, and of the maidseruants. And would God that this were thought vpon better than it is: For where the heads of a house go astray and haue no feare of God nor religiō in them, there it is to be seene that al goeth to wrecke, and that the children also do no honour to their father & mother, for they become not better, but before they can haue any discretion, ye shall see them rooted in naughti-nesse: and the men and maidens shalbe full of corruptiō.

True it is that maysters and mistresses can tel wel ynoch how to finde fault when their seruants commit any lewd pranke, or filche any thing from them, or serue them not as they would haue them: but in the meane while if God be offended a thousand wayes, it makes no matter, that shalbe let slip. So much the more therfore behoueth it vs to marke well that which I haue sayde: namely that we must not think to content God by being carefull to serue him al onely in our owne persones: but wee must also haue an eye to those whom we haue charge of, that we keepe away euill in any wise, assuring our selues that if we consent vnto it, wee muste be wrapped in the same damnation that the wicked are. But if we be so diligent as to take heede to it: let vs not doubt but our God will regarde vs with mercie, and be neere at hande to vs with all blissing and grace according as is promised here. Verily we haue yet one poynct more to marke: which is, that Gods fauour will not shewe it selfe alwayes at the firste brunt. The promises that are contayned here, are taken out of the Lawe, or at leastwise are of the same effect.
For (as I haue tolde you) wee knowe not in what time this booke was written. But howsoever the case stande, wee see that the spirite of God spake to them. For ye see here a doctrine whiche is conformable to that which is conteyned in the lawe of Moyses, where our Lorde promiseth to blisse those that serue him, and to dwell among them, and to make them perceyue howe auayleable his presence is, that is to witte, that their life shalbee happie by it. But lette vs beare in minde that which I haue touched: that is to wit, that God maketh vs not to feele his fauour at the first push. Therefore whereas it is sayd, that such as walke in the feare of God shalbe blissted, and he will make them to prosper: it is not ment that God visiteth not his seruants in such wise as he seemeth to be alienated quite from them, and that although they cal vpō him they must be faine to linger in paine so as they wote not where they be, but that (to their seeming) God hath utterly forsaken them. Then must we be fayne to walke in this world through many afflictions, notwithstanding that wee serue God. But herewithall we haue a double comfort: which is, that on the one side it is certayne that although our hart tende vnto God, yet notwithstanding foras-

forasmuch as it is not with such zele as it ought, nother do we serue him with such affection as we be bound to do: therefore we must be faine to suffer punishment and correction for our sinnes: but yet by that meanes God maketh vs to consider our owne wants, that we mighte humble our selues, fall to amendment, and returme vnto him when we haue bin exercised after that sort with the troubles that he sendeth. Lo heere one great comforte. The other is, that we be made like vnto our Lord Iesus Christe, that like as he is entred into the kingdome of heauen by tribulation and death: euen so we that are hys members do now beare his marks in being troubled in this world, to the end that he may cause vs to come too the glory of his resurrection. VVe see then that all oure aduersities are turned to our welfare. And heerewithall we ought also to comforte our selues in this, that oure God will not put vs to further triall than he knoweth is meete and behoffull for vs: and that although we must be faine to endure many wants and miseries, and that our state seeme to bee the wretchedest in the worlde, yet wil not God ceasse to make vs feele continuallye that hee is neere vs and hathe not forsaken vs, but watcheth alwayes ouer vs, and will defende vs to the end, if we seeke it at his hande, and indeuer too serue and honoure hym, so it bee with a pure and righte meening minde, vtterly voyde of all hipocrisie, as I haue declared alredy.

But let vs cast our selues downe before our good god and father with acknowledgement of our faultes and sinnes, praying him to bring vs backe vnto him selfe, and that forasmuch as he seeth such an vntowardnesse in our nature, that all our thoughtes and all our affections are bent to euill: so as there is nothing in all our intentes but vanitie and leasing: it may please him to resourme vs in such wise, as we may become new creatures: & that we knowing our selues to be destitute of all goodness, may seeke in his fauoure for all that belongeth to oure saluation, yea and to our bodily life: I say that wee maye seeke it in him, according as it is his office to giue bountifullly vnto vs, specially in the name of our Lorde Iesus Christ: and that being gouerned by hys spirite, wee may call vpon hym as our father, and therewithall be ioyned and knitte together in one true brotherly affection, so as wee maye declare thereby that we be hys children, and that wee growe more and more in true vnion and charitie, vntill that beeyng receyued into the heauenly heritage, wee maye enjoy the true vnion whiche is begonne alredy in vs. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only to vs, but also to all people and nations of the earth, &c.

The xlvi. Sermon, which is the first vpon the twelfth Chapter.

1. I Obansvvered and said.
2. Yea, you are a people, and vvisdome shall die vvith you.
3. I haue vvit as vwell as you, and I am no vwhit inferioure to you: and vwho is hee that kno-vveth not the things that you alledge?
4. I am a iesting stocke to my friendes, to him that calleth vpon God, and vvhom he her eth: the righteous and perfect are skorned.
5. As a torch that is despised of a rich man, vvhose foote is at the point to slip from him.
6. Thetēts of robbers do prosper, and they that hold God in their hāds do boldly prouoke him.

T seemeth at the firste blush, that 40 these two sayings, (namely that such as feare God shall be blissed of him: and that the wicked shall be in prosperitie) are cleane contraries. And in dede, Job in au-swering as we haue heard, (that is too witte, that the delpisers of God liue oftentimes at their ease) gainsayeth that which was propounded heretofoare by Zophar. But Iobs answering contrarie to that which hath bin said, is to shew that this doctrine, althogh it bee taken out of the law, is neuerthelesse misapplied. Therefore it behoueth vs to consider well how it is too be vnderstoode. VVheras God declareth and auoucheth in his law, that he will keepe the good vnder his protection, that he will giue them their hartes desire, that they shal want nothing, and that them selues, their cattell, and all their goodes shall bee blissed: he meeneth not that the good shall never be troubled. For where then were patience? and how should it be knowne that he riddeth his seruants out of trouble? If all things should fall out too our mind, we should not know what it were to call vpon God and to desire him to pitie vs, nother should we feele his goodnessse in reaching vs his hand. Then let vs marke well, that God hath not promised the faithfull such a prosperitie in this world as should be vtterly exempted from all the ordinarie troubles wherenvnto it behoueth vs to be subiect: but all such promises of God serue to do vs to vnderstand, that comonly God will make them to prosper which walke in his feare. And this we see. Howbeit by the way wee haue these two poyntes too marke: that is too witte, that oure sinnes make vs vnworthy that God shoulde blisse vs after all sortes and at all times. For there is no man but hee prouoketh God, no not euen the perfectest, in whome (too our seeming) there is no fault to be found. For euen the rightuousest do find them selues blameworthy before God. And therfore if he chastise them, he doth it iustly. Againe, it is not said, that God doth alwayes measure the afflictions which he sendeth, by the sinnes that we haue committed. He hath other reasons why too viuite vs: namely he will mortifie the euill that is in vs. For often-times God is faine to preuent the vices that lurke in vs. Although wee haue not as yet offendid, yet doth God see well that we will fall into some euill, and therefore he steppeth afore it to remedie it. Besidess this, he intendeth to humble vs, that we may not put our trust in the world, nor be tied to the earth. Moreover he meeneth to know whither we will be obedient to him in aduersitie as wel as in prosperitie. Also he purposeth to know what our faith is, and whither we will flee to him for refuge. To be short, he will make vs to haue an eye to the kingdome of heauen, to the end we should know that oure welfare is there. So then, if these two points be well considered: it will be easie for vs to conclude, that God biis-feth such as keepe his commaundements, and sendeth them whatsoeuer hee knoweth to be for their behoofe. Yea: but that is not after their appetite: it is after his own knowledge: he is awayes iudge of that. Furthermore if he scourge them, he doth it for some cause: and the same is no let but that they feele his fauoure and goodnesse continually, and haue whereof to rejoyce in him. Thus ye see how all the promises of this present life are to be taken: not that God bindeth himselfe to handle vs al after one indifferent rate: but in effect his meening is, too shewe that wee shall perceiue him to be fauorable and neere at hand to such as are his. Seeing then that it is said in the lawe, that we shall liue in peace and rest if we follow Gods lawe: what is the cause that men vexe vs and trouble vs, but for that we haue made warre against god? VVhen a mortall man aduaunceth him selfe against his creator, it is meete that he also should haue enimies too vexe him and annoy him. Are we then persecuted by me? Let vs looke if we haue kept peace with God: let vs consider that we haue prouoked his displeasure: and therefore let vs not maruell though hee giue men leauie too vexe vs after that sort on their side. And here ye see why it is said in the lawe, that God will send warre vpon those that haue in such wise incountered his will. And furthermore, although no man pursue theē nor do them harme: yet ceasse they not to carrie their hangma within them.

For among other curses of the law, it is said also (whiche is the sorest curse & that which ought to abash vs most) Thou shalt be awayes as it were agast, thou shaile haue thine eyes funken in thy head, thy life shall hang as it were vpon a thread, in the morning thou shalt say, how shall I continuall night: and at night thou shalt say, Le. 26.f. 36 who will warrant me to passe ouer this night? Thou shalt be in continuall fearefulness (saith the Lord.) Behold a rightfull punishment vpon such as are not framed to the meekenesse of seruing God purelie: namely that they are driven to be their owne tormenters. Let vs marke

Deut. 28.c. 22.25.e. 28.29. Le. 26.f. 36 well then, howe it is not without cause that in the lawe this blissing is giuen vs, that we shal liue in peace and no Deut. 28.4. man shall vex vs, if we cleave vnto God without gaine-saying. For God will hold the wicked shorte, so as they shall not be able to hurt vs, though they practize what-soever they can against vs. Let vs marke also by the way, that although we be assailed outwardly, and be as it were a pray: yet neuerthelesse we must assure our selues, that God will defend vs. This said promise is not deceitfull, howbeit that now and then God will not sticke to suffer the wicked too spurre vs and to gall vs, euen to trie our constancie: also he wil not stick o suffer vs to be tempted in our mindes, so as wee shall be in some doute and distrust. And why? To the end we should call vpon him, and pray him to strengthen vs. Then shall all this come to passe. But yet in the meane time, the faithfull shall feelie that God will not cast them vp in the middes of their troubles, but that he will be at hand with them. And the faithlesse shall be vterly dismaide, so as in the ende they shall feelie, that God hath forsaken them as they deserue. As much is to be saide of all the refredew of the blissses of the law. To be short, as oft as we be troubled let vs haue an eye to our faults, and humble our selues before God, assuring our selues that the chastizementes which he sendeth are rightfull. Are we desirous that hee shoule affwage our sorrowes? Let vs runne vnto him, and let vs ceasse from misdoing. Notwithstanding, (as I haue said alredy) we must not therfore imagin that god holdeth one ordinarie measure of punishing offenders [after the rate of their deserfe.] VVhe see how he chastiseth men in this world, some more and some lesse, yea and hee reserueth many punishments to the last daye. Therefore wee must not pronounce suche a definitiue sentece in generall, as Zophar hath done. And that is the cause why Job speaketh against him: yea (saith he) you are a people. Some haue expounded this sentence as though Job had ment that they whiche had spoken, had brought nothing but suche stiffe as was knownen to all men, yea euen to the very idiots. But it is cleane contrarie. For his meening is to say, It seemeth that you are the whole world, it seemeth that wisdome shal die with you. And thinke ye that I haue no witte? Esteeme ye me too be your vnderling? The thinges that ye alledge are too well knowne. Therefore must I be faine to be despised of them that call vpon God and are herd of him: that is to say, of such as God seemeth to fauoure, and therfore agreeeth to all that they wish. I must be fayne too bee a mockingstocke to such folke, I must be faine to be as a torch that wasteth, which is despised of you that ar rich. To be short, they that hold God in their hand (saith he) do boldly spite him and prouoke him. And all this while the tentes of the wicked and of the vnthrifites do prosper.

Heereby Job sheweth how it is a great folly to affirme generally and without exception, that God doth in thys present life punish all suche as haue offendid him, and that as soone as a man hath done amisse, God redresseth it by and by, and hath his hand vp to take suche vengeance as the partie hath deserued. VVhe see the cleane contrarie. This (as I said afore) seemeth to be repugnant to the doctrine of the law, where it is said, that God will curse all the transgressors of his commiandements, and that he will shewe his fauoure and goodnesse towards those that keepe them. Men see that the hauockmakers are as it were fauored at his hand: and men see that the good are despised and disquieted. VVhat is meant by that: Did God iest when he promised to blisse the faithfull, and pronounced such a curse vpon the despisers of his wold? No: But I haue alredy loozened this knot, by shewing that God executeth not his iudgements all after one rate in this world. And why? VVhe must awayes beare in mind what hath bin said heretofore: that is too witte, that if God should punish those that haue done amisse, like for like (as they say,) so as if the faulte were greate, the punishment should be answerable to it, and if the faulte were light, the chasteizment should be suddene vpon them: and that the good should be deit with after their harts desire: whereto shoule the comming of oure Lord Iesus Christ serue, and the resurrection which we waite for? There shoule be no more hope: we wold conclude, behelde, God sheweth himselfe to be the iudge of the world: and let him do well that listeth, if he will receiue well at Gods hand: there wold bee no more anye heauenly life: wee shoule haue our heauen heere. So the we see that God should prouide ill for our welfare, if he should make the punishments like to the offences of all them that do amisse. And therefore it is requisite that diverse yea and the most part of punishments should be reserued. VVhen God punisheth the wicked, well, it is to make vs walke in feare and wariness: and also it sheweth vs that we cannot escape his hand. For he iudgeth without respect of persons. Then must we conclude, that all the faultes whiche are committed at this daye, and which abide vnpunished as in respecte of thys presente lyfe, shal come too accounte at the ende, that is to witte, when the great assyes are held.

Lo howe Job speaketh not agaynst the doctrine of the lawe, but agaynst the false exposition that is gyuen by Zophar, who woulde that GOD shoulde presently make suche execution of his iudgements, as hee shoulde leauie no faulte vnfounde oute, nor wee neede too wayte for anye further dooyng.

But

But it falleth not out so, as hath bin shewed afore. Hereby wee bee taught to pray God to giue vs the spirite of wisedome, that we may applie well to our owne vse the doctrine that is true and good, so as we may haue skill to take profite by it. For heere we see a doctrine that is very profitable for our edifying, when God sheweth vs that if we serue him, we shall not lose our laboure, but he will mainteine vs continually, and make vs to perceiue it all our life throughout. For what a thing were it if we shuld thinke that God regardeth vs not? Or that all the seruice 10 that we do him, slippeth away without any regard had to it on his part? Therefore we must come to that whiche Esay saith. Be ye contented, for the righteous shall receiue his hire. Otherwise it wold betide vs as Dauid confesseth that it happened vnto him, namely that hee was as good as slidden away, that his foote was slipped, and that he was at the poynt to fall as if he had bin vpon yce, at such time as he thoughte that his washing of hys hands in innocencie and his seruing of God, had bin in vayne. Then must we understand that God watcheth 20 ouer all the world, and that hee knoweth who they bee which seeke to serue and honoure him: and also that he hath his eyes vpon the wicked, as it is said in the Psalme:

Psal.34.c.16
17. so that in the end he must needs shewe, that he cannot beare so great a contempt of his grace. But in the meane season let vs tarrie Gods leysure till he sende his iudgements in due time. For it is not for vs to hasten them: It were a great doltishnesse if we wold haue God to pu-nish the faulcs of such as prouoke his wrath, presently as soone as the toy taketh vs in the head. Yea verely: but he 30 will delay it till another time. Is it not in him? Is it for vs to abridge him of his libertie? Behold why I said that we haue neede to pray God to giue vs the spirite of wisedome, to the end we may not take the saide texte of the lawe after our owne imagination, but that we may bee good expounders of it, so as we do not as Zophar dothe heere, who concludeth, that all such as serue God must be rewarded out of hand, and that this present life must be as a Paradis to the, and that God must be favorable to them that all the world may see it, and that he shew it 40 in very deede. He doth not so, saith Job. VVhy so? For ye see that the wicked are in prosperitie, and prouoke God so much the more boldly. Sith the eace standeth so: ex-periee sheweth vs that God will not execute his iudgements out of hande, but holdeth them in couert and in suspence, vntill the houre that he thinketh good. In the meane while, the good and the children of God, euen they that haue walked before him with a singlemeaning heart, may be scourged extrームly. Yet m.uit not that bee imputed to their sinnes, as though they were the furthest out of square of all men, so as it shoud be said, Such a man is punisched rigorously and therefore it must be concluded that he is a heynouse offender, and that God as it were abhorret him. It is not so: but God knowes wherefore he scourgeth the good, he hath diuerse reasons too do it, and it is not for vs to giue sentence of it. It is not for vs to saye, That man hathe sinned more greciously than others, seeing that God vseth such roughnesse towards him. Thus ye see how we must restrayne the promises and threatnings of the lawe, to Gods prouidence, and to the curse thereof, such as we see it to be daily. The threatnings of God are true when he sayth, that he will curse the transgressers. Yea, but he executeth it not at the first day. God must do his worke as it pleaseth him selfe, in such proportion and measure as he knowes to be conuenient. God promiseth to blisse those that serue him and walke according to his will: yea, but yet for all that, he will haue authoritie to afflict them. And why?

Euen for their welfare and for their saluation. He ceas-feth not to be alwayes neere at hand with them, and too heere them at their neede, and to make them perceiue how profitable their afflictions are to them: and yet for a time they be as it were plunged ouer head and eares, and they be tossed too and fro, so as they wote not where to become. And why? It is good for them to be melanned to their welfare. Lo how God is soothfast in his promises and in his threatnings, and yet gouerneth the worlde in suche wise by his prouidence, as it seemeth that the godly haue lost their laboure in seruing him, and that the wicked haue the bridle laid looce in their necke to skoffe at God, as if they were scaped out of his hand. So will it seeme to vs if we iudge by that which we see present-ly, and according as wee measure things by oure owne witte. Then let vs humble our selues and say, VVel, God is iudge of the world: howbeit that appeereth not at the first blow: therefore how close so euer he keepe himselfe; yet neverthelesse wee must haue the faich and hope in vs to conclude, that the thing which is unknowne to vs as now, shal be shewed vs in the end. But now let vs come to Iobs words as they be set downe here. You be a people, and wifdome shall dye with you. Heereby he meant to re-preesse the foolish haultinesse and presumption of them that haue spoken. For otherwise there is no dealing with such as are so puffed vp with vaine trust of their owne skill: men must needs shew them their follie. True it is that oftentimes men shall nothing availe by so doing. For he that is throughly sotted in his owne fond ouerweening, whatsoeuer a man tell him, will neverthelesse be wedded to his owne opinion, and take him selfe too be that which he is not. Yet notwithstanding when wee are to encounter against such as miswrest Gods truth, we must not sticke to shewe them their follie and ignorance. Verely it may not be done as though men wold shew whither of them are sharperwitted or of better skil. For behold, so do they that haue nothing but ambition and vainglorie in them. Euerie of them wold faine make a great shew, He that beginneth wold faine amaze men with his talke, and he that answereth wold also aduance him selfe: very well, ye see a battell of fooles. But wee must not deale after that sort. Therefore if we encounter them that corrupt Gods truth and wrast it vnto un-truth, and that we come to shewe them their ignorance: VVe must not do it to seeme better learned or skilfuller, nor to purchase our selues the more estimation: but we must content our selues to haue made way for the truth, that it may be received, and that men be no longer wedded to such as be in reputation, to the ouerthrowe of that which was well bruided. As how? At this day a man shall see many poore sine folke hild still in their super-flitions, bycause they say, what? So many great learned men haue hild the doctrine that is followed now adayes, and stand still in the same to this heure: and will they be beguiled? Behold at what point many poore weaklings are, bycause they be forepossessed with this imagination, that it is not possible for the prelates of the Church, the learned men, and the great personages, to be ouerseen. Now if we wil teach such folke, to make them come to the knowledge of God: it is requisite that they learne to knowe the beastlynesse and ignorance of those whome they haue esteemed so highly before: & that they which lift vp them selues against God (as these superstitious hypocrites, do whiche maintaine the abhominations of the papacie at this day) shuld be conuicted of their beastlynesse. For how malapert so euer they be, yet are they so doltish, that euen the little babes may perceiue their gewgawes when they be told of them: and they are in a rage when men do so. True it is that they haue skill ynough: but they are loth that Gods truth shold by any meanes come neere the simple sort, and such as are alredy snarled in the said false opinion that I speake of. Ye see then in what wise Job rebuketh heere the euill expounders of Gods law, and such as had wrested it to a straunge meaning. For he telleth them that (as great clearkes as they wold faine seeme to be) they had not alledged any thing at all to the purpose, nor any thing that ought not to be knowne of all menne. Finally he mocketh them, saying, 10 You be a whole people, wisedome shall die with you. When as Job saith, I am not inferiour to you, I haue herte or witte as well as you: he meeneth not to magnifie himselfe thereby after the maner that I haue told you that it were a fond vaingloriousnesse if euery man shoulde on his owne side be desirous to shewe him selfe more cunning and sharpwitted than others, [as if he should saye] 20 VVhat I pray you: who is he? verely there will be much bickering among men: but yet Gods truth shall continue still. Job meeneth no more heere, but to shewe that God hath giue him the grace to know and discerne the truth better than they that are so full of ouerweening. And so ye see in what wise it may be lawfull for vs too boast our selues. Notto the ende that men should clap their hands at vs as at great learned men, and at men of great wite and knowledge. Away with all these fondestoyes: for it is vnpossible for vs to settle our minds to the seruing of God, except we forget all that euer concerneth our selues. So long as we haue an eye to our selues, 30 and couet to be had in estimation: it is certayne that oure Lord will suffer vs to fall into many oversightes, and to become a laughingstocke to our vter shame. For heere ye see also the hire of all such as couet to be had in estimation. And it is good reason that it shold be so, seeing that Gods truth is thereby as it were laid flat vpon the ground, and in the meane while men haue no regard but to their owne honoure. VVhat is to be done then? VVe must forget our owne selues: but yet so as therewithal we aduance Gods gracieuse gifts, namely too the ende that when we haue a good eace, the same may be maintained, 40 and that the things which we shall alledge may be receiued with authoritie. If a man be taken for an idiot, and haue neither skil nor witte, what will become of it? Nothing that he speaketh will be receiued, we will disdayne him. Then if a man intend to fare the better by aughte that is spoken, he must thinke thus with him selfe: well, God hath giuen some grace to this man, and the same grace is not to be despised: for we should do wrong vnto God, because it proceedeth of the holy Ghost. Sith it is so, let vs beware that we lift not vp our selues against 50 God. Thus ye see how that the cause why we do humbly receiue good doctrine, is to know that the man which teacheth vs hath bin taught of God before. Lo to what intent Job declareth that he had witte, and was no whit inferiour to those that did set so great price and estimation on them selues. To beshort let vs learne to aduance the gracieuse giftes that God hathe put into vs. Yea verely, not to exalt ourselues by them: but to the intent that the thing that we haue receiued may profit and bring foorth frute. Thus much concerning the person of 60 Job. And heerewithall also the faithfull are warned, that when they see a man hath receiued excellent gifts of the holy Ghost, so as he is able to aduance Gods honoure, and to edify his Church: they must giue care to him, and he must be receiued with all reverence in that which he shal say. VVhy so? For otherwise it were a despising of God. Now let vs come to that which Job saith: I am (saith he) as it were despised of my friends. True it is, that as the words lic, he saith he is as it wer despized of his friend & forsake of him: but in very deed, he speketh of himselfe in the third person. Afterward he likeneth himselfe to a torch or a linke that wasteth & is shunned. VVhat can a ma looke for in a torch whē it cometh to the end? For the waxe droppeth downe, & me draw backe from it that it ray the not, and if any of it light vpō them it is ynough to marre their garmēt. Therfore whē a linke or a torch hath lighted me for a time, & serued men as lōg as it can: they cast it away, every ma shunnes it, & ther is nothing more in it but stinch. This is it that Job meaneth in saying that the eace stood euē so with himself. Ye see that I am redy to fall (saith he) and therefore ye despise me. He sheweth the reason of this similitude, saying: because ye see I am as it wer at the brim of my graue. That is the cause why I am forsakē of you. And he saith also that the rich men do mocke him that is afflicted. And why? They call vpon God (saith he) & he heareth the. Job meeneth not hereby that the wicked waite for their welfare at gods hand, or that they seeke it in him: but hee meeneth that they haue the world at will, so as it semeth that they haue god in their hāds & that they carie him in their sleeve (as me say) according as we shall see that he addeth afterward. True it is that some expound this sentence to be ment of the Idolaters which make God to come to their hands: but that is a foolish & vnresonable expositio. For Job looked no further than to the prosperitie which the wicked haue. For al welfare cometh of God, & the wicked haue more abundance of it than other mē: and doth it not seeme then that God is as it were in league with the, and that he sootheth the, & yeldeth himselfe to their lust? A ma might properly say that God flattereth them when they liue so in rest, and prosper in suche wise as they haue shortly whatsoeuer they desire. Job then saith, that those me provoke God so much the more boldly, & yet in the meane while their houses are happie. VVhereby he meant to betoken that which I haue told you afore: that is to witte, that Zophar did him wrong in saying that he was a great sinner. VVherefore: For (saith he) the contrarie is to bee seene. Now let vs come to that which he saith cōcerning their contempt. I am despised (saith he) as a link or a torch that is wasted. Heere in the person of Job wee be taughte that our Lord giueth the world leaue to skorne vs, and suffereth our state to be so miserable as it seemeth that we be vtterly forlorne: and therefore behoueth it vs too be pacient. VVhy so? VVe see what befell vnto Job: and wold we be more deere than hee. Seeing the that so excellent a seruant of God was so giuen vp that men mocked him and tooke him to be a castaway: let vs not be astonisched nor murmur against God if he suffer vs too come to the same poyn: nother let vs thinkle him ouercruell for handling vs so: but let vs consider howe it is good for vs to be meekened after that sort: let it waken vs: & let vs learne that our hope must not be rooted here beneath, but fastned with sure ankerhold in heauē, as the Heb.6.d.19 Apostle saith. Is it not a great lesson whē the mockages of the world areordeined to our saluation? True it is that such laughters shal in the end be flong in the faces of the wicked that as now do fling the at vs: but in the meane season they be profitable for vs, in that (as I saide) they make vs to regard God and to know that our hope lieth and consisteth wholly in him. Thus ye see what we haue to remember when it is saide, I am laughed to skorne of those that haue bin my friends. Verely it is the greeuousest temptation that can be, when they that haue loued vs heretofore, do as it wer abhorre vs: it is hard to digest. But seeing that it befell vnto Job, let vs follow his steps, & stoupe when God listeth to abace vs after that sorte.

Hee saith expressly that his foote slid: meining that so long as he was able to stand, he had bin as a torch or link. For it will do a man easie to haue a burning torch, and the lighte of it will do him seruice: yea so long as it is whole and able to last. But if it be once wasted, a man will cast it away into the canell: for he that beareth it must needs burne his handes, and there remaineth nothing but a little glimcning dark smoke. So then, Iobs intent is to shewe, that during the time that God hild him vp he was honored and esteemed: but nowe that hee is falne, he is as it were cast away. Heereby we be warned, that sometimes we may be as it were forespent, so as men shall see no more light in vs, there shall be nothing lefte but a little smoke, it will seeme that we shall fall in peeces, there shall be no whole peece left in vs, and we shal come too the last cast: but let vs take it paciently, forasmuch as Job came to the same poynt before vs. And seeing that he hath shewed vs the path, let vs follow him, and pray God to strengthen vs in such wise as we may not vtterie decay. Touching this saying, That the despisers of God do call vpon him and he heareth them: as I haue told you alredy, it is referred to the common per ceuerance of men. For it seemeth that the wicked are at a couenant with God, to obteyne whatsoeuer they list at his hand. True it is that the veriest hipocrits and the loosest liuers do in deede cal vpon God: howbeit, that is but in way of mockerie, [as to say,] O that God wold gyue me such a thing. When a wicked man is desirous to rob another man of his goodes, [he prayes in his hart,] O that God wold gyue me such a mans goodes. This is not a praying vnto god: but a disguising of him, and a stayning of his maiestie. To be short, men are starke mad whē they be not ashamed to mocke God after that sort, by wrapping him in their sinnes. They be cursed kaytifes, and yet as farre out of square as their desires be, they wold fayne haue God intermedle him selfe with them. Then is there no right calling vpon Gods name among the wicked, nother is there any true prayer. Thus ye see how it is to be taken when Job saith heere, that forasmuch as the wicked desire what they list, and receive it at Gods hand, it seemeth that God hearkneth too them: that is to say, it seemeth that he is willing to graunt them all theyr lusts. By the way let vs marke, that when the wicked desire of God whatsoeuer their hearte wisheth, yea euen without any reuerence, or faith, or lawfull forme of prayer, but only by casting it foerth at auenture as an inordinate desire: it is to their greater damnation. Wherefore? For nature teacheth vs that we ought to resort vnto God for that which we want. Verely the wicked never bethink them selues aforehand to say, God must be honored at our hande, hee holdeth all welfare and welth in his hand, he is the fountaine thereof, from thence must we draw, and therefore it is reason that we should craue it of him with all lowlinesse. The wicked can no skill of that. But yet doth God thrust them forward with a blind motion, so as they be constrained to know how that God is he at whose hand we must demaund that whiche wee want: according as we see how they say, I wold that God wold gyue me such a thing. Then haue they this knowledge ingrauen in their harts, which maketh the so much the more guiltie before God for dishonoring his holye name after that sort, by mingling him with their outrageouse desires and horrible wishes. And heereby we bee warned that when we pray vnto God, wee must do it with all reuerence, calling vpon him with this full beleefe rooted in our harts, that we be wretched, and that nothing can remedie our miseries and calamities, except we flee for refuge to the meere goodnessse of our gracious G O D, and that it please him to give vs of the goodes that he hath in his hand. By and by after, Job saith That the tents of the wicked shall be in peace: verely (saith he) because they bold God and make him come into their bands: and yet euen those same do prouoke him the more boldly. Behold whereof commeth the contemptuousnesse of the vnbelleuers, and what is the cause that the wicked are not contented to vaunt themselues as though God fauored them, but also proudly and cruelly trample all those vnder their feete, which walke singly and vprightly, saying, what is he? and what is he? For it seemeth to them that Gods exalting of them is to the end they shuld despise others and shake them off. And heere ye see a temptation which is troublesom and hard to ouercome. But so much the more standeth it vs on hand to marke well this text. Then let vs vnderstand that it is no newe cace, that the wicked are now adayes aduanced, and that they raunge abrode and triumph for a time. It hath alwayes bin so: but God suffereth it to their greater decay, and he suffereth it also to meeken vs. Then if the wicked happen to haue their full scope: let vs not lose our courage for all that, but let vs serue our God stedfastly, and let vs glory in this hope that he hath giuen vs a lasting life, notwithstanding that he suffer vs to be combered as now. For if we be not miscaried when we see God aduaunce naughtipacks and set them as it were aboue the cloudes: if we be not ouerthrowne thereby, but continue alwayes sure and stedfast in our vocation: beholde that is a good warrant of our faith. And this is it also which I said afore, namely that it is good and profitable that God shoulde trie vs after any sort: and that when the same happeneth, we ought not to thinke it straunge, considering that it hath bin so before Iobs time. These then that make God come into their hands, euen those prouoke him most malapartly of all. This maner of speech betokeneth not that God fauoreth or loueth the wicked No certesse, but so doe we iudge according to the fleshe, because we say, that God loueth all those that haue prosperitie. Neuerthelesse, al the prosperitie that the wicked haue in this worlde, is but to their destruction and ruine, because God is not on their side. Although they seeme to be fauoured at his hande, and to be his deere derlings: yet in the ende they shall perceyue, that all that euer they haue shall be turned to their destruction. But on our side, although God seeme to shrinke from vs, and make no countenaunce to helpe vs, but seemeth to bee separated from vs: yet let vs learne, I say let vs learne to humble ourselues vnder his mightie hande, to submitte our selues to his good will, and to follow his worde, waiting till he shew by effect, that he was alwayes neare at hand to vs. And in the meane while let our faith continue alwayes in true stedfastnesse. And although God plague vs: let vs not be weerie of seruing him, but let vs hold on our race continually, till hee haue made vs too passe out of all the encounters, and out of all the temptations that we haue to indure in this world.

But let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgmēt of our faultis, praying him to make vs feele them in such wise, as wee may come to submit our selues vnto him, not to stande vpon the defence of our owne righteousnesse and sound dealing: but to yeld our selues guiltie, & to desire him to vse his infinite mercie towards vs. And that forasmuch as hee hath alredy shewed vs the way whereby wee must come vnto him, that is to witte, by bringing vnto him the obedientnesse of our Lord Iesus Christ, that by the meane therof al our faultis may be buried and forgotten, it may please him to receive vs in the said name, and not only forgyue our finnes, sinnes, but also gouerne vs in such wise by his holy spirit, as we may alwayes get the vpper hand, euuen till oure liues end, yea and euuen ouer death it selfe and ouer al the temptations that the diuell is able to raise. That it maye please him to graunt this grace, not only to vs but also to all people and &c.

The.xlvj.Sermon,which is the second vpon the twelfth Chapter.

7. Askethe cattell, and they vvill teache thee: askc the foules of the airc, and they vvill tell thce.
8. Or speake to the earth, and it vvill informe thee: and to the fishes of the Sea, and they vvill report it to thee.
9. VVho is he that knowveth not thesethings, that the hand of God hath done this?
10. In vvhose hand is the soule and all the breath of all living things.
11. Doth not the eare discerne vvords, and the roofe of the mouth the sauour of vittells?
12. There is vvisdome in old men, and age bringeth skilfulness.
13. In him is vvisdome and strength: in him is counsell and skilfulness.
14. Hevvill throwv dovvne, and no man shall be able to build vp: he vvill shut vp, and no man shall be able to let out.
15. Hevvill restrayne the vvaters, and all shall drie vp: he vvill send them foorth, and they shall overflow the earth.
16. He hath strength and might in him: of him commeth both the deceiued and the deceiuer.

O shew that there was nothing but meere ambition and vainglory in al that Zophar had saide too him, Job telleth him that hee knoweth well what Gods prouidence importeth in gouerning the whole worlde, and that it is a very manifest doctrine, 30 so as the other man needed not to haue made so greate protestation of the thing which he ment to propounde. For these (saith he) are knownen things. Yea and it was a great follie in Zophar, to thinke him selfe to haue had a great witte in magnifying Gods prouidence after that sort. Job therefore sheweth that all this geere is common and ordinarie ynough: and afterward for a second point he declareth that hee wondered that his friends did no better understand the matter that he had discoursed afore. VVhereto serueth it you (saith he) to haue eares? For if you eat or drinke, your palat can welynough discerne your foode whither it be sauorie or no. Therefore like as the palat is given a man to tast the thinges that he eateth: so do the eares serue to heare words. But it seemeth that ye bee deafe and haue heard nothing. I thus much for the second point.

Thirdly it is saide, That if a man will seeke true wisdome, hee muste not staye vppon men nor vpon creatures. It is hee (sayeth hee) in whome is all wyse-dome, bycause hee had bene vpbraided afore, that hee voutsafed not to inquire of the auncients, nor regarded the time past. Yea, (saith he) if I beleue you, I must hold my selfe altogether vnto men. But the wisdome of them vanisheth away. VVe must rather go vnto God: there must we seeke all the sure stay that we can haue to rest vpon: we shall alwayes be in a mammering vntill we be wise by being taught in his schoole. And further wee must vnderstand, that all that euer he shall haue shewed vs, shall be nothing in comparison of the infinite wisdome which is referred behind. And for prooife here- 60 of he will cast downe, and no man shall build vp: if hee list to shut vp a man and to keepe him in prison, no man may deliuier him. So then let vs vnderstand, that there is a wisdome in God, which is ouerhigh and secret for vs. Verely (saith he) vnto him belong, both he that beguileth and he that is beguiled. As if he shoulde say, God will send the spirit of erroure (this is a straunge thing, and suche a one as we thinke veryhard) and he will so blind those that ought to keepe them selues from beguiling, as they shall be vtterly blockish: and that commeth not to passe withoute hys will. But thys maketh vs at oure wittes endes.

Therefore wee must conclude, that it is too high a wisedome for vs too attayne too the greate secretes of Gods iudgements. And that is my meening (saith hee) to the ende we debate notheere in vayne.

VVe see now what is the effect of jobs words. Howbeit, that we maye receiue good instruction by thys sentence, let vs marke, first that Job meaneth that Gods glorie doth in such wise shine in the whole worlde and in every creature: that if wee had suche discretion as we ought to haue, the same were ynough to make vs learned. VVhat is the cause then that wee becomme so brutish, and that we know not what belongeth to God? It is as much to say as we marke not that which is altogether visible and open to oure sighte. Some man too excuse him selfe, will say: I am no clerk, I never wente to schoole. Yea verely, but ye neede no more but too learne of the brute beastes. The earthe whiche is speechlesse, and the fisches which are dumb, can teache vs of God: not all that is in hym, but to give vs some vnderstanding of him. But wee are become starke doltes: and therefore wee must conclude, that there is none other let but our owne vnthankfulness, and that wee voutsafe not too open our eyes to see the thinges that God sheweth vs.

Beholde heere a texte whiche is well woorth the marking. And it is not in thys place onely that the holy Ghost telleth vs that Gods glory shewes it selfe every where: but it is sayde, that the heauens tell it foorth. The goodly order whiche wee see betweene day and nighte, the starres which wee beholde in the skye, and all the residew are vnto vs as a lively picture of Gods maiestie. And in good faith, although the Starres speake not: yet euen in holding their peace they crie so loude, as there shall neede none other witnesse againte vs at the latter daye, bycause wee haue not taken heede too that whyche hathe bin shewed vs there.

Yee see then what wee haue too beare in mynde, according also as saint Paule saith in the first chapter to the Romaines, That whereas God is inuisible to himselfe and in his owne being, he hath vttered himselfe openly ynough

ly yuough in his creatures, to the intent wee should bee lefte without excuse : and(as it is saide in the Acts of the Apostles)he hath not left him selfe without witnessse, but crieth lowde and shrill in his creatures, that all goodnesse commeth of him. Now if God haue created thys world, and all is in his hand and vnder his subiection : I pray you is it not reason that we should do him homage, when as we hold our life of him and are wholly his? And if we do it not, needeth he to make any long proces too condemne vs? No:for our naughtiness is too common in that we haue denied the obedience whiche is due to our maker:labored to plucke our selues away frō him : and (in sled of honoring him) spited him with our vices and corruptions. Seeing then that all this is notoriously knowne:are we not vtterly confounded? Therefore let vs remember well what is said heere : namely that there is no excuse of ignorance left for men if they go about to alledge that they knew not God, and that it is to high a thing for them to atteyne vnto. VVhy go they not to schoole to the beasts? For they wold bee sufficient teachers for them. There is nother Asse nor Oxe but hee could teach vs what God is. Did the beasts create themselves? Doth not men see that welynough? Now, when it is said that God made all things : do we not consider to what end?namely that he hath applied all to our vse? Doth not this shew that we be bound vnto him exceedingly? VVhat things hath he giuen vs aboue all other creatures? Seeing he hath shewed him selfe so bountifull towards vs, is it meete that the powring out of his riches should be as it were to cast them in the mire? Is it 30 not reason that wee shoulde set store by the goodness which he hath made vs to feele? So then, the comparison whiche we make betweene oure selues and the beastes ought of right to bring vs so far as to worship and serue God, according to the discerning of good and euil, which he hath ingraued in our heart. But wee through oure retchlesnesse, dulnesse, and vrthankfulness do so burie all things, that oftentimes it is to be seene, that the verie beasts haue more witte and reason than we haue. True it is that when it is said heere, that the beasts teach vs : that is,not by their examples:but because we haue to behold the glory of God in them. Furthermore (as I haue touched alredy) the very beastes do shewe vs our duetie: they do their duetie better than we : and thereby are we condemned double. And that also is the thing wherevnto the Prophet Esay sendeth vs. The Asse(saih he)knoweth his masters stable, & the Oxe knoweth his owners crib:but my people knoweth not me. VVe will say wee be of Gods Church and of his house, and we could find in our hart to be aduaunced higher. But he saith that in 50 his Church he makes him selfe to be herd,his voice soundeth high and cleere:and yet for all that, we know it not. And whereof commeth it that there is more witte and reason in an Oxe or in an Asse, than in mortall men? VVherefore hath he giuen vs reason? Yea why haue we bin taught his word and his will: Is not this an vtter peruerting of Gods goodness? VVe see then after what sort men may be rebuked by the example of beasts,when they be slouthfull in discharging their duetie to Godward:and(as I said)that turneth to their double confusyon. But in this text I ob ment that the creatures do sufficiently teach vs how we ought to honour God. And why? Let vs but open our eyes,saith he. VVe neede not to be learned,nor to haue any great capacitie. For we cannot cast our eye vpward or downward, but God presenteth him selfe on all sides. In what sort? I haue told you that his glory is visible throughout al things. And wherin consisteth Gods glory:In his power,goodnesse,wisdom, and iustice. VVe see that God hath set the world in as good order as can be. Ye see a wonderful wisdome wherat we ought to be rauished. There is an infinite power in that God mainteinheth and preserueth the things that he hath made, and that the whole is vpheld in his full state. For it may well seeme that that wer an impossible thing. Ye see then how we ought to reuerence Gods mighty power. There is also his goodnesse:For wherefore hathe he made the world? VVherefore hath he stufed it with such riches:VVherefore hath he so decked it: Is it not to vtter his loue, and specially his mercie towards men? according as it is said in the Psalms that he extendeth his mercie euen vnto the beasts. And what shall betide vs Psal.30.b.6.7 then who are much neerer to him, and in whom he hath put much more noblenesse without comparison? Ye see the how Gods goodnesse sheweth and declarereth it selfe. VVe see his righteousnesse in that he watcheth ouer his creatures, and careth for them:and therewithall on the other side we see also his iustice:we see how he governeth the world after a wonderful fashion, so that although the wicked seeke nothing else but to bite at it,yet must they be faine to be confounded by it. Therefore let vs learne to applie our indeuoure better to the beholding of Gods works. VVhen the sunne shineth,let vs consider that God kindleth that light, to the end we should be led and guided vnto him by beholding the heaven and the earth and all things conteyned in them:that we shold do him homage for the benefites that he bestoweth vpon vs: and that nothing might hinder vs from marking and considering them throughly. Lo how God wold haue vs to comprehend what he is. Not that we can attaine to the vttermost depth of that wisdome, (for it is too deepe a gulfe:) but yet for al that, it behoueth vs to be diligente, & to do our indeuoure that we may prooue good schollers in Gods schoole,according to our abilitie. If we do not so, doutlesse it shall at the latter day bee cast in oure teeth, that we haue not conceiuied that which the verie beasts and the dumb and witlesse creatures haue shewed vs. The Angels of heauen are redy to declare Gods will: 40 the same hath bin witnessed to vs by the Prophets and Apostles:and specially by our lord Iesus Christ. If we fare not the better by it, what excuse shall we make? But although we were bereft of the holy scripture, and had no doctrine at all: Yet notwithstanding euen the thinges that the beasts do shew vs were ynough to. cōdemne vs, and to bereue vs of all excuse. To the intēt the that it be not cast in our teeth at the last day,that we haue wilfully shut our eyes whē God wold haue drawne vs vnto him and offered himselfe familiarly vnto vs, to the ende wee shuld haue knowē him:Let vs bethinke vs better of this matter thā we haue done heretofore,& let vs follow this warning of Iobs,Aske the beasts & they wil answer thee, talke with the earth and it wil shew thee, the birds of the aire wil informe thee,& the fishes of the sea haue skill to tell thee,yea though they be neuer so dumb. Thus much cōcerning this sentēce. Now let vs come to the seconde point which Job alledged heere. Ibe palat(saih he)try- etb the tast of vitte's, and the eare discerneth words. Hereby he findeth fault with his friends for letting the thinges 60 passe which he had spoke afore,& for that they had not voursafed to consider whervnto it tended,as if they had bin deaf. Job the blameth the for such retchlesnes:but the matter pointeth at vs all. For prooife hereof let vs mark how quick a tast we haue to discern our food:euery ofvs hath skill to say, This is good for me,I haue a good appetite to this. And not only our palat, but also all the rest of our sensēs ar suttle inough. For if we spie a thing that delighteth vs:our eies are neuer off of it. If we haue a mind to go to runne any whither: we spare nother hands nor legs. To bee short, a man will be sharpe witted ynoch. yea and ouersharp witted, in all things that like his flesh, and are to the contention of his foolish lusts. But whē he commeth to the iudging of any doctrine that mighte be for our soule helth, and whereby we should receiue edifying: there we bee such dullards, as it seemeth that we be but blocks of wood. And wherof commeth it that we be so dolish, but because we bestowe not all oure whole witte in such wise as were requisite we should?

1 Cor. 15. d. 33. Moreover, our eares shew that they keepe not an egall measure. For if a man tell vs a foolish tale, or vter any lewde talke, which is as a poyson to infecte vs with (as Saint Paule saith:) we haue our eares attentive to it, a man needeth not to tell vs one thing twice, wee vnderstand him incontinent. For we come with a hungrie appetite to such things, so as we cannot bee satified with sond things and trifling toyes, no nor with things that are hurtfull and wicked. Yee see then wherevnto a man casteth him selfe altogether. But in the meane season if

Esa. 28. c. 9. 10. God tell vs any thing that is good to edify vs: there wee fare as the Prophete Esay sayeth, that if a man tell vs a thing two or three times, yet we let it slip away, and perceiue it not. For the prophet Esay likeneth those that are so vnlustie and dulheaded (bycause God bereueth them of witte and reason for their naughtinesse sake) vnto little babes, to whome folke say, A. A. And rightly: for when a man hath told it them fower or fve times, and well harped vpon it, they will perchance say, A: but if a man aske them what letter that is, they know not awhit more. Afterward one wil come with B. b. So long as a má is pronouncing of the letter to them, they can say B. for once. But if a man aske them anone after what letter it is. They by and by forget it. The Prophet Esay saith that a man must be fayne to repeate things after such a sort to those that haue not profited in Gods schoole, as hee must chaw euery word and euery sillable to them, and yet they will be neuer the wiser, nother will the thing euer sinke into their heads. Euen so fare we also. VVherefore let vs marke well that the holy Ghost by the mouth of Iob heere, doth not only blame those three men: but also condemne vs all for being so attentive to heare of things that belong to our bodily life, and that in that behalf a má needeth not to tarrie til we haue bin at schoole, and are become clerks. For every man can be a master and doctor for his owne pleasure and profit. If [we can say,] This comes well to my purpose, this is for mine owne tooth: incontinently we haue concluded vpon the matter. There neede no long perswasions, and muche lesse any long talke about the matter. For we preuent it, we be altogether vpon the spurre, and there is nothing more nimble than our witte when it is to be applied too sond things. But when we come to Gods doctrine, wee be worse than beasts. And whereof commeth that? Our mouth can iudge of our foode, but Gods doctrine shall haue no fauoure with vs. VVe tast it not, insomuch that we cannot discerne betweene truth and yntruth. Let vs marke then that at the last day there shall necde none other thing to confound al mankind, but only this article, that we haue bin so much giuen to worldly things, as we had no leysure to giue eare to the things that were for the euerlasting welfare of our soules: and that wee haue heere degenerated into brute beastis, by reason that our wittes haue bin tangled either in riches, or in pleasures, or in other vanities and wicked affections. Looke vpon a má that coueteth the goodes of this world. VVhat wil he do? A man shall not beguile him of one penie: hee is alwayes in his recknings, and counting vpon this and that: and nothing scapeth him without looking to: I may gayne by this, saith he: his mind wandreth abrode: he aduentureth, and trudgeth vp and downe. And whence commeth suche wittinesse? It is bycause a mans affection leades him and carries him away in such wise, as he knoweth not where he is. VVe see as much in those that laboure to come to estimatiō and to set themselues in credite and dignitie. Those also will gather all the meanes that are possible to aduaunce them, and they will haue reasons to alledge for them selues on all sides. Yea euen the whoremōgers that are caried away with a beastly lust, and the drūkards that are as swine, haue a skilfulness in their kind of tast after what manner they may compasse their wickednesse. And what shall become of vs then, when we haue no witte to come home vnto God? Doth not this happen bycause we hold skorne to vse the thing that God hath giuen vs, as I said afore? But heere is yet one other accusation against men, whiche is, that we see many now adayes whiche thinke themselues to haue a faire starting hole to knowe nothing of God and to cast all doctrine vnder foote, if they can say, O see I pray ye, I am not able to iudge, a man may beguile me vnder coloure of God and of Religion, and therefore it were better for me to know nothing. Yea, and what an vnthankfulness is that? God hath giue vs eares to here him obediētly: and we say, As for me, I wil make no seeking for the matter. And that is all one as if a man should say, I will not eat, for there are euill meates: a man might give me a naughtie weed that would poyson me, and therefore it were better that I eat no meate at all. If a man should make so foolish a determination in him selfe, were hee not worthy to starue? Lo how they deale which say, I will not knowe the holy scripture, I maye bee deceiuied. VVretched creature as thou art, it is the foode of thy soule. Our Lord nourisheth mens bodies with meate and drinke: and he nurrishest their soules with his word: and yet for all that we would refuze that foode for feare of som corruption: and is not this a manifest tempting of God? And (as I said) wherefore are eares giuen vs, but to heare and herken, and to receiue whatsoeuer God saith vnto vs? True it is that of our selues we shall not be able to do it, except God enlighten vs. But yet if wee come meekely to heare what is told vs in the name of God, and that we desire him to gouerne vs with his holy spirit that we may not be abused by vntruth: he will shewe that he hath not made our eares for nought, but to heare and receive that which is told vs, with all feare and reuerence. Thus ye see what wee haue too marke in thys streyne. And so in effect the holy Ghost exhorteth vs to herken vnto God when he speaketh to vs, and to be diligent in receiuing the doctrine of saluation, not doubting but hee will make it preuale in vs, if wee haue our eares redy and well disposed to heare what he saith. But now let vs come to that which Iob addeth: VVis dome is in old men, and age bringeth skilfulness: In hyn is wisdome, skilfulness, and counsell, and altogether. Heere Iob maketh comparison betweene God and men. For the poynte whereof he had bin accused was this, that he regarded not the time past, that he considered not the thinges of antiquitie, and that hee bare not in minde what had bin taught by such as had liued long time in the world. And heerepon he saith, yea verely, there is wisdome in olde men. Truly this may bee taken in way of mockerie, as thus: you alledge me the auncient times and old men, to the end I should hold me to them: and what shal become of God? Then must God be bereft of his honoure, that tmen may take his roome. But Iob graunteh heere that there may be some wisdome in men, sobeit that they be not exalted aboue measure. As if he shold say, True it is that if a man haue liued long time heere and seene much, he may haue gotten some skill: but must the same be a derogation to God? No; all the wisdome of men is but vanitie, although it deserue to be esteemed in it self. For if comparison be made betwixt men and God: all that euer they haue must needs be dashed downe, and only God must be reputed for wise, and me must know that there is no wisdome but in him. Thus yee see Iobs meening. But we haue a good and profitable lesson too gather out of this sentence. Firste it is certaine that wee ought not to despise the wisdome that is in men, whome God sendeth to vs as helps. If there bee any folke that haue seene much, God intendeth to teach vs by them: and if we hold skorne to profite our selues by that which they shew vs, to whome do we offer wrong? Euen to the liuing God. Also if God haue giuen a man a good witte, so as he is able to giue counsell and aduise: or if he giue him abilitie and grace to teach others: if other folke make no account of all this, but refuse it: it is certaine that the holy Ghost is trampled vnder foote. For the man that is able to instruct vs, hath it not of himself, nor of his own growing: but it is giuen him from aboue, and it is gyuen him to helpe vs withall. For when God dealeth foorth his gifts, it is not to the end that every man should keepe them too himselfe, and not make other men partners with him: but for the common edifying of vs all. Then if we be so stately, as we canot abide to be taught by those that haue good doctrine, nor to be guided by those that can give good counsell: in so doing we quench the lighte of God, and refuse the benefite which he wold bestowe vpon vs. Therefore when we haue men that are able to teach vs: wee must willingly heare them, and yeld oure selues teachable with a meeke mind, that we be not stubborne as we see the more part are. But yet must wee not hold our selues at that poynt altogither and without exception. And why? VVee see howe the wretched world is blinded at this day with the said credit giuing, in so much that men will say, VVhat? Is not the manner of liuing that men vs now adayes, of time out of al mind? VVhat a long time haue men kept themselues to it? Hathe not this bin vsed thus long time? And heereupon the wretched folke do cast them selues into destruction, when God is redy to bring them into the right way: according as we see that his word is preached to vs, to the intent it should haue full authoritie ouer vs, and that we mighte not be led into the snare by deceitfull words, as Sainte Paule saith in the fourth to the Ephesians, That me shuld not leade vs after their lure: but that God might gourne vs, and we become wise in obeying him. Ye see then that the way which we haue to hold, is that when wee haue receiuied at mens hands, the things that they can bring as Gods ministers and the instruments of his holy spirite: VVee must neuerthelesse vnderstande that God must haue the whole preheminence ouer vs, that it is he from whence all wisdome proceedeth, to the ende we be not caried away with trusting too much vnto men, too bee tossed suddainly hither and thither, but that we may be fully settled in certaintie that wee hold our doctrine of him. For the better perciuing heereof, we must note that there are two extremities. For wee shall see some brainlesse persons despise all the gifts that God giueth to men: and the vnskilfullest will be presumptuousest in that case (and that is too common a thing) in so muche as they will brag of their beastlinesse. Looke vpon a ma that neuer had any knowledge: and hee will thinke that hee hath so much more cause to stand vpon his reputation. And we see diuers now adayes which wrest the texts of the scripture to aduance themselues in greater pride. Ye see it is saide that God hideth his secrets from the wise men and great men of the worlde, and openeth them to the little ones: and yet some of the are but very beastes. But yet they glory in it, as though there were no diuinitie but in them. But what? Is it Gods will that men shuld vaunt themselues of their slendernes, too despise the gifts that are of him, & deserue to be esteemed? VVhence come all sciences? VVhence commeth the discretio that is more in one man than in another? Are they not all riuers flowing out of one fountaine, that is to witte out of the spirite of God? Yes vndoubtedly are they. So then let vs learne, not to despise Gods gifts when they appeare in men: but to profit our selues by them, and to applie them to our owne vse. For if we refuse all that is in men, without discretion: Surely that is too great a follie. Men say, A fooles bolt is soone shot: and are not we double fooles when we iudge without any knowledge or discretion? And yet we see many such: and diuerse will say, Such a thing was hild and obserued, yea and there is reason in it, howbeit forasmuch as it commeth of men, I refuze it. Nay, but what canst thou tell whither such a thing came first from God by the means of men? Therefore when a man layeth any doctrine before vs: we must not be so swift and hastie to refuze it, but we must list it. Thus yee see the modestie that we must vse to eschue the extremitie that I speake of. But there is also the other extremitie that I touched: that is to witte, as the same whiche we see in the Papists. Behold (say they) I wil hold me to that which hath bin taught me from my chilhdod, I will follow my fathers and auncestors, and that is of antiquitie. And shall God forgo his authoritie in the meane while? Must men be aduanced so high that God shuld be thrust vnder their feete? VVere it not better that the sunne were plucked out of the skie, and throwne into the botome of the sea? For beholde heere a greater and more outrageouse confusion. Therefore let vs keepe our selues well from offering suche outrage vnto God, as too leave him behind vs, and to hold our selues wholly vnto men. For our receiuing of that which commeth by men, and which God giueth vs by their meanes, must be after such a sort, as God may always haue his whole due, as he may be exalted, as both great and smal may be taught by him, and as we may protest that oure teachableness towards men, serueth not to abate any whit of Gods duetie, nor of his soueraintie which he hath ouer vs: but to guide vs vnto him, and to stoppe all mouthes when he speaketh, so as we may hold our peaces & he not be hindred to lead vs whither he listeth, and that we may (without any gainsaying) receiuē whatsoeuer proceedeth out of his mouth. Ye see the the modestie that ought to be in vs. And heereby a man may perceiue what a doltishnesse it is for the papists to say, O see humilitie is so great a vertue, as it can neuer be condemned at Gods hand, Yea verely: but what manner of humilitie is the humilitie of the Papists? It is a crouching vnto men, and shaking off of Gods yoke, yea and a spiring of him by all meanes possible. And what a diuclish humilitie is this, that the creatures should be aduaunceed and obeyed, and the creator be as a thing of nothing? Then let our humbling of our selues be after such a sort, as that for the maintenāce of the said meeknesse towards men, we may be of a mild mind, to receiuē that which is for our behoofe and profite: and yet neuerthelesse that God may reygne ouer vs, and be our only master and teacher, so as the authoritie which he lendeth to men, may be no derogation at all to himselfe. Let vs not be forepossessed with any fond imagination to say: such a man said it, and therefore it must be beleued. And who is this such a man? Is he not a mortall man? Is he not a frayle creature wherein there is nothing but vanitie? There let vs beware of sticking so much vnto men that we returne not alwayes vntoo God, nor be grounded vpon him, and that the certaintie of our fayth be not ioyned and knit to his word. Thus ye see what we haue to mark. It is he therefore in whom is wisdome, and skilfulness, and wit, and counsell. VVhe it is sayd, It is he: it is to exclude all that is in men. For when the Sunne shineth, it darkneth the light of all the Starres: and what can men doo when God commeth among them? And that is the cause why it is sayd by the prophet Esay, That all creatures must ceasse when God shyneth. And Job ment to repeate exprely heere with many woords, that the perfection of all wisdome is in God: too the intent wee should not surmyse that it needed to be supplyed: as we see men so foolish, that if they haue receyued anie blisising at Gods hand, they must be adding of somewhat to it, they must make some mingling of it. No no: there must be no patching & piecing in that matter. VVhe God putteth his wisdome into vs, it must be vsed pure and simply, and men must not adde anie thing to it whosomeuer it be. But Job ment to speepe yet farther (as I haue touched afore) namely that there is in God a secret wisdome which surmounteth all the capacite of man, and wherevnto wee cannot attayne as yet. True it is that Gods wisdome is not diuers and of sundrie sortes as in respect of it selfe: (for his wisdome is a thing inseparable, and such as cannot be diuided or parted) But in respecte of vs and to our seeming, 30 God is wise after two sortes: that is to wit, wee may say there are twoo particular kinds of Gods wisdome, howbeit but in respect of our selues. And how is that? There is the wisdome which is conteyned in his woord, the which he imparteth in such wyse vnto vs, as wee become wyse by receyuing the instruction that he giueth vs, and that is the wisdome which he communicateth to his creatures: and moreouer there is that wisdome which he keepeth still in him self. And what maner of one is that? It is the woorderfull Prouidence wherby 40 he gouerneth the world beyond all that wee can con-

ceyue. Behold God dispozeth the things which we take to be verye confuzed to our understanding. VVhen tyrants beare sway (as shall be sayd hereafter) when wicked men seduce silie'folk, and carie their soules to destruction, and when the other sort are sauod: all this is doone by the wonderfull prouidence of God. But if we seeke what is the reason of all this: then are we in such a gulf, as all our wits must needs be swallowed vp. Thus ye see a wisdome which God keepeth to himself wherof the maketh not men partakers, according also as it is vnpossible for them to atteine vnto it. Sothen when we shall haue ben taught in Gods schoole, and are become wyse by comprehending that thing according to the measure of our capacite, which it shall haue pleased him to teache vs by his woord: let vs knowe that there are yet other secrets in him, which it behoueth vs to honour, forasmuchas we cannot atteyne to the knowledge of them, bycause it is vnpossible for vs to moue so hygh: Ye see how we ought to consider Gods wisdome twoo 20 wayes. Ye see also how Iohment too speake that thing wherof he will make a larger discourse herafter. Howbeit forasmuchas the time wil not beare it now, we wil keepe the residue till to morowe.

Now let vs kneele downe before the face of our good God and father, with acknowledgement of oure faultes and sinnes: praying him to voutsafe too make vs know them better: that feeling the feblenesse which is in vs, we may learne to humble our selues vnder him, & not presume vpon our owne strength and wisdome, but seeke in him all that we want, and walke vnder his hand and vnder his guidance. Also let vs pray him to gouerne vs in such wise, as all our wittes and senses may be hilde prisoners [vntoo him,] that hee may haue such a soueraintie ouer vs, as he may raigne feasibly, and wee consent with his Angels to obey him willingly: and that in the meane season we take not any thing vpon vs aboue our abilitie, nor abuse the gyftes that hee dealeth vntoo vs, but that we may always acknowledge them to come of him, to the ende we may seeke them there, and yeeld him his due prayse for them. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only. &c.

The. xlviij. Sermon, which is the third vpon the. xij. Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the. 14. 15. and 16. verses which haue bene touched in the former Sermon.

Hen wee see the things come too passe which are reherced here: it seemeth too vs that God gouerneth not the world, but that all goeth at aduenture, or rather that there is no reason or purpose why God should doo so: and we could find in our harts (if it lay in vs) to set him foorth a new lesson, and to point him what he should do, and too correct him as though he did amisse. Ye see then, that mennes wits are out of order, and that they are so rash as they could find in their harts to controll God. But contrariwise, here Job meeneth to auow the mightie power, prouidence, and wisdome of God, whereof mention hath ben made. Therfore he telleth vs, that when we see things so out of order in the world: we must not fater any thing vpon fortune, but assure ourselues how it is God that sitteth aboue & guideth all. Besides this, although we think it straunge that he should woork so: yet let vs not be so presumptuous as to reply against him, but let vs honour the secret and incomprehensible wisdome that is in him.

Thus ye see the two points which he fatered vpō God heretofore: that is too wit, That it is he in whom is all power: and that it is he in whom is all counsell, wisdome, and skill. He hath set downe these three words purposely, to reppresse mennes foolish presumptuousnesse in taking vpon them to haue more discretion and reason thā God, and in misliking his doings though they find them good. Therfore it behoueth vs to mark well Iobs drift: which is to make vs knowe Gods prouideēc in all things that are doone in this world. Neuerthelesse, to knowe that God gouerneth, is not all that wee haue to do. But wee must also graunt him the wisdome that hath ben spoken of. True it is that oftentimes we may perceiue some reason of Gods woorks, and he also will haue men to knowe why he doeth some one thing or other: but that is not alwayes: nother must we make a generall rule of it. Sometimes God blindeth those that haue forsaken his truthe: verie well, That is a vengeance that is euident, and wee knowe that men haue well deserued that God should vitterly bereue them of all knowledge, bycause they had no mind to bee taught at his hand. But som - sometymes we knowe not wherefore God taketh away his woord, and it daunteth vs. In that case it behoueth vs to reuerence his secret determination: and although we knowe not as yet nother the reason nor the end of his woork: yet must we acknowledge and confesse that he cannot be but rightuouse. And yet in the meane whyle let vs bethink vs of the weaknesse of our wit, to the intent that we presume not to shet vp, ne bee desirous to measure the thing that is infinite, by our owne capacite. Now let vs lay foorth the things particularly which are set downe here. It is sayd, that If God break downe, no man shall buylde vp. VVherby is ment, that if Gods hand be against vs, although we had the help of all creatures, all of it shall not boote vs, but wee must needs perish. Behold in effect what is conteined in this sentence. At the first blush we may well say it is so: but we be not yet touched. And for proof hereof, If God scourge vs, we bethink vs not with whom we haue to do: but wee go to seeke meanes to succour our selues, and it seemeth too vs that wee may well shifft off the mischeef by our owne cunning, or if so be that men be willing too help vs. True it is that God forbiddeth vs not too think vpon our selues, to shifft for our selues, and to haue a regard how to remedie things: yea hee maketh this dealing to auayle: howbeit not after such maner as wee haue ben inured to. For when God afflicthe vs, the first remedie is to humble our selues vnder his hand, and to seeke attonement with him. This doone, we may wel desire him to giue vs meanes to prouide for our necessities. But to arme our selues against him, is not the way to warde the blowes of his hand. Thus ye see what were our dutie. But cleane contrarie to this kind of dealing, we see there is nothing but rebelliousnesse in this world when God intendeth to humble it. Then if we minded this doctrine throughly, we should not vsē such maner of dealing as we do. For it would come thus to our remembrance: will God cast vs downe? and who is he that can build vs vp againe? therfore must he himself be faine to put to his hand. And so, haue we offended him? Let vs craue pardon of him, to the end he may haue pitie of vs. And though his iudgements be hidden from vs: yet must we humble our selues vnto him, to the end that he may receyue vs so cast downe. And in deede wee ought too giue good care to the threatenings which God, vttereth to this purpose against the reprobates: as when he sayeth that he wil cast downe Edom, and that if any man labour to set it vp again, it shall be but lost labour. Herein we see that if Gods hand be against vs, all the succour that commeth to vs by men or by creatures must needs be vayne and vnauyable. VVe may well haue them (to our seeming) to maynteyne vs: but we shall find no profit in them: all shall go cleane contrarie too our expectation. Moreouer it is sayde of Babylō, whosoeuer will build it vp againe, must lay the foundation of it vpon his first borne: that is too say, All they that will resist Gods iudgement, shall followe those that haue ben punished afore them, and keepe them companie themselues. Therfore let vs bethink vs well, and let vs desire to be strengthened by the hand of God, and mainteyned in our state by the same. For without that, we must needs perish: yea though all the world were on our syde, as I haue sayd alredie. And here ye see also why it is told vs in the Psalme, that men may well take vpō them to build, whē they haue all things at comandement: but yet can they not go foreward with it, for God wil make al to go backward, if he blisse them not. And no doubt but that in this word Buylde, Job comprehendeth all that concerneth mannes state: as if he had sayd, That it belongeth only to

God to build vs vp: whensoeuer he hath set vs in any trade, we must be stablished in the same by his power: & when he listeth to throw vs quyte downe & to bring vs vtterly to nought, wee may well be dooing, but all that euer man can doo for vs shall bee vtterly vnauayable. Contrariwise if God be on our syde, wee may despaze all things that are against vs. Again, if God be our enemie: Let vs haue all the commodities that can bee, and they shall all turne to our confusion. Thus much concerning this point. It is sayde immediatly, That if God locke vp a man, no bodie can let him out. As if Job should say, that it belongeth only to God to giue vs libertie: so as if he list, although we seeme to haue bothe hands and feete at libertie, we shall be forclozed from all our limmes, and we shall not be able to stire one finger: And although men labour to drawe vs out: yet shall they not auayle at all, so long as God holdeth vs inclozed and shet vp. Finally he betokeneth that which I haue touched already: that is to wit, that God must be fayne to fauour vs, or else all will go wrong with vs, so as wee shall but waxe worse and worse: insomuch that if wee tumble not right downe at the first blowe, yet shall we be digged downe by little and little till God haue vtterly consumed vs. After he hath spoken so, he addeth foorthwith, that If God bold backe the waters, and stop them, there will be drought: and that if God list to let the waters loose, there shall be fluddes, to beare all afore them, as it were to rake vp the earth, that there shall be nother trees nor houses left vnouerthrowen. And Job speaketh purposely of holding the waters and of letting the go, because we knowe not Gods hand sufficiell when it woorketh all after one rate wherwith we are acquainted. Doeth the Sunne ryse in the morning? That is an ordinarie thing with vs, we think not of it, nother doeth it waken vs sufficiell to come vnto God. Doeth hee send any Rayne? That comineth not in our minds. VVhen we see it rayne, if a man askes vs who sent it, we will confess weyl ynough that it is God. But yet for all that, this consideration pierceth vs not too the quicke, and therfore it moueth vs not to humble our selues vnder Gods prouidence, & to acknowledge that all is in his hād, & that he directeth our life. There are verie fewe that think of that. So then Job hath made his choyce here of such works as are rarest and least accustomed among men. For when we see a drought that lasteth, then euery man is touched. If he make faire wether, and rayne now and then in the meane whyle, so as the earth doeth not vtterly drye vp: mē think not of it. But is there come so greate a drought as men perceyue that corne cānot growe, it thriueth not, behold the seede is dried vp in the groūd & cōmeth to nothing, there can no frute come of it: if there come such an extraordinarie drought: then ye shall see vs touched. Even so is it also with greate rage of waters. If hee send Showers and they annoy not: rush we ouerpasse it, and haue no regard at all of God. But if there be continuall rayne, so as all riuers ouerflowe their banks, and it seemeth to be as a new generall flud: then wee marke and beare that in mynd. Jobs meening then is this, that when things happen in such wyse as it may seeme that the order of nature shall change, and that there be so excessiue drougths as it may seeme that all shall be burnt vp: we must knowe that God hath not layd the bryde looce in fortunes necke, but that it is he himself that woorketh after that fashyon. Also when there falleth so great rayne as it is likely that all shall go to haucke, let vs assure our selues that it is God which worketh it. But certesse as drought may wel come sometimes for notorious sinnes, Leui.26.c.19 so as mē may perceiue wherfore Gods vengeāce lighteth: Deu.28.c.23

according as he threateneth vs in his lawe to shet vp the heauen in such wise as it shal be as brasse; that no droppe of moysture can be gotten thence: and that the earth shal become as hard as yron, so that the seedes shal dwin, and the ground shal yeld the no nutritiament nor hart: and also that the ayre shal be deaf, that whē the earth openeth his cranyed mouth as if it were a thirst, the ayre shall not answer it. Our Lord then doeth ryghtly manace vs in his lawe, that he will execute such punishments vpon vs, verily for our sinnes sake. Neuerthelater it will some tymes fall out, that we cannot discerne why God woor-keth so, we shall not haue any such knowledge as may leade vs too iudge that it is God which sheweth vs the reason thereof. Neuerthelesse it becometh vs to honour his power and wisdome, although the end therof be vn-knownen to vs. The must we hūble our selues in all sorts: whether we se the earth as it were drowned with water, or whether it be seared vp with drought, let God be alwayes glorified. And after what maner? Euen by confessing that it is he which doeth it. For first it behoueth vs to acknowledge his power, &c afterward we must iudg his power with such wisdome, as we do not grudge against him, nor blame him of tirannie and outrage. For it is not all one to say, It is true tha: God geverneth the world, & therewithall to imagin a tyrannicall power in him. But (as I haue touched alredie) if we will glorifie God aright, we must acknowledge him to be almighty: and therewithall we must also honour his infinite wisdome wher-vnto we cannot atteyne: in consideration wherof, the same ought not to bee made subiecte to our vnderstanding, neither ought God too yeld vs an account of his dooings. But Job repeateth againe, That in him only is all power, and all skil and rigbinesse. The second word which is set here, commeth [in the Hebre] of Beeing, so as it signifieth Beeing: and therfore a man may take it for all things that haue anie seeming to be, & yet are not firme and substantiall: like as the creature may wel make some shewe and seeme to florish, howbeit the same is but a shadowe, it perisheth out of had, & they theselues vanish away vnlesse God mainteyne them. But in God there is an euerlasting firmesse: for it is he that euer hath ben and euer shall be: it is he also that giueth power too all creatures so as they continue in their state. This sayd woord therfore is wel deriuied of Beeing. Neuerthelesse it is oftentimes taken for Gods lawe, and for instruction: and it is also taken for a princes commissiō or proclamation. But we haue seene heretofore, that Job speaketh not only of Gods mightie power, as who should say, he hath all things in his hand, but also he sayd that he is perfectly wise, and that his prouidēce is wōderful. The let vs mark well, that in this streyne he meeneth not to speake of Gods Beeing, but rather of the vprightnesse or go-uernmēt which he vseth. For we knowe that inasmuchas he is the iudge of the world, he must needs gouerne all things vprightly. And so it is nothing but a repetition of the matter that had ben delt with before: howbeit not without cause doeth Job repeate it. For although Gods works be before our eye: yet is it hard to come too the consideration of them: and when we are come to it, we forget it byandby if the remembrance thereof be not refreshed in vs. Then let vs mark well, what this sentence meeneth: that is to wit, that in God is all power, and also that the gouernment of the world belongeth to him, to order all things with indifferēcie and vprightnesse. VVhē we shall haue recorded this lesson throughly, wee shall haue profited greatly, not only for a day, but for all the tyme of our life. Also there is one speciaall cause for which Job repeateth this lesson. For his intent is to enter into other of Gods iudgments which are straunger to vs than those that he hath spoken of, and specially when he sayeth, That bot be that deceyuct, and be that is deceyued are botbe in Gods hand. Yee see here a thing that seemeth against all reason, namely that God hath the deceyuers in his hand, and that he driueth the therunto. This seemeth to be a point vtterly repugnant to his nature. Job the hath purposely vſed this preface, as it were to brydle vs, that we should not rush headlong against God: and that although we bee troubled with some temptations at the first brunt: yet notwithstanding we might be restrayned, that we become not like many wild beasts which lift vp themselues against God, rayling at him, and blaspheming him if he wil not spoyle himself of his owne mightie power: insomuch as we see how they are not ashamed to flush out this villanous and cursed speeche. That they wil not beleue that God is rightuouse, if he be the doer of all things, specially so farre foorth as to driue foreward the euill. For by that meanes (say they) he should be the author of sin: and who is he that hath shewed that vnto them: It is euen as much as if they would frame God to their owne fancie, because they comprehend not his wonderfull wisdome to honour the same though it bee hidden from vs. Ye see then how they bee but arrogant beasts, which cannot agree that God shoulde be almighty, except they might make him subiect to their owne fashyon and fancie. And (as the common prouerb sayeth) none so bold as blind bayard. O (say they) behold I conceyue it not. And who art thou, we haue seene this in silie fooles. For although they play the doctours in some one science or other: yet notwithstanding they be so over-ignorant, as it is pitie to see, and a mā may perceyue how there is nothing but beastlynesse in the, yet neuerthelesse they will be so bold as to say, I understand it not, & therfore I canot agree thereto. But although it were the wiest and wilyest man in the world, yet ought men too spit in his face and to abhorre him if he dare set vp his bistles after that maner against God. Now then we see that Job hath giuen vs a good and profitable lesson: namely that wheras he ment to say, that God hath bothe the deceyuers and the deceyued in his had: he did put this preface afore it, that al power and skill is in him. Now let vs come to make cōparison betwene our wits, and Gods mightie power. Are we able to inclose it in our brayne? If a mā should go about to inclose it in heauen and earth, it were to narowe a roome for it. And yet will a man aduaunce himselfe thither: and I pray you, is it not a monstrosenesse, whē a man knoweth no more whether there be a creator or no, ne' passeth what apperteyneth vnto him? Then let vs remēber well what is sayd here, namely that although we think it verie hard, that God should haue in his hand bothe them that deceyue and them that are deceyued: yet is it so neuerthelesse. VVhy? For God were not almighty if things might be doone in this world against his wil, and without his medling in them. For how were he almighty? Yes truly, but (wil some man say) what reason is there in it? Thou must seeke the reason otherwhere: and byeause thou canst not atteyne vnto it: thou must withal lowlinesse honour that which surounteth thy capacitie: thou canst not stye aboue the clouds. God must be acknowledged to be wise and almighty: and if thou perceyue not the reason: well, tarie thou his leysure with silence and quietnesse, vntill he discouer that thing vnto thee which as yet is vknowne. For what is ment by this saying, that we shal behold that thing face to face, Cor. 13. d. which we cannot see now, but as it were through a glasse or dimly: would we make the scripture false? These vain-glorious beasts that deface and darken the prouidence of God

God vnder colour that they conceiue not the reason of it, and that they cannot brooke that which is cōteyned in the holie scripture, would haue God to reserue nothing to the last day. And why do they not find fault with him then for not making them greater clerks, seing that men perceyue them to be so ignorāt and dulheaded? Although they make a greate shewe, (for they haue nother iudgement nor discretion in deede) & although men haue thē in estimaciō, whither it be in way of skorne or otherwise: yet is it to be seene that they be as dull beasts as can be. VVhy blame they not God for not giuing them a finer wit? and for not giuing them the meane to profit better in his schoole: For they seeme too themselves too be the worthiest men in the world: and yet hath God giue them ouer. VVhy do they not blame him for not handling thē after their owne lust? For in their owne opinion they be so wise men, as the world ought to make them too ryde triāphing in chariots: & yet in the meane whyle they are seene what they be. So then they wil haue store of replies to find fault with God, when they take in hand to bring him to an accōut. But on our part let vs keepe that which is sayd heere: namely that we must be so simple as to honour Gods prouidēce and wiſdom, notwithstanding that the same be hidden from vs. Furthermore let vs come to that which Iob sayeth heere concerning him that is deceiued and him that deceiueth. VVheras he sayeth that both twayne of them, as wel the deceyuer as the deceiued are in Gods hand: he meenehit not in respect that they be his creatures and haue their life of him. For that were a verie cold saying, and should impert nothing. VVee knowe he treateth here of Gods iudgements which are incomprehensible, and whervnto our wits are not able to reach. Now then were it so straunge a verdit to say, that God hath made all men, & that he beholdeth as well the wicked and deceyfull as also him that is deceyued? This were no whit at all without the cōmon order of nature. But we see that Iob ment to wade further: that is to wit, that whē anie man erreth & is deceiued, the same cōmeth not to passe without Gods wil & ordināce: and also that whē a deceiuer bringeth his crafts & suttleties about god gouerneth them from aboue. As for those that would excuse God of vnrightuousnesse, vnder colour that he suffereth the things that are done by men, but yet doeth thē not himself: I beseeche you do they resolute this questiō? For after that Iob hath sayd, that there is power and vprightness in God, he addeth that bothe the deceiued & the deceiuers are in his hand. Lo hew Iob auoweth Gods mightie power, and that he hath the gouernment of the world, in saying that bothe the deceiuers & the deceiued are in his hand. If there were but a single sufferance, Iob had spokē verie ill. Then must it be concluded, that God guideth all things in such wise as nothing is done otherwise thā he hath ordeined. But by the way we must beare in mynd that which I haue touched already. namely that God wil sometimes haue mē deceiued, & the reasō why he wil haue it so, is apparāt: but sometimes also we know not at al wheroft it cōmeth, nor wherto it tendeth. And in this case it behoueth vs to hold our wits in, & to bridle them, acknowledging ourselves to ignorant and feeble-witted to atteine so high. That it is Gods wil that deceiuts should reigne & that men should be beguiled: the holie scripture sheweth. It is not told vs there that God doeth but only giue leaue, as if he shuld say, I passe not, I wil not medie with it: but that he cōmaundeth it: insomuch as he sayeth, who is he that shal go out to deceiue? Behold how God seeketh for deceiuers, and wil haue deceiuts to haue their ful scope: for so speakes the holie scripture. VVhat glose cā be alledged to darkē so euidēt a text? And the diuel offreth himself, saying: I wil & be a lying spirit in the mouth of al the prophets to beguile Achab. Thervpō God sendeth Satā forth, and willeth him to deceiue and to blind both the king & al the people. Now then we see wel that God shrinketh not into a corner to say, I wil suffer it to be done: but ordeineth & disposeth it. For other wise (as I sayd) he were not almighty. VVhē the scripture giueth that title vnto God: it meeneth not that he can do it if he list, & that he is at rest in heauē & doeth nothing: but it menehit gods mightie power matched with effect: that is to wit, that he is present in all things, & that there is not anie thing done otherwise than he dispositeth it. Ye see then after what maner God is almighty. And as for them that babble so, to disfete or to restraine Gods prouidence, they deny the first article of our faith, like witlesse folk as they be, possessed with diuelish rage. Therefore, vnsesse we wil make the scripture false, it is a settled point and we must hold vs to it, that God wil haue men to be deceiued. And it is not sayd so in this text only, but also throughout the whole holie scripture. Aboue others there is a notable place in S. Paule which ought to be so much the more familiar to vs, bycause we haue the experience and proof of it. For S. Paule treating of the state of the christian Churche to come, sayth there shal be a falling away, so as mē shal become renegats, after the gospel hath ben preached vnto thē, & they shal renounce God, & there shal be a horrible scattering through the whole church: which thing we see. Yet notwithstanding the Papists forbeare not to say, hath God suffered the churche to erre so lōg a time? Behold, S. Paule telles vs it shuld be so. Now if the same come of God, is it but a single sufferance? No no, But S. Paule sayeth exprely that God will send effectuall error. He sayeth not only that God will let Satā looce to deceiue mē: but he sayeth that the deceits and leasings must take effect, and that mē shal not be able to keepe theselues frō being beguiled. Then see we gods horrible vengeance before our eyes, in that men haue bē blinded, so as they haue not perceyued the lyes and deceits of Satan, but haue ben caried away by thē like brute beasts. VVhōse doing wasthat? Gods. S. Paule auoucheth it exprely. Howbeit it is trewe that in that behalf there is a manifest reason. For S. Paule sayeth, that the sayd scattering shal happen for mēnes vnthankfulnes: bycause they haue refused to honour god, therfore they must be faine to beare the yoke of men & be subiect to their tirannie. They had no mind to obey the truthe, & therfore god fed them with lies, according also as it is shewed in the first chapter to the Romanes. Forsomuch thē as the world co-ueteth to be deceiued, yea & shettereth his eyes whē God goeth about to inlichtē it by his word: needs must Satan beguile & misleadē it. But sometimes the same shal come to passe and we not know why: if a man demaund the reason of it, when he hath made long discourse, he shal be at his wits end. Then let vs mark wel that although we perceyue not the reason why God doth a thing, yet must we stoupe downe our necke (as they say) and reuerence his mightie power, assuring our selues that the same is ruled with al vprightness & indifferency, notwithstanding that we be not priuie to it: yea euē at such times as God blindeth mē, and raiseth vp deceiuers to beguyle them, so as false doctrines, abuses & heresies haue their full scope, & god giueth Satā ful power to punish our sinnes. Furthermore a man might moue yet many other questiōs. How? Is it posible that God should serue his owne turne by Satā? There is nothing but malice & naughtinesse in him. And besides that looke vpon a wicked man that hath none other intent but to ouerthrowe all goodnessse and to destroy it: and yet he doth it and bringeth it to passe: Seemeth it not that hee is acquit, bycause his seruice hath ben to the accomplishing of Gods will? Men will moue such

Rom. 1. d. 38.

such questions as these, which serue to grauell our wits: and for that cause, Job (as I sayd) hath vsed this preface, Power and dominion are in God: that is to say, that for-somuchas he hath al things in his hand: it is reason that he should dispole of his creatures at his owne pleasure: & that forsomuchas he is iudge of the whole world, therfore he can not do amisse, neither it is impossible for him to swarue one way or other from ryghtdealing. For his will (although it be vñknowne to vs) is the fountayne of all righteousnesse. VVhen a man hath doone any thing, his doing is examined. VVhy so? For we haue a rule aboue vs, and verely our wits are chaungeable from good to euill: yea and (which worse is) they be naturally al togither euill, crooked, & vntoward, and there is no rightnesse at all in the. For we be subiect to be caried here & there by our owne fancies. By reason wherof our dooings had neede to be examined, and that there should be a hygher rule ouer the. For if me should haue the rule of theselues, it is certain that there would be nothing but cōfusion in their state. And here ye see why the heathē me theselues sayd, that the lawe ought to be as a God ouer vs, and that God ought to be our lawe. But the case standeth not so with God. Therfore when we come to his will: it is the rule of all right. The righteousnesse wherby we must be ruled and wherto we must be subiect, is aboue vs, but is Gods will aboue that according as I haue shewed alredie that Gods righteousnesse is after two sorts: the one as he hath shewed vs in his lawe, by the which he wil haue the world to be ruled: and the other incomprehensible, insomuch as now & the we must be faine to winck whē God worketh, and be content to knowe nother how nor why he doth it. And so whē the reason of any of Gods doings is not retellel vnto vs, let vs vnderstand that the same is a point of the righteousnesse that is in his secret will, which surmounteth the rule that is manifest & knowne to vs. Verely this doctrine wil be verie hard to many me but let vs cōtent our selues with that which is auouched to vs. Seing that the scripture speaketh so, all of vs must answer Amen, and acknowledge the thing that is told vs here: that is to wit, when we see folke erre, and deceyuers to haue their full scope: the same happeneth not without Gods prouidence. But besides this that hath ben sayd, let vs also bethink vs of the warning that Paule and also the prophet Esay giue: which is, that if men looke well vpon themselves, they shall not be so hardie as to lift vp them selves against God, and to checke against his truthe. For what are we? VVe be earth and dung. And what an authoritie hath God? So then if men looked well vpō their owne state, surely they would not presume to lift vp theselues in such wise against God: and also, these dogges which forbearre not too bark though they cannot bite, would not be so bold. But let vs leauue them at that point still. If they cōtent not theselues with that which the holie scripture speaketh, let the go seeke their answers otherwheres. For there are that take greate paines too answer their questiōs: but that is to no purpose. And why? For we tempt God manifestly if we desire to passe our bounds. Behold, God telleth vs that he doth many things, wherof the reason is cōcealed frō vs as now. If we be desirous to know the same, is it not a forcible breaking of the wal that God hath set against vs? He hath barred vs frō it as if he should say, ye shall not passe beyond this: now if we passe it, is it not a plaine despizing of God? So then let vs not ouerlabour our selues to content the fond curiositie of those that auance theselues after that maner against God: but rather let vs lerne to confute them after the fashion & maner of S. Paules speche, saying: who art thou o man? That one word (Man, Man) is ynoch enough to stop the

mouthes of all such as lift vp themselues in that wise against God. For vnder the word Man is cōprehended so much wretchednes as we ought not only to cast downe our heads, but also (if the earth could open) we should be swallowed into the bottomelesse pit, whē we haue this diuelish pride in vs of lifting vp our selues against god. Moreouer let vs mark that this doctrine bringeth vs greate comfort, if so be that we can applie the same to our vse. VVhen it is sayd that bothe the deceiuers & the deceyued belong vnto God: therby wee vnderstand that God bridleth Satan & all deceyuers, so as we cānot, (without his will,) be troubled with false doctrine nor with heresies, nor with anie other darnell that serueth to turne vs aside frō the purenesse of the Gospel. And why? For God holdeth the deceyuers in his hand: yea euen from Satan who is their head, vnto all the that serue his turne. Seing that God holdeth them so in his hand, it is certaine that they cā attempt nothing farther than he giueth them the bridle. And although they attempt, yet haue they no aduaantage ouer vs, bycause that those which are deceiuers are likewise in the hand of God too. Now seing we be in his hand, let vs referre our selues vnto him, & he wil not suffer vs to be of the number of thosē whom Saſa ouerthroweth: but we shall alwayes get the vpper hād of the lies which he shall trēp in our wayes. Lo how we ought to praetize this doctrine: not in murmuring against God, nor in desiring to make a fond shewe and foolish brauerie to say, Tush I wil dispute against all this, and if a man cannot yeeld me a reason of it, I wil neuer bow. Let vs beware of making such brags: and (as I haue sayd) let vs rather hāble our selues to honour that thing with al reuerēce, which we know not. And although we see things so cōfuzed in the world, as there remayneth nothing for vs but to fall into destruciō: let vs not be afryad, but forasmuchas God gouerneth all things, and hath soueraine dominion ouer all creatures: let vs warrant our selues in that. For God can wel ynoch disappoint the policie of our deadly enimie Satan, & all the crafts and deceits of men, so as we shal haue the vpper hād. On the other side, although God list to afflēt vs, and suffer heresies to run abrode, so as many troubles insue, and we see all things cōfounded in this world: yet can he full well preserue vs that we shall not miscarie. For it is he that must giue Saſas errore effect: if he do it not, we be fenced welynough: and (as our Lord Iesus Christ sayeth) it is impossible that euer the chosen should be turned out of the way of Sal- M.t. 24. d. uation. Sting then that the case stādeth so, let vs put our selues into Gods protection, and forsomuchas it pleaseſ him to cōmit the charge of our welfare to our Lord Iesus Christ: let vs contēt our selues therwith, let vs be at rest, & let vs not be tossed with vnpacience to say, how shal we scape? we be in daunger of vndoing. True it is, that we ought to stand vpon our gard, and be carefull to call vpō God: but whē we haue called vpon him, walking in purenesse of life, let vs not doubt but he mainteyneth vs in such wise as all the troubles in the world can doo vs no harme, that we should not alwayes abyde stedfast in his truthe, and the same truthe be an invincible fortresse to vs, according also as S. Paule speaketh.

But let vs cast our selues downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs perceyue what maner of ones we be, & what our rudenesse and brutishnes is: to the end we may lerne to humble our selues vnder him, and to glorifie him in all caces, and to walk after such sort in his feare, as we may think all to be good and rightfull whasoeuer he dispozeth of vs and of all other creatures. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heavenly father, &c.

17. He putteth counsellors to the Spoyle, and maketh iudges dull vvitted.
18. He looz eneth the bande of kings, and girdeth their reynes vwith girdles.
19. He Putteth Princes to the spoyle, and distresleth the mighty.
20. He taketh avvay speeche from the faulfull, he taketh avvay courage from princes.
21. He poureth out contempt vpon the noble, he taketh avvay strength from the mighty.
22. He bringeth hidden things to light, and the shadovve of death vnto open light.
23. He increaceth people and destroyeth them: he inlargeth nations and streiteneh them.
24. He taketh avvay the harts of the gouerners of the earth and maketh them vander as in a vvildernesse.
25. He maketh thē to gropas in the dark without light, & he maketh thē to rele like drūkē men.

Like as yesterday we sawe that God hath in his hād both the deceiuers & the deceyued: so now Job procedeth to declare, that the changes and tur- nings that are seene in the world, come not to passe by haphazard, but by Gods disposition, and that it stādeth vs in hand to knowe, that when the world is so turmoiled, there is a secret bridle frō aboue, so as things are neuerso confounded, but that God disposeth thē as he thinketh good. And he taketh the notablest things, that we might therby perceyue Gods prouidence the better. It should seeme that princes are priuiledged aboue the rest of the world, & that they are (as ye would say) sholded out from the cōmon rank of men. But Job sheweth that God doth there cheefly vtter his power, and wil haue it to be cheefly knowne there. If some poore man be afflieted, or if there light any aduersitie vpon him, there will be regard had of it: for we be cōmonly inured with such matters. But whē a prince that seemed to be hoyssed vp aloft, is cast downe, there we be more touched, and wee must needs espie Gods prouidēce if we be not to bloc- kish. Also whē they that haue the gouernmēt of the peo- ple become so dulwitted as there is nother vnderstāding nor reason in thē: that also is wel worthie to be marked, & we looke neerlier to it than if they were priuate perso- nes. And specially when men haue had good wit, when they haue had some lerning & experience, and whē they haue bē wholly fashyoned to deale with publik gouern- ment, and afterward are sodeinly become dullards, & are no more the men they were afore: such maner of change is so notable, as it cōstreineth vs to looke vp vnto God. And that is the cause why Job speaketh not heere of the cōmon people, but of the gouerners. He speaketh not of the simple idiots, but of those in whō men haue knowne grete widsome, insomuch as they seemed to haue bē a- ble ynough to haue gouerned a whole world, & yet notwithstanding are destitute of wit and reason. Lo in effect what is shewed vs heere. Howbeit forasmuch as the talk cōcerneth notable thigs, & such as import much matter: Job thinketh it not inough for him to vtter his mind in a word or twaine, but he repeateth it, sayng, that God put- teth the princes, the strōg mē, & the mē of might to the spoyle, & that be vnticib their bād, so as ther is no more subiectiō to thē, their alliances are nothing worth, whē they haue their sword by their side it shal fal to the groūd: & (to be short) the meanes which the princes of the earth haue, shal not serue thē to any purpose whē God listeth to pull thē downe. Job therfore stādeth vpon that point, bycause [that on the one side] there is such a laziness in vs, and that on the other side he seeth, we be so blind in the thing which we ought to consider moste of al. For although we do partly knowe it to be gods doings when such chaūges happen: yet cānot the same sink in our minds after such manner as Job speakes of: and although we haue well be- thought vs of it, yet can we not make our profit of it. Ne- uerthelesse it behoueth vs to know that if God do so go- uerne the cheefe states of the world, his arme is also stret- ched out to the lesser things, so as nothing escaperth him: Lo what we haue to mark in effect. But (as I haue sayd) whē the cheefe states bechaūged, every mā wil be moued, but anō after we wil think no more of it. And in deed we see the stories are full of that which is cōtained heere: & yet the world fareth not so much the better therby, as to be so persuaded as it ought to be, of gods prouidēce, and that he hath soueraine dominion ouer all things. This thing was never yet throughly well knowne. And what hath bē the let of it but our owne blockishnesse? For let vs mark well that God delighteth not to chaūge, as men imagine the wheele of fortune, nor as heathenish folke say, that God playeth with mē, as a mā tosseth the balles at a tennisplay. It is not so: but these chaunges happē bi- cause mē cānot suffer God to cōtinue his grace towards them. VVhē al things are settled in good plignt: behold, men are wearie of their ease: they friske, and kickle like horses that are too wel fed. They that are in authoritie forget themselves & despise God, & they imagine that ther is no more any bridle vpō thē. Lo, our Lord sendeth chaunges into the world bicause we cānot abide that he should hold one euē & cōtinual rate ouer vs. Againe it is for our behoofe that he make vs to know what a one he is, & that we should perceyue him to be the soueraine of all his creatures. For although Princes & such as are in honour, abused not their state in auancing themselves to al vngraciousnesse: yet wil they be puffed vp with pride, & thinke themselves woorthie to come to that high de- gree, & haue purchased the same by their owne policie, so as God is nobodie at all with them. And on the other- side we would be of opiniō, that nothing els reigneth but fortune. God therfore muste bee fayne to discouer the things that were as good as buried, to the ende wee may know how he hath the ordering of al things. And that is the cause why so great alterations happen in the world. VVhen a man readeth the Chronicles, he would wonder how it should be possible, that whereas had bene so great a monarchie, things haue bene ouerthrowne in so small time, & after so strūge a fashiō, & mē would neuer haue thought. Let vs looke vpō the first monarchies, which wer of the Assyiās & Chaldies: let vs take that which was so great as the state might well haue seemed to be euerlast- ing, & should neuer haue ben ouerthrowne: & we shall find the same thing that I spake of. Looke vpō the Perisiās & Medes, who reigned ouer all Asia, in somuch that if a man had won a hundred leagues of that Countrie, it was nothing. Armies of fivehundred thousand mē were in a readinesse. And these things are sufficiētly warrāted, so as they be no fables nor things inuēted: but (as I sayd) the certentie of thē is euidētynough. But yet for al that, one Prince

Prince with thirtie thousand men discomfited one hoste of threehundred thousand, & another of seuenhundred thousand. And how was that? A man would wonder at the reading of such things. Yea, but God had blinded those which had erst thought themselues to be so come to the toppe of all strength, as (to their owne seeming) no man durst open his lippes at the, & that they had ben able to haue ouerwhelmed all their enimies with a blast of their mouth. God ment to mocke such a pride. And by that meanes this greate monarchie was ouerthrownen, as if God should breake a manes girdle asunder & his sword should fall away from him. Euen so (say I) did it befall to the Persians and Medes. VVell then, hath great Alexander gotten such victories on al sides? Is he like a thunderclap which ouercommeth a man whē he doth but heare the noyse of it? It is seene that God tooke him out of the world in the flower of his age. And what remayned of him? He had heires male, he had a wife, a moother, and brethren: to be short he had so greate a kinred, as it might seeme that his race should never haue fayled: and he had gotten such an Empire, as at leastwise his children were woorthie to haue succeeded him. For he was no more taken for a mortall man, he was honored as a God, and his men of warre yeelded him such a reuerence, as would not haue sticket to haue dyed for him and for all his lineage. But yet for all that, there was not one tayle of I is whole offspring left, all were fayne to go to the slaughter, and the blud of them to be shed, like as he had filled the earth with blud by his cructie: God rooted out all his howse. VVhen we see this, see we not wonderfull iudgements? And as for them that never red the holie scriptures, may they not espie so diuine a power, as they must (spite of their teethe) confess that there is a God reigning in heauen, who executeth such iustice as never was looked for? I haue alledged but one example: But (as I sayd) all Stories are full of these things: and yet for al that: how little do men fare the better by them? If a man come to the Empire of Rome: it is a state settled in such wise, as there was no likelyhood that euer it should be remoued. For they that bare authoritie in the common welth of Rome, had never suffered any other bodie to impeach their state, and yet neuerthelesse the same was fayne to come to passe. And how came it to passe that the Empire fel vnto him that obteyned it: verly euē by force of warre when libertie was oppressed. But he that had it, had nother heire nor successor after him, that could bee sayd to be prince or Emperour, insomuch as it was to bee hoped that things shold haue bē set again in their former state. Notwithstanding, things were so turmoyled, as a child became Emperour. For whē Augustus Cæsar begā to reigne, he had nother wisdome nor wit, nor any thing else, so that the Empire wa<sup>r</sup> as it were cast into his lap as hee was asleepe. And in deede when he should haue fought in the feeld he was in his bed, and he had much a doo to ryze. Therfore it seemed to him that the Emperourship fell to him as it were in his dreame. Yet was not this done by haphazard, but it was Gods will too abate the prude that was in the citie of Rome, so as afterward a neate-herd became Emperor, the sonne of a brothell, who could brag of nothing but that he was his owne brothers sonne and that his moother was an vnkindly incest. And of whom came they? or of what aunceters? No man can tell from whence they came, whether they were bred out of the earth, or out of the water. Ye see then so shamefull things, as would make a mannes heare to stand vp vpon his head to heare the stories of them red. But God ordaineth it in such wise, to the end it might the better be knowne that such chaunges happen not but for men-nes instruction as it is sayd more fully in the hundredth Psal. 107. and seventh Psalme. Then let vs mark wel how it is not without cause that Job standeth so much vpon this point when he sayeth, That God blindeth Princes so as there is nother wisdome, nor discretion nor aught else in them, but it seemeth that they be bereft of their wits, yea & that that thing shal light vpō them in the minute of an houre and afterward he will cut asunder their girdle, and their sword shal fall from them, in such wise as there shal be no more force in it. Besides this, if men haue had the in esti-matio: God maketh the despised, in somuch as it is sayd, that he poureth out reproche vpon them. Here are three things: wherof two are visible in mainteyning of princes, & the third is secret. The two visible things are Force & wisdom, ye see a king reigneth: & whē hath he that au-thoritie? If he be wise, or if he haue skilfull counsellers so as things be wel guided, and that they advise him in his affaires and lay for them beforehand: behold that is one meane. The other is, when a king hath men and greate furniture of warre, is wel alayed, and hath strong holds in his countrie. Thus ye see the two things that we perceiue to be the standards of the kingdomes, Principalities, and states of this world, that is to wit, Force and wisdome. But God ouerthroweth their force, & so becommeth it nothing worth. And he wil take away the wisdome of those that be of greate forecast, & ye shal see the all so daūted, as they haue lesse wit than little children. There is a third thing which is secret to the world: which is, that God im-printeth a certaine maiestie in princes, so as they be honored & it is not knowne why: according as it is sayd in Dan. 2.e.37.

Daniel, that whē God minded to stablish the great Empire of Chaldie: he put a feare & terrour of it into al creatures. Looke vpon Balsasar and looke vpon Nabuchad-nesar who were kings. God magnified them in such wise, as the birds of the ayre stode in feare and awe of them.
And wherof came such a conceyt: even of that, that God had printed his image in the. Considering the prude that is in all men, let not vs think that kingdomes could stand stedfast, except God mainteyned them by the meanes aforesayd. Every man would be a Lord, and no man would beare the yoke. There is such statelines in the nature of all men, as every man esteemes himself woorthie to bee a king. How cometh it to passe then, that men suffer a smal number or some one alone to reigne ouer them, but by-cause it is Gods wil that that order should be among me. And now it is sayd, that God wil poure out contempt and reproche vpon those that haue ben noble, and whō men haue reuerence, so as God wil make them a laughingstocke, insomuch that men shall flout them, and make none account of them. VVhy so? Because it belongeth to him to set vp, and to pull downe. Therfore let vs mark well the three things that are spoken of here. Do the princes of this world trust in their munitions, and fortresses, in their people and reuenewes, and in all that can be had to main-tayne them? O, it is sayd that God will cut their bands asunder, abate their forces, and vnbuckle their girdle. So then, it is in vayne for princes to think that they shal continue euer bycause they be well stored fenced & furnished with all things at their harts desire. For as soone as God shall but blowe vpon the, nothing shall auayle the.
If princes trust in their wisdome, it shall happen to them likewise. And we see also how the prophets mocke at the vaine ouerweening that was in the vnbelieuers & enimies of God. VVhere are the sage counsellers of Pha-Esa. 19.b.u.
rao: Hath not Egypt had the renoume vntill now, in such sort that if there were any greate policie in the world it was there? And behold they be dulled & bereft of discretion, and how are they vanished away in that wise? who would

would haue thought it: It is God that hath done it, sayerth the Prophet Esay. So the, let those that be the great ones of the worlde learne to humble theselues, & let them not be caried away with this fonde ouerweening, as though they were able to mainteyne theselues by their own wisedome and strength: for wee see that all that geere is but smoke before God. But if the great men of the world cannot yelde themselues therewnto: nor herken to this doctrine, at leastwise let their example serue for our instruction: let vs thinke vpon it, & be it knowne vnto vs that 10 God hath shewed vs no small fauour in that he setteth Kings & Princes vpon the scaffold to teach vs, to the end that every of vs should humble himselfe & walke aduisedly, knowing that God gouerneth al things, and that lie disposeth of his creatures at his owne pleasure. Then shal Princes be blinded: but in their persones God giueth vs a profitable instructiō if the fault be not in our selues. The little ones therfore must ynderstād that it is a singular fauour that God sheweth them when he teacheth the so in his schole, & in the meane while leaueth those a far off 20 that are highliest aduaunced in the world. Herewithal also let vs marke well, that if God do so chaunge the states of Princes, and abate the force of those that seeme to be so puissant & strong as al things quake vnder the: what shal become of such as are nothing in cōparison of them? Let vs go boast of our owne greatnessse and strength. Looke vpon these great Kings and Monarkes that haue Lorded ouer al men, how God hath cōfounded them, in the twinkling of an eye: and I pray you what shal become of these glorious fellowes that haue nothing in cōparison, when 30 vnder colour of I wote not what, they thinke theselues to be maruelous men, & beare themselues in hand that they ought to flie aboue the clowds, because they haue but one peece of a finger vpon other men, and yet are but as Idols theselues? God needeth not in that case to vtter any great iudgement & worthie of remēbrāce: for their foolishnes is a laughingstocke euen to little children. And thinke we then that God leaueth such ouerweening & prude vnpunished, seing it stinketh so in the sight of the world that it can not be abidden, & moreouer hath no ground nor colour. And as for vs that are priuate persones, let vs be well ware that we set not vp our bristles. For it is Gods peculiār office to daunt the proude & to resist them. And the more they labour and strive to aduaunce themselues, so much the rougher must Gods hand be to cōfound them. 28. & 1. Pet. 5. b. 5. & I therefore let vs bee afryad to lift vp our selues against 1. James. 4. b. 6. God: for his hande is ouerheauie if wee come against it. Furthermore, (as I haue touched alreadie) wee muste vnderstand, that men must not glorie in their owne skill and wisedome. For we see what is sayd here of Judges, Cōseilers, & Kings. God, to mainteyne cōmon weales, (which is a holy thing in this world) bestoweth of his spirit vpon those that are not worthie of it. Kings, or their Cōseilers, or such as haue charge too gouerne the people, may haue some wisedome, howbeit not of themselues: but for so much as God setteth them in that state, it is requisite for them to haue some peculiar thing which is not of their owne nature. And God doth this although men bee not worthie of it: the reason wherof is that he intendeth too maynteyne the order which he hath set. Neuerthelesse he fayleth not afterward to bereuee Kings and Princes and their Cōseilers of wit & reason. If he deale thus towards those on whom he bestoweth his spirite extraordinarily: what shall betyde to priuate persones? So then lette vs learne to walke modestly, and not to thinke our selues so well appoynted as to do any thing of our owne witte and reason. For God is able to bereuee vs of all. True it is that now and then God will leauue men witte and reason, and yet in the meane while it shal take none effect, as wee see in the example of Achitophell. God suffered him to bee always a man of great aduise as he was in deede, & there was great policie in the cousell that he gaue to Absalom. VWell then, yee see that Achitophell had a very politike wit of his owne, and God abated it not a whit, and yet he brought not his enterprise to passe. And why? For God blinded as well Absalom as also all his counsell, so as Achitophell was not beleued. VVee see then that God abridgeth the effect and force of them that are craftie & wylie to the sight of the worlde: And sometimes also he maketh them dull and dolish, as Job speaketh here. Euen so likewise befalleth to priuate persones if a man looke vpon them. How? Yee shall see a man that can so good skill to lay aforéhand for his owne matters, as there is no fault to be found with him: and yet for all that, he prospereth not. And why? God hath cut off the effect of such a mans wisedome, and made it too no purpose. Therfore when this befalleth, we perceyue the prouidēce of God. Howbeit it may also come to passe, that a man which is very politike and of great forecast, shall do so fond an act as shall irke men to see it. Is it possible (shall men say) that so forecasting a man which hath giuen counsell to all other men, should fall into such and so grosse a follie? And what is the cause of this? God hath wrought it. So then, what is to be done? If God giue vs wit and wisedome: first let vs vse it as we ought to do: that is to say, lette vs not apply our wit vnto euill, to beguyle men, to deale deceytfully with them, nor to do them harme or hinderance: but let it serue to maynteyne goodnessse, and to reppresse euill: and therewithall let vs still pray God to stablish the wit which he hath giuen vs, assuring our selues that it is no continuall heritage, but God had neede too continue his grace as he hath begonne it. For wee may be vtterly bereft of it too day ere to morrowe: [ and therefore wee must thinke thus with our selues: ] my God, thou haste asisted me, and I am so much the more indetterd to thee: but yet take not thy spirit from mee. If a mans owne wit haue serued his turne well, a day, a yeere, or the whole 40 tyme of his life: let him yelde the honour vnto God, saying: Lord, I am beholding to thee for this, and I haue not stooode by my selfe: therefore thou must be fayne to vphold mee still, for I can do nothing at all of my selfe. Yee see then what wee haue to doo whereas it is sayde that it is God that taketh away the witte of those which were well aduised before: Making them to grope as in the darke, in such wise as they bee both blinde and drunken, and the power that they had to fore is vanisched away, and they are become nothing, so that if God listed, they must needs come to vtter decay. VVhen we heare this, let vs take example by it, as I haue sayd. But we must not leauue the other first article, namely That God poureth out reprob also vpon such as were noble before, and which were had in reuerence and honour, vpon them will God spred out contempt, and then shall they be so full of shame, as men shall skoffe at them, and they shal haue no reputation any more. Hereby we he taught, that although wee haue all that is possible to be wished, nothing shall serue vs when this contempt commeth: but we shalbe as if we had nother shape, nor fauour, nor aught els, when men see vs in such contempt. And if it be demaunded whereof that commeth, noman can tell why. I say yee shall see men aduaunced to great estate and dignitie, yea euen of the mightiest Kings of the world, and yet they shall runne in contempt, nor for want of good iudgement and aduisednesse, or for want of any meanes of force and policie: but men know not why. Therefore when they be so imbaſed and runne in contempt, may not men perceyue that the P. hand hand of God vpon them? Let men search & they shall find that Princes haue sometimes bene so shamefull and looceiluers, as they were not worthie to haue bene in the bottom of an alehouse or of a brothelhouse: & yet for al that, they were maynteyned in authoritie: & that other-some hauing erst bene men of age and of great wisedome and authoritie, were by God made despysed, so as there was no shifte for them of themselues but to fall downe. Herein then let vs behold Gods iudgements, and learne that if such things happen vnto those that are aduaunced above the common array of men: God may well abase vs when he wil & fill vs ful of shame, although we had bene in great dignitie and reputatiō. Furthermore Job hauing spoken so of Princes and of the chaunges that happen to their states, addeth, that we must also behold Gods iudgements in the bodie of the people. He hath spoken of the heads, and now he cometh to the bodies. Behold a people (sayeth he) that is growen great and mightie, & see how God bringeth the to nothing. Againe another people inlargeth and spreadeth out their bounds very far, and then God hemmeth it in. Certes men do comonly fater this thing vpon fortune: but that is because men blinde themselves through their owne vnhankfulness. For if wee would open our eyes, it is certaine that Gods iudgements are so manifest in this case, as men could not gaynsay the. And that also is the cause why it is sayd in the end of the

(where Gods prouidence is treated of) that the mouth of vnrightuousnesse shalbe stopped. The wicked may well deface Gods Maiestie to the vttermost of their power, but yet must they needes be conuincid: and when they haue well cōsidered the doings of things here through the whole worlde, they must needes haue their mouthes stopped. And like as I sayd that when God smiteth vpon the high & prouide heades, the small ones must needes take occasiō to tremble & to humble themselves: So when God visiteth the whole bodie togither, (that is to say, the people) what shal become of euery seuerall member & every seuerall persone? God spareth not a whole countrie: and what shal become of me. Thus ye see how we ought to applie the great things vnto the small, to the end that every man seuerally may learne to walke hūbly vnder the mightie hande of God, and to frame himselfe thereafter. For if we acknowledge God to be our whole soueraine: he wil handle vs after another fashion than is spoken of here: that is to wit, so as we shal perceyue that his protection is wondersfull towards vs. For if men offer themselues to God and suffer him to gouerne them: he will stretch out his hand to maynteyne them in their state: he wil awiales vphold them by his power: & he will be a shield and defence to them against all euill aduentures. But if men will needes sile to high: God muste needes stoppe them. So then, must not euery of vs needes crouch when we see that God smiteth whole nacionis after that sort? But first of al it standeth vs in hand to be throughly perswaded of that which is cōteyned here. For how shal we els take instruction by that which I haue layde forth? let vs assure our selues that whē the Lord shal haue multiplied a people, he can wel diminish them againe to lesse than nothing. And when there happen any great alteratiōns in a realme, let vs assure our selues that the same cometh not to passe by hap hazard, but that God is the worker of it. Therefore wee muste be throughly resolued of those two things. True it is that we may wel talke of the: but that shall never be in good earnest, till wee haue well studied this lesson, and that euery of vs be well practised in them, in such wise as the same may never be blotted out of our remembrance. Let vs assure our selues, that how soever the world goeth, God ruleth al things in such wise as we ought not to be so wittlesse as to fater any thing vpō fortune. That (say I) is the poynt whereat we ought to begin: namely at the hauing of the full assyrednesse of Gods prouidence, & then to apply the same to our owne vie. But I sayd that we must make our owne profit by it, because we see that when some fantastical heads talke of Gods prouidence, it is to none other end but to intangle themselves in such speculatiōs as are so grosse that is a pitie to see the, & they bring no edification at al. They can wel ynough say, God chaūgeth & God remoueth: but what for that? It is not to be edified in his feare. But the very truth is, that when the holy Scripture speaketh to vs of Gods prouidence: the intent of it is that therby we should know his mightie power. And in what wise know we it, and to what end? To honour him that holdeth vs in his hand, & hath ful soueraintie ouer life and death: that is to say, to be subiect vnto him, seeing he hath all authoritie ouer vs. On the other side the Scripture sheweth vs that God is wise in gouerning the world, according as I haue sayd alreadie. Then is not for vs to say, God doth what he listeth, and we wote not whither it be good or bad: But contrariwise we must cōfesse that all that euer he doth is wel done, and although we know not the reason of it, yet must we honour his secret wisedome. And in conclusion wee must tarie his leysure till he shewe vs wherfore he chaūgeth and shifteſt the states of the world in that sort, and therwithal we must haue our eyes open when things are manifest. Behold, God blissteth a people. And wherfore? Euen for his owne mere goodness sake: we must not seeke for any deserts in men when God sheweth the any fauour. So then, whē we see God spred out his goodness vpon a people: he is to be magnified for the same. But if a people be outrageously giuen to euill, and God visit them: must we not also thinke what is the cause in that behalfe? like as in these dayes we see so great confusions in the world as would greeue a mans hart: but we see also how wickednesse is become like a flowing flud. Yee see a Countrie farre out of square in great and outragious vices, and Gods scourges followe by and by, that is to say within a while after: muste wee not needes in that case acknowledge God too bee a righteous Judge? And wee may iustly condemne them that perishe. But haue wee once condemned them? Then must we streytwayes come to our selues. For the principall poynt is, for vs too profit our selues by other mennes coste, when God doeth vs the pleasure to warne vs beforehand, to the ende that euery of vs should come home againe. Yee see then after what sorte wee may fare the better by Gods prouidence according as is shewed vs in this streyne. But it is sayd immediatly, That God bringeth the darkenesse into light, yea even the darkenesse that is as darke as death: that is to say, which is as the darkenesse of Hell: the same wil he bring too light when he listeth. Here Job expresseth what his meening is: namely to reherce vnto vs those workes of God which are most famous. For if he should speake of cōmon and ordinarie workes: we would be as it were a sleepe, and it would not touche vs a whit, as I haue declared alreadie. Therfore wee must be warned in such sort, as our wittes may be astonisched at it, yea and as wee may be quickened vp, how lasie or dulminded so euer we bee. Thus ye see what Job ment by saying that God will bring the darkenesse of death vnto light. He might well haue sayd, God maketh his sunne to shine euery day: we see how the night hath his course, & the day succeedeth. Lo here is a great and wonderfull chaunge. Job might haue spoken so. But forasmuch as that is an ordinarie thing among vs: we passe not of it. Therefore he intended to touch the extraordinarie things, as if he had sayd: God

God maketh such alterations, as if Hell were aduaunced vp aloft or as if death were set vp on high for men to behold. Now when darknesse chaungeth so into light, it is a strange fashion and such a one as never was looked for. But thereby God wakeneth vs and giueth vs cause to thinke better vpon his power than we haue erst done. So then let vs remember this lesson well. But wee be never the better for all the instructions that God giueth vs frō day to day: yea and although he worke such miracles as ought to moue vs throughly when we do but thinke vpō them: yet are we no whit touched with them. VVherefore he must be fayne to worke after another fashion, & to crie out aloude. VVee be like as when a man is layd in his bed and falne fast asleepe: a thoufande things may be spoken to him which he heareth not: folke may talke and discourse of many matters, and he that is asleepe shal know never a whit of it. But if one make a great noyse, then ye shall see him wake, and a man cannot speake so softly but he will heare what is sayd. So standeth the case with vs. For God sheweth vs many things that ought to serue for our instruction: but we haue our eyes shet: he speaketh to vs, but we heare nothing. And why? Because we be a sleepe. And therfore he must be fayne to make a great noyse to waken vs, to the ende wee may thinke so much the better vpon his prouidence, and acknowledge that it is God that weakeneth vs, therefore it is not now for vs to be sluggish so as we should not haue regarde of him to profit our selues by the iudgements that he sheweth vs. VVherefore let vs aduisedly shroud vs vnder his protection, doubting not but that in asmuch as he hath al creatures in his hand, (yea euen vnto the litle sparrowes, which are of small value and estimation) he will never forget vs: not only forsoomuch as we be his creatures fashioned after his owne image: but also because we be his children, according as he hath adopted vs by our Lorde Iesus Christ.

But let vs fall downe before the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying to make vs feele them better, that we may abhorre them & condemne this slouthfulnesse which is in vs and in al our senses: & to enlighten vs by his holy spirite, because we be blinde, euen in the lightsomest and manifestest things. Therfore [let vs pray him] to open our eyes in such sort, as we may behold the great secrete of his heauenly kingdome: yea & that we may behold his maestic so far forth as is expediet for our welfare (according also as he sheweth himself to vs by the meanes of our Lord Iesus Christ) vntil we may come to the full & perfect sight of it, which shalbe at the last day, when we shall see him face too face in such wise as it shalbe fully fashioned like vnto his glorie. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only to vs: but also to all people and nations of the earth, &c.

The. xlxi. Sermon, which is the first vpon the thirtenth Chapter.

BEhold, mine eye hath seene all these things, mine eare hath heard and vnderstode them:

2. I knovv as much as you: I am not inferiour to you.
3. But I vvill speake vnto God, and reason vvith him.
4. Yee bee forgers of lies, and Phisitions of no value.
5. O that you vvould hold your tungs, and that should bee counted to you for vvisedome!
6. Hearre my discourse, and vnderstand vvhat I debate.
7. Neede you to alledge iniquitie in Gods defence, and to speake vntruth for his sake?
8. VVillyee pleasure him? vvill yee pleade his case?
9. Is it good that hee shoulde allowv you? and that you shoulde vsurpe vpon him as vpon a man?
10. Hevvill reprooue you if you fauour him in secrete.

T is a very euill thing when every of vs will set out himselfe and will not be inferiour to his companion. For when we haue this fond desire to seeme and to be counted wise, it is possible that the same shall in-gender much strife among vs, as S.

Phil.2. 4.3. Paule also speaketh of it. This vainegloriousnesse is the Sea and welspring of all debate. For men shal never agree quietly among themselues, except every man yelde meekely to that which is good and reasonable, and be voyde of desire to aduaunce himself aboue others. But if euery of vs be so fond as to steppe before others to be the more esteemed: the fire muste needes be kindled out of hande. Furthermore wee see how the Scripture telleth vs that wee must esteeme the giftes of God in those that haue receyued them. VVherfore let euery man thinke vpon his owne infirmities and sinnes: and that will make vs to stoupe, and to esteeme those whom wee haue presumptuously shaken off: & let vs be afraid to do God any wrong by despising such as are not vtterly destitute of his gracious giftes. But it seemeth here that Job ment too preferre himself before them that had spoken. I vnde- stand as much as you (sayeth he) I am not inferior, mine eare bare these things, myne eyes bath scene them. It see- meth here that Job would haue more reputation of wi-done & skilfuinesse than those three to whom he spake.

But he was not ledde with desire of prayse, his doing so is bycause these men woulde beare him downe with their presumptuousnesse, yea and pervert Gods truthe after their owne fancie. Job therefore was constrainyd to say 50 that he vnderstood those things better than they: and he doth it to the ende that if these men be able to profit theselues by it, they should do it by humbling them. For vnt-till such time as men bee made to stoupe so lowe as they may bee no more puffed vp with the sayde presumptuousnesse: it is impossible too winne any thing at their hande, for all that euer a man can shewe them, for they set too muche by themselues. Then if a man minde too make himself fit to heare Gods truth, and too receyue it: hee muste bee humbled afore. That is the thing 60 whereat Job ameth. But for asmuch as they with whom hee talked, had bene hardened and were settled in the blind ouerweening of their owne wisedome: Job will haue the truth heard, and not to ceasse to haue authoritie still, notwithstanding that these men reiect it. Thus yee see Jobs meening in effect. According herenvnto, wee see how Sainct Paule is forced sometimes to make comparison betwenee himself and those that were of estimation among men. It is certayne that S. Paule was not P.ij. prouoked

prouoked thereto by vaingloriousnesse, nother was hee ledde with such a minde as to desire & couet to be esteememed among men. VVhy then copareth he himselfe with such as had bene wont to magnifie themselues? If they

1. Cor. 11. e. be Hebrewes (sayeth he) so am I: if they be of auncient linage, I also may well account my pedegree: If they bee 22. earnest followers of the Law, I am so too as well or more Phil. 3. 4. 5. than they, I haue liued without blame: if they boast theselues too haue any knowledge, I also haue bene well taught frō my childhood, and I haue had a good mayster.
It seemeth there, that S. Paule gathereth togither all the things that are wont to be esteemed: to the end that men should clap their hands at him, and take him for a great man, and set much store by him. But he ment no such thing. For he himselfe auoucheth it to bee starke folly.

2. Cor. 11. e. VVell (sayeth he) you compell mee to play the foole, and 16. 17. to do as they do which spred out their wings, & be meddling with euery thing to be magnified among men: I am faine (sayeth he) to deale so, but not of mine owne will.
And why? For he saw that the Corinthians & such other like were forepossessed with a fonde reputation of men that were nothing worth, & loued none but such maner of teachers, because they had itching eares, by meanes wherof Gods Gospell was despised, and those troublers had their full scope. And they that had nother wisedome nor discretion to consider what was for their profit, suffered themselues to be led by such as had nothing but faire glozings without any holinesse. S. Paule then perceyuing this, telleth them. No no, If these maner of men purchase themselues estimation by those meanes: I may do so as wel as they, but I wil not: For that is not the thing wherin we must be esteemed: according as he concludeth in the end, that if any man wil be counted to be of Gods Church,

2. Cor. 5. d. he must become a new creature. Ye see then (sayeth he) 17. that the estimation is to be had at Gods hande, and not by these braueries wherwith mens heads are buzied. Neuer-thelesse, S. Paule (as we see) ment to shew, that he was not inferior to those that pretended greate styls to bee in some preheminenſe and dignitie to the worldward, after the same maner that Job doth here. He sawe that those men ment to treade Gods truth vnderfoote, because they were in reputation. But Job for his parte telleth them he vnderstoode the things as well as they: and thereupon he purposed to warne them to be more lowly and to yeelde themselues teachable. And although they had bene vtterly vnamendable and stubborne in their folie: yet neuerthelesse Iobs mind was, that Gods truth, which had bene in maner peruerted by them, shoulde haue full authoritie as it deserueth. Thus much cōcerning the first poynt. And by the way we must bee warned not to seeke prayſe or reputation afore men. For if wee intend that, it is certayne that in stede of maynteyning the truth, we shal marre all: and God also will suffer vs to be sotured in our owne folie, and too be made a very laughing-stocke. Then lette vs bee well ware that wee seeke not our owne prayſe. But when our Lord giueth vs the grace to teach others, let the same tende to this marke, namely to honour him, and to cause the thing too bee well accepted which cometh of him, so as men may submit themselues vnto it, and we our selues shewe example to others to do so: according also as our Lord Iesus Christ setteth the same thing downe for a marke too discerne the good

John. 7. c. and true doctrine by. For when a man seeketh the glorie of God, men knowe thereby that he is a minister of the truth. But if he desire to be exalted and esteemed: he must needs disguise and marre all, and the pure doctrine must needs bee defaced through his vainegloriousnesse. Marke this for a speciall poynt. But nowe let vs come to that which Job sayeth. Yee are (sayeth he) forgers of lies, and pelting Phisitions, and I woulde fayne that yee shoulde all of you holde your tunges: for that were moste wisedome for you. VVhen Job calleth them forgers of lies which had spoken afore, we see straytwayes to what purpose he sayeth it. Nowe let vs take the saying that is added, namely that they bee pelting Phisitions. VVhy so?

Because they misapply their medicines as we haue seene.
It hath bene tolde you alreadie that the doctrine whiche hath bene set downe by these men, was good and holy, howbeit that it was ill applied to the persone of Job. It is as if a Phisitian shoulde chooze good drugs, but yet (without knowing the parties disease, complexion, or nature,) shoulde say to him, Lo, here is a good medicine, and a well tryed, and therefore it shall doo this man good.
But if he deale so: whereas he saueth one, he shall kill another. Therefore it behoueth a Phisition to be wise, that he knowe his pacients complexion and disease. But these men here had no such regarde. And thus yee see why Job called them pelting Phisitions of no value. And behold here a texte well woorthie too be marked. VVee knowe that Gods woerde is the ordinarie foode of our Soules: but yet must the same serue vs also for Phisicke when wee be diseased. Bread hath awytes his accustomed vſe: but Gods woerde must not onely feede vs, it must furthermore heale our diseases and clenze vs. And therfore there must be discretion vſed in the applying of it. For without that, we shall confound all. As how? If a poore man be desolate, and haue a troubled conscience, & we see him at the poynt of despayre: if one should set Gods threatenings and vengeance afore him: what were it els but to send him headlong forward? I see a wall that shaketh alreadie, and I beate at it with great strokes of a mattocke: is it not the next way to throwe it downe? The must wee marke how they be disposed with whom wee haue to doo. For if a poore man be already dismayed at Gods wrath & know not where to become he had neede to be comforted and cheered vp with the promises that God giueth to wretched sinners in calling them too him so sweetely. This medicine then must be applied peculiarly to suche as haue neede of it. But there are others which are shameleſſe, & despise God, and scoffe at al that ever is sayd to them: now if a man come to cocker them in it, by offering them the mercie of God, and by setting afare them the pitie that God hath of vs: were it not a foolish proceeding? For such folke haue neede too bee touched to the quicke, and to be threatened, yea & to be wounded even to the bottome of the hart if it bee possible, that they may know what it is to stomacke in that wise against God. Now then we see, that the holy Scripture, beyng the spirituall Phisike of our soules, muste be applied according to euery mans dispositiō. And now let vs marke in what state Job was. He was extremely pressed with the affliction that God had sente him, and wee haue seene the reason why, namely for that it behoued his pacience to be exercysed. God giueth him pacience, howbeit not but that he shoulde haue much infirmite therewith: for like a wretched man, he starteth out of square, & casteth forth bubbles and froath against God.
Nor that he leapeth quite out of his boundes, but he holdeth not such an euennesse and measure as he ought to haue done. Then how soever the cace stooide, there was infirmite in Job. He knew wellynough how it was God that afflicted him: howbeit forasmuch as he sawe not the cause why, he thought that God pressed him too sore, and that he ought to haue spared him more. And what do they that come to comfort him? They tell him that God is righteous: and that is true. Herepon they conclude

conclude that God punisheth not men without good causes, and that his handling of them so roughly is by reason of their sinnes: all this is true. But they misapply it particularly in concluding that God handleth every man according to his desert, for we see the flat contrarie. Out of a generall principle that is good and true, they drawe an euill consequence. For although God be iust, and men bee sinners, and haue deserued it: yet doth it not follow that God punisheth them thereafter to the full: or that he keepeth one continuall rate, so as he shoulde presently punish those that haue offended, and reserue nothing till the latter day. Also it followeth not that Job was a wicked man, and an hypocrite, &c that God shewed evidently that he was shaken off, or that he had nothing els but hypocrisy in him before. All these things are false, notwithstanding that these men take them and derive them from a true grounde. And so ye see wherefore Job calleth them pelting Phisitions. This streyne then warneth vs to pray God to giue vs wisedome, that we may take the holy Scripture to such end as it pertayneth, and that we may haue the discretion to applie it in such wise as wee may do good with it, and that it be not pulled too and fro by the toppe (as they say) according as many men abuse it. Furthermore when wee take in hand to teach our neyghbours: let vs consider well what it priuile: neuerthelesse it is a beginning to doo well when a man hath holde of himselfe and can rule his tung: for it is a token that he delighteth not altogether in his owne folie. True it is that some can couer their folie for a time: but in the ende they bee fayne too bewray themselues, and too make menne too knowe what they bee, that is to witte, fooles. Neuerthelesse if a man haue skill to keepe silence, although he be but of a weake wit, and haue not such discretion as were requisite: yet is it a great poynt of wisedome that he knoweth it, and fodeth not himselfe in his vyce, but rather laboreth to amende it. I say, although such folie remayne in a man: yet is it a great poynt of wisedome when he auaunceth not himself, but knoweth himselfe in such sort as he misliketh of it and humbleth himselfe. But if a man bewray himselfe to bee a foole by his owne tung: it is a token that he is a starke foole: according as we often see, that such as haue least skill, are babbling without reason, so as a man cannot by any meanes hold them from it, but when he hath talked with them a whole houre togither, he shall finde them to bee the same men still. Therfore when men are perceyued to bee at that poynt: it is a signe of extreme folie. And therfore let this Proverbe put vs in minde of that which S. James telleteth also: that is to wit, that it is a Lanes.3.4.2. great vertue when a man can skill to holde his tung and to vse it soberly. And why? For if wee be too hastie to speake, it hindereth vs frō hearing that which is for our profit. VVhat is the cause that many men profit not at all in the woerde of God? It is bycause they are too hastie, that whereas they ought to be quiet, and whereas onely God ought to haue the hearing: they step forth with their bubbles and caste forth their talke, yea euen at randon. Therefore they shet the gate in such wise against themselues, as they cannot be instructed though the doctrine be offered thē. For this cause let vs marke well, that when S. James counseleth vs to brydle our tangs, his meening is that we should be quiet & discrete to heare, if we purpose to profit by that which is sayd vnto vs: and further, that among men: we must not be to talkatiue, nor wearie them with our vnprofitable babbling: and this must euerie one of vs put in vre. It is not needefull to make long sermons of it, for these are such things as shoulde rather be continually minded than set forth at large with many woordes. And the more that we perceyue it to be harde to frame our selues vnto the sayde vertue: so much the more ought wee to esteeme it in the man that can skill too speake as much as he ought and no more. But now lette vs come to the cheefe poynt that is touched here, Job sayeth, That he will neuerthelesse talk with God, and that he will resēn against him: but he blameth those that had gone abouute to ouercome him by their disputations, as who shoulde say they woulde speake in the defence of God. Thinke yee (sayeth he) that God hath neede of your leasings? or that you shoulde come here too be his proctours and aduocates? hath he neede that men should defende him after suche a fashion? Thinke you that this shall auayle you when he commeth to trie you? ye must bee ouerwhelmed by him for all your pretence of desirousnesse too iustifie him. He will shewe that he abhorreth such dealings, and that he wil be maynteyned by his owne righteousnesse, without borrowing of any meanes to be acquitted at mens hands, and without borrowing of their leasings, and of the excuses that they shall haue forged. VVhereas Job sayeth he will talke with God and dispute against him: verely there is some excesse in that saying: but lette vs also marke the good that is in it, that wee may discerne it from the euill. Beholde, the good that is in this saying of Iobs, is that he fit to teache, to incourage, to warne, too reprocue, and to redresse. Yea but it must bee considered what maner of one the partie is that it muste be applyed vnto, as I sayde afore. If wee see a poore sinner that is cast downe and mourneth for his sinnes, and desireth nothing but to returne vnto God: let it be shewed him that God is ready too accept him and receyue him. Yee see then how wee ought too deale in that behalfe. Contrarywise if wee see one that is proude and stately: wee knocke vpon his harde pate with a beetel too make him meeken himselfe before God. And if wee see a slouthfull persone: hee muste bee pricked soreward like an Aſſe. Thus ye see how the holy Scripture may bee profitable too vs. But in the meane season wee must also keepe the same manner of proceeding on our owne behalfe. For wee muste be the same to our neyghbours that we be too our selues. VVee see that when their conscience is combered, and themselues are disquieted in minde, they feede their owne humour. For they take Gods threatenings so rigorously, as they thinke they shoulde neuer come soone ynough to despayre. Let vs keepe vs from such dealing. And when wee spie Satans wylinesse in making vs beleue that we be vtterly pastre recoverie, and that there is no helpe too recomfort vs: lette vs resist it, and applic the remedie therewith. It is Satan that worketh: and therefore wee on the contrarie parte muste seeke some asswagement too bring vs backe vnto God, wee muste enter into his promises, wee muste giue heedfull eare vnto them, and wee muste set all our wittes vpon them. Moreover, when we see there is too much slouthfulness in our selues, so as wee haue neede too bee pricked and spurred: lette vs take vs too the exhortations that are in the holie Scripture. Thus yee see how we may be good Phisicions bothe towardes our selues and towardes our neyghbours by considering what is meete and conuenient for vs. And as touching that Job sayeth, that he would fayne that his frendes would holde their peace, that they might be counted wyſe men: it agreeith with the common

Proverbe.17 d.28. Proverbe that Salomon vseth, which is, that a foole may bee counted wyſe whyle he holdeth his peace. True it is that a man is neuer the better for hyding his owne shame so long as his folie abides still within him, and he nurriſh will turne away from men. And why? For they with whom he had too doo perçyued not the spirituall battell that he had in himselfe, and that he could haue found in his hart too haue indured a hundred times more, so be it that God had sweetened his stripes with such comfort as he might haue knowne, that God is fauourable to me, and he will never faile me. Had Job bene throughly perswaded of that, and that God had hilde him by his mighty hande: no doubt but he had bene readie to haue indured a hundred times more. Howbeit forasmuch as 10 he perçyued nothing in God but rigour, so as it seemed to him that God was vtterly against him, and persecuted him with extremitie: he woteth not where he is: behold, he is out of his wittes. But such spirituall battells are not easie to be knowne of men. And therefore Job sayeth, that he will talk with God: that is too say, that he will shrinke into himself, and that being so gathred close in secrete, he will holde himselfe there. For men take these wordes at random and wrest them as they list themselues: but God knoweth well yngough to what ende his speaking tendeth. Marke this for a speciall poynt. And further let vs also marke, that when the case standeth vpon the framing of our selues vnto pacience: if we indure any aduersitie, we must comfort our selues in God: and if wee be tried, so as the Diuell tempteth and thrusteth vs forward to despoyre, there is nothing so good as to gather our wittes home. And why so? For so long as wee gaze at men, wee shall nothing auayle, but (which more is) wee shall doo our selues harme. If I be troubled that I can no more: well, if I cōfōrt my selfe with fayne shewes 30 only, and make great protestations before men: God will laugh my soridnesse to scorne, in so much that when I come to my selfe againe, and am alone, my conscience wil pinche mee, and then shall I feele how all that euer I pretended was but smoke. And why? Because I haue had more regard of men than of God. So then, when a man intendeth to frame himself vnto pacience: it is good for him to withdraw into himself, as if he were separated frō the whole worlde, and to reserre himselfe wholly vnto God, and suffer himselfe to be gouerned by him. And truly seeing we are in such necessities, we haue good cause to call vpon God: but how shall we call vpon him, if wee be not as it were cut off from men? For so long as I am fastened to this or that: so long am I turned aside from God. VVe see then that we must cut off al these cordes that hold vs backe, and present our selues before the maiestie of God as the only partie whom wee haue regard of. True it is that wee must regarde our neyghbours also, both too edifie them, and to receyue comfort at their handes. But in the meane whyle wee muste beginne at 50 this poynt: that is to wit, at the laying open of our hartes before God, that we disburden all our matters, sorrowes, and cares vnto him. Yee see then how our talking with God muste bee to the ende that men drawe vs not hither and thither: but that like as God seeth vs, so wee haue our eyes settled and fastened vpon him alone, and all that is hidden in our hartes may bee clenzed and voyded away, when wee bee come to that poynt and are appeareed before him. Thus yee see the good that wee haue to gather out of these woordes of Job, and howe they bee profitable for our instruction. But there is also euill in them: which is, that he wil enter into disputation with God. True it is that sometimes God giueth vs leauue to reason with him: yea, but our disputings muste not bee long: and besides that, the conclusion of them must alwayes bee to glorifie him. As howe? VVe see that the Prophets finde faute with the calamities and desolations which they sawe: for they say, Lorde, howe can it bee that thou shouldest destroy thy people? wilt thou suffer things too bee confounded after this sorte? wilt thou neuer sette them in order? Thus yee see one kinde of disputing or reasoning with God. Yea, but the Prophets and holy men rested not in that poynt. For when they had bewrayed their infirmitie after that maner, they always concluded, doo thou therewith and dispose thou thereof according to thy wonderfull wisedome: it is not for vs too replie against thee, and therefore we will paciently wayte what shall become of thy worke. True it is that wee bee sore amazed as nowe when wee see things go too suche confusion. Yet notwithstanding Lorde, thou wilt prouide well yngough for all, and in such wise as thy name may be praysed: vntill such time as all bee set in order againe, wee will as it were shink downe our heads too the grounde: according as it is sayde, I Lam. 3.4.29 will lay my mouth to the duste, and the Sayncts muste bee humbled in that wise. Jeremy was in horrible extremitie when he sayde so: for he sawe the vtter desolation of Gods Churche, in somuch that his couenant seemed to bee abolished, his whole seruice turned vpside downe, and the hope of the whole worlde buried. And therefore after that Jeremy had made his moane, hee sayeth he will lay his mouth too the grounde, and rather eate dust and dung than liste vp his beake too lette his tung at large against God. Yee see then how it is lawfull for vs sometime too reasor with God: howbeit so as it bee very myldy, and that the winding vp of it bee as I haue sayde: that is to witte, too glorifie God referring our selues wholly vnto him. Lo in effect what wee haue too marke. But lette vs come backe agayne too Jobs persone. He intendeth to dispute against God: and after what maner? It is after suche a sorte that althoough he knowe there is a double rightuousesse in God: (that is to witte, the same which is manifested to vs in his lawe, and the other which he keepeth hidden:) yet he coulde not conceyue the cause why God tormenteth him after that sorte, but it seemed to him that God ought too haue borne with him. Therfore in this disputing, Job vexeth 40 himself, and this passion of his is farre out of square, and the disputation is ioyned with it and dependeth vpon it. Ye see then that Job doth amisse and is to be condemned for reasoning after that sorte with God. Then let vs mark well that whensoeuer God handleth vs roughly, and we be tempted to grudge and fret against him, we must bridle our selues. True it is (as I haue sayd) that God beareth with vs if we vtter our griefs vnto him, & say, Alas Lord, thou seest what I am, I can no lōger hold out, shal it be thus with mee euer? must I yet linger still a longer time? VVe may (say I) make such moanes to God: but when he hath giuen vs such libertie, yet will he haue vs neuerthelesse to conclude thus: Lord, we are thine, and thou shalt do with vs what it pleaseth thee, and it is not for vs but to glorifie thee in all respects. Lo what wee haue to marke, not only when the matter concerneth our persones, but also generally when it shall seeme too vs that Gods workes haue no reason in them. For example: if wee see greate stumblings, and that the wicked haue their full scope, and that God prouide not for the good, but suffereth them to 60 be afflicted without giving them any ease: by and by we say, How now? God hath declared that he wil ayde those that call vpon him, and we see the cleane contrarie. VVe ceasse not too haue recourse vnto him, and yet is he as it were deafe for any prayers that wee offer vnto him. Againe he hath promiied to defend his Churche, and behold how it is left vp to the spoyle. VVe see that horrible tirannie beareth the sway, and where is Gods had which should succour those that are his? doth he shew himself willing willing to maynteyne his owne cace, when men see his Church is openly oppressed, and the enemies of all religion reigne now adayes in suche outrage as it is pitifull to see, and yet God represseth them not? Then if suche temptations come to our minde, let vs learne to get vs away and not to fall to reasoning with God. Thus yee see what we haue to marke vpon this streyne. Nowe lette vs come to the second poynt. Ioh sayeth, that those which bad spoken ment too curry fauour with God, as when wee would support a mortall man: for the Hebrewe woordē that is set here, signifieth too like or accept ones face or persone. VVhat is the cause that wee accept persones in matters of judgement here in this world? Though a man haue an euill cace, yet if he be our kinsman or freende, if he be commended vnto vs, if we may looke for any profite at his hand, or if he be in authoritie: well, we be moued with such a fleshly regard towardes him, and wee be so caried away with it, as the cace of the partie is nothing with vs, but the fauour of him blindest vs. Also this word Face or Persone, is referred to the outwarde things that may serue to incline our mindes eyther to the louing or to the hating of any man. Thus then doth Job speake: It seemeth to you that God hath neede of your helpe to support him, as a mortall man that hath an euill cace. And truly if one bee minded too shewe him fauour, he will say, he is my kinsman, he is my freende, he is commended to me, he hath pleasured me, or he will pleasure mee. Herevpon he disguyseth things after suche a sorte, as he proceedeth no more by right and equitie, but indirectly. And I beseeche you (sayeth Job) hath God neede to bee hilde vp in that wife, and too bee supported after the maner of men? It behoueth vs to marke wel this poynt, that it is not Gods will too haue his cace handled so. For he abhorreth all accepting of persones. VVe know that he telleth vs, that if wee will iudge rightly, wee muste bee turned quite and cleane away from all worldly respects. For those considerations doo vtterly bereue vs of the vprightnesse and discretion which wee ought too haue. Howe happeneth it that when a man maketh a lawe, he will make it reasonable: and when he sitteth too judge a cace, he will oftentimes give a forked sentece? For when he maketh the lawe, hee hath his eye vpon the matter, he looketh vnto vprightnesse, and he cannot turne aside that he shoulde not followe that which is good. True it is that all men haue not this consideration: but yet for all that, when wee haue no respect vnto menne, if a man propounde a cace vnto vs in suche wyse as the persones bee not medled with it, wee will iudge vprightly when the cace is layde naked afore vs. But if the twoo parties come before vs, and that the one bee riche or of our kinne, or that there bee some other like respect, and the other is a poore man, or not so well recommended vnto vs: Then is the iudge caried away, yea and he reuerseth all the matter even when the cace hath beeene layde open before him, and that he hath giuen right iudgement vpon it. And why? For the persones bereue him of the vprightnesse which he had. And here also yee see why our Lorde Iesus Christe sayeth, Judge yee truely and not with accepting of persones. And he sheweth that too bee forepossessed with any humane affection, whither it bee hatred or fauour, and too pronounce a good and vnpartiall sentence, are thinges that cannot matche togither. For our passions doocaste vs into suche darkenesse, that wee see not the right as wee did before. Yee see then howe God condemneth all accepting of persones: that is too say, the respect or regarde that wee haue too menne. Nowe if the cace bee so, that God will not haue any accepting of persones among menne, but viterly abhorreth it: will he take it in good woorth towards himselfe seeing he hath no neede of it? vndoubtedly he wil not. So then wee see Iobs meaning. But now remayneth that wee knowe the profite of this doctrine. For it is more profitable than a man woulde thinke before he hath put it in practize. Let vs take the examples which wee see in these dayes with our eyes. There are that doo halfe stablishe Freewill. And why? That they may the better please their cace against God. But leite menne followe that thing purely <sup>2 Cor. 3 b. 5</sup> whiche the holie Scripture sheweth vs. It is sayde that <sup>Iohn. 8. d. 34</sup> men are naught and frowarde, that they cannot so muche as thinke a good thought, that they cannot so muche as stirre one finger too doo good, that they bee the bondeslaues of sinne, that all their thoughts are nothing els but a conspiracie against God, and that all their affections are enemies of goodnessse. Lo what the holy Scripture telleth vs. But there are that inferre herevpon, yea, is it so? and wherefore then hath God giuen vs the lawe, wherein he requireth that wee shoulde loue him with all our harte, with all our minde, with all our strength, and with all our power? For if wee be giuen vp to euill, why doth God commaunde vs too doo well? is not this a playne mockerie? Othersome say, seeing <sup>Rom. 8. b.</sup> wee can do no good, are wee not to be excused? For sinne ought not to bee imputed vnto vs, except wee bee able too absteyne from it. Seing then that that power is not in vs, it followeth that there is no more sinne in the worlde. Herevpon there steppe in sticklers, whiche would fayne playe the Philosophers too defende God, and to cleere him of all these slauders. O (say they) it is true that wee bee weake, and that wee can doo nothing vntesse God helpe vs: but his grace is readie for vs, take it who will: and wee may make it auayable, if the faulte bee not in our selues. Beholde howe men are desirous to curry fauour with God by defacing the doctrine of the holy Scripture, as though God stode in neede of their vnruthes. So is it also with Gods Election. VVhen men say that God chooseth whom he thinketh good, and leaueth the residue, and that it is vnkowne why he doth it, sauing that it so pleaseth him, and that his only wil ought to suffice vs for a final conclusion, and that in those whom God hath chosen we haue to consider his goodnessse and mercie: and that as touching those that are forsaken, they be as it were mirours of his vengeance: when men speake after that maner, it is according too the Scripture. But nowe, beholde howe the malicious sorte do ranckle and spewe out their blasphemies against God: yea, (say they) and if he chooze whom he listeth, then is he an accepter of persones. VVhy doth he chooze the one rather than the other? Verely as who should say, that God regarded our fayre eyes in choozing of vs, and that the cause sprang not in himselfe, that is to say, in his owne meere goodnessse. But yee see how men are alwayes desirous to checke against God. And herevpon come in these sticklers that I speake of to qualifie the matter. O (say they) we must not say that God doth after that sort chooze whom he thinketh good (for that shoulde giue the wicked men occasion to runne further out of square) but wee muste rowe betweene bothe the streames too content the one as well as the other. VWell then (say they) it is true that God choozeth: but it is those whome he foresaw too be disposed to receyue his grace. And on the other side, looke whom he foreknew too bee wicked and that they woulde not bee the better for his choozing of them, them doeth he leue suche as they bee, knowing well ynoch that they would be vndone by their owne Free-will. Tl. us see how the wicked sorte doo speake of <sup>6. 7.</sup>

Gods election, enen peruerting all truth : and yet they beare themselves in hand that God liketh well of them for doing so. But let vs rather assure our selues that God abhorreth them, as this text sheweth vs. And so yee see to what vse we muste apply this doctrine, if we minde to fare the better by it. Surely it deserueth to be layde forth more at length, and so it shalbe God willing : but as now the time will not suffer a man to say any more.

But now let vs cast our selues downe before the presence of our good God with acknowledgment of our 10 sinnes, praying him to humble vs in such wise, that being conuicted of offending him diuers wayes, we may seeke nothing but his fauour: and that if he afflict vs for a time, and vse such rigour as may seeme excessiue vnto vs, yet wee may still keepe our mouth shet, wayting patiently till he deliuere vs from all our troubles: and that in the meane season we may giue him his due glorie, acknowledging the authoritie which hee hath ouer vs and all creatures. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs but also to all people and Naciones, &c.

The 1. Sermon, which is the second vpon the thirtenth Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the viij. viii. ix. and x. verses, and then as followeth.

11. Doth not his Maiestie amaze you ? doth not the feare of him fall vpon you ?
12. Your remembrance is like vnto asshes, and your bodies too bodies of clay.
13. Holde your tungs in my presence, and lette mee speake, and lette happen too mee vwhat can.
14. VVherefore should I take my flesh in my teeth, and put my soule into my handes ?
15. Although he kill mee, yet vwill I trust in him : neuerthelesse I vwill reprooue my vvayes in his sight.

E haue to go forewarde with the matter that wee began yesterdai : which is, that the Scripture sheweth vs many things which our vnderstanding cannot brooke. For when a man speaketh to vs after that manner concerning God : there is such a scornefulness in vs, as (to our seeming) wee are not bounde to receyue any thing which wee finde not to be good. Herevpon there haue bene some that would fayne play the wyze men in disguising of things, too the ende that all might bee well lyked, according as I alledged two examples yesterday. The one concerneth Freewill. For beholde what the Scripture telleth vs: namely, that men can do no good at all, but are hilde prisoners altogether vnto euil. Many are of opinion, that if it were so, then sinners were excused and quite, inasmuch as they haue no power in them too do good. And there are forgers of lies, which rowe betweene two stremes and say, that then it were better to graunt men some Freewill, to the intent they may be blamewoorthis when they haue done amisse. Yea, but the Scripture speaketh otherwise. VVherefore is it that they flee too suche starting-holes, if it bee not that they forge leasings too currie fauour with God? hath he neede of their lies? muste his truthe be maynteyned by that meane? As much is to bee sayde of those that darken Gods grace in that he hath chosen whom he thought good, before the creation of the worlde, and reiected the rest. And how is that? It is a very sore poynct, and wee see that many men haue stumbled at it. Ye see what these Sages alledge, and yet in the meane wylle they steppe in like sticklers, saying, we say that God hath chosen those that ought to be sauued. And why is that? bycause he foresaw that they would be well dispozed therenvnto. Therfore ip asmuch as he foreknew that they woulde bee ready to receyue his grace : he marked them out, that he might say, these are mine. But doth the Scripture speake so? No, it speaketh cleane contrarie. For it sayeth that God findest vs all alike, and that it is he which putteth a difference betwixt vs: and that there is nother barrell better herring of vs, sauing that God of his owne infinite goodness draweth vs out of death. Thus yee see the pure and simple doctrine of the holy Scripture. VVherefore doo men come too brabble here? As I tolde you, it is because they thinke too excuse God by it. Yea, muste God bee fayne to borrowe our lyes, and muste wee bee his spokesmen with our wrangling trickes, like as wee see that euill cases had neede to bee well coloured, and altogether turkined, that it may so bleare the eyes of the iudges, as they may bee able too knowe nothing? Is it needefull too worke after this fashion in Gods behalfe? Then lette vs marke well how it is sayde here, that when wee shall haue sought all the corners of our wylle to colour that which men would els reiect and condemne, to the intent that there might be no article in all the holy Scripture, that might be misliked: God will condemne vs for such sophisticall inuentions. This extendeth yet further. For wee see howe many there are at this daye that would fayne be medling too make a incane betwixt vs and the Papistes. Verely (say they) it is true that there be many abuses in the Churche, (they confesse all) and things are ouergrosse and vnable to be borne withall, and therefore it is needefull to haue some reformation. They will confesse this. But in the meane season, if they bee demaunded what it is that wee preache: they finde not any fault or peece of fault with our doctrine, but that we followe the pure simplicitie of the Gospell without adding or diminishing: notwithstanding, they see it is reiecte of many, and that men cannot agree, and that it were a very harde matter to reforme all things hande smoothe, and men are not so gentle too bee dealt withall. Herevpon they finde out, and forge a devise too say, It were beste then too holde a meane [betweene bothe,] as wee sawe in the Interim. VVhat hath bene the cause too bring vs this Diuelishnesse, but onely that they whiche were the deuilers of it, were desirous too play the Alchimistes or multipliers, and too finde out a newe Quintessence and I wote, not what? For they haue bene sufficiently conuicted, that in Poperie there is nothing but horrible confuzion, and that all things are ouerfarre out of order. The Idolatrie there is as grosse as may be: the seruing of God is vtterly defaced, wee see that men put their trust in their owne descreuiings: they haue imagined that Iesus Christe was as it were buried, they trotted too this Sainct and that Sainct, to haue them their patrons patrones before God: the Sacramentes are sette out too gaze vpon: they make chaffer and merchandize of mennes soules: they impute more too pelting trifles and too ceremonies than is meete, insomuche that they make Idols of them. Yee see then that these Neuters knowe all this wellynough, and that it had neede to bee remedied. But in what wise? O (saye they) the thing that these Lutherans haue desired hitherto, is in maner impossible: the worlde cannot abide such an alteration; and therefore there had neede too bee some meane. Yea mary, it is true that men haue corrupted Gods seruice by leaning to that which hath beene commaunded by men: and therefore it is requisite that for obedience sake men shoulde be bounde too doo so still, howbeit not too bee bounde in so great penaltie, nor so strayly as before. Againe, men haue trusted too much to the merites of workes: and therefore it must be sayde nowe, that we ought to begin with Gods grace, and that the same is the cheefe piller wherupon to rest. VVhereas Jesus Christ hath bene as good as nobodie, and men haue 20 not resorted to him for grace: Nowe hee must be declared to be our Aduocate, yea our cheefe Aduocate, but not our onely Aduocate. And all this while men maye mingle theyr owne merites with the grace of God, and mens commandements must alwayes bee obserued after some maner. Also men must not ceasse too haue the deceased Sainctes to be their Aduocates, so as they may be fellow commissioners with Jesus Christ. As for worshipping of Images, men will bee no more so sotted: but it may well be sayde, that Images are to stirre vp the de- 30 uotion of the ignorant and simple sort: and verely it is an ouer grosse follie too gad after them on pilgrimage, but yet in the meane while men may keepe still some deuotion to them for the weake and ignorant. As touching the Sacramehts, men may well shewe that they ought not to be had in so great estimation, but men ought to knowe that they ought not to make account of them, but for the remembrance of Christ: but yet men may conceyue of them they wote not what. As for the Masse, well, that shall no more be so much aduaunced, men shall haue no 40 more particular Masses for the deade, nor in honour of such a Sainct, nor for this thing and that: but there shall be a common Masse and men shal say still that it is a Sacrifice: not that Jesus Christ is not the true Preest that offereth himselfe to God his father: but the Masse shall represent the death and passion of Jesus Christ. Lo how these leazingsforgers haue surmized themselues too woorke politikely in making suche a medly, too the ende that the Gospell might not bee too rough too the worlde. On the contrary part it is sayde, that God will 50 not be ayded nor serued by our leasings. VVhat is to be done then? Let vs walke soundly and plainly, and let vs haue our mouthes shet, to the ende that when hee hath spoken, wee may holde our selues to that which proceedeth out of his mouth, without any replying therunto. Beholde (I say) howe we may bee allowed at his hande. But he will condemne vs with all our shifftes, if we think to purchase his fauour after oure owne fancies, and step neuer so little aside from the purenesse of his worde too missashion his judgements thought they bee neuer so 60 straunge to mans imagination. And now let vs come to that which is added. Doth not his Maiestie amaze you, and doth not his feare fall vpon you, (sayeth Job.) And afterwarde hee addeth, That their memoriall is lyke Assbes, and their bodyes are as a bodie of Clay. Hereby he meeneth, that when we lie in Gods behalfe, it is as much too say as we conceyue nothis Maiestie, and that we would make him like our selues, and pull him downe hither, as if we were hayle fellow well met with him. Beholde (I pray you) what driueth men. VVhy are they so shamelesse in falsifying Gods truth? Because they woulde measure it by their owne spanne. And what an oddes is there betwixt God and vs? Then let vs learne to conceyue what manner of one the Maiestie of God is. And therupon let vs be no more so foolishe, as to desire to incroch any thing either vpon his worde, or vpon his iudgements. Let vs dooke downe with our heades, and let God say what it pleaseth him. And when we haue hearde his worde, let him also doo what hee thinketh good, and let vs honour him in all his workes, specially when we enter into the consideration of our owne feeblenesse and frayltie, too say, what are wee? Thus ye see the two things that Job compareth togither heere. First he sayth, Doth not the Maiestie of God amaze you? VVhen he speaketh of Maiestie or dignitie, hee sheweth that men ought too be somewhat better aduised when they talke of God. But what? VVee step to it bluntly, and it seemeth to vs that God will suffer men to play with him, as he addeth immediately after. Therefore when wee speake of God, let vs learne to conceyue the infinite glorie that is in him. For when we haue once conceyued that: it cannot bee but we must be humbled to say, Alas, it is no speaking of God after the maner of men, nor making of any comparison with him. For what shoulde bee made of him? where woulde we set him? or in what degree woulde we place him? VVould wee haue him matched with hys creatures? Is not that as much as to make him a thing of nothing? And what shall become of his Maiestie when men haue abaced him after that sort? Then if wee had the wit to conceyue or but onely too taste what Gods infinite glorie is: it is certaine that we should learne too humble our selues vnderneath the same, and not be any more so ouerweening, as to make our selues beleeue this or that. Furthermore let vs bethinke ourselues. For the feeblenesse and wretchednesse that are in mans nature, give a farre greater glosse to Gods Maiestie, insomuch as hee must needes bee magnified the more, when wee knowe throughly what we our selues are. If wee had in vs the glorie of Angelles, wee should approche the nearer vntoo God: but yet should we be fayne to do as the Angels doo, according as it is sayde of them vnder the shape of the Cherubins, that they were fayne too hyde their faces, & were not able to looke vpon God throughly. True it is that the Scripture sayeth they see Gods face: But howe is that seeing of it? They are not able to abide it without casting downe their eyes, and as it were without couering their faces with their wings: that is to say [they are not able to doo it] without a bashfulness in reuerencing God, as their soueraigne, vntoo whom they are notable to attaine, and without acknowledging the same highnesse to humble themselues thereto. Lo how it is with the Angels of heauen. And now how fare we that are but rotteness? As touching our soules, they bee but as little sparkes, which shoulde bee quenched out by and by, and passe away into a shadowe, were it not that God preserueth them in their state, and that he did it of his owne meere goodnessse. Then haue we not in our selues the power to stande one minute of an hower, but God must be fayne to preserue vs, because there is nothing in vs but smoke and vanitie. VVhen we knowe this: it is certaine that all presumptuousnesse will be well beaten downe in vs, so as wee shall no more haue this foolishe desire of disputing after our owne manner, to paynt God with our colours, according as we see him disfigured and rent in peeces by men. VVee shall no more bee so presumptuous and malapart, when wee know what his glorie is , and haue well bethought vs of the weaknessse that is in oure selues : Thus yee see after what sort wee shall bee astonished with feare of him, as Job speakest heere. For it is impossible that this knowledge of God shoulde be ydle in men , and that it shoulde not cast them downe in such wise, as they durst no more be so bolde to babble of God. For when they haue spoken so at randon , it is a token that they never knewe him, nor felt what his Maiestie is. And why ? As I sayd afore, it is a liuely feeling when wee once vnderstande that it is God that hath created vs , and that wee are of him, and that whether we looke vpwarde or downwarde, all things are in his hand, and that there is in him a wonderfull righteousnesse , there is in him a wisedome that is hid from vs , there is in him an incomparable goodnessse. If wee knowe all these things , it cannot bee but we must needes bee astonyed , and abashed in our selues, so as we shall vtterly abace our selues before him, and honour his highnesse whiche is infinite . So then let vs learne to know better whar God is, to the ende wee may bee trayned to all modestie and sobernesse , and therewithal also let vs examin what we our selues are. VVhen we see our owne fleshe doth tickle vs to like well of our selues, so as wee bee inclyned too flatter our selues , and seeke to stande in our owne conceyte : let vs stirre vp our selues to say , whence commeth this vice ? It is bycause thou hast not yet knowne thy selfe. Consider who thou art, do but enter into thy selfe, and bee iudge of thyne owne state. There we shall finde that we haue a bottomlesse gulf of sinfulness in vs , and that we bee wrapped in such ignorance as is horrible to behokle , which is as it were so thicke a darkenesse , as it vtterly choketh and strangleth vs : and so farre off are wee from hauing our eyes open to knowe God : as we see not the thing that is before oure noze . Therefore when men shall haue bethought themselves in that wize , it is certaine that they shall be so touched with the Maiestie of God , that whereas it was seene that they were full of pride , and asit were harebraynde in speaking of God , so as there was no reverence nor modestie in them at all: then the feare of God shall fall vpon them. In stede of the great and strange rashenesse that is too bee seene in the worlde, men shall finde the reverent awe of God. And why ? For (as I sayde) when wee haue once conceyued what God is : wee shall stoope vnder him. Againe on the other side, when wee see what oure selues are , wee shall haue no more cause too stande in oure owne conceyte, nor to aduaunce our selues in any maner wise. Thus ye see what Job ment too betoken by these twoo sentences. And for the greater confirmation, hee sayth. Yea, but thinke you that hee will beare with you if ye dally with him as with a man ? He sheweth vs hercin , that men are beguiled in that they knowing not the Maiestie of God to honour the same, as they ought too do, doo dally wyth him. VVhereas we ought to honour him : we play with him as we be woont to play in dealing one with another; that hee that can deceyue, sticketh not to deceyue; and all is well ynough so it bee not perceyued. And like as we conuey our wyles among men: so also would we make our couin to passe for good payment to Godward: but that is tooo great an abuse. Therefore let vs not thinke too dally with such a craftesmayster, and too scape vnpunished. For althoughe God suffer men too runne ryote for a ryme : yet in the ende he will not misse too shewe them that hee is not the partie that they tooke him for, but another maner of man. Hee is not the partie that they tooke him to bee, bycause hee is not lyke the creatures which ought to be obedient to the common rule in such wyse as they may bee brought too an account and measured by the lawe that hee hath giuen vnto vs: vnto vs I say, for he hath squared out his law to be our meet-yard, and not to be subiect to it himselfe. Heerewithall also men must vnderstand, that he is another maner of one than they haue imagined him to bee : for they haue not had an eye to the infinit glorie that is in him. Therfore let vs beware of this dallyng. For God sheweth vs that whensoeuer we treateyther of his worde or of his workes , wee must go to it in good earnest. And nowe Job sayth, Holde your tonges afore mee: I will speake: and let beset mee what can. Heere job sheweth that he is not like these babblers , that skirmishe with Gods woerde, and with his iudgements, how beeit aloofe from hand-strokes : According as ye shall see some haue their tungs well filed too talke : but that shall be but onely to debate of tryfing questions farre off from practize. But Job sheweth himselfe to be none of those. And why so ? You see (sayeth hee) bowe I carie my flesh betweene my teeth, as if I were torned all to peeces, and that I were sayne too take vp my fleshe and my skinne in my teeth too carie them. I haue my soule (sayeth hee) betweene my handes. Sith you see mee in suche plignt, thinke not you that I prate like a Popiniay in a Cage. No, no : I am forced too speake from the hart . For God examineth mee by holding mee as it were vpon the racke. Then muste I needes vtter my affections plainly. For as for me I speake as one that hathe experience , and God tryeth mee after such a maner , as it is well seene I haue no leysure to colour matters , and too speake one thing for another. Therefore let mee speake. For yee shall not beare my burthen , it is God with whome I haue too deale, and it is hee also too whome I haue to answere : and so as for your discourses I leauue them there for so muche as they bee woorth , that is too say, for vtterly vnprofitable and tryfing toyes. But as for mee , I will speake according too that whiche God sheweth mee, and which hee sheweth mee by effect . Thus yee see breefely what Job ment too say. But let vs marke heere, the maner of speeche which hee vseth, namely, that he boldeth his fleske betweene his teeth too carie it. For hee was as it were rent all too peeces , as if a mannes skinne were torned off, and hee wist not what too do but too take it vp betwixt his teeth. Yee see then that Job telleteth in what plignt hee was: and thereby hee sheweth himselfe too haue beeene in so pitifull case, as hee was no more like a lyving creature. VVhereas hee sayeth that bee boldeth his soule (or his life) betweene his handes: it is as much to say, as the same was in vtter hazarde, and as it were abandoned and left vp too the spoyle. And heerein a man maye see the dolthnesse of the Papistes , in that they haue surmyzed that too bolde ones soule betweene his handes, signfyed too haue power too do good or euill. Let men deuise what they list (saye they) I haue my soule in myne owne handes, that is too say , I can doo what I thinke good; I haue a free state. To bee short, they ment too builde theyr free will vpon this sentence, I haue my soule betweene my handes. But wee knowe that when God threatneth men , if hee tell them hee will leauue them in their owne hande : it is the sorest scourge that can light vpon them. Beholde , God thundereth at vs when hee sayeth hee will leauue vs vp in our owne hand. And why ? For if God holde vs not backe , there is no remedie but wee muste needes runne headlong into destruction. Therefore wee see howe the Papistes were besotted, when they wrested the Scripture after that fashion. But the meening is verie cleere in this streyne where Job sayeth that hee beareth his soule in his hande , as if it were were alreadie breathed out. Our soule is clozed within our bodie as in a Chest, and that is the meane to keepe it: but if wee had it in our hande, it were all one as if it were left at randon. Job then declareth that hee is rather deade than alyue, and that God handleth him in such wise, as he is like a wretched rotten carkasse, so as there is no more liueliness in him, but is become lothly too all men. Lo (sayeth hee) I knowe well I am no more taken too bee of the companie of men, but am esteemed as a deade bodie. Hereby (as I sayde) Job sheweth that 10 he is not a speculatiue teacher, but a true practicioner of the things that he speaketh, that is to say, of Gods iudgements. And vndoubtedly, without this experience, wee can neyther knowe God, nor his hande, nor his power, nor his iustice, nor any thing else. True it is that all men shall not bee tryed as Job was, that is too wit, with such rigour: but yet must we come to the touchstone, which will discouer vs to haue nothing but vaine speculations. If God doo not sometymes summon vs, so as wee maye feele what our sinnes, and what endlesse death is, and vnderstante that we be destitute of saluation, and shet out from all hope as in respect of our selues: wee shall never know to treat of God aright, I say we shall never know one iote of him with hartie affection. For these trysing pratlars may well haue store of fayre shewes, and they may make their bragges before men: but there shall bee no steadiness in them. Are we then desirous to speake of God earnestly and as becommeth vs? It is requisite for vs too haue beeene exercysed aforehande and that we haue come too the tryall of it: that is too say, that God 30 haue nipped vs, to the ende we may know both him and our selues. Thus ye see in effect what Job hath ment in this streyne. And for the rest, let vs marke well, that when oure Lorde putteth vs to such trials, wee had neede of a greater strength than is in man, to the ende we may stand. Vpon the hearing of some of Jobs wordes, wee woulde condemne him, and good cause why. But by the waye we must consider well the extremitie that hee was in, too the intent we may not thinke it straunge though hee had some temptations that ouermaystred him. Albeit that 40 in the ende he withstoode all combats: yet had he some feeblenesse in the meane while, so as hee was in a maner quite quayled. And a thoughte his fayth fell not quite downe: yet was it shaken, and hee had some defaultes which hee well felt. Then beloued it him too ouergo such temptations, notwithstanding that they were right greeuous too beare: and therefore let vs not thinke straunge of his speech. For what man at this day can say as Job sayd, namely that hee is as a poore desperate soule, that hee holdeth his fleshe and his skinne betweene his teeth, and that hee hath his soule in his hand. True it is that Dauid speaketh after the same maner in the hundred and nyneteenth Psalme: but yet in comparison, Job was euuen at the pittes bottome as wee see, if wee looke no further but vpon that which hee indured in his bodie, seeing hee was so broken out as a man woulde disdeyne to looke vpon him, yea and that the verye sight of him was yngough too make a mans heare stande vp vpon his heade, and that hee was become so hideous a thing, as woulde shame a man, yea and loth his hart to heholde him. Nowe then if Job had indured no more but these paynes in his bodie, had it not bene verie much? But the cheefe poynt (as I sayde) was the feeling of Gods judgement, and how God persecuted him, insomuch that he found no fauour at his hand, but it seemed to him that God ment to adde continually plague vpon plague, till he had sent him to the bottome of death and damnation. Seing then that Job was layd at so roughlye:

let vs not thinke it straunge that there were some temptations out of square in him. For it was meete that God shoulde in that poynt vster the perfectnesse of his owne strength in the infirmitie of man. But let vs on our side applie this too our instrucion. And first of all, if God sende vs so great and excessiue afflictions as wee bee in maner swallowed vp: let not that make vs too despayre (as shall bee declared yet more at full heereafter) but let vs resist it, knowing that God doth still reserue his mercie readie for vs in time conuenient. And if wee be payned more than we woulde wishe: Let vs assure our selues that God will let the maladie rypen too heale it the better. If a man haue a plague sore: well, it is seene that the sore stinketh, and that it is yngough too impaire the health of the whole man: and yet for all that, the Phisition or Surgeon will not launce the Byle at the first dash. And why? For hee shoulde but make it more firie, because the matter is not yet rype. But hee will lay some drawing playster too it first, too make the sore too rypen: and then afterwarde hee will be bolde to launce it. Euen so dealeth God with vs. For hee feeth that wee haue verye noysome plague sores: and what then? Let vs not thinke it straunge that hee healeth them not at the first dashe. For the disease must first bee made ripe, and then afterwarde God maye put too his hande, and finde conuenient remedies. Then let vs assure our selues that God knoweth what is good and conuenient for vs: and therefore let vs tatie his leysure with pacience. But if wee bee too egre in making haste, when wee endure anye afflictions: what excuse can there bee for vs? Specially siþe wee see that Job was come too the gulfe of hell, and yet neuerthelesse did humble himselfe before God: and that although he endured so greeuous torments, and was in so excessiue sorrowe: yet hee restrained himselfe. I say, if a man that was so punished, did still bridle himselfe: I praye you shall wee not bee tooto vnxcusable, if wee chafe and frette our selues in our aduersities? Then let vs consider these things, and let every of vs haue an eye too himselfe. VVhen we see that such a seruant of God hath bene tryed after that sort to the vttermost: we must be so much the more mylde in our aduersities, and not stomacke at God as we haue beeene woont too doo. Thus yee see what wee haue to beare in mynde concerning this streyne. And Job sayeth, That although God kill him, yet will hee trust in him: neuerthelesse bee will reprooue his owne wayes before Gods presence. True it is that the Hebrew woorde Lo, (which I translate In him) maye bee taken for Not, and so dooth it signifie properly. Notwithstanding, it is sometime tystaken Relatiuely, as they tearme it, and one letter is chaunged into another: which is a common vse among the Hebrewes. Neuerthelesse, the meening is all one in eyther of both the wayes. For if yee reade Not: it muste bee in waye of demaunding a question, as thus: Thoughe hee kill mee, shall I not trust in him? Yes, I will still trust in him. Or else [if ye read] though hee kill mee. VVhen hee shall haue killed mee, yet will I put my trusste in him: wee see that the substance of the matter is not chaunged. To bee short, Jobs meening is, that although hee bee ouerthrowne, and as it were enraged by his passions: yet is it not as much to say as that he hath forgone all pacience & intendeth to stand in contention with God, or to alienate himselfe quite and cleane frō him, or that he is minded to stomacke the matter in such wise, as he wil haue no more to do with him. VVherefore? He protesteth that hec hopeth, whatsoever come of it. Although he kil me (saith he) & cōfōid me: yet wil I not cease to trust in him: neuerthelesse I wil reprooue my my wayes in his sight. Thus am I fayne too intermeddle this vehemensie which you see, and which you perceiue, I say I am fayne to intermeddle it with the hope whiche I haue in God. And hecre we haue a fayre and excellent mirrour of Gods working. For hee suffreth the faythfull to fall, to the ende that their fayth may bee the better tryed. These things seeme vnable to be matched togither in themselues : but God himselfe maketh them to agree. At the first blush a man would say, lo heere is fire and water: but at the last God bringeth al things to such an end, 10 as there is no disagrement at all. There haue beene some which in their disputationes, would fayne always conclude after the maner of the Philosophers, that al things are so put in order, as there is no disagreement, but a certaine league or covenant throughout all things: but such men never knew what it is to haue beene sifted by God, and to haue passed through his iudgements. And why? For(as I haue said) God handleth vs after such a straunge fashion, that all things are confounded in that case. And in good sooth there are things in vs alio which can never be made to agree. For sometimes we be desirous to liue, and sometymes wee woulde fayne die: and these are things contrarie. Yea, but the respects are diuers: for (as sayth Saint Paule) naturally we couet to bee, and consequently we shunne death. Death is horrible to vs, because it is contrarie to our nature. That is the thing that dismayeth a man. But on the other part wee see that wee bee hilde heere as in a prison: so long as this bodie of ours compassest vs about, wee are in bondage to sinne, and therefore we be inforced too sigh and bee sorie, and therewithall too long for the euerlastynesse, which is promised vs after the tymie that God shall haue taken vs out of this worlde (for when wee drawe towarde death, then come wee to it, and death is the verie gate of lyfe) assuring our selues that forasmuche as Iesus Christ hath passed the same away, we neede not to bee afayde that death shall haue any power ouer vs: for it is a rebated or blunted sworde whereof the poynct is broken of, so as it cannot hurt vs: and although it draw some bloud of vs, yet notwithstanding, the same shall be but to rid vs from all diseases. It shoulde seeme that these affections are contrarie, and so they bee in deede. But God agreeith them verye well, in such wise that the things which wee haue conceyued by our naturall wit are put vnder foote, because fayth getteth the vpper hande. As much is to be sayde of that which Job handleth in this streyne. For yee see that the faythfull are fully resolued vpon this poynct, namely, to put their trust in God, and to hope for saluation at his hande, howsoever the worlde go. But thys thing they cannot doo, except they hilde him for theyr father, and resorted to him for refuge: [as if they should say,] beholde God hath bene my father to the vttermost, and therewithall hath giuen me leauue to come vnto him. Therefore must I call vpon him, put my selfe intoo his keeping, and not doubt but he will always be mercifull vntoo mee. Yea but hee scourgeth mee, and when I am in minde too come neere him, I shall not perceyue that hee hath hearde mee. Verely thys conceyete is harde and combersome too beare: but yet muste I tary the leysure of my G O D with pacience, and doo him the honour to rest my selfe vpon his promises. Lo howe the faythfull are fully resolued in that poynct. But on the other side, it behoueth them to knowe themselues: and it is vnpossible that they shoulde knowe their owne infirmities, but that they must also make their moan, and say, How now? And these are things contrarie. For if wee ought to tarie Gods leysure with silence: is it meete for vs too make a disputing, and to enter intoo complaunts?

For so to do is contrarie to fayth. True it is that it is contrarie at the first sight: but God setteth them at one well ymough. For after wee haue beeene tossed and turmoyled with some hartburning: beholde, fayth draweth vs in such wise vnto stilnesse, as finally we conclude thus: Out of all doubt, the goodnessesse of God will never forsake vs howsoever the worlde go, but we shall awayes find him fauourable, although he shew not himselfe so at the first brunt. Thus ye see what wee haue to gather in effect vpon this streyne. Now we see wherat Job ained when he sayde, although God kill mee, yet will I put my trust in him: and yet neverthelesse I will reason with God, and reproc mine owne wayes. For the Hebrew worde that he vseth, signifieth to Reproue, and also to Debate, or Pleade. So then his saying and protestation is, that hee is not the man whome the parties that had spoken, tooke him too bee. For they tooke him too bee such a one as would haue played double or quit, that he woulde haue trusted no more in God, and that hee had spoken those things as it were in dispise [of God.] But he telleteth them he is none such, for hee holdeth him still too his trust in God. Now then seeing that he trusteth in God, he must of necessite submit himselfe to him. For to trust in God is not to shrinke away from him, and to holde ones selfe aloofe: But contrariwise to trust in God, is to come vnto him, and when hee seemeth farre off from vs, euē then to streyne our selues to get to him: and therewithall moreouer to doo as the holy Scripture telleth vs: namely too shrowde our selues vnder the shadow of his wings, Psal.17.b.8
lappe, as a childe is receyued of his owne father. Yee see then what is conteyned heere. For when Job sayth, hee will trust in God continually: he sheweth that hee is not as one of these straglers that make outleapes, because they be desirous too play the horses that are broken looce. It is cleane contrarie (sayth he:) for I desire nothing but to be neere him, and that he shoulde haue his hande vpon mee. Hereby then is hee cleared of the false slander that hee was charged withall. But yet neverthelesse he sayth afterwarde, Beholde, yet must I reason with God concerning my wayes: that is too say, the hope that I haue is not such as is vtterly vningled with complaints, so as I should not lift vp my selfe nor murmur agaynst God at all. True it is that this proceedeth of infirmite, yea euē of sinfull infirmite woorthis to bee condemned. But howsoever the case stande, God letteth him not go altogether. For as I sayde afore, fayth ouerruleth oure affections. When we trust in God, and call vpon him, it is not as much to say as we shoulde never haue any bickerings in our selues. But fayth must get the vpper hand, the peace whereof Sainct Paule speaketh must winne the victorie: that is to say, it must get the maystrie in oure hertes. In that he speaketh of the peace of God, and attributeth victorie vnto it, he sheweth well that wee shall haue turmoylings in vs, and that we shall be tossed to and fro. But what remedie is there for it? This peace of God must be of such power as it may get the maystrie in the ende, and all oure passions bee brought in awe of it. Then let vs marke well, that in protesting that hee will trust in God, Job doth also confess his owne infirmite, and shewe that hee is not so perfect but that there is alwayes some fault to be found in him. But yet neverthelesse hee fleeth always to God for refuge. Sith the case standeth so, let vs also on our side vnderstande that when we bee shaken with the prouocations of our fleshe, and our owne affections do somewhat carie vs away: wee must not therefore dispaire, nor imagine that God will helpe vs no more. But let vs plucke vp our hertes too trust

trust in him, and although wee doo it not so perfectly as were requisite, yet let vs be sure that hee will make vs to feele that our wayting vpon him is not in vaine. For he will strengthen vs continually more and more in fayth, and make the same to get the vpper hand of all the temptations of the worlde and of this present life.

But let vs fall downe in the presence of our good God with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him too make vs to feele them in such wise, as being ashamed of them in our selues, we may labour to haue our recourse to

to him and to his mercy: And that it may please him not onely to forgiue vs ouer faults that are past, but also to rid vs out of the miseries wherein we be: that being receyued into his protection and custodie, wee may never slip from him, and that howsoeuer Satan practize agaynst vs, hee neuerthelesse will bee alwayes so at hande, as wee may euer haue wherewith too beate backe the assaults that our mortall enemie maketh vpon vs. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely too vs, but also to all people and nations of the earth, &c.

The. Iij. Sermon, which is the thirde vpon the thirtenth Chapter.

16. Hevwill yet still be my helpe: and the hypocrite shall not come before his face.
17. Herken to my vvordes, and marke vwhat I shall tell you.
18. VVhen I shall haue set dovyne my cace, I knowe I shall be iustifyed.
19. VVho vvill pleade agaynst mee? For if I holde my peace I am vndone.
20. Onely graunt me these tvvo things, and then vvill I not hyde my selfe from thy sight.
21. VVithdravv thy hande from mee, and let not thy vvrath make me afayde.
22. And [then] if thou speake, I vvil ansvvere: or else I vvill speake, and ansvvere thou.

E haue scene alreadie the protestation that Job made: that is to wit, that hee woulde still trust in God, euen when he were ouerwhelmed by his hande. And (as I sayd) that was to shewe howe hee had a deeper conceypte and feeling of Gods judgement than men commonly haue: according whereto hee knewe that there was a double righteousnesse in God. Nowe he confirmeth and ratifieth the same matter a newe, saying that God will bee his belpce: yea: For the hypocrite (sayth hee) shall not come before him. As if hee should say, I knowe that I present my selfe before God, and therefore I am sure that after he hath handled me so hardly, and afflicted me with extremitie, he will still shew himselfe to be my Sauiour. VVherevpon then doth Job ground the hope of his welfare? Vpon that hee dareth approch vnto God. True it is that the hypocrites do also approche vnto God, according as it is sayde in the eight and fiftith of Esay, This people seeketh me day by day, and they preache to me as if they would know my wayes. VVee see that these hypocrites which haue no affection nor zeale, do neuerthelesse make many windlasses, and martyr themselues, and it shoulde seeme there were nothing but fire and flame in them to get neare vnto God. Yea, but they do nothing else but turne the potte aboue. It is not for that they bee desirous too come the streight way vnto God, but they woulde fayne be quit with him, without comming to him at all. As howe? VVee see how the hypocrites are very full of deuotion, and are buzie about this and that. And what pretend they therby. VVhen the Papists heare three Masses in a day, when they make muche bubblebabble, when they take holy water, and when they trot from altar to altar: it is certainte that they pretende to serue God: but their pretending of it is in such sort, as God beholdeth them not nere at hande, but they withdraw themselues and stray farre away from him. And that is the cause why the Prophete Ieremie 60 likeneth all these braueries, and all these maskings, and all these ceremonies that are among men, vnto a theeuers caue. For like as a theefe retyreth into couert, too the ende he might not be seene, and his fault come to light: euen so doo hypocrites make sundrie colours and lurkingholes in this and that and in every thing which they call the seruice of God. But what for that? It is too the ende that God shoulde demaund nothing of them, but let them alone as they bee, that they may couer themselues vnder that mummerie. Thus then you see that the hypocrites make countenance of approching vnto God, howbeit that the same bee not in truth. Therefore althoough they bee puffed vp with fonde misweening, yet are they neuer the neerer vnto God for all that: and althoough they perke vp with their nebbes, and be bolde to make many protestations, insomuch as it seemeth that they would euen runne vpon God [for hast], yet come they neuer the neerer vnto him: but [their doing so, is] because they are besotted, and thinke not vpon God: for if they thought vpon God, they woulde not be so bolde. VVe see then that when the hypocrites haue playde the fooles in their owne fonde trifles, and dallied with God as it were with a little babie: they thinke themselues as righteous as the Angels, and that there is no fault to bee founde with them: and that if God demaund any thing more at their hande, he doth but presse the to much, and that they are so farre from being indettend vnto him, that (to their seeming) he is beholden vnto them. Ye see then howe the hypocrites flash our fire and flame in such sort, as it shoulde seeme they woulde runne vpon God: But why is that? Because they thinke not of him, nor haue any liuely feeling of him in their consciences. To bee short, a man shall neuer come too God with a good hart, and with a pure and free affection, except hee honour him, and in honouring feare him, and in fearing trust in him. All these things (say I) must bee in a mans hart before he can euer come vnto God, and haue any acquaintance with him. The first poynt (I say) is to honor God: that is to say, to knowe what his Maiestie is, and that it becommeth vs to yeeld our selues wholly therunto, too do him homage. Vntill wee haue conceyued this Maiestie of God which is aboue vs, we shall neuer be desirous to come vnto him. Feare must also bee matched therewithall: that is to say, after we haue graunted him all soueraigntie and dominion, we must be desirous too serue him, and to walke as he commaundeth. But this feare alone is not ynoch. Therefore we must learne to knowe Gods goodnesse, that wee may put our trust in it, which also is the meane to come vnto him. And for this cause Job sayth, that the hypocrites will neuer appeare in Gods presence: that is too say, they will shunne God as much as is possible: according also as we see that when they be spoken too of death, they torment themselves, and yet notwithstanding it is the way to come vnto God, howbeit be it tha: they vterly eschewe it. Job then, after he hath sayde that the hypocrites will not come neere God, protesteth that he himselfe is none of that number. For proose whereof, he comneth to God. Yea, and he seeth there is no reasoning with mortall men, and therefore he resteth no more vpō them, but had leuer that god shold herken to him, and that he might haue leaue to speake as if he were before his face. Hereby he presupposeth that God will be his helpe still. But by the way, the woordes that he vseth are somewhat straunge, as we haue seene the like heretofore, and shall see the like hereafter. Howbeit, to the end we may haue the true exposition, let vs folow the order that is hild heere. Hearken ye to me (sayth he) and receyue my wordes: for when I shall bauie set downe my case, I knowe I shall be iustified. Here Job presupposeth that he hath so good reasons to defende himselfe withall, that he shall be quite before God if he may haue leaue to pleade his case. And he pleadeth not before men, (for he had to deale with deafe eares) but he would haue those to whom he speaketh to holde their peace, and too heare what hee shall debate, and too wayte for the ende and issue of that which shall be vttered of God. VVe see then what the summe of his intent is: that is to wit, he ment to say that he should be quit, if he might haue leaue and libertie too debate his case. And whervpon dependeth this? VVe must call to minde, what hath beeene declared afore: that is to witte, the two sortes of Gods rightuousnesse: That God will sometymes iudge men by his law: for there he hath giuen vs a rightuousnesse whiche is throughlye knowne and apparent vnto vs. God doth as it were enter intoo couenant with vs, when hee giueth vs this rule: marke howe I will haue men to liue, he that doth not all these things, cursed be hee: and whosoeuer perfourmeth my law, shall liue. Seing then that our Lord hath so certifid vs of his will, hee hath shewed vs a rightuousnesse that is altogether apparent. But if hee shoulde iudge vs thereafter, we should be fayne to enter into an account, and to examine our life by euery commaundement, and too thinke with oure selues, Go too, wherein hast thou done amisse? Beholde, thy God requyreh such a thing: hast thou performed it? No: then thou seest wherein thou art faultie. Marke (I say) how we shall be condemned by the law. Likewise on the contrarie part, if we know our selues to haue fulfilled Gods law, (which is vnpossible, but I admit it were so) I say when a man tryeth hys workes throughly, if he finde that his life hath bene conformable to Gods law, then is hee iustified after the rightuousnesse that is apparent and knowne too vs. But yet for all this, Job hath protested heretofore, that there is a higher rightuousnesse in God whereby hee coulde condemne even the Angelles. VVherefore is that? For althouge God allowe a mans life when it is throughlye framed according to his lawe: yet is not hee bound thereby, nay ther is it as much to say as wee owe him no more seruice, and that hee shoulde holde vs acquitte. For if we compare the perfection that is in God, with the perfection that is in the creature: what will come of it? The Sunne may be darkned though it give light to the whole worlde: that is to say, there is nothing that can suffize or satisfie that matter. So then let vs marke well that whensoeuer God listeth to iudge vs by his lawe, although wee know no euill nor vice in our selues, yet shoulde we not be rightuous for all that. But let vs come to that which Job sayth. VVhensoeuer I shall haue leaue too pleade my case (sayth he) and to lay foorth my matter in order, and to alledge all my reasons: I know that I shall then be iustified. That is to say, If God would judge mee but according to his law, & that I might answere to shew what my life hath bene: then should I be iustified. But I haue tolde you that this is impossible. For there needs none other proove to shew that al men are cursed and damned, then that God sayth, that whosoeuer performeth not all these things shall be accursed. VVhen S. Paule goeth about to proue that no man shal be iustified by the deedes Gal. 3. b. 10. of the law, but that we be all giltie before God, so as al Deut. 27. d. mouthes must be stopped: hee alledgeth the same sentence. Yea? But doth it follow therevpon that we are all damned? VVe must looke whether we doo Gods lawe or no. And S. Paule presupposeth that we do it not: that is to say, that there is none which dischargeth his dutie, but all of vs are farre off from it. So then what meeneth Job to say that he shall bee iustified if God would admit him to stand to his defence, as if God had not wherof to accuse him, or that he were not faultie in any thing? And we knowe that inasmuch as hee was a mortall man, hee was clothed with many infirmities and sinnes. How then doth he meene that hee coulde be quit? First of all wee must call to minde what hath bene touched heretofore: namely that Job looketh not simply at his owne deseruing, nor what he is of himselfe: but at Gods intent in scourging him. As how? VVe haue seene that God findeth sinnes in vs that are worthie to be punished: Go too, he beareth with them, and forgiueth them, and yet in the meane while he will afflict vs for some other cause, as befell vnto Job. True it is, that he was a wretched sinner, and that God according to his law might haue punished him extremely: but yet notwithstanding hee had no such respect. VVe haue seene afore, that God punished not Jobs sinnes as of set purpose to punish him, as if hee should say, I will punish this man because he hath deserued it, or because he hath liued naughtily. No: God had no such respect with him. VVhat then? He intended that Job should be a mirrour to all men, to the ende that when we beholde him, we may haue occasion to humble our selues, (knowing that Gods hande is too heauie for vs to beare, and also considering our owne frayltie, and that according to his secret and incomprehensible justice, he might handle vs a hundred thousand times roughlier than he doth,) and therewithall also haue an eye too the patientnesse of the man. God then ment to vse Job to all these matters: and so wee see that his intent was not too punish him. And that is the cause why Job sayth, that if hee had leaue too speake and too open his case at large, he shoulde bee founde rightuous, according too Gods intent: that is to say, as in respect of the present affliction that he endured, God shoulde not finde any iniquitie in him in that behalfe, but contrariwise allowe him for one of his seruants. But Job in so saying reiechteth not the forgiuenesse of sinnes wherevpon all our rightuousnesse is founded. VVe say that men are made rightuous by onely fayth, because we bee all damned in our woorkes (this is true) and bring all damnation and cursednesse before God, and therefore must all of vs abide shame and confuzion. For this cause it standeth vs in hande too borrow a rightuousnesse that God may like and allowe: which thing is done when our Lord Iesus Christ clotheh vs with his owne rightuousnesse, and the same is allowed vs before God. Ye see then that we become rightuous by fayth, because we be clensed and scoured from our sinnes in the death and passion of oure Lorde Iesus Christ. And in the meane time God guideth vs by his holy spirit, and in guiding vs accepteth the seruice that we yeld him, that is to say, he accepteth the goodnessse which hee hath put into vs. For there is not so much as one drop of goodnessse in vs, which is not giuen vs from aboue. Therfore like as God giueth vs his gracious giftes, so doth he also also take them in good worth. But howe can our works please God? It is in that he bath not an eye too the imperfections that are in them. For there is not any thing i vs but it hath some blemish before God: but hee regardeth not that: hee beareth with vs of a fatherly loue. Ye see then that we may be righteous before God: yea verely insomuch as it pleaseth him to like well of vs, and not that he is bounde too it, or that we haue deserued it. After that maner Job sayth that hee shall bee found righteous: whereby he excludeth not Gods grace and mercie, which hee extendeth to those that are his, in bearing with them and in not handling them rigorously, and calling their life to account poynt by poynt. And herewithall let vs marke also, that Job speaketh excessiuely as hee hath done afore. VVhat is the reason? Hee was as a man that raueth, and as one that is astraight that hee woteth not where he is. For this cause he disputeth not but of Gods secret rightfullnesse which was ouerrough to him, and therfore he sayth, it is no maruell though he be so troubled, and as it were swallowed vp of dispayre, seeing that God persecuteth him after that fashion without shewing him why, Job then is as it were astonied in such sort as hee hath not an eye to that which he knoweth to bee true, namely that God can well make him too feele his sinnes when hee examineth him but onely according to his lawe: but hee considereth that inasmuch as God pardoneth his seruantes that walke in soundnesse, it is a straunge thing that he hauing done so, yea euen wyth all his hart, is neverthelesse handled so roughly, and feeleth the heauiness of his hande. For the better vnderstanding heereo, let vs looke vpon that which he addeth. He desireth God too graunt him twoo articles: and then (sayth he) I will not hide my selfe from thy sight: that is to say, I will be readie to receyue what punishment thou listest, I will no more complaine that thy hande is too rough to me, I will no more plead with thee when thou presfest me, conditionally that I haue those twoo poynts. The one whereof (sayeth he) is that thy hande should bee withdrawne from me, and that thy terriblenesse shoulde no more dismay mee. By this hee meeneth too faye, 40 that hee prayeth him not too execute his iudgement before he haue indited him. Job thinketh it very straunge that God shoulde scourge him so sore without making him priuie wherfore. It is all one therfore as if a prisoner should desire to be set at libertie, when hee knoweth himselfe to be quite and cleane shaken off, and that men wil not give him any hearing at all. VVhat shal he do? If a prisoner be tormented without any examination, without any question put vnto him, or without any proofe or information layde agaynst him, if yet neverthelesse hee 50 be thrust into a deepe dungeon, if he be set in the stocks, (as Job complaigneth heere) specially if he bee streyned vpon the racke, so as it shouide seeme he were like to be dismembrēd: I say if a poore prisoner were handled after such a fashion: what woulde hee say? Job then complaigneth that God doth nowe execute such a rigour agaynst him, and yet no action commenced agaynst him. Thus ye see the first poynt whereof he speaketh. The seconde is, That God shoulde call him. That is to say, that his case might bee layde forth orderly, as when rigour ceaseth, and men deale by order of lawe. VWell (sayeth hee) let the action be commenced, and I wil no more hide me from thy sight: that is to say, I will not refuse any thing whatsoeuer it be: dispose of me as it shall please thee, and I will be pacient, and obey thee in all poynts. VVee see then that Job is excessiue as a man oute of his wittes. VVhy so? For had hee looked well to himselfe, it is certayne that he shoulde haue known that he had not aught for which hee might haue shewed himselfe before God, but that hee must haue beene faine too haue come with his head hanging downe: like as when men come to that poynt, that they must be faine to acknowledge their own wretchednesse, & stand cōfounded before him. Job therefore woulde not haue vsed such maner of talke, if he had not beene forepossessed with a maruelous great amazednesse, so as he had no moderate discretion in him to humble himselfe before God as became him. But by the way we haue a good & very profitable lesson to gather of this present text. And first of all let vs remember that which I haue sayd alreadie: that is to wit, that if God list to handle vs after a more rigorous maner than that whiche is conteyned in his lawe: yet hath he authoritie to do it as iudge of the worlde. VVee may well replie too the contrary: but wee shall gayne nothing by our murmurings. Therefore haue not wee good cause to humble oure selues? Furthermore, let vs consider a little in what case wee shoulde bee if God should handle vs but according to the measure that is conuenient for vs. For I haue told you that God hath giuen vs his lawe, not respecting that whiche wee owe vnto him, nor also too vitter the perfectnesse of his owne righteousnesse: but as having a regarde to that which is meete and conuenient for creatures. But in steede of approuing oure life before him, when it commeth to be iudged by his law: wee bee faine to stande ashamed of it, yea and that not in one sort, but in a thousande. For our sinnes and misdoings are a bottomlesse gulfe. Seeing then that the case is so, there remayneth nothing for vs but to humble our selues and to sigh, and too bee ashamed of oure shamefulness. For (as I sayde) we may well checke with God: but that will always bee a cause too prouoke Gods wrath more and more agaynst vs. Furthermore let vs beare in minde, that Gods visitations are verie hard to bee borne, seeing that Job was so caried away as he wist not what hee did, and was as a man out of his wittes. VVhy so? Because God pressed him with his terriblenesse. And heereby wee bee warned, that if God punishe vs rigorously, wee muste needs bee ouerwhelmed with dispayre, and bee vterly confounded. It is true, that so long as wee bee a good way off from blowes, we can be stoutynough: but when God commeth to iustle with vs in good earnest, we feele what his force is, which wee had set light by before: and whatsoeuer wee imagined too bee in our selues, shall bee lesse than naught, and nothing else but smoke and fonde surmizing. It is requisite to knowe this. For wee knowe there is nothing more agaynst our saluation, than the said presumptuousnesse wherewith wee bee besotted. This maketh vs rash and to runne at random: and we not onely are not contented too passe our boundes, but also wee woulde fayne stye aboue the clowdes. Ye see then what is the cause of our decay: namely this foolish overweening, wherewith we be dazed. And moreouer the same dooth so hinder vs from calling vpon God, that where as wee ought too resorte too him for refuge, and too broode our selues vnder his wings: euery of vs runneth ryot, and to our own seeming we can moue mountaynes and worke wonders. Thus ye see wherin the cheefe point 60 of our saluation halteth: that is to wit, that whereas wee ought to flee vnto God by prayer and supplication, specially when we be pinched with any aduersitie and at the last cast: wee go too seeke worldely helpes, or else wee yeelde too oure owne fonde fancies which haue deceyued vs. VVould wee then bee exempted from such illuzions and vaine thoughts? Let vs looke vpon our selues in the example of Job, & consider that seeing he hath abiddē these spiritual battels (that is to say, seeing god pressed him in such wise that he felt him as his enemie ) if God doo nowe adayes shewe himselfe our iudge, we cannot shun his hande nor escape his rigour. True it is that if we haue any such concye, we shal be so dismynde , as wee shall see nothing but the gulfe of hell gaping vpon vs, and it shall bee impossible for vs to haue eyther reason, modeſtie, stay, or measure at all. And well ought wee to conſider this, that we may quake at it. Yea, but our quaking must be ſuch as the teſtoure of it may not continue in vs, but that we may come to the remedie of it : that is to wit, we muſt pray vnto God to graunt vs the grace too finde refiſt in him in the middes of our troubles, and that wee may bee ſure of it, notwithstanding that for a time hee make countenance to ſet himſelfe agaynst vs, to deſtroy vs vtterly. Lo howe wee haue neede to pray vnto God that he will not handle vs rigorously. And moreouer whē he ſayth , Gnunt mee theſe two tbiings, and I will come with my head bolt vpright, and I will not bydemy ſelfe before thee: Let vs marke that it is not for vs to ſummon God in deſiring him that he ſhould not puniſh vs before hee haue made vs too underſtande our ſinnes. And why ? For it were to great an intruding vpon his iurisdiction. Shall the wretched offender appoyn特 his iudge what too doo ? True it is that an earthly iudge may be ouerrigorous (for a man may be pressed too cruelly : ) but it cannot bee ſo betweene God and vs : for whenſoever he puniſheth vs he beareth with vs, and as for excesse , there is neuer none in him . It is true that wee perceyue not why hee doth things, neyther do we ſee the ballance and weights which hee vſeth . Nay rather it ſeemeth too vs, that hee turneth all things topsie turuie : and yet for all that, it behoueth vs to honour him in his ſecret iudgements. And let vs affirme our ſelues that the things which wee thiſke to be full ſtrange, are neuertheleſſe ruled in all vprightneſſe and equitie , in almoſt as they proceede from him, and that they ſhall be mañifested to vs in the ende. Then neede wee not to haue this pryme of deſiring too raunge God vnto our fancie , and to require him to do ſo or ſo. But let vs content our ſelues with his good will, praying him to giue vs pacience and full obedience, till hee haue made vs perceyue that all his doings are good. Verely we may well deſire God to indite vs before hee puniſheth vs. VVherefore ? To the intent we may bee our owne iudges. For what ſhall it awayle vs thoughe God puniſh vs euen with extremitie : if in the meane ſeason we continue ſtubburne in our naughtineſſe, or if we be ſo ſlouthfull and dull headed as not to thiſke vpon them at all ? It woulde alwayes be too our greater damnation. God ſhould beate vpon vs , and we woulde not howe downe our backes. Our hart woulde bee neuer awhit the more ſupple , inſomuche that it woulde become like a Styth which beateth backe all blowes. So then Gods chaſtizement ſhall neuer further our welfare, except we be our owne iudges too condemne our ſelues first. And howe may that be if we know not our faults ? For as for thoſe that ſay, I knowe I am a wretched ſinner , and haue well deſerued the punishment that I ſuffer : and in the meane while enter not therewithall into their owne hartes too feele their ſinnes. ſuch are but hypocrites in ſaying I haue well deſerued this chaſtizement without knowing how or wherefore. True it is that wee ought too condemne our ſinnes which we know not of : but yet muſt wee begin at this poyn特, namely of examining our conſciences, by ſeeking there for the thing which is ynough to conuict vs . Otherwife it is vnpoffible that euer man ſhoule humble hiſelfe before God , and condemne hiſelfe truly and vnfeynedly. So then ye ſee too what ende we may require God too enter procesſe agaynst vs before hee puniſheth vs : that is to ſay, that he ſhewe vs the fauor to lay our ſinnes before vs, to the ende we may ſee our owne condemnation, and firſt of all be beaten downe in our ſelues. Lo in what wiſe we may make that requeſt, and not by reaſon of aſtoniſhment as Job did , when our affliction carieth vs away. Neuertheleſſe although it be lawfull for vs, yea and beſhoffull also to make ſuch petiſion vnto God, (that is to wit, that hee woulde admitteth vs and receyue vs to debate our caſe with him:) yet muſt we not require him to withdraw his hande. For God can well do both theſe things at once : that is to wit, hee can make vs our procesſe, and thereiſheweth vs that hee hath iuft cauſe to puniſh vs, when we ſee our ſinnes: and therewithall alſo continue to make vs feele the ſtockes of his hande. God then can well do both theſe things togither : And for ſo much as they may matche togither, the receyuing of them togither muſt not be thought ſtrange: But I tolde you that in thiſ behalfe we muſt not be altogether like Job. And why ? For when he requireth after that manner too bee admitted too his defence , it is all one (as I haue tolde you alreadie) as if hee woulde pleade agaynst God. For according as hee had ſayde that hee ſhoulde bee iuftiſied and acquirte : hee addeth nowe, That he will ſpeakē firſt if God giue him leaue too ſpeakē, or else hee wyll anſwerē when God bath begonne to ſpeakē. Heere Job maketh not his requeſt to the ende aforesayde, that is too witte , too pray God too moderate his rigour , and yet notwithstanding too make vs too perceyue our fautes, and that when hee hath brought vs too ſuch lowlineſſe as wee can become oure owne iudges , then every one of vs maye willingly paſſe vnder condemnation . But Job's intent heere is too enter into a cleane contrarie caſe. VVee ſee then wherein hee ſayleth : and this is ſhewed vs too the entent wee ſhoulde followe the meaſure that I haue ſpoken of alreadie. Nowe wee ſee the proſite that redoundeth too vs by thiſ doctrine , if wee can applie it well too oure vſe : that is too witte, that when wee deſire too bee heard at Gods hande , the ſame muſt not bee too bring excuses as though wee were not faultie, and that wee coulde leſſen our offences, or rather make them none at ali : but it muſt bee too enter into the knowledge of them, yea and to enter in thiſ wiſe as we may bee vtterly throwne downe , and there may bee none other ſhift for vs but to flee vnto Gods goodneſſe: and that when wee ſhall haue condemned our whole life, we may notwithstanding not ceaſe to truſt in the mercie which hee hath promiſed too wretched ſinners, when they miſlike of their ſinnes and condemne them , defyng nothing but that God ſhould receyue them to mercie. Ye ſee then in what wiſe we ought too praſtize thiſ ſayde requeſt. But it is hard for vs to attayne to ſuch reaſon, and therefore we muſt ſtreyne our ſelues to it. For thiſ hardness muſt not put vs out of harte, but rather prouoke vs too runne vntoo God , praying him of his grace too touche vs in thiſ wiſe with his doctrine , as by the meanes of his woerde wee may offer vp thiſ requeſte vntoo him as wee maye ſeele the frute of them. Our faults are tolde vs dayly, and yet there are fewe that thiſke vpon them. God therefore perceyuing vs to be ſo ſlow, yea euen in thiſ ſort as hee is not able to moue vs by his worde: lifteth vp hiſ hand, and ſendeth vs ſome chaſtizements. And biſeauie that if the affliction be but ſmal, it is nothing to vs, wee do but ſhake our care at it as the prouerbe ſayth : God doubleth hiſ ſtripes, and ſcourgeth vs more and more, holding our nozes too the grindſtone (as they ſay,) and withdrawing hiſelfe from vs, ſo as hiſ ſpirite is as it were quenched in vs, and we feele not that he gouerneth vs any more, inſomuch that wee become as poore poore desperate soules, and crie out alas, what is this? Afterward we become so enraged that wee would fayne haue God to giue vs some releace, and if he giue vs it not, ye shall see vs vtterly past our selues, so as there is no remedie in our state. Then may we well desire God to withdraw his hand and to giue vs leaue to say, Alas, Lord, thou seest I am a sillie creature, I feele heere thy chastyzements which are ouergreate considering myne infirmitie. True it is this chastyzement is due too mee, yea and I ought to feele yet much more: but my strength 10 is so feeble and weake, as (to my seeming) I am already shet vp in the dungeon of hell. Alas my God, voutsafe thou therefore to alay thy rigour a little, that I may haue leasure to take my breath, and to bethink my selfe better than I haue doone. VVhen I haue such a releef, I will corse to thee, and my wounds shall be asswaged. For I see that the verye meane too take good by thy scouring, is that I abyde not vnreformable vnder thy hand. Behold the goodnessse that God doeth vnto vs, when hee suffereth vs too come vntoo him. Neuerthelesse 20 when wee make such request vntoo him, it must bee doone with such condition as this. VWell Lord, it is true that the petition which I make is for my necessarie, thou seest I am able too beare no more, and if thou preuent not the mischeef, I must needes fall into such a gulf of confuzion, as I shall never get out of it againe. Neuerthelesse Lord, I referre my self wholly vnto thee, thou knowest what is meete and conuenient for mee, and thou art able too remedie the extremities wherein I am, according as thou haste infinite meanes too plucke; 30 thy seruants euē out of death. Now then if we adde this condicion, God doeth well suffer vs too make such request, yea and he will like well of it. Lo what we haue too marke in this sentence. But by the way wee must not think that Job was so farre ouerseene as too beare himself in hand that he was faultlesse, and that he was ready to enter into lawe with God and too plead against him, weening that he shuld get the better had. Let vs not think that Job was sotted with such a follysse. VVhat then? We must think that he spake without aduisement, as 40 we be woont to do when our affections ouermayster vs. For we haue our eyes so bleared, as we discerne nothing at all. As for example: If a man bee besides himself for greef and anguish as he knoweth not himself any more, some light woords will escape from him, and if he bee told of it, he will answer it was not so. Yet is it true that he shall haue spoken them, Yea but it shall not seeme so to his owne vnderstanding, because his wit is troubled and confounded. For (as I haue sayd) our passions carrie vs away in such wise as we be in a maner beside our selues in that case: and yet in the meane whyle God ceaseth not too mainteyne alwayes a knowledge in vs, the which shall notwithstanding be as good as choked. VVhen a man couereth a fire with ashes and earth, if there be a greate Cole in it, it will lye hid vnderneath and a man shal not see any thing nor perceyue any heate. Euen so doeth God sometymes suffer all discretion too be as it were choked in vs, and in that case wee see nothing but the ashes, that is to say the passions that are vppermoste, and we see some steame, but the fire sheweth not it self at all. Euen so then standeth the case with vs. And when Job made this protestation, he felt himself in such extremitie, that hee sought meanes too come before God, saying that he would be the first that should speake. Let vs bee sure that he spake this as a man vtterly rauing in his fittes. Seing the case is such, let vs lerne to walk alwayes in humilitie, and let vs bee well ware that our affections doo not carye vs away after such a sort, as we knowe not what wee doo or say. Lo heere a sentence that is verie profitable and full of good lerning. For first of all wee see that our affections are like wyld beastes: which dash vs against God. But let vs come too rush at him, and what shall wee win by it? Are wee harder than he? Are wee able too make him too bow, or else too breake him? Alas wee must needes bee crushid and broken in peeces when we rush against him so furiously. And not only so: but also hee will ouerthrowe vs with his blast he nedeth but his breth (as the scripture sayeth) too destroy vs, vndoo vs, and bring vs too nought. Therefore let vs vnderstand that our passions must bee repressed, and we must hold them in awe, yea and wee must as it were fetter them: that is too say, wee must doo the vttermoste that wee can too abate the headye frantiknesse that is in them. For else what will become of it? wee see what hath happened to Job, that holie man, the mirrour of pacience, who persisted in the mynd too obey God, and yet notwithstanding it is to be seene that there was such a violence intermelded with it, as he fell to rushing in such wise as he wist not where he was. So much the more then ought we to pray haretly vnto God to rule our passions when wee see them so vnruyl as wee be not able to weeld the, and that he will represse them in such wyse, as they may not come to lift vp them selues against him. Furthermore if we haue happened now and then to ouershoote our selues, so as wee haue passed our boundes and not hearkened vnto God: let vs not be discolaged therefore: for there is a remedie for it: which is, to pray vnto God that he will bring vs vntoo reason againe. And moreouer let vs kindie again the fire that is going out: that is too say, when wee see that good conscience is as it were falne a sleepe in vs, and in maner choked, so as we haue not so much as one sparke of lyght, but are as people confounded: I say when wee perceyue that: let vs labour to come to reason againe, that we may say, where art thou, thou wretched creature? Thou seest that thou flingest thy self here as it were at auenture, yea euen against thy God, and that there is not wit in thy woords. Therfore it standeth thee on had to restryn thy self by measuring the passions which are ouer vehement and excessiue in thee. Lo how it behoueth vs too come backe vnto reason, whē we find our selues so dismayed as wee knowe not what wee say: and let vs assure our selues that that is the thing whereby wee must bethink our selues, more neerly, that we may absteyne from such excessiue speeches as we see Job hath vttered heere, yea euen without aduisement. Then let vs lerne too moderate our passions in such wyse, as we may desire nothing but that God will giue vs the grace to take such taste of his goodnessse and mercie, that although it seeme that wee should bee confounded, yet wee may not cease too rejoyce, and too rest our selues vpon his goodnessse, that wee may glorie in him euen in the middes of our afflictions.

But let vs cast our selues downe before the sight of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs perceyue them better, and too make all men foreward and willing to come yeeld them selues vnto him: and that when we shall appeere before his iudgement seate, we may not come with other condicion than first of all to be our owne iudges if we wil be quitte at his hand, and be receyued vnto his fauour and infinite mercie which hee hath shewed vs in our Lord Iesus Christ: and that whensoeuer he scourgeth vs, hee will so assuage the smart of his roddes, as we may knowe how that his chastizing of vs is to our profit, and that by meanes thereof we may be the more stirred vp to turne agayne vnto him, and to strengthen our selues more and more in his goodnessse , even till we be come to the place of rest where wee shal fully inioy hys fauoure and gracieuse giftes whiche we posseſſe as now but by hope. That it may please him to graunte this grace not only to vs , but also to all people and nations of the earth, &c.

The. liij. Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the. xij. Chapter.

23. Hovv many sinnes and iniquities haue I ſhevv me my misdeede and my transgression.
24. VVhy doest thou hide thy face, and take me for thine enimie.
25. Doest not thou follow vte after a broken leafe: doest not thou persecute drie stubble?
26. Thou vvyttest bitterneſſe agaynſte mee, and makest me too poſſeſſe the ſinnes of my youth.
27. Thou lockett my feete in the ſtocks that I cannot ſcape, and thou printest them in the ſoles of my feete.
28. So ſhall he rotte as an old tree and as a garment that is motheaten.

Eretofore Job declared a thing that is very true, as I touched yesterday : which is, that when God courgeth vs, and we ſee no reaſon why, if we ſhould go to law with him, for every poynt that we could lay for our ſelues, he could lay an iiiiſt number agaiſt vs, ſo as we ſhould be put to coſuſion, I meane euē the rightuoueſt men that are. And thiſ iſ true alſo, that althoſh we ſeeme not to be faultie by the lawe and common rule : yet muſt God be ac‐ knowledged and declared to be righteouſe, and that we ſhall reape nothing but shame when we haue pleaded neuer ſo well for our ſelues. And thiſ dependeth ſtill vpon that which was handled yesterday: that is to witte, that God hath a ſecret righteouſneſſe aboue that which is knownen vnto vs as it is declared to vs in his law. For if the very Angels were examined by that righteouſneſſe, they ſhould be condemned, and there is no creature (be it neuer ſo pure) that is able to ſatisfie that. And thiſ iſ it that Job purſueth a new. For he ſaith, Showe me my miſ‐ deedes and mine iniquities, how much I haue ſained and traſ‐ grefſed. True it is that heere he confeſſeth, that forſo‐ much as he is ſcoured by Gods hande, it behoueth him to humble himſelue: howbeit that he cannot paciently indure that God ſhoule ſcourge him without ſhewing him the reaſon why. And that is the thing whereiſ he ſauiteth. For if God make vs perceiue oure ſinnes and that we ſee as it were with our eyes that gods puniſhing of vs is bycauſe we haue offendēd him in ſuch manner and ſuch : it is ſo muche more, and therein hee doth vs great grace, at leaſtwife if we haue the wit and diſcretiōn to condenme our ſelues, that wee may aske him forgiuenesse. But if we be hardened, what are wee the better for the knowing of our ſinnes? Notwithſtan‐ ding, if God hold vs impreſoned when wee bee beaten with his roddes, ſo as the ſtripes be hard for vs to beare, and we know not what he intendeth nor for what cauſe hee ſcourgeth vs after that manner: yet muſt wee not murmur, but cast downe our countenance, and ſaie, Lord I wil tarrie thy leuure till thou ſhew me what is the end of this affliction. True it is that wee maye well wiſh it wold pleafe God to make vs perceiue what hys meening iſ, that when we know his will, we might pro‐ fit by it : it is lawfull ynough for vs to make ſuch a re‐ queſt. But yet therewithall wee muſt haue the myldneſſe to hold our tungs, vntill it pleafe him to ſhew vs more at large that which iſ vnuſtowne to vs. VVell then, that we may fare the better by thiſ ſentencē, let vs marke that 20 Job perceiued, howe it was God that ſcoured him. Marke that for one ſpeciall poynte. Secoundy hee was fuli perſwaded that he ſhould not amend his eace by pleading againſt God: and furthermore alſo he knewe that God ſcoured him not after the ordinarie manner as he is wont to puniſh men; he handled not Job after that fashion. Therefore he knewe that that whiche hee indured was not a commone chafizemente, and ſuche a one as a man mighte bring vnder ordinarie rule, but a ſecret and hidden determination of God.

Job knewe this: and he ought too haue bin paciente. In all the thinges that I haue ſpoken of, he failed not a whit. For it is a great matter when we not only per‐ ceyue how it is Gods hand that striketh vs, and ſeele the ſtockes of it, but alſo know whereof they proceede. Yee ſee then a thing that is good and righte profitabile.

And ſeeing we know that God ſhall alwaies be found righteouſe, and that wee may well grudge againſt hym, but we ſhall neuer further our eace by it, but wee muſt needs be euerinore condemned.

See yee not a good leſſon, if wee can learne it and beare it in mynde? Alſo the ſame will ſerue to humble vs, ſo as we ſhall haue our mouth ſhut, to the ende wee may restrayne and bridle oure affections, that wee ſtomacke not matters againſt God. And let vs vnder‐ ſtande that there are ſecrete iudgements in him, which we cannot perceiue: which thing ſerueth alſo to holde vs ſo muche the more in awe, that we may not be prouoked through presumption and malapartneſſe too diſpute againſt God.

Thus then ye ſee good thyngeſ. But yet therewithall men muſt haue a ſtay of them ſelues, when they perceiue that God puniſheth them, and they knowe not wherefore. I ſay they muſt be quietminded and ta‐ rie till God diſcouer that thiſ vnto them, which as yet is concealed. In thiſ poynt Job failed. But let vs con‐ diſter that he was forepoſſeſſed with the griefe that hee indured, ſo greatly as it is not too bee woondred at, though hee were aſtoniſhed and desired God to handle hym at leaſtwife according to his ſinnes, and not to per‐ ſecute hym any further. For when GOD bendeth hym ſelue ſo agaynſt a poore creature, and ſo stretcheth out his arme as it ſeemeth, hee will thunder vpon him: and when a man hath no reſpite but is tormented more and more, ſo as hee ſeeth no ende of his myſerie, but iſ as good as ouerwhelmed in that behalfe: alas it is no maruell though ſome wandering words ſcape him, and euē ſo iſ it with Job.

VVherfore let vs learne to pray God, that whei it ſhall please please him too put vs too such encounters, he will not suffer vs too quayle: and specially that when our infirmite sheweth it self, so as we be at the point too enter into wicked imaginations, hee will plucke vs backe too himself, and bring vs again too such state as we may glorifie him in his incomprehensible iudgements. Thus ye see what wee haue too marke in the first place vpon this streyne. But now a man myght demaund heere, why Job vseth not singly the woord Sin alone, too say, Shewe mee how many sinnes I haue, but addeth Iniquities, transgressions, and misdeedes: too what purpose doeth he that? It is all one as if hee should say, when God hath examined me throughly in all poyncts, he shall find no cause why to handle mee so roughly. Not that Job esteemed him self ryghtuouse (as I haue sayd already): but he speakest out of a troubled mynd, so as he hath no regard of those things, but only resteth vpon considering that hee is no such persone as his freendes had reported him to be: that is to wit that God punished him bycause he was a greater sinner thā other men. And in this he hath a good cace: but in the meane whyle hee considereth it not at all, as he ought to doo. Fynally Job declareth that whē God shall haue serched out throughly all the euill that is in him, he shal find that the punishments which hee indureth, are not bycause of his misdoings. Some there are that in this place haue made a distinction betweene willfull sin, and sin of ignorance: betweene that which is committed against God, and that which is committed by ouersight as they terme it. But that distinction hath no substance in it. Job (as I haue touched already) ment rather to set downe the cace in particulars too the full. And for the better perceyuing hereof, let vs marke that when God speaketh of his lawe and of his commaundements, hee vsyth diuersitie of termes, as Ordinances, Statutes, Decrees, iudgements, and such other like: for ther are a seuen or eyght words that import all one thing. And why is that? First and formost his meaning is too shewe, that ys wee walk not ryghtly we cannot alledge ignorance. VVhy so? For he giueth vs full instruction how wee ought too liue. Those therefore that goe astray make no reckening of obeying God. VVhat is the reason? If wee would studie his woord well, wee could neuer doo amisse: for that would guyde vs in all poyncts and all caces. Ye see then for the first place wherevntoo this diuersitie of woords serueth when it is sayd, Statutes, Ordinances, Obseruances, Proclamations, Decrees, Testimonies or VVitnessings: iudgements, &c. All these serue to shewe that God guideth vs so carefully, as wee cannot make one false step, if wee followe that which he teacheth vs. And therefore wee are the more vnexcusable if wee do amisse. For God hath set many barres in our wayes too hold vs backe, hee hath made vs a certayne path, hee hath set vs bounds on all sides, hee himself guydeth vs that wne cannot swarve too the ryght hand nor too the left, and with his doctrine he giueth vs admonishments, confirming the whole too our vse. Now then if wee take the contrarie way: men may see it is of purposed malice, yea euen as if wee were out of our wits. Thus ye see how men are made vnexcusable, seing that God hath not commaunded the thing that is good, in a woord or twayne: but hath ratified and stablished it by making Ordinances, Statutes, and Obseruances, euen of purpose that men should be conuicted of ouerheynous rebellion when they go against all those things. And on the contrarie part, when the same maner is vsed in speaking of sinne: it is to the end that men should bee the better touched, and vnderstand that they haue not committed a small and light fault, but that they haue deserued too bee punished with rigour, and that their transgressions are horrible. As for example: VVhen Dauid in the two-andthirtith Psalme sayeth, that the man is blissted whose sinnes God forgiueth, whose iniquities are couered, whose transgressions are buryed, and whose misdoings God remembereth not any more. (See wherein mannes happinesse consisteth): wherefore doeth Dauid speake of Sinnes, iniquities, and Transgressions? Had it not ben ynoch too haue sayd in one woord, Blissed is the man whose sinnes God hath forgiuen? But he ment to expresse the infinite gracieuse goodnesse that God sheweth ys when he forgiueth vs our sinnes. And why? For if he should call vs too a reckening, alas there would be none end, and wee should not only be found in arrage vnto him in some one parcell: but assoone as hee shall haue cast vs in one poynct, he shall be new too begin again in another. Dauid then knewe that men were plundged in damnation as deeply and horribly as myght bee, sauing that God pulleth them backe through his owne infinite goodnesse: and that when hee doeth so, men ought not to ouer passe it sliglytly, as if he had released them but a det of five shillings, but they must bethink them well of their misdeeds, of their iniquities, and of their transgressions: they must mynd them throughly, and bear them in remembrance. By this then wee see why there is vsed such diuersitie of woords. But as now Job is flat contrarie: as if he should say, True it is that men may do amisse many wayes, it is true that they bee exceedingly blame woorthis before God: but yet for all that, when my life is throughly examined, there will be nother misdoings, nor transgressions, nor iniquities too deserue that God should handle mee after this fashyon. But wee must bee heedfull too beare in mynd what hath ben sayd: namely, that Job ment not to iustifie him self as though he had performed all things too the full: but only had an eye too Gods intent for the which he punished him. For it is certaine (as we haue seene already) that God had not respect vntoo his sinnes how greate they were: but ment too proue his patience. Lo why hee scourged him. But that wee may take the more profit of this doctrine, let vs marke first, that if God list too vse rigour towards vs, it is certayne that for any one sin hee may punish vs in such wise, as wee shall not knowe where to become, and yet he shall do vs no w:ong. Then of much more likelyhod, if he listed to punish vs for all our sinnes, there should be no end. And thirdly although hee punish vs not directly in respect of the faultes that wee haue committed: yet shall he be ryghtuouse still, and it becommeth vs to sink downe vnder him with true lowelinesse euen in that behalfe.

These then be the three pointes which wee haue to marke. The first is, that if God listed to condemne vs for any one fault alone, wee haue no cause too reply against him, and to say, the punishment is ouergreate. VVe see what it booted Cain to reply against God in that wyse: surely he could not deny the deede, he was conuictid of it afore hande: he had alreadye sayde, Am I the keeper of my brothers lyfe? But when he sawe that his iniquite was knowne: he spited at it, and gnashed his teeth, and grunting sayd: My punishment is greater than I am able to beare. For behold I am as a folorne man, thou chacest mee, and where shall I become? VVhosoeuer meteth me shal kill mee. Thus ye see how Cain murmureth against God, for that his punishment was too greate. But (as I sayd) sped he euer the better for that? No: his wickednesse increased so much the more. Therfore let vs keape

Gen. 4 b.13.

our selues from repynng, although we wist there were no mo but one fault in vs. For it is not for vs to shewe what our sinnes haue deserued: only God is the competent iudge thereof. And therefore he must punish vs, not after our fancie, nor as semeth good to vs: but according to his owne iudgement. Marke that for one poynte. Moreouer for the second pointe we haue too marke, that as our faults are innumerable: so also wee must not thinke it straunge that God should punish vs after diuers sorts, & double his stripes, and that we shuld be plunged deeper and deeper into so many miseries, and there languish as folke vtterly forlorue. Let vs not thinke this geere straunge. And why? For our faults are without number. That is the second poynt that we haue to beare in mind. For the third, let vs marke, That God may well vtter his hand against vs, yea euen to execute his secrete iudgements, when we haue labored to serue hym with a good conscience, and implored our selues faythfully vpon our neighbours, yea and liued among men without fraude, without malice, and without violence. VVhen we haue worshipped and serued God purely after that sorte, and when we haue walked vprightly with our neighbours: yet if God scourge vs, we must still confesse him to be righteous. VVe see not why: but yet must not we pleade, we must come shorte of that, and say, VWell Lorde, thou wilte not shew me the reason of this miserie which I indure: neuerthelesse I thinke the time long, howbeit Lorde it is wisedome ynoch for me, if I can humble my self vnder thy mightie hande. And furthermore do me thou this pleasure for the time to come, that I may knowe what thy purpose was, and that I may profite more and more: and howsouer the worlde go, let me not ceasse too glorify thee. Lo after what manner we ought to proceede. But after that Job hath desired God to enter after that sorte as it were into ordinarie pleading, he addeth, *VV*berefore bides: thou thy face, and esteemest me as thine enemie! Is not that a folowing of a lease that is already broken? is it not a persecuting of stubble that is alredy witered? Here Job alledgedh his owne frailtie to get some ease of his afflictions, and some asswagement of his sores, as he hath vsed to do heretofore and will do again heereafter. And thys maner of praying is good and holy, when it proceedeth of those causes as we see the faythfull haue done. And indeede heere ye see what we haue to bring vnto God, when we wold obtaine fauoure at hys hande to deliuer vs from our miseries and succoure vs: which is, too lay our feeblenesse before him. VVhereas fooles alledge their owne woorthynesse, and go about too bind God vnto them: we can say nothing, but that wee bee wretched. How shall we then obtine mercie? Euen by saying, Alas Lorde, consider what we be, thou must be faine to haue pitie of vs bycause we be thy creatures. VVhen a man alledgedh, Alas there is nothing but filthinesse in my body, Lord if thou take away thy strength, beholde I am brought to naught: and as for my soule, what hathe it? it is but a little breath, and if that thou also withdraw thy breath (that is to say, the power that thou hast gyuen me) I am thenceforth nothing. And furthermore there is so much ignorance, such store of vices, and so many wantes in it, as is a woorder to see. Alas my God, when thou seest that I am so full of miseries, perceuest thou not how there is matter for thy mercie to woorke vpon? VVe see then that when we be desirous to obteyne fauoure at Gods hande, we must take the same way that Job dooth heere: Howbeit so as it be with another mynde. For Job was driuen with too strong a vhemencie, bycause he was wearietoo be so pressed by
