Hauē declared heretofore how greet a temptation Job indured, when it seemed that his praying to God did him no good. For that is our last refuge in al our aduersities, and the soueraine remedie that can neuer fayle vs. Then if it seeme that we be disappointed of our hope, & that God do make as though he were deaf, and (to be short) that we profit not at all by our prayers and supplications: It is as it were a hell that gapeth open vpon vs, and we must needs fall into vtter dispaire, if God hold vs not back, and shew that his delaying to succour vs, is not without cause. Then if God wrought not with a singular power in this behalf: Surely we should vtterly ouerwhelme when we find no relief of our miseries by praying vnto him. Now seing that this happened vnto Job, let euery of vs dispose himself after his exāple. And if God do now and thē suffer vs to linger in Payne, (as often times it commeth to passe) and we be not succored at his hand as we would wish: let vs tarry paciently and fight against such temptations, yea and let vs do our indeuour also to obey him. For it is not ynough for vs to pray vnto God: but wee must also bryde our affetiōs. So as if aduersitie pressē vs, and we be troubled that we can no more: yet ncuerthelesse we must abyde still in this stedfastnesse that is spoken of here. And so if we haue ben subiect to the good wil of our good God for a time, let vs continue in the same to the end: and if it seemed to vs that we were ouercharged, yea cuen in the middes of our aduersities: let this presente example come to our remembrance, that the end wil shew, that although God hyde himself from his seruaunts, and make them not to feele his working at the first, yet he never forgetteth thē, but heareth them at length, when he perceiuthe the conuenient time. But let vs remember the Apostles lesson, that faith must be ioined with pacience, & that we must be exercised in many battailes before we come to the triumph: for this life isordeine diosight in. In the text here foloweth that which I haue touched already: namely, that god shewed himself cruel towardes Job. Now when he speaketh so, it is not to accuse God of vnrightuousnes: but to shew the extremitie of the paine that he felt. The if we be tormented with any excessive rigor, we may well terme the same a crueltie, but yet it foloweth not that we shuld cōdempe God for it. Ye see then what Iobs meening was. And for the beter conceiuing hereof, let vs beare in mynd what hath bin declared heretofore: namely, that the fauful which are pressēd by the hand of God, do feele so terrible anguish as is not possible to be expressed. It is not without cause that David in bewailing the affictiōs that God laid vpon him, vsed these similitudes, namely that he was brought to the botome of the deepes, that there was not any more light left him, and that his bones were as it were rotten, that the marie of them was dried vp, so that all his strength was withered, that his tong cleaved to the rooef of his mouth, and that he was condemned to death, so as there was no more remedie. Lette vs marke that his speaking so, is to expresse the vehemencie of the grieve, wherewyth the poore faythfull ones are oppresed when they feele the wrathe of G O D. For if our myndes misgivē vs that G O D is againste vs: that passeth all miseries. And the more that wee feare it, so muche the more doth our distress and torment increase: For the vnbeleeuers, the dispisers of God, and al heathenish folke are as it were blockish. Loke vpo a man that is hardned in euill, and he dothe nothing but scoffe at all religion. VVell then, if God scourge him, no doubt but he shall be enforced to criē, alas: but yet for all that, he loketh not to the hand which striketh him: he feeleth the stripes, but hee thinketh not that it is God that striketh: whereas the fauful bycause, they knowe that all their welsare consisteth in the fauor of God and in his fatherly faterly goodnessse, do cōfōrt thēselues therewith in the midds of their aduersities : but if God seeme to become their enimy, or to haue shaken thē of, or to haue withdrawen himself frō them although they were [otherwise] at their ease, and that all things fell out as they would haue them: yet notwithstanding they conceiue such a hart grief as they knowe not were to become. And this is the cause why king Ezechias sayd, that God was a cruel lion against him, & crushed all his bonds asunder with his teeth. Mēt Ezechias to find faulte with God, or to stand in cōtention against him? No, VVhy doth he then liken him so to a liō, and a wild beast that cōmeth to swallowe vp a pray, and to crashe and breake al asunder? It is (as I sayd afore) to expressē the fearē wherewith the poore faithfull ones are tormēted, when they seele Gods wrath, and perceiue their owne sinnes, and see that he sheweth himself their judge.

 For thē must they needs be possessed with such anguish as surmounteth al bodyly harmes. So therfore wheras Job cōplayneth that God was turned against him with cruel-tie: he meeneth not that God passeth measure, or that he vsed any tirannie, or that he was vnrighteous: but he expesseth the grief and the excessē of the miserie wherin he was: yet notwithstanding let vs marke well, that when Job speketh so, he doth it as a man incōbered in his wits, and therfore he is not to be vtterly excused, as I haue declared heretofore. And truely whensocuer our affections ouermayster vs, it is vnpossible that we shuld think of God & speake of him so reverently as we ought to do. VVhy so?
 For our affections are blind: and if we wil speake of God with such reverēce as he deserueth: it behoueth vs to gather our wits to vs, and to kepe thē quiet and feasable. So then seeing that Job sheweth and declareth here, what his former tētātions were: no dout but he speaketh vnaudi-sedly. And therfore we must not drawe this saying to an exāple, as though it were lawfull for vs to followe them.
 But let vs cōsider that although a man indeuour to bridle himself: yet can he not so ouerrule his infirmite, but that there is always somewhat in him worthy of blame and to be condemned. And so much the more ought we to be heedfull to brydle our affections, considering that do the best we can, we cānot be so subiect vnto God as were requisite. Thus then there are two things which we haue to note: the one is that when God sheweth himself to be against vs, & in steade of receiuing vs to his free goodnessse and loue, seemeth to be our enimie, and our owne sinnes reproue vs: & we see nothing but the signes of his curse vpon vs: It cānot be but we must needs be extremely tormented. Marke that for one point. And it is a necessarie lesson, to the end that every man may prepare himself afore hand that when we come to the pinch, we may be so armed as we fall not into vtter dispaire, but that in the middest of the gulfis we may tast some parte of Gods cō-fort, to wayte paciētly for the good issue that we see not.
 And therfore let vs not think it to be a thing to be desired, neuer to haue any anguish at all, nor to be put in any feare. For that is more meeter for the infidels and for the despisers of God, which are become brutish as I haue declared afore. The swine and the oxe feele their miserie no further than their outward sense leadeith them: and euen so fare lewd persones that are doted in their vnderstanding, and would fiane forgette God, and thrust the remēbraunce of his name vnderfoote. But contraryewise, let vs be sure it is expedient for vs to be wakened from such drowsinessse, and to feele Gods wrath, to the end we may walke in the greater warenesse, and learne therby to hū-ble our selues. For mē shall neuer know and acknowledge their owne weakenesse sufficiētly, till they haue cited themselues before God. It is sayd that the man is happie which trieth and examineth himself. And why? For behold, this retchlesnesse of ours whē our wits be as it were dulled with it, is the hygh way to destruction. And seeing it is good and expediet for our welfare, to be carefull: let vs vnderstand that it is not without cause that our Lord maketh vs to feele his wrathe, to the intent we should be-think vs the better of our sinnes. Marke that for one point.

 And for the second, let vs marke, that wee can neuer bee brought so well to the obedience of our God and to the ruling of our affections, but there wil be ouergreat gainstriuings stil, according as we see that although Job were a mirror of pacience yet notwithstanding he was not so well stayed as to ouermayster himself when he spake of God. For he proceeded not with such a reverence as he ought to haue done, but ranne hedlong into this temptatō, wherof he was not euercome, but resisted it althōugh with much ado. Seing then that the passions which are in vs are so farre out of square: let vs learne to hold them as it were in prison: and when we haue well fought to tame ourselues, let vs still consider that there is much imperfection in vs, and that God should always find wherfore to condemne vs, if he bare not with vs of his infinite goodnessse. Lo what we haue to note. And now to expresse the greate feare, grief, and miserie that Job was touched with-all, he addeth, that God had lifted him vp vpon the wynd, and made him to ryde as it were in the ayre, & caused all his strēgib and substance to fail him. VVhen a man is so caught vp, and carried away as it were in a whirl wind, it is a dreadfull thing. For if a man were beatē downe and died there: it would not be so terrible, as when God hoyseth him vp into the ayre as it were with a suddaine tempest. VVe see then that Jobs intent is to confirme the matter which he hath declared: that is to wit, that God exerciseth and try-eth his seruaunts after straunge fashions. And therfore let vs not conceiue Gods wrathe only according to the examples that we haue seene with our eyes, and felt by our owne experience: but let vs vnderstand, that God can try vs by such meanes as are vnyknowne to vs, yea euē in such wise as we shall be worse thā forlorne. And whē we know this, let vs also pray God to strengthen vs at our neede: & although that to the outward apparaunce we see nothing on all sides but the graue, and it seemeth that we should be swallowed vp, not only of bodyly death, but also of hel: Yet notwithstanding let vs not cease to cōtinue in the feare of our God, and to rest alwayes vpō the trust of his goodnessse, determining fully to call vpon him, and to flee vnto him alone for refuge, yea though all our senses withstode it, and that it seemed to vs that we were barred from all accessē vnto him. Thus ye see what we haue to minde in these verses. And so let vs not thinke it to bee a needlessē tale, when mencion is made of the winds and of the stormes, and of gods making of him to ryde in the ayre: For it serueth to shew that our Lord hath straunge wayes to chastice vs, when it pleaseth him, and that we ought not to be taken vñwares by them for want of hauing thought of them before hand. And furthermore, if we feele not so greate and outrageouse afflictions in vs: let vs assure our selues it is bycause God beareth with vs. So then what ought we to do when we suffer aduersitie? If we be gre-ued and tormēted more thā reason: (for so it may seeme vnto vs,) let vs take example of Job. How now! Thou art not yet come to the extremitie that this good seruaunt of Gods was at. And what is the cause therof, but for that thy God hath respect of thy feblenesse: but he will not handle thee so roughly though he could well do it and hath iust cause so too do. Thou seest then how he vseth gen-tlenesse still towards thee: what rigour soever thou see-least, thou art not yet so martired as that thou canst say, Ll.iiij.      that he

that he is come vpō thee as a cruel liō that hath tornē thee in peeces. Thou canst alledge no such thing: and therfore thou mayst wel seeke to thy good God, & returne vnto him: & seing he sheweth himself so kindharted and pitiful towards thee, he wil still be thy father & preseruer. Ye see thē how this cōparisō ought to serue our turne, & that it behoueth vs to maister our affectiōs when we feele to much hart burning and repining in our selues, & that we be tēpted to stomaking & rebelling against God. It behoueth vs I say to think vpon the things that are set downe here. And lob aledgeth again vnto God, that he is a poore fraile man and neere vnto death, and that therfore it is a maruell why God shuld persecute him so roughly. I know (sayth he) that thōn wile send me to the graue too the house that belongeth vnto all that liē. Seing that the state of all men is such as thou hast set thē here to make them passe away as it were in a moment: why shouldest thou try thy self and viter thy force vpon them and against them? Lo what lobs meening is: we haue herd the like sentences hertofore, and it is not without cause that they be repeated here. For vndoubtedly God will haue vs to pray vnto him and setteth the infirmities of our frayle state before him, to moue him to take vs to mercy, and to ease vs: as when it is sayd in the Psalme, that the Lord knoweth how we be but dust, and that whē we haue passed through this world, we must be faine to come to rotēnesse. And seing we knowe that God spareth vs and pitith our miseries, ought not that promis to moue vs to pray vnto him after that sort. And again in another text it is said, that god for-

Psa. 103. c. 14. giueth mēs sinnes bycause he seeth they are but a shadow that passeth and vanisheth away. Therfore when we pray God to deliuē vs from our miseries, let vs learne how we ought to alledge that we ourselues are nothing, and that although we haue life, yet we die in the turning of a hād: insomuch that euē in our cheef floure & florishing time, we be likened vnto grasse which is greene to day and cut downe to morowe, so as it withereth and drieth without moysture or substance. The alledging of these things vnto God wil make him pitiful towards vs to deliuē vs from our miseries. Not that he hath neede to be put in mind: for he knoweth our infirmities better thā we ourselues, and therfore needeth not to be aduertised of it. But like as our praying to him is for our ourselues: so likewise al the requests and reasons which we alledge in our prayers, are to our own vse & profit. Thē if a man alledge vnto God, that he is a poore fraile creature: he beholderth himself in himself, & teacheth himself lowlinesse. If we think not vpon our state, we shal always be puffed vp with pride, or else we shal not be disposed as we ought to be to obteine mercie. But if our Lord bring vs once to that point that we be ouerthrowen in our selues: then shall we be the better disposed to seke his ayde, yea and that with greater earnestnesse and desire.

Psa. 78. d. 39. And furthermore our Lord also receiueth and accepteth the seruice which he demaundeth aboue all thing, that is too wit, the seruice of a broken and lowly hart, as it is sayd in the Psalme. Ye see then that the alledging of our frayltie vnto God, and that we be but dust and rotēnesse, yea and that we be nought and worse than nought, must bee to induce him to take vs too mercy: but let vs marke also, that there must be no repyning mingled with it, nor any such complaints as we may haue any grudging or hartburning: as surely lob had not so good stay of him self here, as he ought to haue had. For to what purpose sayth he, I knowe I must go to the graue, euē to the howse of all living creatures: no doubt but he sheweth heere excesse of the passion, wherewith he was tempted: not that he was overcome of it, but yet he felte such rebelling in himself, as he yeeldeed not so peaceably to Gods wil, as he ought to haue done: as if he should say: Thou tryest mee here, thou persecutest me, and who am I? must thou needs shew thyself so sharpe and rigorouse against a poore creature that is nothing. Then behoueth it vs to beware of such impaciencie as this. And herein wee see what the corruption of our nature is. For euen the best things in vs are alwayes mingled with some faultinesse, except God preserue vs by miracle. I sayd heretofore that it is a good and holy thing, that men which are smitten by Gods hand, shuld for the obteyning of mercy alledge their owne feblenesse, and shewe that their life is nothing, and that they haue not any strength in them, and that death threatneth them every minute of an houre. This I say is a good and holy thing: and it serueth too humble vs, to the end wee may offer vnto God the sacrifice that pleaseth him so well. But yet notwithstanding we turne this thing to euill, according as wee see in this present example. If a man say vnto God, Lord who am I? Thou knowest I am but a shadowe that passeth and vanisheth away, and all my strength is but a smoke: if a man (I say) speake so, and therwithall frerte and repyne bycause he thinketh it straunge that God should chastize him: No doubt but the same is a wicked and cursed passion, and yet (as I haue told you), this complaine is good and profitable. And so it is in dede: but men can not withhold themselues from mingling some excesse alwayes with it, and from peruerting the thing that is good. And so there is such an vngratioufulness in our nature, as we corrupt the good, and turne it into euill. So much the more then behoueth it vs too stand alwayes vppon our gard, and to mistrust our selues, seing we be so wauering that we cannot followe right foorth the things that God comauandeth vs. Yet notwithstanding we must not therfore discomfyt our selues: for our Lord will take vs in good worth, so we cōdēne the excesse in our selues. Truely we must not vse here any flatteries, nor make ourselues beleue that vice is not vice. But we must condēne it, & whē we haue so don, no doubt but our lord receiueth vs. Here withal it behoueth vs to retorne to lobs intent. I go to my graue (sayth he) & I know that none shall stretch his hād thither, or that God shall not stretch his hād thither. But the naturall sense is this: whē never so many men haue bewayed me, yet shall none of them stretch his hand thither to succour me: when death hath once caught me, there is no more remedie: all mans helpe booreth not. VVee see then that lobs intent is to say, seing that death ta rieth for vs and is allotted to vs: and when we be dead we are cleane dispatched and no man can succour vs: at least wife giue vs sonie truce whyle wee bee here. VVhy vitterest thou so greater rigour against vs? Thus ye see in effect what lob meint too say. And I haue tolde you already, in what wise it may be lawfull for vs too vse this complaint: that is too witre, without murmurung or disputing. And by the way let vs marke, that to the intent wee lift not vp our selues against God, ne stryue against the roddes wherwith he scourgeth vs in this extremitie: it behoueth vs to come to one other consideracion: which is, that although we go forward vnto death, and haue alwayes one foote in the graue: yet we knowe that God hath stretched out his hand to deliuē vs thēce. For to what end came Iesus Christ into the world? Yea why went he downe into hell, that is to say, why suffered he the anguishes that were due to all wretched sinners, but to deliuē vs from them? So then if men cannot now conceyue good hope to be cōforted in death: it is alone as if they would denie that our Lord Iesus Christ hath suffered it in his person: For wheras the Sonne of God

Gal. 3. b. 13. god abaced himself so farre, as to be subiect to our curse, and to feele Gods hand against him : that was to the end to deliuers from death, and to assure vs that the victorie which he hath purchased, is for vs. Seing then that he hath power ouer death: let his resurrection always come before our eyes, and let vs assure our selues that God hath stretched out his strong and victorious hand, to deliuers from the bondage of Sathan. And therin let vs consider, that although we haue many aduersities to suffer in this mortall life, and that it please God to excercise vs: we must not think it straunge nor enter into the waylings and complaints which are made here, to say yea, what am I: when I haue passed through this world, I must go too the graue, and no man can rescue mee. But we shal be rescued wel ynough, if we haue Iesus Christ for our redeemer, who is ordeyned too be our pledge and warrant, & hath abolished the paynes of death, brokē the bāds of Sathan, and burst open the brasen gates, to set vs free. Seing we know this, let vs be pacient in the middes of al the aduersities of this world, assuring ourselues, that although we haue battels here bylowe, we haue a rest prepared for vs aboue in heauen: and if we fight manfully here, let vs assure our selues that we cannot but triumphe in heauen. Thus ye see what we haue to beare in mind, for the senting and arming of ourselues against the temptations wherwith Iob was assaulted, and which he had somuch a do to withstand. Furthermore let vs marke well the thing that he addeth: which is, haue not I wept with him that was in aduersitie, and had hard and sharpe dayes or tymes? Was not my soule sorrowful with the poore or afflicted? Now then I haue looked for good, and euill is happened vnto mee: I haue hoped for light, and behold here is darkenesse. Hereby Iob declarereth, that he seeth not the reason why God dealeth so roughly with him, forasmuch as in his prosperitie he had not ben cruell but pitifull towards the poore and such as were in heauiness, and that he had not ben drunken in his pleasures, but had alwayes considered what the miseries of mans life are, so as he wept with them that did wepe, and kept company with such as were tormented with aduersitie. Thus ye see what Iob alledgedeth to shewe that there is no reason why he should be so afflicted. And surely when God beateth vs with his roddes: commonly it is bycause he seeth that we cannot beare our owne ease, and that our flesh groweth ouerlusty, or else we be cruell towards our neyghbours. Lo heere the twoo causes why God doeth ordinarily afflict vs. And we see also, that in the scripture he threatneth those that do so passe their bounds in their prosperitie: woe be to you (sayeth it) that laugh, for you shal weepe. And why? for men cannot forbear from ouerreaching themselues, when they be in rest, and things fall out as they would haue them: for the they forget themselues, and think they are exempted from all aduersities, and are as it were drunken folkes: like as a drunken man hath no stay of himself, but rusheth with his hornes as a wild beast: euen so fare the most parte of men when God handleth them gently: that is to say, they abuse his goodnesse, and fling out at rousers, and giue the brydle too their lustes. For hath a man meate and drinke, euen his fill? therevpon infeweth whoredome and shamefull wantoneste, yea and blasphemies, outrages, and violences: and moreouer fond iests & playes, and such other things, and (to be short) a man cannot hold himself in good modestie so long as he is at his ease. Ye see then that the cause why God afflicteth men, is for that he seeth it is for their behoof to bee so corrected. Furthermore there is yet one other inconuenience. For they that haue the world at will, passe not for poore men that are in aduersitie, but despise them and set their feete in their necks. VVee see that in this respect it was sayd in reproche of Sodom and Gomor: behold there was abounding of breade, and therewithall pleasure & cructie, so as they voutsafed not to succour such as were in neede. Forsomuch then as they that are at their ease, wil not intermeddle themselues with the troubles and incumberances of their neyghbours, but hold themselues as it were in an earthly paradyse, and exempt themselues from the feeling of all their greefs and aduersities: God must be faine to handle them roughly when their turne commes about: and forso muchas they haue had no pitie nor compassion of the miseries that they haue seen in their brethren: God must be sayne to make them feele by force anon after, that they be but men. They would discharge themselues of all worldly miseries: and God sheweth them perforce, that they must of necessitie knowe themselues to be such as they are. Ye see then that the doctrine which we haue to marke, is that Gods ordinarie affliction of men, is eyther bycause they haue ben cruel in the time of their prosperitie, or bycause they haue made themselues drunken in their lawlesse pleasure. But herewithall let vs marke also, that God might iustly kepe vs occupied with aduersities, though the foresyd causes were not, and that he hath secret determinacions wherof we perceiue not the reason, like as it happened vnto Iob. And that is the caufe why Iob complaineth. For it seemeth to him that God ought not too haue afflicted him after that maner, seing he had behaved himself so aduisedly: but rather he thinketh that God shoulde haue spared him, seing he had be so fellowlike and freedly a man, and be sad and sorie with such as were in aduersitie. But what for that? Heerby we see that we haue two things to beare away. The one is, that if our Lord make vs to prosper, so as we haue peace and rest, and all that is necessarie for vs, & we be exēpted from all greef for a time: we must not be to delicate, nor to tender in shrinking away, frō shewing pitie and compassiō towards such as are in aduersitie: but we must be touched with the grefes of our neyghbours, to mourne with the and to releue the to our power, & at leastwise to pray vnto God for the, whē we cō help the by none other meanes. Thus the ye see the first doctrine that we haue to marke. And furthermore, let vs not fall a slepe in our pleasures, so as wee should not continually knowe that here is not any thing certain, nor be readie to suffer whensoeuer it shal please God. The first thing I say which we haue to beare in mind, is that we must not forget our selues whē God spareth vs. For what is the cause that prosperitie continueth not stil with vs? It is for that we abuse it, as I haue said alreadie. And secoundly, if God sed vs afflictions, let vs bethinke our selues wel, & examine whither we haue not bene sleepie in the time of our prosperitie. For heerby we be put in mind to know our faultes, & to condemn the before God, saying: Lord thou hast good cause to punish vs, & whie? For since the time that thou didst prosper vs by thy fauor, we haue forgotten thec, & layde the brydle in our neckes, and taken to much libertie. And therefore it is good reason that thou shouldest punish vs, and that we should feele the fruite of our sinne and vnruleynesse. Lo howe wee ought to call to mynde our former faultes, when God visiteth vs by any affliction: And specially howe wee ought to consider well, whither wee haue not bene vnmercifull towarde such as deserued our succour. For if we haue made no account of others: it is good reason that oure Lorde shoulde handle vs roughly again, that we shuld lern to acknowlege our faults bi our Lords sharpnesse and rigor towards vs. Mark that for one point. But yet further, althogh we haue indeuored to helpe our neighbors, & haue had compassion of their miseries, &

Ro.12.1.15. mourned with thē that mourne, as S. Paule exhorteth vs to do: yet notwithstanding let vs not ceaſe alwayes to diſpoſe our ſelues to the ſuffering of the corrections which it ſhal pleafe God to ſend vs, yea euen though we knowe not the cauſe why he doeth it. If we haue ben watchfull in the time of proſperitie, and not abuſed our eaſe: yet will not God miſſe to handle vs roughly now and then. If we aſke why he doeth it: the reaſon wil not be maniſt at the firſt: But he doeth it to humble vs: and ſo let vs alwayes acknowledge him to be rightuouſe. And that is the cauſe why I ſayd, that we ought to beare in mynd theſe two reaſons diſtinctly: Firſt, that we remeber the threatnings which are written in the holy ſcripture againſt ſuch as are vnmerciful to their neyghboors, and play the beaſts in their proſperitie: And ſecondly, that we conſider, that although men behauē themſelues myldly, soberly, and freendly: yet notwithstanding God ceaſeth not to affliſt them after an extraordinařie maner, as we ſee hath hap‐pened vnto Job. VVhat is to be done thē? In ſteade of that he ſayeth here, I haue rayted for light; and beſold here is darkneſſe: I haue hoped for good, and beſold here is euill: let vs looke for good according as God promiſeth it. For (as S. Paule ſayeth) the feare of God hath promiſes, not only of the euerlaſting life, but also of the preſent and tranſitorie life. So then let vs alwayes looke for welfare at Gods hād: but yet let vs not looke for it in ſuſh wile as we ſhuld not be readie to receiue aduersitie, whensoeuer it ſhal pleafe him to ſend it vs. For wheras God promiſeth vs to hādle vs gētly, & to vſe fatherly & louing kindnes towards vs: it is but condicionally, ſo farre forth as is expediet for our ſaluation. And why? For his temporall benefits are ſuſh, as it behoueth him to deale them forth and to diſtriбуſe thē by meaſure. And what is the reaſon? It is the ſame that I haue alledged already: namely, that it is an imposſibilitie (or at leaſtwife a very hard matter) that men ſhould not either abuse and corrupt Gods giſts, or beſlow the cleane contrarie to his meening. So then we may well hope that when God hath done vs good, he wil continue the ſame, yea and alſo inceate it ſtill: but wee muſt not alſo looke that we ſhould not therewithall diſpoſe our ſelues wholly to receiue aduersitie, whensoeuer it ſhall pleafe him too ſend it. VVhy ſo? we muſt not make rekening that wee haue an euerlaſting ſtate in our life without any chaūge. Let vs conſider that as our life is frayle, ſo alſo it behoueth vs to be ſubiect to many chaunges, and that if wee haue proſperitie to day, God may diſapoint vs of it to morow: and though we ſee not the reaſon why: yet he knoweth it, and let vs be contented with it. Ye ſee then after what ſort the faythfull ought to looke for the temporall beneſſis of this world: that is, that when they inioy them, they muſt beleeue fully that God wil continue his dealing towards them as he hath done thither to. Howbeit in loo‐king for proſperitie, it behoueth them to prepare themſelues to receyue aduersitie, in ſuſh ſort as they may not be taken vñwares, nor think it ſtrange if he bereue them of his benefits when he had handled them as gentilie as may bee for a time: I ſay they muſt not thinke it any noueltie if God turne his hand the contrarie way and ſmitē them. Thus ye ſee that our looking for proſperitie

muſt be with continuall diſpoſing of our ſelues to ſuffer aduersitie: yea and to ſuffer it paciently, too the end wee miſcartie not when it commieth vpō vs. And furthermore let vs in conclusion marke well what is ſayd here concerning Job. He complaineth that he was a companion of dragons, and a brother of Eſtridges: that is to ſay, as a wyld man, ſo as he was no more of the number and company of other men, but God had ſo farre forsaken him, that he was become as a wild beaſt. And who is he that ſpeaketh it? A man that liued in ſuſh holynesse and perfeſſion, as he might rather haue been compared with an Angell, than with a mortall creature, and yet for all that, we ſee how he was hādled. Hereby we be warned to put our ſelues wholly into the hands of God, and not to ceaſe to truſt in him though he ſcourage vs roughly, & ſeeme minded to ouerwhelme vs utterly: But to put that thing in vre which we haue ſeene here before: namely, that though he ſhould kill vs, yet we would hope ſtill for his mercy, and fight againſt the batrailes of death, and grounding our ſelues vpō his promiſes, hold our owne ſtill and continue ſtedfast in the middeſt of all our aduerſities. Lo what wee haue to marke. And furthermore if God ſcourage vs for our ſinnes: we muſt be the leſſe plunged in ſorow by reaſon of thole affliſtions, and take them ſo much the more meekly and with a quiet mind, conſidering how we haue neede to be hādled ſo ſharply, in reſpect of the diſeſeſes that are roted in vs. In the meane whyle, forasmuch as we cannot be mery but with offendine of God: wee haue a threatnig added here, that he wil change our harpe into mourning, and our organs into voice of lamenting. VVe ſee how the world abuſeth Gods benefits in theſe dayes. For if every man looke into himſelf, wee ſhall ſee that if our Lord giue vs reſt, by and by we ſtarte out of our hingings (as the Proverb ſaih: ) And againe, if we come to the common ſtate, alas we ſee that the world is as farre out of order as may be: and (to be ſhort,) it ſeemeth that men haue conſpired to greue God, and the more that he ſheweth him ſelf louing and kind towards vs, it ſeemeth that wee become ſo much the bolder to provoke him. Sith it is ſo, we may wel be afraide that he wil turne both our harpes and our organes to weeping wayling & ſorow. For we are wel worthie of it. And good reaſon it is, that he ſhould caſt vs into heauinenſſe and anguiſhe, ſeing that we haue abuſed his benefits ſo ſhamefully. Yet notwithstanding if it please God to make vs ſeele his hand by affliſtions, whether we know the cauſe of it or no: let vs not therfore ceaſe to flee vnto him, in hope that he wil receiue vs to mercy: yea verely if we condene our faults, and that our condeneing of the be in ſuſh wile, as we aſſure and warrat our ſelues that he wil cōtinue his goodnes towards vs, & make vs always to ſeele his grace, even till he haue filled vs with it to the ful.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our ſinnes, praying him too make vs ſo to ſeele them, as it may be to bring vs to trewe repenteſſe, and that yet notwithstanding we may not ceaſe to taſt continually of his goodneſſe towards vs, to put our truſt therin, and to flee therunto for our refuge in the name of our Lord Ieſus Christ. And ſo let vs alſay Almiſtige, &c.

The cxj. Sermon, which is the firſt vpon the. xxxj. Chapter.

- I Haue made a couenant vwith myne eyes: And haue I looked vpon a mayd?
2. And vwhat is the portion of God from aboue, and the inheritance of the almighty of heaſe?
  3. Is there not a cutting off for the vnrightruouſe, and confuzion for ſuſh as conſpire (or praetize) vwickedneſſe?
  4. Doeth not he behold my vways, doeth not he count all my ſteppes?

Ee haue seene already heretofore howe Job protested, that he was no such man as his friends, would haue made him beleue: for they were of opiniō that he was a reprobate afore God. Therefore he declared that he had liued holyly and vprightly: now he returneth againe to the same matter, and not without cause. For it was a grieuous temptation that men shoulde take him to be an hypocrite, notwithstanding that he had walked in vprightnesse of heart and playne meening before God. And furthermore he had had no regard of his owne reputatiō, nor what men thought of him: for God knew him. True it is that he ought not to haue thought it straunge that he shoulde be afflicted of Gods hande, although he had liued as wee see here: but yet was it good that he knewe the ende and cause why God visited him so. But we shall see this more fully in the winding vp of the Chapter. Nowe let vs looke to that which is contayned here: which is, that Job intendeth to declare, that he hath serued God faithfully, and that his induring of so grieuous and excessiue miseries, is not for any offence that he had comitted, but for some other secrete reason knowne vnto God, which men can neyther know nor discerne. First he giueth record of his soundnesse when he sayeth, that he made a couenant with his eyes not to caste any vnchaste looke vpon any mayde living. And it is a signe of great and as it were Angelicall perfection in man, if he be able to protest that he hath not bene prouoked vnto euill.
For it may well be that a man shall haue some sodayne & 30 fleeting temptation, and yet notwithstanding not consent therewto, but rather shake it off and hate it. And truly it were a great vertue, if a man could haue all his witts so sound and vnattaynted of any corruption, as he could neuer be inticed. But Job passeth beyond this. And for the better vnderstanding hereof, let vs marke that there are three degrees of faultinesse ere sinne haue his full shape: I meane, euen although the sinne come not to actuall doing. VVhen S.Iames speaketh of sinne, he vseth the simi-litude of childebearing. For he sayeth, that lust conceyueth, and afterward bringeth forth sinne, & that the sinne is accomplished when it commeth into the actuall deede by executing of the thing. But I say there are three degrees of faultinesse in a sinne although it come not to the outwarde deede. The firste is a fleeting imagination or thought which a man conceyuth by the beholding of any thing: for therewpon some one toy or other will come in his head. Or else although he see nothing, yet notwithstanding his minde is so tickle vnto euill, as it carrieth him here and there, and maketh many fancies to runne in his head. And out of doubt the same is a faultinesse, but yet is not that imputed vnto vs for sinne. The second degree is, that vpon the conceyuing of such a fancie we be som-what tickled, and feele that our wil swayeth that way, and although there be no consent or agreeyng vnto it: yet notwithstanding there is some inwarde pricking to prouoke vs vnto it. Nowe that is a wicked sinne and as it were already conceyued: afterwarde followeth consent when wee settle our will vpon it, so as there is no let in vs for the performance of the euill, but the wante of occasioand oportunitie: there yee see the third degree, and then is the sinne fully shapen in vs, although there be no out-warde deede at all. And this is well woorthy to be noted: For although it may seeme a harde matter, yet notwithstanding there is neither man nor woman but he findeth the thing that I speake of, and hath experience of it from day to day. As for example, when we be afflicted it will come in our imagination to thinke, doth God minde vs?

There is noman that can holde himselfe from such conceytes. For our nature is so corrupted and inclined vnto euill, as it is vnpossible that wee shoulde not haue such conceyts. And surely it is already a fault, when such a thing doth but come in their minde, notwithstanding that wee chace it away and thinke thus with our selues: how nowe? I like not of this: it is a blasphemie to thinke that God pitith not such as call vpon him, or that he will not succour such as seeke him: it is all one as if we would 10 denie that he gouerned the world. Therefore whensoeuer such things come in our thought, surely it is a faulfe, and it behoueth vs to conclude, alas Lord, wretched creatures are we and full of vanitie, sith wee can conceyue so monstruous thoughts. The second poynt is, that when aduersitie presseth vs, and our grieve increaceth more and more, wee fall to such murmurings as this: Alas, should I linger after this sorte if God thought vpon me? would he not haue a care to helpe mee? he doth it not, but dissembleth, and therefore it seemeth that he hath quite gi-uen me vp. VVhen we conceyue such thoughts, and debate with our selues whither God hath a care of vs or no:
then it behoueth vs to consider what a one he hath declared himselfe to be towards vs, and to receyue his promises, and to ground our selues vpon them, to say, no, how-soever the worlde go, yet will I trust in my God, and flee to him for refuge. Howbeit although we finally attayne to this assurance and vndoubtednesse: yet notwithstanding if we waue and doubt before we come therewnto, it is a greater faulfe than the first, and we are already guiltie of mistrust and vnbelief before God, because we haue receyued so wicked a temptation. Lastly commineth the third degree, when we be vtterly ouerthrowne and know not what to say, but only after this sort: See my miserie hath gotten the vpper hande, and God hath forflowed to long to reach me his hand: I see I am quite paste hope of recouerie. VVhen we be so cast downe as we can nomore call vpon God, nor take tast of his promises to rest vpon them and to comfort our selues with them: that is the third degree of sinne. For like as when a childe is ful shaped in the Mothers wombe, there remaineth no more but that it shoulde be borne, so in this case there wanteth no-more but the comming of it into the outwarde deede.
But now let vs come to Iobs woordes, I haue made a league (sayeth he) or couenant with myne eyes. I haue tolde you that this is a token of great perfection. And why? For if a man can withhold his sight, so as he conceyue not any thing that might drawe him vnto euill by looking aboue him, and shewe that there is true chastitie and honesty in him: It must needes be sayd that he is cleere as an Angell from all corruption. And Jobs protesting hereof is not in vayne: wherefore lette vs consider that he liued in this worlde as an Angeli of God. True it is that of nature he was not so: and also whereas he sayth that he made a couenant: that was done after he had so profited in the feare of God, as he had thrust his vnruley lustes vnder foote, and so ouermastered his affections, as he was able to bridle them and keepe them vnder to say, I will not lust any euill to couet it or wishe it, I wil haue no vayne in me that shall tende to the displeasure of God, but I will 60 bridle my selfe both in myne eyes, and in my mouth, and in mine ears. Thus ye see in what wise Job made his couenant. It was not by hauing such a soundnesse in his nature: for he was a man subiect to affections as we be: and no doubt but he had many temptations in his life. Howbeit he walked in such wise, as he was so inured with the feare of God, as not to admit any wicked lustes. Then was it become an habite (as menne terme it:) that is too say, he was so inured vnto it, as he was no more wauering to starte out on the one side or the other, or to prouoke himself to this or that : To be short, we see here how Job met to declare, that he not only indeuered, to serue God : but also had inforced himself in such wise to it, as he had tamed and subdued all the affections of his flesh : insomuch that it was nomore Payne to him to serue God, because he had not the battayles which we haue in vs by reason of our fraylity, yea & by reason of the corruptiō that is in our nature. But let vs marke that this came not of his owne power, neither could he of himself haue purchased such perfectiō: but it behoued god to reforme him in such wise by his holy spirit, as he was after a sorte separated frō the comon range of men. For it is not without cause that David maketh this request vnto God : Lord turne away mine eies that they may see no vanitie. If Job had of himself had the things which he protesteth here: no doubt but David might haue obtained such a stedfastnesse as well as he, so as he shold not haue cōceyued any vanitie, nor had his eyes misseled & caried away by any meanes. But forasmuch as David confesseth that he neither had it nor could obtaine it but by the meere grace of God : it followeth therfore that Job could not thorough his owne free will, make such a couenant as to say, that reason beareth such sway in him as he could ouermaster all his affections: but he meeneth here to yeeld God the prayse of that benefit. Then doth he not vaunt and magnifie himself, as though he had purchased such a grace by his own trauell : but he acknowledgeth that god had so gouerned him, as his eyesight did not prouoke him any more vnto euill. Furthermore when Job speaketh so, let vs marke that on the other side he doth vs to vnderstand, that if a man behold a wife or a mayde, and thereby be tempted vnto euill : it is sinne already before God, yea although there be no outwarde acte, nor any putting forth of a mans selfe to deflowre or to beguile the woman, nor any will at all to consent in a mans selfe to wish it. Then although a man haue not that intent with him, but resist the sayd temptation wherwith he is prouoked : yet notwithstanding he fayleth not to offend God. And there is not a poynt better worthy to be marked than this. Verely wee haere the sentence which

Math. 5. d. 28. our Lord Iesus Christ giueth vpon it : namely that wee must not thinke our selues to be cleere & discharged before God, by absteyning frō whoredome in respect of the body : but that if a man do but looke vpō a woman with an vnchaste looke, he is already condemned for a whoremonger before God. And moreouer (as I haue sayd alreadie) although our will consent not vnto it, yet muste wee confesse that we haue done amisse before God, so that we must humble our selues. The Papists can wel ynough say, that if a man consent vnto euill, (that is to say, if he lust after it in such wise as he would fayne do it if occasion serued) they graunt that such a consent is a damnable sinne. But if a man haue an euill liking, so he consent not thoroughly to it, the Papists say it is no sinne at all: and that is a horrible blasphemie. It is sayd thou shalt loue thy Lord thy God with all thy hart, & with all thy strength. VVhat is ment by minde & strength ? God hath not limited the loue that we owe vnto him, that it should be only in our harts & mindes : but he sayd that our wit, reason and vnderstanding, & all our strength, (that is to say, al the abilities & powers that are in our nature,) must also be thorowly applied thervnto. Now then if a man cōceyue any euil, although he consent not to it nor yelde his affection fully thervnto, I pray you doth he loue God with al his mind? No : if a man haue never so litle a peice of himself inclining to corruptiō, although with all the rest he indeuer himself to accomplish the lawe : doth he loue God as he ought to do? No vndoubtedly : for sinne is nothing els but a transgressing of Gods lawe. Therefore let vs conclude, that all the vayne thoughts which prouoke vs vnto euill, are sinne : and that wee are guiltie of them too. Godward : vñlesse he beare with vs of his infinite goodnesse. But he forgiueth them to those that are his. Neverthelesse it behoueth them to acknowledge it for sinne: and whosoeuer doth flatter himselfe, doth but prouoke Gods wrath, and couer the mischiefe to his owne damnation. For in the ende his hypocrise muste be discouered and layd open to be punished with all the rest. They then which imagine that they do not amisse nor offend God when they be tempted to euill, gayne nothing by it, nother do they amende their market : for needes muste that hypocrise of theirs be grieuously punished. VVherefore (as I sayde afore) although wee consent not to euill, but onely bee as it were tickled with it, and have some liking of it, howbeit that wee withstand it : It is already a fault and oversight in vs. If wee do but conceyue suche euill liking, it already bewrayeth the corruptnesse of our nature. And surely if euill dwelled not in vs and that wee were not already turned away from the soundnesse and cleerenesse which God had put in the first man : out of all doubt wee should haue our eyelight much more pure and chaste than it is, and all our senses, as our hearing, our speaking and all the reste should bee so pure and cleane, as they shoulde haue no stayne in them. And for prouse hereof, let vs consider well how Moyses sayeth, that when Gen. 3. 1. 6. Satan came too beguyle Eue, and consequently hir husbande : after that they had giuen eare vnto him, and bene corrupted with desirousnesse to be like vnto God : they looked vpon the Tree of the knowledge of good and euill, and sawe it was to bee liked for the obtainyng of knowledge. And howe looked they vpon it? had not Gen. 2. 16. 17. Adam and Eue seene it already before? for God had sayd vnto them, eare not of the fruyte that I have forbidden you. For in what houre souer you eate thereof, I tell you plainly you are separated frō me & condēned to death. So then yee see that Adam and Eue had looked vpon the Tree before : and why then doth Moses laye it nowe too their charge as a sinne : because they did beholde it with a liking of it, that is to say, with an vngratious and vntowarde luste, in that they thought it good to eate of. And whereof came that? euen of their heart, which being corrupted, did immediatly marre their eyesight. And like as when a man hath his eyesight marred with overmuch drinking, there is some inwarde disease and some burning, or some other vncōme going before the losse of his eyes: or like as when a man becommeth blinde, there went comonly some rewme or some other like thing before, which in processe of time taketh away his sight : eue so is it with all the wicked looks which are to bee condemned. For if the heart were not already infected and corrupted with some lewde liking: the eye (as I sayde) should be pure and cleane of himself, so as we might beholde Gods creatures and not bee tempted too any wickednesse. But for asmuch as wee cannot as now open our eyes, but wee shall conceyue some wicked luste : nor can say, this is fayre or that is good, but immediatly wee offend God : is it not a great vntowardnesse? So then let vs know that the cause thereof is the reynging of sinne in vs, which doubtlesse hath hilde such possession of vs euer since Adams fall, that our nature is so corrupted as we cannot loke vpon any thing that is termed fayre and bewtiful, but that in steade of being prouoked to loue God and to praise him for his goodnesse, and for bestowing of so many benefites vpon vs : we offend him. And so in steade of glorifying God, and of being prouoked to loue him: we cannot commend any thing to be fayre and good, good, but therewithall our cōcye is tickled, yea and stirred vp, either to couetousnesse, or to whoredome, or to voluptuousnesse. To be short, looke whatsoeuer is fayre or good vnder heauē : the same turneth vs away frō our God, whereas it ought to leade vs vnto him. Is not God the welspring of all beuty and goodnessse ? yes : and surely the sayd wicked lust neither reigneth nor ought to reigne in the childrē of God : but I speake of that which is naturally in mā, vntil such time as God haue wrought in him : true it is that the faythfull shall not be so peruerted, nor haue their wittes so corrupted, as to draw alwayes vnto euill : but yet shal they alwayes haue some remnant of the sayd infection that they bring out of their mothers wōbe : which is, that they shall alwayes haue some inwardē p̄c̄ kings to moue them vnto euil, notwithstanding that they hate it & beatē it downe at the first rising vp. And in good fayth (as I sayd) which of vs cōcyeueth not this fancy, that God hath no care of him, so soone as we indure any aduersitie ? and behold, it is a blasphemie, yea and a cursed blasphemie if we consent vnto it, and that our minde do rest neuer so litle vpon it, notwithstanding that our will do not fully purpoſe it. Now then we see that if a man be tempted to euill, although he cōsent nor vnto it, but suppreſſe it and fight againſt it : yet notwithstanding he fayleth not to offend God. And why ? for it is a transgrefſing of his law, as I haue shewed you already. Also it cānot but proceede frō an euill fountainay : for the eye of it ſelf ſhuld not be corrupted, neither doth ſinne begin to come first frō thence. VVhence then ? frō the riinde and ſoule of man : for doubtleſſe the euill muſt needs be conceyued first within, before the eye do tende ſo vnto euill, and be prouoked therenvto. And ſo ye ſee the cauſe why I ſayd, that Job in protesting that he abſteyned from all euil and vncihaft lookes, ſheweth vs that ſuch as are infected therewith, cannot cleere themſelues before God, but that there hath bene ſome faultinesſe in them. VVherfore let vs leare to ſtande vpon our garde, and not to flatter our ſelues as I haue touched already. I ſay let vs ſtād vpon our garde : for how harde a matter is it I pray you to rule our eyes in ſuch wife, as they ſhall not be tempted with any euill concupiſcence or diſorderd lust ? or not be touched with couetousnesse, when wee ſee the goods of this world ? or not be moued to long for thoſe things which God giueth vs not, when wee ſee the eaſe, delights and pleaſures that are every where ? or not be stayned with lecherousnesse, ambition, couetousnesse or any other temptation, when we ſee them on all ſides ? It is imposſible to be done at all, or at leaſtwife without great diſſicultie : for it ſurmounteth all our power : in ſomuch as it is in manner imposſible for vs to opē our eyes, without cōcyeuing ſome offence againgſt God. Seing it is ſo, let vs leare to keepe good watch : for we cannot rule our ſelues in ſuch wife as to be vterly faultleſſe, & to haue no neede to flee to the forgiuenesse of our ſinnes: wherfore let vs cōclude, that it behoueth vs to fight valiantly, conſidering that we are ſo corrupted as we cānot by any means vſe our ſenſes or apply them to any thing, but there ſhal be ſome rēnant of our wicked corruption in it, which God miſliketh. This then is a thing that ought to prouoke vs vnto heedfulneſſe. And ſecondly let vs leare also to hūble our ſelues, ſeing that the Diuell laboureth to rocke vs a ſleepe in hypocriſie, to the end we ſhould not know our faultes, & ſo make them worse & worse. Therfore let vs enter into our ſelues, and after we haue examined our imperfections, let vs criue out before God: alas Lord, thou haſt giuē me thy grace to go forward in thy ſeruice, I do my indeuour, I inforce my ſelfe, I refiſt all my paſſiōs, and I fight againſt my ſelfe, and yet am I not righteous before thee, but there is much amisse in me ſtil. Lo how the faythfull after much paines taking and inforçing of their ſelues about all their ſtrength, ought alwayes to be of this minde to condemne themſelues when there ſhall be any faultinesſe mingled with the good which God graūeth them to do, & leare to yeeld themſelues guilty before him, and to hūble themſelues, to the end they may obtaine grace. These then are the points which wee haue to marke in this ſtreyne. But howſoeuer the world go, althoſh we haue many fancies running in our heads night and day, and therby perceyue that there is a maruellous corruption in our nature : yet muſt we not be out of hart, but marche on ſtill forwarde, praying God that as he hath begonne to ſet vs forth, ſo he wil continue to make vs more forward, and increase in vs the ſtrength of hiſ holy ſpirit. And let vs beſeech him, that if we haue but one ſoore already vpon our wicked affections, we may ſet both vpon the, that we may ſo irade them downe, as they may neuer rise againe : and that when the Diuell commeth to tempt and prouoke vs vnto euill, he may not bring it to paſſe, but that our wittes may alwayes ouer reach him : and (to be ſhort) that Gods ſpirit may ſo reigne in our hearts, that althoſh there be wicked affections there, yet they may be ſo bridlede and fettered, as they may not lift vp themſelues nor tolle vs hiſther and thiſher, but that wee may alwayes stand at a ſtay, and bee fully reſolute to ſay : It is meete that our God ſhoulde gouerne vs, and that wee ſhould folowe his holy will. Yee ſee then how that in the niideſt of our wicked thoughts, it behoueth vs to take corage to walke on ſtill in goodneſſe, affiuring our ſelues that our good God will beare with vs, not that we ſhould not confesse them to be ſinnes, but that he is contented to pardon them. And as touching this preſent matter, the point wherein we differ from the Papists is this. The Papists ſay that wicked lustes are no ſinnes, ſo a man refiſteth them : but that is a cursed blaſphemie. For were it ſo, God ſhould be fayne to renounce himſelfe and to repeale his whole law. And this is not a ſleeting opinion conceyued onely by the ſimple and ignorant people, but it is a grounded determinatiō agreed vpon by the great doſtors in their ſchooles, or rather in their diueliſh Synagoges. But contrarywiſe wee ſay, they be altogether ſinnes, howbeit they are not imputed vnto vs at Gods hand, because that of his owne free goodneſſe & mercie, he wipereth them out for our Lord Iefus Christs ſake, in whom wee beleeue. And ſeing wee haue ſuſh a conforſte, wee ought to inforce our ſelues ſo much the more, as I haue ſayd already. Furthermore Job ſheweth well, that he knew he had offendē, & bene blame worthy if he had had an vncihaft looke. For he addeth, what is the portion of God from aboue ? what is the beritage of the Almighty of heauen. Job ſheweth here, that his ſpeaking is not to vaunt himſelfe afore me, and to purchace himſelfe reputatiō for his vertue & holinesſe, as they do which ſeekē but the praise of this world : but that he hath his eies fastned vpō god, & ſpeaketh as in Gods preſeſce, deſiring him to be his wiſneſſe and iudge. And to that poyn̄t alſo muſt we come. For as hath bene declared heretofore: ſo long as we couet to haue our life allowed of me, we ſhal be ful of leazing, ſtarthingholes, & ſuttle ſhifts, in ſo much that it ſhal make vs to deface white and turne it into black, & contrariwyſe to make vertue of vice. Lo in what taking we be when we indeuour to cōmend our ſelues afore men. And therfore whoſoeuer deſireth to walke vprightly, & to haue this ſoundneſſe whereof Job ſpeaketh: doubtleſſe he muſt be fayne to gather in hiſelfe, and not be ledde awaу, to ſay: who is he that can ſpeakē euill of mee ? No: ſuch geere muſte be cut of, and he muſte ſummon hiſelfe before God, too ſay, go to, howe is it with mee ?

It is God with whom I haue to deale. Though I had contented all the men in the world, I were neuer the better. It behoueth vs all to haue our mouthes shet: for God is not contented with goodly countenance and fayre disguisings of outward shewes and other likelyhoodes: he loketh on the heart, he searcheth the thoughts and discouereth all that is hidden in darkenesse. Seing it is so, let vs bryde our selues to walke soundly and vprightly. But on the contrarie parte wee are drawne here and there, we are giuen to devising of shifftes and fayre deckings to colour our doings withall, and when we haue no better stiffe, it

Gen. 3. b.7. is ynough for vs to couer our selues with leaues as our father Adam did. VVherefore let vs marke well the lesson that is shewed here to al the faithfull: which is that when we intend to walke as it becommeth vs, we must not behaue our selues as it were before men, nother muste wee rest our eyes vpon them: but we must beholde the heauenly iudge, and vnderstande that it is he to whom wee must make our answere and yeelde our accompt. Marke that for one poynt. Furthermore(as I haue touched alreadie) Job acknowledgeth here, that God wil not suffer vnchast lookes vnpunished. And why? for they are all of them sinnes: And afterwarde he addeth, that the vnrighteous man shall be cut off. VVherein hee sheweth, that hee which hath given his eyes to vanitie, is condemned for a sinner and a wicked man before God, notwithstanding that he haue not consented fully vnto it. Let vs beare in minde what hath bene sayde concerning Iobs time. For although we know not whither he liued before the lawe, or no; yet notwithstanding he liued afore the Prophets

Ezech. 14. d.14. f.19. times, as wee haue declared in that mencion is made of him as of a man of auncient time. And so ye see that Job was in such time, as God had not yet giuen any large vterraunce of his doctrine: nor suche light as came afterwarde. For the Prophets did greatly enlighten the things that were darke in the law. Job liued afore their time, and therfore had but as it were some litle sparke in respect of the doctrine that was afterward: and yet neuerthelesse he knewe he coulde not be tempted to any euill lust, but he shoud be blame worthy before God. And what shall we be then, who haue the sunne of rightuousnesse shyning vpon vs in the highnoone day? For behold, Iesus Christe with his Gospeli bringeth vs so great light, as we haue no excuse. If wee say, I vnderstande it not, it is to high and profounde a matter: what haue wee not doctrine large ynough, seing that Gods will is shewed vs to the full? How then should wee be excused if wee knewe no more than Job knew? And herein it is to be seene, howe great and horrible Gods vengence is in the Popedome, seing that those beasts durst denie that a man sinneth when he is so tempted vnto euill, and hath suche provocation in him, and conceyuet so euill thoughts, sobeit that he consent not thoroughly to it. But Job who(as I haue declared already) had no doctrine at all in comparison of that wee haue, did neuerthelesse know this well ynough. And therfore let vs looke more neerely to our selues: and seing that God hath graunted vs such grace and priuiledge, as to make his truth much more knowne vnto vs thā it was at that time: let vs be watchfull, and assoone as wee open our eyes and espie any vanitie or euill affection in vs, let vs thinke with our selues, ò there is some euill hidde vnder this, wee haue offended our God, and therefore our eyes are attaynted already, seing that the euill sheweth it self abroade. If there be sparkes, is it not by reason of fire? Therefore wee must learne to condemne our selues: and vndoubtedly if it were not for Gods mercy, we should be ouerwhelmed for it. For that is the portion of our heritage that is prepared for vs frō aboue. True it is that men cannot iustifie vs: but we muste be fayne to appeare before God, who will jadge of the matter farre otherwise. And Job sayth exprely from aboue, from heauen. He repeating of this woerde here is no superfluous speache. And why? For he maketh a couert coparison betweene Gods iudgement, and the opinions that we can purchace afore men. Yee see then that men may iustifie vs in all points, and not knowe our filthinesse and pouertie: by reason whereof we shall be taken for litle Angels, and therevpon thinke that there is nothing amisse in vs: but what haue we gayned by it? Nothing at all: for behold how Job calleth vs vp aboue. Very well: true it is that sinners may perchaunce cleare themselues and easilly be alowed amog men. (For there shall be nothing but vertue to outward appearance) but they muste come vp aloft and there will God ouerthrow all the vayne opinions that haue reigned for a time. And therefore let vs learne, that like as we are blameworthie in that wee haue bene tempted to wicked lustes: so also our hyre is prepared from heauen: that is to say, from aboue, except our good God spare vs and vse his fatherly goodnessse towardes vs. Thus ye see what we haue to beare in minde, to the end we may magnifie the goodnessse of our God in that he punisheth vs not with rigour, and also be prouoked to aske him forgiuenesse of our faultes from day to day. Nowe it is sayd immediatly, is there not a cutting off for the vnrighteous, and a punishment for such as commit crimes? doth not God looke vpon my wayes, and doth he not number all my steppes? Here Job expresseth plainly the porcion and heritage whereof he spake. And it serueth to wound vs the more to the quicke by the feeling of our sinnes. True it is that he standeth not vpon all the things that are spoken of in the law: nother vseth he so many woordes: but yet doth the holy ghoste giue vs here a common lesson by his mouth. For when there is any talke of Gods iudgement, and of the punishment that he sendeth vpon sinners: we are so slow as the same moueth vs not a whit: & therfore our Lord is fayne to waken vs, and to make vs feele better how terrible his wrath is, and that it is a horrible thing to haue it so agaynst vs. Thus ye see why Job addeth the declaration that is contayned here, saying: is there not a cutting off for the vnrighteous: or shall not the wicked man be punished? what is ment by this cutting of? that the wicked deserue to be rooted out, and that God should viterly ouerwhelme them and destroy them, according as the woerde Cutting of importeth more than hyre and heritage. For(as I haue sayd) men beare themselues in hand, that they shal scape with some light punishment: and like as when an offender is kept in prysone and knoweth not that he hath deserued hanging, he beareth himselfe in hand that he shall scape with a whipping, or that he shall be banished: even so (say I) men conceyue not Gods wrath as it is, nether knowe they the punishments which they are worthy of, because they thinke not of the everlasting death. VVe see then how Job, after he had spoken of the portion which is prepared frō aboue for the wicked, doth (not without cause) adde, that there is a cutting of and confuzion to destroy them viterly. And hereby wee knowe, that Gods spirite reproacheth vs of rechlesnesse. If we were attentiuе at the first to know Gods iudgements, or at leastwise to vnderstađ our owne faultes: we should not haue neede of the doubling of his woordes: it were ynough for vs to haue bene warned in one single woerde. But after that the holy Ghost had spoken of the porcion that God prepareth for all the despisers of his lawe: nowe he addeth, a cutting of, because we be as it were brutish, and when a man telleteth vs a thing simply, we conceyue it not, but are possessed with suche dulnesse, as we feele not the strokes strokes of God's hand, though he strike vs hard. And how then shall wee be wounded as wee ought to bee, by the threatnings that he giueth vs : surely if he do but speake, we will not be touched nor cast downe in our selues, seing that we cannot be sufficiently humbled by the blowes of his hand. And so let vs marke well, that our carelesnesse and dulnesse are reproved here. VVherefore let vs wake, seing that God calleth vpon vs so earnestly, and lette vs learne to thinke better vpon our selues. This is it that wee haue to marke in this verse. In conclusion whereas Job addeth, doth not God looke vpon my wayes, and keepe a reckening of all my steppes? Let vs marke well that he applieth the doctrine to himselfe, which he had set downe in generall. For he had sayd, what is the hyre or portion of God from aboue ? what is the heritage of God frō heauen ? Job had spoken so of all men : and now he applieth the same doctrine to his own vse, declaring to what purpose he had spoken so : therfore as often as Gods iudgements come to our remembrance, whether men do tell vs of the, or we our selues reade the: let vs haue the widsome to enter into our selues, and to looke euery one vpon his owne person. For Gods iudgements must not lie as it were buried and never be spoken of : but every man muste make them auayable to himselfe, and put them to his owne particular vse. Ye see then how we haue to marke, that after Job had set downe a generall doctrine, he came by and by to the beholding of his owne person, saying : God sercheth and knoweth my wayes : that is to say, forasmuch as God is iudge of all men, I cannot escape his hande. For doth not God(sayeth he)know all my wayes ? and doth he not keepe a reckening of my steppes ? Thus much concerning the first poynt. And as touching the second, lette vs marke also the stile that Job vseth : which is that God marketh his wayes and steppes, and keepeth a reckening of them. For it serueth to expresse, that God beholdeth them not a loofe, nor onely looketh vpon the things that are apparent to the worlde : but also looketh neerely and narrowly too all our workes, and noteth and marketh everychone of them, and that his sight is not dimme nor vieweth things at randon, but marketh, counteth, and nūbereth all things, so as nothing escapeth him, nether is any thing forgotten with him. Now then (I pray you) haue not we the better cause to consider our wayes and to reckon our owne steppes, when wee see that all is present before God ? what is the cause that we do scarcely know the hundredth part of their sinnes ? yea and some man shall comit one faulte a hundred times in a day, and yet scarce thinke once vpon it : what is the cause hereof ?

It is for that wee thinke not that God watcheth ouer vs, nor that wee are so before his sight so as nothing may bee hidden from him; nor he forget any of all our workes and thoughtes. Therefore lette vs way well the woordes that are cōtayned here : namely that God knoweth our wayes and reckeneth our steppes, that is to say, that the number of them is set downe before him, and that every article thorough out to the last, muste come to account : yee see what they shall gayne which haue cloaked their euill doings with lying and flattering : for all must come to light.
VVhat remayneth then ? To looke more neerely to our selues than we haue bene wont to do, and to watch continually, to the end we be not taken vnwares by the stales that are layd for vs on all sides. And seing we be in daunger of falling into so many vices wherewith our nature is stuffed : let vs examine them well, that wee may be sorie for them, and please guiltie before God : and in mour-Psal.19.b.13
ning for them, lette vs still confesse with Dauid, that it is vnpossible for vs to know all our faults. And therefore let vs pray our good God that when he hath looked vpō the faults and sinnes which wee our selues cannot see : it may please him to blot them out, that by meanes thereof we may not repose the trust of our welfare and saluation in any other thing, than in his receyuing of vs to mercie for our Lord Iesus Christ sake, and also in our hauing of the washing wherewith he hath clensed vs, that is to say, the bloud which he hath shedde for our redemption.

Nowe lette vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, that being displeased with our selues for them, we may learne to hate them and abhorre them more and more, and to followe that which he commaundeth and appoynteth with greater earnestnesse and affection, and therewithall that it may please him so to reforme vs by his holy spirite, as he may reigne quietly in vs, and we be ioyned to him in such perfection, as wee may seeke nothing but to be wholly conformable to his righteousnesse, which thing shall then be accomplished, when he shall haue taken vs out of this corruptible lyfe.
That it may please him to graunt this grace, not &c.

The cxij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the. xxxij. Chapter.

5. If I haue vwalked in leazing, or if my foote haue bene hasty to deceytc.
6. Let God vvey my vworkes in the ballance of Iustice, and let him trie mine vprightnesse.
7. If my steppes haue turned out of the vway : or if my heart haue vwalked after mine eyes : or if any spotte haue cleaved to my handes :
8. Then] let me soyve and letan other man eatethe frute, and let my plantes be rooted vp.

After that Job hath protested that he had liued chastly, in suche sorte as his eyes were not defiled with one euill looke : now he addeth, that he had liued so vprightly among his neighbours, that his foote stepped not aside to deceytc or malice. VVe see then that as now he toucheth another kind of soundnesse besides that which he made mention of yesterday. And he will also lay forth the principall poyntes of mans lyfe by particulars : and not without cause. For it is not ynoch enough for a man to haue absteyned from whoredome, except he be also cleere from theft, guyle, and extortio[n] : for God will not haue the things fundred which he hath set togither. He hath giuen his whole lawe to rule our life : and as he hath forbidden whoredome, so hath he also condemned stealing, lying, extorcion and suche other things. Therefore if a man intend to serue God, it is not ynough for him to be cleere from one sinne, but he must frame his whole lyfe after the Lawe. For(as I sayd afore) it were otherwise a separating of the things which cannot by any meanes be put asunder, without impeachment of Gods righteousnesse. Thus yee see why Job, after he had made protestation of his chaste and cleanlye, addeth, that he had not beguyled any man, and that his foote had not stepped aside at any time vnto leaſing or malice. And this is well worthy to be noted. For one of the principal parties which God requireth in his lawe, is that wee should haue

the sayd vprightnesse, that we walke not into by wayes & suttleties, to drawe our neighbours goods vnto vs : and surely it is a very difficulte vertue, so to do, howbeit that every man is desirous to be counted vpright. For the nature of man is alwayes so giuen vnto hypocrisy, that there is not so much as one woerde to be heard, wherein there is not somewhat amisse : in somuch that when we buy & sell with our neighbours, wee are alwayes disguysing of things to drawe all to our owne profite. Seing then that we perceyue such a roote of deceitfulnesse in vs, we haue so much the more neede to giue our mindes to this vprightnesse & soundnesse, so as we may protest before God, that our life hath not swarued aside vnto leazing. Also there is another reason : that is to witte, that deceytes are worse than open violence : like as he that killeth a man by poysoning, is more faultie than he that slayeth a man with his sword. And why ? For this trayterousnesse of killing a man vnder the colour of making friendship to him, or of making him good cheere : is a very detestable thing, and the crime is vtterly vpardonable. Euen so when a man beguyleth his neighbour by craftiness, and creepeth into his bosome by sutteltie, so as a man cannot beware of him : is it not a signe of a more treacherous nature ? These two reasons therefore ought to teach vs so to follow vprightnesse and soundnesse, as our neighbours may not by any meanes be beguyled by vs. And that is the first thing which wee haue to marke here. Furthermore let vs vnderstād, that truth is a precious thing before God, in so much that he taketh that name vpon him when he intendeth to expresse what a one he is. Needes then must vnto truth & guilefulness be so much the more detestable before him, because they be full contrary to his nature. Also when it is sayd that wee muste be fashioned like vnto the image of God, S.Paule setteth downe true holinesse : as if he shold say, that whereas men are giuen to hypocrisy, and there is nothing but counterfetting in them : to the intent they shold come neerer vnto God, & be brought to his obedience, he printeth his marke vpon them, that he may know them for his children. And then doth this true holinesse reigne in them. But if men be not gouerned by Gods spirit, there reigneth nothing but faynednesse and sinesse in their flesh, that is to say, in their corrupt nature. To be short, let vs learne that if a man walke not soundly, nor go not streight in his busynesse when he dealeth with his neighbours : althoough he had al the other vertues that coulde bee named, they were nothing if he wanted this purenesse before God, would we then haue our life well liked of ? let vs give our mindes wholly to this vprightnesse and soundnesse, that we walke not in guylefulness and vntruth. Furthermore let vs marke also how Job sayeth, let God wey all in the ballaunce of iustice, and let him triue myne vprightnesse. This similitude of the ballance is very notable : for it sheweth vs what maner of iustice we shall haue, and what account we haue to yeelde, and how we may be liked of and allowed : that is to witte, by Gods weying of vs in the ballaunce of iustice. And how is that ? his lawe and will (as he hath declared them vnto vs) are a ballaunce whereby to know whether our workes be good and receyueable. For like as wares are weyed when men sell them by the pounde : euen so also muste our workes be iudged. And how ? By Gods ballaunce. I haue tolde you that this doctrine is very profitable for vs, bycause menne challenge more to themselues than is meete for them, and beare theselues in hand that their workes shall go for good, euen when they gourne themselues after their owne lust, by reason whereof they woulde not that God shold gaynstand any thing that they haue imagined, but they vtterly disanull all his authoritie. It is a wonder that a man shold desire to be master of his owne life, and to be his owne guide, as who shold say that God might commaunde him nothing. True it is that menne woulde bee ashamed to speake so : they will not say, it is in me to gourne my self, I will follow mine own brayne, God shall not meddle with commaunding mee any thing.

Ye see a horrible blasphemie which men will not vitter with their mouth : but what for that ? they that followe their owne opinion which they haue conceyued : I pray you do they not auounce themselues aboue God ? and do they not labour to thrust him downe by bereueing him of all soueraintie, so as he might not commaunde them any more ? if a man do whatsoeuer commeth in his owne head, and whatsoeuer he himselfe deemeth to be good, so as he woud that God shoulde allow it and not bring him any more to obedience to say vnto him, this is euill because God hath forbidden it, or this is good because God hath commaunded it, but followeth his owne liking and imaginatio : doth not such a man go about as it were to set himselfe in Gods roume ? It is therefore a diuelish presumption, and yet notwithstanding it is as common as any thing.

VVherefore lette vs marke well, howe it is sayde in this streyne, that it behoueth vs too come to the ballaunce, and there to receyue iudgement either with vs, or against vs, according as God shall haue tried our workes : namely by the rule of his law, and not by our owne lustes. Men imagine another ballaunce that is very foolishe and grosse : that is to witte, to recompence the faultes which they haue committed before God : and that is the meane whereby satisfactions were brought in into the papacie : and this ballaunce haue they allotted to S.Michaell. For they put mennes good workes into the one ballaunce, and their euill workes into the other : and if a man haue done more good than euill, the Papists are of opinion that he is quite before God. See here an Apes toy which is ouer grosse. For it is written, he that doth these things shall liue in them. God promiseth not lyfe and saluation for accomplishing some one peece of the lawe, but for performing the whole in all respectes. Contrarywise it is sayde : cursed are they that perfourme not all the things that are contayned here. And therefore if wee breake but one article of the lawe, wee are guiltie in the whole, as sayeth Sainet Iames. Thus then (as I haue touched before) it is an ouer doltshe and beastly imagination : to matche good and euill after that sorte one agaynst an other, thinking that there may any exchaunge or recompence be made before God. But as I haue sayd alreadie, this ballaunce is Gods lawe : and thither shall our workes come to be weyed, and looke what is founde conformatable to Gods lawe, shall be taken and allowed for good : like as marchandise that are lawfull are put into the ballaunce, and men pay for them according to their weyght. Euen so also it behoueth vs to come to the lawe of God. It is to no purpose (as I haue sayd alreadie) for men to bring their owne weights and measures, and to desire to haue them credited. For in Cities there is a common beame or ballaunce, and every man shall not haue his owne weights and measures, neither were it reasonable and lawfull so to haue, for then would all go to hauock : And for the preseruation of good pollicie, order, and equitie, there had neede to be one certayne and euen ballaunce for all other to be ruled by. Therefore when men go aboue to make their woorkes good by their owne iudgement and opinion : it is as if they would forge a newe ballaunce : but wee knowe what a falsehood that were. Hee that shall haue falsified the common weights shall shall be condemned, and that iustly: then if a man falsifie the rule of good lyfe, which is more precious before God than all the wayghts in the worlde, hath he not committed a greater cryme than if hee had forged some wares? seeing that eace standeth so, lette vs learne too rule our selues as the Scripture sheweth: that is to witte, let vs in all our workes consider well what God hath appoynted, and lette vs without replying take that for good which he alloweth in his lawe, and reiect all that for euill which hee forbiddeth there. If wee deale after this sorte, there will be none of these foolishe deuotions among vs which reygned in the papacie. For whereof commerh it that menne do so lifte vp themselues, and every one deuile some meanes or other of seruing God, too say, this is good, and I will do such a thing? It is bicause all of them bring false weyghts and false baalaunces. For every man woulde preferre his owne deuice, but God reiecteth and condemneth euery whit of it. Therefore lette vs haue the meekenesse to rule and gouerne our life by the commaundements of God: and then all this desire of hauing sundry meanes to serue God withall, shall bee layd away, and wee shall haue one common certayne and vnfallible rule. And why? For there is but the onely one baalance of iustice, and there is but one onely lawe of God too gouerne vs: and although there bee a difference of estates, yet are wee all called backe to one generall way.

Exod. 20. VVhen he sayth, thou shalt not committe adultrie, thou shalte not steale, thou shalte not lie, nor beare false witnessesse, he sayeth it aswell to the greate as too the small. Then seing our Lorde sendeth aswell Kings as handycraftees menne to this generall rule of lyfe, shewing vs a broade way to the ende wee shoulde not go amisse: wee bee so much the lesse to be excused if wee couet not too holde vs to it, and also labour not to give good example to our neyghbours, and ayde one an other to frame our selues after suche sorte vnto Godwarde, as wee may all of vs obey him, and be fully subiect to him as it becommeth vs. Nowe if men shunne this baalaunce and measure: yet shall they not gayne by it. For it is sayde immediatly, lette God trie myne vprightnesse. VVherein Job sheweth, that it belongeth onely vnto God to iudge whether wee bee good or euill. True it is that hee signifieth two things: the firste is that God will not iudge mennes liues at aventure, but only by his lawe: And the second is that there is no competent judge but he alone, and that although men vsurpe that prerogatiue, yet notwithstanding their opinion shall be ouerthowne, bicause it is but an ouerweening.

VVherefore wee ought to marke well this poynct, that God will iudge our woorkes by the triall of his lawe: and that serueth, firste too beate downe all the vayne trust of hypocrites which bring their pelting trash before God, and will haue him to content himselfe with it. As howe? I haue done this, and I haue done that (say they:) according as wee see howe that when the Papistes haue taken muche payne in their deuotions, they thinke that God is in their debte for it: or else that hee woulde never quite them, vnsesse they brought suche things with them. No no, lette them go aske their wages of him that did sette them a worke: For God disalloweth it euery whit. He affirmeth that he will iudge mens workes by putting them into the baalaunce, that is to say, by examining them after his lawe. Hee will not devise a newe iudgement: But hee hath giuen vs his lawe. And that God is bothe the lawegiuere and also the iudge: are things that go ioyntly togither. Howe do wee thinke that God ought too iudge? According to that whereby menne haue bene taught aforhand, that is to witte, by his lawe. Then is there an agreeableness betweene the lawe which hee hath giuen vs to keepe, and the iudgement that he muste execute. Thus then, as concerning the firste poynct, yee see the hypocrites shall be confounded in their vayne presumption, in that they think their workes shall bee allowed, and yet yeeideno reuerence to Gods lawe, but beare themselues in hand that God shall owe them an ouerplus if their doings be compared together and layde into the ballaunce.

But wee bee warned, that if wee haue indeuered to followe Gods will, and to submitte our selues thereto: then are our workes acceptable vnto God. The worlde will perchance condcmne vs: according as wee see how the Papistes haue no liking of any thing that wee do. And why? Bycause there are not so many gaye pomps and goodly deckings among vs, as there are in their Synagoges. For if a man come into the Churches of the Papistes, hee shall finde them as full of gewgawes as they can be stuffed. And yer in the meane whyle they are but Apes, and they make no reckening of our doings. For to their seeming it were a small matter to come thither to pray vnto God, without the gay ceremonies that glister among them. But what for that? it is ynough for vs that God alloweth vs. And howe? lette vs looke vpon his lawe and vpon the things that he requyreh of vs in the Scripture: for the thing which muste stirre vp the faythfull, and give them courage to serue God according to his will: is that they know howe wee muste not followe any other thing, than that which is agreeable in all respects to the doctrine which wee haue receyued as nowe in the Gospell. The woordre that I haue spoken (sayth he to the Iohn. 12. g. 47.) Iewes) shall iudge you, and not I.

Furthermore lette vs alwayes consider, that it behoeweth vs to come to account before the greate iudge, and that it will not boote vs to haue bene flattered and praysed of menne. For it is sayde, that God will trie. By these woordes he signifieth, that all the trialles that are made as nowe, haue no certayntie nor any stay to rest in, but that God will ouerthrowe all. VVherefore lette vs learne to walke in such wise, as wee may protest before God, that all our laboring and traueling hath bene towards him, that our desire hath bene to be subiect vnto him, and that wee haue euer honored him as our guyde and gouernour: Lo what wee haue too marke in this streyne. And nowe Job addeth consequently, if my foote or pace stepped out of the way, or if my heart haue walked after myne eyes, or if any spotte haue cleaved to my bandes. This is according to the talke which he had concerning his vprightnesse and soundnesse: howbeit hee expresseth the thing yet more, which he had sayd afore. And fiste of all hee protesteth that his foote stepped not out of the way. Verely we cannot liue so perfectly, but we must make many false steppes, and oftentimes swarue to and fro, though it be but through oversight and fraytie. But here Job declarerh that he steppeth not out of the way: and he vserh the similitude of way (as the Scripture is wont to do:) and it serueth to drawe vs the better to the obeying of God. VVhen as Gods lawe is called a way: I pray you ought it not to be as a spurre to pricke vs forward to walke as God hath ordeyned: and ought it not also to be a bridle to hold vs in subiectioun? if we haue occasion to go to any place, do we not desire to keepe the best way: yea and the shordest, easiest and certaynest? And if any man beguyle vs: are wee not very angry with him for it? And if wee stray, doth it not grieue vs: In somuch that every step weirh vs, and wee thinke we haue a clogge of leade at our heeles, whē we know not whether we be right or whether we go out of our way: Seeing then that men are so carefull

to know the right way in their trauayling, that they may come wel to their iourneyes end : is it not great pitie that in the way of our life, wee are willing to go astray, and seeme to be desirous of it? for we are not only negligent of inquiring to the intent wee might not starte aside nor steppe out of the way : but also when the way is before our eyes, so as God pointeth it out with his finger, & calleth vs thither, incoraging vs to follow him and warning vs to turne nother to the right hand nor to the left, but to keepe on the hie way as he sheweth it vs : we are not willing to take heede to it . And the cause why the Scripture vieth this similitude of a way, is to shewe vs that if wee misse of our way, our ignorāce cānot excuse vs. And why? For God hath shewed vs his will : and if we obey him, it is a good and infallible way, we cannot steppe aside nor run astray like wandring vacaboundes. Contrarywise, they that cannot conforme themselues to God and to his lawe and his woorde, may well runne and gad, and trudge vp and downe as the Prophet Esay sayth : But that shalbe to tyre their legges, and yet not further their way a whit. Then like as the woorde ballance which Job hath vsed, ought to holde vs in awe so as wee presume not any thing of our owne head, but indeuour to frame our life to the will of God : so also the woorde way ought to teache vs, not to walke as wee thinke good, but to holde vs wholly to that which God ordeyneth. Thus ye see in effect what wee haue to remember in Iobs protestation : that is to wit, not that he never did amisse (for that were impossible for a man though it were but in respect of frayltie & ignorāce as I sayd): but his not turning out of the way, doth vs to wit, that he ran not astray, according as he addeth, saying : If my heart bath followed myne eyes. For hereby he meeneth that he was not so euill minded, as to consent to any of the vanities, which men cōceyue in beholding the things that they like of. For (as I sayd yesterday) all our lookes are as many sparkles to kindle the fire of our lust within vs. For our nature is so foward, as we cannot see any thing that is fayre or good, but wee drawe it to an occasion of offending God. For if a thing be fayre : strayghtwayes we be in loue with it. And how? with a wicked lust. And if it be good : our desire is kindled at it. And in what wise? vnto euill. For asmuch then as men are so lightminded in consenting to their wicked lustes, Job sayeth that his hart folowed not his eyes : howbeit there might seeme to be some contrarietie betweene this maner of speache, and the talke that he had yesterday. VVhy so? I told you that all vnchast lookes that are attaynted with any vice: proceede from the hart, and are a token that the hart is corrupted. And therupon I alledged that which is spoken by Moyses of Adam and Eve : namely that they loked vpon the tree of the knowledge of good and euill, and saw that it was to be liked : and therefore that it could not be, but that there was already some lewde lust within the which perswaded them vnto euill : for the eye of it selfe would not sinne, vnlesse it were prouoked by an euill mind. How then doth Job say here, that his hart folowed not his eyes? But I sayd therewithal yesterday, that when we open our eies, there come many lewde thoughts to our mind. Howbeit that oftentimes we be not tickled with the: for God holdeth vs in awe by his holy spirit. Otherwise it is certayne that we should not only be tempted and prouoked to euill, but wee shoulde also fall and be ouercome out of hād. Then may we perchance cōceyue some euill thought at the first sight, and yet not be ledde away with it by any meanes. That was one poynt. Thereupon also I did sette downe three degrees of faultinesse : the first was when we haue but onely a conceyt : the second when the heart is somewhat moued with it : and the third is when the will is fully resolued and determined vpō it. But now we haue to note, that forasmuch as men are conceyued and borne in sinne, and wholly giuen to corruption : that is the wel-spring frō whence we haue our wicked thoughts. For as soone as we open our eyes, some temptation will step before vs, yea though we sticke not to it but vtterly shake it of, so as we be not a whit moued with it. Though such a thing wāue before mine eyes : yet notwithstanding no part of my hart inclineth therunto, but I do vtterly abhorre it. From whence then commeth this cōceyt? Even of sinne which dwelleth in vs, & wherein we be as good as buried: for if Gods image were the same in vs that it was in our father Adam at the beginning : vndoubtedly al our sense (as was declared yesterday) should be pure & cleane without any infectiō, and all our looks should tend to God. So soone as we should looke vpon any creature, the glory of God would vtter it self in it, and we should be led by it to honor him : and to be wholly inflamed with his loue. There wāuld be no vanitie nor disorder : and much lesse would there be any wicked rebelliousnesse : in somuch that we should not see any thing, but it would further vs to goodnessse. Then let vs marke, that all vnchast looks and all other temptations which we cōceyue by meane of our eyes, do spring out of the sayd fountayne of originall sinne, that is to say, out of the sayd corruption which wee draw from our father Adam, and from the fowardnesse of our nature in asmuch as wee be alienated from God. Now then we see that these two things may wel stand together : namely that a man should be tempted to euill by the wickednesse of his heart, and yet notwithstanding that the conceite which cometh of the eyefight, should be before the affection of the hart. And howe is that? I haue told you already, that our eyefight is a tempting of vs to follow the wicked lustes of our hart, when the euill is already conceyued within. Ye see then that sinne goeth foremost: and so it must needes be concluded, that if the hart were not infected with corruption, our eyes should bee cleene. It is true : but yet for all that, it is true also that we are sometimes tempted without any inward affectiō: like as Iesus Christ himselfe was often tempted, and yet notwithstanding had not any vncleanesse in him: but was Mar.1.b.13. tempted after such manner, as a sound nature might be : Luk.4. 4.2. he had outward sightes, but his will continued stedfast in Hebr. 2. d. goodnessse, for there was no corruptnesse at all in his sens- 18. & 4.d. es. But it is otherwise with vs : for all our sensē are corrupted by reason of sinne. Neuerthelesse there may be some corruptiō in our senses, and yet our will shall abide sound still, according as was declared yesterday by the distinction that I did set downe then, and which I repeated even now, If this be to darke, I will treate of it yet againe a little playnelier: if we be tempted with hautinessse when we lift our eyes to heaven : or if we be tempted with covetousnesse when we looke vpō the goods of this world : so as we desire to haue this or that : saying, I would such a house were mine, I would I were owner of somuch medowe or of so many Vineyardes : or if wee see any other things, and be stricken with any covetousnesse : if our hart incline that way, so as we haue any inward desire, or feele any burning within vs : and that it be not lōg of vs that wee haue not the thing which our liking lusteth for : then doth our hart walke after our eyes: that is to say, our hart hauing cōceiued a misse thought by reasō of the eyefight thorough the corruption of originall sinne, hath followed it : that is to say, hath yeedled to a motion which was contrarie to Gods lawe : and we haue not bridelē our affections in such wise, but that somewhat hath stirred vs vp vnto euill. But if wee haue the conceyte to say, this is fayre : and yet notwithstanding do stoppe there : or else do or else do say this thing is to be liked, and yet therewithall haue such stay of ourselues, as to say also, It is meete for me to be contented with that which God hath giuen me: I say if our heart abyde settled there, and be not shakē, nor tossed, nor pricked and prouoked, but stand stedfast in our contention and pouertie : then doo our bodily senses make vs to conceyue some euill thought, and yet notwithstanding, the hart is settled without mouing. To be short, our eies may perchance wander, and be excessiue in gasings about, which are to bee condemned because they proceed of original sin. But God imputeth it not vnto vs as I haue sayd. Furthermore, wheras Job saith here, that his hart walked not after his eyes: we haue to marke therevpon, that oure eyes which were created to looke vpon Gods workes, to the end we might be taught to loue, reuerence and feare him: are become as it were the baudes of Satan, and are as it were inticers, whiche come to beguile vs and worke our destruction. God I say hath created our eyes. To what ende? To the ende that whiles we be in this worlde, we should haue abilitie to discerne betwene things, and that the same might lead vs vnto him. VVhether we looke vpward or downward, do we not see that our lord calleth vs to himself? Are not all the creatures both in heauen and earth, meanes to allure vs to come vnto God? Then doth he not onely say come vnto mee: but also hee draweth vs thither by his goodnesse, according as we see how he sheweth himselfe liberall towards vs: and therin also ministrēt occasion to vs to walke in his feare. Thus ye see to what end our eies were made. For if we had no eies, we shuld not haue such meanes to behold Gods glory in all poyntes as we haue. But we are so froward, that we vse our eyes cleane contrary to the will of God. For (as I haue said) our eies dazel vs, and deceyue vs: and as oft as they open, it is to hale vs away and to make vs run astray, to the end we should become like brute beasts, full of wilde and vnruyl lusts. And besides that, they are as two firebrondes to set vs on fire. VVheras they ought to receiue gods glorie to transform vs therunto, they receyue Satans firebronds too kindle all our affections, to the intent our whole desire might be to offend our God, and to aduaunce our selues against him. Thus ye see a poynct which we ought to marke wel, to the end that every one of vs might beware. And furthermore forasmuch as wee cannot be vtterly discharged of our frailtie and corruption, but that our eies will be wandring and drawe vs away, and there will euer be some sodaine conceytes to allure vs vnto euill: let vs at leastwise bridle our heartes, and let not our affections bee gadding wyth our eyes, to make vs stray from the way aforesayde, but let vs learne to holde our selues vnder the obedience of God in all subiection and feare. In the ende he addeth, that if he had any spotte cleaing too bis handes. This is yet one other similitude, whereby hee meeneth too declare yet better the vprightnesse of his life. For like as wee handle things with our handes: so also when wee haue to deale wyth men, all things that we deale wyth, doo as it were passe through our handes, and are handled by vs. Job then meeneth that in his assayres and dealings with men, hee was never stayned with anye craftinesse, violence, corruption or such other things. And surely that was a great vprightnesse. Neuerthelesse wee muste alwayes marke, that Job speaketh not of himself in way of boasting, but rather the holy Ghost intendeth heere to giue vs a myrrour of perfection, too the ende that when we knowe there is any spotte in vs, we shoulde assure our selues that God calleth and summoneth vs too oure acount, and that we cannot escape vnpunished. For by and by there is a curse added: let me sōwe (sayth Job) and let an other man eate, and let my plants be plucked vp, as if he should say, If I haue laboured to inrich my selfe by vnlawfull gaine, let God plucke away all my substance, and let all perishe and go too hauocke. Yee see in effect what is shewed vs heere. Nowe therefore let vs take heede too walke more carefully than we haue done. For men dispatche themselues thereof too lightly. If they haue any meane trade of liuing, and content themselues with it howelsoever they fare: Straight wayes they are rightrūtuous (so thinke they themselues) and there is nothing amisse in them. But yet for all that, we must bee faine to come to the ballance, as I haue touched before. And bycause the lawe of God moueth vs not, the holy ghost addeth one other helpe: which is, that in the example of Job, hee sheweth vs howe oure lyfe ought too bee ruled.

Thus ye see howe by the way we haue to marke, that Job ment not too magnifie himselfe, but to shewe in hys owne example howe we ought to liue. Besides this also, although wee haue indeuered to walke in suchē perfection as we haue brydeled our affections, as our wandering lusts haue haried vs away, as we haue always preſerued every mans right, and as wee haue not vſed anie craft or malice agaynst any man: yet muste wee alwayes hang downe oure heades before God, as wee haue seene heretofore. And if God scourge vs, although it be not for our finnes, but for some other purpose, as namely to humble vs, or to trie our pacience: yet must we cast downe our heades stil, and furthermore acknowledge that wee are alwayes guiltie howelsoever the world go, and that God shall alwayes finde some fault in vs, so as he might iustly reiect our whole life. Thus ye see how we ought to practise this sentence. Neuerthelesse (to be short) it behoueth vs to haue our eyes alwayes fastned to our handes: that is to say, too deale so purely in all things that we take in hande, as our doings may not in any wise be stayned: but it is hard for vs to haue such a purenesse: for looke howe many dealings wee haue to doo with, so many peeces of pitch do passe through our handes. And howe is it possible that we shoulde scape without catching some spot? God therefore must bee faine to worke in that case, and to preserue vs euē after a woorderfull fashion. And it ought to prouoke vs greatly too prayer, when wee see there is such an vncorruptnesse required at our handes, and we drawe cleane backwardes, insomuche that wee are so farre off from beeing cleane, as we perceyue not the spottes and blottes that are in vs. Then remayneth there none other shifte, but to flie to God for refuge, not only to craue forgiuenesse of the faulēs that are past, but also to desire him to guide vs by his holy spirite, and too keepe our handes cleane, so as we may be restrayned fro all craftinesse and malicious dealing in all things that we haue to do with men, whatsoever they be. Moreouer let vs marke well the curse that Job setteth downe heere. For although hee applie it but to his owne person: yet notwithstanding he pronounceth generally what payment is prepared for all those, which defile their handes after that sort, with the wickednesse that they haue deuised against their neighbors. Do the couetous men indeuer to inrich themselues at other mens costes? Is a man so giuen to himself as he passeth for nothing in this worlde, but to grow riche? Let vs not thinke that the same shall indure long: but that at length God will execute the thing which he pronounceth here: that is to wit, that such as haue planted shall not eate of the frute. And in very deede wee see that suche as haue heaped moſte goodes togither: inioy them not, but God bereueſt them of them. And oftentimes a man needes not too forbide them the eating and drinking of the things that they haue gotten. For they themselues are so niggardly, as they dare not cherishe themselues, but pine awaie, and become their owne tormentours. And afterwarde, looke what they had gathered togither in long time with great labour: that doth God plucke and sweepe away: their children make a fayre dispatch of it: and the goodes that were reserued still to bee the last, shall oftentymes make a rope for their children to drawe them to the gallowes. VVee see these iudgements of God before our eyes: and therfore let vs learne to walke vprightly, and not thinke that those which haue gathered most in this world, are happiest. And why? For Gods curse is alwayes at their tayle, and cannot misse those which haue pilled and polled other men of their goodes. VVherefore let vs bethinke vs to be conterited with the little that God shall giue vs, assuring oure selues that if wee walke continually in hys feare, he wilbe a good fosterfather to vs, and never sayle vs, if we deale like children towards him, & vse true loue

Now let vs fal down before the face of our good god, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him so to open our eyes, as we may walk before him, and as it were in his presence, and that seeing he hath shewed himself so familiarly vnto vs by his worde, we also may behold him as he hath declared himselfe there: and that therewithall we may make such a triall of our whole life, as wee may perceyue the wretchednesse that is in vs, and the miseries whervnto we be subiect, and flie vnto the remedie which he hath set forth vntoo vs by his goodnesse, which is too haue recourse vnto his mercie, and to pray him to guide vs in such wise by his holy spirit, that we renoucing all oure wicked affections, may seeke to frame oure selues wholly to his holy wil, and to walke vnder his obeyfance, vntill we be come to the full perfection whervnto it behoueth vs to tende all our life long, and which appeareth alreadie in his Angels. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also, &c.

The cxijj. Sermon, which is the thirde vpon the. xxxij. Chapter.

9. If my heart haue beeene deceyued in any vvoman, or if I haue laid vvaignt at the doore of my neighbour.
10. Let my vvife grinde vnto another man: and let straungers bovy dovvne vpon hir.
11. For that is a loocenesse and an iniquitie to be condemned.
12. It is a fire that deuoureth alto destruetio: yea & which shuld pluck vp the root of my reuenue.
13. If I haue refused the iudgement of my seruant, or of my mayd vvhē they striued agaynst me.
14. VVhat shal I do vvhē god standeth vp? And vvhāt shal I ansvere vvhē he doth visit me?
15. Hath not he that hath made him made me [also] in the vvoimbe? And hath not he fashioned vs in the wombe.

E haue here twoo protestations of Iobs making, which are worthie to be marked. The one is that he had liued so chastly, as he was clere before God frō seeking to abuse any mans wife. And the other is, that he had not bin proud nor cruel to wards such as were his vnderlings: & therwithal had bin so far off frō vaunting himself against his equals, that lokes where he had most power, there he shewed himself most gentle and milde. But it behoueth vs to beare in minde, what hath bin said heretofore: that is to wit, that Iobs protesting to haue walked rightly before God & men, without doing any mā wrong: was not in any one kind alone, but in the whole law of god: according as he layeth forth the things that are conteyned threin, which doing of his ought also to be a special warning vnto vs. For (as I haue shewed before) it is not ynoch enough for vs to indever to discharge our dutie in some one point only, & leave the rest vndone. For God will not haue the things separated and dismembred, which he hath ioyned together in his lawe. VVherefore let vs beare in mind what hath bin set downe heretofore. Now let vs folow the order which Iob keþeth here, & marke how the residue is added. As touching that which he speaketh of aduoutrie: the mening is, that he offendeth himself to suffer the shame of hauing his own wife abandoned to whordome, if hee had sought to abuse any mans wife. Let other men (sayth he) bow downe vpo my wife, and let her suffer that reproch, yea and let me endure it as well as she. If I haue bin led id away, or if I haue layde wayte at my neigbors doore, that is to say, if I haue watched to do him any harme. And afterward he declareth why he abhorred whordom so much. (For saith he) it is a wickednesse, yea & an iniquitie that belongeth vnto judges: that is to say, which is worthie to be condēned. For it is a deuouring fire, and a thing that would pluck vp my welth by the roote. Thus yee see howe Iob continued in chastitie, and gaue not himself to the filthinesse of whordome, because he knew it was a cursed thing, & such an offence as God could not beare with. Now as touching the punishment which he setteth down here, it is the iust reward of whoremasters and aduouterers: that is to wit, that the like shuld be done vnto them, as they haue done vnto others. And not only in this text is mention made of it: but we haue a notable example of it aboue all others in the person of Dauid. For although he were a holy prophete and a king chosen out among all mankind, hauing record that God had founde him according to his owne hart: yet notwithstanding we see what punishment fel vpon him for stepping once aside, and for rauishing another mans wife. For the Prophete Nathan declared Gods curse vnto him, saying: thou hast done this in secrete: but it shalbe payde thee openly, and the sunne shall beare witnesse of it. Dauid had wrought so wilily (as he thought) that his sinne should never haue bene knowne to the world, but he shoulde haue gone clere away, forasmuch as no man did reproche him with it, or mutter of it. But god reuenged his hypocrisie, & told him that although he had done the wickednesse in secret, yet it shoulde come to opē light, & he shoulde be shamed, and his sinnes be knowne to al me. And how: It was a hideous thing that his own son shoulde cause a trūpet to be blown to assemble the people, and there in the open sight of the worlde, put the kings concubines to all villanie. Beholde here an incest agaynst nature: and yet God declareth that this happened not by casualltie. I is It (sayth he) that haue done it. As if he shuld say, let not me loke only at the person of Absolon without going any further. True it is, that men ought to abhorre him for breaking the orde: of nature in that wise, for ouerthrowing al honesty, & for working suche villanie towrdes his father: neuerthelesse I also (sayeth the Lorde) haue wrought in this case, and men muste not think it to haue happened by casualltie or or aduenture, but it is I that haue done it, sayth the Lord. Seeing that God spared not such a Prophete, and a man indued with such excellencie, as he had led his whole life in sound vprightnesse, sauing in his fall with the wife of Vrias: If God I say, vsed such a rigour towrdes Dauid whom he had chosen: how shall he spare the whoremongers that make a continual trade and ordinarie art of abusing other mens wiues, and lie alwayes in wayt to bring their wicked purposes aboue? Muste they not needes feele that there is a Judge in heauen, which will not suffer suche a wickednesse vnpunished? God therefore maketh such reprochfulnesse to return vpon themselues: but yet let them vnderstande, that they receyue a iust payment, and such a one as they haue deserued: and let them learne to humble themselues before God. Furthermore, when they heare it threatned, that if they abuse other mens wiues, their owne wiues also shalbe rauished & defiled, & God wil raise vp whoremongers to execute his iustice: it ought to abate the temptacions of such as haue any feare of god at all. If a man haue any tast of the feare of god, or any reason: surely he wil be hild in awe at the hearing of such a threatening, wherby God warneth him. And therfore let euery man make his profit of this text. And seing that god cannot abide any such locenesse: let vs pray him to gouern vs in such wise, as our wicked affections may be tamed, and this wicked lust may not raigne in vs, no nor haue any place in vs, nor accessse vntoo vs. Marke that for one point. Furthermore, let vs marke also what is added concerning the crime: to the end we think it not straige that god should punish so roughly. For in as much as we alwayes would measure our sins by our own meetyarde, and wee bring a false balancie as was sayde yesterday: wee woulde (if it were possible) finde faulfe with God, and accuse him of ouer great rigour in punishing our faultes. And that is the cause why I sayd, that we must mark wel how lob addeth, that it is an ouer great locenesse, yea and an outrage worthie to bee condemned: it is a burning fire to deuour all things euen to destruction. This doth vs to vnderstand, that we must not iudge of whoredome after the comon opinion of men which make but a sport of it: according as we see how the scoffers iest at it, and many dispisers of God, & heathnisch folk make but a game of it. Men shal heare this diuelish blasphemie, it is but a venial sin: It is to be forgiuen, and such other things: and these things haue not begon of late dayes. And that is the caufe also why S.Paule hauing spoken expresly of whoredome, sayth: My frends, beware ye be not tempted with vain wordes. For by reason of such things the wrath of God cometh vpon the vnbeleuers. Sathan had at that time imbruied the world with such mockeries, that whoredome was not counted so horrible a thing as it ought too be. S.Paule sayth it shalbe to no purpose for men to bable and flatter theselues with such toyes. And why? For gods wrath shal neuerthelesse haue his course: and he hath shewed from time to time, that he cannot beare with whoredome. And truly we ought to mark first of all, what it is to defile our bodies, which ought too bee the temples of the holy ghost. And other sinnes sayth S.Paule ar comitted in such wise, as the soyle and staine of them abideth not so much in the body of man, as the soyle and stain of whoredome doth. For it seemeth that whores & whoremongers would as it were wither their owne bodies, to beare their shame and dishonestie in them before God. If we considered well that by whoredome men do vnhalow the temple of God, and of his holy spirit, and dismember the boodie of our Lorde Iesus Christ: surely we woulde abhorre that sin more than we do. Againe, when aduourrie and whoredome are matched togither, it is a peruerting of all right and equitie among men. If a man rob another man of his goods, he shalbe punished: a theefe shalbe rebuked at all mens hands: he shall bee cried out on, and men will spit in his face: and yet aduourrie is more than a simple robberie. For therein men rob not other men of theyr goods and substance only: but also of their honor, honestie, and all: and they rob not onely those that are borne, but also those that are yet vnfashioned in their mothers wombes. Againe, is not mariage a holy league or couenant, as our Lord nameth it in the scripture? If a man falsifie a couenant that is made in any bargayning, and selling, by conueyng some secrete title or interest to himselfe, or by suborning some false witnesses: it is & ought to be punished. But beholde, the cheefe couenant that can bee in the worlde is broken and falsifyed: Solemne declaration is made of the fayth that the husband oweth to his wife, and the wifetho his husbande: they come into the Church as it were in the presence of God: and they call vpon him to be their judge, if either of them keepe nor the promise that he hath made: and yet notwithstanding, al this commeth to nothing. So then if we considered these things aright: surely whordomes & aduoutries should not be suffered as they are, but euery man woulde abhorre them, yea and there would be none, but he would bridle himself, and become his owne iudge, and holde that determination for a law and rule: and if anie were so wicked as they could not be hild in the feare of God, and in religion: yet notwithstanding they should feare the threatening: and (to be short) it is certaine that men would be more zealous to cutte off such euill from amongst vs. Hereby we see that many which make profession of the Gospel, thinke not awit of that which is told them. And although they do thinke that it is God that speaketh: yet notwithstanding they are not moued with it. And why? For Sathan hath doted them, they are so straught as they haue no reason nor vnderstanding in them. And therfore let vs remember this lesson whiche is conteyned heere. Then whereas it is sayd, that whoredome is a great locenesse, and a wickednesse to be condemned: let euery of vs cite himselfe before Gods iudgement, and take heede to keepe our selues vndefiled. And bycause it is aboue the strength of man so to do: and that it behoueth God to worke in vs, for the subduing of all our wicked lusts: let vs pray him too gouerne vs so by his holy spirite, as wee may abhorre that sinne, and haue alwayes before our eyes the vengeance that is spoken of heere. And although god punish not whormongers & aduoutries after that sort which is set down here: yet let vs assure our selues that he hath diuise meanes to do, so as we cannot escape his hande. If a man haue inueigled an oþer mans wife, and God cause not his owne wife too fall into the like dishonestie (as it may come to passe, that a wicked man shall haue a vertuous wife, and God shall pitie her so, as shee shall be preserued, and not giue over hirselfe vnto euill, though hir husbande be wicked:) yet notwithstanding, let not hir husband therefore thinke he hath made the better market: for God shall well ynough find some other meanes. Let vs vnderstande then, that he hath chasticements inough in his coffers: according as it is sayde in the song of Moyses, that he hath terrible roddes which Deut. 32.c. are vñknowne vnto vs, and which he can bring forth whē soever he thinketh good. Therefore let vs preuent his iudgement, and feare him, and stand in awe of him seeing he sheweth vs the fauour to warne vs afore hand. Againe if we bee yet so retchlesse as not to consider the warning that is giuen vs heere: let vs marke well that the holie Ghost doubleth the sayd threatening, in that he saith that it is a fire which deuoureth all to destruction, and plucketh vþ Mm.ij. bis bis welle by the roote. Needes must men bee worse than brutifh : if this at leastwise do not waken them. For it is not only said, it is a loocenesse, or it is a sin that deserueth to be condemned: but it is a fire that consumeth al things, and goeth euen to the roote : it is an vtter destruction, that suffereth no substance to tarie vnwiped away. Seeing then that we heare that God manaceth vs in suche wise, to the ende we shoulde be afryd of his wrath : Is it nor high time to bethinke our selues nowe or neuer? Furthermore, let vs practise this doctrine after two sortes: that is too witte, let euery of vs profite himselfe by it after the sayde manner, and moreouer also let vs indeuer (as much as in vs lyeth, and euerie man according to his state and calling) to amende the euill amongst the people, and keepe oure selues pure. As touching the fyrt poynt, let euerie of vs looke to himselfe, and keepe good watch ouer all his affections, for feare least he be deceyued. I haue shewed you heretofore, that it is not inough for a man to keepe himselfe from the deede doing: vnlesse he set such a watch ouer his eyes, as he haue not any vnachte looks. For hee that looketh vpon an other mans wife with a wicked desire, is alreadie condemned of whoredome and aduoutrie before God. And what shall become of vs then, if we go to the hart? And what shall become of vs, if we proceed to lying in wayt and to watching to deceyue other mens wiues? So much the more then behoueth it vs to be vigilant in watching ouer our lusts: and forasmuch as they be stubborne, let euery of vs bethinke himselfe, and holde himselfe in awe vnder the fear of god. Also let vs haue an eie to the horrible threatening which God maketh against whoredome, and be zealous to correct it, when we see it raigne amongs vs. For if we beare with it, & nourish it by our negligence, we shall be hild for bawdes and ruffians before God. It is not for any man to excuse himself: for he that is purblinde or beetleblinde in that behalfe, and suffereth whoredome to bee committed, cannot cleare himselfe, but that hee is a bawde before God (as I haue sayde alreadie) and as much as in vs lyeth, wee do but heape vp the fyrewood of Gods wrath. Seeing that the house of a whoremaster must be consumed, and that there is a fire to desuoure all: If we indeuer not on oure behalfe too quench it, and too stoppe whoredomes from hauing their full scope among vs, that they may not bee commonly suffered: The fyre must needes spread through the whole town, & through the whole Countrey: and wee must needes feele Gods curse vnderminding vs till we bee viterly consumed. And forasmuch as here is expresse mention made of Judges: let all such as haue charge and office of punishing sinne, looke wel to themselues. For they shalbe double bawdes, and double ruffians before God, if they suffer whoredome to slip before their eyes, and they themselues couer it, and make no reckening of it, but rather are contented that it shoulde continually haue more scope. Thus yee see what we haue to marke in this text. Furthermore, let vs beware, that we be not onely restrayned by some forced feare, for committing the outwarde act of whoredome: But forsoomuch as God is so gracious vnto vs, as to choose vs to be the temples of his holie spirite, and hath drawne vs to himselfe: let vs pray him to graunt vs the grace to serue him in all purenesse, not only of bodie, but also of minde. And forasmuch as we bee graffed into the bodie of oure Iesu Christ, and that he hath knitte vs into himself as his mebers: let vs beware that we do him not the dishonor, to defile our selues with such filthinesse. Ye see then after what sort the faithfull ought to induce themselues to chastitie, not through a forced feare, but by knowing the grace & honor that god hath done vnto the-

in that it hath pleased him to come vnto them after that sort. Therefore let the desire nothing somuch as to come vnto him by the meanes of our Lorde Iesu Christ. Thus much concerning the protestation that Job maketh here of whoredome. And now let vs come to the fecod protestation which he addeth: which is, that he was so farre off frō taking away of other mens goodes, that he vsed not anie pride or cructie euen towards those that were his vnderlings. Men seruants & maid seruants in those dayes were not as they be now adayes: mē had them not for wadges, so as they were boūd to do no more thā couenāt: but they were bondslauves euen to liue and die with them, & men possessed them as their Asses and Oxen. And this is well worthy to be noted: for although by mans law the master had power of life and death ouer his bondslauve: yet notwithstanding we see how Job delt in that case: that is to say, he restrayned and bridlede himself, because he knew that according to Gods law, those that haue such superioritie must not abuse it, nor play the tyrants to tread reasonable creatures vnder their feete. Therefore wee ought to marke well what the state and condition of seruantes was in that time. For it will make vs knowe the better how great Iobs gentlenesse and vpright dealing was, in not taking libertie to do that whiche the worlde gaue him leaue to do. For he sawe it was not lawfull for him to do it before God. Nowe let vs marke the woordes that hee vseth heere. If I (sayeth hee) haue refused the iudgement of my seruaunt, or of my mayde when they striued agaynst mee. For the wordes stryue whiche he vseth heere, signifieth to quarell or debate, and to be at some variance or pleading. Heere Job meeneth, that althoughe hee might haue stopped the mouthes of his men, & his maydes, & haue loden them with strypes when he had listed, so as none of them shoulde haue durst to quetch agaynst him: yet notwithstanding hee had giuen them leaue to pleade their good case, so that although hee were neuer so angrie, yet if his seruantes had any reasonable excuse, they might freely debate the matter with him, and shew their right, so as he did not oppresse them by force. VVe see then that there was no pride nor cructie in him. And he sheweth therewithall, how he was able to master his affections in such wife, as he coulde be gentle in bearing with his inferiours. For (sayeth hee) hee that made them, made mee also, wee were fashioned all of one. This maye be taken, that we were fashioned all in one wombe, that is too say, wee come all of Adam, and are all of one nature: Howebeit, muste yet extende further. Job then considered two things when he bare so gently with his seruantes. The first is, that wee haue one common creator, & are come al of one God: & also that we are of one nature, insomuche as it is too bee concluded, that all men thought they be of neuer so base degree, (and dispyshed in the worlde) are neuerthelesse our brothers. For he that disdeyneth too acknowledge any man for his brother, must make himselfe an Oxe, or a Lion, or a Beare, or some other wilde beast, and disclaime the Image of God which is imprinted in vs all. Lo heere the two reasons that Job alledged, and therupon hee concludeth, what shal I do when God commeth to visit me? Should be not lift vp binselfe agaynst me? Might I bee able to stande before his face? If hee shoulde call all my life to account, howe coulde I answere, if I haue beene churlishe too my seruantes? Lo heere a text which importeth a very great and profitable doctrine, if so bee that wee can vse it well. For if we ought to be so gentle towardes our inferiours, that when it lieth in our hand to oppresse them, we must of our owne accord bee a lawe, measure, and rule to our selues: how gentlie ought we to bee towardes our equalles?

equalles. For it seemeth that if any man be subiect vnto me, I may vse such authoritie ouer him: as hee shall not speake, but I may do what I list to him: according as we see how men beare themselues in hand, that they may do much more than they may, and if god giue them an inch of authority, they take an ell: so as ther is no ho, nor measure with them. But surely it behoueth vs to spare those that are our inferiors, & aboue whom god hath aduanced vs. And what then must we do, when we haue to deale with our equals or superiors? A maister shalbe condemned before God, if he oppresse his seruant by violence, or if he be so presumptuous and stately, as he cannot abyde that his seruant shal defend himselfe in a good quarel. And what shall become of the seruant if he be stubbornesse against his maister? What shall become of the child that setteth him selfe against his father? or of the subiect that riseth against his Souerain? Surely these things are lesse to bee borne withall. Then see we heere a generall doctrine comon to all men: which is, first that such as are aduanced to any authoritie, must knowe that Gods setting of them in that state, is not to giue them the bridle to vex others, and to trample them vnder their feet: but it behoueth them to refraine themselues alwayes in lowlinesse and mildnesse. Marke that for one point. For the authoritie which is amongst men, ought not to haue such preheminence, that he which serueth, and is of low degree, shal therfore be despised. True it is that a man shal be maister of his owne house, and there is no souereintie so noble as that. And therefore a man woulde looke too haue himselfe onely heard and obeyed in his owne house. Neuerthelesse, we see that a maister hath no such power ouer his men and maydes: but that hee ought too haire the paciently whē any wrong is done them. Then if a man ought to vse such gentlenesse towards his vnderlings in his own house: what ought such to do which haue authoritie of iustice? For they haue no such power as masters haue ouer their seruants. They haue an honorable authoritie & preheminence: but that is not to lord it ouer men, so as others shal be in bondage to them. Nay rather let not kings and princes flatter themselues, neither let them beare themselues in hand that the world is made for the, but rather that they are made for the multitude. Hath not God stablished principalities and kingdoms for the common welfare? It was not to aduance two or three only aboue the rest: no, but it was to the ende there shoulde be some order and state of gouernment among men. And therefore kings and princes ought to beware, that they liue in suche wise ouer their Subiectes, as they misuse them not, nor execute any tyrannie ouer them. For they shall be much lesse excusable, than are the maysters that deale cruelly with their seruants. And much lesse libertie haue they which are called to the state of iustice, and set as Gods officers to yeeld euerie man his right. If such forget themselues, or bee caryed away with pryde, God must needs punishe them more roughly than the maysters that haue done any outrage or wrong to their brethren that serued them. Furthermore, is it so that suche as haue any authoritie ouer others must not exalt themselues? What shall they doo then which are of equall state? Howe ought euerie one of vs to liue with hys neighbour? If a man exalt himselfe, whereas he ought to acknowledge himselfe equall and fellowe like, so as hee playeth the Bull: I pray you muste not such pryde bee tamed? And when a man that hath nothing in him but headie rashnesse, woulde take vpon him such authoritie ouer his neighbours, as hee will not vouchsafe too looke vpon them but askew, and beare himselfe in hand, that all the worlde ought too quake at his looke: shoulde not God set hisarde to suche braueries? So then let vs marke well this streyne. For it serueth not onely too teach mildenesse and gentlenesse vnto maysters, but also and of much more duriē to all men in generall. And therfore as we see that god will haue all inferiors to suffer and endure such as haue authoritie ouer them: It behoueth euerie of vs to looke to his owne state and calling, and to leare to frame oure selues vnto such mildenesse, as neither the maister do oppresse the seruant, nor the seruant striue agaynst his maister, but euery man so discharche his owne duerie, as God may be scrued aboue all. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this streyne. And for too conuict vs the more, if perhaunce wee were so farre out of our wittes, that euerie of vs woulde take vpon him more than belongeth vnto him: let vs marke that when we fall to bee so proude, and become so cruel towarde those that are vnder vs, wee shall not onely bee condemned by the mouth of God, and his Prophetes, but also the verie heathen men muste bee our judges at the last day. I sayde euuen nowe, that by the lawes of man, a maister in those dayes had power of life and death ouer his seruantes. And what sayde the heathen men thereof? It becommeth vs too vse our seruantes as hyrings, that is to say, as folke that we haue taken for wages, and not as though they were our vnderlings. These are their owne wordes. If the vnbelieuers that were at that time had such a regarde of humanite, as it seemed to them that euerie man ought to bridle himselfe: euuen although he had free libertie giuen to do what he listed with his seruants: I pray you what excuse is there for vs, which are inlighned by Gods woerde: if wee haue not suche a consideration at the least? So then let vs marke, that if God aduaunce vs to anie authoritie, it is to trie our modestie. And if hee giue vs men seruantes and mayde seruautes, to bee vnder vs: it is to the ende too inure vs with the humanite and vpright dealing whiche is spoken of heere: and to the ende wee shoulde shewe, that if God haue shewed vs anie speciall fauour: wee ought to thinke our selues behoden to him for it, and by meanes thereof bee prouoked to vse it soberly. And seeing that hee whiche hath all power ouer vs, doth neuerthelesse spare vs: It behoueth vs to followe him willingly as his children, and to resemble him in gentlenesse towarde others.

Cice. I. offic.

Furthermore, when a man will vnder the colour of his authoritie, vaunte himselfe cruelly agaynst others: let vs assure our selues that that power of his is vterly peruerse. Yea (I saye) it is a sygne of an ouer malicious nature, when a man aduaunceth himselfe after that sort, by reason of his credite. Contrarywise, it is certaine that suche as are of a milde and louing nature, will alwayes spare their inferiours. And the more authoritie that God giueth them: the more are they restreyned, yea euuen of their owne accord. For heere is no speaking of the constrainyt that commeth by other men, like those which play the Lyamboundes, and vse all kinde of flatterie, while they are able to doo nothing, and afterwardes overpassee their boundes when they bee aduaunced, shewing themselues to haue no mildenesse in them, but to bee of a slauish nature whiche is counted a villeyous and detestable thing. And this ought to induce vs the more too the mildenesse whiche the holie Ghost commaundeth vs in this streyne. But the chefe thing is, the well bearing away of the two reasons that we haue touched heretofore: that is to witte, that wee haue one maker of whome all of vs do come, and that we are all of one like nature.

Thus ye see what we haue to consider to beat downe all pride and crueltie in vs when wee bee tempted therevnto.

Then if a man haue a householde , and God hath gyuen him menseruants and maydservants, and he is tempeted to vse vnmeasurable rigour agaynst them: let him seeke the remedie that is shewed vs here. As howe? If I handle my seruants cruelly, so as I plucke the bread out of their mouthes, and they dare not eate one morsell, for feare least I shoulde grudge at it: or if I holde them too hard to their labour, and (to be short) if I shew my selfe vnomerciful and churlishe towrdes them: agaynst whom doo I set my selfe? True it is that they bee mine : but therewithall, hath not God created and fashioned them? Haue not both they, and wee, one common mayster in heauen? And that is the reason which Saint Paule al-ledgeth, when he exhorteth maysters to beare with seruaunts. My frendes (sayth hee) although ye haue superioritie ouer them, yet haue you also a mayster in heauen. And suchie as are exalted: ceasse not therefore to be subiectes. For God is aboue them. Therefore let them beare in minde, that they must render account to him that gaue them their seruants. Must they not needes bee restreyned when they haue this consideration with them? For haue wee it of oure selues? By what right come we too the superioritie which euerie of vs hath in his owne behalfe? Is it not a pawnie that God hath put into our handes to keepe? Then ought wee not to be well aduised, that we may vse it according too his will? The heathen men themselues when they (intended to frame kings and princes too conformitie) had skill ynough too say: true it is that kings make themselues feared and redoubted, but yet can they not escape the hande of the heaueny Judge: there is a God aboue them. If this be verified of princes which are in highest superioritie: what shall become of those whiche are in meane authoritie? As of maysters and mistresses? And furthermore, as (I sayde) let vs consider that wee haue all of vs but one maker. And if we can consider that we are all discended of one God: we must needes conclude that whiche is true: namely, that wee cannot oppresse our neighbours, but God must bee offended. Therefore let no man exalt himselfe in vauitie: for (as Salomon sayeth) hee that mocketh the blinde or the poore, despyseth his maker. Nowe there is a poore man, and I despise him, or I put him to some shame: true it is that the wrong is first offered to a mortall man, but yet dooth God stuppe in betwixt vs, and taketh the iniurie as done to himselfe. Thus ye see what Iob, (or rather the holy Ghost) ment to betoken in this streynge, when he sayeth that he which created the mayster, created the servant also. So then when we be touched with any vaine presumption, to set more by our selues than by other men, and too couet such superioritie as euerie man shoulde stoupe before vs, and cast himselfe at our feete, and wee our selues haue our full scope: let vs come to this consideration: saying, yea althoughe I bee a mayster, God hath made my servant, and hath fashioned him as well as mee. VVhen wee thinke after that sort, it will quaile our ouerweening, so as our hautincise shall be repressed. And herewithall also let vs haue the seconde. regarde that is spokē heere: namely, that we bee of one selfesame nature. For it is true that God hath also shaped the brute beastes, trees, and all other things: but hee hath not shaped men after the fashion of brute beastes: For hee hath giuen men vnderstanding, and printed his Image in them. On the other part, I cannot looke vpon another, but I must needs see my selfe as in a looking glasse.

Then seeing that God hath knit such a knot betwixt vs: I pray you dooth not he that goeth about to breake it, cutte off himselfe from mankind? Dooth not hee deserve to be cast vp among Dogges: seeing he acknowledgeth not the nature, which God hath put into vs all? Yes, but what for that? There are verie fewe that thinke on these things. For contrarywise, yee shall see that if a man bee exalted but one finger heighth: hee beareth himselfe in hande that hee is no more of the state of all other men. And therefore so muche the more neede haue wee too marke well this doctrine. For if in those dayes whē there was not yet such a light as there is now: Iob vnderstode, that seeing God is the maker of vs all, and hath set vs all in one ranke: the same ought to correct the prude of men, and to pulldowne all their highe lookes and highe stomackes: I praye you what excuse shall wee haue at this day, when God sheweth himselfe to bee our father? curteous towrdes those ouer whome wee haue superioritie, seeing our Lorde auoucheth them to bee his chil-discharge his dutie according to his calling, and all of vs yeeld honour too the great Lorde and mayster whiche is the common iudge of vs all.

And so let vs fal down before the face of our good god with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to receyue vs to mercie, and therewithall to plucke vs back in such wise to himself, as we may desire nothing but to submit our selues wholly vnto him, and that notwithstanding any authoritie which he giueth awell to one of vs as to another ouer men, yet we may consider that there is one mutuall bond among vs, and one of vs is subiect to another, to the ende to discharge our selues of our dutie, and to walke after such a sort in brotherly vnitie, as we may all of vs with one common accorde and (as it were with one mouth) clayme him to bee our father. 23. For I haue feared the punishment of God, and could not beare his burthen.

Ere Job sheweth what manner of louingnesse he had to succour the poore and needie. He had protested here tofore, that he had not done any man wrong: but here he passeth yet further, namely that pitying the necessarie of such as came to him for succour, hee relieved them of his owne goodes and substance, yea euen without making them to linger for it. VVherein he sheweth himselfe to haue had a willing forwardnesse, that is to say, that he was no sooner requested, but he employed himselfe, and delayed not from day to day, as those do that loue to be hugged by the eare. And this is the cause why he sayth, If I haue disappoynted the poore of bis desire: that is to say, if I succoured not the poore when I sawe him want and needie: or if I haue weryed the eye of the widow. For if we wayte for any thing with a longing, our eye is alwayes vpon it, and when we looke ouer earnestly vpon any thing, oure eyes faynte and dazzle. VVee see then howe jobs meening is, that hee hung not downe his groyne in his bosome (as they say) when poore folkes came to desire his helpe, but succoured them out of hand. Also he addeth that he sawe not men sterue for colde which wanted rayment, but rather delt so with them as their loynes and sides blisst him: that is to say, they felte the fauour whiche hee shewed them, They were warmed with the fleece of my lambes: to be short, hee sayeth, that he bad not eaten his morselles alone, nor deauoured by himselfe the goodes that God had giuen him, but had giuen the widowes and faterlesse part with him, whom (sayth he) I haue brought vp with me as their father. VVherein he doth vs to wir, that hee had beene a fater too the faterlesse. From my mothers womb (sayeth hee) I haue had the widow with mee, I haue taken into mee the poore that needed succour, and I haue never sayled them. And if it be not so, let my shoulders fall out of the socket: that is to say, let me bee dismembred, and let mee fall in peeces like a rotten carren. Let mine arme (sayeth hee) bee thrust out of ioynt, and let the bones of it be broken: Let the worlde see Gods great and horrible curse vpon mee and my bodie, (sayeth hee) if I haue done wrong too those that were feeble, and not able to reuenge themselues: like as if I haue lifted vp my hande agaynst the faterlesse, and although I were able to do them wrong, for any helpe they shoulde haue at mans hande, and that justice might vpholde mee in my wrong: yet notwithstanding, if I haue attempted any suche thing, let mee bee torn in peeces, and rot alive. And that it is so, I was alwayes afraide of Gods scourge, for I was not able to beare his burthen. Herein he declarereth as he hath done heretofore, that it was not the respect of men, or the shame of the worlde, or any other consideration that lifted him from doing euill: but that forasmuch as he saw that God was his iudge, therefore hee walked vprightly. And although he might haue gone unpunished to the worldward, without feare of being pursued by way of iustice or otherwise, and might haue taken libertie too do harme to the meaner sort, by reason of his credite: yet notwithstanding hee alwayes had a consideration too saye: verely, my God I knowe that thy wrath woulde bee terrible vntoo mee, and howe shoule I be able to indure it? To be short, Job sheweth heere, that his absteyning from sinne, was not for feare of punishment, (for he sawe none before his eies) but for conscience sake, which compelled hym to obey God, and to feare hys judgement to come. This is the effect of that which is conteyned heere. And first of all we haue heere one lesson to shewe that wee bee Gods children: which is, that wee must bee pitifull to helpe our neigbors at their need. Almes deedes therefore are commended to vs here. It hath beene tolde you often heretofore, that this worde Almes importeth as much as mercy. Now we see that among other tytles, God chalengeth this unto himselfe, that hee is gentle and mercifull. Then can we not bee his children, neither will hee acknowledge vs for such, except wee labour too followe his example in this behalfe: namely, too bee moued to pitie when wee see any poore folke in aduersitie, and to go about to provide for them, euerie of vs according to his abilitie. True it is, that we may giue all our substance, and yet our doing shall not bee counted a vertue. For before the hand bee opened to giue, it behoueth the hart too bee touched with compassion: But if we haue pitie of those which are in aduersitie: it behoueth vs also to succour them to our power. For (as S. Iames sayth) if I say to a poore man, Ian.2.16. my freend God helpe thee: therby I shew that I haue no loue in me. If I say, it is great pitie of this man, and yet in the meane while labour not too succour him whome I ought to relieve: it is a mockerie, and I am but an hypocrite. That is to say, I see there how God sheweth mee a pitifull case, and it is as much as if God gaue mee occasion too imploy my selfe: and thereby I see that hee calleth mee: and yet in the meane while I make no countenance of it at all. If there were but one deoppe of kindnesse in mee, woulde I not indeuer to helpe such a necessarie for my part?

So then we haue to beare in minde in this text, that the holy ghost exhorteth vs to almes deedes, and that the same consisteth in twoo poyntes: that is to say, in beeing pitifull towrdes our neighbours, when wee see them in aduersitie, and also when wee haue such a pitifull affection as wee seeke the meanes too succour them, and euerie man streyneth himselfe too his power. True it is, that wee cannot steade all the necessities that we see, and therefore a Christian man may well mourne in his heart, without putting his hande to his purse. For it is impossible (euen for them that bee best minded) to helpe at all tymes. And therefore this pitifullnesse shall suffice them, and God accepteth it for an almes deed, as if the poore were nourished and fed by them: And when they haue thys compassion vpon a poore man, it is as great a sacrifice vntoo God, as if hee had giuen and delt dole oute of a full purse. Neuerthelesse, it behoueth vs alwayes too looke that wee deale according too our habilitie, knowing that our Lorde hath made vs Stewardes of hys goodes which hee hath put into our handes, not too the ende that euerie of vs shoulde deuoure them by Alm.iii. himselfe himselfe alone : but that we should communicate them too such as haue neede of them. True it is also that no man can set any certaine stint in this case : and surely when Saint Paule speaketh of it : hee sayeth that God constreyneth vs not as it were of necessarie , but wylle haue vs do it of free deuotion. By the way, let vs beare well in mind, that if the poore do passe before vs, and we see their neede , and keepe oure purses shette, so as we vouchsafe not to succour them : It is a sure signe that we bee as wilde beastes , and that there is not one mite of pitie in vs : and that wee our selues shall one day feele the lyke vnmercifulnesse , if God sende vs anye afflictions : and that although wee bee miserable, yet shall no man bee moued at it , but men shall looke, vpon vs with disdaine, so as we shall bee shaken off , and left vtterly destitute. For it is the measure and wages which God is woont to giue vnto all suche as are hardharted towards their neighbours: according as it is sayde , that hee which is mercilesse, shall haue iudgement withoute mercie . Yea and besides that, men shall bee cruell towardes vs, according to our deserthes : wee must also in the ende appeare before God , who will handle vs wyth all rigour, bycause we haue not followed the goodnesse which is in him, and which he woulde haue to bee oure rule and example. So much the more then behoueth it vs too bee mindedfull of this doctrine which is shewed vs heere : namely that God thinketh it not ynoch that we should not only absteyne from euil doing, and from hurting our neighbours , and from taking away other mens goodes, and substance . True it is, that it is alreadie a kinde of vertue when we can iustly protest that we haue cleane handes, and are not gien too thieuerie, deceytre, and extortione. But yet for all that, let vs not thinke wee are cleare quitte. For if God haue gien vs wherewith to helpe such as haue neede : if wee doo it not, wee bee blameworthie. And why ? For wee haue taken awaye Gods goodes, and put them too another vse than hee ment. If a seruant bee put in trust too receyue his maysters goodes , and his mayster hath appoynted him too giue thus mucche to such a one, and to pay suche an other a summe of money that hee oweth : or if hee haue sett him an ordinarie after what sort hee will haue his goods spent : if the seruant play the niggard , so as one man commeth crying after him, pay mee : and yet hee will not part wyth a penie , and another commeth, saying, your mayster willeth you too giue mee suche a thing, and yet hee will nat let any thing go, and the housholde cryeth oute vpon him for breade, and hee letteþ them sterue for hunger, which labour in his maiesters seruice : I pray you is it tollerable that the seruant shall answere, beholde sir, I haue not touched one mite of your goodes , beholde sir, I haue reserved vnto you all that euer I had ? For the mayster maye say tookis shame : I haue not put my goodes intoo thy hande too that ende. For thou hast done me shame , in that thou hast not bestowed my goodes where I appoynted thee , and nowe must I beare the slander of thy niggardship in pinching that which was none of thine. Nowe when the mayster shall commen with suche a seruant : shall hee not condemne him for wicked ? Likewise God giüeth vs hys goodes, to the intent wee shoulde relieuе oure brothers with them. Nowe if on the contrary part wee bee so strayght laced as there goeth no penie out of our purses, nor one morsell of breade from our table : what shall become of vs ? Is it not a defrauding of them, whom God hath ordeyned to haue part of our substance , and a robbing of God in the thing that hee hath put intoo oure handes ? Then as I sayde afere, let vs learne to be more

mercifull. And although no man can taske vs, too say, thou shalt giue thus niuch : yet neuerthelesse , let euerie man streyne himselfe , and consider his owne abiitie, knowing well that when wee haue done all that wee can doo : yet are wee not discharged. Thus then ye see, that the particular law which euerie man ought to haue: is, that his charitié ought too stretche it selfe farre and wyde, even so farre, as wee may still confesse our selues not too bee sufficiently discharged towrdes the poore. And if wee do all that is possible ( althoogh wee come not too full perfection , ) so it bee not with niggardlynnesse or grudging, but of a free heart too succour such as haue neede : let vs assure our selues that our Lorde accepteth our almesse, as a sacrifice of sweete sauour. yea even though there be some faultinesse in it, and that we do not the tenth part of that which we are bounde to do. Herewithall it behoueth vs to marke the circumstance which is set downe heere, that wee cause not suche too linger as haue neede, (for when we vse such delay, it is a token that wee haue not a free hart to do our neighbors good) and that wee put them not off to another tyme, except it bee vpon good consideration. For it may well bee, that a man maye bee pitifull, and yet notwithstanding inquire of the necessitie of the partie : but that is not the lingring whiche Job meeneth, when hee sayeth, that hee disappoyneted not the poore man of his desire. For heere hee intendeth to expresse the lothnesse that is in niggardes : namely that when a man desireth any relifie of them, and woulde faine drawe a penie outh of their purses, it is too their seeming , as if a man woulde plucke the guttes outh of theyr bellies : And therefore they woulde awayes faine haue some release. They are lyke vnto an yll paymayster : when men come too demaunde their dette, he knoweth well that hee must paye it, yea and that hee is wel able to do it : But it doth him good too bragge with the money in his purse a daye or twaine. Or else they are like a man that is led too hanging: hee delayeth as long as hee can, and when he commeth to the mounting vp of the Ladder, hee falleth too preaching at every steppe : Euen so play these holdfastes when a man commeth to demaunde his dette : it maketh them awayes to shrinke backe : and much more if a man come too aske them almes. But if wee were charitable, surely wee shoulde not haue that lothnesse in vs : wee shoulde not seeke such respites: the poore shoulde not linger outh vs in suche wise , as wee shoulde haue oure eares beaten ever after with their cries : But we woulde indeuer to helpe them presently as much as lay in vs. Ye see then what wee haue too remember in this streyne : namely, that if wee will do almes that is acceptable vnto God, wee must not tarie till we bee importunatly called and cried vpon. But when we see there is neede, we must hie vs to take order presently : like as when wee our selues indure any aduersitie, it seemeth to vs that men shall neuer come time inough to succour vs. And why then deale not we likewise with others ? VVee neede to take none other measure, but that . For it is a true naturall rule, to do vnto others as we woulde bee done vnto. But we are hasty to desire succour, and piteously slow to giue it. Yee see then what the cause is, why wee oughr the better to mark this saying, that Job made not the widow to linger, nor disappoyneted the poore of his desire. And nowe he addeth, that he had not eaten his morsels alone, but had giuen the fatherlesse , and the widow part with him. VVhy so ? For (sayth he) I haue brought vp the widow with me from my mothers wombe , and I haue nourished the fatherlesse as a fether. Heere wee see a woondervfull example of bountifulnesse and liberalitie. For

For heere is no dooing of some little almes deede for a weeke, three, or four: but Job declareth heere: that hee had becne a father to the fatherlesse, and a defender too the wydowes, not onely in helping them, but also in finding them with his goodes and substance. VVhen wee heare this, I pray you ought we not too bee greatly ashamed? VVee can hardly and scarcely finde in our hearts too succour one among an hundred: so as if wee misse a whole score of tymes, yet we thinke our selues well discharged with some lighte almes to some one man: not that we prouide for him as were requisite, but by giuing him some little peice of coyne as we passe by them, as if wee woulde say, go and shifft for thy selfe some otherwher. Is it not a great shame for vs that Job should be giuen vshere for a myrrour, and that in his persone our Lorde should shewe vs our ductie, and yet notwithstanding, we do nothing? But yet that which is conteyned heere, ought too serue to oure learning and instruction. And contrariwise, it serueth to condemne vs, insomuch that there shall neede none other recorde before God, to reproue vs of our beastly crueltie, at leastwise if we followe not that which is shewed vs heere of Job. True it is, that although we haue not this perfection, yet will not God sayle to accept vs as I haue sayde. Insomuch that although our almes deedes bee not such as they ought too bee: yet will God take them in good woorth, so we haue the sayde compassion towardes suche as are in distresse, that we indeuer to do them good, and that our doing of it be with a cheerefull minde. But in the meane while, if we cannot matche Job to the full, shall wee not therefore followe him? Shall we not at leastwise labour aloofe, to fashion our selues after his example? Shall we not go towarde the same marke? VVell then, we be not able to bring vp the fatherlesse, yea and though we haue wherewith, yet our infirmitie holdeth vs backe from employing our selues to the vttermost. But yet at the least wee ought to haue some compassion: let vs doo somewhat, though we do not all. And againe, although we cannot attaine to the marke that Job came vnto: at leastwise let vs trauell towardes it, seeing that God calleth vs. But is it not a greare shame that wee doo nothing at all? or else if we remoue but one legge, we grinde our teeth at it, as these loyterers do, who when they set forwarde one foote, do thinke that they drawe a whole mountaine after them. And again, if they lift vp one arme, they frownce at it, and grinde their teeth: and in stead of putting forwarde, pull backewarde. VVhen we go to worke after that fashion, is it not a token that there is no willingnesse in vs? Therefore if we cannot come to such perfection as Job declareth himselfe to haue had, which thing he declareth not in way of bragging, but to the intent that we should be the more moued: let vs at leastwise follow his example. For God knowing that we become neuer the better for singel teaching, setteth vs forth lookingglasses, to the ende we shoulde haue the leſſe excuse. If a man aske, how then, must we giue to all men without difference? The answere heretoo is, that the holy ghost intendeth not too take awaie discretion from almes gyuing, so as men shoulde not looke to the well bestowing of it: for if we should go to it without discretion: euery man should beas it were d̄rawne drie, and in the ende the poore should be left succourlesse: for the boldest would beare all away. And what maner of men are the boldest? Such as are least to be pitied: For they will counterfeyte themselues to bee poore, onely to rake all to themselues: Their onely seeking is too haue double and treble, and they care not though oþer men suffer hunger and thirst. Therefore it is good that men shoulde vse discretion, and looke narowly too whome they giue: specially considering the lewdenesse that is nowe a dayes in the worlde: For there are so many hypocrites, as it is pitie too see. Hardly shall a man finde one amongst a hundred, that is woorthie to be succoured. For although they bee poore in deede: yet notwithstanding, men are loth to do them good, because as soone as they get anything, by and by they fal to gluttonie & drunkēnesse, and so God maketh them to waſt it all away. To be ſhort, we be come to the full measure of all iniquitie: inſomuch as we ought too vſe great discretion, and narrowe ſearch when wee giue. But in the meane while let vs beware that we ſeeke not couert for our niggardlynelle vnder the shadowe of this discretion. For God miſliketh not that men ſhoulde haue regarde to whom they giue, to the ende their be-neſtie may be well beſtowed. No, but it behoueth vs first to be fully reſolved after this maner in our ſelues. As for me I minde not to ſpare according to the meaſure that I haue: I will doo good according to my abilitie: I deſire no more but to finde where I may ſuccour. VVhen a man is ſo reſolved, let him inquire whether his almes maye be well beſtowed on this man or that man: for he maye freely do it. But if a man ſay to himſelfe, I were beſt to be well aduised where I giue, and alwayes take occaſion of excuse: to ſay, I finde no pouertie there, ſo as hee is glad to haue ſome occaſion to ſtay him from giuing: It appeareth manifestly, that ſuچ a man ſeeketh nothing, but too exempt himſelfe from releueing thoſe that haue neede of his helpe. Then if wee intende to inquire, it behoueth a good will to go before: that is too ſay, that our ſeeking be but to do good: and then let vs boldly inquire. For we may well do it, ſo we be first and formeſt well minded, and ſeeke not couert for our niggardlynelle. Thus yee ſee to what poynt we muſt come. Yet notwithstanding, our ſearching alſo muſt not be too narowly. For it is iſpoſible that we ſhould not be de-ſeuied in well doing: and although we do our beſt to trie things, yet notwithstanding wee muſt needes bee ouer-ſeeen in giuing ſome almes to ſuche as are vnwoorthie. Gal.6.b.9.

And that is the cauſe why Saint Paule exhorteth vs to do good without ceaſſing. 13. For wee ſhall haue many lettes to hinder vs. First we ſhall ſee ſome malicioſe perſons that will miſreport vs, and therupon wil followe vñ-thankefulnelle, which dealing is able to thrust vs out of the way. But yet muſt we alwayes be of good courage, and holde on ſtill, whatſoever come of it. To bee ſhort, according to that which I haue ſayde alreadie, we cannot ſet downe particular rules for all things, but the generall rule which God giueth vs, ought to ſuffiſe vs: which is, that wee muſt haue a kinde harte, inclined too pitie and compassion, and a deſire to benefit and ſuccour ſuچ as haue neede of our helpe, and we muſt not make them to linger in wayting vpon vs: but rather haue a plaine mee ning heart, to the ende our hande may be open, whenſoever need requireth. Thus yee ſee in effect what we haue too beare away heere. And further let vs marke well, howe Job addeth immediately, that he had not ſene hiȝ periſhe which wanted cloþes: nor ſuffered him too ſterne for colde, that had no rayment to couer him: but their ſides and loynes (ſayth he) bath bleſſed me, and beeſe warmed with the fleſces of my ſheepe. Here Job ſheweth that he had laboured all kinde of wayes to do almes deedes, not onely in giuing meate and drinke to ſuچ as were a hungry, and a thirſt, but also in clothing the naked. And truly if wee intende to be merciſfull, it behoueth vs to ſuccour the neceſſities of our neighbours, in ſuch ſort, as we ſee them: for it is not iough too ſuccour them in part. True it is that all men cannot doo as Job did: for wee haue not ſo many thousandes of cattell as hee had , who might haue bin accounted amongst the great Princes of these dayes in respect of his reuenue: according as we see he had not onely yokes or hundreds of Oxen, but whole droues, yea as many as coulde be kept in fife or sixe Villages, or rather in a whole Countrey, which was much more. For we haue seene well ynough, that his substance was onely Cattell, as the Cattell of a whole Countrey . Euerie man therfere cannot attaine to that. But howsoeuer the world go, let vs consider our own abilitie : for according to 10 Mark. 12. d. thervnto it behoueth vs to indeuer to do good, like as we

Luk. 21. 4. 2. know it is said that the widow which gaue but two mites, was more praised & commended of Christ, than such as had cast in great summes of mony. The reson is, because she had giuen her whole substance, wheras the others had giuen but a small portion in respect of their riches. So then let euery one of vs consider his owne state : and whe we see our neighbors want either meate, or drink, or clothes, at leastwile if we be not able to succor the otherwise, let vs pray god to haue pitie vpon them, & to help them : but therwithal, in any wise let there be no fault in vs, that they were not ayded and succored. Yē see then what wee haue to beare in mind, in that after Job had spoken of his meat, and that he had delt part of it to the hungrie: he addeth also, that he had clothed such as shoulde haue sterued for colde, if it had not bin for his helpe. Yea and he sayth, that ihiir loynes blisſed him. VVherein hee declarereth that they had occasion to cun him thanke for that he had releued them after that sort. And therewithall he sheweth vs, that he looked not for his rewarde at mens handes , nor 30 sought to be discharged to Godward for doing good, but was glad of the good that he had done, because he knewe it was acceptable to God. And this is a lesson which wee ought to beare well in minde. For although men bee vntankefull towardes vs, and such as wee haue done good vnto, do grudge agaynst vs, and render vs euill for good : yet notwithstanding we haue not lost any thing by doing them good. And why ? For (spite of their teeth) their belies will blisse vs before God, if we haue fed them : and if we haue succoured them any otherwise, the very thing it 40 selfe will answe for vs. True it is, that sometime they wi. be so malicious, as to say: yea mary it is to much purpose. And wherefore am I beholding to him ? According as we see nowadayes that the poorest are proudest, and such as a man hath indeuered to do good vnto, wilonest speake euill of him. This we shall see, but let vs not therfore be wery. But if we cannot away with such vntankfulness, let vs marke the saying that is set downe heere : which is that the thing whiche we haue done shall blisse vs before God. Is there any man that playeth the verlet, 50 and grudgeth and murmureth when another man hath helped him? Verywell: yet doth he carie his sides still: and if a man haue clothed him , his bodie must needes blisse him before God. True it is that he hath no such intent with him : but howsoeuer he fare, God loketh vpon the body that was clothed: and that blisfness shall come in account before him. If a man haue bin fed (as I saide,) his belly must needes speake : and although his mouth bee churlish, so as it turne good into euil, & nothing cometh out of it but poysone : yet notwithstanding our Lord will accept the blisfness of the almes deed that the ma. haue don. Thus ye see, that to the end we may be prouoked to succor such as haue need of vs , we haue to marke that we must not respect whether they be able to recompence vs, or to counteruail the good that shall be don the, or whether they be such as will be thankfull : but put the case they be cleane contrary, yet shall we not haue lost our labor, because God accepteth the sacrifice that is don. Ye see then what is imported in this saying, that the sydes or loynes of a man that is nipp'd with colde, do blisse such as haue clothed him. And on the contrary part let vs marke, that although the poore aske not vengeance against vs, nor complain of vs : yet notwithstanding their sides will curse vs in suffering smart, when we shet our eies and haue no pite of them, but say, I am at mine ease, and I care not how othermen fare. Now if we haue bene so cruell herted : it is certaine that when wee vouchsafe not to succour the poore and needie that sterut for want of relieve, God wil make their sides and loynes to speake , and although the parties themselues open not their mouthes to complain of our vnmercifulnesse: yet notwithstanding the anguish that they suffer, crieth and complayneth before God, & vengeance ensueth according to the complaint: and it shall come so too passe, although men speake not a woorde, as I haue said afore. Now after that Job hath spoken so: he addeth, that he lifted not vp his hande against the fatherlesse, notwithstanding he saw his helpe at the gate : that is to say, although he could haue done it without punishment of men. For in those times men sate in justice at the gates of townes, as places of most resort. Job then saith, truly I coulde haue made one ma. quake, and another to run away, & I could haue bin as thunder amongst them, and no man shoulde haue opened his lips against me. VVhy so ? For a man of credit shall bee borne with, and folke shall not dare complain of him: and if they do, the judges shall not dare to redresse it. Then although I had my full sway, and that justice would haue suffered all that I had attempted : yet notwithstanding I abused not my credite , neither did I tramp'e poore folke vnder my feete. If there were a fatherlesse child, I sought not to profit my selfe by him. For we know that fatherlesse children are oftentimes put to the spoyle. Job then sheweth, that he was of such an upright minde, that when he coulde haue takcn away other mens goodes, he never went about it, nor never ment to make his owne aduaantage of other mens cost : no not though he had libertie to do it on mans behalfe. Howbeit, he addeth a reason why. For (sayth he) Gods punishing and castig dñe of men made me afayle. As if he shoulde say, I did not respect whether men would speake euil of me or no : but onely I hilde mine eyes fast vpon god who is my heauenly iudge. And here we see, first of all that there hath bin a great corruption in all times, and that such men as haue bene ordeined to yeeld every man his right, haue not discharged their dutie therin. Then is it no new thing, if judges do nowadayes reach out their hand to the wicked sort, bolstring and bearing them in their wickednesse. For it hath always bene an ordinarie custome. And therefore such as are in state of justice, ought to looke the better to themselves for the discharge of their dutie before God. But wha? This corruption hath reigned a long time, and at this day it hath full scope more than euer it had. If a man say : it maketh no matter, seeing the mischeif hath bin of so great antiquitie: truely it is not to be excused for althat. Also there was not such knowledge of God at that time, neither were men so wel acquainted with the doctrine as they bee nowadayes. VVherefore if they that do nowe sit in the seate of justice, and haue the mace in their hande : do suffer extortions, or see a poore man troden vnder soote, and make no account of it : or winke at men in authoritie , when they take more vpon them than becometh the : what excuse is there for them, seeing their eares are dayly beaten with admonitions and warnings, and they are told their dutie both toward god, and toward the people that is committed to them? VVherefore let vs marke vpon this doctrine , that if there were then such corruption ordinarily in the worde , that the 60

Judges

Judges supported the wicked: it behoueth vs to cōfōrt every mā himself, whē we see the like cōfusion at this day.
And it must not greeue vs ouermuch, though we can get neither right nor reason against such as do vs wrong, nor be able to bring our matters about. Then standeth it vs on hande to be armed with pacience: For we see it hath beene Gods wiſe to exercise his seruauntes after that sort at all tymes. He coulde well haue ſtabliſhed iuſtice in the time of Job: but it was his wiſe that many poore folkes ſhould ſmart. VVhereas we be in the like case at this day, he intendeth by that meanes too teach vs what it is to ſuffer: Marke that for one poynt. Yet neuertheleſſe it behoueth thoſe that are in the ſeate of iuſtice, too looke well too themſelues. For inaſmuch as men are inclined to that vice, they ſhall ſoone be thrust from their duty if they take not good heed, according as we ſee by to many exāples. There is alſo a ſecond leſſon, which it behoueth vs to remember: whiche is, that wee reſpect not what is lawfull for vs too the worldwarde, but ſettle our fight vpon God after the example of Job, ſo as hys ſearc̄e may withholde vs from hurting or wronging any of our neighbours: and this leſſon is very needfull. For I pray you what is it that men regard nowadayeſ but how they may ſcape the reprooſ of men? It is inough if a man can bring his matter to paſſe: and in the meane ſeaſon, what is the order of iuſtice? Euē ſuſh as it was in the time of Job. There was ayd at the gate for ſuſh as did extortiō, for ſuſh as deuoured the widowes, and for ſuſh as troubled poore folkes. Alas, nowadayeſ we be come to the ſame extremitie, and muſche worse: inſomuch that if a 30 poore man be troden downe, he ſhall haue no redrefſe at all. And why? For they that take away other mens goods, that beguile, beate and trouble poore folkes, and that ou-uershoote themſelues into all wickedneſſe, are lawleſſe persons and growne to ſuſh a boldneſſe, as they thiſke there is not any law to reſtreyne them. Againe, the Magistrates on their ſide, are fearefuller than women, there is no stoutneſſe of Gods ſpirite in them: or elſe they be contented too diſſemblaſe and too pleaſure men, yea and more and halfe to agree with the wicked. And although 40 they knowe that things go amifle: yet notwithstanding they haue no zeale to repreſſe them. The other are yet worse: for they ſeeke nothing, but that all ſhoule bee oute of ſquare, and that the worlde ſhoule come too ſuſh extremitie of euill, as there ſhoule be no feare of God nor honestie, nor any thing elſe but conuſion. Lo at what poynt we bee. Now then the moſt part of men, thiſke of nothing but howe they may ſcape when they haue done amifle. Looke vpon a Royster that lyeth in wayte for other mens goods: I warrant you if there bee any meanes to trappe them, hee ſpieth it. Yea but hee muſt come to account. Tush, what for that? If I may but bribe ſuſh a man (ſayth he) the matter is by and by diſ-patched. If I can carie him a preſent of ſuſh a thing, I winne hiſhart: and he ſhal win me two or three mo: and againe if I do ſuſh a thing, I ſhall be ſure of the fourth: and if I may make vp halfe a dozen on my ſide, my matter is out of criſe. See how they that haue the ſwords of iuſtice in their hand are ſet to ſale like brothels, ſo as they haue no more shame nor regard of their honour, nor of any thing elſe. For nowadayeſ the ſhiftes that they will pretend, ſhall be ſo villaynous, as there ſhall be no colour of hone-ſtie in them. VVe ſee it, and ſo every man taketh leau-to rob, to poll, to oppriete, and to commit all maner of extortion. And why? For if the matter be brought before a iuſtice, all is marred. And therefore it is a ſentence well worthie to be noted, when Job protesteth that notwithstanding his credit & authority, &c that men ſtood in ſuſh awe of him, that even the judges themſelues diſt not to haue dealt with him: althoſh there had bin no complaints made of him, yet for all that he abſteyned of his own accorde frō doing euil, & concluded not with himſelf that he miſt therefore do a thing becauſe me permiſted it: but had always this ſaying for a bridle, that is to wit, that gods punishments made him afraide. Therefore let vs learne too walke in ſoundneſſe, & in a good cōſcience: and when we intend to do any thing, let vs examin whether god permit it or no: and if we ſee that it diſpleaſereth God, ſo as he hath forbiſſen and diſallowed it: let vs let it alone: & although men ſooth vs, yea and giue vs libertie to do what we liſt, yet let vs kepe our ſelues from doing it. And why? For it behoueth vs to come before the heauenly iudge. And what ſhall it auiale vs then to haue eſcapèd the handes of men? For it ſhal be but a doubling of the vengeance. And why? Because we ſhew well by our deedes, that we feare men more than God. And do you not ſee how wee offer him too heynous iniury in preferring mortal creatures & wretched carions before his Maieſtie? I ſhall be afraide of men, and in the meane while mocke God, and hys Maieſtie ſhall bee nothing with mee. Againe when wee haue corrupted iuſtice either by hatred or by fauour, or by ſome other crooked meanes, ſo as we haue wcon the Judges: ſee ye not yet a ſecōd outrage which we offer vnto god. Is it not a defiling of that which he hath halowed?

But iuſtice is a holy thing: and we vniſallow it when we turne those vnto euill whiche are ſet in that ſeate, and whoine God hath appoynted of purpose, that the autho-ritie of his name ſhoule ſhine in them. If we (I ſay) doo go about too thrust them aside: is it not a poynt of highe treafon to God? And for that cauſe I ſayde that we doo but double Gods wrath vpon vs, by ſhifting oure ſelues from mens handes after that ſort. Yee ſee then that wee muſt fasten oure eyes vpon God, and looke vnto hys iudgement, to the intent we may of our own free accord refraine from doing euill when wee may do it, although the ſame be permitted vs on mens behalfe. And therewithall alſo let vs marke, that this our fearing of Gods punishment, muſt not be onely when we feele it, but before it come at vs. For it is to late for a man to feele that God is his iudge, when he is ſtriken with his hande: and therefore let vs be afraide when God threatneth vs, and before the ſtrokes light vpon our heads. Yee ſee then how every man may refrayn from euill doing, if by the eye of ſayth they foreſee the punishments a farre off, which are prepared for all euill doers, and for ſuſh as trouble their neighbours. And God ſheweth vs great fauour when he warneth vs aforhande, to the end we might preuent his vengeance. Thus ye ſee what we haue to bearne in mind.
And the conculſion which Job addeth is this: bow ſhall I bare bis burthen? It is too ſhewe vs that thing whiche is ſpoken too vs by the Apoſtle: namely, that it is a right dreadfull thing to fall into the handes of the living God. Heb.10.f.31 VVe are afraide of mens punishments which touch but the bodie: and what is done for the tire of Gods wrath which conſu:neth all things, and yet neuer goeth out, but burneth in ſuſh wife as we muſt be forced to continue in it, yea and to indure it without end? VVhy regard we not that? So then let vs not bee moued with this punishment of Gods, and let vs only looke to kepe our ſelues frō euil doing for shame or punishment of the world: but let vs conſider well in our mindes and in our underſtanding, and let vs auerayne our ſelues that when men ſhall haue determined to execute the cruelleſt torments vpon us, that can be deuized: yet notwithstanding all of it is nothing in comparison of Gods heauie vengeance. Thoughe a man bee layde vpon the wheel, or nipped with

with pinsons, or burned aliue, notwithstanding that these be verie greeuous torments: yet do they passe away, and continue not for euer: and againe they do, but grieue the bodie. But beholde, the wrath of God which consumeth all things, as a flaming fire that burneth without end, and a worme that gnaweth and bitteth the hart with. Deu.32.4.22 Esa.51.c.8. C. 66.g.24 When the scripture vseth such similitudes, it is not to expresse what is in it to the full: but onely to giue vs some little inckling of it. Therefore let vs marke well, that the vengeance of God which is prepared for the wicked, is an intollerable burthen: and let the same prouoke vs to walke in feare and pacience, assuring our selues that if men vse crueltie and violence against vs: there is a iudge in heauen to reuenge it; wherefore let the same restreyne vs from euill doing, though wee may safely do it for any worldly respect. And let vs take heede that our conscience bee pure, & that the knowledge of god be our very rule to guide vs: & let vs alwayes looke vpward to behold him that hath set vs in this worlde, declaring vnto vs that we must one day come to an account before his iudgement seate.

Now let vs fal downe before the face of our good god, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him too make vs sele them in such wise, as we may craue forgiuenesse, and be so sorie for them, as we may indeuer our selues wholy to amend them, and to profit from day to day in his obedience, vntil we be fully reformed. And that we pitying such as are in necessitie, may indeuer to succour them, and be like minded vnto them: praying our good God to haue pitie vpon them, and to succour vs also: and that although we bee vnworthie of it: yet notwithstanding, seeing he hath alreadie made vs to feele his goodnessse and mercie, we may not doubt but he will bestowe more and more vpon vs, and increase his grace from day to day in vs, if wee flee too him for helpe with true humilitie, according as he calleth & allureth vs daily vnto him by his worde. That it may please him too graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also, &c:

The Cxv. Sermon, which is the fift vpon the xxxij. Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the. 21. 22. and. 23. verses, and then vpon the text whiche is added here.

24. If I haue set my hart vpon golde, or if I haue sayd to the vvedge of golde, thou art my hope.
25. If I reioyced of being rich, or because my hande had founde abundance.
26. If I haue looked vp to the shining Sunne, or to the Moone vwalking in hir brightnesse.
27. That my hart hath beene deceyued in secret, and my hand hath come to my mouth.
28. That vvere damnable vvickednesse, and I had denied the God aboue.

Esterday we sawe the protestation that Job made concerning his vpright walking, not for feare of men: but because hee had hys eye alwayes vpon God: knowing that he is the iudge of all men, and that it behoueth vs too come before him to make our account. Hee sayde exprefly, that hee trusted not in his owne credite, nor had any such foolish imagination with him, as too make himselfe feared, as riche men doo which haue wherewith, so as the greater sort are alwayes puffed vp with pride, and we see that the poorer sort and such as cannot reuenge themselves, are troden vnder foote and turmoyled, and men doo them wrong, iniurie, and shame. Job then sayeth that hee had absteyned from all iniugē towards men, and not gone about to do them any euill. And why? Because he knewe he could not escape the hand of God. VVhereupon we haue to shewe, that if euill be bolstered heere bilowe: It behoueth vs to vse pacience, seeing it hath alwayes been Gods will to exercise hi. seruantes after that sort: that is to wit, that they shoulde suffer many outrages, and not bee mainteyned in their good right, and that iustice should be blinded, or rather turned vpside downe. Let vs mark then, that we must not thinke we haue gayned any thing, by scaping the hands of men: for we do but kindle the fyre of Gods wrath vpon vs, bycause that hee that hath defaced iustice, is guiltie of treason agaynst God. 60 And moreouer men abuse themselves, when they thinke a thing to bee lawfull because it shallnot be punished at mennes handes, and therewpon take more boldenesse, wherat God is the more greeuously offended. Therefor his curse muste needes increase and kindle more and more vpon vs. Nowe after that Job hath protested that hee had not abused the fatherlesse, nor done anie outrage to the weake: hee addeth, That bee had not put bis trust in golde, nor sayde vnto bis riches, I rest my selfe in you, nor reioyced when his goodes increased. VVe haue alwayes to beare in minde what hath beene shewed heeretofore: that is to witte, that Job toucheth not some one vertue alone, but comprehendeth generally the whole rule of good life which God hath giuen vs. And in very deede it is not ynough for vs to haue performed a peecē of the lawe(if at leastwise we were able to do it:) But it behoueth vs to indeuer to rule & frame our life through out according too all things which God commaundeth. In like maner then as Job hath protested that he had not shewed himselfe cruell towards the fatherlesse and pore: so nowe he sayth, that he was not puffed vp with pryde and presumption in himselfe, nor did set the more store by himselfe, because he was rich. Surely this was a singuler vertue. For we see commonly, that if a man haue som little thing to brag of, men shal scarce beare his foolish ouerwening. VVe need not to be kings nor princes to puff our selues vp, or to vaunt our selues, for as sone as a man hath but a little goods, by & by he is vpon his tiptoes, and spreadeth out his wings. And his vaingloriousnesse is not only in men, but also in women. And surely we see that as sone as womē haue wherwith, they flow in pompe & excede their degrees. And againe a man doth so change his countenance, as he vouchsafeth not to loke vpon his neibors but at one side, & he wil not scarce open his mouth: or if he do, it shalbe so scornfully and proudly, as men wil be afraid to speak any more to him. Thus ye see the pride that appeareth euery where. But what would come of it, if they had great heapes of golde and siluer, or if they had all things at will as Job had, when he sheweth that his riches were multiplied? Is it not a hard thing then that a man should alwayes be so milde and lowly when he hath his coffers full of gold and siluer, as he should set nothing by them? VVe see therefore that God wrought maruellously in Job, when hee suffered him not too bee blinded blinded with vaine presumption for all he was so riche, but caused him to possesse his riches in such wise, as hee was alwayes readie to leaue them, and did not set his hart vpon them.

Psa. 62.6.11 Ephe. 5.6.5. Nowe looke what Job protesteth of himself, the same is commaunded to vs all, according as we see it is sayd in the Psalme, If ryches increase, set not your hearts thereon: that is to say, make them not Idolles too put your trust in them: neyther bee you puffed vp with hauitnesse. And in this respect doth Saint Paule also say, that Couetousnesse is Idolatrie. For it is vnpossible that a man should be couetous to gather muche, and not therewithall bee possessed with this pride, that he would be had in estimation in respect of his goodes. Nowe when this pride reigneth in me: vndoubtedly there is a double Idolatrie. The one is that he beareth himselfe in hande, that God would fayle him if hee had not wherewith to helpe himselfe: and againe, if hee bee riche, he dispyseth God, and thinketh himselfe to be so well fenced, as he needeth no other thing. To be short, it is a very drunkennesse. For like as when a man is drunken, he maketh himselfe to beleue wonders: so when a man is rich, he presumeth vpon his riches, and remembreth no more that he is a mortall man, but forgetteth himselfe in such wise, as he sticketh not to aduance himself against God. And so let vs marke that Job protesteth not here any thing of himself, which God commaundeth not to all the faithfull: which is, that they shoulde not set their mindes vpon riches: though they flowe vnto them. Secondly, let vs marke, that it is a rare vertue among men, and therefore that wee haue the more neede to imploy our whole indeuer therevnto, seeing wee cannot restrayne oure selues without greate difficultie, and withoute bringing of oure selues vterly vnder foote. Therefore let vs indeuer to holde our selues at suche a stay, as ryches may not carie vs away, nor blinde vs so farre, as too make vs sette our hearte and minde vpon them.

Ephe. 5.6.5. And further, let vs marke that it is an intollerable vice, for a man to trust in his goodes. And why? For is it not an exceeding heynous offence for a man to robbe God of his due honour, and too giue it to a deade and senselesse creature? But dooth not hee make a God of his ryches (as I sayde afore) which presumeth somuch vpon them? Ye see then that God is bereft of his honour, and golde and siluer which are but deade creatures haue it: And is not that a monstruous thing? VVherefore let vs learne, that we cannot presume of our selues vnder the colour of the goodes whiche God giueth vs: but wee must become rancke traytors too God, and soule Idolaters as S. Paule termeth the couetous folke. And that is it which Job also ment to expresse in saying, If I haue set my heart vpon golde: or if I haue sayde too the wedge of golde, thou art my trust. Here Job bringeth in a talke betwene himselfe and his money. Verely a man will not talke vnto his ryches when hee openeth his chest and coffer: hee will not enter communication with them, as though he had some bodie to talke with him: but in this maner of speche, Job doth verie well set forth the follie and ouerweening of riche men in trusting too their ryches. And why? They haue there as it were a secret cōfērence and conspiracie with their golde and siluer. True it is that they speake not, but yet without speaking they ceasse not to haue the thing which Job sheweth here. VVherefore as often as wee bee tempted to put our trust in creatures and earthly things: let vs call too minde that it is a robbing of God of his honour, and a purloyning of it from him, to giue it to a thing of nothing: and therefore let vs abhorre such dealing. Therewithall also let vs remember the condemnation that Job layeth here upon vs: and let vs compare oure selues with him. VVhat a shame is it that a man should aduaunce himself, and gaue vpon his fetheres, and thinke himself to be a iohs fellow, because hee is worth I wote not what! Beholde, Job possessed great treasures, and had gathered golde and siluer in heapes: and yet notwithstanding he alwayes held himselfe in such lowlinesse, as if he had beene a poore man. VVhat a shame then is it for vs to bee lifted vp wyth a little, seeing that Job was not blinded with all the great abundance that God had giuen him? Marke that for one poynt. And furthermore let vs marke, that it is a great tryall of a man, when he is rich, and yet notwithstanding becommeth not proud, but continueth alwayes milde, and without presuming of himselfe, walketh as if he were no better than another man. Ye see here a good tryall.

And therefore let vs not think we haue atteyned any great vertue, if we be not come to that poynt. For there is not a man to be found in this Citie of Geneua, no nor in this whole Countrey, that is lyke vnto Job. And truly if a man shoulde gather all the rycheſt men togither, they were (as you woulde say) nothing at all in comparison of that which Job possessed. They that boast themſelues nowadayes of their ryches, are as if they shoulde thinke themſelues to bee great men, because they be but mounted vpon a blade of an Onyon, if a man shoulde compare their wealth with Iobs. But when our Lorde doth ſo holde men at ſo lowe an ebbe: let them assure themſelues that it is for their profit, and that if they were in greater wealth, they woulde burst: and it woulde bee a cauſe of their decay, and they woulde mounte ſo hie, as they shoulde breake their necke. So then let vs marke, that oure Lorde procureth oure benefite and welfare, when hee ſuffereth vs not to mounte ſo hie. For wee coulde not weelde our good fortune (as they terme it:) we ſee that although we haue no occaſion too aduaunce our selues, and that oure ſtate bee as ſimple as may bee: yet notwithstanding wee are alwayes diſirous to growe great, yea euen as it were in despite of God and nature. And what a thing were it then if wee had all things at will?

Lo heere the thing which ought to make vs too beare our estate with the bittter pacience, euen though it bee neuer ſo base and ſmall. Yea and let them thare of the pooreſt ſort vnderſtande, that God intendeth to humble them, and ſubdue them, to the ende they ſhoulde not bee gyuen vnto prude, as by all likelyhoode they woulde bee, if hee did not brydle them, and holde them ſhort by ſuche tryall. Howſoever the worlde go with vs, let it content vs, that our Lorde knoweth what is meete for vs, and hath it in his hande, ſo as hee cannot bee letted too giue it vs, when hee knoweth it too bee good and expedient for vs. And thus yee ſee what wee haue to marke in effecte concerning that is ſayde heere, that Job did not putte his truſte in Golde, nor vaunted himſelfe though hee ſaue bee was riche. But yet is that weil worthie too bee noted whiche he addeth: that is too wit, that hee reioyced not when his hande coulde leape vpon muche, nor when goodes came to him from al places: nor reioyced at al in that behalfe.

It ſhoulde ſeeme at the firſt bluſhe that Job ſpake more by himſelfe, than is poſſible to bee founde in a mortall man. For it can not bee that a manne ſhoulde not bee gladde when hee haþe goodes: It is impoſſible that hee ſhoulde bee as a blocke of woodde. VVhat doothe Job meene then, by ſaying that hee reioyced not? Let vs marke for an aunſwere, that hee ſpeaketh speaketh not heere of all maner of gladnesse. For it is a naturall thing for a man to be sadde when he is poore, and too bee glad when hee is riche, and this gladnesse is not euill of it selfe. For it is written thou shalst eate and drinke, and bee merie before the Lorde thy God. Therefore if oure Lorde giue vs goods, so as wee haue wherewith to cherishe our selues, it is too the ende we shoulde bee merrie. And as I haue tolde you alreadie, so little doth this mirth or gladnesse displease God, or is too bee condemned in it selfe: as it is rather a token of the fayth and feare whiche wee haue towardes him, for somuch as wee learne thereby too prayse his goodnesse, and to yeeld him thanks for the benefites which he dealeth vnto vs. But Job speaketh here of a blinde reioycing, such as is among worldlings, which are caried away with their goods: so that they forget God, and remember no more their owne fraitie: but are exalted in themselues. This then is a frantike ioy, an inordinate ioy, a ioy that turneth vs away from God, and maketh vs so drunken, as we know not any more what we be. And this is it that Job ment heere. To be short, he doth vs to vnderstande, that he hilde his minde so bridled, that when riches came to him, he did indeed receyue them at Gods hande, and was glad of them, yeelding God thankes for increasing them after that sort: but yet notwithstanding he did not therewithall repose his felicitie in his riches. And this is the principall poynt that we haue to note. For wherin do men abuse themselves, but in that they rest vpon these transitorie things, whereas they ought too bee led further? VVhen there is any speaking of the welfare and felicitie of men: It behoueth vs all too tende vnto God, and to assure oure selues that if we bee separated from him, wee bee vnhappy, and that all the goodes, pleasures, and honours whiche wee can possesse, are as many condemnations vpon vs. Thus ye see how it would behoue vs to seeke God, when there ryseth any question concerning oure welfare and happiness. And on the contrarie part wee see howe men busie their heades about corruptible things, insomuche as they make theyr God of them, one of his golde and siluer, another of his honour and credite, and a thirde of his pleasures. VVhen a man desyreth to bee riche, beholde the marke that hee shooteth at. He setteth before him, that to bee riche is a happy case: and in the meane while hee letteth God alone, and giueth him quite ouer. The man that seeketh to bee exalted to dignitie and credite, is so rauished with it, that he careth not to be separated from God: for that is all one to him.

A whoremonger, or he that is giuen to any other wicked lust, beleueueth that all goeth well with him, and hee is glad of it so as hee may injoy his desyre. VVe see that whereas men ought to tend and trauel to Godward, they rest themselves vpon corruptible things. And so let vs marke heere that Job reioyced not in his ryches, but in the goodness of God that made him riche. But yet coulde not this bee sufficiently vnderstoode, if it were not declared more familiarly. Not that the woordes are ouerdarke of themselves, but because wee woulde always vse some hypocrisy with God, as thoughewe were wilie ynoughe too beguile him. Men then hope euer too scape by theyr startingholes, when they do but halfe knowe themselves: and therefore if a man say at one woerde, that wee muste not reioyce in ryches, but in God that gyueth them: the veriest niggardes and the veriest pinchpennyes in the worlde will alledge this excuse, and make protestation with full mouth. Oh, I! I reioyce not in my riches: but forso much as God hath gyuen mee them: I glorie onely in him that giu-deth and gouerneth mee. Lo howe men beeing full of hypocrisie, seeke also some fayre colours too vernishe their filthe withall: and therefore I sayde, that it was needfull too expounde better this sentence, of reioyning in God and not in ryches. VVhat then dooth that import? That hauing an eye too God, who hath gyuen vs the goodes that wee possesse, wee shoulde vnderstande that therein hee meeneth too shewe himselfe a fathertoawdres vs: and that seeing hee is our father, it is a good reason also that wee shoulde bee children on our sydes towardes him. But Gods children wee cannot bee but wee muste vse brotherly loue towards men, bearing in minde that the goodes which wee haue, are layde as a pledge in oure hande by God for the releueng of our neighbours that haue neede.

And further let vs vnderstande, that God will not haue vs tyed too these earthly things. If wee regarde God, wee will immediately haue an eye too the endless life that hee hath prepared for vs in heauen: and then shall wee not bee wedded too these corruptible thinges, neyther shall wee make ryches too bee as dyrt and myre too wallowe oure selues in. Suche as gyue their heartes ouer vnto ryches, are as it were in a quamyre, as men saye heere. For like asthese, after they haue plucked oute one legge, sinke deeper in wyth the other, so as they cannot get ouute: So those that putte theyr trust in this worlde, are so farre vnable too rayse vp themselues to Gndwarde, that they stagger, stumble, and reel: and too bee short, cannot get out of the gulfie wherein they bee plunged. On the contrarye, beholde heere howe our Lorde offereth himselfe to vs, and calleth vs to the heauenly life, as if he shoulde say, hie you apace too mee, marche yee ouer the worlde, and be not wedded to it.

Therefore if we followe this incouragement whiche God giueth vs. It is certaine that we shall haue none other desire but to go forwarde to the heauenly lyfe, and wee shall not bee hilde backe by the goodes of the world. Heerewithall also let vs marke, that it is no reioycing in God, except we be contented with him alone, according as it is sayde in the sixteenth Psalm, The Lorde is mine Psa.16.b.5. heritage, my portion, and my longing. Nowe then if wee haue this contentation, it is certaine that wee will not passe for all worldly goodes whensoeuer it shall please God to bring vs therewithal, sobeit that wee possesse him alone, who can neuer bee taken away from vs. VVe heare also howe it is sayde vnto Abraham, I am Gene.15.a.1. thine exceeding great rewarde. By that saying; God intendeth to drue vs vnto him, and to holde our hearts and mindes fast settled in him without raunging heere and there. So then wee see nowe what it is too reioyce in God, and not in ryches. For (as I haue declared alreadie) if a man reioyce in God, it behoueth him too shewe as well in wealth, as in pouertie, that his heart is not wedded to worldly goodes: in wealth, by not beeing letted to follow the way that God setteth afore him, and too discharge himselfe of his dutie towardes his neighbours: and in pouertie, by beeing patient when it shall please God to bereue him of all the goodes that hee had, so as hee commeth too this conclusion, yet am I not separated from my God, it is not ynough for mee that I am in his fauour, and therefore nowe it behoueth me to bee quiet, for he is the thing in whome I ought to take all my rest. This is the effect of that which Job ment, and of that whiche hee intendeth too teache vs by hys example, whien hee sayeth, that hee reioyced not in his riches. It is also too bee noted that this reioycing caryeth a thankesgiuing with it. That is too saye, when wee have haue wherewith to reioyce in God , it behoueth vs also to gloriſe him : acknowledging that wee haue not anie thing but of his meere goodneſſe . Furthermore, pryme also is condemned in this ſaying . For whereas we bee forbidden to reioyce in riches : it is to the end we ſhould not vaunt our ſelues in them, too thinke our ſelues hetter than other men . And this is it that Sainct Paule ſayeth to Timothee : warne the riche men of this world that they be not proude and hie minded , but that they truſt in the lyuing God . There Sainct Paule ſheweth 10 that which wee haue touched alreadie : namely that it is a rare vertue and not verie rife to bee founde , that a riche man ſhoulde bee lowly and haue no pryme in him to prayſe himſelfe aboue others . And yet for all that , it is not poſſible for vs to reioyce in God , but this pryme muſte bee throuw under foote , and our heartes bee whoſly ouermayſtered . Forasmuche then , as men cannot attayne therevntoo without great hardneſſe and greate ſtreyning of themſelues aboue all theyr power : Sainct Paule ſheweth the conuenient remedie , which is to truſt 20 in the living God . For if we wift what it is to truſt in God : it is certaine that ryches ſhoulde not carie vs away . Then muſte it needes followe , that ſuche as are wedded too their riches , know not what it is to truſt in God , neyther paſſe at all for him or his grace , according alſo as I haue ſayde alreadie , howe it it not for naught that Sainct Paule in another place termeth couetouſneſſe , Idolatrie . After that Job had protested ſo , hee addeth : If I haue looked vp too the Sunne when he ſhy ned , or to the Moone walking in hir light , or if I haue layde 30 my bande vpon my mouth : for ſurely that were a beynous thing , it were a renouncing of God aboue . Some haue expounded this ſentence , as though Job ſhoulde protest that hee had not worshipped the Sunne , and the Moone , becauſe that in olde tyme the ſame was a verie common ſuperſtitio[n] , ſpecially in the East Countreyes , and Job was of thoſe partes , as wee haue ſene heeretofore : and ſo it ſhoulde ſeeme that Job ment to declare here , that hee had not done as moſte men did among whome hee liued , that is too ſaye , hee had not woondred and 40 gazed at the Sunne and the Moone , nor attributed any godly Maiestie vnto them , nor made Idolles of them . And ſurely G O D telleth hys people exprefly by Moyses , that they muſte not bee ſo blinde as to wor ſhippe the Sunne and the Moone . For what is the Sunne ? True it is that hee hath a wonderfull light in him , and that wee ſee there ſome markes of Gods glo‐ rie . In like caſe is it with the Moone . And that alſo is the cauſe why it is ſayde , that they preach vntoo vs , and that God ſpeaketh vntoo vs , as it were by theyr mouth , to the ende wee ſhoulde bee allured too come vntoo him . But therewithall God ſayeth vntoo them : if you woorſhippe the Sunne and Moone , you are vnthankful . For too what ende haue I created and fashioned them ? It is to the ende yee ſhoulde knowe mee , even mee that am the Creator of them . If yee do the contrarie , your vnthankfulneſſe will be doubled . For what is the Sunne ? your ſeruant . VVhat is the Moone ? your handmayd . VVherefore doth the Sunne ſhine , but to give you light , and to make the earth frutefull ; according as God giueth 50 him that vſe ?

So then , ſeeing that the creatures ( howe noble ſoever they bee ) are ſubiect vnto vs , and God bath ordeyned them to do vs ſeruice : Is it not a foule vnthankfulneſſe for vs to make Idolles of them ? This expositiōn is veriet true : but yet it agreeeth not too the preſent place . For heere Job ment to vſe another ſimilitude , of purpoſe to go forwarde with the matter that wee haue treated of alreadie : namely that hee had no presumption or pryme in him . For wee ſee howe the proude ſort do caſt vp theyr nozes intoo the windē ( as they ſaye ) and take not themſelues to bee of the common rate of men , but make I wote not what a ſtately countenance , as though they woulde ſeparate themſelues from this mortall life . And their pryme extendeth not onely too their neighbours , but they also looke ſo loftie euerie where , that they preache before God with ſuche a ſtatelinenſſe , as the Sunne and Moone ( though they bee farre aboue vs ) are notwithstanding not highe ynough for them , but they ouerlooke them , ſaying : where are wee nowe ? VVhich of vs is the greater ? VVhich of vs is the higher ? Job then ment to exprefſe mennes fooliſhe hautinenſſe in aduauncing and ſetting out themſelues out of measure , and ( to bee ſhort ) in that they vouchesafe not too holde themſelues in the common traine , but woulde be greater than God graunteth them to bee .

Thus ye ſee what it is to looke vp to the Sunne when he shineth , and vnto the Moone when ſhee walketh in hir brightneſſe . And yet neuertheleſſe , we ſee that our Lorde giueth vs there a token of our feebleneſſe . For we cannot looke vpon the Sunne , but our eyes are dimmed out of hande . True it is that God woulde haue vs to reioyce in the light of the Sunne , and hee maketh him to walke in the Skie to do vs ſeruice . VVe ſee howe hee ioorneyeth to giue vs light : and beſides that , we knowe alſo that the Sunne giueth liuelinenſſe to our bodies , and wee ſee that the earth is made frutefull by his warmth . For from thence do wee drawe our ſubtaunce and nou‐ riſhment : but yet therewithall oure Lorde putteth vs in minde of oure frailtie , to meeken vs in that wee cannot looke vp , but our eyes shall bee dimmed . Those then which looke vp after that ſort vntoo the ſhining Sunne , and to the Moone in hir light , woulde faine ſhew themſelues valiaunt fellowes , as it were in ſpite of nature , and that there is more in them than in a l the worlde beside . But Job protesteth that he was none ſuche , and therewithall he addeth alſo , that bis heart was not beguiled in ſecrete , ſo as bis bande ſhoulde be layde to his mouth . VVhen hee ſayeth that hee was not beguiled in ſecrete by hys heart : It ſerueth to exprefſe the better , that hee had not onely beene curteous and lowly towards men , but alſo had beene continually as a little one before God , notwithstanding that men prayſed him : and that althougle everie man did him reverence , ſo as hee was dreaded of the whole worlde : yet for all that , hee gloried not in a nie of all thoſe things , inſomuch that if an Anatomie had bene made of his heart , and that all that euer was within it had beene ſounded and gaged too the bottome : a man ſhould not haue ſound any hautinenſſe . This is the ſaying which hee vſeth : and afterwarde he ſayeth , that bee kiſſed not his bande , or that bis bande came not too bis mouth to be kiſſed . Some expound this ſaying , that he comended not his vertues to make them meritorious , or to ſetile the truſt of his welfare vpon the goodneſſe and holinenſſe of his life . This doctrine is good , and that expositiōn is of it ſelue notable : For it was vitered by a man that liued in a verie corruptiōn time . For Sainct Gregorie ( as men call him ) who liued in a time of ignorance and corruption , and was afterwarde Bishoppe of Rome , declarereth that it is a beaſtly wickedneſſe , yea and an v̄iſter renouncing of God , for a man too truſt in his owne deſerteres . And yet nowe adayes it is the cheefe article that is in controuersie betwixte vs and the Papistes . For wee ſay , that our ſaluation is grounded vpon the free goodneſſe of God , and vpon the death and paſſion of our Lorde Ieſus Christ , and that we be ſaued by faſh only only: and contrarywise the Pope will haue euerie man to be his owne sauour. But yet here is one that was Pope of Rome, which neuerthelesse can skil to say, that it is a renouncing of god, & an outrageous wickednesse for me to kisse their handes, that is to say, to trust to theyr owne works to make them meritorious vertues. This doctrine then is good and profitable: but yet notwithstanding this text must be taken more simplie, than too concerne Iobs vertues. True it is that they are comprehended in it: how beeit as wee haue seene afore, hee speaketh generally of all the occasions that men take too trust in creatures and themselues. Therefore he sayth, if my mouth haue kisſed my bande, that is too say, if I haue leaned to mine owne credite or to any thing else, or if I haue beene so beastly as to make Idolles of my goodes, and to honour them: (for this woord kisſe betokeneth to do homage, or honour.) Then if my mouth haue kisſed my bande: that is to say, if I had that vaine selfe trust that I did any homage or honour to my selfe: If I haue done so (sayth he) let God curse mee. For out of doubt, that were a renouncing of the liuing God, or the Souereine God. Heere wee haue too marke, that the sayde highmindednesse is an intollerable thing before God. And this manner of speeche of looking vp to the Sunne whiche Job vsyth, is to bee marked well.

True it is that naturally our countenance looketh vpwarde, and that God woulde there shoulde bee a difference betweene vs and the brute beastes in that behalfe. For he hath giuen the beastes as it were hanging looks: because they looke but downewarde too the grounde: 30 but man hathe his countenance lifte vpwarde, because hee looketh for a better and excellenter state in heauen: And in verie deede it is to the intent wee shoulde alwayes looke vp aloft, to seeke God and his heauenly kingdom: but in the meanwhile this is no let, that wee shoulde not humble our selues. And this also is the cause why Dauid protesteth, that hee medied not with great matters, nor with wonderfull things that were to high for him. This maner of speaking is partly like vnto the similitude that Job vsyth. Dauid sayeth, Lorde thou knowest I haue not walked in great things. Howe so? Is it not lawfull for men to deale with great matters? The state of iustice is honourable, and the carrying about of Gods worde is a great thing also: and to bee short, there is not that man which findeth not some let in his vocation. If a man instruct others, or if he take vpon him but too teach childe[n] in a schole: eyther of them both are creatures fashioned after the Image of God, and he ought too refourme them: And is not that a great matter? If a man haue a whole Countrey too guide, is it not an excellent matter? Yes, but Dauid speaketh of the puffing vp of the heart when wee woulde aduaunce our selues. For wee knowe that he had to deale with matters of great waight: and therefore hee addeth, nor in woorderfull things that are aboue me: that is to say, I had no desire to deale with the things that passed my capacicie. And Job sayth here, I looked not vp to the Sunne: that is to say, I did not cast vp my noze, nor play the royster too aduaunce my selfe agaynst God, of all the time that I was in reputation of the worlde. Heereby then wee see (as I touched afore) 60 that this foolish lust of men to make themselues esteemed is an intollerable thing before God. VVhat is to be done then? It behoueth vs to come too the remedie, which is lowlinesse. Seeing that God forbiddeth vs to lift vp our countenances on high, let vs cast them downe with our owne good will: For we haue sufficient cause so to do. If wee looked wellvpon our selues, we woulde continually practize this prouerbe, namely, that hee that knoweth himselfe best, will set least store by himselfe. But forasmuch as we are loth to knowe our selues, and what our state is: It is no wonder though we be so caried away with this foolish pryde, as we could finde in oure heartes too stie aboue the Clowdes. VVherefore let vs marke, that it standeth vs in hande to examine well oure owne wantes, to the ende we may be restrayned too all modestie, and be able to protest that we haue not cast vp our heades, but that we haue alwayes looked downward in acknowledging that we haue not whereof too make anie boast. Marke that for one poynt. Secondly, when it is sayde, that Iobs heart was not led away in couert. Let vs beare in minde, that humilitie or lowlinesse consisteth not onely in the outwarde appearance towardes men: for we shall see many which are meeke and gentle to all outwarde likelihoode, and yet in the meane while ceasse not to foster a foolish selfeweening in their heartes, and too haue an estimation of themselues. VVee see howe all these hypocrites are outwardly framed vnto lowlinesse: 20 when notwithstanding they are inwardly so proude, as they are readie too burst with poysone agaynst God. And what a thing is that? They bee humble outwardely amongt men, and seeme as simple as sheepe: and in the meane while, they playe the Bulles in ioustling agaynst God. As for example, allsuche as glorie in their owne vertues, and thinke to earne Paradise (as all the religious rabbie doo in the Popedom) do certainly lift vp themselfes agaynst God, insomuche as they make account of theyr owne merites: and that is much worse than to pretende a statelynesse towardes men. If there be a man that is puffed vp with vaine pride, that setteth out hymselfe in a brauerie, and that thinketh the ground beareth him not: Euerie man will mocke at him: It is a stinking folly, and cannot bee borne withall. Now if such a presumption sette it selfe agaynst God, although it be hidden inwardely, I pray you, is it not muche more vileyous?

Then let vs marke well, that it is not inough for vs to beare a sweete and amiable countenance, and too pretende a milde behauour towardes men: but wee muste looke that our heart be not led away in secrete, and that we haue no pride hidden within. For although it appeare not to men: yet shall it not fayle to be condemned of God. And therewithall let vs marke, that if couert pride bee too bee condemned: then shall they not scape whiche spreade oute theyr wings, and vaunte themselues openly. And let vs vnderstande, that our Lorde setteth them heere as it were vpon a Scaffolde, to the ende we shoulde knowe the vice wherevnto wee are all inclined, and whiche reigneth in vs till God correct it. Furthermore, as touching the kissing of his handes: I haue tolde you alreadie, that that manner of speech importeth a doing of homage, or honor: and it is not without cause that the holy Ghost hath vsed such speech: for there is not any thing wherein men do more falsely beguile themselues, than in taking vpon them the honour that belongeth vnto God: and that is a plaine spying of him (as Saint Paule declareth). Therefore it is to bee concluded, that vntill such time as men do vtterly distruste themselues and mislike their owne vertues, they shall never be throughly humbled as they ought to be, neither shall they honour God as becommeth them, and as he deserueth.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him to make vs feele them better than wee haue heretofore done: & that seeing we be so miserable, we may throughly consider our owne wantes, and learne too shake off all pride:

pryde : and that forasmuch as our Lord sheweth vs so often that all our welfare, felicitie and glory consist in him, wee may learne to seeke them there, and so to mortifie all our fleshly lustes, as Iesus Christ may reygne there peaceably, as vnto whom all souerayne dominion is giuen, to the intent that all knees shoulde bow before him : and that in asmuch as it behoueth vs to passe thorough this world : and the things that may holde vs backe there, are all convenient for the necessities of our lyfe, he suffer vs not to be still intangled in them, but that wee may trauayle toward the heauenly kingdome, and so vs the creatures which he hath ordayned to our vse, as wee may not make them Idolles, and that wee may nother thorough misgovernement nor thorough any other outrage be wedded to this worlde, but so passe thorough it, as wee may alwayes still go forward to be gathered vp into the euerlasting rest which is purchased for vs by our Lord Iesus Christe. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also to all people and nacions of the earth, bringing backe all &c.

The cxvj. Sermon, which is the sixth vpon the xxxij. Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the 26.27.28. verses, and then vpon the text whiche is added here.

29. If I reioyced at the aduersitic of mine enemie : or vvere glad vvhenn euill befell him :
30. Or if I haue suffered my mouth to speake euill of him, or to vtter curses agaynst him :
31. If my housshould folke haue not sayd, vwho shall giue vs his flesh to eate ? vve are not satisfied :
32. If the straunger did lodge in the streate, or that my gate vvere not open for them that tra- uayled by the vvay :

Hauē begon already to expounde the sentence where Job protesteth that he looked not vp to the sunne and the moone. And the effect of my saying was, that hee declareth thereby that he was not puffed vp with pryme as those are which presume vpon themselues and thinke they are of great value, trusting either in their owne richesse or in their credite, and therespō despising other men, yea and thinking themselues to be no more subiect vnto God. Job then protesteth, that he was not puffed vp with such pryme as to challenge any worthinesse at all to himself : and he addeth, that that were a renouncing of God on hygh. For he had sayde afore, that it was a heynous offence and woorthy of death. And here wee see, howe God abhorreth that highmindednesse of men, when they would aduaunce themselues aboue measure. And thereof we may gather, that lowlynnesse is a sacrifize most acceptable to him of all others. Also of our owne nature wee do not easely abace our selues : in this behalfe it behoueth a man to be as it were brought to nothing, that he may not esteeme of himself, if he intend to be taken and reputed for humble before God. For humilitie or lowlinesse is not an imba- cing of our selues when we haue wherewith to magnifie our selues : but it is an acknowledging that there is no- thing but wretchednesse in vs, and that if we would open our mouth to alledge any thing for our selues, we shal find nothing but vtter confusion in vs, so as if our heart concyue any vaine presumptiō, the same is but wind, which may well burst vs, but never feede vs. Thus ye see what the true and right humilitie or lowlinesse importeth : namely that a man should not esteeme of himself, accord- ing also as in very truth wee haue no reason so to do : and whosoeuer setteth by himself, must needes be ouer- blinde and brutish. For he that entreteth into himself, and examineth all his vertues thoroughly : shall finde that he hath none of them, but of Gods mere grace, and that he is bounde vnto him for them, yea and that all the ver- tues which God giueth vs, are matched with as many infirmitiēs, so as wee cannot but cast downe our eyes. And therefore as for those that flatter themselues nowadyses through ouerweening : they not only beguyle theselues, but also robbe God of his honour, and by that meanes become ranke traytors to him, and moreouer vtterly renounce the liuing God as it is sayde here. Truely this is right harde at the first sight : howbeit when al is well considred, it is easie to iudge, that Job exceedeth not measure and reason, in saying that he which flattereth him selfe renounces God. VVhy so ? For it is not enough to confessē that there is but one God : but it behoueth vs also to knowe him as he is, and to reserue him his due honour and all that belongeth vnto him. For if I bereue God of any parte of his glory to decke my selfe withall : what am I ? Shall a wretched worme of the earth and a rotten carriō set so much by himselfe, that God should be abaced, to the intent that he should be exalted ? Is not this a mingling of heauen and earth togither, and a per- uerting of the whole order of nature ? And againe when God is so robbed, & his glory as it were put to the spoyle: is it not a renouncing of him ? For men acknowledge him nomore to be such a one as he is, but rather do vtterle disclayme him. Therefore let vs marke well, that it is impossible for men to aduaunce and preferre theselues, but it must needes be as a kinde of renouncing of God. And here yee see also why it is sayd in the P̄ialme that P̄alm. 10.4.5.

we haue song, that the proude which stande vpon their owne vertue and strength, trusting therento, and chal- linging so much vnto theselues as they thinke no harme may touche them : do conclude in their heart that there is no God, and to the vttermost of their power reiect all religion. True it is that they speake it not with their mouth : but yet for all that it is so in deede. For the holy Ghost which searcheth our priuities declareth that it is so. And therefore lette vs learne to honour God and to put away this false imagination, that all pryme may bee beaten downe in vs. For it is impossible that a man should offer seruice vnto God without humilitie. And (as I haue sayde) wee cannot be humble except wee ac- knowlede our selues to be nothing, nor nothing woorthe, and that all glory ought to be reserved vndiminished vna- to God. Furthermore lette men esteeme as much of themselues as they list : and yet for all that they shall feele God agaynst them as their mortall enimie to their vtter confusion. For he that exalteth himself, rusheth agaynst God : but he that humbleth himself, leanteth vnder his hande. If wee knowe our owne wretchednesse, it will as it were beate vs downe : and then will God reach vs his hande to lift vs vp and to set vs in his lappe. But will we needes go about to trust to our owne strength ? it will be to harde an encounter for vs : which shall serue to breake our heads be wee never so proude. For God must shew himself our aduersary when there is such presumptuousnesse in vs. Yee see then what wee haue to remember in this streyne. But let vs marke that this looking vp to the Sunne and the Moone, (that is to say, mens loftinesse in presuming vpon themselues) may be of twoo sortes : the one is, when vnder colour of their richesse, or of some honour wherein they be placed, they forget themselues and thinke not any more that they be mortall creatures. VVhen they are come to that point, God may wel punish such blinde prude, according as it is a fonde thing and woorthie to be scorned of the whole worlde. For what is our life ? or what are all the appurtenances of it ? But there is an other maner of prude : which is, that men so flatter themselues, as they thinke they haue both wisedome and power to gourne themselues, and that they can deserue much to godward. Now when men presume so farre of themselues, as to challenge the prayse of their owne saluation, they must needes stumble with a deadly fall : because the principall poynt which God reserveth to himselfe, is that wee should know our selues to be in state of damnation, and vtterly forlorne and past recoverie, and that we should recover no hope but only in his free goodness. VVhen this doctrine is defaced : it is as much as to exalt men to the ende that God should bee brought to nought, and it is all one as if men would put Gods honor to the spoyle. VVherefore let vs learne to cast downe our heades, assuring our selues that if wee could glory in God alone, being beaten downe in our selues and hauing corrected this foolish self weening wherewith we be puffed vp : God would releue vs and make vs partakers of his glory, and we might beleue that all the goodes which he hath, do belong vnto vs. Haue wee nothing on our side ? God is rich ynough to supply our wats, & we may assure our selues, that he will not fayle vs in any thing, according as the Scripture sayeth, that although men be poore and wretched, so as there is nothing in them wherof they may boast : yet notwithstanding God is their glory and will couer al their vncleanness, so as they shal not be ashamed to go cheeke by cheeke with the Angels of heaué, as Gods children and members of our Lord Iesus Christe.

Rom. 10. b.12. Eph. 2.4.4. Psal. 20. 3. 4.1. Psalm. 3. 4.4. Ezech. 16. 4.8. Thus much concerning the humilitie or lowlinesse that I spake of. And when Job hath spoken so, he addeth an other protestation : which is, that he reioyced not when any inconuenience happened to his enimies, nor was glad when he saw the fall, nor bad giuen his mouth leue to cast forth curses upon them : yea and that he had so persisted in that minde, that he bad not giuen leue to his boylholde seruaunts to prouoke him to reuenge : but did neverthelesse restreyne himself, notwithstanding that there came syrebrands to moue him therenvnto. Yee see then what this protestation of Iobs contayneth : that is to wit, that although menne did beare him ill will & indeuered to hurt him & to put him to losse, yet notwithstanding he rendred not like for like, nor (which more is) nourished any secrete hatred in his heart. And this protestation is well woorthie to be noted, because it is one of the hardest things that God commaundeth vs. And that is the cause why the hypocrites in the papacie haue not bene ashamed to falsifie the holy

Matb. 5. g.44. Luk. 6. d.27. Scripture, in saying, that our Lorde Iesus Christs willing of vs to loue our enimies, is but a counsell and not a comauendement. VVhat moued them to vse such blasphemy ? It was because they measured Gods comauendements by our strength : they had an eye to mans abilitie : and when they saw any thing surmount our power, they concluded that God did not then comauand it: for(to their seeming) God requireth nothing of vs which wee are not able to performe. Verely they overshot themselves to far in that poynt, and their hypocrisie was tootoo grosse. For let vs examine all the rest of Gods comauendements, and see whether we can fulfill any of them : and we shall find that we cannot haue so much as one good thought to begin withall, and much lesse be able to stirre one finger. And how then can we apply al our strength to it ? But these hypocrites abuse themselves with a false imaginacion that a man is able to performe the lawe of God. And when the Diuel so besoteth them, therupon they surmize that it is impossible for men to loue their enimies. And therefore they shake off Gods yoke, and say it is no expresse comauendement that ought to be obserued of necessitie, but only a counsell that Iesus Christ giueth : and furthermore that the sayd counsell cōcerneth the perfectiō of the gospel, but was not so vnder the law : and that is an other blasphemy. But here ye see that Job protesteth it, & wee know not whither he liued before the law of Moyses was published. Howbeit : (as I haue shewed heretofore) he was afore the time of the Prophets (for they make mention of him as of a man of former time): & yet neverthelesse he declareth that he loued his enimies. And whence came this vnto him ? Came it not of the lawe which hath euer bene written in the harts of the faythfull ? hath God set downe any thing in the two tables which he hath not alwayes written by his holy spirit in the harts of his childrē ? And what els doth he at this day through the whole holy scripture : but set those things before our eyes which he graueth in vs by his holy spirit ? in somuch that there is a cōformitie betweene the doctrine that is preached, & the inward grace that God giueth vs by his holy spirite : and they agree in all poynts and all respects. Then we see here, that before our Lord Iesus Christe came downe into the world, Job protested that he loued his enimies in such wise as he reioyced not at their fall. I told you that it behoued vs to marke well this poynt. For what a shame shall it be to vs, if being admonished by our Lord Iesus Christes exhortation, we go about to seeke startingholes, and will not follow at leastwise those that liued in such time as the doctrine was yet very darke ? shal we not be double faultie ? Yes surely shall wee : so then let vs marke first of all, that it hath alwayes bene Gods will, that the louing of their enimies should be the marke of his childrē. And for proufe hereof, let vs hearken what is sayd in the lawe of Moyses: If thine enimies oxe or asse be fallē into a ditch, thou shalt lift him out. God comauenth vs to do good to our enimies brute beasts : & shall we not then do the best we ca to succour their owne persons ? I am bound to procure mine enimies welfare, and to shew it euen in his cattell : & what shall I then do to his person which is much more precious ? So then we haue to conclude against the horrible blasphemie of the Papists, that Gods will hath at all times bene, that the faythfull shoulde loue those that hate them, and indeuer to do those good which hurte them. Marke that for one poynt. And herewpon wee haue also to marke, that it is not a counsell that may freely be left vndonne : but a streyght comauendement, agaynst the which wee cannot striue without offending God deadly. Nowe seing it is so that God woulde binde the faythfull to loue their enimies, euen in time of the lawe : much more reason is it that wee shoulde haue the sayde rule now. For wee haue a more large declaration of it by the holy mouth of our Lorde Iesus Christe. The doctrine of the lawe is darke of it selfe : yea and it was wrested awry by the Scribes and the Phariseys : but nowe hath Iesus Christe brought it agayne to his purenesse, and tolde vs, that if wee loue not those which hate vs, and indeuer not to helpe those that would hurte vs, vs, wee shall not be acknowledged for Gods children. Surely it is a horrible threate that wee shall be disherited of Gods kingdome, and that he wil shake vs off and banishe vs from the fellowship of his children. Seing then that our Lord Iesus Christe hath with such threatening tolde vs, that we must beare good will to our enemies : let vs learne to frame our selues to that doctrine, and therein acknowledge, that the shamelesse boldnesse of the Papists hath bene to villeyous, yea and to diuelish, in saying that Iesus Christes woordes are but a simple admonition, seing it is matched with such a sentencie of damnation that God will renounce vs, and banishe vs out of his kingdome, if wee ouermaster not our heartes so farre, as to loue those that hate vs. Moreouer wee haue also a mirror hereof in our Lorde Iesus Christe : for he offered himselfe for such as were his deadly enemies. VVherefore indured hee so bitter death : but to reconcyle vs ? Now if there behoued a reconciliation to be made : then was there a hatred, and God and wee were at oddes.

Behold then, our Lord Iesus Christ yelded himselfe to death, yea and to all curses to recouer vs vnto God his father, at such time as wee were his enemies : and ought not such a pledge to breake our hartes though they were harder than stone ? And this is i<sup>t</sup> also wherevnto Sanct Paule bringeth vs backe in the Epistle to the Ephesians, when he goeth about to subdue all the hatred which wee haue conceyued agaynst our enimies. Thus then the order which we haue to note, is that those which liued vnder the lawe offended God when they intended too reuenge themselues : and therefore what shall become of vs which haue such a declaration as I haue tolde you already ? Howbeit, it is not ynough for vs to beare our enimies no euill will : but wee muste also haue a minde to seeke their benefite and welfare. And this is well woorthise to be noted. For diuers haue thought they shoulde be discharged before God, so they ranne not with naked swoerde agaynst those that haue offended them or done them any wrong. As for mee (say they) I will seeke no reuenge : but I pray God auenge me of them, &c it would do mee good at the heart if I might see a mischiefe light vpon them. Yea ? nay, here is another maner of practising of this doctrine, when Iesus Christ declareth vnto vs that we must pray for them that curse vs, speake well of them that backebite vs, and do good to them that seeke to hurt vs. But contrarywise wee are so full of poysone, that wee desire nothing but that God shoulde ouerwhelme them. And on what side soever any mishap befalleth them : we are glad of it. Can this be done without the ouerthrow of all that is contayned in the doctrine of our Lord Iesus Christ. There are others also to be found which haue not so malicioouse a heart as to suffer their wicked lustes to haue open libertie : but they will say, as for mee I am ready to forgiue him, and I wishe him no more harme than to my self : and yet in the meane season they cannot wish the welfare and profite of such as haue displeased them, or with whome they be offended. But let vs marke that it is not ynough for vs too absteyne from all revenging with our handes and our tongues, nother is it ynough for vs to put away euill will, so as wee would not wishe any harme or aduersitie to such as are our enimies : but it behoueth vs to go one degree further. And how is that ? It is that wee multe loue them. For if Job had not loued his enimies, surely he would haue reioyced at their misfortune. So then lette vs learne, not onely to keepe our hearts locked vp, that they be not prouoked agaynst such as offend vs : but lette vs learne to beare them such an affection of freindship, as wee may bee sorie when any euill happeneth vnto them, and also haue pitie and compassion of them : and if this seeme too harde for vs to do : was not Job a man subiect to affections as wee bee ? and yet did God get the vpper hande of them. Then behoueth it vs to fight. That cannot be done without great enforcement. It is true : but wee muste strayne our selues, howbeit not vpon truste of our owne strength, but with praying vnto God to giue vs the spirite of meekenesse to bring vs thither as wee see his woordie leadeth vs. VVhat is to be done then ? if I looke vnto the thing that is coming : it is certayne that my nature draweth quyte backward. For I shall be angry when a man hurteth me or hath practized any euill agaynst mee. And although I loue vprightnesse and good dealing : yet shall I not fayle to be inflamed with hartburning, and to haue some desire of reuenge against such as haue gone about to do me harme. Yet notwithstanding I see here that Iesus Christ condēneth mee, and pronounceth this dreadfull sentence, that God will shake mee of, and that I shall be razed out of the number of his children, if I loue not mine enimies. And therefore seyng I know, not onely the infirmite, but also the frowardnesse of my nature : it behoueth mee to pray God to correct these vices in mee. I knowe that I haue nothing but bitternesse in mee : wel then, God hath the spirite of sweetenesse : therefore it behoueth mee to seeke it at his hande. Go to, there is in mee a certayne frowardnesse that vexeth mee, and God hath the spirite of meekenesse and gentlenesse : then behoueth it mee to desire him to make me partaker of it. If wee haue our recourse after this sort, vnto God : surely we shall not want any thing. Furthermore let vs enter into our selues and inforce ourselues : for what shall wee gayne by soothing of our selues ? It is true in deede that God commaundeth mee such a thing : but I am a man, I feele mine owne infirmite, yea and I am diseased. Behold, the Phisition offereth himselfe, and commeth with the Medicine in his hand : and yet had I leuer to continue still in my disease, than to suffer any medycyne to bee ministred vnto mee : nowe then I pray you, am I therefore too bee excused ? VVherefore, in asmuch as wee know the vices that are in vs, lette vs go to the remedy : wee neede not seeke farre for it : and although wee be very loth, yet behoueth it vs to fight agaynst our lustes : assuring our selues that they be as madde beastes, and therefore great force and violence must be vsed to oppresse them. And here yee see why I sayde, that it behoueth vs to streyne and inforce our selues : for wee shall haue much ado to bring it to passe. Neuerthelesse if wee go to it after this sorte : God will turne the bitternesse of our nature into louing kindnesse and sweetenesse, and he will not suffer vs to hate our enimies. And for this consideration, as oft as we be tempted to hate our enimies, we must call to minde the request that wee make when wee desire God to forgiue vs our faultis as we forgiue them that offend vs. Forthere it behoueth vs to bee cited before God, according as in very deede we come to present our selues before Gods iudgement seate. How ? VVhen I protest vnto my God, that I forgiue myne enimies, and that I desire none other pardon than I graunt them, and yet in the meane whyle there is nothing but dissimulation in mee : VVhat ? Shall not my prayer bee turned into cursing ? if wee thought well vpon this : surely wee might breake the wicked stomachacke that is in vs, and at length God shoulde haue the victorie, so as it should be easie for vs cuen to loue them that hate vs. But that wee may the better knowe the euill that is in vs : lette vs go to it by degrees as the Scripture leadeth vs. It is not possible but wee shall bee stirred vp when a man dothe vs any wrong ? VVell, there is one sinne already if we do but grudge agaynst him in our heart :

Math. 5.c.

Ephes. 4.f.

heart: according as our Lord Iesus Christe sayeth, wee haue already gayned the everlasting fire. And his exprefsing hereof is by a similitude which he borroweth of the maner of the iudgements that were in histime. Therfore to make comparison of the three degrees of offending in this behalfe: he sayeth that the first is woorthie to be punished by iudgement. But when we open our mouth to vtter any woordes of spite or disdayne agaynst him that hath offended vs: then is there a condemnation yet grieuouser and more to be feared: as if we were condemned by a councell or cōsistorie somewhat more solemnly assembled: according as Iesus Christ alledgeth that similitude. The third degree is when we come to open raging in woordes thorough choler: and this offence deserueth to be punished as it were by the chiese court of justice. But Iesus Christ leuing the similitude, sayeth playnely that such a one is worthy of hell fire. He meeneth that al three are worthy of it, but yet notwithstanding he sheweth the degrees of the euill. Then if a man haue any fuddayne choler: although the same settle not in his heart: yet ye see hee hath already deserued euerlasting death before God. How shall wee do then if wee foster deadly hatred in our hearts and be full of venomous rancour to bereuenged of them that haue done vs any wrong? wherefore let vs learne to correct this vice in vs, and vnderstand, that if any euill woorde haue scaped our mouth, it behoueth vs to be sorie for it, and to fall to that which Sainct Paule sayeth, namely that the sunne go not downe vpon your wrath, least yee give possession vnto Sathan. Hereby wee be warned, that if wee haue bene moued to any displeasure, the same must passe away and the sunne must not go downe vpon it, so as our anger should multiply in it selfe. And why? The punishment that Sainct Paule addeth, ought to touche vs neere. For sayeth he, it is to giue Satan possession of vs. If a man shoulde demaunde of any of vs, whether wee would that the Diuell should haue the masterie of vs, and reygne ouer vs, and be our Prince: wee would vtterly abhorre it. And yet notwithstanding wee do it as oft as wee beare any euill will agaynst our enemies. VVe cannot make God a lier, nor his holy spirite whiche speaketh by the mouth of S. Paule. But when wee knowe this: lette vs passe further, and thinke thus with our selues: yonder saine is a creature of God, and I see he is a wretched damned soule: what ought wee to do then, but onely pray God for such as are in the way to destruction. And agayne, hath not our Lorde Iesus Christe redemeed mennes soules? true it is that the effect of his death cometh not to the whole worlde: Neuerthelesse for asmuch as it is not in vs too discerne betweene the righteous and the sinners that go to destruction, but that Iesus Christe hath [to our knowledge] suffered his death and passion aswell for them as for vs: therefore it behoueth vs to labour to bring every man too saluation, that the grace of our Lorde Iesus Christe may be auayleable to them. And furthermore if this bee to heauie for vs, lette vs consider what comparison there is betweene God and vs. For who is he that offendeth not God dayly? and yet neuerthelesse assoone as wee returne vnto him, he giueth vs libertie to come familiarly thither without doubting that wee shall be receyued. And yet in the meane whyle if any man offendeth vs, there is no meanes to be founde to make vs frendes agayne.

Thus ye see what wee haue to gather of this sentence, where we heare Job protest that he not onely forbare all reuenge, but also was sorie when any euill happened to his enemies, and his heart rejoyced not when he hearde speaking of it. Neuerthelesse the holy Scripture telleth vs, that the righteous shall reioyce at the confuzion of the wicked: and that is true. Howbeit to the intent to haue such a gladnesse as God alloweth, it behoueth vs to bee scoured and clenzed from all priuie malice and all regard of our owne persons. VVhen Gods children reioyce at the aduersitie of the wicked, it must be to the ende to acknowledge that God is iust and righteous: and yet therewithall they must also take warning to walke in feare, seeing that God sheweth himselfe a iudge, and giueth them example and instruction at other mennes coste. VVhen wee do it after that sort: it is a beholding of the vpright iustice of our God, and a learning to walke in feare and carefulnesse. By the examples that he giueth vs, so as we haue no respect of our owne persones to reuenge our selues when wee be prouoked to any wrath by meanes of any euill that is done vnto vs: but rather do vtterly forgive it, and moreouer haue pitie and compassion on the wretched soules that perish.

Thus yee see after what maner wee may lawfully reioyce at the fall of the wicked. True it is then that it behoueth vs to gloriſe God in all the iudgements which he executeth in the worlde: but lette vs beware wee mingle not our fleshly affections with it. For it behoueth our zeale to bee pure when wee will reioyce at the aduersitie which God sendeth vpon the wicked. Furthermore Job addeth this circumstance which I haue touched, that is to say, that his household seruaunts had bene as fyrebrandes to prouoke him, and would fayne haue had him reuenge himselfe: and yet for all that hee had not bene moued a whit as he sayeth. Some vnderstand this sentence very rudely: as though Iobs seruaunts should be greeued with him for entartayning straungers to curteously, and therefore wished him dead for the paynes whereto he did put them. But that is quyte from the matter. For Job meeneth to declare nomore here, but that although his seruaunts prouoked him to reuenge when they saw men do him harme and wrong: yet notwithstanding he refrayned himselfe, and yelded not to such temptations. And this is well worthy to be noted: for it was an excellent vertue in him, to be lesse moued with the wrongs that were done to him, than his household seruants were. There is noman but he taketh his own wrongs so to hart, as other men cannot pacifie him. It may perchaunce be sayd to a man that hath a displeasure done him, stay your selfe, I will take the wrong as done to my owne person, let me alone with it, I will reuenge you well ynough: but yet cannot that content his minde, his affections are so farre out of order.

But wee see contrarywise that Iobs seruaunts were greeued when menne did wrong to their master, and not he himselfe: and therefore it muste needs bee sayde, that the spirite of God wrought in him after a singuler and wonderfull fashion. Howbeit wee muste marke by the way, that hee doth not vaunte himselfe here to purchace estimacion: but is set foorth as a mirror and patterne for vs, as if God had set him vpon a scaffold too the ende wee shoulde labour to fashion our selues like vnto him, and be out of all doubt that there is no excuse for vs, if we follow not such an example. VVhat is to be done then? Although we haue tētations to prouoke vs to reuenge our selues of our enimies, yea and that men also do pricke vs forward & inflame vs, and otherfome also do flatter vs in our sinnes: yet must we not therefore beleue such flatteries, but wee muste settle our eyes and mindes vpon God. For what is the cause that menne doo so easely pardon and iustifie themselues when God condemneth them, but for that they giue eare too suche as come too picke thankes by tale bearings? And why? is not is not that lawfull for vs to do? Specially, if I haue done you wrong: why shold you not seeke your reuenge and requyte like for like? there needeth no retorickē to persuade vs to do harme to our enimies: for there is not that vayne nor sinnewe in vs, which is not forwarde ynough that way: yea, wee are rather to furious in that case. And yet in the meane whyle beholde what aduocates do come to cloke our vices by soothing vs vp in our sinne. Somuch the more then behoueth it vs too minde diligently what our Lord Iesus Christ commandeth vs: namely to loue our enemies in such wyse as our eares be stopped agaynst all things that may be ailegged to vs by menne. So that if there be any folke that flatter vs, and seeme maynteyners of our honour and profite, and that they coulde finde in their hearts to employ themselves wholly for vs: let vs suspect such kinde of folke. It were much better that a man shoulde rebuke vs when he seeth vs to farre moued and out of pacience, and that he shoulde labour to assuage our rage: than that he shoulde come to set it forwarde after that sorte, notwithstanding that hee do it of a good will, according as some men will be so affectioned towardes vs, that if they see another do vs wrong, they will come to declare it vnto vs: saying, I take such a harme to be as myne own, and I will reuenge it, I will not suffer such an outrage to be done to you. Therfore it may well come to passe that a man shall haue some good zeale when he seeth vs disquieted: but in the meane whyle what shall wee gayne by it, but to be thrust headlong into greater ruine? So then the beste freendes that we can haue, are those that labour to bridle vs when we haue any iniurie done vs. Furthermore when wee be tempted by such makebates as come to increase the mischiefe: lette vs recouer all our wittes vnto God, and say: notwithstanding that menne iustifie mee, yet shall I not therefore bee quite before the heauenly iudge, and therefore it behoueth mee too brydle my selfe to suffer this wrong. For seing it pleasest God to take mee for one of his children: it becommeth mee to followe him, and to fashion my selfe like vnto him. And sith he cauſeth the Sunne to shine both vpon good and euill: I must indeuer to do good to such as woulde hurte mee, and by that meanes heape coles of fyre vpon their heads. After this maner must wee practize this sentence. And moreover lette vs marke also what Job addeth, and that shall serue vs for an ende. Namely, that the straunger was not lodged in the streetes, but that his gate was always open to him. Here Job declareth that he was frendly to such as had no meanes to recompence him: and that also is the very effect, whereby wee shewe that we haue a right charitie towardes menne. For if wee do good to such as are able to requite it, and to such as are alied vnto vs, eyther by kinred or by some other bond: it is no true and perfect prooef of our charitie. True it is, that that frendlinesse is good, if it bee ruled according to godlinesse: but yet it is possible that in so doing wee shall haue more regard of our selues than otherwise, like as wee oftentimes see that a man seeketh his owne peculiar profite in doing good to his kinsfolke and freends. But when wee do good to such as are not able to requyte it, yea and to such as are vnyknowne to vs: therein wee shewe that wee serue God, and holde the right rule of charitie. Thus yee see what Job protesteth here: and specially he speaketh of straungers, as of those whom God commendeth vnto vs thorough all the holy Scripture, and not without cause. For such as are at home in their owne countrey Exod.22. c.21. shall haue relieve ynough, they shall haue kinred and many other helpe and succours, and a man cannot lightly hurte them. But contrarywise poore straungers are destitute of all helpe, they haue nother freends nor kinsfolke, nother haue they any ayde or fauour towardes the worldē. Leuit.19. g. 33.

Yee see then that the right triall of our louing kindnesse, is when wee intende to shewe that wee serue God truly without seeking our owne peculiār profite. And surely our Lorde doth more rigorously condemne the outrages that are done to straungers, than those that are done to a mans owne neyghbours. True it is that both twayne of them are worthy to be condemned, and nothing shall scape vnpunished: howbeit let vs marke therewithall, that God receyveth those into his protection and saufe keeping, which are not maynteyned by men. And verely wee see howe God sheweth that wee set not our selues agaynst a mortall man when wee do any wrong or violence to such as he hath takeo into his custodie: but that it is an offending of his Maiefie. And so much the better ought this thing to be printed in our hearts: for so much as wee see the very Heathen men do shame vs in that behalfe. For when they intended to shew that some man was of a slauish and wicked nature, they were wont to say, auaunt, thou art a churle towardes straungers. It was more with them, than if they had called a man whoremaster, theefe, drunkard, periured, or murtherer. When it was sayde, go, thou art an enemy of straungers, it was as much to say, as thou art worse than a brute beast. The Paynims spake after that maner, and made a common Proverbe of it: and what shall become of vs then which professe our selues to be Gods children, when wee fight so directly agaynst the order of nature? Is it not a token that wee mocke God to the full: and that wee woulde spitefully prouoke his maiestie agaynst vs? Therefore let vs marke well the protestation that Job maketh here: that is to witte, that hee not onely was liberall towards those whom he knewe to be of abilitie to requite it: but also that he employed himself vpon such as were not able to make any recompence. Lette vs consider with Job (I say) that God hath set one common and generall bonde among all mankindē, and that it behoueth vs to bestowe our charitie vpon such as resemble vs, and to haue pitie vpon them in succoring them, euery of vs according to his abilitie. And if wee be Gods children, let vs labour to exercise true brotherlinesse towardes all menne: but specially towardes those that are more neerely knitte vnto vs by the bond of fayth: lette vs bend our selues aboue all to do them good.

Nowe lette vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faultes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as wee may be sorie for the vices that haue reigned ouermuch in vs, and do yet still reyngē: and that wee may flee for refuge to his mercie: and that therewithall it may please him to tame and mortifie all our wicked affections, and to beare with our infirmities, guyding vs to himselfe, and drawing vs neerer and neerer vnto him, vntill wee become to the ende of the race wherevnto wee trauell all the tyme of our lyfe. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heauenly father wee acknowledge and confess according to the truth, that we be not worthie to liste vp our eyes to Heauen, to present our selues before &c.

33. If I haue hid my sinne as euery man doth, or put mine iniquitie in my secrete:
 34. Though I vvere able to breake a great throng: yet the despized of houses astonished mee, I kept silence, and I vvent not out of my dore.

Ere wee haue a protestation well worthie to be noted. For Job sheweth vs by his owne example, that when we haue done amisse, the remedie is not to hide our faultes as the comon custome of all men is to do: but to confesse the misdeede willingly, and not to be ashamed to be acknowne of the sinne which we haue committed, to the end it may be wiped out before God. Surely this is a very rare vertue, & therfore so much the more standeth it vs in hande to marke what is shewed vs here. For Job speaketh not for himselfe only: but he giueth an instruction that may serue for all of vs. Therefore he declareth, that he bad not bid his sinne, nor layed it vp in secrete. That is to say, he had not laboured to cleere himselfe afore men, but had yeelded himselfe guiltie, and acknowledged his offences. Marke that for one poynct. Therewithall he sheweth how men are attainted with the vice of hypocrisy, & that it is their fashiō to denie things, and to vse startingholes, so as their faultes be put vnder foote. In this place he hath vsed the worde Adam which signifieth a man, and is sometimes taken for euery man. In this text Job ment to say, that there shall neuer be any found so well touched, as to acknowledge their faults, but rather will finde wayne backshrinckings to hyde them. Although then that this vice do reygne in the world: yet doth Job protest that he is cleare from it. True it is that Adam began first that trade, and shewed the same to all such as came of his race. For we see that when he was convicted, streightwayes he labored to hyde himselfe with leaues. And afterwarde when God summoned him to appeare before him, still he found a trifling excuse, and woulde fayne haue scaped by some meanes or other. Ye see then that Adam was the first beginner to shew hypocrisy to his posterite. For he learned that lesson, not only to himselfe, but also to wrappe all men in. It is not two or three of vs only: but all of vs haue it of nature. Surely the Diuell winneth much at our hands, when he maketh vs to cloke our faultes: for if wee acknowledge them, wee must needes be ashamed of them. But if wee haue once couered the Euill: wee thinke all is safe, and therupon take leauie to fall a sleepe: every of vs findeth this in himselfe by experience. I pray you if we were prouoked to mourne before God & to craue pardō of him, should we not by & by haue remorse of our sinnes, to be sorie for them, and to seeke remedie? Yes: but the Deuil blindeth vs, or else tieth kerchers before our eyes, or else disguseth things in such wise vnto vs, as we cannot discerne the euill to be as it is. Lo in what case wee bee. And therfore it behoueth vs so much the more to studie this lesson of not putting vp our wickednesse as it were into our bosome, that is to say, not to hyde it: but to lay it open. True it is that when a man knoweth his sinne, it is possible that he shall become desperate, as it happened both to Cain and Iudas. Neuerthelesse we cannot come to repentaunce, nor desire forgiuenesse at Gods hand, nor finally be deliuered of our offences, vntill they be layed open, and all hypocrisy be set aside. Furthermore he that is come to the knowledge of his sinne, and is at desfiance with it in himselfe, will desire nomore to hide himselfe to the worldward, according as we see that we haue always vn-truthes in our mouths to iustifie our selues withal. There will be no such thing in vs: for repentance bringeth true humilitie. Therefore as for him that is convicted before God to haue done amisse, and willingly acknowledgeth his fault without shrinking backe, no doubt but he is also ready to condemne his offences before men, and to shew that he is sorie for them. But let vs nowe see if the thing that was in Jobs time, be not increased now adayes, in so much that there is nothing more rife, than hypocrisy. Truely we see by this text, that it is no new thing for men to seeke to disguyse themselues, and to take couert when they haue done amisse: It hath bene so at all times and (as I sayd afore) it began at Adā, and hath continued vnto this Gen. 3. b. 11. day. Howbeit we see such shamelesnesse in the worlde at this present, that those dayes were nothing in comparison of these we see now. For if one go about to warne a man of his sinne, he shall finde a brazen face to denie it, when the thing is altogether manifest. The partie shal know wel enough that his euill doing is knowne: and yet notwithstanding he will not haue it spoken of, but would stoppe euery mans mouth with his outfacing of it. Yea and many times, he contenteth not himselfe with such shamefull deniall: but also falseth to quarrelling and threatening of them that speake of it. Then if men did hide their faults in jobs time: they do it much more in these dayes. But yet for all that, it is no sufficient defense, nother shall it be receyued before God, according as wee see in this text. Although all men be hardharted and wilfull, so as no man will come to reason, but when folke labour to draw sinners to repentaunce, they kicke agaynst them lyke restie iades: lette vs assure our selues that jobs example is set forth for our learning, and that wee must not follow the common trade, nor say, euery man doth so, it is the common custome. No: but let vs looke vpō God who draweth vs the contrarie way. VVould men iustifie mee? And God will haue euery of vs to condēne himselfe. Do men conceale their faulcs to the end they might be vnowne? God will haue vs discouer them, yea euen with all lowlinesse. Then behoueth it vs to come to that poynct, and not to say, I see all men do so, and it is euery mans custome. VVhat though? Men did so in the time of Job: but they were condemned by the holy ghost. Therefore, when we see men do the like now adayes, that is to say, that no man confesseth his faultes: yet neuerthelesse lette the faythfull learne to frame themselues to that which is shewed here: that is to wit, not only to mourne before God, but also to shewe before men, that they be sorie in their hartes, and condemne themselues in such wise, as they may become their own iudges, and obteyne mercy of the heauenly iudge by returning vnto him. To be short, we see that hypocrisy is condemned by this texte. The beste for vs were to abstayne vtterly from sinne, and to keepe our selues from it. But forasmuch as wee be so frayle as wee cannot liue in this worlde without taking many falles: the remedie is to stoupe and mourne before God, and moreouer not to go aboute to saue our honestie in such wise afore men, as wee should not yeelde our selues guilty as often as neede shall requyre. True it is that God comandeth not a man to proclayme it in the streates whē he hath done amisse, & say I haue committed such a fault: for that were rather to cast a stubling block. But yet it stādeth deth vs vpon, to m<sup>r</sup>ke what is sayde in the holy Scripture: namely, first of all that wee muste be lowly towards our neighbours, assuring our selues that wee be infected with many vices. VVhat is the cause that a man despiseth al other men and can beare nothing at their hand, but thundereth at them when they hane done amisse? VVhat is the cause of it (I say) but this Hypoerisie? For if wee knew our owne infirmities, surely they would as it were bryde vs, that wee shold not condemne other folkes at auenture, but begin at our selues. Thus yee see the first thing that we haue to do, and which is commanede vs by the holy Scripture. So then are wee miide and gentle in bearing one with an other? It is a kind of confessing our owne sinnes. The second thing is, that when we haue offended any man, it behoueth vs to come to reason: For we see that otherwise we haue no access vnto God, according also as our Lord Iesus Christ sheweth vs that our Sacrifices and offerings shall not be accepted, vnsesse we be reconciled to our neyghbours when wee haue offended them. Therfore we must leare to be sory in their behalf if we know our sinnes. And thirdly, when we haue giuen any cause of stumbling let vs come humbly to amend it, yea and so to amend it, as the evil may not be borne with all, nor we kick against the spurre. Thus yee see the three cōfessions with the scripture requireth of vs as in respect of men. Herewithall let vs marke, that all this cōmeth and proceedeth of the sayd ryght meining which we haue in sorowing before God. For vntill wee be fully sory at the hart that wee haue offended: we shall never make a pure and ryght confession before men, for whatsoeuer 20 wee doo: it shall bee but saynedesse. And so it is certaine that those which shal haue confessed themselues before God to be such as they be, will also haue the modestie of not iustifying themselfes afore men. For it is a moekerie when any man shall say, Oh I, I know myself a sinner before God: and yet notwithstanding shall bee so wilfull towards men, as no reason nor truth eā be wrung from him. Such an one sheweth that the diuell hath bewitched him, and that he hydeth his faults and layeth the vp in his bosome, as much as he possibly can. VVherefore let vs marke well, that if wee be come to the poynt of feeling our sinnes, and of being ashamed too haue transgresed Gods lawe, and too haue done against his righteousnesse: wee shal haue no more prude to hinder vs from making a pure confission, and such as we ought to make before him. Furthermore it behoueth vs also to marke, how it is sayd here that Job did not put his sin into his secret. This importeth very much: For men cannot beguile God, but they beguile themselues, and therupon it seemeth too them that they haue gayned much, when they can put their sinnes out of their mynd too thinke no more vpon them. If a man can forget himself and cast his faults behynd his back, or thrust them vnder his foote without thinking any more vpon them: then is he no more sad, then feeleth he no more greef, but is fotted in his wickednesse, he is as it were stark rotten, and feeleth not any more of it. But yet in the meane whyle God ceaseth not to do the duty of a judge: For all things are registred before him, and although hee make no countenaunce for a tyme, yet must ali come 30 too an accompt before him. Men could find in their harts to bee always hidden, that is too say, not too see their faultes, and then they think they shall never come to light. But their sin continueth still, and although it bee buried in respect of men, yet wil God bring it to light. Job then sheweth heere, that men do but beguyle themselues by couering their sinnes after that sort. For they must needs appeare and be brought too light, howsocuer the world go. Then let vs remember, that it is best for vs to ouenclike our owne faults, that God may deliuer vs from them. For if we bring the before him with a free hart, and condēne the euill that is in the: it is certaine that they shal be vtterly done away if we require it. Therfore let vs condemne the euill where we find it; to the end we be not condemned of God. For as long as wee do hold our harts so close, and labour to conceale our faults in the: it behoueth God to fight against vs, and vs to feele how it belongeth to him to scatter the cloudes, and too pluck away the sigleaves wherwith we shal haue couered our dishonesty, insomuch that we shal be inforced to perceiue it spite of our teet, & it shal be knowne both to me and Angels. This is it that we haue to remēber in this streine, where mencion is made of putting a manes sin into his secret. To be short, it wil happē vnto the as it doth vnto those that hide a sore. The sore is hidde in the body, and yet in the meane whyle there is no meane made to purge it, but a man couereth it in such wise as it shal not be knowne, and yet the infectiō doubleth for al the cloking of it, and the rancor of it increaseth more and more for want of cleasing of it. It were better that it were opened: for then shoulde it haue some issue to purge it self, which thing it eat not do, because the disease is so pent vp within. Euen so fare we when we go about to hyde our faults. For the is there as it were a rotte sore, and we would faine hold it in by force, and our striuing to kepe it secrete, breedeth a greater rankling, which causeth the mischeif too increase and inflame more and more. VVhat is to be done then? There is no meanes but that which I haue spokē of: which is, to come before god, and not to be ashamed to cōfesse our wretchednesse, to the end that he may remedie it as he knoweth most cōuenient for vs: and also to become our owne iudges, for he is so gracieuse vnto vs, as to make vs our owne iudges: and insteade of condēning vs, he is ready to acquite vs. On the contrary, part, drag we back as much as we can, wee do but offend our God, and prouoke a greater vengeance against vs. And that is a cause, why it is not for vs to shet vp our faults in seereat as we are woont to do. And here is men- 40 tiō made exprestely of our hydings, clokings or couerts, bycause me of their own nature do find many pretē shiffts and sleights to shun Gods presence: yea for a whyle. True it is that we may wel shink aside, but yet doth God see vs through hiē Neuerthelesse (as the Prophet Esay sayth) the wicked do dig themselues caues, and when they think no more vpon Gods iudgement: then it seemeth to the that they haue very well shifft off the matter. And further if that serue not their turne, they fall to the flat contrary, & runne vp and downe, and whē they find any new mouse-hole or cranie, then are they safe, (so beare they themselues in hand,) and if they cannot hyde themselves altogether, they play the partriches or yong childre, which think it yrough if their owne eyes be hidden. And so the cause why here is expresse mention made of our hydings, is for that we be naturally giuen to hypocrisie, and seke continually some pretē shiffts to beguile God: wherin we do but beguile our selves as it is seene. For it doth but soade vs in our wickednesse, and in the meane whyle we consider not that in so doing the diuell doth so possesse vs, as wee cannot recouer our selues vnto the for eraine Phisicō that is able to heale and cure al our diseazes. Furthermore after that Job hath protest<sup>d</sup> the knowing of his faults: he addeth, that although he had ben able to breake a great thong: yet he feared the veriest taskalles, and went not out of his bowe. Howbeit before we passe any further, let vs marke what maner of man it is that speketh. It is Job, who had liued an Angel amoung men, and had behaved himself so vncorruptly, as his like is hardly too bee seene through the whole world: and yet notwithstanding he sayth, that he bid not his faults. How shal we do then? For if a man compare the righteousest and perfectest men with Job, he shal finde that they come nothing neere the holinesse and vprightnesse that was in him. Now if a man that had such feare of God, and liued so vncorrupt alife, acknowledged himselfe to be a sinner, and would not stand to the mayntaunce of his honour, but yeelded himselfe guilty when he had done amisse: what a shame is it at this day, that such as are a great deale further off from such holynesse, will not confess their faultes playnely and throughly? I pray you muste not the worlde bee needes worse than blinde now adayes when men cannot be made to yelde glory vnto God by confessing their sinnes? Job hath declared vnto vs that he was as the eye vnto the blinde, the feete of the lame, the father of the fatherlesse, and the defender of the wydowes: agayne he declareth, that he was the common host of poore straungers, that he had clothed the naked with the wooll of his sheepe, that hee had not eaten his bread alone, that he had not done any man violence, and that although he had credite in the place of iustice, and might haue bene borne out: yet had he never giuen any man cause to complayne of him. After the declaration of all these things he addeth that he had not hidden his faultes. But now adayes there is none of vs all, but he is infected with many vices, whereof Job was cleere: and yet notwithstanding wee woulde seeme much more righteous than he. Muste not the Diuell needes haue plucked out our eyes, so as wee can nomore see what sinne is, but haue forgone all remorse, which is 30 the extremitie and vttermost poynt of all euill as S. Paule sayeth? So then lette vs learne to compare Job with our selues as oft as wee be so foolish and ouerweening as to acquite our selues. And let vs acknowledge that we come farre short of such a perfection as Job had: and therefore that there is nothing for vs to do, but to mourne before God, and to condemne our selues vtterly. And when we be so condemned before him, let vs learne to vse such mildenesse towrdes men, that if wee haue offended our neighbours by doing amisse, we may améit it, & that if we haue done any man wronz, we may labour to be recóciled to him, and to be short, that we may be ashamed of our sinnes, and in all poynts and all respects yelde glory vnto God. And now Job proceedeth with his mildenesse in saying, that he bad feared the veriest rascalles of all men, notwithstanding that he was able to breake and beare downe a great throng of people. This texte is taken otherwysse of some men. For the Hebrew woerde that Job vseth here (I meene the woord which I haue translated to breake or burst asunder) signifieth sometime to feare or be afryd. So then the sayde woerde signifieth both to feare or be afryde: and also to oppresse, beare downe, trample, treade vnderfoote, breake, broose, or burst asunder. Some therfore expounde it as though Job declared, that he had not feared a great multitude: that is to say, that he was never abashed to rebuke euill wheresoeuer hee sawe it: according as when wee bezelouse to Godwarde, it is certayne that wee will not suffer any man to offend him without setting our selues against him: or seing that God hath done vs the honour to make vs his aduocates: we cannot at leastwise but declare our misliking of the euill, and indeuer to stoppe it as much as may be possible, putting

Eph. 4. e. 19. the lesson in vre which Sainct Paule sheweth vs in saying that wee muste not haue fellowship with the frutes of darkenesse, but muste reprove them. Many therefore do expound this text as though Job protested that hee had set himselfe agaynst euill, and letted it by all meanes wheresoeuer he founde it: and that although he might

haue purchased himselfe displeasure and hatred of the whole world, yet notwithstanding he ceassed not to condeme the euill alwayes where he found it: and this doctrine is good and profitable. And surely wee see howe necessarie a thing it is to stablish our selues in such stedfastnesse. For if wee intend to stoppe euill doing: wee muste haue the whole worlde, that is to say, most menne our enemies. True it is that God commaundeth vs to <sup>Ro. 12. d. 18.</sup> seeke peace with all men as neere as wee can. But when <sup>Hebr. 12. d.</sup> we do our duetic in that behalfe, wee shall be sure to set the whole worlde in our topes, if we go about to rebuke sinne. For wee see howe every man flattereth himselfe, and corrections are so harde and bitter, specially now adayes as no man is able to suffer them. Then seing it is so, we had neede to settle our selues in such stoutnesse, that although the whole world should ryse vp agaynst vs, and all men without exception should labour to oppresse vs, yet wee should not swarue aside, but perfist euen to condeme the euill. This doctrine surely is good and profitable: but if wee consider the order of the text: wee shall finde the naturall sense to be that which I haue touched. The first woord that Job vseth here signifieth, when, if, for, albeit, or although. Some thinke that by this protestation Job ment to denie that he stode in feare of any never so great a multitude: for the Verbe that commeth after the first woerde (as I sayde) signifieth to feare: howbeit the comónest signification of the first woerde is the same that I speake of Albeit or Although: and therevnto the Verbe doth commonly signifie to breake. And so I see Jobs meaning is that although he were able to breake and scatter a great throng of people, that is to say, although he were of great might, credite and authoritie: yet notwithstanding he did not ouerawe men to stoppe their mouths, but abased himselfe so farre, as to feare such as were most despized & as it were the ofcastes, rascals, & comon laughing stockes. This proueth well his former saying. For it is a very good signe that Job ment not to hide his face, seing he had the mildenesse to feare the basest sort. VVee know that a man for his richesse, or for some other gifte that is in him, shall be so auuthorised among men, as euer man shall feare him and stande in awe of him, and not open their mouth at him. And although he should comit all the faults in the world. Yet men durst not speak against him, except it were by muttering in secrete. For no man might haue libertie to say, Behold, such a man misbehaueth himselfe: And againe if such a one as is auanced so high, haue any brute going of him: he wil steppe forth and say, what? Haue they nobody to speake of but mee? And he will take on maruelously for the sauing of his honour or worship. VVee see then that this is a common thing in the world, and no maruell: seing that euen in the time of Job, those that were in credite abused their richesse and honour to the maynteyning of themselues in euill, and too the stopping of mennes mouthes that they shoulde not in any wise speake of them. It is an vnpardonable offence if a man shoulde rebuke a Prince or a Curteour, or a lawlesse person that is in authoritie of iustice: by and by there will be a great sturre kept, if such a mans honour be touched. And although there be many things in them worthy of blame: in so much that eue little children could tell them their faultes: Yet notwithstanding all men muste be whist. But contrarywise beholde, Job sayeth I was able to breake throngs of people, that is to say, I was able not onely to subdue mine enemies, but also to bruse them and breake them in peeces: and although the whole worlde had set themselues agaynst me, yet notwithstanding I was of such credite and power, as I could well haue gottē the vpper hand of them.

And what did I for all that? He sheweth that he was as meeke as a lambe, and that he suffered any man to reprove his faults. Although he were some rascal or begger sayeth he, yet I stode in awe of him, and I was ashamed when he spake of mee, and I acknowledged my sinnes. I tarried not till some greate army was rayled, or till some great men came to put mee to shame: but I give care to the basest sort in the world. Now we see what is the plaine meening of this text. But the principall point is, to learne to take profit by this doctrine. And first of all let such as are in any authoritie aboue others remember, that they must not make a cloke of it to couer their filthinesse, but a looking glasse to see how God hath exalted them to hygh degree, to the end that if there be any euill in them, it should be the more noted. And vndoubtedly it is good reason that those whome God hath graunted to be in degree of honour aboue their neyghbours, should indeuer themselues to shewe good example: seing they are so hyghly exaltered. And if they do the contrarie, their offence is so much the more greuouser, and God hath iust cause to vpbrayde them, saying: How now? I haue aduaunced thee and I haue reached thee my hand, to the end thou shouldest be as a burning cresset to giue light to the whole world. But seing thou hast giuen occasion of offence, thy shame must needes be the greater. Therfore let those whome God hath set in state of honour, vnderstand, that it is not to the end they should haue the greater libertie to do euill, and be able to stoppe playne folkes mouthes: they must not vse such a bucklet: For if they go about to couer and burie their faults after that sort, God will viter the greater vengeance against them in laying open their shame. Marke that for one point. And therewithall let the meaner sort haue cōsideration of the. For there is none of vs all that commeth nere to such authoritie as Job attributeth here to his owne person: wee are not able to breake throngs of people, nor to beare downe greate bands of men that may ryse vp against vs: hardly can wee fight with a snayle. Therfore by that meanes God holdeth vs in humilitie although it be against our wills. VVhat a matter were it then, if we would presume to shet the mouthes of those that haue iust cause to speake euil of vs: we are nothing, and lesse than nothing, & yet notwithstanding we would be still in reputation and haie our honour maynteyned, that no man should touch it, and if any man speake of it, we think that heauē and earth ought to be turned vpside downe for the taking away of that defamacion. And I pray you, is not that a fighting directly against nature? Although God had exalted vs and giuen vs the meane to maincayne our honour: yet wee heare how it is said here, that it behoueth vs to stand in awe of the basest sort. Now then, seing that God giueth vs not the brydle, but reineth vs short, to the end we should suffer our faults to be knowne: VVhat excuse is there if we fall to striuing against it? Thus ye see how the meaner sort ought to humble themselues double, considering that they see such a mirrour in the person of Job, that wheras he was able to beare downe greate multitudes, yet he submitted himself in such sort, as to suffer himself to be reproved of the meanest sort, yea euen of such as were counted the beggerliest of all others. VVherefore let vs haue the mildnesse to suffer our selues to be reproved, both of greate and small. I hys ye see what we haie to marke in the first place. And therewithall it behoueth vs also to way well this word despised: for behold, the cause that maketh vs so proude that we cannot be corrected: is our looking what men are, whether they be our equalles or no. And if they seeme no better than ourselues: wee think they haue no auantage ouer vs. Schall such a one take vpon him to rebuke mee? Is he better woorth than I? And furthermore we be not contented to esteeme me as our equalles, though they be much our betters, but we cast them vnder foote. For wee can good skill to note other mennes vices, yea and to inhaunce them, saying: VVho is he? do not men knowe that he hath done many things amiss? And in the meane whyle our owne faults be smoothed: all is clere in vs, and vice is made vertue. This is the thing that rocketh vs a sleepe in such pride as we canot receiuue any yoke or correction, when God sendeth men vnto vs to finde fault with vs, and to shewe vs, how greatly we be to blame. And therfore so much the more behoueth it vs to marke how Job sayeth here: I feare the most despised, that is too say, euen such as were as the offscourings and fi. th. of the world, yea euen the veriest raskalles in whome there was no dignitie nor any thing else. By this we see that if God do vs not the honour to warne vs by men of greate estimacion and credit: It doeth not therfore followe that we should despise the warning that other men giue vs. And for proof herof, the first thing that we ought to think when any man reproueth vs, is that he is a messenger sent vnto vs of God: insomuch that if a little child should speake to vs, and our conscience tell vs that he sayeth truth, wee refi. God if we be wilfull against him. Therfore let vs no more say what is he? despised, he to be heard: But let vs looke vpon the message that he bringeth vs, and if it be of God, let vs stoupe down our heades to receiuue the yoke. Marke that for one point. And for the second let vs marke, that oftentymes those whome we do so despize, are much better than our selues, and that nothing blindeth vs, but our owne hypocrisie bycause we serche not our owne vices as we ought to do, & yet in the meane whyle are ouer eare against our neyghbours. That is the cause which maketh vs so to reiect them which are worthy to be heard and receiued. Therfore let vs stripe our selues out of that prude, and learne to feele our owne wretchednesse, yea and to feele it in such wise, as we may be abashed, as wee are well worthy. And therewithall let vs not haue such an eye to the vices of our neyghbours, as we shold not looke vpon the vertues that God hath put into them, and honour them. Thus ye see what will cause vs to receiuue correction paciently. Againe, there is yet one other respect. For if we be warned by men of no valewe or estimacion, we must think with our selues: Behold, God intendeth to put mee to the more shame. For I deserue not that he should send mee any man of reputation to the worldward. He could rayse mee vp some Prophet, or he could send mee some man that were wife or honorable for his vertues: but he wll haue me subdewed by one that is despised & reiectet of al me. And why? To the end to make mee feele my diseaze the better. For if I were warned by some man that had autoritie ouer me, I wold think wel, it were a shame for thee to stryue against such a man: and that would cause mee to merrishe still some prude in me. But behold, God commeth to buffet mee after an other sort: he suffereth mee not to have some good freend to counself mee, or some man of good countenaunce to warne mee for the safegard of myne honestie. but he sendeth mee an outcast. Seing then that it is thus with mee, I must needs acknowledge that God doeth it not without cause. Lo how we are by all meanes brought to this reasonableness of fearing the meanest and most despised sort. Moreover when Job sayeth, that he went not out of dores: he meneth not that he vsed any back shrinkings, but that he refreyned himself willingly: suffring himself to be condemned without gaynsaying, and hyding himself, as a man conuictid. This in effect is the thing that we

haue to note. True it is that a man may sometimes hyde himself, and yet not cease to chawe vpon the bit and to seke reuengement against such as haue defamed him. But wher as it is sayd that Job went not out of his dores: It is not ment that he did it too the end he would not heare his reproch, and in the meane whyle practise to be reuenged of his enimies and of such as had sculaunded him. No: but he hild himself within his house to rid the place of such as had gone about to rebuke his faults: he gaue them their full scope, as if he shold say, I wil not set myself against them, I will not send my me to mainteyne my quarrell, let them condemne me before the whole world, here wil I keepe mee as locked vp in prison. VVe know that if a man be in prison, other men haue libertie ynough to cōmence actions against him. Job then of his owne wil kept himself as prisoner, to the end to suffer me to condēne him. And this is well worthy to be noted: for we see nowadyses that if a man be the giltyest in the world, and he vnderstand that other men speake of him, & heare some windie words, what will he do to remedie it? he wil come into the opē streete and iustle with his shoulders, & some like a boare: he will keepe a coyle to mainteyne his cuill, and he wil bring a rowte after him, saying: I wil get the vper hād whatsoeuer come of it: There are that haue spoken cuil of me, but I will find the meanes to stoppe al their mouthes that speake cuil of me. VVold God the exāples herof were not so manifest as they be. But what? A man cannot open his eyes, but he shall see it. It is an ouerordinarie vice that such as spylght God and the world, and sowe abroade their corruptions euery where, are vtterly shamelesse & shewe theselues possessed of the diuel. For they come forth facing and bracing with the forehead of a harlot, and whē they haue wyped their snoute, all is well againe, what soever the matter was. Their offences shall be so shameful, as the ayre shal stink of them, and yet shall not men dare speake one word, but must be fayne to giue place to those roysters. Seing then that this vice reyngeth euery where: wee haue somuch the more neede to marke the lesson that is shewed here: that is to wit, that when we haue offended, we must wil.ingly kepe our selues as prisoners, and seke by all meanes to brydie our selues, and suff. r men to condemne vs, that God may acquite vs. True it is that our holding of our selues in, must not be to cloke our sinnes by keeping silence: howbeit, let vs in the meane whyle be quiet, and not come abroad like brazenfaced fellowes to mainteyne our vices, nother let vs striue against God, but rather consider that we be blame worthy in all respects before his maiestie, and therfore that there is no other remedie for vs, but to flee to his infinite grace and mercy which he ysseth towards all poore sinners that returne vnto him.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, prayng him to make vs so to fele them, as being cōvictid of them, we may not followe our father Adam in vsing outleapes too think that we shal be quiet by shrinking aside from them, but rather that we may consider how we be more than damnable: and therupon flee only to his mercie, and also learne to be sory & to feele our own shame before me, to the intent that when wee haue discouered them before God and his Angels, wee may bowe vnder his maiestie which shal not be dreadfull vnto vs, because we be reconcyled vnto him by the meancs of our Lord Iesus Christ: And that forasmuch as we cānot live in this world without feeling our vices and imperfēctiōs ouermuch: it may please him to guide vs cōtinually by his holie spirit, vntil he haue clothed vs throughly with his owne righteousesse. That it may please him to graunt this grace, &c.

The cxvij. Sermon, which is the eight vpon the. xxxij. Chapter.

35. Oh that I had some body to heare mee, my marke is, that the almighty should ansvere me.
Let myne aduersarie vvright a booke.
  36. If I beare it not vpon my shoulders, I vvill take it to me as a crowne.
  37. I vvil recken al my steppes, I vvil present my self to him as a prince.
  38. If my land cry out against mee or if the furrovves therof do vvepe togither.
  39. If I haue eaten the soyson of it vwithout siluer, or if I haue oppresed the ovnners of it vvith sorow.
  40. Let it bring me forth thistles in steade of vvheat, and darnell in steade of barley.
- This is the ende of Jobs vwords.

E haue seen heretofore how Job cōplained that God harkened not too him that he might obteyne reason at his hand. Truely in saying so, his intent was not to blasphemē, as though God had bē cruel and vniust to him: but his meening was that he knewe not why he was so afflited, and that it was not lawful for him to go too lawe with Ged, though he knewe not the reason of it. Proceding herewithall he addeth now, that all his desire was that God shoul answer him. VVherein he doeth vs to wit, that if God would be so gratiouse to him as to shewe him why he was so tormented: that knowledge should suffize him. Howbeit that there was no apparant reason why he shold be handled so roughly, seeing his life had ben without blame, and that he had indeuered to walke in holynesse. True it is that this word answer may be expounded two wayes: that is to wit, that God should come afore him as his aduersarie partie, and lay forth his reasons and articles. orelse that he should answe, that is to say, that he should declare himself to be on Jobs side. 50 Howbeit, forasmuch as heeretofore he hath often times sayde, that if God woulde condiscend to shew the cause of that his iustice, it shoul suffice him: I take this texte as if it were sayde, I desire no more but that God shoul shewe me the reason why he scourgeth me: For as for in common respecte I vtterly despize and desie the whole world. Let me haue a strong partie to put in accusation agaist mee, yea and let him make a greate booke of it: It shall not greue me to carry it vpon my shoulder. For it shal be no heavy burthen to me, but rather it shal be a crowne to me, 60 and an ornamēt to deck me withal. Now we see in effect what Job ment to say: namely that he had ben no such mā as he was reputed, and taken to be: according as wee see how his freends cōdemned him for a reprobate, bycause he indured so greate torments, and it seemed vnto them that God met to vtter his vengeance, to the intent that Job should be a mirrour of wicked men, whome God doeth vtterly destroy. Job therfore protesteth that he is no such man, and therewithall desireth no more but to haue audience.

dience. Before whom? not before me only: but that God should answere him, that is to say, that God should make his righteousnesse to be knowne, and the would he mainteyne, that his suffering was not for his sinnes, namely if the thing might be throughly considered, and that God would pronounce sentece as by way of ordinarie proces, and not by prerogative of his hygh and secret power, so as men might not knowe why he worketh after that manner. And we haue seene herofore, that it is not without cause, that Job should make that wish. And why? For diverse times God chasticeth vs according to the threatenings that are set downe in his lawe: that is to wit, that when we be punished, it is by reason of our sinnes: and that is the most ordinarie maner. Ye see that God suffered not our misdeedes vnpunished, and after he had giue vs a rule wherby to liue well, he added threatnings, saying: If ye breake my commaundements, I will punish you with warre, pestilence, and famin, with sicknesse, pouertie and diuers other things. ¶ Vel then, if we be beatē with Gods roddes, it behoueth vs to laye our life to his lawe: and if we find ourselues to haue done amisse, there our inditement is throughly framed, and our iudgement already giuen vpon vs, and there remaineth nothing but execution.

Thus ye see the ordinarie maner that God vseth in chastizing me. But in Job he had an other respect. For he punished not him for his sins, (not that he deserued it not) for there is no creature so rightuouse that can exempt him self from Gods correctiōs: But yet for all that (as I haue declared afore) God had not a respect to Jobs offences, 30 he punished him not in that measure by reason of his misdeedes, but to trye the faith and patience of his seruat, and also to make him an example to all the world. In the meane whyle Job had his mouth shet, so as he wist not what to say: and therfore it behoueth vs not to inquyre any other cause why he was handled so roughly: It is a secret vndeowne to men. Then is it not without cause that Job desireth God to answere him, that is to say, to enter in to plea with him, and to suffer him to mainteyne his owne soundnesse, and to let him know why he indureth such torments. But herewithall let vs marke, that it is not lawfull for men to challenge God after that sort. For it is good reason that he should handle vs after his owne pleasure, and that we shuld stoupe to him although the cause of his iudgements bee not apparent vnto vs. Then if it please God to visit vs with rigor, and wee see not why he doeth it: yet must wee kepe our mouth shet that we murmur not against him, and neverthelesse haue it open still to glorifie him, confessing that although his iudgements be a bottomlesse deepe, yet they cease not to be iust and rightfull. Thus ye see what we haue to note. For in good faith, there is not a more terrible thing, than if God shold enter into lawe with vs. If he set himself against vs, alas, what shall become of vs? Then if we fall to prouoking of him, and desire too go to lawe with him, is it not to our greate confusion? And this doctrine is well woorthie too bee noted. For wee see how men doo dayly fall too murmuring and grudging in themselues. And what else is that, but too prouoke God, and to desire to go to lawe with him? But shall we bring 60 our matters well to passe?

True it is that they which skirmish after that fashyon when they bee afflicted, say not that they would haue God to be against them: but in the meane whyle, that is the marke which they shoothe at. For if a man be impacient in his afflictions, and hold not himself in quiet by yeelding too Gods good will too take correction at his hand: I pray you doeth he not lift vp himself, too the intent that God being so prouoked too wrath, should maynteyne his owne right? Let vs keepe ourselues from quareling with God when he stryketh vs with his roddes, that we haue him not our deadly enimy: and let vs learne rather to submit vs vnto his hand, and to like well of that which he doeth, although the reason therof be hidden from vs for a tyme. Surely we ought to desire earnestly, that it may please God to shewe vs why he scourgeth vs: Howbeit that must not bee done to any other end, than to profit our selues by his corrections, and to apply our chastizements to our instruction, when we knowe the cause of them. Therfore when every of vs feeling his owne sinnes, is sory that he hath offended God, and ashamed of his owne lewdnesse, and therupon humbleth himself, seeking remedie to turne away from his euill: I say when we by all meanes indeuer to apply Gods corrections to our owne vse, and to make them turne into such a discipline, as we may shew ourselues not to be vtterly past amendment: we may wel after that manner desire God to make vs vnderstand why he scourgeth vs, to the end that his corrections be not in vayne. But if he list to vse his power, and to hold vs there as it were in ignorance, so as wee know not why he vseth so greate rigor against vs: yet must wee in such extremitie cast downe our heads, and flee for refuge vnto that which I haue declared already, namely that God is righteous in all respects: and therfore that although wee knowe not the cause why he affliceth vs: yet wee must not cease to glorifie him continually. Lo what wee haue too marke in this l'reyne. And herewithall let vs come to that which Job sayeth: My marke (sayeth he) is that the Almighty shold answere mee. If myne aduersarie wright a booke, and it behoue me to beare it, I will not bee ashamed to carry it. I shall not be like an offendour that is indyted and condemned: but that booke shall rather maynteyne my soundnesse: I durst (sayeth he) dock my selfe with it as with a crowne. ¶ When Job speaketh so, he meeneth that all the accusations which were layed against him, were false: and that he had ben wrongfully sclaundered cōsidering that he had liued innocēly. Howbeit in saying so, he meeneth not that he had ben vtterly cleare, so as there was no faulce to be foūd in him: For (as it was seene yesterday) he hath cōfessed himself a sinner, yea and protested that he hid not his faults as men are wont to do, and according as we see mennes hypocrisie to be such as euery man would fayne hide himself with vayne and trifling lurkingholes. Job declared that he intended no such thing, but that he freely condemned himself when he had done amisse, yea and taried not till men of authoritie reproached him: but suffered him self to bee shamed by the most despised sort, & humbled himself so low, as too receyue correction by those which were not worthy to looke vpon him. So then in this text Job meeneth not that he was vtterly without sin or stayne, (for then were there contrarietie in his words) but he layeth forth his case according as we haue seene: that is to say, that he was not as a reprobate, and that although God handled him roughly, yet folowed it not that he did it for any hayhouse faults of his: but for some other secret cause.

We see then in effect, that Job ment not to exalt himself against God with such pride as many do, which vphold theselues to be righteouſe, yea even without feeling the sinnes that they haue cōmited. And althoough he had liued as an Angel, yet notwithstanding he knew well that God might find sufficiēt cause in him to punish him. Neverthelesse he mainteyneth his owne vncorruptnes, to the intent to separate himself from the nūber of the despisers of God.

of God. Hereby we be taught, that there is a meane for vs to maynteine a good case. VVee know that they which are most faultie are by their good will most bold too iustifie themselues when they are rebuked. And although their condemnation be apparent ynough, and euery man doeth see that they be nothing worth: yet notwithstanding they will be most shamelesse in maynteyning themselues to bee faultlesse, and affirme themselues too haue greate wrong to be reproued. But contrariwise, although Gods children haue indeuered to walke aryght: yet notwithstanding the first thing that they do, is that they yeeld themselues giltie, and acknowledge themselues too be wretched sinners. Thervpon we see that if a man go about to iustifie himself without exception, he vndertaketh warre against God. For whosoeuer sayeth that he is no sinner, intēdeth to make God a lier, as sayeth S. Iohn in his Canonickall epistle. God hath prounouced one generall sentence vpon vs all, and experiance also ought to shewe vs, that all of vs ought to flee to Gods mercie for refuge. Hee then that will iustifie himself without exception, warreth manifestly against God, and iustleth with him. And what shal he winne by it in the end? Nothing: But what must we do after we haue acknowledged our faults? If we be reproued for any thing, and feele our selues giltie, let vs cast downe our heades and acknowledge ourselues to haue deserued, that God should put vs to such shame, as to be condemned by men (yea euen of the basest sort) and to haue them to be our iudges. But if we knowe not that wee haue offended in the thing wherof we are accused: Gods meening is to humble vs after another sort: Neuerthelesse it behoueth vs to receiue correction paciently. Finally if men reprove vs, and will through rashnesse beare vs downe that we be offenders, wheras we knowe the contrarie: It were hypocrisy for vs to graunt that such flauders are trewe. If a man were accused of robberye, of whordome, or of murther, and were clere of it, so as he might protest before God and his Angels that there is no such thing in him: If he do condemne himself he doeth euill. So then we may well maynteyne our cleernes after the maner that Job doth: not only in respect of our honestie, as the vaingloriouſe sort do, which wil not in any wise be touched at al, but ar so tender of their honour as they cannot suffer it to bee touched, no not though they haue defamed themselues, but wold haue their shame couered, & yet in the meane whyle they themselues blast it abroade, so as euery man knoweth it: VVē must not go that way to worke, but euery man must in that cas ſe iudge of himself as he ought to do of his neigbours, and we must lerne to condemne the euill, and too allowe the good, without accepting of persons. Lo after what maner we may maynteyne a good quarrell. And that is the cause why Job sayeth, if God wold answere mee, though all the men vpon the earth should bend themselues against mee, and that myne aduersarie part, alleage all that is possible: I ſhall be ſo farre off from being ashamed to beare it, that I ſhall take it as a crowne to deck me withall. It ſhall be an ornament vnto me. But here-withall let vs marke also, that when we intend to main-teyne our owne innocencie: It is not ynough for vs, to hyde our shame before men: but our principall point must be, that God may bee as our warrant, and answe for vs. True it is that the answe wherof Job speaketh, is ment as I haue declared: that is to wit, that God ſhould as it were enter an ordinarie proces againſt him, and ſhew the cause why he ſcourgeth him: but yet therewithall Job pretendeth, that if God wold give him libertie to maynteyne his case, all wold make on his ſide, and they that had reiecte him bycause of his extreme afflictions, ſhould be found liers. So then (as I haue touched afore) we ſee it is to no purpose to haue escaped from me, but we muſt ſpecially haue an eye vnto God, to bring our good case before him, that he (as I ſayd) may warrant it, and we receyue ſentence of diſcharge at his hand. And wold God that this were well printed in our hearts. For we ſee now-adayes that all is one with vs, ſo we may be released before the world, we ſeeke nothing but that: and ſo is God despiled. For there is none of vs which thinketh that euer he ſhall render an accompte before him. But we loke that no man may bite vs, and that if any man come to assayle vs, we may haue wherewith to kepe him off. Therefore when wee be ſo escaped from the world, wee think all is ſafe, and ſo in the meane whyle, that is the thing which maketh vs bold to exalte ourſelues the more againſt God: wherfore let vs think well vpō this doctrine, that is to wit, that it is a wretched reward when the world ſhall ſoothe vs, and God allowe vs not: And therfore aboute all things, let every man examin himſelf what he is, and let not that be done after his owne fancie, but according to Gods lawe. For we knowe we bee no competent iudges, but it behoueth vs to receyue iudgement by the lawe, and by the things that are ſayd and conteined there. So then let Gods ſeate be ſet vp by hauing his worde before our eyes, and let vs conſider throughly whether we haue walked as he commaundeth, and whether wee haue not ſwarued from his word: and if we haue done amifle, let vs learme to condemne our ſelues. And furthermore if he graunt vs the grace to obey him, although there be many vices in vs, yet notwithstanding ſo that our cheef marke haue ben to obey him, let it content vs to be allowed of him though the world condemne vs, and let it not greeue vs that the world chargeth vs with flauders, ſo that God reache vs his hand and accept vs, and ſhewe that he liketh wel of our life. VVhē we be at this point, let the dogges bark at vs ſo long as they cannot bite vs: and although we ſeeme (by the report of our enemis) to be the wickedest men in the world, yet let vs beare all things paciently. This is the thing that we haue to marke in this text. And ſo we ſee that there are two points too note. The one is that we muſt not giue our ſelues to ambition and vanitie, to ſeke our owne prayſe before me, & to exempt our ſelues from Gods iudgement: but contrariwise it behoueth vs to feele how terrible Gods wrathe is, and to examin wel our owne conſciences, to the end we be not faultie before him. VVhē we haue obteyned this, (that is to ſay, when God hath graunted vs the grace to walke vprightly, ſo as we be ſure that he alloweth vs:) let vs beare the flauders and false acuſations of the world paciently, and tarry till God ſhewe our ſoundneſſe openly, and make it to ſhyne as the breake of the daye according as he hath promiſed too do. And that is the ſecond point. Yet notwithstanding as touching that Job ſayeth, Ps. 57.4.6. that he will beare the booke that ſhall be made againſt him as a crowne, that is to ſay, the proces wherby he ſhall be charged after that ſort with his faults: It is not ment that it is alwayes an honour vnto vs afore men too haue a good case. And surely it is vnpoffſible to find a better case than Saint Paules was, in that he had ſerved God faythfully in his office, and yet notwithstanding he ſayled not to be charged and accuſed falsely. And what doeth he? For as much as he ſeeth that men are blind and ignorant and iudge wrongfully: he appealeth to the day of God. I appeal (ſayeth he) to the day of the Lord. Ye ſee that Saint Paule is conſtreyned to vſe ſuch remedie, according as oftentimes it commeth to paſſe, that wee be defaced, and that the world holdeth vs for wicked, ſo as we be diſgraced, bycause the wicked are ſo shameleſſe, that all is one with with them to speake euil of men by hooke or by crooke. But yet in the meane whyle we shall not cease to go still with our heads vpright. And why? For wee may appeale vnto God for our warrant, as wee see the prophets doo. VVhen Jeremy sayeth, Lord if I be a deceyuer, thou hast deceyued mee: It is bycause it was layd to his charge that he did nothing but beguile the people. VVell (sayeth he) if it be as you saye, then hath God deceyued mee. VVhē he speaketh after that maner, he meeneth not that there is any deceit or guile in God, but he doth boldly reppresse 10 all the slaunders that were layd vpon him, saying: Arme yourselues against God, for I knowe that he will maynteyne my quarrell. And Esay reporting that he was reieted of mé, and as greatly reproched & despised as could be: sayeth, yet will the Lord answeare for mee. So then whensoeuer we bee defaced and oppressed by men, and blamed by the whole world: yet shal we not fayle to haue a croune of glorie, if we haue record before God. And that is the cause why Job sayeth that he will ouerthrowe all the slaunders that shall be layed against him. No no 20 (sayeth he) I wil not come as an offender that is condēned alredie in himself, before that informations be put in against him (for he is conuictid in his owne conscience of the misdeede that he hath doone:) but I will come as a prince. And vndoubtedly the children of God are the iudges of their iudges whē they be wrongfully oppressed by men. It is certayne that they dare more boldly appeare, referring theselues wholly vnto God, and resting in him, than those dare which condemne them through malice, violence and tiranny. VVheras the enimies of the truth 30 do now adayes condemne the faithfull to be burned, and in doing therof do sit vnder their clothes of Estate: do we not thinke that a gallowes is more honorable wheron a martyr shal be tormented, or a stake that is set vp for a childe of God to be burned at? Yes: For that surmounteth all the thrones of the world. Kings and Princes together with all their iudges, must needes through their wickednesse vnhalowe the seats that are hallowed and dedicated vnto God. And forasmuch as they sit in them, they must needs be full of filthinesse and infection, because 40 they followe not the wil of him which hath set the there, and so they make those places shamefull and detestable, which notwithstanding of theireselues are honorable. Cōtrariwise, although a stake or a Gibbet be a lothsome thing to the worldward: yet notwithstanding it is certayne, that when a Martyr and a child of God bringeth a good conscience thither, and suffere there in a good quarrell: he sanctifieth the same which was after a sorte cursed. So then it is not for nought that Job sayeth, that if god wilbe so gratiouse to him as to aunswere him (that is to say, too giue him leaue to mayntayne his Innocency and to heare him declare his life) he will come with a lofty countenaunce like a prince, and not drooping like an offendour: and he will boldly receyue all the books that can be written against him, taking them as an ornament, croune, our garlād. This is it also which ought to comfort vs, namely, our walking in vprightness before God, and our indeuering to serue and honour him. For then if the world be vnthankfull, and men do vs wrong and degrade vs, it maketh no matter, so we can protest before God, that our case is good, and also that wee be able to shewe that it is so, when we be drawne before men. For it is a shamefull thing to say, God is my witnesse, when the rest of our doings are not answerable to it: according as many men call God to record rashly, and yet it is knowne too bee clean cōtrarie. But if we wil be allowed of God, we must so deale as the world may heare witnesse of our vprightnesse whē it cōmeth to the hearing: and we must haue our mouth open to declare how the matter goeth, and to disproue the slaunders that shal be layde against vs. Furthermore, when we haue this, (that is to say, when wee haue good record that we be not faultie before God,) and can also shewe the same in deeede: Then although men make bookees against vs, (that is to say although they deface vs with so many blames and slaunders as shall seeme to be houge mountaynes:) yet shal the same be no heauy burthe to vs, bycause we shall be vphild by Gods hād, and rest ourselues vpon him. But rather we shall make it a crowne or garland vnto vs. For it is much better for vs to be so blamed of the world, and that God should allowe of vs: than to be flattered on all sides, and that the same should excuse vs, according as we see there be many that take libertie to do euill and ro despise God, bycause the world sootheth them. For what is the reason that so many men runne out of square, and giue theselues the bridle to all euill: but bycause they haue ben spared, and mennes eyes haue ben shet to wink at all their wicked doings? Lo what is the cause of their destruction. So then it is much better that our Lord should be our warrant, and in the meane whyle the whole world be against vs: than to be praysed and commended of the world, and in the meane whyle to haue heauē crye out for vengeance against vs. VVe see how the Pope is exalted nowadayes in his holinesse, and that although he be a monster and a diuell incarnate: yet do all men bowe to him, and giue greater titles of honour to him, than to God. And in the meane whyle, is not this a cause to augment his damnation more and more? As much is to be sayd of them that iustifie the world, too the end the world also should receiue and flatter them in all their sinnes. But contrariwise (as I haue sayd) let vs learne to looke continually vnto God, and in the meane whyle if he suffer vs to be vniustly condemned of men, let vs suffer it paciently, and not cease to beare our heads still vpright. Furthermore, (according to that which is sayd here, concerning the reckening of all our steppes) let vs bee ready to yeeld an account whensoeuer we shal be accused of any cryme. Let vs not thinke to scape Gods iudgement by concealing any misdeede in vs: but let vs consider that it behoueth vs to answeare for ourselues, and that although men doo iustifie vs, yet they cannot hyde the things that are in vs from God. Now after that Job hath spoken so, he addeth his last protestation for a full knitting vp. If my land (sayeth he) haue cried against me, or if the furrowes therof complaine that I haue eaten the foyson of it without money, or if those that haue tilled it complayne of me that I haue oppresed them: let mee eat Thistles in steade of wheate, and darnell 50 in steade of barley. Hereby Job concludeth that which wee haue seene afore: that is to wit, that although he had ben greuously afflicted by the hand of God, yet notwithstanding men ought not to haue condemned him as though he had ben a greater offender than others whome God spared. And why? For (as I haue sayd) God keepeth not all one rate in afflicting men. Sometyme he punisheth them for their sinnes, and otherwhyles when he intendeth to visite his owne seruaunts with extreme rigor, he reserveth the cause of their afflictions to himself. For although they haue serued him and indeuored to frame theselues wholly to his righteousness: yet will he not therefore for beare to send them right greate afflictions. In that case we knowe not what to say, vntill the last day when God shall manifest the things vnto vs which now are hidden. So then Job sheweth that we must not esteeme his lyfe according to the state wherin he is. For although he bee the miserablest of all men to outward sight: yet doeth he protest that he had a desire to serue God. And wherin shē-sheweth he that we haue heretofore seene many of his protestations, and now this is the last, that his land cried not out against him. True it is that the earth hath no mouth to cry nor complaine, nother hath it feeling to suffer any wrong at our hand, nother semeth it that we do the earth any wrong: insomuch that although it could speake, yet a man wold not say that it had cause either to cry or to weepe or to make any complainte against vs. VVhat doeth Job then meene by saying that his land complayned not, and that his furrowes wept not? He meneth not that the earth of it self hath cause to complayne: but the holy scripture vseth such maner of speche, to make vs perceiue the better and with greater velenencie, that if we do amisse before God, the creatures shal be against vs, and beare witnesse against vs. As how? If we haue oppressed the poore labourers that til the earth to giue vs foode: If we haue v-sed extortio against the, or if we haue plucked away their goods, not only they shall beare witnesse against vs, but the earth which they haue tilled shal also depose against vs. And why? For they haue bestowed their sweate there, and that is as their blood. Now it is a greate cruelty in vs, whē we think not how the earth on her behalf hath opened her bowels according to the order that God hath set, and yelded her frute when shee was tilled. The earth the hath don hir dutie & wrought with hir labourer, as if ther were a mutuall agreement betwixt the, and yet notwithstanding beholde how the Seagulves deuoure the foyson of the earth, taking away mens goods, and doing them a thousand extortions. Then if the laborer complaine, must not the earth also on hir parte answe which hath bē as it were tormented. Ye see then why the holy scripture vseth such speech, we see the hardnesse that is in vs, in so much that if a man tel vs of our sinnes, we think our selues quite discharged, if we may find some pretie starting hole. And although we be conuictid of the before God, yet are we not so afraide as to be sory for them, or to feele how dreadful the wrath of God is. Therfore it behoueth vs to be spurred, not as asses, but as folke that are vtterly hardened: Insomuch that whē God striketh vpō vs with mayne strokes as vpon stones, he can no more soften vs or make vs to yeld, than stithies or anuildes, except it be by force. Thus ye see what we haue to marke. And so, as oftē as the scripture speaketh after that maner, namely that the earth crieth out and that hir furrowes aske vengeance: let vs understand that God reproueth our stubborneſſe, and sheweth vs that we be so blinded in our sinnes, as we cannot come to knowledge except he drawe vs to it by some violent meanes. Marke well this point. So therfore let vs not continue hardharteſſe, whē we see our Lord vseth such velenencie against vs to wake vs withal: but at leastwise let vs then enter into the examination of our faults, and be cast downe before him Lo what we haue to marke. And therewithall also we must come from the earth to the me. It is said that a righteous man wil haue a care of his horse, his oxe, and his asse: but the wicked men wil turmoyle Prou. 12. b. 10. their brethrē and neyghbours, in eating vp the sustenāce of their life without any equitie. Therfore whē we heare any speaking of the earth and the beasts: let vs vnderstād that it is to the end we should be the more indifferent towards our neighbours, which are our flesh and blood, and of the self same nature that we our selues are: So that if we vse any tyrannie and crueltie, that thing must needs be fulfilled on vs which is said in the holy scripture, namely Esa. 58. b. 7. Lam. 5. 4. that our withholding of the wages of such as haue trauayled and taken paines for our profit, shall cry vnto heauen, and all creatures shal beare witnesse of the wrong & extortio that we haue don to our neighbours, according also as the Prophet Abacuk speketh of it, saying that the walles Hab. 2. b. 11. of the houses which are builded with deceyte and extortion shal cry out loude and shirle, and play the quirresters in that behalf (as they terme the): so as they shal answe one another on either side: the one side singeth, behold blud: the other, behold murther: the one behold deceipt: the other, behold crueltie: the one behold pilling & polling: the other behold couetuousnesse: the one behold periury, the other, behold robberie, and another, behold spightfulnesse. So then let vs marke wel, that according as we shal haue abused the creatures of God, so must they aske vengeance against vs at the latter day. And therfore let vs take warning hereby to walke with such cōscience, as we may go with our heads vpright, not as perfect before God to beare out his iudgement & vengeance, but rather as it may please him to receiue vs by his infinite goodnes, and so to guide vs by his holy spirit, as we may apply our indeuer to serue him with a good conscience, according to the grace which he shal haue giuen vs.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as we may haue our whole recourse vnto his mercy, and therewithall euery of vs so inforce himself to walk in purenesse of life, as we may be able by the power of his holy spirit, to resist al temptations, and to followe whether foever he cal vs, and iustly protest that we haue serued the liuing God, and sought nothing but to glorifie his name as it becommeth Christians too do. For the performaunce wherof, it may please him to graūt: that all the time of our life, we may seke altogether to please him, and by that meanes edifie one another, to drawe euen the silly ignorant sort to the light of the Gospell, whervnto our good God calleth vs by his grace: and that to the same end it may please him to rayse vp true and faithfull ministers of his woord, &c.

The cxix. Sermon, which is the first vpon the. xxxij. Chapter.

- THese three men left speaking to Job bycause he esteemed himself to be righteous.
2. And Eliu the Sonne of Barachel the Buzite, of the house of Ram, vvas angrie and sore displeased vwith Job, bycause he sayd he vvas more rightiouse than God.
  3. Also he vvas angrie vwith his three freends, bycause they had made none ansvver, and yet condemned Job.

Hat we may fare the better by that which is conteined here, and by the things that we shal see hereafter, we must beare in mind what we haue seene heretofore: namely, that Job hauing vndertaken a good case, did hādle it amisse: and that those which came to cōfort him, hauing vndertaken an euil case, vſed good argumēts & apparāt reasons, wherof profitable doctrine might be gathered. And therfore there was a fault in the, bycause they laid not a good foudatiō: and there was a faulte in Job bycause he builded amisse vpon a foundation that was good in it self. And that is the cause why it is said now, that Eliu the Buzite was angry & inflamed with wrath wrath, bycause those said men had not disproued Job, and yet notwithstanding had condēned him; and also that he was angry with Job, bycause he went about to iustifie himself above God. So we see that this anger of Elius was not without cause, as wel against Job, as against his three frends that came to comfort him. For although Job had a iust and resonable quarrell, yet did he farre ouershote himself: and although the other alledged very good reasons, yet did they resist God: for their reasoning was to an euill purpose. Now in the meane whyle it is said, that Iobs three frends left off to dispute any more against him, bycause he thought himself to be rightrouse. VVe haue seene that Job made not so great accōpt of his owne righteousnesse, but that he thought there were many faults to be found in him, and therfore on the contrary parte, he protesteth himself to be a wretched sinner. Howbeit he wold not coadēne himself at the Job. 7. d. 20. wil of those which judged amisse of his afflictio. The opinion and imaginaciō of Iobs three frends, was that Job was a castaway before God, bycause he was handled so roughly. But it is sayd that we ought to iudge discretly of the party whom god correcteth. For we must not cōclude that euery man is punished according to his offences. Some times God spareth the wicked and wincketh at their misdedes, and that is to their sorē damnation: For they shall pay right dere for Gods goodnessse in tarrying for the so paciētly. Then if God do sometimes make no cōtenance of punishing those that haue deserued it, let vs not therfore think that they haue made the better market, nother let vs iustifie the bycause God spareth the. And contrariwise whē we see a man beaten with Gods scourges: let vs not therfore think him to be wickeder than al the rest of the world. For it may be that God will trye his pacience, & not punish him for his sinnes. Now Job would not cōsent to this fonde doctrine of his freends: and that is the cause why he seemed to them to iustifie himself, though he ment no such thing. And therfore (as hath ben herto fore shewed) let vs beware of vndertaking any euil quarrell: For we shall be blinded, and it will seeme to vs, that if a man agree not fully with vs, he is so condemned as we ought not to haue any further talke with him. But before we enter into disputatio, let vs be wel assured of the truth. There is nothing worse than to be to hasty: we know that these ordinary prouerbes are continually put in vre amongs vs, namely that hast maketh wast, and that a foles bolt is soone shot. Seing it is so, let vs learne to hold our iudgement in suspence, vntil we be throughly assured of the truth. And herewithal let vs marke, that oftentimes it may happen that we shall be wrōgfully condēned before men. And although that such as do backbite vs haue their mouthes stopped, and haue not any reason to cōuince vs withall: yet they wil not cease to be caried away with such spite, as to slander vs, and to cast foorth wicked words against vs. Hereby we be warned, that if men bee so maliciouse as to condēne vs without proof, we must not take it to much to hart: For it is no noueltie: It happened to Job that excellent seruant of God: and at this day we see that the papists think ynough, to haue decreed that their lewd errors, superstitions, and false doctrines, are good. For they steppe to it with a maystely style, that it is ynough for them to haue determined it to be so. There is no entring into disputacion, nor any searching by reason how things go. For to their owne seeming they haue all authoritie, and therewpō they thūder against vs. But in the meane seazō we know that truth is on our side, & we are fully resolute of it. VVherfore let vs resist such temptations, and not be abashed at the, seing that at all tymes they that had no reason for themselues, haue notwithstanding not ceased to condēne the good case boldly and without remorse of conscience. Seing the that the diuell blindeth the so: let vs always kepe on our course, & sticke stedfastly to the truth that we knowe. And for our owne parte also let vs take warning to walk more leysurely when we haue ben anywhit to hasty. For oftentimes it wil fall out, that the children of God shal be ouerseene, and not haue stay ynough of ourselues. Therfore let vs not go on still, neither let our rashnesse be matched with wiſfulnessse. Truely it is a hard thing: For he that hath once ouershoot himself, doth commonly become wilfull. Howbeit when we haue done amisse we must not cōtinue in euil, but rather learne to restraine our selues, saying: I haue here exceded measure, & I know wel I haue not bridled my self with such modestie as I ought to do. VVhat isto be done. Oh, I must not harden myself: but seing I haue taken a wrōg way, I must returne backe againe. Ye see then that by the exāple of Iobs frends, the holy ghost warneth vs, first, to be wel aduisēd that we take no quarrel inhād rashly against God: and secōdly that if we happen to be ouerseen we must not in any wise be wilful, nor proceede in our evil, but acknowledge our fault & labour to amend it out of hand. As concerning Eliu of whom mencion is made here, it is not without cause that the scripture sheweth vs of what stock he came, according as he is named the Buzite, of the house of Ram. For here we see first the aūcientnesse that we touched heretofore: & the principal point also which God met to declare vnto vs, is that therē hath always remained some good seede of religiō among those that were wrapped in many fond fancies. And that is a very notable point. For we knowe that the world did out of hand fall away from God, and all men turned aside to corruptiō and lies. I meene even immediatly after the flood, notwithstanding that the vengeance of God were so horrible and worthy of remembraunce, and that the children of Noe which had escaped, (hauing liued a long time after) might tell their children and successors after what maner God had taken vengeance of the wickednesse of the world. For notwithstanding all this: yet they fell all away and forsooke the right religion, turning aside vnto lyes, idolatrie, & all other disorders. Herein we see that men are exceeding frayle, & that there is nothing harder than to hold them in the feare of God & in good religion. True it is, that in respecte of euill, wee be but too stedfast, wee cannot be bowed aside: and if a man wold go about too amend the euill in vs, he knoweth not at which end to begin, nother can he bring it to passe, bycause there is such a piteouse hardehartnesse in vs. But as for goodnesse: wee forgo it byandby: there needeth nothing to thrust vs from it. VVe haue a faire mirrour hereof shewed vs in this, that men went astray, and forsoke the pure knowledge of God so soone after the flud, notwithstanding that they were cold of it. And herewithall we see in this example of the persone of Eliu, that God hath alwayes left some good seede in the middest of darknessse, and that there hath alwayes ben some good and holy doctrine. And why? To the end the vnbeleuers shoulde bee left vñexcusable, so as they could not alledge that ignorauice reynged ouer ali. For wheroft came it, that God was not serued and worshipped purely, but for that men turned their backes vpon him? And they did not that through a simplicitie, whervnto they might giue some colour of honesty: but rather of a stubborne wilfulnessse. Men are loth to be beguiled, yea or to seeme to be beguiled: but whē it cometh to the seruing of God, they shet their eyes, quench all the light that shyned in them, and seeke nothing but to give ouer themselves to all trumperie. This is the thing that is shewed vs here. But it behoueth vs to way wel what hath ben ben treated of heretofore: namely that although these men were no Prophets of God, yet notwithstanding the doctrine that proceeded from them had such a maiestie, as it might right well beseeche the person of Prophets. True it is (as I haue sayd) that they did misapply it. But yet notwithstanding there was an excellent spirit in them. And in very deede (as I haue declared afore) the things that haue ben set out by them, ought to be receyued as out of the schole of the holy ghost. And although these personages were so excellent: yet were they not taught by the lawe of Moyses, but were separated from the churche of God. For if the lawe were published at that tyme (which thing is vncerteyne,) yet were they distant from the countrey of Iury, and had not any fellowshipe with them, that they might bee partakers of the doctrine which God had simply appointed for his people. VVe see then that men which had no scripture, nor any thing saue the doctrine which Noe and his children had spred abroade after the fludde: are Prophetes of God, and haue an excellent spirit. And although they dwelt in a strange countrey, yet we see that God had giuen them a knowledge sufficient to edifie all the common people. Thus ye see how the world could not bee excused of ignorauance. For although idolatrie reigned in the tyme of Thare and Nacor, and that they themselues also were idolaters, (as it is sayd in the last chapter of the booke of Iosua) and that those which came of them folowed their steppes: yet notwithstanding Elia which was of the house of Ram, and the other three, were exempted from the common corruptions of that tyme: And so wee see that the pure religion was not quite abolished among them, but that they had a sufficient doctrine to leade them to God, and to conuince the world of the wilfulness and ignorauance that was in it. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in the first place. Also when we heare it sayd, that God gave men ouer to walke in destrucciō: Let vs marke well, that it is bycause he was not so gratiouse to all me, as to giue them the peculiar doctrine which he had reserved to his owne people and church: but yet was that no excuse for them. God therfore did let all men runne astray; and they were all drouned in destruction: Neuerthelesse there continued alwayes some seede in their harts, wherby they were so conuicted as they could not say that they knewe not God, nor had any religion, nother could any of them clearch himself from it. For it abode ingraven in their consciences, that the world was not made by it self, but that there was a heauenly maiestie wherunto it must nejds bee subiect. Verely sainct Paule speaketh expesly of the records which God hath imprinted in his creatures insomuch that the order of the world is as it were a booke to teach vs, & ought to leade vs vnto God. Howbeit herewithall it behoueth vs too come to that which is treated in the second chapter to the Roinaynes, namely that God hath grauen such a certeinie in our cosciences, as we cannot wipe away the knowledge which we haue of good and euill. Euy man hath not so much knowledge as wee haire that Iobs three freends had: But yet notwithstanding we shall neuer find any ma so rude & barbarous, but he hath some remorse of conscience, and knoweth that there is a God: and hath some discretion to condemne the euill and to allowe the good. God then hath left these traces and cranks in the hearts of the ignorantest, to the end that men might not couer themselues with any excuse, but be condemned by the inditement that is laid vp within themselues. And by the way let vs marke, that it was foolishly doone of men to fight against God, in maintenaunce of the doctrine which had reynged among the. For seeing that the knowledge of God hath shyned so clerely in the world, as all men might be infligthened by it, as we haue seene afore: How is it possible that they shoulde give over themselues to so grosse a beastlynesse, as to worshipe stocks and stones, to honour the Sunne and Moone, to make puppets, and quite and cleane to forgette the liuing God? How could this come to passe? For it is all one as if a man shoulde wilfully runne headling against a thing at hygh none, or like the stumbling of a dronken man that reeleth aside, though he see the right way before his eyes. VVe see the that men swarued not aside through simplicitie, but that they spighted God through a purposed malice: and therfore let vs consider it well, to the end wee runne not any more to these wonted shifts, to say: I pray you if me be so dazed as they knowe not any thing concerning God, ought it not to serue to excuse them? when any man alledgeth this: let vs on the contrary perte take that for our answere, which is sayd in saint John: namely, that the light shined in darknesse: and we see the same by this present example. For it had ben vnpossible for men to haue runne astray into so grosse and outrageouse superstitionis, if they had not wilfully throwne themselues into them. Their ignorauance therfore was matched with wilfulness and stubbernesse, when they forsooke the right way of saluation, and gaue themselues ouer too their idols. Lo what we haue to beare away. And it warneth vs to be the more ware in walking, whyle we haue the light with vs: I haue sayd already, that if God be so gratiouse to us as to shewe vs the way, it behoueth vs to make hast; and it is no time for vs to sleepe, and much lesse to shet our eyes wilfully. At this day we see that greate darknesse reigneth ouer most parte of the world. The wretched Papists go astray, and knowe not what they do. And why? For God hath giuen them ouer as they be worthy: and forasmuch as they haue forgotten the truthe, his vengeance must needs come vpon them as a waterflood, to ouerwhelme them and drowne them in destrucciō. But we on our side haue Iesus Christ, who is the Sunne of righteousnesse that shineth vpon vs. And therfore we must not haue our eyes shet, but we must walke whyle the day lasteth, following the exhortation that is giuen vs here, that we become not giltye of wilfull defacing of the knowledge which is giuen vs at these dayes. Thus ye see what wee haue to marke in the fust place of this sentence. Now as touching the anger of Eliu, let vs marke that it is not blamed here as an inordinate passion: but it is a good and allowable mislyking, bycause it proceedeth of a zeale that Eliu had toward Gods truth, when he saw Job iustifie him self in such wise, as he esteemed himself more righteous than God. Iobs freends had not this knowledge. For they held opinion against him, that he was a wicked man: and Job declareth that he was not so: No more was he indeede. Howbeeit (as I haue sayd) he exceded measure: and although his case was good, yet did he handle it amisse, and toke an euill way with it. Eliu therfore marketh Iobs overshotting of himself, and his murmuring now and then through impaciencie: and how that therin he wente about to iustifie himself aboue God. Againe he is angry at those that tooke vpon them the euill case vnauidisely, & were not able to compasse it, but were confounded in it when it came to the pintche. Behold then how Eliu is inflamed with anger, but not without cause: and forasmuch as his zeale was good, therfore the holy ghost allowed the anger and wrath that was in him. But by the way it behoueth vs to marke this saying, that Job intended to iustifie himself aboue God. Truely his intent was not so, & he would rather a hundred timesthat the earth had swallowed him vp, or that he had neuer ben borne into the world, than to haue to haue thought such a blasphemie. And truly I haue told you, that as often as he overshot himselfe, it was not to conclude fully so, but it was through the raging of his passions, according as it is verie harde for men to staye themselues, but that many passions shall oftentimes escape them. Ye see in what case Job was, and howe in the ende he alwayes condemned himselfe: and when he had done amisse, woulde not excuse it. Howe is it sayde then that hee intended to iustifie himselfe aboue God? This saying conteyneth a good and very profitable doctrine. For here we be taught, that we may sometimes happen to blaspheme God, when we thinke not of it. In what sort? In pleading agaynst him. If wee allowe not all things to bee good whiche God dooth, and specially when he afflieth vs: It is certaine that we would make our selues more righteous than God. True it is, that we will not say it, neither will we thinke it: but the thing sheweth it selfe. And it is inough too condemne vs, if we do not glorifie Gods iustice in allowing it to be rightfull. This will bee the better vnderstoode by an example. Beholde Job knoweth God to be righteous, yea and he vnfeynedly acknowledgeth him so to be: and as for his owne part, he acknowledgeth himselfe a wretched sinner, and that there are manie faultes too bee found in him, yea and that he if shoulde quarell agaynst God, he shoulde bee vanquished a thousande tymes, before hee coulde answere to any one poynct. Job then meeneth not directly to iustifi. himselfe aboue God, no nor to make himselfe equall with him: but in the meane while what sayeth hee? I maruaile why God afflieth mee thus? VVhat fault is there in mee? And againe, I am a poore creature, full of infirmite, and is it meete that God shoulde stretche oute his strong arme against mee? VVhy doth he not kill me out of hande? VVhen Job runneth oute intoo so manye murmurings and grudgings: no doubt but hee iustifieth himselfe aboue God. And why? For it seemeth too him that God is vnreasonable in afflictiong him so: and because he knewe not why it was done, hee desired God to come thither as his aduersarie partie. Afterwarde againe hee is angrie that God consumerth him not out of hande, and that he sendeth him not quite away.

Seeing then that Job had so headie passions, no doubt but in so dooing hee made himselfe more righteous than God. And this is it that I tolde you euuen now: namely, that wee shall oftentimes blaspheme God in oure passions, ere wee thinke of it. VVhiche thing ought too cause vs too take the more heede, that wee giue not our passions the brydle, least wee fall too suche wretchednesse as too blaspheme God ere wee bee aware. 50 This doctrine then is verie profitable for vs, when the holy Ghost telleth vs that all suche as grudge and murmur in theyr afflictions, and cannot submit themselues too the mightie hande of God, too confesse that all his doings are rightfull and reasonable: do make themselues more righteous than God: and that although they say it not, but protest a hundred tymes that they neverment too thinke it: yet neuerthelesse, it is so indeede. And beholde a competent Judge hath giuen determinate sentence vpon it, and therefore there is no kicking agaynst it: for we shall gaine nothing by it. So then, what remayneth, but too learne first and formoste too condemne our selues, and too bring our inditement alwayes readie made, when we come before God, and too say that we be wretched sinners?

And furthermore, that when Gods iudgements which hee shall execute vpon vs, seeme ouer sharpe vntoo vs: et va beare them paciently withoute making anie great inquiries. If wee thinke it straunge that God shoulde handle vs with anie great rigour, and see not the reason why he dooth it: or if the miserie seeme too harde, and that God spareth not our straitie, nor hath suche piete of vs as he ought to haue: let vs not giue brydle too oure fancies to consent vntoo them, but let vs always beare in minde, that God is righteous howsocuer the worlde go. True it is, that wee shall not perceyue the reason why he dooth it. And whereof commeth that, but of oure owne infirmite and rudenesse? Is it meete that wee shoulde measure Gods iustice by our witte? VVhat a presumptuousnesse were that? VVhat reason were in it?

So then let vs learne too glorifie God in all things that hee dooth: and although his hande bee roughe towards vs: yet let vs not cease to confess sti. Alas, Lord if I go to lawe wi: thee, I knowe well my case is overthrowne. Beholde howe Jeremie proceedeth in that Ier.12.4.1. behalfe, and sheweth vs the way in the things that wee haue to do. For although things were in so great confuzion as hee might haue beeene caryed away in a madnesse too inurmure with the rest of the people: yet notwithstanding hee vsterth this preface, Lorde I knowe thou arte righteous: Truely I woulde faine enter intoo disputation with thee, I am prouoked theretoo by my fleshly desire, and bycause I see things so farre oute of order, I woulde faine inquire the cause why thou woorkest after suche a sorte: For I am tempted therewerto. Howbeit Lorde, before I take leaue to aske why thou dealest thus: I protest first, that thou art righteous and vnpartiall, and that nothing can come from thee which is not worthie of prayse.

Thus yee see that the manner of proceeding, whiche wee ought too holde, so often as wee haue too deale with Gods incomprehensible iudgements: is too consider that our witte is not able to mounte so highe, and that they bee too deepe a dungeon for vs to go downe intoo. And let vs practice this thing cheefely in oure selues. For inasmuche as men are full of hypocisie, they alwayes beleeue themselues to bee cleare and guiltlesse before God. And although they be not fully perswaded of it: yet they beare themselues in hande, that God hath no cause too pursue them with so greate rygour. Euerie man flattereth himselfe too lessen his owne sinnes, although hee bee fully conuictid. VWell (sayth hee) it is true that I am a sinner, yet am I not of the worst sort in the worlde. And why knowe we not the greatnessse of oure sinnes? Because wee tie scarfes afore our eyes.

Forasmuche then as wee are puffed vp with prude: It standeth vs in hande too practice this lesson, specially when God afflieth vs: namely, not too enter intoo quarelling with him, althoughe his chastizements seeme ouerroughe to vs: But too acknowledge that there is a measurablenesse in all his doings, and that he is not excessive: too the ende that the same mayte teache vs too frame oure selues quietly vntoo his will. And whensoeuer Gods chastizing of vs, is not in respect of oure sinnes: let vs assure oure selues, that the same is a singular grace, and a speciall priuiledge whiche hee gyueth vntoo vs. For there were alwayes iuste cause too punishe vs, although wee were the rightuousest persones in the worlde. But nowe are wee farre off from suche perfection. VVhat might God then doo vntoo vs? Neuerthelesse, if hee visire vs too trie oure pacience, and graunt vs the grace too suffer for his names sake, when hee might punishe vs for our sinnes: let vs vnderstande that hee dooth vs an excellent great honour. And therefore let vs humble our selues, and euerie one of vs in hys owne behalfe haue the modestie to say , well, I woulde faine that God shoulde vse mee after another fashion, (for too my seeming hee passeth measure in afflicting mee:) but yet for allthat, I knowe he doth it not without cause , and sithe his afflicting of mee is ~~not~~ for my sinnes, it is so muche the more fauour that hee sheweth mee. For I haue deserued muche more: and therefore it behoueth me to stoupe , and to submit my selfe wholy to his good will.

Rom. 3.c.19 Yee see then that the meane whereby God may bee glorified through vs, and we yeelde vntoo him the righ-tuousnesse that is his : is by keeping our mouthes shutte, according as Sainct Paule treateth thereof in the thirde to the Romaynes<sup>1</sup>, saying : too the ende that ~~all~~ mouthes might bee stopped, and all the worlde acknowledge it selfe, too bee indettet vntoo God, and that he onely shoulde be iustified. After what sort is it that God shal bee iustifyed by vs, according too Sainct Paule? Too witte, when all of vs condemne oure selues, and haue not the boldencesse too styrre agaynst God, but dowllingly confesse that all of vs are indaungered vnto him.
If wee bee once come too that poynt , then is God iusti-fyed: that is too saye , his rightuousnesse is commended by vs with such prayse as he deserueth. But contrary-wise, if men exalt themselues, and knowledge not that they bee indaungered vntoo God , so as hee maye condemne them: nor confesse the bonde of dette whiche they haue forseyted vntoo him : althoughe they protest that they mende to iustifie him(that is to say, to con-fesse him too bee righteous) yet neuerthelesse they condemne him.

Furthermore, whereas it is sayde that Eliu was so angrie: let vs marke that there is a greate difference be-twene the anger that proceedeth of godly zeale, and the anger that any of vs is moued withal,either for his goods, or for his honour, or for any respect of his owne. For he that is angrie and displeased through a priuate passion, is in no wise to bee excused: and although hee al-legethet it is for a good cause , yet notwithstanding he 40 offendeth God in beeing angrie: For we bee too blinde in oure owne passions. Therefore marke this for one poynt, that it behoueth vs to brydle our anger, specially when we bee prouoked to bee angrie with our neighbours in any respect of our selues. Howebeit there is one anger whiche is good , namely, that which proceedeth of the greefe that wee conceyue when God is offended. Then if we bee inflamed with a good zeale, and mainteyne Gods quarell: if we bee angrie we are not to blame for it : But let vs marke that such anger must bee 50 without respecting of persones. For if a man bee angrie through a passion of the fleshe: suche one hathe a respect too himselfe, and intendeth to mainteyne himselfe.

And againe, if hee intende too shewe that hee beareth a fauour to his frendes, and dooth more for them than for other men: then is there an accepting of persons bycause wee haue regarde too our selues. VVee shoulder rather bee angrie with our selues, if we woulde that God shoulde allowe of our anger and wrath. And 60 Epb. 4.f.28 this is the thing which Sainct Paule speaketh: For hee Psal. 4.b. 5. alledged purposelie that whiche is sayde in the Psalme concerning our beeing angrie, howebeit withoute offending. And howe is that done ? It is when a man en-tereth into his owne conscience, and searcheth himselfe earnestly, and hath not an eye vnto others so much as to himselfe, to condemne himselfe, and to fight agaynst his owne passions. Ye see then after what sort we may be angrie, and at what poynt wee m ist beginne our anger, if we will haue it allowed of God : that is to witte , eue-rie man must beginne at himselfe, and bee angrie at his owne sinnes and vices, and cast vp our choler at them, in that we see wee haue prouoked Gods wrath agaynst vs, and are full of so muche wretchednesse. Let vs bee an-grie and greeued at that , let that be the poynt for vs too beginne at : and afterwarde let vs condemne the euill wheresoeuer it bee founde, as well in oure selues , as in our frendes: and let vs not bee ledde with any priuate hatred, to cast out our rage vpon any man bycause wee be forepossessed with some euill affection. After this maner shall our anger be allowable, and shall shewe that the same proceedeth of a true zeale to Godwarde. True it is that we shall not alwayes bee able too keepe measure : for although a godly reigne in vs, yet shoulde we still doo amisse in exceeding measure , if God re-streyned vs not. Therefore in this zealousnesse it behoueth vs too haue both discretion, and stay of our sel-ues . But yet neuerthelesse (as I haue sayde alreadie) this anger shall bee allowable, if it spring oute of the sayde fountaine : that is too say , if wee hate the euill where-soever wee fynde it : euen thoughie it bee in our owne persons.

Nowe then what is the thing that we haue too marke in this streyne ? First and formest , that we muste not condemne all anger, and that when we see a man chafed or in a choller, we must not alwayes take it for a vice, as we see these scorners of God do , whiche say : Oh, will you scorne so ? Is it meete you shoulde be angrie ?
Might you not vse a quieter fashion ? They blasphemē and dispise God wickedly, according as there are manie to be seene, which could finde in their heartes to over-throwe ailloctrine : seeking nothing else but to spreade such corruptions abroade , as men might not any more knowe God, and that his truth might bee buried. And when they haue so done , they woulde haue men too winke at them, or rather to allowe all their dooings, and to tell nothing but fables in the Pulpit, so as there should be no rebuking of them at all. It is very well too the matter say they : can they not preache without beeing angrie ? Howe then ? Is it possible that we shoulde see a mortall and transitorie creature, lift vp i myselfe after that fashion agaynst God, to trample all good doctrine vnder his feete : and yet notwithstanding beare it paciently ?
VVee should shewe thereby that there is no zeale of God in vs. For it is sayde in the Psalme, that the zeale of Ps. 69.b. 10 Gods house ought to eate vs vp. For if we had a worme John. 24.17. gnawing vpon our hart, it ought not too greeve vs so much, as when there is any reproche done vntoo God, and when we see his truth turned into a lie. So then let vs learne, not to winke at vices, but let vs discerne be-twene godly zeale and the fleshly anger wherewith men are moued and inflamed in their owne quarelles : according as it is sayde heere , that Eliu was kindled with displeasure and in a whote anger, and yet notwithstanding, it is reckened too him for a vertue : For it is the holyo Ghost which speaketh it I say let vs consider heereby, that we must not at the first dashe reiect all anger : but haue an eie to the cause why a man is displeased . For when it greeueth him that God is offended, and his truth peruerted: let vs consider that that anger of his springeth out of a good fountaine.

Furthermore, according too that which I haue said, let vs learne to vtre our choller when we see Gods honor wounded, and w en me go about to darken or deface his trut, let vs be moued & inflamed at it, that we may shew our selues the childre of god. For we canot give a better proof of it.

of it. Neuerthelesse, let vs herewithall keepe such measure, as we mingle not our owne excessiue passions with the zeale of God, but be discrete in putting a difference betweene them : and againe, although wee hate and abhorre the vices , yet notwithstanding let vs labour too bring the persons too saluation. Truly the practising hereof is hard. Howbeit, God will guide vs, so we suffer our selues to be ledde by his holy spirit, and give him the whole gouernment of vs . In the meane while it behoueth vs to marke well this doctrine , because that in these dayes wee see infinite occasions too be angrie at, if wee bee the children of God . On the one syde there are the Papistes, whiche seeke nothing but too abolishe all religion. True it is, that they will pretende to mainteyne Christianitie : but whatsoeuer they say , they intende nothing else but to suppress the Maiestie of God. VVee see howe Gods truth is torn in peeces, and what cursed blasphemies are spued oute by them. I pray you if these things shoulde not touche vs too the quicke, too be wounded with them as if a man should stryke vs with a Dagger : Shoulde wee not thereby shewe , that wee knowe not what God is, and that we are not woorthise too bee taken for his children? VVee bee so chare when our owne honestie is wounded, as wee can by no meanes indure it : and in the meane while, Gods honor shall bee put too all shame and reproche , and wee wyll make no countenance at all of it: And must not God then needes shake vs off , and shewe that wee haue had no affection to mainteyne his honour? Marke that for one poynt. Howbeit we neede not go so farre as the Papists : for euen among our selues when wee see these Dogs and Swine which seeke nothing but to defyle all things , which thrust their groynes at Gods woord; and labour to ouerturne all: when wee see these mockers of God , and these heathenishe villaynes whiche turne all things into a scorne and mockerie : when we see wicked men turken, corrupt, and marre all things with their faise flauderis : and when we see heretikes sowe their poysion abroade too destroye all things : I praye you when wee see all these things, ought wee not to bee moued? It is sayde, that when men bende themselves agaynst God

after that manner, it is all one as if they woulde wounde him too death. They shall see him ( sayeth the Scripture) whome they haue peerced. God tellet vs that men ( in so dooing) come too stryke him with theyr Daggers: and shal wee in the meane while not passe for it? God tellet vs that his spirite is greeued, and after a sort in payne : and shall wee but laugh at it? Againe, we heare suche horrible blasphemies, that the name of oure Lorde Iesus Christ is as it were torn in peeces : There is no talke nowe adayes but of scorning and reproching Gods name in suche wise , as a man might bee ashamed too heare of among the Turkes . VVee see naughtypackes that commute on the one syde whoredome and all disorders, and on the othersyde outrage and all violence. Too bee short , wee see all things vterly out of square , and doo wee shewe oure selues too bee Gods children and Christians, if wee make no accounte of it? VVhat proofe doo we gie of our Christendome? So muche the more then behoueth it vs too haue another maner of zeale than we haue had heretofore. And when any of vs is angrie , let it be for our sinnes : and specially if we see God greeuously offended . So shall wee haue an anger that is allowed of God, like as he had that is spoken of heere, and whom the holy Ghost here prayseth. And yet notwithstanding, forasmuch as it is easie for vs to swarue aside : let vs therewithall beware that we gie not the bridle to our passions, but let vs pray God so to governe vs by his holie spirit, as our zeale may be altogether pure, to the ende it may be allowed of him.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as we may sigh and sobbe for them, and that whereas we haue beeene ouermuch hardened heretofore by soothing our selues in our vices, so as we could not be greeued to see the world so farre out of order : we may learne hereafter to bee sorie for our euill doings, and to desire him of forgiuenesse, to the intent he may so guide vs all the rest of our life by his holy spirite, as we may seeke altogether to serue and honor him in all poynts according to our calling. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heavenly father, &c..

The Cxx. Sermon, which is the seconde vpon the xxxij. Chapter.

4. Eliu vvayted till Job had made an ende of his vvoordes, bicause they vvere all elder than he.
5. And vvh'en Eliu savv those three men to haue no reason, he vvas moued to anger.
6. Therefore Eliu the sonne of Barachell the Buzyte aunswvered and sayde , I am yonger in yeares than you, and you are auncient , and therefore I doubted and vvaſ afraide too put forth mine opinion.
7. For I thought vwith my selfe, the yeares shall speake, and the length of time shall bring forth vvisedome.
8. But it is the spirite of God vvhich is in men, and the inspiration of the Almighty giueth vnderstanding.
9. The great men shall not bevvise therefore, neither shall the aged haue iudgement.
10. Therefore I say, heare me, and I also vvill shewve my doctrine.

Esterday I treated of the zeale of Eliu, which is prayzed to vs here by the holy ghost, and I shewed wher-vnto that example ought too serue vs: namely that when we see Gods truth defaced, and his name blasphemed, the same ought to wound our heartes. Also I shewed, that if we haue any affection to God and his honour: then must wee mainteyne hys truth to the vittermost of our power. True it is, that euery man shall nothauie learning to do it. But yet neuerthelesse, according to our abilitie and measure , it behoueth vs to shew that our minde is too resist the euill, and not to consent vnto it. And therewithall it was declared, that this zeale ought to be guided with reason, so as wee must not be moued with ouergreat headinesse, but must haue some good respect matched with it. And that is the thing which we red euen now:namely that Eliu was not over-hastie hastie, but had giuen eare to all the sayings that had bene alledged afore, and therin hee shewed his modeltie. Then let vs marke well, that if a man thrust himselfe foorth rashly, without considering whether it bee needfull for him to speake or no : it shall not bee reckened vnto him for zealousnesse. As for example : wee see manie that thinke it long till they may haue libertie too speake, and yet notwithstanding it is possible, that some other shall be much better able 100 lay foorth the matter than they: and yet (to their owne seeming) they shall neuer speake soone ynough. This hastinesse can neuer be allowable. And for proofe therof, what knoweth he which speakeith to instruct others, whether some men be better able too do it than hee? Hee himselfe had neede too be taught, and hee thrusteth foorth himselfe to bee a teacher. But there is yet an other fault : for when an ignorant persone, or suche a one as is not weil grounded, babbleth : hee stoppeth the mouthes of suche as haue more grace, and better meanes too edifie withall. Therefore let vs marke well, that where modestie is not, there the zeale 20 is rashe, and not gouerned by the spirite of God. For Gods spirite dooth in deede deale abroade his gracious gifites, but he is not contrarie to himselfe. Seeing then that he is named the spirite of discretion : it is meete for vs too discerne when it is needfull to speake, or when to keepe silence.

2.Cro.12.b.10*

True it is that a man may well put foorth some good matter, although he be not of the most abiitie, but be inferior too others: Howebeit it behoueth him too deale searefully, and too shewe that hee commeth with a desire and readinesse too take profit, and that hee had leuer bee a learner than a teacher. If a man go so too woorke, althoughe hee speake before a multitude: yet will hee not fayle too bee modest and lowly. But if a man fyle his speache, and make no ende of his talke, but determine vpon all things : therein hee sheweth, that there is some vaingloriousnesse in him, and inor ouer, that hee giueth not roome too Gods grace, as hee ought to doo.

Thus ye see what is shewed vs in the example of Eliu, 40 when hee sayde that he wayted till their wordes were at an ende : For hee knew not as yet wherenvntoo the matter would come. And heerevntoo hee addeth, that hee bare reverence vnto age. For hee sawe that both Job, and those that talked with him, were auncient men. And forasmuch as age bringeth experience and grauitie with it: Eliu thrusteth not hymselfe foorth, knowing that when God suffereth a manne too liue a long time in the worlde, hee giueth him grace too bee able to profite suche as are yonger. For hee hath liued longer, 50 and therefore hee ought also too bee better settled, and too haue gotten some skill : And so the thing which we haue too marke in the seconde place, is that Eliu acknowledged those that had spoken afore him, too bee his auncientes. And here yong men haue a good and profitable lesson, if they can put it well in vre. For as I haue sayde alreadie) when a man hath liued long, hee ought too haue remembred the things that God hath shewed him by experiance and those ought to serue him, not only for himselfe, but also to giue good counsell too others which haue not like experiance. Also there is a grauitie matched with it. For yong men ought to thinke, that although God hath giuen them some vnderstanding, yet they want much, because they haue not seene much. If a man want experiance, surely he shal from time to time rashly overshoot himselfe: for he forecasteth not the end of things, neither knoweth he where to begin: and moreover the heate that is in yong men, is alwayes contrarie to reason and good vnderstanding. Though a yong man be well stayed and also haue good knowledge therewithall: yet notwithstanding youth driueth him headlong, & there is such boylng in his nature, as he cannot always rule himselfe. VVee see howe Saint Paule warneth Timotheus, that he should not be subiect to the lusts of youth. 2.Tim.2. d. And by these lustes of youth, hee meeneth not disordrednesse in playing, whorehunting, drunkennesse, or other such looce behauour: for Timotheus was a myrrour and patterne of all holiness in himselfe, yea and S.Paule was faine to exhort him to the drinking of wine, and yet notwithstanding he speaketh to him of the lusts of youth. 2.Tim.5. d. And why? For inasmuch as hee was yong of yeates : it was possible for him too bee overhasty in diuers things. Nowe if it behoueth Timotheus (who passed his elders in discretion and grauitie) to receyue this warning, what had the common sort neede to do? Therfore let yong folks looke well too themselues : for if they haue not the honestie to hearken to their elders, and to learne of them, and to followe their counsell : surely if they had all the vertues in the world, that only one vice would staine and defile them all. And there is not a more commō vice, than this presumption. For inasmuche as yong men haue not beeene acquainted with the difficulties that are in manie things: therefore they steppe forth boldely : they sticke not at any thing: nothing (as they thinke) is vnpossible vnto them. Youth then doth always carie presumption with it, as an ouercommon and ordinarie inconuenience: and yet is it not therefore to be borne withall. For (as I sayde) if a yong man haue manie vertues besides, and yet do trust in himselfe, yea and despise his Auncientes, and beare himselfe in hande, that hee is able to leade all others: God will confound him with all his pride, and all the gifites that are in him shall be defaced. And therfore so much the more ought yong folkes, and suche as haue not yet seene much : bridle themselues. Yea and forasmuch as wee see that nowadayes the worlde is so farre out of order, that yong folkes haue gathered suche a diuelish pride, as they bee past receyuing any maner of nurture or instruction at all: Such of them as haue a nanie feare of God, ought to fight so muche the more agaynst themselues, to the ende they bee not caryed away after the common fashion.

VVee shall see these yong Roysters take vpon them to bee men, as soone as they bee from vnder the rodde, when notwithstanding they bee not yet worthie to beare the name of children. They be but as yong Cockchickens of three dayes hatching, and yet they will needes be great men. They ought too bee kept yet halfe a score yeares more vnder the rodde: and beholde, they bee (to their owne seeming) fully men. And wherein? In malapertnesse: For they are as shamelesse as a harlotte of the Stewes, and they may not (by their good willes) be vnder any more awe or correction. Al the world seeth this. Now seeing that this vice is common, and as it were a contagious disease: those to whom God hath giuen any grace, ought to bethinke themselves well, and to take heede that they bee not intangled with it: For they should be caryed away as other are, if God hilde them not by strong hand. So then let Gods children stande vpon their garde, & assure theselues that if they be modest, it is very much although it haue not so gay a shew. And albe it that they which are desirous to set forth theselues, despise them, because they go no: perking vp with their nelbes: let them assure theselues, that they are much more allowed of God, & that he will blisse their honest behauor & make them to profit more in two yeres, than those overhasty felowes shal do in foure. VVee see what hapneth vnto fruits.

If a frute bee too soone ripe, and come soone to his perfect colour : it dooth also fade away incontinently : but the frute that is more latewarde, is of longer continuance . Euen so is it with suche as will put foorth themselues before their time. Truly they may beare a goodly shewe, and haue some taste in them : but it shall haue no substantialnesse in it.

Contrarywise, they that are shamefast and honest, and not presumptuous too putte foorth themselues hastyly : will surely be slowe. But yet in the meane season, oure Lorde giueth them a frute of longer continuance. Thus ye see a good poynt to beare away in this sentence. True it is that modestie is a vertue conuenient for all men : but yet oughte yong folkes too marke that whiche is sayde heere : namely that they muste yelde honoure too theyr Elders : acknowledging that they for theyr owne parte, maye haue excessiue passions whiche had neede too bee restrayned by other men: For they are not sufficiell stayne of their owne nature , and againe, they haue not experiance too bee so skilfull as were requisite. Furthermore, when a yong man hath behaued himselfe so modestly: hee muste in time conuenient vitter the thing that God hath giuen him, yea euen though it were among olde men. For the order of nature letteth not, but that when olde men discharge not their dutie, yong men maye supplie the roome in that behalfe, yea euen too the shame of those that haue liued long, and misspent the time that God hath giuen them, or rather vitterly lost it. Yee see then that the meane whiche we haue to hold, is that the reuerence which yong folkes 30 bear too their elders , muste not hinder the continuall maintenance of the truth, that God should not be honored and vices suppressed. For it may come to passe, that the elder sort shall bee destitute of Gods spirite , or else lewde persones that shall haue nothing in them but craft and vnfaythfulness : or else they shall bee wilfull and brainlesse. Nowe in such cases, ought yong folkes to be hilde so vnder the yoke, that they shoulde by the authoritie of their elders bee turned away from God, and hys woerde, and from the thing that is good and holy ? No. 40 Then let vs marke, that this modestie importeth not that yong men should become sheepish, to discerne and know nothing: but that it is ynough that they presume not of themselues to skirmish and cast their froth before theyr time. Let them hearken, let them be teachable, let them bee alwayes willing to kepe silence when any good matter is in debating, and specially let them beware of stepping intoo other mens places. That beeing done, if they see that the elder sort shewe not good example, specially that they peruer the good by turning it intoo euill: then 50 (as I sayde) it is meete that Gods spirite shoulde shew it selfe where it is. Like as in our time, they that haue beeene misledde in the superstitions of Poperie: the longer they haue liued in the worlde, haue still the lesser knowledge. Nowe to tarie till God shoulde serue his turne by them, (I meane commonly) it were not needfull. These then are aged men that haue had long experiance. But what forthat ? They haue beeene plunged in darkenesse , and there is no knowledge of God in them , nor anye purenesse of Religion. VVhat then coulde suche aged men 60 bring , but onely a greater wilfulness ? For they haue beeene so sapred in their errors, and so wholy given vnto them, as there is no likelyhood of any meanes to bring them oute of them . Nowe if God list too call yong men too publishe his woerde abroade : It were no reason that the holiest shoulde bee so brideled , that yong men might not speake, and olde men bee contented too heare them. True it is that like as God calleth some of all sortes : so hath it commonly beeene his will, to be serued by the elder sort : neverthelesse hee hath declared also, that his truth is not tyed vntoo age . So then wee see nowe what modestie ought too bee in all men generally, and specially in yong men : that is too wite, that they must yelde themselues quietly, too learne so farre as occasion shall bee giuen them, and not desire too vaunte themselues, nor bee ledde with fonde longing too make a shewe : but receyue the things with silencie, whiche shall bee alledged by others , and not make so muche of theyr owne painted sheathe , as not too acknowledge that they haue neede too bee guyded and gouerned by those that are of more experiance. This done, wee shall not neede too bee restreyned from iudging, vnder the shadowe of eldershippe , nor too go like silie beastes, and too holde all things that come oute of their mouth to be as the word of God, because they say it: must be so. For discretion ought to be matched with zeale, according as I haue declared alreadie, that the spirit of God conteyneth both of them in him.

So then if there bee modestie in men, there must bee also zeale and discretion , and wee muste not onelie not be brideled by the authoritie of such as haue liued long, but also if the whole worlde were brought agaynst vs, yet oughte not antiquitie too prejudice the thing that is rightfull and necessarie. As howe ? I haue tolde you alreadie, that if all the old men in the Popedom had conspired agaynst the Gospell , and woulde heue other men too stande too theyr accustomed fashon : it is not ment that their auncientnesse shoulde shette God and hys woerde oute of the doores, or that yong men should bee letted too mainteyne the truth, althoughe that the olde men sette themselues agaynst them, and woulde haue all other men too holde themselues too their customes, because they haue mainteyned the euill a long time. For those too whome God hath giuen better grace , ought too steppe vp agaynst them. Howebeit , it behoueth vs too passe further : and if any man say vntoo vs, howe nowe ? It is aboue a hundred yeares ago since our fathers and forefathers haue lyued after this sort : or it is fife hundred yeares, yea or a thousande yeares ago since these things haue beeene obserued , and since men haue hilde them for a lawe and infallible rule : I say if men alledge this antiquitie of time : yea or if a man shoulde alledge from the creation of the worlde : yet muste not Gods truth bee oppressed vnder that shadowe . So then we see nowe, that to bee modest , it behoueth vs not too be blinde Buffardes, but to keape a meane and measure. And this is it which Eliu meeneth by addling, I sayde age shall speake , and the multitude of yeares shall vitter knowledge. But it is the spirite of God that dwelleth in men, and the inspiration of the Almighty giueth understanding. Marke howe the order of nature goeth afore : that is too wite, that wee muste give eare to our elders : For when men choose gouernours in a Citie, or in a Countrey , if they should take yong light headed and brainlesse fooles, which haue no skill to gouerne their owne persons, the choosing of such too bee thair Judges and leaders, were a peruerting of the order of nature, yea & it were a shame, and it might seeme that men intended to spite God as often as it were so.

Then if men which might choose settled personages and men of great grauitie & ripenesse, would let them sit stil in their houses, & in the meane while take phantasticall fellowes, and little Snales of one nightes growth, and set them in the seate of Iustice, when as they knowe not what it meeneth : It were like, as if men shoulde marrie little babes. It woulde please them well too bee married, because it woulde be sayde vnto them, you shall eate rost meate and pastycrust, and that woulde like them, verie well. But were it therefore a maryage? Euen so (saye I) is it with those that are sette in the seate of iustice, and haue neyther skill nor witte, but are worse than babes, because men had not a consideration too chooze suche as were of more grauitie and experience. Therefore it behoueth the order of nature too be obserued firsste of all: whiche is, that when wee haue men of yeares whome God hath indued with grace, 10 then they shoulde bee putte in office too guide others, and the yonger sorte humble themselues vnder them. For it is a shame that yong men shoulde take vpon them the roome of theyr elders, and disdaine too receyue instruction at the handes of those that haue liued long. This pryd bindeth not it selfe agaynst mortall men, but is a resisting of god, who hath settid the order of nature, and woulde haue men to obserue it. As muche is 20 too bee sayde of vs preachers, and of the state of bearing abroade, and publishing Gods woerde: for when there is a well tryed man of good experiance and knowledge: If men vouchsafe not too bee scrued with such a one, but take a yong man at aventure: what a thing is it? Therefore it behoueth vs to haue the same order in estimation. Neuerthelesse there muste no generall rule bee made of it: for oftentymes it may come too passe, that God shall gyue muche more grace too yong men, than too suche as haue lyued double their tyme. And therefore the sayde order which wee haue spoken of, must not hinder the spirite of God, that he shoulde 30 not bee receyued where hee sheweth himselfe, and his gifites be applied too good vse, according as hee distributeth them. And that is the cause why Saint Paule chose

Act.16.4.12 R.16.6. 21. Pbil.2.2.20. 1.The.3.4.2 1.Tim.1.18

Timothie, though there were many elder men at that time. For when hee had seene that excellent man (as who had the recorde not onelye of men, but also of the holy Ghost) hee preferred him before those that were elder. Euen so dealeth Eliu hee: c: who after hee had hearkened vntoo others, sayeth, hee knewe that it is the spirite of God whiche is in men: as if hee shoulde saye, 40 true it is, that wee muste not judge that olde men doo dote, except wee knowe howe the matter goeth: neyther muste wee fayle too giae them roome and place: but wee must yelde suche honour too their age, as too say, well, the man that hath seene muche, is able too teach vs. But if wee perceyue that he discharge not his duetie, or that hee hath lost his tyme whiche hee hath lyued in the worlde: then if the spirite of God be in a yong man, it behoueth him too putte foorth hymselfe.

Then let vs marke well, that the obseruing of the order of nature, must not bee alwayes with suche condicione, that when God induerth them with anye gifites of grace, they shoulde not serue his Churche, or that they shoulde not teache, not onely theyr equalles and companions, but also euen the oldelt men of all. And consequently, the riche men muste not sickle to theyr age, and therewppon bee vnpacient, and reicte all warnings, too saye, howe nowe? I haue lyued a long tyme, and shall a yongladle teache mee my lesson? No, but let them thinke thus with themselues: I ought too haue profited in suche wise, as I mighte haue beene a leader of others: but I see nowe, that I haue neede to be ledde my selfe: I am a yong childe in comparison of those that shoulde haue beene taught by mee. And seeing it is so, that God hath disappointid me of the grace that was requisite in a leader: it behoueth mee too bee a Scholler and not a mayster.

Yee see then that olde men ought too yelde themselues too conformitie, when they see that God hath gyuen larger gifites of grace too those that ought too followe them, and not to go afore them. Nowe haue wee a good doctrine too put in vre, whiche wee gather of the things sette downe heeretoefore: whiche is, that Gods spirite reigneth aboue the order of nature. And for the better conceyuing of the thing whiche is conteyned heere: let vs marke that Eliu in saying that it is the spirite of God whiche dwelleth in men, ment too expresse, that when it pleaseth God that one man shall bee of greater vnderstanding than another: it is a speciaall gifte whiche hee graunteth as it were for a priledge.

True it is, that generally God hath made vs all reasonable Creatures: and that is the thing wherein we differ from the brute beastes. God then hath giuen some discretion, and vnderstanding to all men without exception: and yet notwithstanding we see that some are slow and dull, and othersome quicke witted, some are phantasticall, and othersome are of good grauitie. VVhereof commeth that? Let vs understande that God holdeth his gifites in his hande, and dealeth them at his pleasure, too whome hee thinketh good. This is it that Eliphas ment too expresse in this place, too the ende that men should not thinke themselues to haue it by natural inheritance from their mothers wombe, nor as a thing belonging to them of dutie, nor as gotten by their owne purchase. Beholde, Eliu telleteth vs that God hath created vs all: and true it is, that wee haue some reason: howbeit but by measure. Yet notwithstanding if a man haue knowledge and wisedome: it behoueth him too know, that God hath reached outhe his hande vntoo him peculiarily, and that therefore hee is the more beholden and bounde vntoo him. And this is sayde vntoo vs, too the intente wee shoulde not bee exalted with pride, nor thinke oure selues too bee the more worth, bycause wee haue knowledge and vnderstanding: But that wee shoulde consider, that forasmuche as it hath pleased God too give vs that grace, it behoueth vs too walke in so much the greater feare: For we be so much the more in his dette: and therewithall his giuing of his benefites, is to the ende wee shoulde communicate them with ourneighbours. Therfore if we cannot vse them too the glorifying of our God, and to the edifying of suche as haue neede of them: it is certaine, that wee are so muche the more blameworthie. This is it that we haue to marke here for one poynt.

And further, it behoueth vs also too make comparison here betwene two degrees: that is to wit, that if it be God that giueth speciaall vnderstanding vnto men, to discerne the things that pertain to this transitorie life: what is too he sayde of the doctrine of the Gospell, and of the true and pure Religion? Haue wee those of nature? Can wee purchase those by oure owne trauaile? Alas, wee muste needes come farre too short. If it fall oure that a man be a good schoolemayster to teach children, or a good Aduocate or Phisition, or a good Marchant of a Citie, or a good Labourer in the Countrey. It is continually the spirite of God that woorketh in all these things. A man shall haue neede too bee sharpe witted, in some one thing more than in some other: like as there is required a greater skill in some handycraftees, than in marchandise.

Nowe then, euen in all these thinges whiche seeme too bee common and of no value in themselues, God muste bee fayne too distrybute his spirite vntoo men. But if wee come too the the doctrine of the Gospell: there

Ike as it was declared yesterday, that no man ought to put forth himself too hastily, but that wee should rather seeke to learne than to teache others, except necessitie constraines vs: So now it is shewed vs here, that wee must not thrust ourselues into any vnowne matter, before we knowe well howe the case standeth. And truely wee see that such as will bee disputing of matters that are not well knowne too them: do runne astray and speake vntowardly, and therin wee perceyue our owne want. Therefore we haue to marke what is shewed vs heere by the example of Eliu: namely that wee must not cast foorth any wordes at auenture, nor be ouerhastie in giuing sentence of things that are hidden from vs, and whereof wee are not duly informed. True it is that this lesson perteyneth cheefly too suche as are set in the seate of iustice: for they ought to examine matters throughly, before they judge of them: neuerthelesse, euerie man ought to obserue the same rule in his owne behalfe. And that is the syrste whiche wee haue too marke heere, according too that which was declared yesterday. And always wee see that which was said: namely that when Gods spirit gouerneth a man, then like as he giueth him zeale, & moucht him to religion, so also he giueth him skill & discretion, so as the one goeth never without the other: and if a man haue an vnruyl zeale, it cannot bee counted for any vertue: but if Gods sprite raigne in him, he shall perceyue that those things are inseparable. And so much the more ought we to pray God, that if hee giue vs the grace to mainteyne his truth, he will also shewe vs when it is time to speake, and when to holde our peace, and that hee will giue vs vnderstanding and reason, that wee runne not at rourers through the vnauidednesse. For it is too slender an excuse, too say I thought I had done well, I tooke the matter to bee so. True it is that there is no man but hee is sometymes overseene: and therefore so muche the more ought we to take heede too our selues, and (considering the weaknesse of our owne witte) to seeke too bee gouerned by Gods hande, so as in hauing a good zeale, we may also haue reason to weelde and rule it well. Now let vs come too that which Eliu sayeth. Hee declareth that his discourse shall not bee such as the other mennes were. Say not (sayeth hee) wee haue founde wisedome: for God hath ouerthrowne Job and not men. Here Eliu betokeneth that he will take another way in disputing agaynst Job, than the other men had done. For what way hild they? Thou art afflicted by the hande of God (saye they) and not without cause: and therefore it muste bee concluded, that thou art a wicked man. Thine affliction is so great and vmeasurable, as there was never yet any man in the worlde seene to bee so sore pressed as thou: and therefore it followeth, that thou passest all men in wickednesse.

To what the foundation was which Iobs freends toke in going about to reprove him. But Eliu protesteth, that hee will not take that way. And surely it is apparant, that if hee had gone forwarde after that sort, it had still made the matter worse and worse. For I haue tolde you, that Job was able too mainteyne his soundnesse, in that hee had walked in the feare of God, and not offended, in any thing, fawing in that hee coulde not settle his minde wholy to the obeying of God, but thought his afflictions strange, howbeit in that respect of the principall poynt, his case was good and iust. Surely some men vnderstand this text, as though Eliu shoulde say, thinke not that ye shall become wylle by holding your peace, and that God will confounde him well ynougue though mortall men meddle not with him. But if a man looke neerely too the matter, hee shall finde the natural sense too bee that whiche I haue spoken: namely that Eliu taunted Iobs freends. For hee vpbraydeth them exprestly, that they thought themselves to haue founde wisedome, like as we commonly say in the Proverbe, that a man thinketh hee hath founde the Beane in the Cake, when there is some subtle meening in a thing, and he windeth himselfe into some comparie to put foorth his opinion and device, bearing himselfe in hand, that he hath an inuincible reason although it be but fonde and tryfing. So speaketh Eliu heere. It seemeth to you (sayth he) that the knot of the matter is, that forasmuch as God hath pressed Job after that sort, and punished him so roughly: therefore hee is his enimie: you take that too bee so good and strong a foundation as can bee: but it is nothing woorthe, according as I haue declared alreadie, that although God doo visite a man, it dooth not therefore followe that hee is wicked. For albeit that God doo threaten the transgressours of his law, to punish them both in their owne persons, and in their goodes, and in their children: yet was not Job persecuted in that respect, but for another cause. Although God threaten the transgressours: it is not ment that hee reserueth not libertie too himselfe, to exercise the pacience of the faythfull when he listeth, or that hee may not shew himselfe rough towards them, althoughe hee haue not a respecte vntoo their offences whiche they haue committed. VVherefore then? to humble them. If there were no other reason but that: It ought well to suffice. Besides this, God will haue his seruants an example vntoo others. And moreover it is needfull to mortifie their fleshly affections. For often-times we haue secrete vices vs, the which God remedieith before hand. And sometymes when he sendeth vs afflictions, wee knowe not the cause, but hee seeth farre cleerer than wee. So then wee must fully conclude, that God scourgeth the good, and suche as haue not prouoked his wrath, and that he ceaseth not to shew himselfe rough towards them and to execute great rigour vpon them, insomuch as it shall seeme that he is minded to ouerwhelme the vtterly. And is it therfore to be said that men should count them wicked? No then is it a fonde argument: and although Iobs freends ground themselves vpon it, and thought to haue found wisedome in that behalf: yet notwithstanding I say it is but a childishe thing. VVherefore concerning this text, let vs beare that thing in minde which I haue touchid heretof ore, which is, to behaue our selues discretely when God afflicteth men, and not to judge of them at auenture, that he whiche is beaten with gods rods is forthwith to be condemned, & that his sinnes are to be measured by his afflictions. For it were a rashe and vnwyse proceeding too make a generall rule of it. Howe then? Let vs vnderstante, that God hath diuers reasons too afflict men. True it is that it is his ordinarie iustice to punishe sinnes: Neuerthelesse, sometymes it is his will too tri the obedience of good men, and of suche as haue serued him and applyed their whole indeuer too followe his commaundements: yea and those shall be handled with greater rigour, than the wicked. And why? For God intendeth to teach them what it is too bee humble and obedient. Seeing the case standeth so, it behoueth vs too refrayne from hastie judgement when any man is afflicted. For God wyll also preserue his seruantes from the temptations that he sendeth them.

True it is that if they haue by any meanes prouoked him too displeasure, hee remedyeth that euill by af-

Hilting them. Nowe shall wee therupon iudge, that such as are handled roughliest, are the wickedest. What a thing were that? See yee not that wee shoulde proceede cleane backwarde from God, and quite contrary to his intent and purpose? Furthermore let vs applie this, as well to our neighbours, as to our selues. If wee see men that are afflicted with many miseries: let vs first looke vnto their lyfe, and not bee hasty too giue sentence vpon them, but consider howe they haue liued. If a despiser of God, an vnruyl person, a man giuen to 10 outrageous vycs, bee greeuously punished: let vs acknowledge, that therein God sheweth vs as it were in a picture, what his vengeance is. And there wee haue a iust occasion too iudge. Why so? For the thing it selfe speaketh. When a man hath despysed God and spent his whole lyfe disorderly, and wee see that God scourgeth him. In that behalfe there is no doubting, the matter it selfe is not darke nor difficult. So then our iudgement shall not bee ouerhasty, if wee proceede after that sort. But contrarywise, if we haue sought for 20 the reason why God afflicteth men, and see none: (as if some man had walked vprightly;) in that case we must brydle our selues. And why? For we knowe not Gods purpose, vntill hee shewe it vntoo vs. Lo howe wee ought to iudge in respect of others. And heerewythall when we see the wicked punished as they haue deserved, let vs not onely condemne them, but also applie the same too our owne vse, according as Sainct Paule sheweth it: whiche is, that wee shoulde walke in the feare of God, and take warning by other mennes harmes. Be- 30 holde, God punisheth Vvhoremonges, Theeues, and Rebels: and that is too the ende that we shoulde learne to walke in his obedience, and not prouoke his wrath, as those did whome wee see so roughly handled. Thys then is the thing which wee haue too doo, when God maketh vs to beholde his vengeance, in such as haue bene vitterly rebellious agaynst him. But if wee see the good men visited: it behoueth vs to thinke: Alas, if the grene tree be cast into the fire, what shall become of the drie? 40 VVhen wee compare oure selues with such as are in a maner halfe out of this worlds alreadie, wee shall see verie great vertues in them, and yet notwithstanding they are handled muche more greeuously than wee. Therefore wee must needes say, that God beareth wyth vs. For if hee ptyed vs not, what shoulde become of vs? And when wee bee wakened by that meane, let vs assure ourselues, it is not too the ende wee shoulde take the more libertie to do euill: but too restrayne vs, and as it were to tie vs vp: too the intent wee shoulde submit our selues wholly vntoo our God. VVhen we haue so 50 considered the scourges and afflictions that God sendeth vpon our neighbours: let vs on our side (when our turne commeth about too bee punished at Gods hande, yea euen for oure sinnes) acknowledge that there needeth no other witnessesse than oure owne conscience, which also is a sufficient Judge to condemne vs. But if afterward God be at any time rough to vs, and we see no reason why: yet let not our heartes fayle vs, neither let vs vexe our selues in disputing with God though he do not as we would haue him: but rather let vs learne to comfort our selues. And although God seeme to be our mortall enimie, and to thunder against vs: yet notwithstanding let vs trust in him, as we haue seene Job speake hereto-

Thus ye see how we ought to be discrete in iudging fore. Of the chastizements that God sendeth vs, and also that we ought to be verie milde towards our neighbors. This is the thing that we haue to beare away in this sentece of

Eliu, when hee sayth, that it is a follie for men to gaze so much at the present afflictions, as to say, that because gods hand in rough, hard, and sharpe vpon a creature, therfore he vitterly ouerthroweth him. I say wee must not followe that for a generall rule. And why? For we shoulde bee beguiled at all assayes, as I haue shewed alreadie. Now heerevpon Eliu vprebraydeth Iobs frendes, that they were confounded. I wayted (sayth hee) and they spake no more, but gane ouer their talke. Heereby he betokeneth, that they were confounded, bycause they were euill grounded: For wee knowe that the truth is alwayes invincible. True it is that hee whiche hath a good cace, shall not alwayes be heard: For we see that a good cace may be oppressed by brainlesse and frantike folke when they haue their full scope. For they stoppe the mouthes of such as haue iust cause too speake. But when things go orderly, if a man haue a good cace, God gyueth him wherewith too maintaine it: For truth (as I sayde) shall haue the vpper hande. So then it is not for naught, that Eliu taunteith Iobs frendes, who were confounded in the middest of their way. VVherefore let vs assyure oure selues, that when wee knowe throughly that a thing is true, God will also giue vs arguments and reasons to maintaine it, too the ende wee be not vanquished by such as labour too beate downe the truthe, and to turne it into a lye. God I say will so strengthen vs, as wee shall neuer bee destitute of reason. And this is a doctrine well woorthie too be marked. For what is the cause that oftentimes wee dare not vndertake a good quarell, but for that we haue not the stoutnesse and skill too resist so stedfastly as were requisite? Nowe to the ende that such fearefulness shoulde not hinder vs from beeing zealous in maynteyning the truth as wee ought too doo: let vs marke that God forsaketh not those that haue courage to maintaine good caces, but giueth them victorie in the ende. Yea, and although they be oppressed by subtilitie and wilynesse (as it may so come to passe as I haue sayde:) yet notwithstanding they shall neuer bee confounded howesoever the worlde go. Then let vs trust too this promise, and referre oure selues vntoo G O D, and wee shall finde that this is not sayde in vain.

True it is, that aboue all things, it behoueth vs too discerne whether the cace that wee mainteyne, bee good or no. For God punisheth the lightnesse of such as take matters in hande before they knowe why or howe. Hee leaueth them as soone as they haue opened theyr mouth, and they become laughingstockes vnto all men. Beholde the iuste rewarde of such as are ouerhasty in putting foorth themselues. But when wee bee sure of the goodnessse of a cace, let vs rest vpon that whiche is sayd vntoo vs heere: that is too witte, that God will so strengthen vs, as we shall not bee overcome. And furthermore, when wee see sometymes that such as ought too mainteyne a good cace, play the goslings, and stande as if they were dead and abashed: let vs marke that God punisheth such faynheartednesse, and gyueth them not such courage as they ought too haue, because they called not on him, nor hung vpon him, for somuch as they thought not the holie Ghost to be able ynochough too giue them strength.

So then thisvnbeleefe sheweth it selfe now adayes, in that if there be a good cace, it shall be thrust vnder foot. Yee see that the wicked haue courage ynowghe and too much, to set forth theyr lies, and to withstand the coming forth of the truth. And why? For the wicked faile not too applie too strayne themselues to the vittermost too ouerthrowe all things, and too bring matters to confusion:

there is a wisedome that surmounteth all mans vnderstanding : yea and is woorderfull euen too the verie Angelles. They bee the verie secreteſ of heauen which are conteyned in the Gospell. For it concerneth the knowinge of God in the person of his sonne. And al-though oure Lorde Iesuſ Christ came downe heere beneath : yet must wee comprehendē hys godly Maiestie, or else we cannot grounde and settle oure fayth in him. I ſay it concerneth the knowledge of things that are incomprehensible to mans nature.

Nowe if God muſte bee fayne too deale his ſpirite in respect of the handicrafteſ and worldely trades that concerne this tranſitorie lyfe : muſche more ought wee too thinke , that oure owne ſharpe witte is not able too knowe the things that concerne God and the ſecreteſ of his kingdome, and that it behoueth vs to bee taught by him, and in the meane ſeafon too become fooles in respect of oure ſelues , as Sainct Paule ſayeth, that wee maye bee partakers of that wisedome. For this is the ſentencē that is giuen thereoſ : namely that the naturall man dooth neuer comprehendē the doctrine of God :

1.Cor.3.d.17 that is too ſay, as long as men abide in their owne natu-ral kinde, they neyther knowe what God is, nor can at any time taste of his woordē , but (whiche worse is) it is follie to them as Sainct Paule ſayeth : For too their ſeem-ing it is an vneſonable doctrine : and therefore it is the onely ſpirite of God that giueth vs fayth and inlight-neth vs. And this ought to be well marked. For when wee ſee there are ſo fewe that knowe God , yea and that many men whiche are well ſtiken in yeareſ , and haue liued long time in the worlde , are ſtarke madde in their Superſtitioſ , and fight feareſly agaynſte the doctrine of the Gospell: oftentymes it dazeleth oure eyes, and wee are amazed at it. Yea, but heere is a text whiche ought too arme vs agaynſte ſuſe ſtumblin-gblockes. It is the ſpirite of God whiche dwelleth in men: it is the iſpiration of the Almighty that giueth underſtānding. Do wee ſee wretched men blindeſ, and ſo plun-geſ in ignorance, as they cannot come too the gopſell? Let vs not maruell at it. And why? For it is manneſ

1.Co.2.d.14 40 naturall kinde , not too diſerne anie whitte of Gods ſecreteſ , vntill wee bee inlightned. But contrarywiſe when wee ſee a man that knoweth God (whether he bee yong or olde) or if wee ſee an olde man that hath bene ſaped a long while in the dotageſ of Papistrie , come to right Religion, let vs auſſure oure ſelues that God haſe wrought a miracle in that cace. Also if wee ſee yong folkeſ come too it, let vs auſſure oure ſelues that God draweth them too him after a marueylous fashion. For they doo not eaſily receyue the yoke, because they bee 50 full of presumption as I ſayd afore. Then if God tame them, and make them teachable, it is his mightie hande that hath brought them vntoo it.

And ſo wee ſee, that this teſte ought too ſerue vs in twoo thingeſ. The firſte is, that ſeeing that by oure witte wee can neuer reache ſo highe as too knowe God or his truthe : we ought too putte oure owne reaſon from vs , and too renounce it vtterly. And that is the thing whiche Sainct Paule tearmeth too bee made a foolē.

Then if wee will haue our Lorde too fill vs with his wisedome : it behoueth vs too become fooles: that is too ſay, wee muſte not bring anie thing of oure owne, nor weene oure ſelues too haue one thing or other: For that were a ſhutting of the doore agaynſte God. VVherefore if wee will haue God too continue the grace of his holie ſpirite, when hee ſhall haue giuen vs anie portion of it: wee muſte learene too exalt and magnifie him as hee deserueth , and too acknowledge that there is not one droppē of good vnderſtānding in vs, till God haue putte it intoo vs. And agayne, the ſame muſte cauſe vs too perſiſt alwayes in hys obedi-ence , and too walke in greater feare and carefulneſſe : ſeeing that if God ſhoule quenche the light that hee hath putte intoo vs, wee ſhoule bee in darkenesſe, yea and in ſo horryble darkenesſe , as wee couldc neuer gette oute of it . This is the firſte uſe of this place.

10 The ſeconde is, that althouglie wee ſee the greater part of the worlde goe astraye , and ſcarceley anie man wil-ling too ſubmiſte hiſelfe vntoo God : wee muſte not thiſke it ſtroungē that menne ſhoule bee ſo farre oute of order, as too playe the wilde beaſteſ . And why? For it is the ſpirite of God that giueth underſtānding. VVherefore let the ſame bee as a grounde for vs, too magnifie Gods gracie the more , whiche wee ſhall haue receyued : and therewithall let vs not bee caried awaye, though we ſee ſuſe rebelliouſneſſe. And why? For men doo but followe theyr owne kinde, they follow theyr owne heade, and in the meane while reſiſt God : and that is bycauſe the doctrine of the Gopſell ſur-mounteth all manneſ reaſon : and God muſte bee fayne too woorkē by his holi ſpirite in opening theyr eyes, or else they ſhall abyde continually in their beaſt-lyneſſe.

Finally, Eliu concludeſ therevpon, that great men are not alwayes wiſe, and that ſometymeſ aged men haue no underſtānding, ſkill, nor diſcretion, more than other men. Truely Eliu meeneth nor heere, too peruer the order of nature. For hee hath protested heeretooſore, that hee woulde hearken too the aged, and was willing too ſubmiſte hiſelfe too theyr doctrine. But he mee-neth that whiche I haue touched alreadie : namely that God is not bounde too age , nor too the ſtaſtes and qua-lities of men.

VVhen it pleaſeth God too aduaunce a man too di-gnitie, if hee will haue him too ſerue for the welfare of hys people, he indueth hym with gracie too bee able to diſcharge hiſ office : Otherwyſe hee leaueth hym deſtitute, and the higher that a man is in degree, the more ſhall hee bee knowne too bee a double beaſt. As for example, If there bee a nian chofen too preache Gods woordē, and God bee mynded too ſhewe fauour too his Churche : hee will induie the ſayde man with hys ſpirite, hee wyll giue him underſtānding of his woordē, and hee will graunte him cunning and ſkill too applie it too the uſe of the people, and too gather good doc-trine of it: and finally, hee will giue him zealousneſſe and all other thingeſ that are requiſite : and hee will ſhew hiſelfe ſo maniſtely in that behalfe , as wee maye ſaye, that hee hath a care of vs , for that hee diſtribu-teeſ his gracieſ after that ſorte vntoo men, in the thingeſ that are requiſite for oure welfare. As muſche is too ſay of them that ſitte in the ſeate of iuſtiſe : according as they haue neede that the ſpirite of God ſhoule bee doubled in them, ſo also when God intendeth to be ſerued by them, hee giueth them a mightie power too diſcharge their dutieſ.

60 Contrarywiſe, if God bee angrie with vs : then they whiche ſhall haue the preaching of his woordē, ſhall be beaſteſ withoute underſtānding, and men ſhall diſpife them for diſguyſing thingeſ, ſo as the good doc-trine ſhall bee defaced, and defyled by them , and (too bee ſhorte) ſcarceley ſhall they bee good ſchollers, and therefore muſche leſſe good Mayſters. Yee ſee then what Eliu ment too ſhewe in ſaying, that the great men ſhall not alwayes be wiſe, nor the aged men alwayes the man of best understanding. As if he shoulde say, we must not make a generall rule to saye this man is aduaunced to hie estate and authoritie, and therefore he must needes bee a man of knowledge : wee muste not gather any such consequent of it. And why? For God can well forsake the greate ones , so as they shall become grosse beastes , and the longer they shall haue liued, they shall but haue mispent the more breade in beeing fedde at Gods cost, insomuche that it had beeene better (as you woulde say) that an Ox had beeene fedde with it. For 10 it had beeene better bestowed.

So then let vs learne, that forasmuche as God distributeith hys spirite too those whome hee intendeth to applie to his seruice : they ought so muche the better too employ themselues carefully and in the feare of God. And if they doo otherwyse , it will appeare that those whiche were taken too bee wyfes , shall bee vterly blinded , so as they shall not knowe God , according as

1.Cor.1.c.19

God threatneth by his Prophete Esay , saying, that the aged shall not see any whitte , and that the wise shall become brutishe and vterly dull. VVee see then howe God declareth a much more horrible vengeance agaynst the great men, olde men, and gouernours , than agaynst the common people. Hereby wee bee warned , that wee muste not attribute an infallible autoritie too them , as thoughe they coulde never erre nor misgouerne others. Nowe if God doo blinde the olde men, great men, and suche as are in autoritie after that sort: what shall become of them ( I pray you) if God giue them not hys holy spirite ? And let vs marke well the cause why God 30 maketh that threatning. It is for mennes hypocrisie, Mat.15.b.9 because they serued him but for countenance sake, and Mar.7.a.7. their heart was farre from him, so as they protested too serue him wthy theyr mouth , and in the meanwhile gaue themselves too the traditions of men : that is too say, God reigned not alone ouer them by his woerde, but men had theyr owne scope. But God cannot abyde that his autoritie shoulde bee so diminished. And that is the cause why he sayeth, I will blinde the wyse, and take away vnderstanding and reason from the aged. 40 VVherefore if wee desire too haue God too gourne vs, and too reigne among vs , and to inioy the gracious giftes that are necessarie for our saluation : let vs learne that it behoueth vs too yeelde him the dominion and soueraintie ouer vs, and all of vs both great and small, must frame oure selues too his obedience.

Furthermore, let vs take his worde for our rule , and suffer our selues too be gouerned by it: assuring our selues that otherwise we must not loke that the holy ghost shall woork in vs. And therefore let vs seeke all the meanes that can be to be taught . God would that there should be shepheards in his Church to preach his word, and that wee shoulde receyue correction and warning at their handes. Is not this done so throughly as it ought to bee? Let vs pray God to supplic that default. VVherefore let vs walke in such humilitie , as oure whole desire may be, that god should haue al preheminēce ouer vs, assuring our selues that we can haue no further reason nor vnderstanding, than we bee inlightned by his holy spirit. That is the meane whereby hee will never suffer vs to be thrust out of the way, but when he hath once begun too guide vs and teach vs , hee will make vs growe stronger and stronger in all wisedome , according as Sanct Paule 1.Cor.1. sayeth, that seeing that God hath once begun in vs, hee will not suffer vs to want any thing, vntill the latter day, at which time we shall haue full knowledge of the things which we know as now but in part.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good god, with acknowledgement of our sins, praying him to make vs so too perceyue them, as wee may bee vterly beaten downe in them, and specially that knowing what a number of wantes and miseries be in vs, we may pray him too reforme vs and clese vs from all our spots, and make vs so pure by his holy spirite , as hee may always acknowledge and auowe vs too bee his children : and that wee also on our side may serue and honour him as our father, and shewe such brotherly loue one towardes another, as he commaundeth, so as we may seeke nothing but to exalt his holy name among vs, and euery of vs in his degree too yeelde him his due honour. That it maye please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also too all people and nations, &c.

The.Cxxij.Sermon,which is the thirde vpon the.xxiij.Chapter.

11. Behoide I haue vvayted for your vvordes, giuing care vwhile you prepared your selues and fought out your reasons.
12. Then I considered you, but there vvas none of you that disproued Job, or that ansvered his vvordes.
13. But to the ende you may not say, vvee haue founde vvisedome : God hath cast him, and not man.
14. He hath not directed his vvoordes vnto me : neyther vwill I ansvere him according to your vvoordes.
15. They vvere afryde and ansvered not, but left speaking.
16. And I taryed, but they spake not: they stooode still and ansvered no more.
17. I also vwill ansvere in my turne, and shewre mine aduice.
18. For I am full of matter, and the spirite of my belly constreyneth mee.

20. Therefore I vwill speake and haue a vent, I vwill open my lippes and ansvere.
21. I vwill not novve accept the person of man, neyther vwill I giue titles to man.

fusion: and in the meane while no man setteth hym selfe agaynst them, at leastwise with suche courage as were requisite. And why? For suche as are willing too doo well, and haue some affection, are notwithstanding faynt of beleefe. But surely if they trusted in God, he would not suffer all things to be confounded as they be. Thus yee see what we haue to consider when Eliu taunteh lobs friends for being confounded. It is as much as if hee shoulde saye, that thereby it was apparant, that they had an euill cace, and that they had made a wrong to match agaynst Job. And hee addeth, that bee also wyl speake in his turne. This woerde Also ought to bee well weyed. For thereby Eliu betokeneth, that hee putteth foorth his aduyce in due time. VVhy? I haue tolde you alreadie, that bycause he was a yong man, he ought too haue yeeded reverence to the aged: For otherwise it had beene a peruerting of the order of nature. Therefor it behoueth this modeſtie to go before, and that Eliu shoulde suffer his elders to speake, and he to heare them. That done, forasmuch as God giueth him the grace to discerne the cace better than they had done, hee also speaketh in his turne. VVe see then that hee runneth not a heade, that is to say, he thrusteth not himselfe into the matter at aduenture: but holdeth his peace till conuenient time serueth, and then speakeſt. And this is a poynt which we ought to mark verie wel. For we know that in Gods Church all things ought to be handled orderly and comely, as Saint Paule sayth. Therefore there are twoo things requisite in the manner of teaching: First, that order be obſerued, and ſecondly, that the order be matched with honestie, ſo as the things may be comely and conuenient. Seeing it is ſo, let vs beare in minde the example of Eliu, and let vs holde vs to the doctrine that Saint Paule gyueth vs in the ſayde Texte: whiche is, that there bee no disorder amongſt vs, according also as Saint Paule ſayeth in another ſtreyne of the texte by mee alledged, that although God haue rayfed vp many Prophetes in his Church, and that there be many which haue ſkill to ſpeake, yea and also wherewith to teache: yet notwithstanding it is not for them all too vtter forth what is giuen them. For it behoueth that there be order and meaſure, and also there is a certaine honest comeliness too bee kept. That therfore is the thing whiche is ſhewed vs heere in the example of Eliu, when hee ſayeth that hee will ſpeake, yea, but that is when he ſeeth that things are misordered, and that lobs freends had disguised the truth, and that they had mainteyned an euill and false principle. For althoughe they vſed faire and apparent reaſons to colour the matter withall: yet notwithstanding the foundation wherepon they buildest, was not good. And Job alſo on his ſide, althoughe his cace were iuft, yet notwithstanding did handle it amifle, and vſed many wandring wordes. Therefore after that Eliu had harkned quietly, now when he ſeeth that God giueth him an entraunce and acceſſe: hee vſeth it. And beſides this, hee is alſo conſtreynd to doo ſo, according as he ſheweth when hee addeth that his heart is greeued, and that bee is like a caske full of newe wine. If a man put newe wine into a Caske and close it vp, and giue it no vent: the caske burſteth when the wine boyled. Euen ſo ſayth Eliu that his minde is ſhet vp as if a caske were full of newe wine, and coulde holde no longer, but muſt needes burſt out.

Hereby hee meeneth that necessitie conſtreynd him to put forth his opinion, to the ende that the cace which had beene euill debated, might nowe be ordered by reaſon. And bicaufe Eliu ſpeaketh here with great vehemenſie: ſome perceyuing not the caufe, haue thought him to be a man of a loftie minde, and full of boſting. But firſt of al we ſee, that God condemmeth him not. VVheras he condemmeth Job and his freends, and ſheweth that all of them had done amifle one way or other: yet notwithstanding Eliu is iuſtified. Now ſeeing that God condemmeth him not: what mortall man ſhall take vpon him the authoritie to judge aboue God? Therfore that is a great folie. Moreouer, this muſt not be thought ſo ſtrage a thing. For we muſt beare in minde, how it hath beene declared heretofore, that Eliu was not as one of the Prophets that were in Gods Church. After that God had published his lawe by the hande of Moyses, he promiſed alſo, that the people of Iſraell ſhoulde neuer bee deſtitute of Prophetes. For it is written in Deut. thou ſhalt not go too Deut. 18.b. Sorcerers, nor Soothſayers: thou ſhalte not ſeeke for 10.ii. ſuch reuelations as the Heathen do: Thou ſhalt not run after witchcrafts, and other vaine ſciences: neither ſhalt thou aske counſellat the deade. For thy God ſhall al Deu.18.d.18 wayes rayfe thee vp a Prophet in the middes of thee: as if he ſhould ſay, the heathen men ſeeke and ſearch many wayes too bee taught. And why? For they knowe not where they be: they haue no Prophet, nor any certaine doctrine to lead and guide them. But it is not ſo with you (ſayd God to the children of Iſraell:) I will alwayes giue you ſome Prophet, ſo as I will dwell familiarly among you, and my truthe ſhall bee knowne vnto you. Thus then there were Prophetes in the Church of God according to his promise: and that was continually a common thing. But Eliu dwelled among ſuch foike as had not the lawe and promises of God, neither did our Lorde make anie couenaunt with thoſe people. For either they were before the lawe, or else they were among Idolaters, according as I haue tolde you, that Thare and Nachor (who Iofu.24.a.2 were the greate Grandfathers and aunceters of Eliu) Gen.22.c.21 were Idolaters.

Seeing then that Eliu was iuſtified by God with ſkil to ſpeake as we haue ſene, the ſame was an extraordinarie matter. And therefore we muſt not think it ſtrange, that there is a great operation in him, and that god ſheweth heere an ynaccustomed power, and that Eliu alſo feeleth himſelfe as it were chaunged. For to the intent that Prophecys ſhoulde haue the more authoritie, wee ſee that God hath at tymes ſette ſome apparent markes in them. Like as when God called Saule too the kingdome, hee ſo chaunged and renued him, as hee ſeemed too bee quite and cleane another man than he had bene afore. And the text it ſelife ſayth, is Saule alſo among the Prophetes? Then if God ſo rayched thoſe Prophetes too the quicke whiche were called too ſhat ſtate according too his promise, and that the ſame was a cuſtomable order: I ſay, if hee chaunged them in ſuche wife, as it appeared that they were as men rauished: muſche more reaſon is it, that when hee wrought in a heathen man wiche was out of his Churche, there muſte needes bee ſome notable marke in that behalfe, ſo as the worlde might knowe that Gods hande was vpon him. Howebeit, forasmuche as the Diuell is alwayes an Ape of God and a counterfeyter of his woorkes: the like befell too the falſe Prophetes alſo of the Inſidelles, whiche brought them reuelacions in the name of thir Ido's. For they alſo were rauished. VVhen a man cam to inquire of any ſecret thing at the Idols which had the fame and re nouine of foretelling things too come: they had there their Prophetes eyther men or women, whiche were as it were halfe deade, when they ſhoulde anſwer such as came to inquire of them. They drewe out their wordes like thoſe that were fallen into the falling ſicknes: they ſomēd at the mouth, & their cies turned in thir headeſ.

heades. And this was done purposely, because the diuell woulde bleare the eyes of ignorant wretches, and sorte them after such a fashion, as they shoulde moued too reuerence, whether they woulde or no. As how? Needes must this be through a heauenly power (did folks say) seeing that men and women are so changed. But (as I said) all this was done by Satans pollicie, who through a certaine slight did counterfeit Gods workes, and so disguise him self after that sort, to the ende that men shoulde not discerne, but rather thinke that the things which came from hell, proceeded from heauen. Neuerthelesse we see well, that the cause why we ought not to thinke it strange that Eliu had such a vehement pang in his minde: was for that God hadordeined him of purpose, to vndertake the encounter agaynst Job and his freends. Yea and it was requisite that God shoulde woorke after a newe fashion in this man. And why? For youth of it selfe shall not be heard among men, because that olde men make greate account of their age, and think themselves to be of great abilitie and wisedome: and that maketh them so much the more arrogant. For by meanes thereof, they are so forepossessed with a foolish opinion, as they cannot finde in their heartes too bee taught, but with great hardnesse, and as it were by force. Therefore it behoueth God too touch Eliu to the quicke, and to make a great alteration of minde in him, to the end that his doctrine might haue some entrance, and be receyued among his elders. To be short, God ment too authorize Eliu when he gaue him such a vehemencie of minde. But there is also the reason which I haue touched, namely, that he sawe the truth oppresed, insomuch as Job had mainteyned his quarell amisse although it was good, & the other men had disguised things & made an euill foundation, abusing the talke which concerned God, by alledging good and holy reasons for the prooef of a wrong principle which they had taken. Therfore at the sight of this, he was moued wyth a zeale that he conceyued in himself, and his heart did as it were boyle within him, and it woulde haue made him to burst if he had not discharged himselfe of it. This ought to serue vs to double vse. For first of all sith we see that God hath printed such a marke in the doctrine of Eliu, and that the heauenly spirite is apparant in his mouth: So much the more ought we to bee moued too receyue his sayings. For too what purpose hath God marked it so, but too the ende it shoulde haue the more reuerence among vs? So then, forasmuch as God hath put his Seale to the things which Eliu shall discourse hereafter, and woulde that his doctrine should therby be made the more certeyne vnto vs: let vs not receyue it as the doctrine of a mortall man, but let vs learne hereby too submitte oure selues vnto it, and let vs be sure that our fayth shall not be grounded vpon the doctrine of a creature, but that it is God which speaketh by the mouth of a man, and vseth him as an instrument. Lo what wee haue to marke. Howbeit it behoueth vs too passe further: namely that if the marke which was dimme in Eliu ought to serue to make vs receyue his doctrine with fuller obedience: what is to be sayd of the great and notable prooefes, which God hath giuen vs by his lawe, and by all his Prophecies? True it is that Eliu bringeth the pure worde of God, and that it behoueth vs to take the things that proceede out of his mouth, as things that come of the holy ghost. And why? Because God hath stirred him vp to such a vehemencie. But if wee consider how God hath magnisid and approued his lawe, and the doctrine of the Prophets: we shall see, a fashion that is much more mightie. For when the law was published, lightning, the trumpets sounded in the cloudes, the earth quaked, the Mountaynes renioued as sheep at the voice Psal.114. of God, and (to be short) there was no Element whiche gaue not recorde of that doctrine, in shewing that it was altogether heauenly. Also there followed miracles when the Prophet spake, and the heauenly power appeared alwayes with so great proof, as ought to put out our eies, if we do not see it. And therfore seeing we knowe it was gods wil that that one only mark which he gaue vnto Eliu, should cause the doctrine of Eliu to bee receyued as of sufficiēt authoritie: let vs vnderstand, that when the law & Prophets come in question, we ought to haue reason to be more moued & stirred vp, according as the thing which is spoken of Eliu, is but an appurtenance of the other. Thus ye see what we haue to mark in the first place. And in the second it behoueth vs also to marke, that like as Eliu was moued with zeale, when hee sawe men disguise Gods truth and falsifie his woerde: So must wee also haue the like minde at the least. Then if false Prophetes ryse vp too deface the good doctrine, if wicked men disguise theyr blasphemyes to perswade the worlde too despise God, and his woerde, if an euill cace bee mainteyned, or if men go aboute too ouerthowright: let vs not bee dumbe nor carelesse: but let vs haue the same vehemencie in vs whiche hee shewed vs heere. For if wee haue not this godly zeale towrdes Gods truth, wee shewe oure selues too bee none of his children.

And therefore let vs marke well the example whiche is set foorth heere in the persone of Eliu, yea and let vs make comparison betweene oure selues and him. For if a man that was not brought vp in Gods schole, but was intangled among the Infidelles, was moued wyth suche zeale when God touched him, that hee irned, as if hee shoulde haue burst, till hee had discharged hys conscience: I pray you what shoulde wee do when God teacheth vs so familiarly in his woerde? Can we bee excused when wee yeldē not recorde vnto him before men, at suche time as we see goodnessse defaced, yea and vtterly razed out: and yet set not our selues against them that do it?

Then seeing that our Lorde calleth vs therewith, and layeth such a charge vpon vs: If we be dumbe, and make no account of mainteyning the good, but rather do help the wicked by our silence: are we not traytors to God and his truth? Yes doubtlesse are we. So then it behoueth vs to be moued the more, sith we see that a man which had not heene instructed in the lawe of God, nor was of the body of his Church, had notwithstanding such an earnest will to mainteyne the truth, and was in a maner inforced to it. True it is that this inforcement is willing. For when God intendeth too bee serued by men, hee caryeth them not away too make them go too it by constreynt. I meane his Prophetes and true seruantes: for hee will serue his owne turne by the wicked, whether they will or no: but I speake heere, of those too whome he giueth his spirite of Prophecie: whome hee maketh not to serue him without giuing them a good will to do it. Hee coulde well speake by the mouth of Balaam, Num.22.23. and yet notwithstanding we see that Balaam was still a deceyuer, and the holy Ghost setteth him forth too his reproch and slander. But as for Eliu, God stirred him vp as his Prophete, so as hee serued him with a good will, that is too say, hee ouercame all lettes that myghte turne him awaie from maintayning of the truth. So then, nowe adayes also when wee see the truth oppresed, so as some men mocke at vs, and othersome go aboute too byte vs, yea and too cate vs vp, bycause wee mainteyne mainteine the truth : let vs fight against such temptations, for that is the enforcement whiche ought to sette vs forward. Sometymes we will be ashamed to mainteyne a good quarell, because wee see that men do but make a mocke at it, and that the scoffers which scorne God, will also be so malapert as to bleare out their tongs at vs, and to laugh all our allegations to scorne. But Gods truth muste not bee despisable vnto vs, though the worlde reject it. Then let not these temptations withholde vs from fighting valiantly agaynst them : but if we see our selues redie to be hated, and that men practise mischeefs against vs, for mainteyning good quarelles : let vs not give them ouer for all that. True it is, that that were ynough to drawe vs backe, and to stoppe our mouth: nevertheless it behoueth vs to fight agaynst such temptations after the example of Eliu. Ye see then how Gods seruantes ought to be fully resolute, not to swarue from confessing the truth when neede requireth : And finally, Eliu sayth, that there shall bee no accepting of persons with him, and that he will not vsse any flaterie, because that if he should soothe men, bee cannot tell whether his maker wuld destroy him. Eliu meeneth to say in effect, that he will not be briedeled by the authoritie of man, that he should not speake freely when it commeth to the mainteyning of God's truth. But this cannot be layde forth at length as nowe, and therefore it is ynough for vs to haue Elius meening. Surely it is not an euill thing, nor vtterly to bee condemned, to call a man by an honourable tytle: Howebeit, forasmuche as the same doeth oftentimes hinder vs, and abashe vs before hande, so as we haue not 30 such libertie as were requisite, to do our dutie in speaking plainerly and flatly when wee ought to do it: therefore doth Eliu say, that bee will not giue tytles to men, that is to say, that hee will not exalt men su highe, but that the truth shall bee aboue them. So then, let vs beare in minde, that although it bee lawfull for vs too yelde honour vnto men, yea and that wee ought to do it, insomuch that we must honour not onely our superiours or equalles, but also our inferiours, according as the scripture commaundeth vs : yet notwithstanding, 40 whether it bee towarde our equalles, our towarde our inferiours, or toward such as surmount vs in degree: alwayes the truth must be preferred before men.

And althoughe wee yelde euerie man the honour that belongeth to him, and which he deserueth : yet let vs not cease to speake awy whole withoute accepting of persones, according as wee knowe, that when wee speake in Gods name, hee will haue vs too do it without feigning. Then if wee intende to honoure God as is meete, and as hee deserueth, it behoueth vs to vtter our wordes freely when we speake to men: and (as I sayde,) that vwill bee no impeachment of yeelding euerie man his due honour. For yet for all that, wee must not haue our mouthes sherte, but euerie of vs must followe his owne calling, and when it commeth too our turne too speake, wee must speake truth. Ye see then what wee haue to beare away in this last saying of Elius, too the ende that suche as beare office in the common weale, shoulde speake freely as they ought too doo, and that euerie of vs, (althoughe all haue not the office of teaching and pronouncing sentence publikely) shoulde nevertheless confesse the truth freely when it is required at our handes, assuring our selues that God accepteth it as a sacrifice of honour done vntoo him: And that wee doo so, it is not onely a keeping of the rule that is giuen vs, but also an honouring and exalting him aboue all creatures.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs feele them better than wee haue done: and that for the brin ging thereof to passe, wee may not presume aught of our selues, knowing well that wee cannot open our mouth except hee guide and governe vs by his holy spirite, and therefore that it may please him too instruct vs in such wise, as we may haue our mouth open too speake when neede requireth, and that we may not followe our owne affections and lustes in speaking, but that all our life may be agreeable therenvntoo, and be bestowed in suche obedience towarde our God, as wee may seeke nothing but to frame it wholy to his holy will: and that although wee bee subiect too muche wretchednesse and corruption in passing through this worlde: yet wee may not fayle too labour still for the full perfection, whervnto God will call vs, when we shall haue glorified him in this worlde. That it may please him too graunte this grace, not onely to vs, but also, &c.

The Cxxij. Sermon, which is the first vpon the xxxij. Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the three last verses of the former Chapter, and they vpon the text that followeth.

- Therefore Job heare thou my talke, and hearken vnto all my vvordes.
2. Beholde I haue opened my mouth, my tongue shall speake in my palat.
  3. My vvordes are the rightnelle of my heart, and my lippes shall vtter pure doctrine.
  4. The spirit of God hath created me, and the breath of the Almighty hath giuen me life.
  5. If thou canst, ansyvere mee, and prepare thy selfe agaynst mee, and debate thy case stoutly.
  6. Beholde I am to Godvatde as thou [or according to thine ovnē mouth] I am also formed of the clay.
  7. There is no feare of me to trouble thee, and although I presse thee, yet shall it bee no heauie burthen to thee.

Hauc begun alreadie too lay foorth the protestation that Eliu made of speaking rightly without regarde of men: and (as it hath beene declared) the man that will speak rightly and godlily, must haue his eyes sherte that he accept no persons. For if we be led either with hatred, or with fauor, there wil be nothing wel ruled in vs, there wil be nothing but troublie. Specially when it standeth vpon teaching in Gods name, it behoueth vs to be well aduised to turne away from a fleshly affectiō And Eliu said purposely, that God might roote him out, if he shoulde haue respect of mens greatness. Now it might seeme hard at the first sight, that God shoulde shoulde destroy one for no more but magnifying some mannes greatnessse. Howebeit lette vs marke first of all, that when God graunteth vs the grace too speake in his name : it behoueth vs too yelde all the authoritie too his worde , and too aduaunce the estimation thereof. But if wee bee so turned aside by looking vnto creatures, that wee speake not freely as wee ought to doo : Is it not a dishonouring of God? If a man be sent from an earthly prince , and luffer other men too scorne him, and he playeth the goose and dare not preferre the message that is committed vnto him : it is such a lozelrie as is not to bee pardoned. Beholde , God receyueth vs to his seruice, euen vs that are but dust before him, euen vs that are altogether vnprofitable : he putteth vs in honourable commission to beare abroade his worde, and he will haue it to bee borne at roade with authoritie and reuerence. Nowe, there is a man that doth so dismay vs, as we disguise Gods truth, to turne it into a lie, or else brue it in such wise, as it shal be put quite out of his owne nature: I pray you is not that as great a reproche as can be done vnto God? So then if Gods word be not caried abroade so soundly and freely as men may honor it: it is no maruell though punishment be prepared as Eliphas speaketh here. Thus haue we a double lesson to gather of this text. The one is for such as preach Gods word, and are in office to teach as shepherdes. These must settle theselues too suche constancie, as they swarue not howsoeuer the worlde go, according as it is sayde in Iere my, that he must take to him a forehead of brasse too fight withall, because the world will never be without great stubbornnesse, and such as are exalted to any dignitie of honorable state, can not yeld themselues in subiection and obedience vnto god, but do always set vp their tristles against him. Now seeing that they doo so forget themselues, as they cannot stoupe too him that hath created and fashioned them : It behoueth vs to haue an invincible constancie, & to make our reckning that we shall haue entitie and displeasure when wee doo our dutie : but yet neverthelesse let vs go throughout it without swaruing aside. Lo what we haue to marke on oure side, we (say) which are ordeyned as pastors to preach the worde of God. Notwithstanding it behoueth all people too receyue a generall instruction. Therefore when wee come to heare a sermon, let vs not carie such a loftie stomacke with vs, as to checke agaynst God when we be reprooved for our sinnes: let vs not carie such bitternes, as to be angry when our galled backs be rubbed : neither let vs bee so foolishe and ouerwise, as to thinke that God ought to hold his peace for vs: neither let vs seeke to be borne withal vnder the colour that there is some good qualitie in vs. Though we were kings and princes, yet behoueth it vs to low downe our neckes to receyue Gods yoke : for all lostinesse must be pulled downe, as S. Paule sayth in the second to the Corinthiās. For the cause why the gospell is preached, is to the ende that both great and small should submit themselues vnto God, & suffer themselues to be gouerned by him: which thing cant be done, except we cast downe our lostinesse (as S. Paule sayth in that place) which exalteth it selfe against the maiestie of our lord Iesus Christ. And we must not tarie til we be inforced and compelled to obey God: but every man must do it of his owne good wil. Then let such as are in any estate vnderstād, that thogh they were more than kings, yet ought they to humble themselues at the preaching of Gods truth. And why? For they must thinke thus of themselues. From what Lorde or mayster is he sent that preacheth? Euen from him that is souereyne Lorde of all mankinde, and vnto whom all men owe subiection. Then if we bee of meane degree :

I pray you, is it not an ouerfranke follie, too desire that men shoulde beare with vs, and winke at oure faultes, and cloake them, yea and that the worde of God should bee falsified for our sakes? Can God transforme himselfe? No: But hee will haue his woerde too bee his liuely Image.

Nowe then if we seeke to be flattered, it is as much as if wee woulde desire that God shoulde chaunge his nature, and renounce himselfe, to the intent too please vs. And is not that too diuelishe a rashnesse? Then let vs learne to come too the hearing of Gods worde with all humilitie and mildenesse : assuring our selues that oure obedience muste bee tried in this behalfe , and that none must be spared, but all mens faults shewed with rightfull libertie, as is conuenient. Now let vs come to that which Eliu addeth. Job (sayth hee) beare tbou me. Truely I speake with my tongue, and I vtter my woordes from my palat. But yet notwithstanding my sayings are the righ tnesse of my hart, and thou shalt not beare any thing but trutb and vprightnesse at my mouth. See heere what a protestation Eliu maketh, to the intent to be heard: that is to wit, that he will not speake feynedly , and as a double minded man , but will set downe things purely, according as he knew them to be, and as they had bin reuealed vnto him. Marke that for the first poynt. Secondly he addeth , Bebolde I am in respect of God as thou art, or according to thy mouth. The worde that he vteth signifieth properly a mouth : howbeit, sometymes it is taken for Measure. Nowe wee haue seene heeretoo fore, howe Job desired God to come to him, without bringing any such terrorre as he felt. If God were my match (sayth Job) I coulde answere him: and although he haue all authoritie ouer me, yet coulde I mainteyne my case. Lo after what maner Job speaketh. And so this sentence might be expounded thus : Bebolde I am according to thine owne mouth: that is too say, according as thou hast desyred : or else thus : Bebolde I am according to thy measure: that is to say, I am like vnto thee, in respect of God. Neuerthelesse, the meening will abide always one : And therefore wee neede not too stande much vpon the worde. Let vs consider still wherevntoo Eliu intendeth too come : that is to witte, that hee is not God that he might make Job afryde, but that he is created of clay as Job is: that is to say, that he is a mortall and transitorie creature which hath no strength in himselfe. For (sayth hee) it is the spirite of God that bath fashioned me: and the breath of the Almichtie bath giuen mee life. Too bee short, we see howe Eliu telleth Job heere , that hee will speake agaynst him with such reason, as hee shall bee ouercome. Thou shalt no more alledge (sayth he) that God maketh thee afryd, that his glory is terrible to thee, and that thou canst haue no right at his hande : Thou shalt not bee able to say so. For who am I? Beholde , I am a wretched lumpe of earth and myre . True it is that I haue breath and life, howbeit I haue them of God: but yet am I as full of frayletie as thou . So then there shall nothing ouersway betweene vs two, but reason: and thou must be faine to be confounded. VVe see in effect the two poynts that are conteyned heere. The first is, that Eliu declareth that his wordes are the righ tnesse of his hart: and that he will not speake any thing whiche he hath not thought and conceyued in himselfe.

This is well worthie to be noted : For therupon we may gather , after what sort hee ought too bee disposed which beareth about the worde of God: namely that he must not haue store of bubbleable at his tongues ende, nor cast forth wordes at all aduenture, no nor yet play an enterlude : but according as God hath taught him , so must hee deale forth that thing which is printed in his heart, hart, vnto those other whom God hath giue him charge, So then, will we serue God purely in our office? It behoueth vs first and formeſt to bryde our tonges, that they ſpeakē not any thing, but that which is printed in our heartes. And ſurely we heare how it is ſayde by Dauid, and likewiſe alledged by S. Paule, (who applyeth it to all the miſters of Gods worde) I haue beleueed, and therefore will I ſpeakē. True it is, that this thing is common to all Christians, and to all the children of God: but it ought cheefely to be obſerued of thoſe whome God hath ordeneſt to bee as iſtrumentſ of his holiſtite. VVhenoeuer we ſpeakē: then is it Gods will too bee heard in our persons. Seeing then that hee hath done vs ſo great honour: at leaſtwiſe hiſ doctrine ought too bee printed in vs, and too take roote there, and afterwarde our mouth ſhoule beare wiſneſſe that wee knowe it. Too bee ſhort, it behoueth vs to haue beeſe taught by God, before wee can be good maſters or teachers. And ſpecially when wee preache, let it not be onely to teache others: but let vs comprehend oure ſelues in the ſame number and compagnie. Beholde I ſay what we haue too marke. And vndoubtedly when a man ſpeaketh Gods worde without feeling the operatiō of it in hiſelfe: what doth he elſe, but play a part in an enterlude? And what a trecherie is that? VVhat a defiling is it of Gods worde. So then let vs bethink vs throughly: and as oft as we go vp into the Pulpit, let vs remember well the leſon that is giuen vs heere: namely, that the riightneſſe of oure heart muſt ſhewe it ſelue in our tongue. And therewithall also when wee ſee that a doctrine is good, and that the man which ſpeaketh, laboureth too edifie vs: let vs knowe that we bee vnthankfull, and vterly rebellious agaynst God, if we heare not hiſ matter with all humiliatiō. Nowe when Eliu maketh this preface, hee ſpeaketh not after the maner of men, as in the way of curteſie: but he ſheweth after what ſort God intendeth to holde vs to hiſelfe. By what meanes is that? B: holde mee (ſayeth hee) beare mee: for there is nothing but riight in my talke. It is al lone as if hee did ſet it downe for a rule in Gods name, that iſ a doctrine that is preached bee good and holy, and we conuincid that it is ſo: then if wee yeede not with all reuerence too frame oure ſelues therafter, wee ſhall not be guiltie of reſiſting a man, but it is all one as if we ſpited the iuing God.

So then let euerie of vs bee atteſtive when Gods woordē is preached: and ſeeing hee is ſo gratiouſ vnto vs, as to rayſe vp men too declare hiſ will familiarily vntoo vs: let vs not bee as wilde folke, but let vs yeede oure ſelues teachable in the things that wee knowe too to proceede from him. And forasmuch as the lawe, the Propheteſ, and the Gospell, haue beeſe conueyed vntoo vs, by ſuch maner of men, whose vprightneſſe is well y-nough knowne and witneſſed: let vs marke that whosoeuer ſubmitteth not hiſelfe to that doctrine, needeth no other proceſ to hiſ damnation. To be ſhort, let vs marke, that our Lorde hath authoriſed hiſ Propheteſ and Apoſtleſ, to the ende that the doctrine which they haue giuen vs ſhould not be doubted of, but be taken as an vnrēpeaſable decree. Marke that then for one poyn̄. But herewithall we be warned, that the faythfull muſt not become ſo ſheepiſh as to receyue whatſoever is tolde them, but muſt examine the doctrine whether it be of God or no. And that is the cauſe why it is ſayd, that we muſt triue the ſpirites. And this muſt bee well noted. For wee ſee that the wretched Papiſtſ ſuffer themſelues to bee ledde without any diſcretiō, and the fayth which they haue is nothing but meere ſheepiſhneſſe that men muſt ſtoppe their eyes, and haue no reaſon at all in them. But contrarywife, Gods will iſ, that wee ſhoule haue both ſkill and diſcretiō, that we be not abuſed and ſeduſed by the falſe doſtrines that men ſhall bring vs. Howe ſhall that be done? Truly we muſt not preſume to iudge of Gods truthe according too our owne wiſe and fancie. But wee muſt rather captiue all our reaſon and vnderſtāding, as the ſcripture ſheweth vs. Neuertheleſſe, wee muſt therewithall pray God to giue vs diſcretiō, to diſcern whether that the thing that is ſet before vs, be good and riight or no. And furthermore, let vs with all lowlyneſſe deſire too bee gouerned by him, and too bee vnder hiſ hande, affiuring oure ſelues that by that meanes, wee ſhall knowe whether there bee anie riight in the matter that is tolde vs or no. Also it is the thing that oure Lorde Ieſus Christ alledged, when hee will haue vs too receyue hiſ ſayings. I ſeekē nor mine owne glorie (ſayeth hee) but the glorie of him that ſent mee. Therefore it behoueth vs alwayes too ſearche too what ende the man tendeth that ſpeaketh vnto vs. For if we ſee that the marke whiche hee ſhooteth at, is that God ſhoule bee glorified, and reigne ouer all men: there muſte bee no more diſputing agaynst him, but wee muſt rest fuli there. But on the contrarie part, iſ hiſ doctrine tende too the defacing of Gods glorie, too the turning of vs from hiſ ſervice, or too the aduauncing of ambition and vanitię, ſo as it builde vs not vp too bee the true Temples of God, or iſ it grounde vs not vpon God, too re-miſſe oure ſelues wholly vntoo him, too call vpon hym pureley, and to reſt oure ſeies vpon hiſ grace and fatherly goodneſſe: Then do wee ſee that there is no riightneſſe in it.

True it is, that we ſhoule bee ſore combred in that caſe, if God had not firſt of all ſhewed vs, what maner of one this riightneſſe is: but if wee haue once the principles that hee hath gyuen vs, wee can neuer ſwarue, vniſſe it bee long of oure ſelues. Beholde, God tellethe vs, that hee will bee exalted, and haue men too ackno-wlede, that all goodneſſe commeth of him. Againe, hee will alſo haue all Lordelhippe and power ouer our life, and therein holde vs ſo in awe, as wee may be gouerned by him, and according to hiſ good will: hee will haue men too bee vterly abaced, and bereft of the truſte of theyr owne riightuousneſſe, wiſedome and ſtrength: hee will haue vs to come & draw water in our Lord Ieſus Christ, as in the fountain of all goodneſſe: hee will haue vs to call vpon him pureley, and hee will haue the ſacraments which he bath ordeneſt, to be receyued as warrantes of hiſ grace, and as meanes and helpeſ to further vs to ſerue him with ſo much the more free and earnelſt hart. These are the things wherein there can bee no gloſe, nor anie darkenesſe or diſficultie. So then let vs alwayes haue this touchſtone with vs when we come to the trying of any doſtrine. And then ſhall wee perceyue whether it be riight or wrong, true or false, pure or corrupted & mingled, or according to the true riightneſſe which God hath ſhewed vs. I ſay we neede not to bee wrapped any more in doubts in thiſ behalfe: only let vs open our eyes, and therewithal pray God to guide vs by hiſ holy ſpirit: for without hiſ ſpirit we ſhal alwaies waſer, & not be able to diſcerne ſo much as little childrē, according as S. Paule ſaith Gods ſpirit muſt be as a crefſet to giue vs light, or elſe we ſhal neuer co-prehend Gods ſecrets. They are ſpirituall, & we of our nature are fleſhly and earthly, and we alwayes beare downward. But if god inlighte vs by hiſ holy ſpirit, the do we iudge of the doctrine, & diſcerne in ſuch wife, as we cannot be deceyued by al Satans tempiations. And although he ſend vs deceyvers & rayſe vp many turnmoi-lers that labor to turne a l. thing vp. d. down: yet cannot that preuyale anye thing agaynst vs , so long as Gods spirite is our light , (as I haue sayde alreadie.) Furthermore, although God do sometymes speake by the mouthes of the wicked (according as it is sayd that the kingdome of our Lorde Iesu Christ shall bee furthered now and then by occasion , so as the hypocrites or folke that haue no feare of God , but are led with vainglorie and other vanityes shall serue for a time , and God wyll make their doctrine awayable too the saluation of his chosen , howebee it that it bee too the greater condemnation of themselues) alough he say I , that this may nowe and then come too passe : yet notwithstanding it is not the ordinarie meane . For when it pleaseth God too haue vs edifyed in him , immediately he rayseth vp men that speake heartily and zealously , yea and hee giueth such a marke to the worde that commeth out of theyr mouth , as men maye knowe the woorking of the holye Ghost , according as also Sainct Paule sayeth . And heere yee see , that such as are in office too preache Gods woerde , ought so muche the better too pradise that whiche I haue sayde : that is too wittie , too learne well themselues before they teache others , so as their heart may speake before their mouth . For the bringing here-of too passe , let them pray God so too touche them too the quicke , as they may haue the woerde well rooted in their mindes , that they may bee able both to serue their neighbours , and too perceyue that they thrust not forth themselues at aduenture , but that they are drawne by the holy ghost . Yee see then what wee haue to remember in this streyne . Now in the seconde place Eliu protesteth , that he is a transitorie and fayre man , so that hee cannot make Job of rayde : Nevertheless hee will not winne anie thing at his hande , but by reason and truthe . Before we come too the cheefe poynt , by the way we haue to marke the maner of speache that hee vseth heere : which is , that the spirite of God hath created him , and that the breath of the Almighty hath giuen him lyfe : and further , that hee is but myre and clay . Truely this is well woorthie to be noted of all men . For if wee coulde well beare in minde that which is shewed heere : vndoubtedly all pryde woulde be buried in vs . For what is the cause that men do glory so much in themselues , and are so full of ouerweening , but first for that they knowe not their owne originall beginning : and secondly , for that they haue not the skil to consider in good earnest , that looke whatsoever they haue , they hold it of God , and that it is no heritage vnto them , but that they haue their life and all the appurtenances thereof , bycause it pleaseit God to preferue them . Then if men coulde first consider from whence they come , and secondly , that whatsoever goodnessse is in them , they haud it of Gods meere grace : it is certeyne that they shoulde be rightly meekened . Therefore it is sayde , that wee are fashione of mire and clay . Nowe let vs go boast oure selues and make as great vauntes as wee list , and yet shall we not bee able too chaunge our nature . Wherefore , when a man feeleth himselfe tempted with pride , so as hee woulde exalt himselfe too muche : let him enter into himselfe , and consider from whence hee came , and oute of what thing God tooke him . If but onely our feete bee myrie , it seemeth too vs , that wee are the lesse woorth . And if the myre doo but touche vs , we thinke our selues defyled : yea if it do but hang on our shooes . And yet for all this , we be made of clay . Therefore we ought not so too forget our pedigree from whence wee come , namely that we are but earth and dust . True it is that this saying is common yngough , and euerie man confesseth it : but in the meane season no man acknowledgeth it . For such a through conceyte were yngough too purge vs of all pridy . VVhat else is the presumption and ouerwening that in is me , but only a windiness , because they bee puffed vp with ignorance , and haue forgotten theselues ? So much the more then ought we to wey well this speeche , wherein it is sayde that wee bee created of clay or myre . True it is , that there were some worthinesse and excellencie in our nature meete too bee commended , if we were throughly whole and sounde : but yet were it not lawfull for vs to bee proude of it . And seeing we are so corrupted in Adam as wee bee , it is certaine that we ought to be double ashamed . And why ? For we were created after the Image of God . And what maner of Image is it nowe ? It is a disfigured one : wee bee so defaced , that the marke which God had put into vs to bee glorified therby , is turned into his dishonour : and all the gracious gifites that were bestowed vpon vs , are become as many recordes too make vs guiltie before God , bycause wee defile them , and so long as we continue in our ewne nature , wee do but abuse the benefites that wee haue receyued , and applie them vnto euill . And so yee see alwayes that our confusyon increaseth , by all the gifites whiche God hath bestowed amongst vs . But yet let vs put the case , that we were as vncorrupted as ever our father Adam was at the first . Shoulde wee therefore presume of oure selues vnder the colour that God had so innobled vs ? Truely wee holde all things of him . VVhat is it that putteth a difference betwene vs and the brute beastes , and maketh vs more excellent ? Haue wee it through our owne purchase ? Haue we gotten it by our owne strength ? Haue it by inheritance from our forefathers ? No . But wee have it of Gods free gift throughe his owne meere goodnessse . So then what is to be done , but onely to humble ourselves ?

This is the thing which we haue to gather ingenerall vpon this streyne , where Eliu confesseth himselfe to bee made of clay , and that hee is beholden too God for his life and breath , bycause hee bestowed them vpon him of his meere goodnessse . And nowe by the waye , those whome God will haue too serue him in state of honour , ought too remember this lesson the better . For when God reacheth men his hande , and setteth them in some degree of honour , it is not too the ende they shoulde vaunte themselves , but rather acknowledge how muche they are bounde vntoo him , and bee so muche the more prouoked too honour him , sharpening and applying all their wittes and affection too worke in suche wise , as God might bee honoured by them : according as it is sayde , that a candle must not bee hid , but set vpon a table or cupborde that it may giue light over all the house . Those then to whom God hath shewed the fauour to exalt them to any hie and worthie calling , ought to be the more inflamed too enlighten their neighbours , and to giue them such example as the grace whiche they haue receyued , may not be as it were choked . This is the thing which we haue to marke here in this second place . And heerewithall let vs marke generally , that men cannot yelde God his due glorie , except they strippen themselfes stark naked . For so long as wee pretende too reserue any thing too oure selues , bee it never so little , the glorie of God shall bee so much diminished . VVhat is too bee done then ? VVhen wee haue well searched what graces or benefites wee haue : let vs make so manie items of receyts in our account , & acknowledge that we haue nothing at all of our owne . The verie way for men to kepe themselves from robbing god of his praysle , is to indeuer to know theselues , how there remaineth not one drop of goodnessse in them , but every whit of it must be be put into an inventorie, according also as they are accountable for it afore God. Furthermore when we be so brought to nothing in our selues, we susteyne no losse by it: for we shal not fayle to be apparelled againe: yea & if we be truely ioyned vnto God, & yeeld vnto him his due prayse: we shal be much richer than those that are so full of ouerweening, surmizing theselues to haue I wote not what a kind of inheritance. So then let vs not be loth to be diminished and to be so vterly stripped frō all glory: for our lord wil not suffer vs to be vnfurnished of any goodnesse: but yet notwithstanding it behoueth vs to be so abased, as I haue sayd. Besides this, when we know that we Ezech. 3. 4. 6.

Iohn. 3. d. 27 do nothing but as it is giue vs frō aboue: let vs apply al the things that God putteth into vs, to such vse as he cōmandeth. For our Lord hath not indued vs with the giftes of his holy spirit, that the same should be otherwise applied than to good vse, or that they shoulde bee vnprofitable. Therfore let vs be well aduised, that the things which we haue receiued be presented and as it were offred in sacrifice vnto God: & seeing it is his will to haue the welfare of our neighbours aduaunced, let vs aboue all things haue a regard to edifie one another. Lo what wee haue to beare in minde here. And now let vs come to the talke that Eliu holdeth here, & to the substaunce of it. He had sayd, the spirit of God bath created me, and his breath bath giuen me life. So then (addeth he) there is no terriblenesse in mee to make thee afraide, but onely reason shall beare the sway. Here Eliu sheweth what the duetic of a good teacher is: namely to looke well to himself, & to view and cōsider himself before he open his mouth. And why? for they that haue not knowne their own fraytie, will haue no cōpassiō of their neighbours: and when they fall to rebuking of suche as haue done amisse, they go to it with such rigour, as it shal be rather to make the wretched wanderers stray further, than to bring them into the way. And when it cometh to comforting, they haue no skill how to do it: or if they come to teaching, they do it with a disdayne. Therfore if we will teach Gods woord as we ought to do, let vs begin at the knowing of our owne infirmities. And when we be well acquainted with them, that wil leade vs to a modestie & meekenesse, so as wee shall be of a milde heart to vter the woord of God. True it is that forasmuch as there are many which are full of prude & stubbornesse: the woord of God had neede to be vnto them as a hāmer to brouse and breake their hardnesse: but yet notwithstanding we ought first and formost to teach those that yeeld theselues teachable. And how may we do that when we know not what neede we haue to beare with them? But beare with them we cannot, except we feele how frayle we our selues are. For he that knoweth not his owne wantes, hath no compassion to partake other mens sorrowes, and to comfort them. So then will we teach the ignorant faythfully: we must understand that there is nothing but ignorance in our selues: & that it had bene worse with vs than with all other men, if God had not giuen vs the things which wee haue receyued of him. Againe, will wee comfort the wretched and afflicted? Let vs first vnderstand what it is to be afflicted, let vs haue passed that way our selues, and let vs be touched with griefe and heauiness, that we may comfort our selues with others that are in sorow, & haue skill to beare with them. Furthermore if we will rebuke such as haue done amisse, let vs not do it with ouer great rigour, but rather let vs pitie their destruction. True it is that sometimes vehemency muste needes be ioyned with it: for when we see their wretched soules perish, it is no time to cocker them: if men be wilfull in their stubbornesse, we must not only strike them, but also wōude them to the quicke. Yea, but yet therewithall it behoueth vs to haue this poynt afore had, namely that we haue bene acquainted with our own infirmities, & that it grieue vs to deale rigorously: like as although a father beate his children, & vse much more rougher wordes to them than he would do to strangers: yet notwithstanding his hart bledeth, when he is fayne to transforme himselfe after that sort. Then let vs marke, that a man shal never be meete to be a teacher, except he haue put on a fatherly affectiō, & first of all knowe his owne infirmitie, to the end he may frame himself to such a pitifullnesse, as he may haue cōpassiō of all such as he hath to deale withall. This is the thing which is shewed vs here by Eliu. Furthermore let all such as are placed in authoritie, cōsider well that they must not abuse their power vnto tyrannie, to oppresse those that are vnder the. For they shall haue a double account to make before God, if vnder the colour of their authoritie, they will haue men to feare them and stande in awe of them, and not seeke cheefely the honour of God & the welfare of those that are cōmitted vnto them. And see here how Ezechiel speaketh of euill shepherds which haue misin-treated Gods people through tyrannie. He sayeth that they reigned ouer them with all rigor and lordinesse. Yea but contrarywise it is shewed vs here, that all such as will quite theselues faythfully towards God and their neighbours when they be set in hie degree, must not therefore aduaunce themselues, but rather know that if they intend to carry terrour with them to put poore folke in a feare: God must be fayne to shew them that his minde was not to set wilde beastes here to scare his flocke, nor Goates to pushe at them with their hornes, and to trouble their water, as he speaketh in the sayd text of Ezechiel. God then will shew, that those to whom he hath giuen the swoorde and seate of justice, and those whom he hath put into the pulpit to teach his woord: are not set there to be Goates to tredaine and oppresse the silly Sheepe. Lo what we haue to marke in this text. And herewithall Eliu sheweth, after what maner we ought to receyue doctrine: that is to wit, that if we know it to be true and right, we must out of hand passe with it without gaynesaying, although wee be not forced nor constrainyd vnto it. Yee see then what we haue to beare in minde concerning the circumstance of the place & the matter: that isto wit, that when a good doctrine is propounded vnto vs: very well, he is but a mortall man that speaketh it, but do wee see that he hath reason and truth. Then let vs assure our selues, that in replying agaynst him, we fight not onely against God, but also agaynst our own conscience, which is a sufficient iudge to condemne vs. And herewithall we haue a very profitable warning to gather: which is that whensoeuer we come to be taught in the name of God, if we see that the doctrine which is offered vs is right, there must be no more replying: for wee shall winne nothing by it: but if there be reason, it behoueth vs to submit our selues to it. Furthermore this ought not to hinder vs from setting Gods maiestie before our eyes. For wee must not judge of the doctrine that is set forth vnto vs, according to our owne wit and fancie. Therefore two things had neede to be matched here together. The one is, that wee fully determine to be ready to obey God, cōcluding in our selues that our maker ought to haue all soueraintie ouer vs, and that we ought to be subiect vnto him. This is the preparatiue that must be made aforhand. And afterward we must enter into iudgement, that is too say, wee muste examine the doctrine, howbeit not with prude, nor with an opinion that wee be wyse ynough of our selues, but with praying vnto God to gouerne vs with his holy sp̄rite, that we may follow the doctrine which he shall haue shewed vs. Thus ye see the two things that ought to be matched together. And this matching or mingling bringeth no confusion. For he that is prepared to obey God, will not leue for all that, to open his eyes, and to consider how he ought to discerne vntruth from truth. Howbeit herewithall lette vs learne, not to be so frowarde as to haue no regard of the man that speaketh: but let vs consider that God sheweth vs great fauour, in that it pleasest him to vse his creatures, and to abace himselfe after that sorte vnto vs, to the ende wee shoule haue the more leysure to consider his woerde. For if he should come vnto vs in his owne Maiestie, we shoule be vndone. But when he offereth himselfe to vs by men, he applieth himselfe to our infirmitie, to the intent we might the more commodi-ously know his truth which he setteth before vs. Yee see then in effect what wee haue to remember in this streyne, and the rest shall be reserved till another time.

Now lette vs fall downe before the face of our good

God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so too feele our wretchednesse, as wee may be taught, not to challenge any thing at all to our selues, nor to be abused any more with vayne follies, but to acknowledge that we be altogether miserable, and therewithal to desire to be succoured of him through his mercie, and be thankefull for the benefites which he hath already bestowed vpon vs, to the ende that by his gracious goodnesse in continuynge them towards vs, wee may learne to apply them to the glorifying of his holy name, and to dedicate them vnto his seruice, beseeching him further to beare with our weakenesse, vntill he haue vtterly ridde vs of it, and transformed vs into his owne glory. And so let vs al say: Almighty God our heauenly father we acknowledge and confesse according to the truth, that we be not worthie to lift vp our eyes to Heauen, to present our selues before thee, nor &c.

The.cxxij Sermon, which is the second vpon the.xxiij Chapter.

8. Doubtlesse thou hast spoken to mine eares, and I haue heard this voyce of thy saying.
9. I am pur: and vwithout sinne. I am cleane and there is no vnguentlesse in mee.
10. He hath found occasion agaynst mee, and taken mee for his enimie.
11. He hath put my feete in the stockes, and taken heede to all my vvayes.
12. In this thou shalt not be iustified, I vwill answe thee that God is greater than thou.
13. VVhy striuest thou agaynst him? for he vwill not answe to all vvoordes.
14. God speakest once and tyyce, and men heare it not.

E must cal to minde what was trea- 30 ted of yesterday: that is to wit, that God doth vs a great pleasure, when hee vouchsafeth to apply himselfe so far to our infirmitie, as to speake familiarly vnto vs by the mouth of a mortall man which is lyke vnto our selues. For it is to the ende that beyng not put in feare by his maestie, we shoule haue the better leysure to thinke vpon the things that he sheweth vs, so as we may haue a quiet and vntroubled minde, to conceyue well the 40 doctrine that wee heare, and to make our profite of it. True it is that if God speake to vs from heauen, it would moue vs the more, and consequently the doctrine should be of the more authoritie: howbeit in the meane season wee would be as it were agast, and so shoule we not be masters of our wittes to consider what he sayeth. But when a man speakest, wee may the better at our owne ease, both taste and digest the things that are spoken.

Yee see then in what wise God beareth with vs. Surely wee see that when the lawe was to be published, the peo- Exod. 20.6.19. ple of Israell sayde, lette not the Lorde speake vnto vs, for wee be vndone if wee muste heare him. And why? for since the tyme that God had begonne to shewe his Maiestie, there was such a feare stryken into their hearts, as the poore soules wiste not where too become: insomuch that they concluded, that if God shoule haue spoken to them stel, they shoule haue bene destroyed Vhen Exod. 34.6.33. Moyses came abroade, he was fayne continually to hang a veyle before his face, because God had giuen him a marke of his glory, and the lewes were not able to abide it. So then wee see that when God rayseth vp menne to teache vs by, therein he hath a respect vnto our feeble-nesse, and vttereth not his power vnto vs, too the intent wee should not be to much dismayed, but that wee might have our wittes at liberty to be edified by his doctrine, so as the same might be familiar too vs, and wee haue the more leysure to thinke vpon it, and to applie our study to it. And hereby we be warned, that we must not despise

Gods woerde when it is preached vnto vs by men: for it were to villanous an vnguentlesse in vs, if God shoule abace and humble himselfe from his owne great-nesse to the intent to apply himselfe to our vnabletie, & wee take occasion therat too make no account of the things that he sayeth vnto vs. And therefore although this treasure of Gods woerde be sette before vs in earthen vessels, that is to say by mortall men which are full of all infirmities: yet muste wee alwayes esteeme it as it deserueth, knowing that the men speake not in their owne name, but are sent vnto vs of God, who will be heard by their mouth. Nowe lette vs come to the vpbraydings which Eliu offereth here vnto Job. Doubtlesse thou hast sayd in my hearing, and I haue heard the voyce of thy wordes: That thou art righteous and without sinne, and that thou arte not guilty of any iniquitie. Therefore herein thou canst not iustifie thy selfe, that is to say, thou canst not mayntayne thy quarrell that thou haste not done amisse. And that it is so: how wilt thou answe God, seeing he is greater than thou? Thou accusest him that he hath sought occasion to punishe thee, and that he hath set thy feete in the stockes, so as thou hast no libertie to maynteyn thy case. But thinke not thou to escape by that. For thou muste be condemned, and God muste make thee feele that he doth iustly punish thee after this sorte. Here wee have to examine, first of al, whether Eliu do charge Job wrongfully or rightfully with intent to iustifie himselfe: for it seemeth at the first sight, that he hath mistaken Iobs talke, and that hee turneth it flaunderously too another mee-ning. And for prooef hereof, Job never went about to 60 challenge such perfection, as to haue no sinne in him: we haue seene the contrary. Therfore it should seeme, that Eliu doth falsifie the woordes that he had heard, & apply them to a contrary meaning. Howbeit forasmuch as God blameth him not (as we shal see:) and that we haue already herd how he protested that he would not assaile Job after the maner that the other had done: let vs marke that here he taketh Iobs wordes as Job himself ment them: that is to wit, that Job had an eye to his present affliction, as if he

he should say, true it is that I am a poore sinner, I cannot deny but I haue committed many offences before God, but in this I finde my selfe righteous, and God vseth his absolute power agaynst mee, in that I see not the reason why he tormenteth mee after this sort : for my affliction is ouergrieuous. Although then that Job ment not to iustifie himselfe generally : yet notwithstanding he ment to iustifie himselfe in the case of his affliction. And it seemeth that Eliu doth him wrong still in this behalfe also. For I haue tolde you already, that in very deede, God met not to punish Job for his sinnes, although he might haue done it iustly : but thought it ynoch to trie his pacience. And had not Job reason, seing he knew that ? For he framed himselfe to the ordinaunce and will of God. But the answere is, that in receyuing the afflictions which God sendeth vs as trialles of our obedience, after wee haue perceyued that God punisheth vs, not in respect of our offences, or for that he is angry with vs, but rather for that hee intendeth too humble vs, and to know whether wee will bee subiect vnto him in all poynts : and also too mortifie our lustes : when wee are in this forwardenesse, wee muste immediatly haue an other consideration : which is, that yet neuerthelesse God can well finde good cause to punishe vs if it please him. Although then that God spare vs, and will not vse his rigour towardes vs in respect of our sinnes : yet notwithstanding he may do it and there is iust cause to do it. VVhy then doth he it not ? Because of his goodnessse : and yet in the meane whyle hee afflieteth vs for some other respect. Marke that for one poynt. And the second is, that if God shewe vs not, why he afflieteth vs, it behoueth vs to cast downe our heades, vntill he come neerer to vs, and make vs perceyue why he dealeth so with vs. Therefore wee ought to tarry his leyture, and not to give brydle to our affections. Job sayled in these two poynts. For although he acknowledged himselfe to be a sinner : yet notwithstanding he gaue not God the glory which was due vnto him. The reason whereof was, that he had not sufficiently minded this poynt, that God (if he had listed) might haue punished him much more rigorously, yea euen for his sinnes. And againe wee haue seene, how he raunged abroade and chased in himselfe, saying : what meeneth God ? I am here a wretched creature, and is it meete that God shoulde stretch out his arme agaynst mee ? And is there any reason in this dealing ? It leemeth then that he ment to accuse God of some tyrannie : not that he concluded so in himselfe, but that he was tempted so to do. That is the thing wherein Job sayled. And therefore it is not without cause, that Eliu sayeth vnto him : how now ? Thou hast ment to iustifie thy selfe as if thou were pure and cleare without sinne : And therein thou shalt never be acquit, nor get the better end of the staffe. So then, to the intent we may profit by this doctrine, let vs beare in minde that if God punishe vs for our sinnes, it behoueth vs first of all to yelde our selues guiltie. And there is nothing more expedient than that. For if wee intend to be iustified afore God : what els haue we to do, but to looke vnto our owne lyfe, and to know that wee are well worthie to be beaten with Gods scourges, seing we haue offended him so many wayes ? Notwithstanding, if God haue some other respecte in afflictint vs, and yet handle vs more roughly, than such as are altogether vntruly and make an vtter skorne of Gods maiestie: let vs marke that his doing of it, is not because of oursinnes. VVhy then ? He intendeth to trie vs and to make vs knowe whether we be wholly his or no. For so long as things go as wee would haue them, what know wee whether wee be forwarde to serue God or no ? But when we must be fayne to renounce our owne will, to subdue all our owne naturall wit and vnderstanding, and (to be short) to fight a - gaynt our own affections : that is a true triall of our serving of God. Therefore when the case shall stande so, let vs thinke in our selues : truely my God may iustly ouerwhelme me a hundred thousand times. For although 10 he haue graunted mee the grace to walke in his feare and to indeuer myselfe to serue him : yet were that nothing at all, I could not stande one minute of an houre, vnlesse he vphildest mee by his infinite goodnessse. Surely he will vpholde mee : Howbeit therewithall he maketh me subiect vnder his hand, and sheweth me that I ought to hang wholly vpon him. Go to, he doth it for a good cause, and therefore it behoueth vs to be quiet, so that after wee haue inquired, why God vexeth vs so sore, and why he persecuteth vs so extreemely, and we perceyue no cause why : It behoueth vs to conclude, O my God, thy determinations are incomprehensible, and forasmuch as I am not able as now to know any more by reason of the rude-nesse and infirmitie of my vnderstanding : I will wayte 20 patiently till thou make mee to perceyue the cause why.

So Lord, when I shall haue taried in this sorte like a poore blind soule, thou wilt open mine eyes, and make me perceyue whereunto these things tende, and what shall be the ende of them, and I shall profite better by them, than I do now.

Yee see then that the wisedome which ought to be in the fauytfull, is to haue such mildenesse as to confess alwayes that God is righteous, although they perceyue not the reason of his workes. And herewithall also, they must 30 with all humility acknowledge themselues wretched sinners, and that God might finde cause ynoch to make cleane riddance of them, if he listeth not to beare with them of his owne mere grace. Thus ye see in effect what we haue to gather of this text. Now lette vs come to that which he addeth. God (sayeth he) bath taken occasion (or picked a quarrell) against mee, and therupon bath set my feete in the stockes, and tormented mee and looked vnto all my pathei: he sprieth mee out, and hath his eyeso vpon mee; 40 as I cannot stirre a finger, but by and by I haue committed a faulfe. Truic it is that Job intendeth not to accuse God of vnrighteousesse, or of punishing him without cause.
Howbeit herewithall lette vs marke well, that he was so caried away with his affections, as there scaped many dis-ordered woordes by fits, which are not to be excused. And I haue noted all this heretofore as oportunitie requyred, and as they came in place. For I haue shewed you, that Job skirmished too much agaynst God, and yet was still patient, resting in full purposē to glorifie him, notwithstanding 50 that he was troubled at times, and was brought so lowe as he wiste not how to recouer. And this is well woorthy to be noted, as whereof we may gather a good lesson : which is, that although we be not so caried away, as to purpose too blasphemē God : yet notwithstanding assone as wee haue neuer so little libertie, immediatly we ouershoote our selues, and there is no ho with vs. It is a pity to see what man is : for he is so fraught with euill, that assone as he hath a litle libertie giue him, by and by he raungeth out on the one side or on the other, and will not hold the right way, but gaddeth astray, yea euen or e-uer he thinketh it. It is certayne that if Job had bene asked whether God sought occasion against him to handle him so cruelly : he would haue answered, no, he is righteous : yea and he woulde haue sayd it without hypocrisie. Yet notwithstanding he is charged here, (& not without cause) 60 to haue strayed agaynst God, as if he had sought vayne shifftes. How cometh that to passe ? and why ? Because Job was tossed too and fro in his sorowe, and nowe and then had not so good stay of himself as he ought to haue had.
So then let vs marke, that although a man be well giou-Pp ij.

ded in the feare of God, and had leuer to die than to vtter a blasphemie : yet notwithstanding, we cannot giue our passions the bridle, but by and by there will scape vs some euill woordes that are to be condemned : and specially if we be pinched with aduersitie, the passion of sorow is so vehement, as it cannot be ruled : for then a man skirmisheth in such wise, as he iustleth against God, and that is to his owne destruction in the end. Sith we see this : first of all let vs consider, that our nature is to sinfull and frowarde. And so ye see one poynt which we haue to marke, which is, that it followeth of necessitie that we are corrupted, seeing we cannot thinke vpon God without doing him wrōg and iniurie. And furthermore also we are admonished to enter into an other consideration : which is, to holde our selues in subiectiō whensoeuer God scourgeth vs, and to say, alas I perceyue thou art disposed to afflict me : do thy will. VVhen God hath graūted vs the grace to be at that poynt : let vs assure our selues, that we haue well profited, inasmuch as we are ready to obey him and to receyue the stripes of his roddes paciently. Howbeit when God hath brought vs to so much reason : we must not theē slip aside, but rather say, Go to, thou art already boūd vnto thy god, in that he hath made thee willing to receyue the chasteinemēts that he sendeth thee : Neuerthelater, there are stil so many infirmities in thee, that in the turning of a hād thou shouldest by & by become impaciēt & rebell against him, and blasphemē him also without thinking of it. So theē let vs learne so to mistrust our selues, as we may stand vpon our gard to preuent these temptations. That done : let vs know further, that notwithstanding the good wil which we haue had to yeeld our selues vnto God & to beare the afflictiōs paciētly which come of him : yet is not our paciēce perfect & faultlesse. For what a nūber of euill imaginaciōs will run in our head ? And although we sticke not to theē, but rather do mislike them, & alwayes settle our selues to say, behold, my God shall gourne mee, he shall haue the rule of me, and it behoueth mee to haue the meekenesse to hūble my self vnder him, euen though he would trāple me vnder his feete : yea, and although he would thrust we downe into the depth of the bottolēsse pit, yet ought I to yeeld myself vnto him. VVhen we be come to this point, yet will there be many euill thoughts in our mindes. And againe if we speake, there will alwayes somewhat slip frō vs, & we shall never haue our wordes so well restrayned, but that there will still be somewhat of our fleshlinesse, & of our own naturall imaginatiō lapped about it. Therfore let vs learne to condemne our selues, although wee haue bene pacient. And seing thēt Job is reproued so greuously by Eliu in this sentence : let vs be sure we shall be found much more blameworthy : specially if we haue not indeuored to obey our god, nor yeelded him the honor which belongeth vnto him. Lo what wee haue to marke in this streyne. And by the way, if Job be condēned here to haue blasphemed God, what shal become of vs, when we be so caried, as there is no more pacience in vs, as it is most comonly seene ? Then how can we beare this condēnatiō, if we haue charged God, as though he sought vaine & fond clokings to execute his rigour against vs. But it is certaine that if men confess not freely and willingly, that God is righteous in al his punishmēts, nor do fully cōclude & rest vpon it : it is all one as if they should say : yea verely, behold, God is a tirant. They will not vtter such wordes, for it were horrible : but yet so is their meening : for there is no meane. If wee glorifie not God in his righteousnesse, acknowledging all his doings to be grōuded vpon reason, equitie, & right : it is as much as if we charged him with executing of tirānie vpō vs. I graunt that the blasphemies shall not be alwayes alike, neither shall there always be a consent. Job overshot himselfe so far as to say, there is no reason why god should afflict me : howbeit forsoomuch as the headinesse of his passiōs caried him away, as we haue seene heretofore : therfore the holy Ghost is fayne to cōdemne him in this text. VVherfore let vs be sure, that our dānation shall be the greater, if we be not quiet in our afflictions, but fall to grudging, & that although our mouth speake not a woord, yet we be so ful of hartburning within, that we play the Mule which chaweth vpō his bit. Now then, whē we haue such bitternesse in vs against God: it is asmuch as if wee accused him of picking couert quarrels to vs, to punish vs without cause. As touching that it sayd here, God bath set my feete in the stockes : Eliu rehearseth Iobs woordes as Job had ment them. For God gaue him no libertie : as when men hold an offender in the stockes it is a kind of punishment to make him cōfesse that which he would not, whether he will or no. Job then had vsed the sayd cōparison, saying : that God gaue him no means to maynteyne his quarrell, although it were good. Neuerthelesse it is true, that Job of al the while was sure in himself, that God knew well some reason why to afflict him: but yet for all that, he ceasest not to wonder & to chafe at his affliction as though God pressed him to sore. If a mā had asked him whether he had mēt so, he would haue answered no : he would haue vnsayd it out of hand : neuerthelesse his passions were so vehement and prouoked him so sore, that this saying scaped from him, ere he was ware. Now if Job were rebuked for a woord that had scaped him vpon the suddaine and vnwares : what shal befall vs when we be wilfull and hardharted, and not only haue spoken some woord vnaudisedly, but also purposed long afore, so as we be wilfully stubbornē ? Truely God warneth vs therof, and sheweth vs that we haue done amisse: and therefore if we will not receyue the warnings that he giueth vs, but follow still our owne wit and naturall concyeyts : I pray you shal not this stubbornesse condemne vs a hūdred fold more, than this ouersight which was in Job. And it is worthy to be marked well, that whensoeuer we thinke of Gods mightie power, we must not take it to be a tirannicall power, to say, Beholde God may do with vs what he listeth, we are his Creatures : he seeth that there is nothing but frayltie in vs, and yet notwithstanding he ceaseth not to vexe vs without cause. VVhen we speake after that fashiō, it is not only outrage, but also cursed blasphemie. And therfore let vs match Gods mighty power with rightfulness, saying : true it is, that the power of my God is terrible vnto me, & I am wholly dismayde at it: but yet doth not my God ceasse to be righteous: he doth al things rightfully. Thus then the thing which we haue to gather vpon this sentence, is that when we be astonished & feele as horrible torments as may be possible : yet must we not therfore say that god is excessive in afflictng vs, nor that he will shewe what he is able to do : let vs keepe vs from saying so : for what a thing were that ? let vs consider that euen in the greatest extremities that wee can feele, God maynteyneth vs, and so alayeth his power, as wee are not consumed at the first blow. And therewithal let vs know, that although the afflictions be sore to vs warde, and as heauy as may be, yet notwithstanding God ceaseth not to be righteous. Marke once agayne what we haue to beare away in this sentence. And whereas God watcheth our steppes : let vs be sure he doth it not without cause. Now lette vs come to the argument which Eliu vseth too reprove Job. Herein thou shalt not be quite (sayeth he): And why? For God is greater than thou. This present reason seemeth to be very colde to conuince Job, and to decide the present case. For firste of all, who knoweth not that God is greater than men ? And who is so mad, as not to confess his greatnessse, and to acknowledge it in him? VVee see many fantastical heads that despise God : but but yet they sticke not to graunt that God is greater than they. Eliu then sayeth no new thing: and although the same speache were not very common, yet notwithstanding what a reason is it to say, God is greater than wee, and therefore it followeth that it shall not boote vs to maynteyne a good case. It seemeth rather that Eliu agreeth to that which Iob had sayde: that is to wit, God vsseth such rigour agaynst mee, howbeit that is of his absolute power: he is greate, and I am not able to make my parte good with him: he is my maker, and I am but a poore earthen pot: there is nothing but infirmitie in me. It seemeth here then, that Iob doth fater an absolute power vpon God, as who should say that he did what he listeth agaynst men, without reason or equitie. But let vs marke that it behoueth vs to take this sentece otherwise than the woordes sounde. For whereas mencion is made of Gods greatnesse: it is ment to go ioyntly with all that ever is in him. And truely we must not separate the vertues that are in God: for they are his owne proper being. Men may well haue some vertues in them, that may bee taken from them: but it is not so with God. VVhen wee speake of his power, or his iustice, or his wisedome, or his goodnesse: we speake of himself: they are things inseparabile, and cannot be seuered (that is to say, they cannot be taken away from his Being): for they are so ioyned togither, as the one of them cannot be without the other. Is God mightie? so is he also good. His mightinesse defeateth not his goodnesse, nor yet his iustice. Therefore whereas Eliu sayeth here, that God is greater than man: he meeneth not that his greatnesse is onely in power, but also that with his greatnesse of power, there is infinite iustice, infinite wisedome, & al others things infinite in him. And what are we in comparison of him? That therfore is the naturall sense of this streyne. Now wee see that this argument is good to put all men to silence, and to make them stoupe to humilitie, that they may stande no more in contention agaynst God. And why? what is the cause that we murmur in our afflictions? That we cannot suffer God to handle vs according to his will? that he seemeth to haue done ynoch enough and to much already? And that we demaund so curiously why God vsseth such rigor agaynst vs? what is the cause of all this? for that we thinke not vpon Gods greatnesse. For it is certayne that if a man considered what God is, it woulde at the first brunt stay him and sherte him vp, so as he would not take any more libertie to grudge nor to reply in anywise. Therefore let vs marke, that all our ouergreat and excessiue affections, all our nurmurings, and all other such like things: proceede of this, that wee knowe not what God is, and that we spoyle him of his Maiestie, asmuch as lieth in vs. That is a cursed thing, and there is none of vs, but he loatheth it: and yet for all that (as we see by experience,) it happeneth vnto vs, ere we thinke of it. For if things fall not out, as we would wish: do not we breake out of array to enter into disputation against God? No doubt but we would that all should be well. I put the case that our zeale were good: yet would we bring God to dispose things according to our liking. And if they happen otherwise: by and by ye see we are out of pacience. And whereof commeth this? Because we be to desirous that God should giue vs leaue to common familiaritie with him, and wee beare our selues in hand, that we could shew him how things ought to go otherwise. And though we canot do so, yet notwithstanding his will cannot content vs. To be short, we must come to this poynt, that all things are gouerned by Gods prouidence: but it seemeth vnto vs, that all should go contrarywise. Ye see then, that to enter into debate and disputation agaynst God, is all one as if we would defeate him of his greatnessse and bereue him of his right, asmuch as in vs lieth. So then it is not without cause that Eliu vseth this principle here agaynst Iob: namely; God is greater than thou, and howe then wilt thou pleade against him? Hereby we be warned, first of all that whensoeuer wee be to much greeued in our afflictioes, and would haue things to go otherwise, and cannot abide that God should gouerne vs after his pleasure: it is all one as if wee would first rob him of his right, & afterward make him our fellow and companion, so as he should haue nōmore authortie nor superioritie ouer vs. Our intent shall not be so, but yet are we woorthie of blame for it. And therefore so much the more ought wee to be sory, and to gather our wittes about vs, seeing there is such a lostinesse in vs, as we cannot be thorowly subdued to glorifie God in all things that he sendeth vs, but wold that things should go cleane contrary: taking vpon vs to taske God to do what wee would desire him: for it is all one, as if we would take his greatnesse from him. Marke that for one poynt. Furthermore let vs marke, that it is not ynoch enough for vs to haue conceyued generally that God is great: but it behoueth vs also to consider the greatnesse. For else wee shall well ynoch confesse that God is Almighty, and that ashee created the worlde, so he hath all things in his hande and gouernaunce. VVee shall never sticke at that, howbeit these are but flying confessions houering in the ayre, and wee shall fare never the better by them, if we go no further. VVhat is to be done then? it behoueth vs to apply these miracles of God to our owne vse, that it may come to our remēraunce after what sort God should be great: namely to the end we may be wholly giuen to obey him: that whatsoeuer he do, we may thinke it to be good: that howsoeuer he dispose of vs, we may agree vnto it, and acknowledge him to be righteous: and that although hee tosse vs too and fro, we may alwayes stand stedfast in beleefe that he sendeth vs not any thing which is not rightfull. Yee see then that the acknowledging of this greatnesse of God, is by graunting him to do with vs what he thinketh good: and not onely with vs, but generally with all creatures. Now we know what it is to cōfesse that God is Almighty, at leastwise earnestly & vnfaynedly. But yet shall men never yeld themselves to the obeying of God, nor never giue him the glory that he deserueth, but by knowing what they theselues are, & what God is. VVhe we haue made this cōparison, and perceyued that wee are nothing, and that God surmounteth al that we can thinke, and that he hath an infinite glory in himselfe: I say when we know this: then shal we haue no more the vaine trust to exalt our selues, nōther shal we any more play the wilde colts as we were wont to do: but we shall learne to graūt God an infinite greatnesse, & to know that we our selues are nothing. And for the better expressing hereof, Eliu addeth that God answereth not aliwoordes. This importeth a great substaunce. For Eliu intendeth to shew vs, that we cannot comprehend al things as now, because God listeth not to reuele thē vnto vs. This is in effect the thing which he met. And it behoueth vs to marke, that God manifesteth himself vnto vs in part, to the end we should not be left vncaught in the things that are good & expedient for vs. Neuerthelesse he knoweth our capacitiē, & according thervnto reueleth his will vnto vs, referring in the meane whyle vnto himselfe, the things that we could not cōprehend, because they passe our vnderstanding. If we bear this lesson in minde, we shall haue profited well for one day: Behold, God hath taken vpō him the charge and office to teach vs, and therefore we must not be negligent in hearing: seeing that he is so gracious to vs as to be our master, let vs in anywise be his schollers and giue diligent heede to that which he sayeth. Howbeit let vs marke therewithall, that whē he executeth the office of a scholemaster towards vs, it is not to open vnto vs al things that we would doubt of, or whereof we would be inquisitiue. VVhat then? The things that he knoweth to be for our edifying, that is to say, which he knoweth to be for our behoofe. And so it behoueth vs to marke three things. One is, that we must haue our eares opē to receiue the doctrine that God teacheth vs, and not be as brute beasts when he doth vs that honour, but apply our indeuer to profite vnder him. Thus 10 ye see the first poynt. VVee must not do, as the wretched Papists do which would know nothing: O (say they) it is a daungerous matter to inquire of Gods secrets. It is true that we must come to it with lowliness & reuerence: but ought wee therefore to haue our eāres stopped, or deafe, whē God speketh to vs? So then let vs alwayes learne to be ready and willing to receyue whatsoeuer is sayd or set forth vnto vs in the name of God. Thus much cōcerning the first point. Secōdly let vs mark that God wil not shew vs all things as now, but we must content our selues with that which S. Paule sayeth in the first to the Corinthians: 20 Cor. i. 12. that is to wit, that as now we know in parte, and see as it were in a glasse and darkely: for as yet we haue not come to the day of the full reuelatiō. For although the Gospell be called the brightnesse of the noone day: yet notwithstanding the same is referred to our measure. God inlightheneth vs there sufficiently: we see his face in our Lord Iesus Christ: & we behold it to be trasfigured into the same: but howsoeuer the worlde go, wee see not that which is prepared agaynst the latter day. It behoueth vs to increase 30 cōtinually in faith: but faith presupposeth that the things are yet hiddē, according as we haue the measure of sayth, as the Scripture sayeth. If we haue it in measure, then is it not in perfection. Thus ye see how wee haue to beare in minde, that the faithfull during this present life, ought to content themselues with some tast of Gods will, and to know some portion of it but not all of it. For if we haue sond desire to say, I will know all things & be ignorant of nothing: that were a mad wisedome, and it were much better for vs to be starke fooles. Therefore let vs marke, 40 that the faithfull must cōtent themselues with that which is reveled vnto them: and that is a far greater and better wisdome, than to be inquisitiue of all things without exception. Marke that for the second point. And the third is, that Gods holding of vs at that poynt, is not for that he is niggardly to shewe vs his will any further, but because he knoweth what is conuenient for vs. And therefore let vs marke well, that God teacheth vs for our edification. VVhat then is the measure of faith? what is the doctrine of the holy scripture? It is the rule which God knoweth to 50 be expedient for our saluatiō: and men neede not to cōplainte, if they may know the things that are conteyned in the holy Scripture, and haue them declared vnto them dayly in Sermons, if men know that: they neede not to cōplayne as though they had not vnderstanding ynoch. For looke whatsoeuer is good and conuenient for vs, our Lord hath declared it vnto vs. So then sith wee see that God hath comaunded his woord to be brought vnto vs, and would not hide any thing frō vs which might be for our saluation: we haue so much the more thanks to give him for disclosing himselfe so familiarly vnto vs, and we

haue wherwith to cōtent our selues, rather than to be curios as wee see many are, which be desirous to be searching out of measure. And the Papists also haue had the same, so as on the one side they sayd, O wee must not be inquisitiue of Gods secrets: & vnder that colour, they rejected al the holy Scripture: & on the other side they had a foolish curiositie in seeking things that appertayned not vnto them: and they were full of fonde dotages, to say, what is such a thing? And how is such a thing done? To be short, nothing contented thē: in somuch as the whole holy Scripture was no better vnto thē than an Apce. For they were not ashamed to spew out this diuelish blasphemie, that when we haue all that is in the holy Scripture, it is not ynough for vs, but we must haue other secret mysteries which God hath reserued to his Church. VVherevpon haue they forged all this? Like as Mahumet sayde that his Alcorā was to great perfection: so also the Pope sayeth that there be certaine secrets reserued vnto him, besides the holy Scripture. VVhat a shame is this! But yet notwithstanding wee be warned here, that the cause why our Lord hath fitted his doctrine to our capacitie & measure, is for that it behoueth vs to be cōtēted with it, & not bring thither our wādring lustes, to say, how goeth this or that? For what are wee? And therefore let vs heare God speake, & let vs open our eyes and receiue that which he sheweth & telleth vs by his woord. And againe, when we be come to that point: let vs hold vs in quiet. For he sheweth vs after what sort we must put our trust in him: after what maner we must liue: and after what maner we must worship him. Hath he shewed vs this? well. Let vs settle our selues wholy there, and bee contented with that which he sheweth vs in the holy Scripture: for he knoweth what our vnderstāding can bruck. And also the things which he hath declared vnto vs are not very darke, so we do him the honour to receyue them with all lowliness, & be not so mad & ouerweening, as to desire to vnderstand that which he will haue hidden frō vs, & that we will not graunt him to be righteous, except he shewe vs the cause why, according as we see many which wil say: Tush, I belieue it not, for it passeth mine vnderstanding. Thou vile toade, darest thou blaspheme God after that sort, because he giueth thee not an account of al his doings? & disdaynest thou to forbear the thing which is hidden frō thee because thou canst not cōprehend it by reason of thy own beastlinesse? So then lette vs not be puffed vp with such pride, as might make vs rush against God: but let vs cōtent our selues with that which is declared here, wayting paciently for the great day, wherein the things which wee know now but in parte, and which we do but tast and behold as it were in a glasse, shall be shewed vnto vs face to face and in full perfection.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs seele thē better thā we haue done, that we may not onyl craue pardon of him, but also beseech him to renew vs by his holy spirit, & to clenſe vs frō al our fleshly affectiōs: & that forasmuch as there is nothing but vanitie in vs, & we canot but stray frō the right way, if we folow our naturall inclination: it may please him to redresse it and to guyde vs by his hād vnto the end of our life. That it may please him to graūt this grace not only to vs, but also &c.

The. cxxiiij. Sermon, which is the third vpon the. xxxiiij. Chapter.

14. God vwill speake once or tvvice, and men haere him not.
15. In a dream and vision of the night vvhē sleepē is vpon men, & they are at rest in their bed:
16. Then openeth he the eare of men, and sealeth his chastizement vpon them.
17. To the ēnde to drayve a man backe from his vvorke, and to lyde the prydē of men.

Ere Eliu goeth forwarde with the matter which he had begon already in the last sermon: that is to wit, that God yeeldeth no accōut of his doings and sayings vnto mortall men. And wee haue to marke here, that whiche I haue declared alredy: namely that Eliu treateth not here of that doctrine of

Esay. 45. 6. God which ought to be cleere and easie vnto vs. For God

(as he protesteth by his Prophet Esay) speaketh not vnto vs couertly, nother is it for nought that he sayeth, seeke me. And if his word be darke vnto vs: that cōmeth not of it self, but of the blindnesse which is in our dull wits. For the doctrine which God hath set forth vnto vs, & which is contayned in the holy Scripture, is rightly named light. Eliu therfore speaketh here of the determinations which God maketh in his owne secrete purpose. For (as it hath bene sayd) God in setting forth his woord vnto vs, hath a regarde of our capacitie which is very slender, and in the meane while reserueth the things to himselfe, which wee could not cōprehend as yet, because they were not profitabile for our saluatiō. Not that God taketh pleasure in our ignorance, but because he knoweth what is good for vs: & therefore it behoueth vs to be cōtent with the measure that he giueth vs, and to tary till the day of the full discouery be come, at which time we shal know the things that are now hidden. VVherfore let vs profite now according as it shal please God to giue vs power, vntil we behold the things opēly, which as now are darke vnto vs. Ye see then in effect what we haue to gather of this text: namely that here is no treating of the woord of God which we heare dayly, and which he will haue to be taught vs: but of the secretes which he keepeth to himself, & which he wil not haue disclosed vnto men as yet, because they are not able to conceyue them. He had sayd heretofore that God will not answe to all woordes: that is to say, that men which are nothing, must not presume to call God to account of his workes, so as he should make the priuie why he worketh after one sort or other. Now he addeth, that God will speake once or twice and men shall not beare him. It is the worse for vs, that there be many sentēces cōcerning God, which he sheweth by effect, wherof notwithstanding the reason is ynkownne, and although God speake as it were with his own mouth, yet somtimes he is not heard: that is to wit, when the matter cōcerneth things which me comprehēd not as yet, & which are as it were buried frō them till the latter day. True it is that this present sentēce is expounded diuersly: some vnderstād it, that God wil speake once, that is to say, that he will speake the woord & it behoueth vs to rest vpō it: & that two will come against it, & he will not vouchsafe to regard them: and so, that men must not think to repeale Gods ordinance for it shal alwayes stand vnimpeached. That is true. But as touching Elius matter, I haue tolde you already, that it behoueth vs to continue the thing which we sawe in the last Sermon, namely that God will not yeeld an account of any of his wordes. And so Eliu graunteth him a libertie to speake & say what he will, yea euen in such wise as men may not carpe at it. There haue bene also which do referre this to that which Eliu addeth, namely, that God speakeþ vnto men in visions by night when sleepe troubleþ them, and also ebat he speakeþ by chastisements. It seemeth vnto them that here be the two maners of speaking vnto vs which God vseth: so as sometime he reveleth himself by inspiratiōs, and sometimes also toucheth vs with his hande. But this is nothing to the purpose, & it is a cōstrained sense. Furthermore we neede not to beate our braynes much in seking diuersities of expositiōs, seeing that the naturall sense is manifest vnto vs. Therefore let vs follow that which I haue declared alredy: which is, that God shal speake once or twice, yea and yet not be vnderstood. Thus wee know what Eliu mēt to say: & now remaineth to apply the same to our instrūction. And how? first of all by knowing our own slenderncesse: for what is the cause that men take so highly vpō them to seeke & search after such a sort as nothing may escape thē: but because they thinke thēselues able ynough to find out al things: but if a mā be thorowly wel tamed, in such sort as he challege nothing to himself, he will be no more so proude & loyty to search Gods secrēts to far out of measure. So then to the intent we may take profit of this text specially, first let vs hūble our selues yea euen by acknowledging that our vnderstanding is to small & grosse. Marke that for one poynt. And on the d̄therside let vs cōsider also, that Gods secret iudgements are Ro. ii. 13. a dreadfull dungeon, that his wayes are incōp̄rehēsible, & that it is not lawfull for mē to wade to far in thē, but must cōtent thēselues with that which he declareth. Ye see then that the secōd poynt which we haue to marke, is that whē we thinke vpon the highnesse of God, we ought to be rauished to the honoring of it, & cōclūe that we must not take vpon vs to be able to know & cōprehend al that is in him. For whither were that to go? wee creepe here vpon the earth, & we know that he far surmoūteth the heauēs. Then seing it is so: let vs honor his secret iudgements, assuring our selues that he will alwayes haue authority to speake & vtter what he listeth, mauger al them that speake against him: yea & that when he speaketh once or twice, that is to say, when he sheweth his pleasure and will: men shall know nothing of it because they are to rude to conceyue the things in one woord, which God hath determined in his purpose: but shal dayly see one thing, & yet not withſtāding be new to seeke of it, yea & stil dazeled at it, euen at the end of a yeere or ten: & although they haue seene one thing oftē, yet the reason of it shal be hidde frō thē. VVere it not for the prude that is in vs, it is sufficiētly confirmed vnto vs by experiance, that we never come to any reason but by cōpulsion, & that we wil always needes be ſelwise, eue though our ignorāce shew it ſelf ynough & to much. Neuerthelesse it is not without cause, that we be warned in this text, that God will haue his determinatiōs as it were buried & hid. VVe see the effect of it dayly, & we know not what to say, ſauing that it is a wōderful thing, & that it behoueth vs to bridle our selues, in waiting till our Lord revele it in greater perfecțiō, which ſhall not be till we be bereft of this mortall flesh. Thus yee ſee what we haue to marke here. And according to the article which I haue touched already, let vs note also that here is no ſpeaking but of the iudgements which God will haue hidde, because it is not for our behoof to haue full knowledge of thē as yet. It is ſayd in the 62. Psalm that god ſpeakeþ once, & David protesteth that he wil haere it twice, namely that there is might & mercie in God. There is no treating of Gods wōderful iudgements, as there is here. Of what then? of the things that we lerne by his word, which are brought to our remēbrāce & ſet before vs cōtinually. For on the one ſide God maketh vs to ſeele his mighty power, to the end we ſhould feare him & walke according to his will: & on the oþer ſide he giueth vs his mercy, to the end wee ſhould take cōfōrt & ioy at it. VVhat learne we dayly in gods word, but that he is the master to whom it behoueth vs to be ſubiect, & that we must not liue after our own lust, but that God muſt raigne over vs, & his law be a bridle that we may be taught vnder it. Thus the firſt poynt is to ſerve God, & to know what he requireth & alloweth. The ſecond is, that wee know him to be our father & Savior, to the end to put our whole truſt in him. Psa. 62. c. 12.

And how shall wee know him? By grounding our selues vpon his mere mercie, knowing that there is nothing but death and damnation in vs, and acknowledging that he hath drawne vs out of death through his owne mere goodnessse, for our Lord Iesus Christes sake. Thus as concerning this second poynt, the two things wherein it behoueth vs to be confirmed, are that we must resort to him for refuge: and also that for somuch as his mercie is set before vs dayly, wee should not doubt but that he will receyue vs. So then, this texte of Davids, speaketh not of the things that are kept hidden from our knowledge: but of the things that God intendeth to declare vnto vs and teach vs. Therefore he sayeth, God hath spoken: that is to say, God hath so manifested his will in his speaking, as men ought not to doubt any more, nor to replie agaynst that which he sayeth. I haue heard it twyce, sayeth he. Herein he betokeneth, that it is not ynough to haue heard God at a glaunce: but that it behoueth vs to minde the things without ceasing which he speaketh. And although he speake but once: yet must we not let his doctrine slip, but settle it throughly in our remembrance, and learne to print it in our hearts, and thinke vpon it early and late, because our memorie is short. So then, we see now, that it is the dutie of the faythfull, to apply theselues throughly to the hearing of the things that God sheweth them by his woord, and to set their whole minde vpon it, assuring themselues that God will give them the knowledge of the things which he telleth and promiseth them for their welfare. Marke that for one poynt. Howbeit, here with-all let vs keepe our selues from seeking any further, and let vs not couet to be wyzer than God will haue vs to be. And how may that bee? By learning in his schoole: and if he reserue any secrete iudgements to himselfe, let vs be ignorant in the things that he wil not haue knowne vnto vs, vntill he haue taken vs out of the world. As for example. It is sayd vnto vs that God gouerneth all things by his prouidence: and Eliu speaketh to the same purpose here. Ye see then that God disposeth of all his creatures, he holdeth all things in his hand, and nothing happeneth in this worlde by chance, but all things according to his will. This doctrine is giuen vs in the holy Scripture, and it behoueth vs to receyue it without gaynsaying. Nowe then if wee inquire howe and why, and would that God (whensoever he worketh) should yelde vs a reason of his doings, and would enter into disputation to checke agaynst him: we passe our bounds, as wee see these toades do which are full of poyson, and spew out their blasphemies agaynst the prouidence of God, saying: If God dispose all things, then is he the author of sinne: then is euill to be fathered vpon him. Lo here a cursed thing. For it behoueth vs to hold our selues within the cōpasse which the holy Scripture giueth vs: and because wee perceyue not the reason whi God doth all things, and therefore do thinke them straunge: it behoueth vs to stay there: like as also when the holy Scripture sayeth, that God chose whom it pleased him before the making of the worlde, and forsoke the rest: it is good reason that we shold receiue it with all reuerence, and acknowledge that our saluation proceedeth of the free goodnes of our God, for as much as he hath chosen vs out of that forlorne and damned lumpe. Furthermore, if vpon this sayd poynt, we fal to flittering into ouer high speculations: we shall be confounded by it, and that rightly. VVhy so? For therein we would know more than God hath graunted vs, and that were aslinch as to fight agaynst him. And thinke we that such an outrage shal scape vnpunished? Thus ye see how wee ought to practize this sentence where it is sayd, that God shall speake once or twyse w̄itout being heard: that is to say without being vnderstoode, because the wit of man is to weake. But now let vs come to that which Eliu addeth. He sayeth that wben men be layd downe to sleepe and are at rest and asleepe: God speaketh and openeth their eares, of purpose to withdraw them from their owne workes, and to tame or hyde the pryde which is in men: (that is to say) to caste it downe and to burie it: or els to seeke his discipline or instruction in chastizing them. If he see them hardeharted and that they receyue not the playne doctrine or instruction which he giueth them: then is he fayne to stryke vpon them, and to tame them with his roddes, and to inforce them to be taught in his truth. This is in effect the thing which is treated of here. Truly Eliu speaketh of his owne time, for I haue tolde you already, that he was not of that people which God had chosen to communicate his lawe vnto. For if that he and those whom wee haue heard speake, and Job himselfe were after the tyme of Moyses, which thing is vncertayne: yet were they straunders fr̄ the Church of God: and the knowledge which they had, was giuen them by an extraordinary manner, inasmuch as it pleased God to inspyre them. And this is the cause why he sayeth that God inspireth men, euen by dreames: and that when they are asleepe, God doth as it were plucke them by the eare, and give them warning to thinke vpon him. True it is that God inspireth vs also, and althoough we haere his woord to our instruction, and haue his holy Scripture to reade: yet doth he not ceasse to warne vs still, and to giue vs many heartbitings, which are as many summonings to call vs backe to himselfe, when we are gone astray. For we see how men bury the sayd knowledge, and seeke by all meanes to forget God: but God commeth to search within vs. Therefore when we feele any prickings and thoughts that stirre vs vp: let vs vnderstante that God putterth vs in remembraunce of himselfe, because we bee inclined to forget him, and to become as it were brutish. Specially in the night time when we be alone, and our wittes gathered to vs, that we wander not here and there: then if there come deepe thoughts that wey with vs so farre as euen to make vs to sweate or tremble, or els if we be in such disquietnesse of minde as though wee were vpon a racking: it is God that worketh in that case: and he summoneth vs, because he feeth that we are as it were fugitives, like a yong boy that leaueth his fathers house, and runneth abroade blowyng a feather in the wind. God then, seeing vs runne so astray, calleth vs home by visions in the night. True it is that they shall not be such as Eliu, Job, Eliphas and the oþers had. And why? for we haue the helpe which they wanted: that is to wit, the woord of God, which is preached to vs and wee do haere it. Thus doth God revele himselfe vnto vs, because we haue his lawe, his Prophets, and his Gospell in our hands, and our eares are continually beaten with the doctrine that he hath willed to bee taught after the manner of those that had nother Scripture nor preaching. Yet neuerthelesse wee see that God worketh now and then after that sort with some men. But to be short, wee haue to marke here, that although God sende vs not such visions as the auncient fathers had: we must not be discontented nor grudge at it. For that were to great an vnthankfulnessse, because it hath pleased God to communicate himself vnto vs by an other meane which is fitter for vs. There are some curiouse folke which demaunde, why God appareth not from heauen as he did in times past, and why the thing is not perfourmed which he spake by Moyses, namely that he would speake to prophets in visions, figures, and dreames. It is bycause that at this day we haue his will fully reveled vnto vs. VVere it not a superfluous thing, that God should appeare vnto vs

c. 20.
Rom. 6.c.11.
Eph. 1. 4.*

as he did in former times, seing he hath giuen vs an other meane, and that if we despysē not his woerde which we haue in our handes, we be sufficiently, fully, and perfectly instructed there? So then let vs learne to be contented with this fashion which God hath ordayne to instruct vs by. And further let vs note, that his appearing by visions vnto the auncient fathers, was because they had not as yet the lawe written: or else his appearing vnto the Prophets, was because it was needfull to haue a larger declaratiō of the things that were yet darke. But now that Gods truthe is cleare and manifest ynoch, it behoueth vs to take the visions of the time pastē for a confirmation of our fayth, knowing that they sprang out of the same fountayne. And therefore let vs walke in the simplicitie whiche God willeth vs to holde. Marke that for one poynt. And for the second, let vs cosider Gods goodnessse, in that after he hath giue vs his woord in writing, and raysed vp men to expound it, he still toucheth vs and stirreth vs vp inwardly by his holy spirite, giuing vs remorces and inspirations. Therefore lette vs consider the care which he hath of our saluation, seing he draweth vs so sweetely vnto him by all meanes. Ye see in effect what wee haue to gather vpon thisstreyne. Nowe when Eliu addeth, that God sealeth his instruction in men by chastycing them with his band: it is an article well worthy to be borne in minde. For here it is shewed vs, that God muste bee fayne to speake vnto vs with many strokes of had as they say. And why? for he is so gratiouse vnto vs, as to allure vs gently by his woerde: and when he seeth that this gentlenesse auayleth not, he vseth a greater vehemensie too tame vs: for here he rebuketh vs for our sinnes, he maketh vs afayde, and he citeth vs to his iudgement, to the end we should beware and restrayne our selues, and be as it were beaten downe vnder him, to confessē our wretchednesse, craue pardon, and be sorie for them, so as hee might clense vs from our faults. But hath he vsed those meanes? that is to say, hath he laboured to bring vs backe to him by the sweernesse and homelinesse of his workes. VVe continue still the same wee were afore, and become wilfull in our hardhartednesse. Therefore he is fayne to lift vp his mightie hand and to runne vpō vs, and to strike vs, as it were with a hāmer vpon an anvilde, when he seeth vs so hardcharted and that his woordes enter not into our eares. This is it that Eliu ment to say. True it is that he had sayd heretofore, that God openeth mens eares: (yea truely, for we know well that God worketh by a secrete power in vs when he sendeth vs the inspirations that are spoken of here): But he addeth this as nowe, because wee would fayne be so sotted, as there shoulde bee none other life with vs, but to giue our selues to making of good cheere. VVe see how men shunne Gods presence as much as they can, and seeke by all meanes to run astray in all vanities. God then openeth our eares, when he toucheth vs in such wise, as wee be compelled to be thinke our selues. A very theefe that is hardened in his wickednesse, and could finde in his heart that all remembraunce of Iustice were abolished, shall notwithstanding not fayle to haue prickings and heartbitings to sting him withall. And whereof commeth that? euē because God openeth his eares: howbeit let vs marke, that there is a double opening of our eares which God worketh in vs. Forsometime he openeth our eares to the ende that wee should bee inforced to perceyue that it is hee that speakest: but yet for all that wee cease not to be stubborne still, and to refuze the doctrine and corrections which he giueth vs, so as wee receyue no chasciment at his hand to amend vs. There is an other opening of our eares which is better: which is when God softenth our harts, so as we do willingly receyue his sayings, and giue heede to them, and yelde our selues wholly to his doctrine. VVhen it is sayd, that God openeth menes eares: is it not to be vnderstood, that all men indifferently do yeeld themselves teachable vnto him, and that al are disposed to obey him. No: he speaketh as well of the reprobates as of Gods children. For the reprobates shall haue some opening of their eares in so much as they shal be faine to perceyue (spite of their techr) that God speakeith vnto them. Howbeit for as much as they shake of that thought, and thrust it vnder foote: they continue alwayes as deafe. In the meane whyle the good men take profit of it: for they know it is no striuing agaynst God. And whereas Eliu addeth, that God sealeth his instruction: hee speaketh of such as are so dull vpon the spurre, and so stubberne as God cannot subdue them by his woerde. Therefore such as do so shake off al doctrine, muste bee forced to haire God speake after an other fashion: that is to wit, God must be faine to beate them, and to teach them with harde strypes, and to shewe them by force, that he is their master. Yee see then how this streyne ought to be vnderstoode. Therewithall let vs marke well the manner of speach that Eliu vseth here: which is, that God signeth or sealeth his instruction by chasciments. Hereby he sheweth, that chasciments serue to make the instruction of authoritie, when men reject it and make no count of it: and that could not be, except the instructions of Gods woerde were matched with his chasciments. For if God should but onely beate, without sending any knowledge of his will: what a thing were it? Therefore it behoueth him to teach vs with his beating of vs. And why? for if a father beate his childe, and dragge him about by the heare of his head, and tredē him vnder his feete, and yet speake neuer a woerde to him: the childe shall bee vtterly dismayed because he knoweth not what his father meeneth, nor why that choller is come vpon him, and so the childe shall bee neuer the better for it. But if his father say to him, thou naughtie boy: see what thou haste done, and therupon do beate him: the childe perceyeth that his fathers instruction is to his profite, and he learneth too knowe his fault, in that he hath not obeyed him as he ought to haue done. Beholde (sayeth he) because I receyued not my fathers singlie woerde, he sealeth the instruction that he gaue mee. Euen so dealeth God with men. Not that he graunteeth all men the grace to haue his truth preached vnto the, and to reade the holy Scripture: but he giueth them the remorces and heartbitings that I speake of before. For as S. Paule sheweth in the second to the Romaynes, as wee our selues feele sufficently by nature: there is not that man which hath not an inward record in his owne conscience. So then God reveleth his will vnto men, so farre forth as is needful to make them vnexcusable. And therewithall, for as much as he seeth that men suffer not themselues to be taught at his hande, but do stoppe their eares or else count his doctrine as a triffe, and make a mocke of the warning that he giueth them: forasmuch as menne forger themselues after that sort: it standeth God in hand to seale his doctrine, and to make it of full authoritie, so that when men are scourged, they may acknowledge in themselues and say: very well: Nowe I see that God sheweth mee his power: and because I haue not honored it, nor reverenced his maiestie as I ought to do: therfore I am fayne as now to know him perforce, and to consider his instructions better than I haue done. For what is the cause that I am smitten, and that the mischefe is light vpon me ere I thought of it? Because I made my selfe beleue that I might scape Gods hand: but now he holdeth mee fast shet vp, and thereby

I see that his doctrine is ratified vnto mee, that is to say, is made such, as I am fayne too thinke on him spite of my teeth, and to honour him better than I haue done. So the let vs learne, that whensoeuer God afflieth vs, or sendeth vs any chasteicements, we must cosider, that the same are as it were the seales that he setteth vpon the warning which he had giuen vs afore. If an evidence be vnsealed, men will doubt of it: and if it be alledged, it shall not be credited because it is not autentik. But if it haue a seal at it then is it out of doubte, and a sufficient instrument, and must be receiued. VVherfore let vs marke that God worketh after the same maner in afflicting vs: wherby he sealeth his doctrine. For although we had not the gospel preached among vs, ner any lawe, ner aught else but our own conscience as the Paynims and Turkes haue: yet had we sufficient warning of Gods wil, and knowledge ynough of it, if we did not choke it by our owne wilfulnessse. But seeing he speaketh vnto vs so familiarly both in his lawe and in his Prophets, and specially by the mouth of Iesus Christ: if we on our side be so hardharted and stuppe, that we will not receyue any thing: Is it any woorder if our Lord strike vs with many blowes, and inforce vs to come vnto him? Now therfore let vs not be ouergreued with our afflictions as many men are, who turmoyle when God afflieth them, more than if they had never knowne the word of God. But this knowledge which we haue must needes be sold the dearlier vntoo vs, because that God hath spoken so vnto vs, and allured vs to him by his owne holy mouth, and we drawe backward from him, and voutsafe not too go forward one steppe. And 30 must we not needes be smitten double, when there is nothing else with vs but kicking and wincing? So then let vs learne to receyue the chasteicements that God sendeth vs with a quiet mynd, and consider that his afflicting of vs, is not in vain. VVhy so? For let vs marke whither his doctrine haue bin of such autoritie amogs vs as it ought to be, that is to say, whether wee haue ben teachable and meeke to followe our shepherd as sheepe and lambes. Assoone as God speketh, we ought to print his word in our harts, and to stick vnto it. But we do either go about to wipe it out, or else our eares are deaf, or else it goeth in at the one eare and out at the other. Seing then that one sort of vs haue giuen no reuerence to Gods word, and another sort haue stryued openly against it, and the third do mock at it: seing it is so ill receyued at our hand, God must be fayne to seale it. And how? by afflictions. Ye see the that al the aduersities which god sedeth vs are his seales. Howbeit to the end that the chasteicements which are hard & painful to vs of nature, may be made amiable vnto vs: let vs marke wel that which Eliu sayth here: namely that Gods intent is too drawe men from their owne workes, and to byde their prude. Herein he expresseth, that God in sealing his doctrine by afflictions, not only respecteth the magnifying of his word, that it might haue full maiestie: but also therewithal procureth mennes saluation. The end therfore, which God ameth at in afflicting vs, ought to be as suger to season the bitternesse which otherwise sheweth it self in afflictions. Ye see Gods afflictions are combersome to beare. Yea truly: For we shunne all things that we mislike of. And morouer Gods wrath is a terrible thing vnto vs. Now whensoeuer God punisheth vs, it is a token that he is angry with vs, and therfore we cannot but be afayde greeued, and distressed. Howbeit God sweeteneth all this, by shewing vs, the end that he intendeth: which is that he meeneth to frame vs to his owne hand, and that all his seeking is to make vs followe him to obey him. Thus yee see what Eliu addeth in saying, that God intendeth too drawe men from their owne workes.

Now when he speaketh here of workes, he meeneth not generally all things that men take in hand: but the things that they do rashly and of their owne head. For we know that God hath created vs to labour, and that he will not haue vs to be ydle and vnoccupied, but that every man should apply himself to that which he is able, and that we should consider wherin we may serue both God and our neighbour, and every of vs employ himself therin according to the abilitie which he shall haue receyued. Therfore when God afflieth vs he meeneth not too drawe vs from our works, that is to say to make vs vtterly good for nothing. True it is that whē we be brought lowe with sicknesse, our armes and legges be as good as broken, mē must be fayne to serue vs, the world must be combered with vs, and we are able to do no seruice: but yet doeth not God drawe vs vtterly from all worke: For patience is a worke that good esteemeth aboue all other things. So then (to be short,) God draweth vs not from al works by afflictions vs: but the works that are ment here, are the foolish enterprises that men take in hand. For if God let vs alone and lay the bridle in our necke, how bold are we to practise this or that? Nothing can stick with vs: insomuch that we would remoue heauen and earthe. I must do this(say we) & I haue such a way to go. VVe see nowadayes that Princes take such enterprises vpon them, as if they had all things in their hand, and would as it were make new worlds. And the pride which sheweth it self in those greate men, fayleth not to be also in the lesser sort: For these play the scorpions which wrythe with their tayles to cast abroade their poysen. There is none of vs al, be he never so meane, but he vndertaketh things at auerture. Therfore it is needfull that God should bring vs back after that maner: that is to say, that he should pluck vs back from our rashe doings, by sending afflictions vntoo vs. And so(as I sayd)we haue good cause to be of good comfort whē God afflieth vs. For seeing we are so stuppe of nature, as we never come to him of our own free wil: what would become of vs, if we should not be restrayned by force? Therfore considering that men do of their own 40 nature go cleane contrary to the will of God, and fling abroad like wild beasts: let vs understand that God hath neede to represse vs. And sith we know it, let vs give him glory for that he suffereth vs not to runne like wild colts, but doeth continually brydle vs vnder his obedience, yea and also tame vs by afflictions when he seeth there is too greate headinesse in vs. Lo what we haue to beare awaye in this strayne. But let vs marke that which Eliu addeth for an end: namely that God intendeth to byde the prude of men. For herein he sheweth the welspring of al our enterprises, which is the pride that is in vs. VVhat is the cause the that mē do leape after that sort, and fling theselues in the aire, and make such kicking and wincing? Euen their foolish ouerweening which blideth them. For if men knew themselues, they would be tame ynough. But they take themselues to be maruelouse wights. They knowe not that they are borne and created to obey God. The vntill such time as pride be abated in vs, surely we will be ouerbold to run astray: and therfore if God intend to with draw vs frō our enterprises, it behoueth him first of all to cure this disease of pride which reyngeth too much in vs. And here is expresse mention made of hyding our pride, not that it is ynough to bury it to the end it may not shew it self: but Eliu vseth here the same similitude which wee oftentimes vse towards men, to make them ashamed as if a man shuld say, go hide thyself like a vllcine, to one that made greate countenances in a brauery, and shuld deface him with such reproches as he durst no more shew himself, but shuld be faine as it were too bury himself in his howse. Lo after what sort his pride is as it were hapered. And after the same sort doth God work towards vs. For wheras we would faine play the wise men: our folly bewrayeth it self, and God suffereth not our pride to be always concealed, but it bewrayeth it selfe. VV<sup>e</sup>t then, whē this is perceiued, what doth God c<sup>e</sup> he afflic<sup>t</sup>eth vs to the intent to mecke vs: howbeit he doth it to our shame: that is to say, he buffeteth vs, and therwithall worketh vs such reproche, as we perceiue our owne dishonestie, and are faine to go hide ourselues like lewd lozels that went about to exalt theselues beyond measure & reason. Ye see then what Eliu ment. Therfore God couereth not the pride of men, but sheweth that he beateth it downe and thrustereth it vnderfote, yea euen in such wise, that men are ashamed of it wheras they had erst ben to bold, thinking themselues able to work woonders. So then let vs marke now, that God sheweth vs a singular fauour whē he speake<sup>t</sup>h to vs, seing that we should be but as wretched brute beasts, if we were not taught by him. Againe he sendeth vs hartbitings to nip vs to the quick. If they do vs no good,<sup>10</sup> and we be afterward afflicted by his hād: let vs assure our selues, that that is bicause we be too hard and stubbornē, and therfore must be tamed as wild beasts. Yet notwithstanding let vs consider, that they are all of the God seales, wherby he healeth and ratifieth the warnings which he had giuen vs by his word. And therfore let vs make much of thē and receiue them paciētly, seing that by that meanes he procureth our welfare and saluatiō. And so let vs desire nothing all our life long but to shewe ourselves true children towards him, and too giue ouer ourselves wholly to his obedience and seruice.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledging of our faults, praying him to make vs feele them better than we haue done. And forasmuch as he hath chosen vs to be of his houshold: let vs desire in any wise to be guided by his hand in all simplicitie and reuerēce, and that forasmuch as he hath kinded the light of his word amongs vs, we may be gouerned by it vnto the end, and our mynds mainteyned in such purenesse as they ought to be, so as we may from daye to day grove and increase in the knowledge of his word, vntill we come to behold his glorie fully and perfectly, and be transfigured into the same: and that although it behoue vs as now to passe through many battels, and to feele vnto what wretchednesse we be subiect in this world: yet notwithstanding we may be vphild always by his power, to get the vpper hand of all temptaciōs, to the intent that his goodnessse may strengthē vs more and more to walke in his obedience. That it may please him too graunt this grace &c.

The cxxv. Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the xxxij. Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the xxij. and xvij. verſes, and then vpon the text whic̄h is added here.

18. He plucketh back his soule from the graue, and his lifethat it should not come to the syvord.
19. He chastiseth man vwith greef vpon his bed, and breaketh his bones vwith chastisements.
20. So as his soule refuzeth bread; and his life the pleasaunt meate, 21. His flesh is consumed so as it is seene no more: and his bones also vwhich are not seene, do clatter.
22. His soule dravveth to the graue, and his life vnto them that followe at death.
23. If there be an eloquent messenger (one among a thousand) to shewve a man his righteousnesse.
24. That God hath pitie of him, and sayeth, deliuer him, to the end he go not dovvne intoo the pit: I haue found atonement.
25. His flesh shal come again more freshe than a childe: and she shal returne to the dayes of his youth.

I sawe yesterday that God must be faine to draw vs by force from our folishe enterpryses: because that naturally we be so presumptuous, as there is nothing but we would bee medling with it. If God should but only warne vs to bee mild, and not to thrust forth ourselues ouerhastily: it were not inough. For there is a folishe boldnesse in men which cannot be held in awe but with greate violence, as if a man shuld tie vp a wild beast with cheynes. God therfore must be faine to deale with vs as is shewed vs in this text: that is, that mā wil never turne away frō his own enterpryses, except God subdue him by mayne blowes. And what is the cause therof? Euen pryde, as hath ben sayd alredie. Therfore vntill the pryde which is in mannes nature be beaten downe and thrust vnder foote: they will needes be alwayes roysting and starting out on the one side or the other, yea and flinging away like wilde beasts. And so let vs marke well, that the cheefest thing which we haue to do in our afflictions, is too learne to humble our selues, that we bee not so foolish and ouerbold, as to take more vpon vs than God giueth vs leave to doo, but that wee walk vnder his gouernement, asking counsel alwayes at his mouth, holding ourselues stil to that which he comandeth, and not challenging aught at all to our own strength and power. Ye see then a lesson which it behoueth vs to remember early and late when God afflic<sup>t</sup>eth vs. But Eliu expresteth yet more the thing which I haue touched: that is to wit, that God procureth our welfare by the sayd meanes of humbling vs. And how is that? Because it is the destruction and vndoing of mē to be so puffed vp, and to exalt themselues more than is lauful for thē. Therfore there is no other meanes too drawe them out of the ditch, and to kepe them frō stumbling into a deadly fall, but that God do hold them back by afflictions. And so ye see that the cause why we fall not intoo the graue, is that God afflic<sup>t</sup>eth vs. But therewithall Eliu sheweth vs how harshe this medecyne is, in that he sayeth that is consumeth our flesh, so as we haue no more the shape of man, but are like unto dead men that are taken out of the earth, and our bones do clatter without, and wee canrot somuch as take breathe, but are in continual torment so as wee haue no release, but God persecuteth vs with such extremitie as we can no more. Thus he sheweth that God can not at the first blowe win that thing at mennes hand, which which were to be desired: that is to wit that they should know theselues wretched and full of infirmities, and ther vpon stoupe vnto him, but that they must be fayne to be ouercome with strong hand and continuall torments, or else they will never yeeld and submit them self vntoo him. Behold the twoo points which wee haue to marke. And as touching the first, let vs learne to beare our afflictions patiently, sith we see that they serue vs for medicines and salues. Is it a small thing for vs to be drawen out of the graue? These words concerne not only the bodily death which passeth away: but also (by a similitude) the everlasting damnation is termed here a grave or a pit. Then are we ready to fall not to breake our armes or our leggs, no nor only to breake our necks: but also to perish for euer, and to be wyped out of the booke of life, and to be cut of from the kingdome of heauen. Lo to what state our pride bringeth vs. For so long as we flicker after that sort in the ayre, and think wee haue any strength of our selues, and build therupon after our own fancie: I say so long as we be possessed with such foolish presumtiō: we are alwayes redie to stumble and to perish.

But God hauing pitie of vs, sendeth such remedie as he knoweth to be conuenient: which is, that he afflieth vs and beateth vs with his rodds. If we grudge and cannot be paciet when God doeth so chalstise vs: Is it not an extreme vnthankfulness, not to suffer God to remedy our destrucciō & to draw vs frō it? So then let vs marke well, that here the holy ghost met to make Gods chalsticemēts sweete and amiable to vs, to the end we should beare the quietly when they beseint vs. Marke that for one point. Verely this will seeme straunge to fleshly reason. For [our fleshly reason will say] could God prouide no better meane for our welfare than by tormenting vs after that sort? Behoued it him to send vs to death that he might call vs vnto life? Surely it is an incredible maner of proceeding if a man debate it according to his owne reason: and he will thinke it but a foolishnesse that God should kill vs in pardoning vs. For what are afflictions? Signes of his wrath: and wee knowe that all diseases are the messengers of death, and that all the sorowes which we conceiuie, are drownings of vs. But our Lord sendeth vs sorowes, sicknesses, and torments, and holdeth vs in them as vpon the rack, till we can no more, and till wee faynt in such wise as our life draweth to the graue. For these words concerne not the small afflictions wherewith we are accustomed: but they cōcerne Gods sending of vs to so greate extremitie, as there remayneth no more hope in vs. And how is that? muſt God cast vs into the bottome of death, to the end to draw vs out agayne? But so worketh he, and we muſt not pleade against him, for wee shal always haue the worse end of the staf. And out of doubt, that is the cause why the holy scripture sayeth, that it is his ordinarie maner to kill before he quickē, and to bring to the graue before he rayse to life. Then let vs vnderſtād that God intendeth here to excercise our obedience, by trying vs to the vittermost so as we can indure no more, no nor somuch as drawe our brethe, but seeme to be vtterly choked. Therfore when our Lord bringeth vs too that point, it is to the end to knowe whether we be wholly his, and whether we can abyde to be gouerned by his hand or no. Howsoever the world go, when we be tempted in our troubles and greefes, let this sentence come to our mynde to comfort vs withal: behold it is sayd that God in bringing me to their graue, intendeth to drawe the out againe: and that in cōsuming their fleshe he mindeth to restore it again: and that in tormenting the with extremitie, he purposeth to comfort them and to bring the to rest. Seing it is so, let vs take hold of this comfort, and let that is to affwage all our sorowes: let vs not be out of hart although it seeme that we be vtterly forlorne: let vs alwayes passe further and further in the strength of this doctrine: and let vs learne to rayse vp our selues by it, euen when we be cast downe into hell. Thus ye see what we haue to bear in mind. And afterward whē Eliu maketh so long a descriptiō of Gods chalstizemēts: it is to shew vs how dreadful his wrath is. And this also is a very profitable lesson for vs. For which of vs thinketh of the greatness of Gods wrath as it is spokē of in the holy scripture? It is sayd in the song of Moyses, who knoweth the greatnessse of thy wrath: And vndoubtedly although Gods Psa.90.c.11 wrath be a fire that consumeth all things: yet notwithstanding we think not vpon it, but ouerpasse it. It is told Ebre.9.f.31. vs in Sermons, and we reade goodly texts of it: but we are & 12.g.29. not touched with it, nother doeth any man rest vpon it. Forasmuch then as we make no account of Gods iustice, and take it to be but as a sport: we ought to marke well the counsell that is giuen vs by the holy ghost: like as in this text it is sayd that God breaketh mennes bones: that is to say, vseth so greate violence, as there remayneth no strength at all in them vncorused. Their flesh wasteth & cōsumeth away, so as there remaineth but an image of death: and a man is so continually tormented, as he is like a deade man. It is not without cause that all this is set afore vs: but it is to the end to waken vs, and that when God vttereth his iudgements against vs to make vs feele our sinnes, we should the better bethink vs that those torments are more terrible than can be expressed, According also as wee see how the holy scripture vseth many cōparisons in that behalf. Esa.58.c.13.

many cōparisons in that behalf. VVhy doeth it liken God to a liō that breketh & broozeth things with his teeth, and plucketh them in peces with his pawes? It is not to attribute such a cructie vnto God as is not cōuenient for him: but to humble vs because wee bee dull, and knowe not what it is to feare God, or to stand in awe of the punishments which he sendeth vpon such as lift vp themselues against him. To the end then that wee may not be any more possessed with such dulnesse, the holy scripture setteth forth God in the likenesse of a lion that commeth vpon vs with his teeth and his pawes, to make vs vnderſtād that when he intendereth to shewe himself contrarie vnto men, there is no terror aboue it nor comparable to it. Yee see then to what vse wee ought to apply the things that are sayd here, and that such wārnings ought to serue vs afore hand. Also somertymes when we be in trouble and that God falleth so vpon vs: It behoueth vs to put the things in vre that are spoken of here, to the end we may knowe that we are not the first [which haue ben so delt withall]. Yea and vndoubtedly it is a notable place where it is sayd that God consumeth all a mans fleshe, that he brooseth and breaketh, that he swalloweth vp, and that he killeth men. And why? to quicken them. And so although his anger be dreadful vnto vs when he visiteth vs with rigor, and that we be driuen to feele the things that are conteined heire: yet notwithstanding he cheereth vs with the hope of salutiō, which is the only meane to bring vs vnto life. VVherfore seing that our God, giueth vs hope, and that we be not the first that haue bia so delt withall, but that he hath handled his seruants after that sort in all tymes: let vs suffer our selues too be as it were swallowed vp of sorowe and to be set there as in a gulf. And truely wee see that Eliu following that which hath ben shewed in the foresyd song of Moyses, speaketh not so without cause. Marke then how this sentence ought to serue vs to double vse. The first is, that when we be in rest, we must take tyme too bethink vs how dreadfull Gods wrath is, to the end we may walke in feare and carefulnesse Psa.90.c.11 nesse and submit our selues vnder his hand. And the second is that we must not be to much afrayde when God visiteth vs so roughly,knowing that he hath delt after the same sort towards those whose saluation he hath procured. Then let vs not thynk it straunge that he should deale so with vs, but let vs learne to fashion ourselues like vnto those, which haue wayted to be fully comforted at Gods hand after they had bin in heauiness, yea euen after they had bin swallowed vp of sorowe. And therwithall let vs marke also the long continuance of our afflictions, wherof Eliu speketh here. For he sayeth not that Gods afflictiong of a man in such wise as he shall seeme to be vtterly forlorne, shall not be only for one brunt, and to releue him againe byandby after: No, but contrariwise when he layeth his hand vpon those whome he intendeth too afflic, he maketh it heuier and heuier, insomuch that if a poore creature be sore tormented to day, it shall be double to morowe, and afterward be so increased, as it shall seeme to haue nother end nor measure, and it shall continue so long, that he shall passe through a hūdred deathes, before God shall seeme to releue him. So litle then shall we bee deliuered from our afflictions immedately when we haue felt them: that they must be increased more & more. For it is the good pleasure of God, that we should fight against many deathes. Truely this seemeth right hard vnto vs: howbeit let vs marke that a rough horse must haue a rough rider, and that forasmuch as wee bee tough wood, it behoueth vs to haue hard wedges & hard strokes with a beetle. True, it is that we think not our selues to be rebels against God: but if we consider the thing as it is, without flattering of ourselues: we shall find that the nurishing of wilful stubbornesse in vs, is no smal nor common thing. Some chawe vpon the brydle in such wise against God, that although their afflictions increase, yet they cease not to gnash their teeth still, and to play the wild beasts. And an other sort pretend some token of humilitie: but what for that? They bee so sickle, that to day or to morowe it is quite out of their heads. So long as a man is hild at a baye, he wil vndoubtedly say I haue offended my God, it behoueth mee to turne a newe leaf: and he will not only make countenaunce afore men thorough hypocrisie that he is willing to amend: but he wil also think himself to bee vtterly chaunged, and that there is no more any wicked affection in him. But what? if God deliuer him to morowe morning, he wil become worse than he was, or at leaste wise as bad. See in what plighe we be. And therfore let vs not think it straunge that God shold so increase his strypes. If he see that we cannot be woon, but that there is such a sturdiness in vs as he must be faine to correct vs a long whyle, it behoueth him to worke more roughly. Like as when a disease is rooted, peraduenture the diseased person will think him self to be rid of it, as soone as he hath taken but some stirrup, our some pille, or hath bin let blood: I say it will seme vnto him that he is throughly whole: but the roote of the disease is not yet plucked vp, & therfore he must be faine to take some very harshe and bitter medecines, and bee kept to a diet, and abide vnder the Phisitions hand a moneth or twayne, yea or a whole yere. Euen after the same maner must God purge vs by diuerse remedies, and make it long ere he cure vs, bycause this vyce of pride is rooted ouerdeepely in vs, and is entred euen into the māre of our bones, so that all is infected, and there is no soundnesse in vs, but all is corrupted till God renewe it againe. Thus ye see why here is mention made of the long continuing of our afflictions til we can no more: yea and that God must be faine to vse diuerse remedies, not afflictiong vs always after one fashion, but sending vs some tymes one kind and sometymes another, which thing let vs assure ourselues that he doth not without great cause: for he taketh no pleasure in the tormenting of his pore creatures. VVe knowe it is his nature to make vs fele his goodnesse: howbeit in the meane whyle, forasmuch as he feeth that wee are not fit to receive it: it is good reason that he should chaunge, and after a sort transfigurē him self, to the end to conforme himself vnto that which hee feeth fit for vs. And that is the cause why it is sayd that he chastizeth man with greef vpon his bed. VVhē Eliu speketh so, it is to shewe vs that if God punish vs in good earnest, there is nother release nor truce at all. For his meening is, that though we seeke rest we shall find none, if God bee our enimie, that is to say, if we take hold of his wrath. For when the scripture sayeth that God is our enimie, and is angrie with vs: it meeneth not that he is so in deede, but that he pretendeth to be so bycause we haue neede to be put in feare, that we may be sorie for our sinnes. So then let vs mark wel, that when a man is so tormented, he is forced to haue warre without end, and if he seke to haue rest, he shall find none. For the hand of God is to long: we shal not be able to scape from it, till wee be reconciled to him. This is the thing that ought to bee vnderstoode in this sentence. And if God giue vs any release, let vs assure ourselues that he beareth with our infirmite & the same ought to serue to our singular cōfort. For although God examin vs roughly, and bring vs euē to the pits brimme: yet notwithstanding he giueth vs still some tast of his goodnesse with it, that wee may take breathe againe. It is sayd here that he hath not graunted this grace vntoo all men, but that he persecuted some in such sort as they had no rest at all. And what meeneth he by saying so? He speketh not of the reprobats only, but of those whom he had chosen, and whose saluatō he had procured and furthered by that meanes. So then let vs vnderstand, that when God suffereth vs not to be afflicted ouersore, but giueth vs only some litle strypes: he hath a respect to our feblenesse, bycause he seeth wee are to weake. Furthermore, when he sayth that a man forsaketh his meat, insomuch that he findeth no tast in pleasant meat, and would fayne be out of the world: It is to shewe vs that when we are touched with the feeling of Gods wrathe, and haue conceyued it too the quick: wee can find no tast in any thing. VVhat is it then that giueth vs tast of all the benefits that wee receyue at Gods hand in this world? It is his grace. True it is that the heathenishe sort, as the despysers of God which are saped in their sinnes, and are become vtterly briſe, and feele no more sting of greef: doo finde tast ynoȝh in their pleasures: yea euen in their beastly pleasures: For they haue not yet conceyued the wrath of God. But as for those that seele God against them, they must needs mislike all things that are desirable of their owne nature, yea and vtterly lothe them. And why? For they cannot take pleasure, euen to liue. Although this life bee full of much wretchednesse, and is as it were a Sea of all miseries: yet must we set store by it, bycause God hath set vs in it, and preserueth vs in it, to the intent we should knowe him to bee our Creator and father, according as indeude the end why we were created, and why we be mainteyned in this transitorie life: is that we should know how it is God that interteyneth vs here, and that we should feele his fathery goodnesse, in that it please him to haue a care of vs and to gouerne vs. So then our life ought to be deare vnto vs in that respect: and when he sheweth himself angry, our life must needs be bitter. For it is impossible that Osey. o b. 8 a man should not desire too bee fordon when he feeleth Lu. 2; e. 20. that: according as it is written that they shall say too the Apo. 6. d. 16 mounmountaynes, coner vs. Thus ye see to what point we are come. And therfore let vs learne to find tast, first of all, in the goodness of our God, to the end that the rest of his benefits may be pleasant vnto vs, and that we may finde fauor in them. I say let vs learne to tast the goodness of God: that is to say, let vs not be so giue to worldly things, as that our cheef marke shold not be to say, let vs seeke to obey our God, and to submit our selues quietly vnder his hand. Ye see then, what we must desire. Haue wee so doone? whensoeuer we inioy the benefits that he giueth vs, whither it be in eating and drincking, or in the rest of our life: let our reioycing be in such wise, as it may bee wholly referred to the acknowledging of the fatherly goodness of our God, to say, behold God doeth well shewe the care which he hath of our welfare, seing he voutsafeth to feede our wretched bodies. Behold, they be but deade carkases, and yet God voutsafeth to nourish them. Ye see then that it behoueth vs to eate and drinck in such sort, as wee may thinke continually vpon the goodness of our God. Furthermore when all things be out of tast with vs, and that we beso ouerpresse with anguishe as our very life is hatefull to vs: let vs consider from whence the same procedereth. And that is bycause God hath hidden his cōtenaunce from vs, & we feele no more his fatherly goodness which should make vs too find tast and fauour in all his benefites. So then if wee mourne and bee in perplexitie and anguishe, let vs pray God to make vs feele his goodness whiche as yet is unknowne to vs. And when we feele that, let it serue vs not only to take breth by, and to setvs in rest: but also to restore vs in such wise, that wheras we were viterly dismayed afore, we may gather newe corage and come againe to the floore of our age, according as it is sayd here by-andby after. Thus ye see what we haue to beare in mind. To be short, it is sayd that the flesh of a man shal waste awaie, so as it cannot bee sayd any more that he is aliue. Now if it be so that we must be brought as it were to nothing, and that God doth viterly disigure vs: let vs looke to arme our selues with patience, and not enter into disputacion, although we come to the sayd extremitie. And why? For it is sayd that God handleth his chozē after that sort. Here is no speaking of those whom he intendeth to ouerthrowe and destroye, but of those whom he hath ordyned to saluation, whiche are in his hand, and whom he guideth. Euen those doeth he disigure in such wise, as a man would take them to be viterly forlorne. Seing it is so, let vs pray him, that although we become like deade me, yet he will kepe our life kēdē in his hād. And very needfull it is that he shuld do so. For although all men be not affilcted so roughly as Eliu speketh of here, and that God vsē not such rigor but where he listeth: yet notwithstanding generally it behoueth our life to be as it were a kind and shape of deathe as sainct Paule sayeth. And as we see Collo. 3. 4. 3. that in wynter tyme the trees haue nother floures nor leaues, nor any freshnesē in them, but their life is drawnen into them. Euen so must our life be hidden in the hand of God. And when we haue done him the honour to put him in trust with it, we shall find in the end, that he hath ben a good and faithfull keeper of it. And therfore if it please him to bring vs to such an afterdeale for a time, as we shall perceiue no token of his fauour, but shall seeme to be quite alienated from him: let vs tary his leyture, and mourne till he giue vs again the cherefulnesse that is spoken of here. Now after that Eliu hath treated of the afflictions which God sendeth to the faythfull, and shewed that they must first be cast downe before God set them vp: he addeth that when God intendeth to make them feele his goodness & fauour, he vseth his word towards them. Here yee see the meane wherby God quickneth those which be as it were alienated from him: that is to wit, he sendeth the such a messenger as is hardly to be found amongs a thousand, and he shal bring him a message of righteousnesse: [that is to wit] he bringeth him word that God iustifieth the sinner, and receiueth & accepteth him into his fauour. Ye see then after what sort we be restored when we haue bin as good as dead. And here is a goodly and excellē sentēce, to shew vs that when God sendeth vs tydings of his goodness, and that his promises are declared vnto vs: it is al one as if he reached vs his hand to drawe vs out of our graue. VVhat would we more? So then let vs marke well how it is sayd here, that a man shall gather new strength if he haue assuraunce of Gods goodness. And how so? For as I haue sayd already, our Lord hath giuen that propertie to his gospell, that by giuing eare to the promises that are conteyned in it, wee take comfort in him, and are assured that he calleth vs to him. Truely this is hard for men to do: For of all the battels that wee haue to fight agaynst the temptations of our flesh, the greatest battel is against vnbeleef: and specially when we feele any of Gods chastisements, then be wee as it were in darknesse, insomuch that our sorowe dimmeth our eyes, and although Gods promises be set afore vs, yet notwithstanding we cannot apply the to our vse, but there seemeth always to be somewhat betwixt vs and them, and that they belong not to vs. Lo in what pligt we be: and every of vs ought to feele it by his owne experience. Vndoubtedly Satan commeth to intermedle himself in that case. True it is that we will not denie Gods promises: but wee will stand as it were in a mammering and say, I haere well this promis, which is so goodly a one as it ought to cheere vp a whole world. But what for that? I linger still in vayne, bycause I perceyue not that the same ought to pertayne vnto mee. Somuch the more therfore ought we to marke well what is sayd here: namely that whē God sendeth vs a man which certifieth vs of his goodnes, it is al one as if he reached vs his hand and sayd vnto vs. Lo here I am, hitherto I haue affilcted you: and although the same hath bin with great rigor, yet haue I not done it as a iudge that intended to punish your misdeeds according as you deserued, but as a Phisition to heale you. True it is that you felt it not at the first, I was fayne to vse fearing, corzyng, serching of the bones, and other very violent remedies: but in the meane whyle I procured your helth by it: and therfore consider you of this my goodness. Thus yee see that whensoeuer God giueth vs the holy scripture into our hand, and wee find there any promis of his mercy, or if he send vs a man that is able to warrant vs the forgiuenesse of our sinnes: it behoueth vs to cōclude thus: howsoever the world go, my God will pitie mee, and indeede he sheweth it by lending me this record, and specially by this benefite, that the gospell is preached vnto vs. For wee knowe that the vse of preaching is to vnbind vs vpō the earth to the intent we should be vnbound in heauen. The chief end for which God will haue his word ministred vnto vs, is that forasmuchas we are hild prisoners vnder euerlastinge damnation: those that are ordeyned to bee ministers of Gods word, should vnbinde vs and release our sinnes, that is to say, warrant and beare witnesse vnto vs of it. VVe knowe it is the peculiar office of God to forgiue sinnes: It belongeth not to men: but our Lord Iesu Christ ment to expresse the power and workfulness that is in preaching, by saying that therethrough our sinnes are forgiuen vs, yea euen by mostall men. And that is the cause why sainct Paule sayeth expressly that the message which is committed vnto vs is the message 2. Co., of at-

of attonement or reconciliation. Then if we be in a Christiā church, and the gospell be preached there purely : let vs be sure that God hath committed the keeping of the keyes of the heauenly kingdome, vnto the men that do so beare abroade his word. And to what purpose? To the end to open vs the gate of saluation. Let vs assure our selues that he hath giuen them authoritie to breake our bands according as it was foretold by the Prophet Esay, that Iesus Christ should be sent to preache deliueraunce to poore prisoners. Hee hath not done this in his owne person only by accomplishing the sayd promis: but hee doeth it still also dayly by his ministers. True it is that Iesus Christ is the partie that hath let vs looce from the bondage of sin and everlasting damnation, wherin wee were by nature : But yet hath he committed the same charge to all shepherds of his churche. Yee see then that the thing which wee haue to beare in mynd when Eliu sheweth vs the meane wherby God restored those whom he had sent as it were vnto hell, and which were as good drowned : is that he sendeth them a messenger that is able to warrant them righteousnesse. And he speketh purposely of ryghteousesse, not bycause those which ought to comfort vs should vse flatteries to make vs beleue that wee be ryghteous, and preache vnto vs our owne vertues and merites: no: but the righteousesse which he speketh of here, is that God is made at one with vs. And how is that? Bycause he imputeth not our finnes any more vnto vs. Then are wee ryghtouse, not in our selues nor through our owne vertues, but bycause it pleasest God to forgive vs.

And it is a point which wee ought to marke well. For when the world sekereth ryghteousesse, it is by bringing menes owne deserts vnto God, and it imagineth that although they haue done amisse, yet they are able to make him some amends. Behold the common vse or rather abuse wherewith men deceyue themselues. For if they bee combered with any hartgref, by feeling the vengeance of God, they fall to considering with themselues, How now? Haue I not liued well? Haue I not serued God as I ought to do? And though I haue committed some fault: is there not some meanes to recompence it withall? Yes: And I haue done this and that. Behold I say how men would euer put some barre in Gods waye, to the end he should haue no vantage of them. Thus seke they their ryghteousesse in their owne merits. But when God intendeth to giue vs a ryghteousesse wherby wee may stand before him, he vseth a contrarie kind of speche, which is: that he admitteth vs and accepteth vs for ryghtouse, by couering our finnes. VVheron then shall our ryghteousesse rest? On the free mercy of our God, bycause that when he hath once scoured awaye our spots with the blood of his sonne, and discharged vs from death and damnation by the rausome which our Lord Iesus Christ paid vpon the crosse, he wypeth out our finnes, and layeth not our offences to our charge. Thus the ryghteousesse which is preached vnto vs by Gods messengers, is that we be iustified or accepted for ryghtouse.

And it is not without cause that the holy scripture vseth continually the word iustifie. It might well be sayd that wee find fauour or grace when God pardoneth vs, according also as it is often sayd so: but the holy Ghost thought it not ynough to vse such words. And why? For so long as wee bee sinners, God must needs hate vs: wee knowe that he is the weispring of ryghteousesse, and there is no agreement betweene him and vnyrighteousesse. Therfore so long as we be sinners, wee be lothly in Gods sight, and he must needs reiect vs: and (to be short) we haue no enterauice vnto God, til wee be iust and righteouse. Now then, how become we righteouse? It is bycause God regardeth not our finnes, but burieth them and hydeth them, and clerseth vs from them. So then our finnes are wiped out in the death and passion of our Lord Iesus Christ, insomuch that we be taken for ryghteouse, and God finideth no more fault with vs, whē he accepteth vs after that sort for his sonnes sake. This is the ryghteousesse that is spoken of in this strayne. Furthermore, wheras it is sayd exprestly, that the messenger which recomforteth vs, is one among a thousand: It is to make vs set the more store by the benefite, wheroft wee seldome make accōut: that is to wit, of the meane of our attonement or reconciliation. Then is it declared, that the same is no base nor common thing. It cannot at all tymes be stumbled vpon that we shoule have a man sent of God to warrant our saluacion, or to be the meane of our attonement with him: and therfore it is no such thing that we shoule cast it vnder our feete. And that is the cause, why the Prophet Esay sayeth: how beatiful are the fecte of them that bring glad tydings of peace! Now by the feete the Prophet meeneth their comming and presence, as if he shoule say, if the world knewe what a benefite it is when God declareth his mercy vnto it, it wold loue and esteeme those that preache the gospell, and it wold acknowledge that God hath committed such a treasure vnto them, as surmounteth all the goods that wee can wish. Sainct Paul also alledging the same text, applieth it to shewe that the preaching of the gospell is a singular gift of God. Then let vs not thinke that the same commitheth of men: but let vs be fully assured and resolued, that God seeketh vs when his gospell is preached vnto vs. God must be the builder therof, such goodnessē must procede from him: and therfore if wee father it vpon men, it is to great an vnkindenesse. VVherefore let vs beware that wee deface not the goodnessē of God: and when the churche is in such order that we haue preaching and all other things: let vs assure our selues, that it is all one, as if God came to seeke vs, to bring vs to salvation.

And therewithall let vs knowe, that he graunteth not that grace and priuiledge to all men. In good sooth there are countreyes which we esteeme, and also (to the world warde) are to be more esteemed than we: which yet notwithstanding haue not the message of saluation. Let a man go through the whole world, let him serch all nacions, yea euen those which haue bin most excellent in times past, let them go seke in Grece where all sciences of the world were inclosed, as it seemed: let him go into Italie, into Fraunce which now is in some estimacion, or let him go into Spaine: And what shall he find, but vtter desolation? For there, not only those which ought to be the messengers of saluation are vtterly dumme, but (which worse is) yee shall heare mastie dogges barking out blasphemies against God, and yee shall see wretched soules led to destruction, and the diuell hunting euery where after his pray. For vndoubtedly looke how manye preachers go vp into their pulpits, so manye dogges are there too hunt and ferche in the game, and to bring it into Satans toyles, that the wretched soules may go too damnation. But here wee haue Gods promises preached vnto vs, to leade vs to saluation. Therfore wee see it is not without cause sayd, that a faythfull messenger of Gods grace, is an odde man among a thousand, and so rare a benefit, as wee ought too esteeme hyglily. Howbeit this is not sayd too make vs esteeme the persons, but to make vs too receiue the benefit which is ministered vnto vs by them with the greater reuerence, that that is to say to make vs receiue the grace of God, forso-muchas it pleaseth him to draw vs to him, and to iustifie vs of his fatherly loue, shewing vs that although we bee wretched and miserable, and that there bee nothing in vs but death and damnacion, yet he will not leaue vs there, but deliuers vs by the meane of our Lord Iesus Christ.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, praying him so to make vs feele our faults, as wee may mortifie all our lusts more and more, and bee withdrawne from the corruptiōs of this world, and from our selues, to seke vnto him: and that forasmuch as in this mortal life we be subiect to much wretchednesse and misery: It may please him to reache vs his hand from aboue to deliuers vs from them, after he hath once taken vs from the gulf of death. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only too vs, but also to all people and nations &c.

The cxxvj. Sermon, which is the fifth vpon the. xxxij. Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the xxij. xxvij. xxv. verses, and then vpon that whicb is added here.

29. Hes hal pray God, and appease him, and behold his face in triumphe, and a mannes righteousnelle shal be restored vnto him.

E sawe yesterday that whē God afflieteth vs, he procureth our saluation by that meanes, although it seeme not so to vs. True it is that the wicked shall bee afflieted too: howbeit it doeth but make them hardehaerted and chafe against god: and so little fare they the better by their affliction, that it doeth the more bewray their wickednesse, and bring the to the full measure of it. But when God afflieteth his chosen, he ouermaystreh and mortifieth them in such wise, as they tremble before his maiestie, and become vtterly dismayed and like men half dead, insomuch that there is no more hope of life in them in respect of them-selues and to the worldward: and finally, there remaineth nothing for them but that God should haue pitie of the. And Eliu setteth out the meane wherby God maketh his chastizements auayable towards the faythfull: that is to wit, by comforting them through his goodnesse, and by telling them that he is redie to forgiue their sinnes. For al- though afflictions be for our profit, and serue vs for me- dicines and salues, as was shewed yesterday: yet notwithstanding it appereth not so, but by the end. Now the end is shewed vs here: which is that God reacheth vs his had, assuring vs that he will be mercisull to vs how soever the world go, notwithstanding that he haue handled vs roughly. Then let vs marke wel, that the life of our soules consi- steth in the woord of God, wherby he giueth vs assurance of his mercie and goodnesse towards vs. And to the intent we should esteeme this benefite as it deserueth: it is sayd that he which is the warranter of the remission of our sinnes, is as an odde man among a thousand, so as he is not to be found at aduenture, but is a treasure which God re-serueth to those whom he thinketh good. Besides this, I haue told you that God in promising men the forgiuenesse of their sinnes, giueth charge and commission too the ministers of his word, to drawe them from death, ac- cording as it is expressly said, that the keyes of the king- dome of heauen are committed to those with preach the gospel. Too what end? To forgiue sinnes: not of their owne authoritie, but to the intent that the wretched sin- ners may be the better assured of their saluation, and not doute but God receiueth them to mercie. Therfore the ministers tell them in his name, that they be quit before his judgement seate. And this is the cause why it is ex- pressly sayd, that God will haue mercy of a man when he sendeth him a good and fauiful teacher, and giueth his appointed ministers the sayd charge and office of res- cuing and deliuering the wretched creature that was in 20 way of damnation. Howbeit too the end that all these things may bee the better vnderstoode: here are three points to be marked. The one is that Eliu sheweth vs the cause and soundacion of the forgiuenesse of our sinnes: namely that God is mercifull vnto vs, and of his infinite goodnes wil not haue vs to perish. That is one point. The second is, that the office of such as preache the gospell, is to drawe wretched soules out of death, and to set them at libertie. And the third is, that the same is not done, but by expresse commission giuen of God: according also as it belongeth not to a mortal man too take vpon him so hygh a thing, which is aboue our abilitie. Then as touch- ing the first point, we see that the holy ghost bringeth vs here to the welspring of the grace which wee obteyne of God. VVhē he forgiueth vs our sinnes, why is it? Not for that we are worthy of it: not for that we are able too bee before hand with him: not for that we bring any thing that ought to procure his fauour towards vs: but because he looketh vpon vs with mercy. To be short, the holy ghost fathereth the remission of our sinnes vpon the only free goodnesse of God, for wee be so wretched as there is nothing but damnation in vs. Behold, it pleaseth God to succour vs, and he doeth it not for any thing that he findeth in vs, saue only infinite miseries: but of his owne goodnesse which moueth him therunto. This then is a point which we ought to marke well, to the end that when we come to obteyne forgiuenesse at Gods hand, we may not imagin to appeaze him with our owne me- rits, nor to be particaulers of the remission of our sinnes: but looke vpon that which is told vs here: that is to wit, that when God will haue pitie of vs, he receiueth vs to mercie out of hand. And so Eliu ment to aduertize vs, that God doeth not always make vs to feele that goodnesse: but that although he loue vs, and bee minded to prouide for the things which he knoweth to be profit- able for vs, yet doeth he not always giue vs that feeling, but hydeth it vtterly from vs: as when God afflieteth vs, it is sayd that he turneth his back to vs, or else that he voutsafeth not to looke vpon vs, ore else that his coun- tenance is louring towards vs, and that wee be not able to behold it. Then let vs marke well, that the faythfull shal now and then be dismayed, and seke God, and not be able to find him: not that he hath forgotten them, or re- jected them, but because he will not as then make them to feele his loue. And that is the cause whē Eliu sayeth expressly that God is mercifull to vs when he sendeth vs witnessse of the forgiuenesse of our sinnes by his word: not that he was not so before, but because wee are then sure of it by experience, and do as it were take possession of his

of his goodnes which was vnknowne vnto vs for a time. The second point was, that the office of such as preache the gospel, is to forgiue sinnes. And it is a notable point: For without that, we were vtterly forlorne: and past recouery. There is none other meane to giue vs hope of saluation, than by assuring vs that our sinnes are forgiuen afore God, and wee quite and cleane discharged: For (as it hath bene sayd) that is the ryghteousnesse wherby we are acceptable vnto him. Solong as our sinnes are imputed vnto vs, God must needes hate vs: and what else is the being of Gods wrath vpon vs, but a bottomlesse gulf of all cursednesse? Againe, when wee be reconcyled vnto him, the gate of paradise is opened vnto vs, he acknowledgeth vs for his children, and the heritage of heaven is already prepared for vs. And how may that be obteyned? By hauing good and faithfull teachers too preache the gospel vnto vs. For the end wherat God ameth, is attonement or reconciliation with vs, according

1. Co. 5. d. 18. as Sainct Paule declareth, where he expresteth that the propertie of the gospel is, to be a message of attonement betweene God and man: which is, that Iesus Christ who knewe no sinne, but was the vnspotted lambe, did put himself vnder the curse of our sinnes, to the end that wee should find the ryghteousnesse of God in him, that is to say, after wee are washed in his bloud, and haue put ourselues vnder the sacrifice which he hath offered, wee bee taken and reputed for righteouse, bycause the sayd sacrifice had the power to put away all faults and offences. Lo what it behoueth vs to marke in this place. Therfore whensoeuer we reade the holy scripture, or come too a sermon, when any promis of Gods goodnesse is set afore vs: let vs assure our selues that then God warranteth his loue towards vs, to the end we shold be deliuered from death wherin we were plunged. And altho wee heare but a mortall ma, and that his voice be but a sound which disperseth and vanisheth in the aire: yet must we beleue, that God will worke in such wise by his power, that the sayd doctrine shall bee sufficient to deliuere vs from the damnation wherin we are, and from the bondage of sin,

Matb. 16. 6. so as we shall passe out of the bonds of Satan, and bee set clere before God, and this saying (namely whatsoeuer 19. &c. 18. c. you lose in earth shal be losed also in heauē) cannot fayle vs. And so wee see of what importaunce this word is 18.

1eb. 20. e. 23. where it is sayd deliuer the sinner or set the sinner free: For when God giueth expresse charge to such as speke vnto vs, to drawe vs out of the gulf of death, that wee myght enter into paradise, it is all one as if his voyce sounded from heuen. And in very dede sainct Iames speaking of

Iam. 5. d. 20. priuate persons, sayth that he which warneth his brother, shal saue a soule that was lost. If this take place in al those that bring men into the good waye when they were out of it: what shall it do seing wee haue the speciall seale which our Lord Iesus Christ hath giuen to his word, at such tyme as the same is preached to vs by the sheperds of his churche: that is to wit, that their office is to release and forgiue sinnes, (as I haue alledged already out of Sainct Iohn,) and to bynd and vnbynd (as I haue alledged out of sainct Mathew.) To be shourt, we see what the power of the gospel is, when wee receyue the promises of it by faith: namely that it is as much as if god shuld reache vs his hand from heauē, to pull vs out of the dungeons of deathe. And herewithall let vs marke for the third point, that this is not done, but by Gods ordinance: and it serueth for a difference betweene the gospel, and the blasphemies of the Pope. For the Pope vpholdeth, that he & his Chaplens haue the keyes of the kingdome of heauen, and the office of forgiuing. But what commission can they shewe for it? For they, iye the forgiuenesse of sinnes to shrift. And where did God euer tell men, that it behoueth men to shrieue them of all their secretes in the care of a mortall man, to obteyne mercie? God declareth, that if the sinner signe for his sinnes, he Ezech 18. e. 21. will be mercifull to him. But behold a mortall creature presumeth to make a lawe, and to shet men out of Paradise if they obserue it not. Is not that a notorious usurping of Gods power? Besides this, the Pope hath his Bulles, indulgences, pardons, and such other things, 20 ground the forgiuenesse of sinnes vpon: and therewithall he mingleth the bloud of martyres, as he that meaneth expressly to deface the vertue of the deathe and passion of our Lord Iesus Christ. And yet notwithstanding, in the meane whyle he hath no promis of the gospel, he hath nothing but toyes, ceremonies, sorceries, greate crosses vpon the backe, and such other trash which in conclusion are nothing but Satans gewgawes. But contrariwise it is sayd, that there can be no forgiuenesse of sinnes without Gods message, that is too say without preaching and doctryne. When the Pope forgiueth sinnes, he is dumme, he bringeth not one iote of Gods word, nother hath he any thing but charmes and sorceries as is sayd afore. Moreouer he layeth tyrannous lawes vpō mennes necks, to ouerthrowe the meane which our Lord hath ordyned: agin he abridgeth God himself of his libertie, and there is no let in him to disappoint God that he shold not receyue sinners to mercye. Ye see then that the popishe churche is the diuels synagoge, destitute of the forgiuenesse of sinnes, and consequently damned, so long as it holdeth it self to the tradicions of Antechrist: For it is impossible that it shold be reconciled vnto God. But on the contrary parte, wee say that mennes sinnes are forgiuen them by receyuing the message of the gospel, and that the same hath not to do with the ceremonies that men haue devised, nor with the lawes which they haue inuented at their owne pleasure, but only that we must followe the order and rule whiche our Lord Iesus hath stablished, who hath the remission of sinnes in his hand. He hath giuen vs a meane 40 wherby he will have it done: which is, the preaching of his gospel, and the receyuing of it with assured fayth. Therfore if we sticke to that simplicitie, we may be sure that the comission commeth from aboue, and that men take not ne vsurpe not any thing vpon them of their owne brayne. Thus ye see what we haue to marke vpon the word where it is sayd, that God will pitie him and deliuer him. Then must every whit of it come from aboue, and none but God only must woorke in this behalf by his free goodnesse, according also as he himself protesteth by his Prophet Esay saying, I am hee, I my self am he which wipeth out thine iniquities O Ilsaell. Then must such a benefite needs procede from him: For it is not in any creature to giue it vnto vs. Now wee see what substāce there is in this text, so it be wel vnderstood. And immediatly after it is sayd, to the end that his soule should not enter into the pit. VVee haue seene already heretofore, that the wretched sinners are neere to the graue, and that they are as good as deade and consumed, so long as God pursueth them with rigor. But now Eliu addeth, that 60 God preuenteth that mischeef by sending the said mesage of the release of our sinnes, so as wee fall not into the graue, that is to say, we perishe not. For the case here standeth not only vpon temporall death, but vpon damnation: wherin we shold be vtterly ouerwhelmed if God did not preuent it, and preserue vs of his infinite goodness. The let vs marke, that whyle we be afflicted, wee be couered with the darknesse of death, and it seemeth to vs that there is no getting out of it: but yet notwithstanding, euen in that time God lossteyneth vs as it were in couert : and although wee perceyue not that wee rest vpon him, yet notwithstanding he sheweth vs that fauour. For without our knowledge, it behoueth God to worke in that behalf, although wee cannot conceyue it. And vndoubtedly when wee begin too take hold of his goodness by fayth, we must not lay the first point of our saluation there : but wee must mount vp hygher : namely that he chose vs before wee were borne, and that frō thenceforth he continueth his goodness always towards vs. So then let vs marke, that God of his owne goodness chose vs after a secret maner incomprehensible to our naturall understanding. Agayne when it pleaseth him to manifest his goodness vnto vs, (which thing he doeth when his gospel is preached vnto vs) he sheweth vs that he is willing to haue vs deliuered from the graue. Therfore we perceiue our deliueraunce and saluation when we tast of the promises of his gospel : not that it is done throughly at the first, but God giueth vs some small taste of it, confirming the same more and more in vs, vntill we see the gate of Paradise wyde open, and that we be deliuered frō the graue Lo what we haue to marke vpon this saying. Furthe more when Eliu sayeth that God bath found reconciliation : let vs marke that he intendeth here to expresse yet better, the thing that he touched euen now. VVhich is, that we must fater the attonement which God maketh with vs, vpon Gods owne free goodness, and that it is hee which worketh, yea euen before we could haue any thought or mynd to come vnto him. For he must be fayne to seeke vs when we be gone astray 30 and haue forgotten him, according to the saying of the Prophet Esay. True it is that we are often commaunded to seeke God, and to turne vnto him when we haue offendid. But what for that? It canoēt be done except he teach vs inwardly and touche vs so to the quicke, as we may be inforced to mislyke of our sinnes. Againe who is he that giueth vs any hope, or that causeth vs to runne vnto God for refuge? Isit not he himself, by inlyghtening vs with faith? So then it is not without cause that Eliu addeth, that God found reconciliation. And whilē? For when he afflieth vs, he prepareth vs aforschand to receyue the grace that he intendeith to giue vs. For so long as we bee puffed vp with prude, Gods goodness hath no entrance into vs: So long as we be hardned in our sinnes, we beate back the sayd grace a greate way from vs: And so long as we be saped in our fithinessse, surely we cannot tast of the reconciliation which is made by our Lord Iesus Christ. Therfore God must be fayne to worke here, & the work must be altogether his. And how worketh hee? First by bringing vs to the knowledge of our sinnes by the hartbyting which he giueth vs, according as it hath bin sayd heretofore, that he sendeth vs inward feare, as if he souđed a trumpet to summon vs to his judgement. Ye see the that God calleth vs home to him by secret inspiracions, when he seeth vs gone astray and distraught. And besides this, he appointeth men to warne vs, and to reproue vs. And surely that is another greate benefite, when we haue good and faythfull teachers that shewe vs our sinnes to the quicke, and threaten vs with everlasting damnation. Furthermore if this suffize not, (as we see that wee are dull vpon the spur, and God had neede to kick & prick vs more roughly) he addeth the corrections of his hand, and afflieth vs. And here ye see how wee must profit ourselues by corrections, to the end we be not like stithes to beat back the strokes. Neuerthelesse it is only Gods working, who to bring that to passe, giueth vs harts of flesh, and softnes: the hardnessse that is in our cursed nature. VVell the, hath God made his corrections to take place. Then is it.

Epb.1.2.4.

hyghe tyme for him to manifest his mercye vntoo vs, and to make vs to tast it. So then we see well that it is he which findeth reconciliation, and that we on our side can do nothing afore hand, but rather wee still drawe back from him. VVhen God teacheth vs, in what plyght bee wee? And if he let vs alone, are wee not as it were drunken in our lustes without thinking vpon him at all? And although he send vs good warnings, and that we be conuictid of our euill: yet notwithstanding we labour still to burie it, to the intent it should not bee scene at all. Othersome grind their teethe and chafe when God sheweth them their sinnes, and they can so little abyde it, as they do nothing else but byte and kick. Othersome become as it were utterly senselesse, and there is such a dulnesse in them, as there followeth no amendment for all that euer a man can say: and therfore it behoueth God to worke in that behalf. And againe when hee shall haue afflicted vs to the vttermoste, yet shall there not be a ryght obedientnesse in vs: yea and when we bee euen confounded, we shall be still like wretched mad men, according as we see it happened to Cayn and Iudas. Lo in whatplyght wee should bee if God wrought not in vs, And therfore if wee haue not this message of saluation, what shall become of vs? Although wee were throughly tamed, and did nothing else but sighe and grone: yet notwithstanding al would turne but to despaire in vs. So the, it behoueth vs that the acceptable tyme come vnto vs, according as it is sayd in another place of Esay, behold the Esa.49.6.8 acceptable tyme, behold the dayes of saluation. And why doeth he terme the time of saluation an acceptable time? Because God hath chozē it of his owne mere goodness. And that is the cause also why it is said in another place of Esay, Comfort ye, Comfort yee my people, shall the Esa.40.1.8 Lord say. Thus is it his doing to comfort vs in our afflictions, or else we should be swallowed vp with sorowe. And therfore he addeth, that he repenteith him at the hart, that he had scourged his people, and telleth them that the tyme of comfort is come. Herin we see a more certayne declaration of the thing which is touched breifly here, which is, that it is Gods peculiar office to find reconciliation. Neuerthelesse Gods wil is to do it by his misters. And so, as oft as the promises of the gospel are offered vnto vs, wherin God calleth vs to him, and sheweth himselfe favorable for our Lord Iesus Christs sake, giuing vs the grace to tast of that goodness, and assuring vs that he is ready to receyue vs to mercye: let vs assure ourselues that then is the conuenient time which he hath appointed for our saluation: Then let vs humble ourselues, and be sure that we haue not preuented him, but that he hath sought vs. And therewithall let not vs be behind hand vpon such occasion. According as saint Paule in alledging the said text of Esay which I haue touched, sheweth vs that we must bee ready to come when our Lord calleth vs, and that wee must not driue off from day to day when reconciliation is found out and offered vnto vs. And herevpo Eliu concludeth, that a man being so comforted by the message that God sendeth him, becommeth yong agayne and is restored, and his fylste becommeth as fresh as a yong cbyldes. VVherin he sheweth the true meane of conforting vs. VVhich is not to forget God, and to seeke sond vanities to sorte our selues withall: but to bee certified of Gods goodness. And it is an article which we ought to marke well. VVee see after what sort men labour too comfort themselues: namely, by forgetting God: For it seemeth to them to be a melancolik matter to think vpon him. And in good sooth, how many are there which will say stoutly ynough, that they be Christians, and yet notwithstanding when they intend to be to be mery, they dryue away al thought of God and of eternal life: and not only so, but also offend God of set purpose. And why? For they cannot be mery, but in doing euill. Seing then that the nature of men is such, and that we be atteynted with that disease: let vs looke well to our selues, and be sure that our mirth shall not be blis-sed from aboue, except we be assured of the remission of our sinnes. Therfore if we haue Gods fauour so as wee can call vpō him, as Eliu will byandby adde: therin cōfisteth our tru: gladnesse which is allowed of God, & is lasting, and will bring vs to saluatō. But so long as we know not in what case we are with our good God, ne seeke to bereconcyled vnto him, but lie rou:ing stil in our own filthinesse: the more we desire to be mery, the more wee kindle Gods vengeance against vs, the more we increase still the fire of his wrath, and wee plunge our selues the deeper into the bottomlesse pits. Yee see then how it is more than needfull that it shuld be shewed vs how much it stideth vs in hand to be wel assured of Gods mercifulnesse towards vs. And that also is the cause why the holy scripture (when it treateth of giuing joy and comfort vnto vs, doeth alwayes set before vs the fauour of God, saying: Behold, your God is mercifull to you, and therfore he glad. Behold, your redemer seketh to ioyne you and knit you to God his father, and therfore be ye glad, be ye quiet, and be yee at rest in your consciences. Herby wee are admonished that we must needs be in trouble and vnuquietnesse, so long as we knowe not in what case we bee with God. True it is that the wicked will seke meanes ynough to make them selues mery: and in good fayth, 30 they ruffle it out (as you see) in despizing God: but howsoeuer the world go, yet doeth God send them such prickings and torments of mynd, as they be sore distressed, and if they daunce, it is after the fashion that is spokē of in Moyses: namely, that yet neuerthelesse sin is at their dore, and there wayteth for them like a dog that wayteth for his maister. Ye see then that the wicked may ruffle it out, but yet can they not go out of their dores without gnawing of their conscience, and God must stil hold them at that bay. Therfore somuch the more ought wee

40 to think vpon this doctrine, that is to wit, that wee turne not our backe vnto God, ne bury not our sinnes whē we would haue peace: but that we alwayes haue some pro-mis of God to comfort vs. And when wee see that God allureth vs to saluation, let vs be glad of that: For the shal our gladness be blessed. And if wee haue the taiste that God is our father, it will sanctifie all our joyes: but without that, we must needs quayle, and there is no way for vs to reioyce. Marke that for one point. And for the second, we haue also to marke, that the only grace of God ought to suffize vs though we haue neuer so many sor-owes mingled with it, according as God will excercise vs. For he will not send vs full ioye, so as we myght laugh with open mouth as they say. Yet notwithstanding it behoueth vs to be contented with this certeyntie that wee haue him to our father, and that we shall find mercy with him. Then if we haue this priuiledge of abilitie to call vpon our God, and can assure our selues that the gate is open to vs, and that we shall haue good accesse vnto him in the name of our Lord Iesus Christ: I say, if we cā haue that boldnesse (not through our owne rashnesse, but for that he hath voutsafed to open his holy mouth to wit-nesse his loue vnto vs (which thing he doeth when his gospell is published), let vs assure our selues that we must rest wholly therupon, and though we haue neuer so many sorowes and incombraunces. Yea and it behoueth vs to passee further, and to surmount them all, and to reioyce in our miseries and tribulations: seing that Gods loue is printed in our harts by his holy spirit: that is to wit, seing that God voutsafeth to be our father and sauour, and hath shewed the same not only by his word, but also in very dede in the person of his only Sonne whom he hath not spared but giuen too the death for vs. Thus yee see what we haue to marke where it is sayd that a man shall gather new strength, and be restored againe, and that his flesh shal become as fresh as a yong child. For it serueth to shewe, that although wee seele many miseries in this world (as it is certayne that we must haue many aduersities in passing through this transitory life:) yet notwithstanding we shall not cease to haue a ioye that shall ouer-come and get the victory of all things, if our Lord con-fourt vs in his goodnesse. And this is it which Saint Paule Pbil. 4.b.7. meeneth when he sayeth, that the peace which passeth all mans vnderstanding shall get the vpper hand in our harts. VVhen he speaketh of this peace of God, he mee- neth the gladnesse which is giue vs through the remissiō passeth al mans vnderstanding. And afterward he addeth, that the same getteth the vpper hand or victory in our

shall haue many troubles and greefes, yea and be in daun- the sayd peace of God getteth the vpper had, and maketh vs conquerers in fighting. And vndoubtedly syth wee see cording as it is said in the fourth Psalme, that al the welth of the world cannot make them so glad which are fleshly, howbeit if God make his countenaunce to shyne vpon

ken so he addeth immediatly that a man shall pray vntoo God and appease him, or finde him favorable. Behold here yet one point more which importeth very much: For without this calling vpō the name of God, we know not rightly the frute of the ioy that is spoken of here. For wherin consisteth all our welfare? Euen in that wee may in his lappe when wee be afflieted, so as wee knowe that he will be mercifull to vs as he hath promised. This (say I) is the souereyne welfare of men, so long as they liue in this world. For vndoubtedly prayer is the thing wherby we come vnto god. It behoueth vs to walke herē by faith, 1. Co. 5.b.7

Ye see then that here is a band of familiarity betweene
God and men, in this libertie which he giueth vs to call to the end wee may come boldly before the throne of God to pray vnto him. Ye see then how it is shewed vs here, that when a man is so comforted by the promises of the gospell, by and by he calleth vpon God, & findeth fauour at his hand. And so let vs marke first of all, that all the prayers which men make without the tast of Gods goodnesse, are but dissimulation, yea and starke abomination.

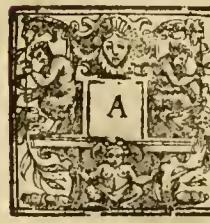

True it is that wee cannot be so sure of it as were requisite, and although we pray vnto God, yet haue wee not a perfect faith : but yet if we haue not this full purpose in vs to go vnto God as to our father, because he calleth vs and we be grounded vpon his promises, we do but dishonour his name with our praying, and all our prayers shal be turned vnto sinne. And hereby a man may see how cursed and wretched the state of the Papists is : And wee ought well to thinke vpon it, to the end we may bee sory for their destruction, and magnifie Gods goodnesse so much the more, in that it hath pleased him to drawe vs out of such a dungeon. The Papists thinke they pray to God deuoutly ynough : yea, but in the meane whyle they hold this for a principle, that a man must alwayes doubt of Gods fauour: yea and they haue no trust at all of Gods promises, but go to it at all aduenture. And that is the cause why they make so many windlasses, seke so many patrones and aduocates, and devise so many meanes to go vnto God. For they do him not the honour to submit themselves to his word, and to trust fully to it. So then ye see that the Papists are alwayes in doubt, yea and they will needs be in doubt : by meanes whereof they are so farre off from the priuiledge of calling vpon God to be herd at his hand, that they are rather continually beaten backe. For as saint Iames sayeth, if a man come doubting too require any thing of God, he must never think to obteyne ought. And why? For our prayers must be grounded vpon Gods word. And therfore wee see, that it is not without cause that Eliu sayeth here, that the man which is so comforted will pray vnto God. But now let vs marke that we can never be disposed to pray, vntill we knowe that God calleth vs. There is one generall reason which it behoueth vs to hold, according to that which is sayd in the Prophet. I will say, you are my people, and you shall answe mee : thou art our God. God must begin and thunder vnto vs if we will be sure of our salvation : there shall be no good melody, except God haue first thundered into vs, that is to say except he haue giuen vs boldnesse by his promis to answe vntoo him as to our God. And therfore as oft as we pray, let vs begin at the promises which are conteyned in the holy scripture, and consider that God calleth vs to him, that he promiseth to heare vs, and that we may boldly go vntoo him. Yea, but yet let vs not ceasse in the meane whyle to walke in feare, but let vs consider that we come to present our selues before the maiestie of our God : let that (say I) leade vs to humilitie and reverencie, according as it is sayd in the text which I haue alledged out of the fiftie Psalme, namely, Lord I will enter into thy temple Ps. 5. b. 8. and worship in feare. So then let vs consider the maiestie of God, that wee may bee afayde and stoupe and submit ourselues with all lowlinesse : and yet notwithstanding let vs not cease to take courage continually, and to become bold. And why? Because it hath pleased our good God too call vs vntoo him, and too promise vs that our comming too him shall not bee in vayne. Yee see then how wee haue too marke, that although wee haue conceiued an assurednesse of Gods good will, and do fully beleue that he wil receyue vs: Yet notwithstanding wee must not ceasse too humble our selues too him with all lowlinesse, knowing that wee shall alwayes find him a pitifull and mercifull father towards vs, if in seeking him wee hold the ryght may as he sheweth it vs.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him so to put them away, as wee may not doubt, but that he will accept vs as ryghteouse for our Lord Iesus Christes sake : and to graunte vs the grace that our comming to present ourselues vnto him, may be, not only to be discharged of the burthen of our sinnes, but also to be so clesned, as he may dwell in vs, and so governe vs by his holy spirit, that wee may walke in all obedience too his lawe and to his holy commandements which he hath giuen vs. And so let vs say, Almighty God our heauenly father, we acknowledge and confess according too the truthe, that wee bee not woorthy too lyfte vp our eyes too heauen, too present our selues before thee, nor too presume so farre as that our prayers should be, &c.

The cxxvij. Sermon, which is the sixth vpon the. xxxij. Chapter.

26. He shall pray vnto God vvhho vvil be fauorable to him : he shall see his face vvhith ioy, and he vvil render (or returne) a man his righteousnesse.
27. He vvil looke to vwards men, and say, I haue sinned : I haue turned avvay from goodness, and it hath not profitid mee.
28. He hath redemed my soule, to the end it shoulde not go dovvne into the graue: and my life to the end it shoulde see light.

According to that which was declared yesterday, here Eliu sheweth vs that when men are reconciled vnto God, they may call vpon him with a quiet and stedfast cōscience. And it is the true frute of faith to haue such a quietnesse as we may be sure that God loueth vs, and flee to him for refuge. For without that, wee were in cursed case. And vndoubtedly althoough we had all the goods of the world, we shoulde not be sure to inioy them one minute of an howre, except

God maynteyned vs in the possession of them. Moreover let vs put the case that a man myght continue in ease and pleasure all the tyme of his lyfe. Yet should all Gods benefites turne to his destruction and damnation, vnlesse hee vsed them purely, and were sure of the sayd fatherly loue of God. VVee see then that if wee cannot call vpon God with such certeinty that he will heare vs, and accept our prayers : it is pitie of our life. Somuch the more then behoueth it vs, to marke well the order, that is shewed here by the holy ghost: which is, that when God shall haue certified vs of his

goodnesse towards vs, we knowing that therin he will be favorable to vs, & pardon our sinnes, may seeke vnto him and boldly present our selues before him. And that is the cause why it is added in the text, that God will shew him his face, and that his righteousness shall returne vnto him by that meane: or else that a man shall see the face of God. But wee must not greatly stand vpon the words, seing that the meening is evident. Therfore it is all one as if it were sayd, that so long as men are accused in their owne conscience, they cannot think vpon God but with al terroure, so as they could find in their harts never to perceiue any thing of him, nor that any man shuld speake to them of him, nor that they might haue any inckling of him. And out of doubt we see that so long as sinners are asleepe in their euill, they desire nothing so much as to forget God. And if any mention be made of him: it is an intollerable torment to them, as if an offender were brought before his judge. Yee see that as long as wretched creatures are buried in their sinnes, they cannot thinke vpon God but to their greate greef. But when we haue assurance of the forgiuenesse of our sinnes: then we come boldy to God, we are glad to think vpon him, wee are willing to heare of him, yea and it reioyceth vs to behold his face. And this is it which Sainct Paule meeneth by saying, that we finde peace to Godward when we be iustified by fayth. Also by that saying he meeneth that the wicked haue no rest, but when they be fallen asleepe, or rather dulled in such wise, as they thinkē not vpon God. Thus yee see how the heathenishe sort and such as seke to feede them selues in their vices, do labour to forget God, and settle 30 themselues therupon: But when God bringeth them to their remembraunce, then they wake, yea euen too their sorowe.

Contrariwise, if we be certified that God receiueth vs to mercy (wherof fayth is a good and sure warrant) wee go boldly vnto him, and haue peace with him, and the neerer that we come to his maiestie, the more trust haue we of our saluation, forasmuch as he desirith nothing, but too bee our father, according as he hath shewed in deede. And the matter which was treated of yesterday, is confirmed yet once againe in that it is sayd, that righteousness shall be restored vnto a man. Eliu had sayd heretofore that if a wretched creature be in trouble, so as he feele Gods wrathe and vengeance, there is no way to comfort him; and specially to restore him to life, except the gospel be preached, and that God send him some man to tel him his word purely, wherby the wretched sinner, that was ouerwhelmed, may knowe that the gate of paradise was opened vnto him. In discoursing herevpon, Eliu sayd that the preacher of the gospel shoulde declare to him that was so afflicted, his righteousness. And what is that righteousness? I haue declared already, how it is not that men are righteous in themselues, or that they are able to stand before God: but that this righteousness is, that God burieth their faults and imputeth them not vnto them, but clenseth them of his owne free goodnesse. For the blood of Iesus Christ is the spiriteall washing of our soules, namely when they be watered by the holy Ghost as sainct Peter sayeth. And there yee see also the understanding of this text, that a mans righteousness shall be restored vnto him or returne to him againe. For so long as God pursueth vs as a iudge, and summoneth vs to yeld vp our account: we be ouerwhelmed by outrisnes; and there needeth no other processe: nor witnesse agaynst vs. But whē God calleth vs to himself, and sheweth vs that there is good remedie for vs to be discharged of the bond of death, wherin we are bound: (which remedy is to put our whole trust in the death and passion of our Lord Iesus Christ, and to receive and imbrace the promises of salvation which he giueth vs) that is the returning of our righteousness vnto vs, which had bin erst alienated frō vs, and wherof we had bin vtterly bereft. So then let vs learne, not to nurrisch our sinnes in our boosome any more. For we shall gayne nothing by laying playsters vpon our sores to hyde them: the rottenesse of them will increase the more, and we must needs drop asunder in the end, and be altogether infected. Then is it not for vs to flatter ourselues and to seke wayne startingholes, but we must come right foorth vnto God, and suffer our selues to be reproved by him. And when wee feele any remorse of conscience, let vs receive it humbly and besory for our misdoings. If we haue profited little by the warnings that God hath sent vs: at leastwise let vs not be past amendment when he chastizeth vs. And when we be beaten with his roddes: let vs be so calldowne in ourselues, as we may seke nothing but his mere mercy, considering that we are vtterly vndone if he helpe vs not. Ye see then how it behoueth vs to deale. And by that meanes let vs not doubt, but that our righteousness shall be restored vnto vs, according as it is sayd by the Prophet Esay, that Esa.1.18. when we bee imbruied with the blood of our sinnes, insomuch that the stayne of it is soaked into vs, God will make vs as whyte as snowe, if we returne vnto him with a pure hart. But let vs not thinke herevpon, that God pardoneth our sinnes to let vs fall asleepe in them: but to the end wee should seeke to him, and make the priuilege which is giuen vs ayaynable, that is to wit, be bold to call vpon him as our father, and assure our selues, that he will haire vs. Eliu having spoken so, addereth: he wil looke towards men and say I haue sinned, I haue turned away from goodness, and it hath not booted me; be bath deliuered my soule from the pit: This text is expounded by some men as though Eliu speake of God, saying that it is he that looketh so towards men, and that if any man say I haue done amisse, then wheras he had bene in the darkenesse of death, God deliuereth his soule from the pit, and restoreth to him the light of life. Howbeit forasmuch as word for word it is set downe thus, he wil looke towards men and say I haue done amisse, I haue turned away from goodness and it hath not boode me in any stead, or was not meete and conuenient for mee: a man may see and easly gather, that Eliu goeth on still with his matter, shewing that they which are brought so lowe as to seeke their sinnes, and to be euen at deathes dore, if God shew them the fauour to cal them back againe, and give them hope of life, and specially cheare their harts, so as they are able to cōfōpō him in true assurednesse of fairthe: do afterward turne themselues to men, and declare their miseries, to the intent to magnifie the infinite goodness of God which they haue felt. And so the second frute of the forgiuenesse of sinnes, is that when the wretched sinner knoweth that God hath not shaken him off, but as yet openeth him the way and giueth him accessie to come vnto him: like as he resteth therupon to call vpon God and afterward made the frute of faith ayaynable: so also it behoueth him too confesse the sayd goodness of God before men, and not to be ashamed to shewe the misery wherin he was vntill God had deliuered him by his mercy. To be short, like as when God hath sent vs the promises of his gospel, wee ought to acknowledge the, and to seeke vnto him: so also it behoueth vs, to mourne before me. For it is not ynoch enough that euery of vs shuld pray to God priuily by himself: but it behoueth vs also to set forth his glori, and to indeuer to prouoke our neighbours to the same, so as one of vs may be edified by another: and he that hath felt how good and mercifull God is, must shewe it vnto others,

Q. q. iii. that that they may take example at it: And when there is such an agrement amongs vs, we must also preache Gods praises togither, according as euery one of vs is bound vnto him, and there is not any man which may not justly confesse, that God hath a hundred times plucked him out of his graue and quickned him. Ye see the in effect what the meening of Eliu is. Howbeit, that we may the better profit by this sentence: let vs marke that it behoueth vs first to enter into ourselues, and the to go vnto God, & afterward to go vnto our neighbours. Thus ye see three things which we haue to marke, and it is an order which wee ought to kepe well. The first is, that men should examine their owne consciences, & haue an eye to their whole lyfe. And why? To be ashamed of their sinnes: For vntill we haue well perceyued that wee be worse than wretched, how will we haue recourse vnto God? VVe will not be moued to seke him, nor to desire forgiuenesse. So then it is requisite for vs to begin at the sayd point, namely too feele our sinnes how greuouse they be, and also to feele and conceyue the wrathe of God, to the intent wee may be as it were forlorne, and behold hell as it were gaping vpon vs to swallowe vs vp, and be so vtterly astonished, as we may be driuen to say, Alas, what is to be done? So that we may haue no rest in ourselues, but languishe so in our miseries, as we may come with an earnest zeale too seke the Lord. Thus ye see the first steppe that wee must begin at. The second is, that we must come vnto God, and seeing hee taryeth not till we seeke him, but of his infinite goodnessse preuenteth vs, in somuch that he inspireth vs to the end we should seeke him and flee for refuge vnto his mercie, & there rest: whē we haue any promises of his goodnessse set afore vs; seing that he seketh sinners to bring them from death to life: wee must take those promises and apply them to our vse, saying: euē so my God, thou shewest that thou art willing to receiuē sinners to mercy: behold I am one, yea and I am so forlorne, as I wote not any more what too do. Therfore I doubt not Lord, but thou wilt make mee feele thy gracie and goodnessse. So Lord, there will I rest, and although I be hemmed in with many troubles and sorowes which were able to turne me from thee: Yet will I rest vpon thy promises, and therewith call vpon thee, assuring myself that thou wilt strengthen mee against all Satans temptatiōs. Thus ye see how it behoueth vs to deale. The third point is the conclusion that Eliu maketh here: which is, that we must declare Gods goodnessse to our neighbours so farforth as is needful to their edifying, that hee may be praised with one accord; and that all men may confesse, that there is no welfare but in his mercy, and that we are all damned; if the only goodnessse of our God remedy it not. These (say I) are the three degrees which it, behoueth vs to keepe. But I told you that we must begin at ourselues. And why? VVe shall see many which wil blasē a broade Gōds praises with full mouth, but they haue not welforemynded the in their hart. There are which think themselues discharged when they haue sayd, O my God, haue pitie vpon mee, I haue bene such a one, I haue done such an euill deede. True it is, that such men haue some feeling in themselues, and speake not altogether through hypocrisie: But yet notwithstanding there is much wind in them, and their mouth is larger than their heart. For scarcely haue they tasted of Gods mercy: and yet they would haue men to thinke that they haue felt it throughly, and that they be full fraught with it. But there is vanitie and ambition in such men, when they voyden their mouth after that sort to speake well, and in the meane whyle haue not mynded Gods grace too feele it accordingly, that it myght be well imprinted in their consciencces, and they themselues bee ryghtly nurished with it. That is the caufe why I sayd, that before wee speake, it behoueth vs too haue considered well what wee haue soone afore: that is to say, to haue examined well our selues, to haue bene diligent in serching how wretched wee be, and to haue bene come too the verie point to haue bene swallowed vp into the dungeon of hell. And afterward when wee haue bene brought to that afterdeele, to imbrace Gods promises, and to haue such a lyuely feeling of them, as wee may call vpon him with a ful trust. True it is, that this cannot bee doone perfectly, but yet must wee go towards it, yet must wee creepe neerer and neerer to it, and wee must strayne ourselues to come at it. Verie well, haue wee made such profers? Then is it tyme to open our mouth and too prayse Gods goodnessse, that other men may bee drawne to him by our example, and that all men may know, how there is none other hope of saluation, than in his only infinite goodnessse, when it pleaseth him to make the death and passion of his Sonne auayable to take away our sinnes, so as we may be wasshed cleane from all spottes and vncleannessse, and bee accepted for ryghtouse before him.

And this matter concerneth not the shrift of the Papistes, but the confession of a Christian, which ought too be put in vre among vs, and is not. I haue told you heretofore, that one of the cursed blasphemies in the Pope-dome, is to tye the forgiuenesse of sinnes to the Shrift that is made in a mannes eare: for God never requyred it. And in good sooth, it is vnpossiblē that euer any men should knowe the hundredth part of their faults, I meene euē of their grossest faults. And how shall they doo then if they go about too number the offences which they haue doone vnwittingly? Therfore the Shrift that is among the Papists is as a gulf of hell. But there is a Christen confession which is allowed by the woord of God: which is, that wee should generally confess our sinnes, and when any of vs hathe giuen any cause of stumbling, hee should acknowledge his fault to amend the cuil. That (say I) is the thing which we haue to do when God shall haue afflicted vs, and afterward remedied our aduersities. It is not ment that wee should go blowe in a mannes eare, to tell all our offences there: nor also that wee should mount vp vpon a scaffold, to tell particularly the faults that wee haue committed, and after what maner wee did them. No: wee neede no more but too confess our defaultes in generall, and therewithall too consider that our Lord hath bound vs to him exceedingly, in that he hath giuen vs a happie and wiſhed end of our troubles, which would haue ouerwhelmed vs if he had not reached vs his hand, and set vs vp again:

Also when wee haue offended our neyghbours by giving euill example, wee must acknowledge our faults, and riot bee ashamed to confess them with sorrowesse in our harts. I sayd that this latter confession is ill practized among vs: for we see the prude, that is in most men. True it is that they dare not say, that they be ryghtouse: howbeit when they confess theirselues sinners, it is but a cloke of hypocrisie: they say that all men are so: and so wheras euery man ought to feele his owne misdooinings, wee fall to couering of them with the mantle of other men. And that is a playne mocking of God. So then, if wee intend too confess vnfeynedly that we be bound vnto God, and to humble ourselues before him: let vs speake according to the feeling of our owne consciences; and the miserie wherin we haue bene plundged, and the deadlinesse wherout of God hath made made vs way. Marke that for one point. Also there are othesome, who when they haue committed any offence, do fall to blaspheming of God: when a whole streeete is infected with whoredome, if a man reproue them for it, they will aske him whither they bring him backe to po-pishnesse or no, bycause they be told of their faults. As who would say, that God would haue stumbling blocks nurished, and that the partie which hath troubled the church, should fare the better for his hardnesse and wilful stubbornnesse. Sothen let vs marke, that when God discouereth our sinnes, it is to the end that if wee haue caused any trouble or offence, wee should labour to amend it, and not be ashamed to open our mouth to confesse what we haue doone. And that is the thing which is shewed vs now: namely that when the sinner wil seeke vnto God for pardon, and afterward come familiarly to him to take him for his father, trusting in his mercy: he must also turne himself vnto men. He must not only pray in secrete, nor only say in his hart I haue sinned, and after that sort aske forgiuenesse, and returne vnto God: but he must also turne vnto his neighbours. And wheras erst he went aboue too deceiue God, and would haue rocked his owne conscience asleepe: he shall coeue such a greef and confuzion in himself, that God shal be glorified by it, & such as were as it were asleepe shall awake: those whose mouthes were out of tast shall find some savour in the grace of God: such as were swallowed vp with sorowe shall knowe that God opened them the gate to come vnto him: and (to be short) such as were in despayre shall recouer hope of life and saluation. Ye see then that the holy ghost ment in effect to declare in this text, that when we haue prayed vnto God every man secretly by himself, we must likewise offer him a generall sacrifice before men, in acknowledging how much we be bound to his goodness, and in humbling our selues in our sinnes, considering how we had bin damned creatures if he had not pitied vs. Therfore it is sayd that he will bane an eye vnto me. And it behoueth vs to mark the order, wherof I haue made mention already. For Eliu began not at that point, but sayde at the entraunce, that the sinner shal be wakened: namely, for that God shal send him remorse of conscience: and if he receyue not that, nor become the better for the warnings which are giuen him, nor be afraide of Gods iustice for all the threatnings that are made vnto him: he shall feele his hand so hard and heuie, as he shall be inforced to perceyue his owne confuzion, and to be greeued at it, and to become as a dead ma. And afterward when he shall come to quickening, God shall cause the gospell to be preached and the promises of saluation to be offered vnto him: and he shall receyue them to his benefit. Herepon he shall call vnto God and conceiue such a confidence, as he shall without any douting go vnto God as vnto his father, and say. Seing that God hath adopted mee into the number of his children, I may well take this libertie of coming vnto him: and seing he allureth mee so sweetly vnto him, I must not doubt but he will receyue mee. This doone, it is tyme to looke towards men. If wee should looke first vnto men, and make fayre confessions before we haue bene sorie and throughly greeued within: it were a peruerting of the order of nature. But when wee haue once felt well the greeuousnesse of Gods iudgements, and afterward are able to receyue the promises of the gospell, and to call vpon God with trust in him, and to rest vpon his mercie and fatherly goodnessse by feeling him favorable too vs, and that he is redie to help vs: when wee haue doone all this: then is it tyme to looke towards men, that is to say to edifie our neyghbours. This then is an inferior thing to that which hath bin declared afore. And what is to be done in looking towards men: we must say I haue sinned, I haue turned aside from goodnesse: I haue bene a wretched man. Here then it is shewed vs after what sort God ought to be glorified by vs: that is to wit, we must acknowledge that he only is righteous, and that there is nothing but iniquitie in vs, as S. Paule sayeth in the third to the Romaynes. For whē he sayth there, that God is iustified: Rom. 3.4. he meeneth that we ourselues must first be condemned. If God should be counted ryghteous, and wee ryghteouse to, what a thing were that? Then should he haue a ryghteousnesse that were common and intermedled with men: but when we be vtterly conuictid and no man dareth exempt himself, but contrariwise, we willingly yeld ourselues guilty and resort to the only goodnesse of God, knowing that it belongeth to him only to iustifie vs, bycause he is the fountayne of all righteousnesse: that is the ryght acknowledging of him to be righteous. VVherefore let vs learne to do as is shewed vs here: For it is a generall rule for all the faythfull, and it is not giuen by a mortall man, but by the holy ghost. Are we then desirous to publish Gods goodnes which he had shewed vs in forgiving vs ou sinnes. It behoueth vs to make this confession with the mouthe, to our saluation: according also asl Re.10.b.0.

Saint Paule sayeth in the tenth to the Romaynes, that our beleuing with the hart maketh vs ryghteous, and our confessing with the mouth maketh vs safe. And saint Paule is a good and faythfull expounder of this presente text. For (as I sayd before) if we begin at the mouth, al wil be but wynd and smoke. Therfore we must first beleeue with the hart, that is to say, we must gather ourselues vnto God, and enter into our owne consciences, and therewithall bethinke vs of his promises, that wee may flee vnto him and vnto his mere mercy for refuge. This done, the mouthe must followe next. And the confession of the mouthe will then bee to our saluation when we shall haue so beleueed with our hart vnto ryghteous-nesse. Yet notwithstanding these twoo things must bee matched togither, according as we see that they are inseparable: Now wheras it is sayd I haue sinned, I haue turned away from goodnesse, and it bath not profitid me: The holy ghost sheweth vs that our confession must be pure and freeharted, and that we must not speake by halues as the hypocrites do which say. O it is true that al the world is sinful and all men are faulty: and so (to their owne seeming) they are well quit. Surely there is no dallyng after that sort with God: but we must set foorth our sinnes to the vttermost: that is to say, we must feele them too bee an intollerable burthen: according also as wee see that Daniell doeth, saying: Lord we haue sinned. Is that ali? no: but he addeth, we haue delt wickedly, wee haue trayterously transgressed thy lawe, and wee haue bene wilfull and foward. For what cause doeth Daniell pack so many words togither and make such a heape of them? It is to shewe vs, that such as will discharge themselues so lyghtly to Godward with speaking but a word of their faults and away, are but hypocrites, and never felt what their offences are. Dani.9.a.5.

So then let vs marke well, that there is no superfluitie in this text, where Eliu, (after he had shewed that the sinner which is quit at Gods hande, will confess his fault,) sayth not only, I haue sinned, but also addeth I haue turned away from goodnesse. VVherin he doeth vs to understand, that a man must not stick to confess his det fully, and to say, I haue bene vtterly foward and maliciose, I haue bin giuen to al wickednesse, I haue strayed quite & cleane from the waye of saluation, I haue bent my self against God, and I haue giuen my self wholly vnto Satan

as much as was in me. Thus ye see how wee must deale: [that is to wit,] not for countenaunce sake, but so as the hart do speke before God, and then the mouthe also agree with it, to confesse before men what we haue felt within ourselues. And this is in effect the thing which is shewed vs here. But now let vs apply this to our selues, & consider what entraunce we giue vnto God, to lay forth the treasures of his goodnessse towards vs. For a man shall see nothing through out but hardnesse of hart, & shamelessness. How many are there in these dayes that humble the selues? Nay, contrariwise al are wild beasts, and those which be most faultie are leaste ashamed to mainteyne their wickednesse, and to set vp their bristles against men whosoever they go about to amend the: and yet notwithstanding these men cease not to vaunt themselues of the gospell. As for reformacion it is nothing worth with the, and yet it is the Apgee of the christians: And what is the first lesson that we ought to beare in mind, but only this: namely that we may be inlighened, to knowe the wrath of God, & to feele how haynouse our sinnes are, so as we may be sory and vtterly ashamed of them: and that wee may imbrace Gods mercy and take hold of it, to the end to be reconciled to him for our lord Iesus Christs sake, & by the meane of his death and passion: And finally, to confess our wretchednesse before men, to the end that the whole prayse may bee yeelded vnto God, as meete is it should be.

Beholde I saye wherevntoo wee ought to invre our selues. But what? as I haue touched afore, when men haue done amisse, and that not lyghtely but greeuously, so as one becommeth a drunckard, another a whoremayster, a third a sweater, the fourthe full of malice and crueltie, & another a beater of him that sekes nothing at his hand: If a man shewe them their faults, what shall he see? wild beasts which ca by no meanes be tamed, and which make but a skorne of all the warnings that are giuen them. For scarcely is there one amongs ten which hath such lowlinesse and modestie in him, as to confess his fault when he hath done amisse. Seing it is so, do we not shet the gate against our God? do we not reiect the grace which is offered vs by the gospell? To be short, we canot abyde that God should forgiue our sinnes. And so we see that the preaching of the gospel vnto many men, must be to bereue the of al excuse, & to drown the in the deepe of hell because they could not make their profit of it. Neuerthelesse the holy ghost prouoketh vs to receiuie the exhortacion that is made vnto vs here. VVherfore let vs fight against the pride and hypocrisie that are in vs. For they be the two things which keepe vs from humbling of ourselues before God, and from confessing of our faults before men. Hypocrisie maketh vs to labour continually to cloke our sinnes, & to preted to giue ourselues vnto goodnessse: when in the meane whyle our hart is farre frō it, and wee go the cleane contrary way. And againe, pride maketh vs to desire always to be in good reputacion. Alas we seke to be esteemed among men, or at leastwise to kepe ourselues from reproche, and although we know our owne sinnes, yet are we loth to be told of the, and in the meane whyle behold our condemnacion increaseth and doubleth before God and his Angels. And therfore let vs learne too tame this pride vntill it be fully subdewed, so as wee may come to our God with all humilitie, and not only confess our wrctchednesse before him, but also indeuer to edifie our neighbours. If a mademand for what cause we shuld speake so before men: there are two reasons. The one is that God might be knowne to bee only righteous as I haue sayd, and that his grace might appearre and slyne forth. Although God could forbear our confession: yet notwithstanding he will haue it openly and many festly knowne that we are in his det. And we see it is impossible to knowe his goodnessse towards vs, if we be not vtterly cast downe, and euен at the point of dispaire. Thus ye see the first reason why wee ought too confess before our neighbours, the goodnessse that we haue felt at Gods hād, in that he hath deliuere vnto death, and frō the destruction wherin we were plunged. Also there is a second reson, which is, that other men should be edified by our example. I haue bin excercised in affliction, and God hath bin so gratiouse to deliuere mee out of it: It is good that other should knowe of it, that when God shal afflic them, they may think with themselues, behold Gods hand is vpon me, and he summoneth me: And why? For I was as it were drunckē in my sinnes, I was as a stray beast, and now I see that he intendeth to drawe me home, and to set mee into the waye of saluation again. Therfore it is good that men should be warned of Gods working which we haue felt in our selues: according as we see in very deede, that the confessions which the faithfull haue made in times past, do serue at this daye for our learning. If we had not the example of Dauid in the greate numbers of afflictions which he felt and ouercame. As soone as wee felt any smal aduersitie, we should forthwith be at the poyn of dispayre. But when wee see that the illewe was good and profitable vnto Dauid, and that he confesseth it to Psa.3.b 6.b. haue bin a necessarie thing for him to be so afflicted and c.8. & 11.9. chastized at Gods hand, wee also do trust in God, and c.18. & 119. flee vnto him, assuring our selues that it is his office too thetb.67. raise men out of the graue when he hath cast the into it. So then whē we confess our sinnes, & report how God hath visited vs with rigor for a time, and afterward quickned vs againe: it serueth to instruct our neighbours, that they may not bee nouices nor thinke it strange, when God shall visit them in their turne: and that (as I haue sayd) they may know themselues to be wretched sinners, and seke the remedie of it by putting their trust in the death and passion of our Lord Iesus Christ: and be more and more stirred vp to serue and honor him, when they 40 shal haue felt his goodnes and grace by experiance, in that he hath receyued them so to mercy. Thus ye see that the thing which is shewed here, is not vnprofitable. For a hundred are edified and instructed by the example of one man. And therfore let vs learne to put away retchlesnesse when our Lord shall haue shewed vs any fauour, so as we may magnifie his goodnessse before me, and the same may be preached with one commō accord. And afterward it is said for a conclusion, he bath deliuere my soule from the pit, and my life from entring into the graue. Truely this cannot be throughly dispached as now, but it must suffize vs, to haue a short abridgement of it, as neede requyreh for the ioyning of this parte to that with I haue declared already.

Discourse hath bin made of the confessing of sinnes, how me ought not to be ashamed to cōdemne the selues, & that afterward it behoueth the immediatly to adde the praise of God in that they haue knowne his goodnessse. And therfore it is said, I haue sinned, I haue turned awa y frō goodnessse, yea, and It bath not booted me at all: But my God bath draue me out of the pit. The affone as the holy ghost hath taught vs to acknowledge our wrctchednes & to be ashamed of it: he wil haue vs immediatly to preache gods mercy, according as we haue felt it, how he suffered vs not to perish, as we must needs haue don if he had not helped vs. And let vs marke wel how it is sayd here vnto sinners, that it shal not boote the to resist their maker. Then what shal we gaine when we hyde our sinnes and think not vpo the, but rather nourish them by fond selfelyking? Alas,

alas, it is alwayes to our greater destruction. But when God discouereth our iniquities, and maketh vs to feele them, the doth he procure our profit. For therein he provoketh vs to resort vnto him. Thus ye see the first point that we haue to marke in this streyne: and further lette vs marke also, that when God shaketh vs off and layeth our wickednesse to our charge, there is no remedy but wee must be forlorne, vntill our God be pitifull to vs, and receyue vs to mercie. And therfore whensoeuer God forgiueth our sinnes, it is all one as if he rayfled vs frō death, so as wee must conclude, that when wee be so reconciled vnto God, then hath he wrought a resurrection in vs. VVe were dead, and there was no hope of lyfe in respect of our selues, and he reacheth out his hand to make vs aliue agayne, and to drawe vs vnto him. So then lette vs learne to magnifie the grace of the forgiuenesse of sinnes, acknowledging that God doth rayse vs to life: as often as it pleaseth him to receyue vs to mercy. And forasmuch as we see that Satan ceaseth not to thrust vs from so great a benefite, let vs be so much the more inflamed and prouoked to exalt it highly as it deserueth.

Now lette vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgment of our sinnes, praying him so to excercise vs in his iudgements and in the knowledge of our wretchednesse, as we may alwayes learne to serue and honour him, and to yeeld our selues to him with true humility, that we may be strengthned more and more in his mercy, to trust therenvnto & to settle our selues wholly vpon it, and that thereby we may learne to cōfesse before men, howe gratiouse our good God hath bene vnto vs in receyuing vs to his mercy, to the ende that the prayse of our saluation may be yeelde vnto him alone as to whom it is dewe, and that we may be so ashamed and abashed in our selues, that he onely may be exalted, and all of vs be humbled vnder him, to yeeld him his due honor and homage. And for the doing hereof it may please him to rayse vp true and faythal ministers of his woerde, which seeke not. &c.

The cxxvij. Sermon, which is the seventh vpon the. xxxiiij. Chapter.

And the first vpon the. xxxiiij. Chapter.

29. Behold, God doth all these things thryce to a man.
30. To dravve backe his soule from the graue, that he may be inlightened vwith the light of life.
31. Marke, O Job, and heare me: hold thy peace, and I vvill speake.
32. And if thou haue matter, ansvere mee and speake: for I desire to iustifie thec.
33. If not, heare mee, hold thy peace, and I vvill teach thee vvisdome.

1. And Eliu spake agayne and sayd:
2. You vvisse men heare my. vvoordes, and you men of vnderstanding herken vnto mee.
- 3: For the eare trieth vvoordes, and the mouth iudgeth of meats.

E haue seene heretofore how God prouideth for our welfare. For in as much as we are wretched creatures, he on his parte must be fayne to remedy our vices, or els there will be no hope of vs. Yee see then, that we be vtterly forlorne and vndone, if God haue not pirie vpon vs. And the meane hath bene declared vnto vs: namely that he teacheth vs to receyue his grace, sometimes by the chastisements which he giueth vs, and sometimes by afflictions and great stripes of his roddes. And if he see that we be dull and slowe, he striketh the harder, so as we are cōpelled to come vnto him, because we be vtterly quayled and can holde out no longer. Herepon he comforteth vs in such wise, as we may come vnto him, and call vpon him, and feele him fauorable to vs, and hauing felt such grace, acknowledge the same in the sight of men, and both be the more cōfirmed our selues, and also confirme our neighbours in it. Now then Eliu hauing treated of all this, addeth that it is not for one time onely that God iustifieth vs after that sorte, but that he reneweth the sayde instruction oftentimes. And why? for somuch as wee be not so good schollers as to profite sufficiently at the first day, God is fayne to hold on in mortifying the affections that are in vs, that he may draw vs to him by humbling and comforting vs agayne. Nowe if this were done but once, wee would by and by forget it, and returne to our owne nature, and there would be no such strength in vs as to walke as hecommeth vs. Thus haue we the meening of Eliu, or rather of the holy ghost. And it is a very necessary doctrine for vs. For besides that in the papacie men haue as it were buried the righteousnesse that commeth of free gift, whereby God saueth vs: there haue bene also somewhat more modest men, who haue darkened and intangled his doctrine in such wise, as they haue thought it ynoch to say, that God iustifieth vs of his goodnessse, howbeit they say that the same is but one, & that when we be so reconciled vnto him, thenceforth it lieth in vs to deserue and keepe possession of the grace which we haue receyued. But this is the meane to bring a man to vtter despayre. For if our Lord reach vs his hand but for once, and do but onely set vs in a good way: I pray you how shall we be able to hold out to the end, considering the fraylty that is in our flesh, whereof we haue to much proofe? Also the grace of God were vnauyable to vs, if it continued not with vs to the end, and renewed not from time to time as neede requireth. Furthermore we see our flesh is to lustie, that although we haue bene tamed for a whyle, and wee seeme to be throughly disposed to beare the yoke, seeking nothing but to obey God, so as we wonder how wee should be changed in any one thing: yet notwithstanding, the rebelliousnesse which is hid within vs, auaunceth it self, and Satan who knoweth the meanes howe to thrust vs out of the way, commeth to beguyle vs with his fligths. VVhat should become of vs the if God should correct vs but for once, & euer after let vs alone to our selues? what should become of vs, if he should cōfert vs but for one day, and euer after let vs shift for our selues with the comfort that we had receyued? Surely it would every whit fade away, yea euen out of hand. And so it is more than needfull, that God should begin new againe at euery instant, considering how we returne to our naughtinesse, and that his roddes are not so welprinted in vs, as to make vs remember them as were requisite, and that we are not earnest to call vpon him, but had ieuer gad aboue, and wander away in our owne vanities, and in steade of seeking our saluation, wee be harried here and there, and our wittes are so wauering, as they cannot rest where they should, and therefore do continually roue abrode without ceasing. And whereas Eliu setteth here Three tyme: he meene nth many times, after the maner of the holy Scripture. VVhich is, not to determine any certayne number, but to shew that it is for our profite that God should afflict vs after that sort. For we be to variable and inconstant, and therefore it behoueth him to returne vnto vs againe and againe, or els the things which he shal haue done wil serue to no purpose. And he cōfirmeth the matter which he delt withall; which is, that whē God hath deliuere our soules from the graue, and quickned vs with the light of life, it is a swetening of the rigor of the chāstisements which wee feele at his hand. For we cannot but shun them to the vttermost of our power, because they be contrary to our nature. VVce would fayne that God should handle vs after our owne liking, that hee shoulde neuer bee rough to vs, that wee might neuer be disquieted in our mindes, that we might alwayes liue at our ease, and that he would alwayes maynteyne vs in mirth and rest. Yea verily, but (according to that which I haue sayd) it is not good that God should handle vs after our owne fancie, but that he should vse his own discretion, and send vs whatsoeuer he thinketh expedict for vs. So then let vs haue an eye to the end and issue of our afflictions; that they may be a cōfort to vs: that is to say, that they may serue for salues & medicines: marke that for one poynt. Therfore although they be bitter at the first sight: yet let vs receyue them at Gods hand, knowing that they be recordes of his loue, and that hee hath a care of vs to worke our saluation.

Beholde (I say) the thing that ought too appease all our grudgings, so as we should not be impatient when God chāstiseth vs. And why so? For it is for our profite that it shoulde be so. Neuerthelesse, it is not ynoch enough to knowe that afflictions serue vs for medicines: but it behoueth vs also to consider for what disease, and then will wee like the better of them. If a man be sicke but of some small, light, or cōmon disease: yet will he like well of the thing that shall remedy him. But if he be wholly giuen ouer, and taken but for a dead man, and yet recouer: then will he set the more store by the remedy that was giuen him. Euē so is it with the thing that Eliu sheweth here. For he sayeth that God in afflicting of vs doth not only remedie our vices, but also fetch vs from the graue and quickē vs. Herely he sheweth, that we be vndone and vterly drownē in destruction, except God plucke vs backe vnto him euē by violent meanes. And sure it coulde none otherwise be, considering our hardhartednesse, or rather that we be so snarled in our sinnes, as we cannot easily be wōud out of them. Seing then that God rayseth vs agayne, (according as was treated more at large yesterday) lette vs assure our selues, that wee cannot sufficiently esteeme the goodnessse that hee sheweth vs, when it pleaseth him to chāstyze vs. That therefore is the second poynt which we haue to marke. The third is, that wee muste needes passe that way. For in that he sayeth, to the intent to drawe backe: he betokeneth an inforsing necessitie. True it is, that God could well saue vs without this meane: but here is no disputing of Gods mightie power: and Eliu hath respect to our state, which also is the poynt that wee muste rest vpon. And therefore let vs learne, that if God should deale gently with vs, and lette vs alone in quiet, that wee might sleepe in our sinnes without waking: it would be the cause of our destruction. Then is it needfull that we should be handled with such rigor as we ostentymes are: yea and if he bare not with our frayltie and feblenesse, he should be fayne to vse a farre greater roughnesse towardes vs. Therefore howsoeuer a man be afflicted, he ought to beare it paciētly, assuring himself that God doth it not without cause, no nor euē without a necessary cause. Also therewithal we haue to marke the cōparison which is set betwene the graue, & the light of life. VVhat is it whē God withdraweth vs backe from death? And why doth he bring vs to the light of life? ye see on the one side an extreme misery, yee see also on the other side a souerayne benefite. And therefore let vs learne, that if God suffer vs to follow our owne lustes, we make hast always towards the graue: that is to say, we do nothing but plundge our selues into vtter destruction, out of the which we can neuer get out againe. Lo what má would do, if God should give him the bridle. And hereby we haue good cause to mislike of our selues, cōsidering the fowardnes that is in vs. True it is that euery one of vs will say he is desirous to go vnto God, and to attayne to saluation: but in the meane whyle, what do wee? looke vpon our lyfe, looke vpon our thoughts, looke vpon our whole doings: and it will seeme that we be madde in seeking our owne destruction. For wee cease not to prouoke the wrath of God, as who should say, wee could neuer come soone ynoch to the depth of our misery. Seing then that we be so giuen to all euill by nature, as though wee were desirous to perishe wilfully: lette every man learne to know himselfe, and to mislike of himselfe, and therupon suffer God to governe him, seing our owne guyding and government is so wretched and vnhappy: and let vs forgette all the foolishe presumptions wherewith the world is so sortid, that every man thinkes himself wise ynoch, if he may haue his owne free will. Lo how men deceyue themselues in making themselues beleue that they haue great store, both of wisdome and strength. But contrariwise we see that God had neede to correct by force this cursed affection of desiring to know more than is meete for vs. Therewithall on the other side let vs cōsider wherunto God calleth vs, when he draweth vs backe from the graue into the light of life. He setteth vs not in some middle state, to say, ye shall not be starke dead, ye shall but lāguish: but he calleth vs to the light of life, that is to wit, to that newnesse whereby wee are regenerated to the incorruptible and heauenly life. The matter then concerneh not Gods deliuering of vs onely from death: but also his bringing of vs to his everlasting kingdome. And although we walke in many corruptions here by lowe, and are beset round about with them, yea and that they dwell in vs and are euē in our bones and maree: yet will God guyde and governe vs, euē till wee come into his kingdome. I hus ye see a cōparison which cōfirmeth yet better the infinite gratiouse goodnessse of our God, to the end we should be the more stirred to seeke him: & when he shall haue brought vs into the right way, indeuer our selues to go forwarde from day to day: and when hee shall haue drawne vs backe, suffer him to teach vs, and desire him to continue his teaching still. And herewithall let vs marke also, that we must not be discouraged though we do oftentimes fall backe & seeme to clyue asunder. And when God hath set vs in a good trade, and that we be as it were throughly tamed, if the vices of our flesh happen nowe and then to get the vpper hand of vs, so as wee be driuen from him, and our infirmite groweth into misbelefe, so as we be couered with darkenesse: let vs not therfore be out of heart. And why? For it is sayd, that God will worke many tymes in a man, to the intent to bring him into the light of lyfe. Therefore when we be come vnto God, and haue had had a sure hope of salvation: if now and then we fall into troule and anguish, so as a suddayne storme seemeth to ouerwhelme vs: let vs not therfore cease to trust in God. And why? For it is sayd that he will beginne his worke new againe in vs: not that we should give our selues the brydle, (lette vs beware of that,) but that in the meane while, we should put in vre the saying of the Prophet Esay, which is, to strengthen the quaking legges, and to cheere vp the faynting hearts. If a man be strong in despising God and in making no account of his grace: hee 10 had neede to feele Gods iudgements, and to bee smitten hard, and to be wounded to the quicke. But if we be feeble and trembling, so as our knees quake, and we haue no more strength in vs: it is the propertie and nature of the Gospell to strengthen vs againe, according as it is sayd in

Esa.35. 4. 3. the Prophet Esay, where all such as haue charge to teach in the Church, are commaunded to strengthen the weake legges, to chere vp the faynt harts, and to cherish vp the trembling knees. Seing it is so, it behoueth vs to followe the same order, according also as the Apostle applieth it to

Hebr. 12. d. in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, sheweth that every man ought to be his owne teacher in that behalfe. So then let vs looke to our selues, and if we be astonished at Gods justice, let it not caste vs into wicked imaginacions, nor make vs to fall into despayre: but if wee feele that our knees tremble, and that our armes and legges be as good as broken, & that we be so afflicted as we know not what to do: yet lette vs not therefore ceasse to strengthen our 30 selues from day to day. Eliu hauing spoken so, addeth:

Iob beare me, giue good eare, at least wise if thou haue no matter agaynst mee: for I stoppe not thy mouth, speake, if thou haue wherewith to iustifie thy selfe: if not, hold thy peace, and heare mee speake, and I will teach thee wisedome, for I desire to iustifie thee. As if he should say, I would fayne that thou shouldest be quit. If thou haue good and auayleable defences, bring them forth: if not, lette thy mouth be shet. Here no w<sup>e</sup> agayne we be warned in Iobs person, to keepe silence when Gods truth is set afore vs, and not to reply 40 agaynst it. And it is a very profitable warning, considering the hardnesse of heart and the pryme that is in men. For it is exceeding harde for vs to submit ourselues vnto God. VV<sup>e</sup> see that there be alwayes stryuiings in vs, and that our mindes are not frained to suche lowlinesse as they ought to be. For if a man alledge vs a good and holy thing: we are not so mylde as to receyue it: but we haue such a pryme, as wee are loth to bee subiect to any other thing than our owne will. Yee see then that the nature of men is to lift vp themselues agaynst God, and alwayes to kicke agaynst his woerde. Sith wee be subiect to such a wicked and cursed vice, lette vs marke well the warning that is giuen vs here. VV<sup>e</sup> which is, to bee teachable when God causeth men to tel vs his truth. And this is it which

S. Iames meeneth when he sayth, that it behoueth vs to receyue Gods woerde with a meeke spirit. It is not without cause that he hath expressed this meane. VV<sup>e</sup>ould we then shewe how wee profit in Gods woerde? It behoueth vs aboue all things to haue a meeke and gentle spi-rite. For if wee be of a fierce courage, surely wee shall turne all to euill, and never finde taste in Gods woerde, but ouerthrow all goodnessse, and our light shall be turned into darkenesse. VV<sup>e</sup>hat is to be done then? VV<sup>e</sup> must keepe silence when God speaketh. Neuerthelesse wee muste not looke that he shall shewe himselfe visibly from heauen: but as often as his woerde is preached and set forth vnto vs, we must hold it for true and good, assuring our selues that it proceedeth from him: And if we reply against it, we make not warre agaynst a mortall creature, but we aduaunce our selues with diuelish presumption agaynst the liuing God. Therefore it behoueth vs to hold our peace that we may be taught. Finally the whole and true wisdome of men, is to yelde themselues teachable vnto God, and to submit themselues wholly to that which is shewed them in his name and authoritie. This is the first point which we haue to marke in the exhortacio which Eliu maketh here vnto Job. For his speaking vnto that man is in such wise, as that vnder his person all of vs are warned of their duety as I haue sayd already. But aboue all things let vs marke, that it behoueth vs to keepe silence when we are spoken to of Gods iustice, & reproued for our sinnes. Thus ye see a circumstance which we haue yet to marke ouer and besides that which hath bene sayd already. VV<sup>e</sup>hat is it that Eliu treated off hitherto? he shewed vnto Job that God is righteous, yea and after such a sort, as men ought to be wholly gouerned by him, and that it is in him to draw them backe from the graue, and to bring them vnto life, holding them continually in his mighty hande, till he haue brought them to their perfection. Buttherein do men most of all beguile themselues. VV<sup>e</sup>hy so? Men canot gloriſe God and take all shame to themſelues: they will alwayes challenge ſomewhat to themſelues, and although they ought to know their own lewdnesse and to be ashamed of it: yet notwithstanding they are alwayes puffed vp with ſome presumption, and dazeled with ſome vayne fancie, ſaying: haue not I this? and haue not I that? and although I be not perfectly righteous, yet am I not viterily deſtitute of all goodnessse. Thus yee ſee how men are deſtrous to reſerve ſomewhat to themſelues, and cannot yelde vnto God. And that is the cauſe why wee cannot fully receyue the doctrine of free iuſtification: which sheweth vs that God receyuth vs of his owne mere mercy, and that his accepting of vs is not for any respect of our owne workes which are altogether ſinfull, but because it pleaseth him to washe vs and clenze vs in the bloud of his onely ſonne, and to holde vs and acknowledge vs for his children, notwithstanding that by nature there is nothing in vs but wretchednesse and cursednesse. For this cauſe Eliu hauing ſhewed how much we be bound vnto God for all things which we haue, in ſo much as the honour ought to be yelded vnto him as to the beginner and performer of all: he addeth that all men ſhould giue eare to it, & hold their peace, according also as S. Paule ſayeth in the third to the Romanes, which Rom. 3.c. 19. I alledged one of these dayes past. Now when Eliu ſayeth, that he is deſtrous to haue Job quit: thereby he ſheweth that he went not to it of a fierce and cōtentious mind, (as mē are wont to do when they will mayntaine a contrary part) nor of purpose to grieue the man. No, but he would faine that Job could haue mainteyned his righteousness: & ſith he hath not wherewith to do it, he would haue him to hūble himſelfe before God. And let vs marke that Eliu ſpeaketh here, as the inſtrument of gods ſpirit. And hereby let vs take warning, that whēſoeuer god thūdereth againſt vs in the holy Scripture, he couēteth not our deſtruction by bereeuing vs of the thing that belongeth vnto vs, as though he enuied vs for ſomething which weē had that were worthy of prayſe: no, for what is it that can hurt him? ſhould God be any whit diminished by our hauing of ſome truthe on our ſide? No: but forasmuch as it is for our behoofe to bee viterly thownie downe, because wee can not receyue the benefit which hee offereth vs, vñleſſe we be quyte and cleane voyde of all presumption and vanitie: therefore he bereueth vs, firſt of all, vayne glory, and ſheweth vs that wee haue nothing but shame and reproch in vs, and that we be infected, and as it were rotten in our filthinesse. God (say I) is fayne to bring vs to that poynt: nor for that he is greeued at our righteousnesse (for it is well knowne that there is no fault in him) but bycause it is for our profitte. So then what remayneth for vs, but to humble our selues, and to receyue the promises which are giuen vs of our saluation. And for asmuch as the Diuell eggeth vs to stray from the obedience of our God, and from harkening quietly vnto him: let vs brydle our mindes, yea & let vs brydle them short, and say, yet muste thy God raigne ouer thee and be thy mayster, and thou must be his scholler and receyue whatsoeuer is deliuere thee in his name. Lo here in effect what we haue to remember, concerning the exhortation that Eliu maketh here vnto Job. And herevpon wee may also gather that which I haue touched already: namely that we shall never profitte, till wee haue learned to holde our peace. And what is this holding of our peace wherof Eliu speaketh? It is that wee should not be to wyse in our owne conceypte, nor suttle to reply against God, to say how is this, or how is that? For wee muste be contented with that which God sheweth vs: because obedience pleasest him best of all things. And so yee see that the chiefe poynt of fayth, is to be quiet to Godward. For whē men are so presumptuous as to take vpon them of their owne reason to conclude vpon the things, which they ought to stande vnto: surely God will blinde them, and he must needes punish such pride. VVhat is to bee done then? wee are commaunded to keepe silence: that is to say, to beate downe all the prude that is in our nature, so as we may not thinke our selues to haue any wisdome of our owne: but may seeke it at Gods hand, and suffer him to teach vs that we may profitte. Now let vs come to that which Eliu addeth in generall. He sayeth, beare me ye wise men, give eare to mee ye men of vnderstanding: for the mouth iudgeth of meates whether they be safery or no, and the eare tryeth woordes. Here Eliu doth first of all tell vs and aduertise vs, that this doctrine is not onely for the rude and ignorant, but also for all men: and therefore that noman muste holde skorne of it, as though hee were learned y-nough already: for the wisedome may be more confirmed here, and finde that they loose not their time in harkening to that which is sayd and contayned here. And vndoubtedly if wee knew what is in vs, wee would be more attentiu to heare the doctrine that is dayly preached vnto vs. And first of all, is it not a thrusting away of God, if wee take skorne to be taught, as though he had ordyned an vnprofitable thing?

Beholde, it is Gods will that the Gospell should be preached, and that menne should heare it and giue eare vnto it. But hath he sayd that ought to be done but onely of the ignorant, and of such as are still as it were in their Apce? Ne: It is spoken to the whole bodie of his Church, in somuch that he will haue both great and smal to followe that rule. And S.Paule sheweth that we must continue in this order till we be come to the perfect age, euen to the age of our Lord Iesus Christ. But where shall we finde this perfect man? He is not to be found in this mortall lyfe: wee must be bereft of this mortall body, and God muste haue taken vs home to himselfe, before wee can come to this perfection. So then seeing it is Gods wil that the whole body of his Church should be taught, yea euen the perfectest and excellentest sorte: shall it not be to lewd an ouerweening, if we beare men in hande that the doctrine is superfluous for vs, and that wee haue no neede of it? lette vs looke vpon the example of S. Paule who was a mirrour of Angellike holinesse, and yet notwithstanding he sayeth that he indeuered still to go forward dayly. VVhen he was neere death & had foughтен valiauntly for the honour of God, yet still he forgat all that he had done afore. And although hee had serued God faythfully and suffered many things for his names sake: yet notwithstanding he had his eye alwayes vpon that which was remayning, and sayd, I must not regarde that I haue done one thing or other, and in the meane while fall asleepe and not indeuer my selfe to passe further: but I must keepe on forwarde and streyne my selfe to come to that which remayneth. Herein(say I) S.Paule sheweth vs well what wee haue to do. So then lette vs marke, that wee muste not be to nice to shake off the doctrine which is set afore vs, as though it could serue vs to no purpose, or as though we were learned y-nough alreadē. For here the spirite of God exhorteth the wyse men, and men of most vnderstanding, to heare and receyue the things that are sayd. Therefore wee see that Gods wisedome is so infinite, as it can never be thoroughly comprehended. So long as men liue in this world, it is y-nough that they haue some tast of it, and profitte dayly more and more in it. On the other side, let vs marke well, that when we haue learned any thing, wee keepe it ill, and forget it out of hand: and therefore wee had neede to be put in minde of it: and God is so gratiouse vnto vs, as to set his mercie afore vs, to the end we should not be vtterly as it were desperate and past hope of trusting in him. For the vnderstanding of a thing in our brayne, is not all that wee haue to do: but it must morcouver be printed in our hart. This doctrine is not speculatorye or a gaze, (as men may terme it) as humane sciences be, (for in them it is y-nough to haue conceyued what they be): but this must be rooted in our hearts. Now let vs consider whether we haue such a beleefe of Gods will, as we neede not to be dayly put in minde of it, and shewed it. And so it is to be concluded, that the wise men and men of vnderstanding are counseled here to herken and giue eare: and thereby (as I sayd) all lostinesse must be layde downe, and wee must intend to be taught of God. And so much the more must we follow the rule that is giuen vs here, because wee see that the world findeth no tast in Gods woord. The ignorant (because they know not what it is) do shet it out of their dores, and are loth at any time to come to good doctrine. The fickleheaded (assonne a: they heare but some woerde at a glaunce) thinke themselues to be so greate Clarkes, as they haue y-nough of it, and therevpon ouerpasse it, according as we see too much experiance of it in these dayes. Howe many are there that haue their eares stopped, and which, although the woerde of God do dayly sounde forth, so as they might be partakers of the doctrine of lyfe and saluation, yet notwithstanding make none account of it? And why? For they haue no taste of it. There are some to be seene, who hauing vnderstoode some small thing of the Gospell, do beare themselues in hand that they are so great clarkes, as they neede not to heare any more. VVhat a number of these fantasticall and lightheaded Christians are there which say, as for me I vnderstood the truth, it is thus many yeeres ago since I knew the Gospell. And what knowe they of it? That a man may well eate flesh vpon the frydayes, and that a man is not bound to shrieue himselfe: and therevpon they fall to babling, and mingle cursed blasphemies with the slender things which they know. I wote not how. And why? For they hilde skorne to be taught in Gods schole. For somuch then as we see that God doth so punish mens negligence: wee ought to take the more heed of this doctrine, and to marke well how Salomon sayeth, that the wise man shall grow continually in wisedome by hearing. Prov. 1.4.5. Now if God so punish the negligence and ouersight of men: what shall become of their prude, when they shet the the gate wilfully agaynst all good doctrine, and conceyuing a disdayne against it, do swell like toades, so as they will not in any wise be taught? After that Eliu hath exhorted the wise men and men of vnderstanding to heare, he addeth the reason: For the mouth (sayeth he) doth serue to tast meates, and the eare to trie and iudge woordes. Hereby he betokeneth, that such as disdayne to give eare to God and to his truth to be taught by it, and seeke not to be confirmed more & more in the things that they haue heard already: peruerit the order of nature, and become as it were monsters, and worse than brute beasts. And why? For a beast followeth his owne kinde: but behold, a man which shall call himselfe wise, hauing reason and discretion, and which was created after the image of God to be inlighened in all truth, shall notwithstanding give his minde dayly to eate and drinke, but not to profit in Gods woerde. He hath that point comon with the brute beasts: for they be nurished with foode and seeke no further. And a man, who would be more excellent than the Angels of heauen, doth notwithstanding give himselfe wholly to eating and drinking like a beast, and in the meane season vouchsafeth not to vse his eares, which he hath receyued to a more noble and precious intent than eating and drinking. For these serue but to maynteyne vs in this transitory life: but the other serue to give vs hope of the euerlasting life and saluation. Then if a man will not vse such a gift of God: must he not be esteemed as a monster agaynst nature (as I haue sayde) or as a double beast? Now we see what Elius meening is: for he sayeth to vs, my friends, if any man refuse to be taught, marke what he doth: for when God created vs, he gaue vs a mouth to tast meates, to the intent we should receyue foode dayly at his hand. And the same is a benefite which we ought to esteeme, in that our Lord nourisheth vs by it, but that is not the principall benefite. For he gaue vs eares also. And to what purpose? For to be taught by. They are not to communicate one with another onely about the buying of bootes, shooes, cappes, bread, and wine: the vse of the tongue and of the eares is yet more noble: that is to wit, to leade vs into truth by the meane of Gods woord, that we might know how we were created incorruptible, and that when wee be passed out of this world, there is an heritage prepared for vs aboue, and (to be short) to bring vs vnto God. Fayth commeth by hearing as sayeth S. Paule. Seing then that God hath ordeyned our eares to so excellent an vse as to lift vs vp to heauen to beholde our God, and to behold him as our father, and to witnesse vnto vs that he receyuethe vs as his children, and to sowe the seede of the incorruptible life in vs in the middes of the corruptions that are in vs: seing (I say) that wee may obtaine such a benefite by the eare, should wee play the deafe men, or stop our eares when men speake vnto vs & tell vs of the truth which we know to be for our saluat[i]o[n]. Is it not an ouer great beastliness to do so? Then muste not a man boast any more of perfectnesse, wisedome, and vnderstanding, if he cannot abide to be taught. But contrarywise he is worse than all the beasts in the worlde as I haue shewed before. And altho[ugh] this sentence of it selfe haue no neede of long exposition: yet notwithstanding wee haue neede to bee quickned and stirred vp to know it. For wee see in what case wee be. Every man is busie ynough about the things that concerne this present lyfe: but as for our own saluation and the glory of God, a man cannot bring vs to thinke vpon them. VVee are carefull ynough to eate and drinke, not onely to dresse it three or fourre houres aforehand, but also to make prouisiō a long time afore, yea euen for fourre liues. For men haue so greate care to compasse transitorie goodes, to the end they may never haue want, that they are euer in had with them. And although they haue ynoch enough to finde the during their life: yet they beare themselues in hand that they should want euen after their death. Yee see then how wee be giuen to the transitory things of this worlde, without considering that God hath not created vs as brute beasts, but hath giuen vs a more excellent thing than our body, which is the hope of the eternall life that we looke for. Seing then that of very nature we be so brutish: we haue so much the more neede to marke that which is shewed vs here: that is to wit, that seing God hath created and fashioned vs, and that there is no parte of vs nother in our body nor in our soule, which is idle: but that al ought to be applied to some vse: wee ought to make all those things auayable which God hath giuen vs. Seing also that we are so buzied in our earthly cares, that some marre themselues with eating and drinking, and are alwayes at their gluttony and riot: and other some are busie in pintching and gathering, and desire nothing but to heape vp more and more: and other some followe their whoredome, and other some their ambition, to get them estimation and credite in the worlde, let vs bethinke our selues better. Seing then that we be hilde so fast here beneath, what is to be done? Let vs indeuer to turne away from all these pluckings backe, and consider wherfore our eyes are made. Is it but onely to beholde the things that may serue for this life, and to lust after them, because our flesh liketh well of them? No: but the chifest cause is, that we should behold Gods workes, whereby he calleth vs to him. And wherefore were our eares made? Onely to haue intercourse one with another about our worldly matters and businesse? No: but to the end, wee might be taught to come vnto our God, and to sticke wholly vnto him, and to atteyne to his heauenly glory. Seing then that in the middes of the corruptions of our body, our Lorde hath set meanes to bring vs to the sayd incorruptible benefite, namely by giuing vs the sense of hearing: ought we not to put it to that vse? if wee do not so, surely wee shall haue no excuse. Nother must we alledge that which many menne caste forth: namely, I can no skill of Gods woerde, for it is to high and darke for mee, and I cannot fassen vpon it. Yea but in so doing wee distrust God, that he giueth vs not witte and discretion to receyue the thing that is for our saluation. For he hath promised vs that he will teach the lowly. And therefore let vs distrust all our Psal. 19. v. 8. owne senses, and confess that wee are wretched beasts, Math. 11. d. and he will inlighen vs by his holy spirit. Let vs trust in the promise that he hath giuen, namely that he wil be the scholemaster of the humble and mecke, to instruct them to saluation, so that if we suffer our selues to be governed by him, he will bring vs into the right way, and when he hath once set vs in it, he will make vs go forwarde more and more: and although wee be nowe and then thrust out, yet will he set vs in agayne: and although wee fall, yet will hee lift vs vp with his hande. Thus yee see still what wee haue to marke in this texte. For it is not sayd onely that the eare shall heare, that is to say, that it is created but onely to heare: but it is also layd, that it shal iudge of wordes or matters: as if Eliu should say, that our Lord hath not giuen vs the opening of our eares to receyue the doctrine that is told vs, as a poysone; but to the end to receyue the doctrine that serueth to the spirituall feeding of our soules: like as when we receyue bread and wine, we are not afraide to eate and drinke, as though we wist not whether it were poysone or no. True it is that wee must beware of poysone, and pray God to preserue vs fro it: but are we so foolish to starue themselves and to forbear eating and drinking, for feare least their foode bee poysone?

poysoned? No: for they can skill of meate to discerne whether it be moysoned or no. So then let vs vnderstand, that our Lord hath not giuen vs the vse of our eares, to the end we should be afryd to receyue the doctrine, because we thinke it to high and to darke for vs: but it behoueth vs to pray God to giue vs the spirit of discretion and iudgement, to the end we may apply that thing to our profit, which shall be declared to vs out of his worde: and therewithal so to governe vs by his holy spirit, as we may be skilfull to discerne the thing that is good & profitable.

for them, and to withdraw our selues from these earthly things, and be contented to be visited by his hand after any maner of way, acknowledging our selues to be so wretched and miserable creatures, as we deserue well to be utterly ouerwhelmed by him, and yet not forbearing to resort to his mercy, assuring our selues that he is ready to receyue vs into his fauour, and therefore desiring him to make vs continually to tast his goodnesse more and more, to the ende that in passing through the afflictions of this world, we may not cease to be comforted and to reioyce in him, and to blisse his holy name, sith that he hath once shewed himself a father and Saviour towrdes vs. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but &c.

The cxxix. Sermon, which is the second vpon the xxxijij. Chapter.

4. Let vs chooze a iudgement, and consider among our selues vvhat is best.
5. For Job hath sayd, I am righteous, and God hath ouerthrovven my right.
6. I also am a lier in my right: mine arrowve is greeuous vwithout any sinne.
7. VVhat man is like Job? he drinketh skornfulnesse as vvater.
8. He vvalketh vvith those that vvoorde iniquitie, he vvalketh vvith the vvicked.
9. For he sayeth, a man shall not please God in vwalking vvith him.
10. And therefore ye men of vnderstanding heare ye mee, God forbid that there should be vvickednesse in God, or any naughtinesse in the Almighty.

Hen the cace standeth vpon yellding of accouët of our life, wee must not looke to have any other iudge than God, who notwithstanding any appeale, will giue senteëe of vs according to his owne knowledge, and then will it be in vayne for vs to replie, for wee shall gayne nothing by it. Howbeit for as much as men are rebellious, and cannot finde in their hearts to confess that God is righteous, except they bee compelled to it: God vseth a maner of speach in the holy Scripture, that he is contented to go to lawe with vs, and that there shall be as it were some meane iudge agreed vpon betwixt him and vs. Not that any such thing can be done, but to the ende that we shoud be the more reproved and conuictid, in that although wee might go to lawe with him, yet would it not auayle vs awhit. And he

Esay. 1.6.18. speaketh after that maner in his Prophet Esay. Lette vs chooze men (sayeth he) to iudge betwixt you and mee. True it is (as I haue sayd) that there is no reason why God should abase himselfe so ffre. His meening is no more but to shewe, that although wee had libertie to cyte him and to pleade our cace agaynst him: yet shoulde wee alwayes be ouercome. After the same maner doth he deale here in this text when Eliu sayeth, Lette vs chooze iudgement, according as hee had protested heretofore that hee would not be afrayde to speake. Forasmuch then as Job had complayned that God abashed him with his maiestie, and that he had no hearing: Therevpon Eliu sayeth, Go too, I will not so fray thee that thou shouldest colourably alledge that there is no reason for thee: but I will come peaceably to thee, and it shall be lawfull for thee to speake as thou listest. If thou hast any thing to defend thy selfe withall, alledge it, bring it foorth, and lette it bee debated. Nowe that wee haue the naturall sense of this texte, let vs see how wee can apply it to our instruction. Firste of all then wee haue to gather, that although God haue all power ouer vs: yet notwithstanding hee iudgeth vs with such vprightnesse, as there is no fault to bee founde in it: and although wee had leaue to pleade our cace, yet should wee be put to shame. And this is it which hath bene handled sundry times heretofore: namely that God vittereth not his power agaynst vs after the maner of a tyrant which putteth no difference betweene good and badde, but intendeth to tri the vttermoste of his power: no, God hath no such lawlesse power (as yee might terme it): but as his power is infinite, so are all his doings indifferent and rightfull. True it is that wee do not always perceyue the reason of his woorkes, neither ought his righteousness to be inclozed within so small a measure as our vnderstanding: but yet notwithstanding it behoueth vs alwayes to be fully perswaded of this poynt, that God is in such wise mighty, as hee dispozeth all things with iustice and vprightnesse. Furthermore lette vs not presume to call him to the lawe, but lette vs assure our selues that wee muste before all things yelde our selues guilty. And herewithall let vs marke also, that if we had liberty to pleade, it would not be for our profite: for wee should alwayes be founde guilty: and although that he iudged vs not, yet would our owne cōscience condemne vs. And therefore let vs learne to humble our selues before God, & to know that he hath such power ouer vs, as he may iustly cōfound and ouerwhelme vs, yea and that with such rightfulness, as we shal not haue one worde to answere, which he cannot disproue if he list. But let vs now come to that which Eliu treateth of chiefly here. He findeth fault with Job for complayning that his plague was greeuous, and vndserued on his part, and that God had peruerited his right, that he was driven to be a lier although in very deede he had wherwith to iustifie himself. Ye see here in effect what things Eliu chargeth Job withall. But let vs consider whether Jobs meening were so or no. I haue declared heretofore, that Jobs meening was not directly to blasphem God, howbeit that he exceeded measure in his passions. Herken then wherin Job did amisse. He knoweth himselfe to be a sinner: he confesseth himselfe to be so, neither sayd he that God had no cause to punish him: but yet in the meane whyle he cōpared him self with others, and thought that God handled him to roughly. Thus the chiefe thing wherein Job ouer-shotte himself, is that he conceyued such a rigor in God, as he thought him to be ouersore, and that he ought not to haue pressed him so harde, considering that he was but a silic poore creature, and that his life and strength were nothing but smoke. But herein wee cannot excuse him. For I haue tolde you afore, that in handling of a good case he followed not a good order. Like as his aduersaries dealing in an euill case, vset good arguments and substanciall reasons. Therfore as cōcerning Job, although he had a rightfull case, yet did he misguye it. And why? For although he were patient, and determined to submit himselfe vnto God: yet did he not restrayne his passions from all excesse: like as when a Christen man indeuereth to tame himselfe, and to hold himselfe prysoner vnder the obedience of God: he canot do it with such perfection,

Gala.5.e.17. but that in the meane while he shall feele that the fleshe fighteth against the spirite, and that wee do not the good which we would do, as S.Paule sayeth. In which place he speaketh not of those that are fleshly, and which giue themselves the brydle in all euill: but of such as haue beste zeale to serue and please God. And surely he setteth forth himselfe for an example, saying that although he informed himselfe as much as was possible for a mortall man, to frame himselfe wholly to the will of God: yet was he not able to bring it throughly to passe. For when the temptations are great and violent, as they were in Job: it is impossible that wee should be so constant, as not to be shaken, and that wee should not bee tickled nor suffer much infirmitie in the battells which we haue agaynst our flesh. VVee see what happened to Iacob: he wrestled with an Angell, and therefore is called Israell: that is to say, preuyling with God: but yet notwithstanding he halted, and was fayne to haue a lame hip as long as he liued: to the ende he might feele, that hee had not gotten that victory in suche wise as there was no feeblenesse in him. And that is an example and paternē for vs, that although God strengthen vs by his power, so as wee ouercome our temptations: yet the same is not done without some markes of our infirmitie. Euen so happened it vnto Job: and Eliu doth iustly reprove him here. Yet neuerthelesse Elius meening is not, that Job intended to accuse God directly of vnrighteousnesse and crueltie: but he sheweth that he did not so glorifie Gods righteousnesse, as he ought to do. Truely he speaketh roughly, and seemeth to wrest Jobs wordes & to make them worser than they were: but let vs marke that it is good reason that the holy ghost shold bewray the vices that are in vs, although they leeme not greate vnto vs. As for example: Job confesseth here generally that God is righteous, yea and he knowledgeth him to be such a one euē in his own person: but yet was he tossed so roughly with his passions, that it slipped from him, to say, why doth God punish mee after this sort? There is no reason why he should do it: and if I might pleade my case, I would shew how I haue not deserued that he should be so violent againt mee. Such woordes scaped frō Job without knowing what he sayd. Howbeit if a man examine his meening: it is not of the worst sort. Only he was carried away with his panges, and it could not bee that he should not be so turmoyled with his passions, as not to skirmishe againt God. VVhy then doth Eliu reprove him nowe with such rigor? Because the least doubt which wee can haue of Gods righteousnesse, and the least disputing that we can make with him, is blasphemie though it seeme not so to vs. Lette vs marke well then, that here the holy Ghost discouereth the malady that was as it were hidden, to the ende wee should understande, that whensoeuer any fancies come in our head to darken Gods righteousnesse, or to deface his glory by any meanes, although we purpose them not: yet are they horrible faultes, and wee cannot condemne them ynoch, nother are they veniall sinnes as the Papistes make them. For they say, that if a man double of Gods righteousnesse, yea and haue many cursed imaginations rūning in his minde: yet are they in deadly sinne so he consent not to them. But this is to beastly a doctrine, and yet among the Papistes menne holde it for a certayntie. Contrarywise lette vs marke well, that here the holy Ghost thundereth agaynst the concyts that come in our thought, although wee knowe them not to be so contrarie to Gods glory: and moreouer that although wee minde not directly to accuse God, yet when wee be so intangled with wicked thoughts, and our passions tolle vs too and fro, so as wee are not peaceable to glorifie God, and to obey him in al respectes: wee canot be excused, but do deserue to be reproued, as if wee had intended to iustifie our selues and too make God guilty in respect of vs: or as if wee had charged him with iniquitie, & purposed to maynteyne our selues as though there were no fault in vs. And this ought to warne vs, to yelde our selues alwayes guiltie without any disputing when we haue to deale with God. For although our shittes might bee allowed of menne, and that we be wont also to fall asleepe in them: yet in the ende wee shall spight of our teeth, feele that God can in one woordē ouerthrowe all our long replies, and all the fayre colours that wee shall pretend. And therefore if there come any wicked thought to diminish Gods glory, and to make vs to doubt of his righteousnesse: lette vs learne to knowe, that wee are already entred into blasphemie, and that we are greatly to be condemned, yea though those thoughts passe away out of hand, and that our mindes rest not vpon them.

Agayne if wee haue any thought which tendeth not to any purpose of accusing God, but onely to some intent to iustifie our selues agaynst him: it is a blasphemy. VVhat is to be done then? Lette vs learne to confesse that God is righteous, and condemne our selues. For they are twoo things which cannot match togither, that men should go about to cleare themselues, and therewithal be able to glorifie God as becometh them, as he is worthy. God then neuer ha: h his whole right, except we be confounded and all things quite and cleane dashed, so as wee haue no defence againt him, nor any thing leftvs, but only to hang downe our heads. Lo what we haue to gather in the first place of this text. Neuerthelesse to the ende that this thing may be the better imprinted in our hearts: lette vs marke how Eliu sayeth here, that Job had walked with the wicked. As how? doth Eliu accuse Job to haue bene a despiser of God, and a man of disorderly life, seing that heretofore he had protested that he had walked in suche perfection, as it was harde to finde a man like vnto him? For wee haue seene that he was the eye of the blinde, the feete of the lame, and the father of the fatherlesse, that his hād had not bene shet to the poore, that he had not suffered the sides of them that were acold to curse him, that his house had alwayes bene open to such as had neede, that he had bene freendly to strangers, that although he had had credite, yet he neuer abused it, and that although he might haue bene borne out in place of justice, yet had he walked simply and oppressed not a ny person. How then doth Eliu now accuse him to haue walked with the wicked? This is according to the matter that he hath taken in hand: namely that when a man replieth agaynst the iudgement of God, he walketh not with him Therfore lette vs marke well, that although a man be nother whoremonger, nor thēf, nor drunkard, nor murtherer, nor quarreler: yet notwithstanding he fayleth not to be accessary of the greatest wickednesse that can be, if he glorifie

glorifie not God, but haue any poynt of prude in him, so as he cannot submit himselfe to Gods justice, righteouſnesſe, and goodnesſe. Then if wee yeeld not God his due honour, wee be wicked in ſo doing, although the reſte of our life were Angelicall. And it is a poynt which we ought to marke well. For (to our ſeeming) a man is righteous, ſo he cannot be charged to the worldward, and haue led a vertuous life. But in the meane while, think we it is no ſinne, if a man ſerue not god in ſuch humility as he ought? VVhen wee haue yeelded our neighbours that which is their duetie, and God is diſappoyn̄tēd and robed of that which is due to him: muſt we therfore neeđes be righteous ſtil? No: for if I be faultie for robbing of any man, and deserue euerlaſting death for the value of fife ſhillings: Then if I rob God of his honour, and go about to diſminihis maieſtie, is not that a much more haynouſe crime, than all the roberies, all the whoredomes, all the murthers, all the poſonings, all the periuries, and all other things in the world? So then let vs marke well, that whereas Eliu chargeſ Job, too haue walked with the wicked: it is not ment of the vices that are apparant to the worldward, as that he were a whoremonger, or a theefe: but that he had not glorified God in acknowledg- ing him to be righteous, but rather had contrarywife intended to condemne him: howbeit, not that he did it di- rectly, but that he murmured agaynst God, by reaſon of the torment of his misery: and that although the ſayde impaciency were mingled with pacience, yet notwithstanding it was to be reieced as a blaſphemey, and Job was to be condemned for it as an euill doer. And hereby wee be warned, that our liuing without annoyance, and without working any deceyte, harme, or wrong to our neighbours, muſt be in ſuch wife, as in the meane while our cheef regard muſt be of God, to walke before him in ſuch humilitie, as his prayſe may alwayes ſounde both in our hearts and in our mouthes, that we may glorifie him (ſay I) both with heart and tong alike: and when any heartburning or incomberance commeth in our mindes, lette vs yeelde our ſelues guilty out of hand, and not tary till we be condemned of others, nor till God ſende vs iudges to pro- nounce open and ſolemne ſentence againſt vs: nother let vs tary till he thunder from heauen, but lette euery of vs acknowledge the euill that is in himſelf, and miſlike even the leaſt and ſlighteſt thoughts that can enter into our imaginacions: affiuring our ſelues, that they be hoſtile and deadly ſinnes. Herewithall let vs marke wel, that God will not fayle to receyue vs to mercie, ſobeit that wee also be ready and willing to condemne our ſelues. But as for thoſe that deale ſtubbornely, and will neeđes diſpute and checke with him: they ſhall finde in the ende, that their wilfulneſſe ſhall ſerue them to no purpose, but to put the to double coſuzion. And ſo we ſee it is not without cauſe that God hath diſtinguiſhed his lawe into twoo tables, to ſhew vs that the ſeruice and honour which we owe him, goeth forment: and that then followeth the duery which wee owe to our brethren. The ſeruice of God therefore muſt be as the foundatiō of our whole life, ſo as we muſt glorifie him, knowing that it is the ende wherevnto hee hath created vs, and for the which he maynteyneth and nouriſheth vs in this worlde. And afterward according as we are bound one of vs to another, wee muſte indeuer to helpe and ſerue our neighbours, without hurting of any man. Ye ſee then what we haue to remember in this text. And now also let vs conſider the maners of ſpeach which are conrayned here. VVhereas Eliu chargeſ Job with this ſaying, I am righteous and God bath ouerthrowne my judgement. It is not ment (as I haue tolde you afore) that Job intended ſo flatly and ſhortly to accufe God of ouer-throwing his right. But lette vs marke, that when a man doth ſo precisely maynteyne his owne right, he cannot do it without derogation to God, and without aduauncing himſelfe agaynst his righteouſnesſe. And therefore it is a poynt well worthy to be marked. For it will be founde, that there is not any of vs which ſometime or other is not ſo bold as to ſay, that god hath ouerthrowne his right. And herewithall let vs marke well, that we would fayne be righteous when wee enter into that extremitie: according alſo as when S. Paule ſpeaketh of the glorifying of God, Rom. 3.19. and of confeſſing him to bee righteous, he will haue all mouthes to be ſtopped. So long then as men reply, and and whet their tunges to maynteyne their owne righteouſnesſe: they muſt neeđes haue God to be their aduerſary. And looke whensoeuer God afflieth them, if they cannot yeelde to cofeſſe that he is righteous in ſo doing, ſurely they aduaunce themſelues againſt him. Yee ſee then what we haue to do, if we will not haue God to ſet himſelfe againſt vs, and to condemne vs as guilty of lifting vp ourſelues againſt him, and of accuſing him of unrighteouſnesſe. VVee may well protest that wee had no ſuch meening, but yet the thing is ſo in deede: and what ſhall we gayne by denying it, ſeing the holy Ghost hath giuen his determinate ſentenece vpon it? Thus much concerning the firſt ſpeach that is conrayned here. And wheras it is ſayd, I am made a lie in myne owne right: Thereby he ſignifieth, that he was not admitted in his owne deſence: which is al one, as if ſome Judge were vnaſonable and cruell, and would opprefſe ſome good and rightfull caſe by their authority. Lo how Eliu doth here vprebrayde Job with his blaſphemey of God: [as if he had ſayd] oh ſee I pray you, I muſt be taken for guiltie: And why? Because God will haue it ſo, for he will not heare mee in mine owne deſence, he preſſeth mee, and my mouth is ſtopped, and if I alledge any reaſon, it ſhall not take place, nor be admitted. But Job ment not to ſteppre ſo far out of his boundes. Howbeit herewithall let vs beare in minde what hath bene ſayd: that is to wit, that if wee acknowledge not our duetie ſimply, it is al one as if wee would ſay that God vſeth a tyrañicall power ouer vs, and pro- cedeth not by reaſon and equity, but diſpoſeth things off and on, bicause we be at his pleasure. Although then that our mouth vter no ſuch woordes, yea and that our heart quake at the thinking of them: yet notwithstanding if we do not fully conclude that there is no deſenece for vs, and that we be guilty: we do ſtill enter into pleading againſt God, and wee muſt be condemned as defacers of his righteouſnesſe. As touching that it is ſayd immeadiately, that Job dronke ſkornefulneſſe as water: it is ment that he was ſo dulled, as hee perceyued not that the woordes which he had vſed, were vncomyly and worthy to be reieced, and that he had deſerued to be ſkorned as a wiſleſſe man. Yet notwithstanding wee haue ſeenē that Job ſpake many excellent ſayings, yea and that he was the inſtrument of the holy Ghost, ſo as wee may gather great learning of the things that he ſpake. Seing it is ſo then, why is it cast in his teeth, that he dronke ſkornefulneſſe as water? It is bicause that when a mans paſſions are ſo inflamed that he knoweth not what he ſpeaketh, it cannot be but that he muſt be caried away after that forte. Now if this befell vnto Job: I pray you what ſhall become of vs? His pacience is ſet downe for a rule, and I haue tolde you that the end which he had, ſheweth that there is nothing better for vs thā to abide the good pleasure of God in all the chaſtisements which hee ſendeth vs: whatſoever they be. And yet for all that, he is accuſed as a shameleſſe perſon that drinkeſt lewoneſſe as a fishe ſucketh in water. If this be layd to his charge, and rightly: I pray you what what shall become of vs , when we see our selues a hundred times impacienter than hee, and that there needeth no furtherance to make vs chafe and fret against God ? Ought we not too thinke that wee are worse than dull ? So then we see in Iobs person that the holy ghost ment to shew vs what we be whē aduersities comber vs oversore , and that our frailtie and feblenesse are so mingled with them, as we know not where to become, but gnash our teeth and chaw vpon our brydle, and are so straught, as we keepe neither way nor path any more . This is it <sup>10</sup> then which we haue to marke in this streyne. Now let vs come to the sentece which Eliu addeth. He accuseth Job to haue sayd, that it profiteth not a man to haue walked with God. This walking with God importeth that a man so giueth himself to the seruice of God, as he thinketh continually to gue an accōut, and acknowledgeth in himself after this maner. he that hath created & formed me gouerneth and guideth me, I cannot shun his hande nor scape his iudgement, and therfore I must be present before his eies, so as he shall see, not only all my works, but also my <sup>20</sup> thoughts. Lo what it is to walke with God. And the holy scripture doth purposely vse that kind of speech, because men are like Coliers sacks(as they say) which make one an other black . And experience sheweth, that when we walk without hauing an eie vnto god, ther is none of vs, but he taketh libertie to do euil, vnder the shadow that other are as bad as himself : and in the meane while also giueth occasion to other of his neighbors to do euil: insomuch that at this day, there is not any of vs, but he giueth euill example by some meanes or other, through the vices which <sup>30</sup> all of vs haue of our owne. And therfore when we walke with men, we walke in horrible confusion: all our life is like a hotchpotch, or a darke dungeon, so as nothing can be discerned in it. Behold(I say) what it is to walke with men. But what is to be done ? Seeing that in walking after the worlde , we become worse and worse, and euerie man draweth his neighbors vnto euill, and he himselfe followeth them as fast too: Is it not a peruerting of all order? Then there remayneth nothing for vs , but to gather vs <sup>40</sup> vnto God, and to frame our selues wholy vnto him. It is Gen.5.c. 22. sayd that Enock walked with God. And why? Because he was not peruerted, and although the whole worlde was at Ec.44.c.16. that time as corrupt as might be, yet notwithstanding Ebr.11.c.5. Enock continued vncorrupted. And wherof came that? Because he gathered his wits to him, and gaue not himselfe the bridle to deale disorderly: but although iniquitie was as a waterfloud vpon the earth, yet he knew that it behoued him to walk as in the presence of God. Furthermore, this importeth also , that wee must not regarde too haue some faire shewes, as many do which think it ynoch to be praysed of men, & to absteyn from euill to the worldward, and that if they haue cleare hands to outward sight, it is ynoch for them. But it is nothing worth except we haue our hart pure before God. And therfore let vs mark well , that when the holy scripture speaketh of walking before God, it meeneth that it is too no purpose to haue framed our outward life in such sort as our vices may not appeare : but that oure consciences also muste agree therewithall, so as we be cleane rid from all wicked and frowarde affections. Thirdly, our walking before God, must be to frame our selues wholy too his lawe. For if our lyfe bee allowed of men , and that we flatter our selues with our good intents : what is it? Nothing : according as wee see in the Popedome , that suche as imagine themselves to be most deuoute, thinke that God is very muche in their dette : but yet for all that bycause they despise the holy Scripture, and leane too their owne iuentiones which they haue buylded at aduenture , all is but trash and filthinesse. And therefore let vs marke, that if we will liue well, and haue a right and certaine rule, it behoueth vs to walke with God, that is to say, too walke vprightly: we must frame both our thoughts & our dedes vnto his cōmandement, & not vnto mens devices, nor to our own imaginations. Thus much concerning this saying. Now let vs come to the principall point . How is it ment that Job shoulde say that it shall stand a man in no stead to haue walked with God? It is because he was as it were astraught in his tormentes, and knewe not that God assisted him for that he had serued him, and conformed and ruled his life in all righteousnesse. True it is that Job knew generally that God was righteous, & that we must not esteeme or measure his righteousness by the present state of the world, and the things that are seene with our eies. For ye see also that the controuersie which he had against his frends, was that the good men are afflicted and troubled in this worlde , and that the wicked do prosper, and so that God hath a higher iudgement which hee reserueth to himselfe , and therefore that we must not restraine our vnderstanding to the things that we see presently, nor thinke that God doth in this worlde render euery man that which is prepared from him: for it were too much brutishnesse to haue any such thought. Job the Iob.31.b.16. hath discussed this case alreadie. But what for that. In the meane while he ceassed not to be as it were dazeled whē he came to thinke vpon his afflictions. He was so caryed away, that he asked, where am I ? VVhat haue I woon by giuing my self so to the obeying of God? Forasmuch the as Job was so dismayd, & started aside: he is iustly vpbrayed with the vttring of this blasphemie, that it shall not boote a man to haue walked before God. And hereby we be warned to bridle our selues, whē we behold the things that are done in this world: and not to fall into imagination to say, why doth God dissemble thus? VVhy doth he suffer his Church to be turmoyled so? VVhy are there so great outrages done ? I say let vs bridle our selues short. And why? for if we do but imagin that any of these things are straunge, it is asmuch as if we blasphemed God. True it is that our lord imputeth not that blasphemie vnto vs: howbeit, that is of his own goodness: neuertheles we are guiltie of it. And here in the person of Job the holy ghost reproueth vs, to the ende we should mislike of such blasphemie and abhorre it, and that as soone as there cōmeth any euill imagination in our thought, we should put it away, knowing that the same would leade vs too a greater blasphemie if God withhold vs not. Furthermore, let vs marke, that it behoueth vs to be so much the warer in that behalfe , because we see that Gods seruants haue bin so tossed with that tempest. True it is that when Jeremic asketh why the wicked prosper, & why God fauorthē the, Iere.32.s.1. (as it seemeth) he protesteth that god is righteous, & that his iudgements are rightfull, & he vseth this preface for a bridle. Lord(saih he) I know that thou art righteous: but yet for alij that he escapeth not vnshaken. VVe see what Abacuk sayth in the same respect. Abacuk doth the like, & therin he sheweth that he was restrainyd with the fear Hab.1.c.3. & reverence of god, but yet was he troubled in his mind. David confesseth that there hapned much more vnto him. For we see how he said, then haue I washed my handes in vaine, & my giuing of my self to al righteousnesse, & my Ps.73.b.13 indeuering to serue God hath bin but lost time. Seing that David came to that point, I pray you what shall we looke for ? And so it is true that he reproacheth himselfe, and therwithall confesseth that his foote was vpon yee, so as he was readie to fall. And afterward he addeth, Lord I am a beast, I am no more a man, nor worthie to be called a reasonable creature, but am become vterly, brutish like R.

an Asse or an horse, and therefore Lord thou must holde me with strong hande , or else I am vndone. Seeing that Dauid confesseth that hee was not exempted from such temptations : I pray you how shall we do , as I said afore. And thiſ is the cause also why Esay vttereth this saying,

Bsa.3.b.10. (say ye there is a reward for the righteous) not as a common saying, but as a singular one. He exhorteth the faithfull to conclude, & fully to resouue themselues, that there is a reward for the righteous: that is to say, that they shal not lose their labor in seruing God This seemeth too bee a common saying, and yet notwithstanding the Porphet Esay maketh a singular one of it. And the reaſon is,because things are out of order in the world, as they shall be at all tymes, and therefore the faythfull are(to their owne vnderstanding ) vtterly dismayde , saying : why doth God afflict vs with such rigour ? VVe be readie too murmur immediatly, yea and wee should fall too blaspheming of God, were it not that he holdeth vs backe , and declareth vnto vs, that the things which he doth are not in fauor of the vnbeleeuers. So then although hee seeme to haue forgotten vs, yet notwithstanding wee must assure our selues that he will pitie vs , and that in the middes of his rigor he will asswage his stripes, yea and that we shall bee discharged at his hande : for we should be ouerwhelmed a hundred thousand times, and vtterly perish , if he preserued vs not by his infinit goodnessse. Thus much concerning this poynt, wherein Job was condemned for saying that it shal not boot a man at all to haue walked with God. It is not for that he was throughly perswaded it was so : but because he was amazed in his sorowes, and considered not Gods guiding & ordinance,as he ought to do. True it is that he alwayes knew it in part : but yet is he condemned, because hee hilde nohimselfe so quiet and feasable as he ought to haue done. Then are we a hundred thousande tymes more to bee condemned than he, if wee learne not to be our owne judges , to the ende we may bee acquitted before God. Nowe it is sayde for a conclusion, God forbid that euer there shoulde bee iniquitie in God, or vnrighteousnesse in the Almighty. Here wee haue to note, what the summe of Elius wordes is, that we may take profitte by the whole discourse that we shall see in this Chapter. It is, that it behoueth vs too gloriſie God as righteous. That then is the summe of the whole Chapter. Surely this seemeth verie common, and that it is no neede at all to speake of it , because that (too see too) no man dareth denie that God is righteous. But yet notwithstanding a man shall hardly find one amongs a hundred, that acknowledgeth Gods righteousnesse as he ought to doo : but that euē they which doo it best, do fayle in ſome poynt. I ſay that euē the righteouſest ſhall be tempted too the doubtes which I haue ſpoken of . VVhat ſhall become then of the worldly and brutiſh ſort, which are not acquainted with the magnifying of God , nor haue giuen their minde to it ? And therfore let vs assure our ſelues that whosoeuer ſhal haue borne away this doctrine of confeffing that God is righteous, and be throughly perswaded in it : ſhall haue profited greatly , not for a day or twaine , but for a hundred or a thousande yeaſes, if he liued ſo long in the worlde. Howbeit it behoueth vs to conſider after what ſort wee ſhoulde conſeffe God too bee righteous . Truely this matter cannot as nowe bee treated of at length, but yet muſt I ſpeake a worde of it, to open a gap to that which ſhall followe. After what ſort then do we conſeffe God too bee righteous ? It is when his onely and ſingle wyl counteruayleth all reaſon with vs, and that wee bee fuli perſwaded that all things which God doth are good & rightfull, although we know not the reaſon why he doth them. For if a man will acknowledge God to be righteous,no further than hee himſelfe is able to conceyue in his braine : what a thing were it ? Shoulde God not bee ſubiect vntoo vs ? But wee muſt fully conſclude in our ſelues, that God is righteous. And why ? Because his wil is the rule of all righteouſneſſe, in ſomuch that whatſoever proceedeth of him, it behoueth vs too honour it , althoſh we finde it ſtrange to our imagination. And althoſh it ſeeme to vs that it ought not to be ſo : yet notwithstanding let vs be reſtrayned with ſuch reverence, as to conſeffe that forasmuch as God is the fountainne of al righteousnes, it behoueth vs to think all his doings good. Thus ye ſee in the firſt place what we haue to mark. And againe let vs acknowledge this righteouſneſſe in all things that come to our imagination, in ſuch wiſe as we may alwayes beare in mind, that God is righteous. As how? VVe ſee the wicked reigne, and haue their full ſcope, and that greeueth vs, and too our ſeeming God is all that while a ſlep in heauen: and when he remedieth not things at the firſt dash, we thinke he doth not his dutie. But yet neuertheleſſe it behoueth vs to conſeffe , that God is righteous in all these things. Againe when wee bee troubled and affliſted, one while in our goodeſſe, and another while in our perſons, and we ſee that the whole Churche in geuerall is trampled vnder foote, and ſubiect to the tiranny of the wicked. VVhat is to be ſaid to it ? Yet muſt we ſtill acknowledge and conſeffe that God is righteous. And ſeeing it is ſo, let vs tarie till he ſhewe vs why things go ſo vntowardly to our ſeeming : and let vs auſſure our ſelues that his diſpofing of things after that ſort is not without cauſe. VVherefore let vs ſhet our eyes when things go cleane contrarie to our liking , and let vs onely ſettle our ſelues vpon the ſayde poynt to ſay , Lorde thou art righteous, and I will content my ſelfe with thy righteouſneſſe, vntill thou make mee to enter into thy ſanctuarie, and there perceyue why thou orderest the ſtate of mankind after that ſort. Truely if I ſhoulde followe mine owne fancie as now, I ſhoulde murmur, yea and repine agaynst thee, too ſee how things are confounded heere. But forasmuche as wee knowe that thou gouernest the whole worlde by thine infinite wiſedome and iuſtice: it is meete that thou ſhouldſt be alowed, and that we ſhould conſeffe that thy diſpoſing of all things after that ſort is righteouſ, although we perceyue not the reaſon why. Thus ye ſee how we ought to praſtice this leſſon in effect.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good god with acknowledgemēt of our faults, praying him to make vs ſo to feele them, as we may be ſory for them , that we may hate our wicked life past, and do our indeuer hereafter to frame our ſelues to his will, that he may receyue vs to mercy : and that in the meane while he will ſo gouerne vs by his holy ſpirit , as we may ſeeke al togither to please him, and to frame our life to his holy ſeruice. And ſo let vs all ſay, Almighty God our heauenly. &c.

The. ex xx. Sermon, which is the thirde vpon the. xxxiiij. Chapter.

10. God forbide that there ſhould be vnrighteouſneſſe in God, or iniquitie in the Almighty.
11. For he ſhal render vnto man according to his vyvorke, and caule euerie man to finde according to his vyvayes.

12. God vwill not condemne for naught, neither vwill the Almighty ouerthrov right.
 13. VVho is he that hath visted the earth besides him? or vwho is he vvhom hee hath set ouer the vvorlde? or vwho hath builded it?
 14. If he turne his heart to vvardes him, and dravy awy his spirit and his breath.
 15. Then shall all flesh faile togither, and man shall returne into dust.

E haue to lay foorth this sentence which seemeth to be meetly common, namely, that there is no vnrighteousnesse in God. Every man confesseth it, but fewe do know it, and are sully perswaded of it. If we be at rest, and God do to vs as we desire, it is easie for vs to consent that he is righteous: but so soone as wee be troubled, and any harme or aduersitie do cumber vs, we fall to grudging, and acknowledge no more that God is righteous, as wee had done before. Therefore it is not inough for vs to protest in one worde that God is righteous: but the cheape pnynt of it, is to ac-20 knowlede all his doings to be good, and too submit our selues willingly to his mighty power when we come to the practising of it: so as if he afflict vs, we enter not into pleading with him, nor be discontented that he governeth vs otherwise than our desire doth craue. Ye see then what we ought to consider in this text, where it is shewed vs, that there is no vnrighteousnesse in God. To be short, vntill we be come to so much reason, as to be quiet, and obedient vnto God in all things that he dooth, although things fall not out too oure fancies, purpose or iudge-30 ment: wee accuse God vndirectly of vnrighteousnesse. And why? Hee governeth the whole worlde, nothing shall happen but by the disposition of his ordinance and power. Then if we finde fault in the things that happen, is it not a bending of our selues against him that hath all power? So then let vs learne to submit our selues to gods prouidence, confessing that all his doings are good: and then shall we count him righteous, and yeeld him his due prayse. But if wee replie against him, and fret and finde fault at his doings: it is as much as if we blasphemed him by calling him vnrighteous. True it is that it cannot o-40 therwise be but that in our afflictions, we shall haue some heartburning: but yet must we subdue our passions, and holde them as prisoners, and conclude in our selues that sith that God is wholy good and wise, hee dooth not any thing otherwise than reasonably and vprightly. Thus ye see howe wee ought to fight agaynst our passions, when they rise in vs, and prouoke vs too aduaunce our selues agaynst God. Nowe let vs see howe Eliu proueth that there is no vnrighteousnesse in God: he saith, that he will render vnto men according to their wokes, and make euerie man find according to his wyses. This ought to be wel noted. For to knowe that God is righteous in himselfe, is not all that is to be done: his righteousness is not so shet vp in his being, as that it shoulde not be knowne vnto vs: but it extendeth every where, and must be knowne cheefly in vs. VVill we then know how God is righteous? Let vs looke every where about vs, and we may well espie his righteousness, in considering that the world is gouerned by him with such equitie, as there is no fault to be found in it. And surely if euery man be called into his right aray there is none that shall haue occasion to complaine, but all men must needs confess, that his bearing with them is of his infinit goodnessse, and that his punishing of them is by his rightfull rigour. Lo what we haue to gather as now vpon the reason that Eliu alledgedh. And it is a very notable poynct as I haue sayd afore. For whereas he speakest to vs of Gods righteousness: we must not imagin that he is righteous onely in himselfe: but consider his righteousness as it becommeth vs, and extende it as we ought to do, that is to wit, to the whole government of the worlde. In what wise then is God righteous? Because he guideth all things vprightly: and looke whatso-50 ever we see, it behoueth vs to allow it as rightfull, because it proceedeth from him: I meane not the sinnes that men commit: but I meane that God disposeth all things in such wise in his souereyne prouidence, as it behoueth vs too thinke all things good that proceed from him. And therefore when any of vs commeth to examin himselfe: let him understand, that there is no couert for him too pleade agaynst God, neither can God be accused of crueltie, nor any man say that he misincreateth him: but he must of necessitie allowe his righfulness in his gouerning and guiding of vs. Furthermore, if we will comprehend this matter, and be throughly perswaded of it: every of vs must first search himselfe, and consider aduisedly what a one he is. For what is the cause that we are so waywarde, and that whatsoever God do vnto vs, hee cannot content vs, but we are always so malapert as to lift vp our selues against him: but that wee bee binded with vaine selfsoothings, and every of vs thinketh himselfe to be righteous, because wee thinke not vpon our sinnes. And therefore if we once haue the skill to know well our owne faultes: it is certaine that all replying agaynst God, will cease and be dispached, so as euerie of vs will come humbly and say, Lorde thou hast handled me after such a sort as I must needes acknowledge thy righteousness and glorifie thee. But what? VVe can-60 not forbeare to beguile our selues. And although wee haue not any thing to replie: yet will wee always lessen our faultes, yea and couer them though they be never so notorious. And forasmuch as we be so fast allepee in our sinnes through our hypocrisie: it is easie for vs to lift vp our selues agaynst God. Therefore if men bee desirous to acknowlede that God is righteous, to the end to yeeld him his deserued prayse: the true remedie is, first to make their owne inditement, and to accuse and condemne the selues: and then will it be no hard matter to them to acknowledg that God is righteous. For they be sufficiently convicted in themselves, that hee hath not misinreated them nor done them any wrong, but that his chastisng of them hath bin for their offences: and that although he hath vsed some rigour towards them, yet notwithstanding he hath alwayes borne with them of his goodnessse & mercie. Thus yee see in effect what wee haue to beare in minde. And therewithall let vs marke, that when it is sayde, that God will render vnto a man according to his wokes, and make euerie man to finde according to his wyses: It is no: so ment as though God punished the breakers of his lawe out of hande, and mainteyned the good: but it is to shewe that God doth no man any wrong. Then may it well come to passe (as it happeneth dayly) that God will beare with the wicked for a time: for it is seene that he maketh no countenance when men runne ryot in all evill, nor seemeth to thinke vpon them, nor to see them. Ad that is the cause also to harden the wicked to make them the bolder. For vnder the colour that God punisheth them not out of hande, it seemeth to them that they be quite scaped and discharged. So the god doth not alwayes punish evill doings out of hand, nother doth Eliu meene that he doth so. But in the end when God hath delayed a long time, & prolonged the term of the wicked: at length he will shew that although he wayted for their repentance, yet he forgat not their misdeedes, but registred them before him, and packed them vp vpon a great heap, to increase the terror of his wrath. Their delay therefore shall be dearly solde vnto them, when they shall haue so abused gods pacience, who forbare to punish them at the first, to the ende they shoulde haue leysure to knowe their faults, & to amend them. Mark this for one point: namely that God executeth not his judgement at the first day in such sort, as we may perceyue with our eyes that he re-compenceth euery man according to his workes. And in good sayth what a thing were it, if he should punish sins, forthwith as they deserue? VVe would not looke for any other day: for all should be accomplished in this worlde.

Ro. 14. b. 10 And then where were the article of our faith concerning our rising againe, and our coming before the judgement seate of our Lord Iesus Christ? To be short, there should 2Co. 5. b. 10 be neither reward for the good, nor feare for the wicked and rebellious. And this also is the cause why it is purposely said in the holy scripture, that God will render recompence, or requite. Saint Paule speaking of the righteous-nesse of God, sayth not that he will recompence frō day to day, but that he wil recompence. And whē? At the last day. Elius saying is not agaynst this sentence. But when he sayth, that God will render, he presupposeth the thing that is true: namely that it behoueth vs to hold our minds at a stay, vntill God shewe vs the things that are hidden from vs for a time. Our sayih (I say) must bee exercised in wayting patiently for the things that we perceyue not as yet. It is ynpough for vs that God giueth vs some tokens of his iustice, and sheweth vs some notable examples, whereby wee are inforced to feele, that hee hath an eye vnto men too punish their offences. If God giue vs any recordes of it, let vs bee contented, and in the meane while bee pacient, vntill wee knowe the things that hee as nowe reserueth too himselfe. Thus ye see how wee must take this sentence to applie it too oure vse. The 40 seconde poynt is, that God doth not so recompence e-uerie man according too his workes, but that hee also beareth with them whome hee punisheth, and sheweth them some fauour, althoough that on the one syde hee bee rigorous too them, and make them feele that hee is their Judge. Howebeit, that is too do vs too wittie, that as in respect of the worlde, God passeth not to punishe our sinnes, it is suche measure as they doo deserue.

For what a thing were that? Hee shoulde not sende vs diseases, wantes, and suche other things: but hee shoulde thunder vppon vs, and ouerwhelme vs at the first blowe, so as wee shoulde not feele some terrible punishment, but hee shoulde arme himselfe in his mightie Majestie too confounde and ouerwhelme vs. For what are our sinnes? So then let vs marke that God punisheth not sinners oute of hande, and maketh them too feeble his vengeance in full measure, as they haue deser-ued it: but beareth with them so, that all the chastizementes which wee receyue in this worlde, are but Gods warnings, in giving vs leysure too repente. Not that the 50 same shall profit all men: for the wicked are condemned alreadie, by cause they be past amendment, and God hath not onely framed their indiremte, but also sente downe their condemnation, which is readie too bee executed whensoever hee wil. Howesoever the worlde go, if wee consider wel the chastizementes that God sheweth vs in this world: all of them are nothing comparable vntoo our sinnes, but hee giueth vs respite too the ende we shoulde think vpon them. Thus see you yet one other poynt which we haue to marke in this text. And the thirde is, that God doth not so recompence men according to their wayes, but that he reserueth power too himselfe to pardon those whom he listeth, when he intēdeth to bring them back to himself. God doth not punish his chosen. And why? For it pleaseth him to receyue them to mercie, and to be at one with them of his own free goodnesse. And in so doing he burieth their sinnes, so as he entreth not into iudgement with them, as it is sayde in the Psalme. God then hath libertie to put away our offences without punishing them: and yet the same is no deroga-tion at all to his iustice. And why? For when God listeth to forgiue our sinnes, howe dealeth he? Hee nourisheth not the euill in vs: but he toucheth vs with it, and sheweth vs it, and maketh vs to feele how sore we haue offended him, and afterwarde giueth vs a minde to be sory, and to mourne for our sinnes. VVhen we be so touched with repentance, wee become judges of our owne faultes, and condemne them: and by that meanes God hathe executed his office. For it is muche more when a man condemneth himselfe, than if hee were condemned of God, and gnasheth his teeth, and aboade still vnamenable and stubborne in his wickednesse. Therfore God forgetteth not his office, when hee draweth vs too repentance: For hee pardoneth not our sinnes too the intent too cocker vs, but contrariwise, too the intent too double his righteousness, so as on the one side we may feeble the euill that wee haue committed, and on the other side, hee may make his mercie shine vppon vs, too discouer the miseries wherin we were till he had set vs free from them.

And therefore let vs marke well that Gods forgiuing of the offences of his chosen, is no derogation at all to his iustice, that this saying shoulde not be alwayes true, that hee recompenceth men according too their workes, and maketh them finde according too theyr wayes. Nowe wee see the thing that I haue touched: which is, that to glorifie God in his righteousness, it behoueth vs alwayes to be perswaded in our afflictions, that we suffer not any thing wrongfully, but that God hath reason to chaste vs, and that if wee enter intoo quarelling with hym, wee shall but make oure case the worser. And furthermore, let vs vnderstande, that God dooth so bear with vs through his goodnessse, as wee haue alwayes cause to perceyue that wee are exceedingly bounde vnto him, for that hee vseth no extreeme rygour agaynst vs as he ought to do.

Finally, let vs vnderstande, that although he make vs feeble his vengeance: yet he sparcth vs, and that although he shewe himselfe rough and sharpe, yet doth hee inter-meddle his goodnessse with it: and therefore, that hee is alwayes righteous, insomuche that men shall gaine nothing when they thinke to quit themselues: but the best for vs is, that when we see that God calleth vs, and allureth vs to come vnto him, we fall to feeling of our offences before the blowes come, and be sorie and mourne for them, so as God may bee inclined to forgiue vs. Lo what wee haue in effect too remember in this sentence.
According heerevnto Eliu for the greater confirmation of it, sayth, that God will not condemne for naught, nor ouerthrowe the right. He speakeith no new thing, but ratifieith his owne matter, even by aunswering vntoo that which was alledged by Job. First therefore he sayth, that God will not condemne for naught: that is too say, men can never alledge that hee dooth them wrong, or that hee maketh them beleue that they haue done amisse, [when they haue not.] According as oftentimes a pnoire innocent

innocent shall bee oppressed among earthly judges, by charging him with a thing of nothing, wherein he is not faulty, and yet he must be fain to passe that way, & there shalbe false witnesses to face him downe though he were the righteousest man in the worlde. There then a man may oftentimes bee punished wrongfully and without cause. But it is not so with Gods iustice : he needeth not to shew why, or to keepe great registers for proofes or for excuse of himselfe when he is slandered by men: every man carrieth his owne indytement written and well sealed in himselfe. I say we need none other Judge than our owne conscience, and though every man knowe it not presently : yet will God waken vs wellinough, spight of our teeth : and when we shall haue flattered our selues a long time, yet must we returne to this poynt to bee conuictid, namely that he had iust cause to punish vs. And this is the cause also why Eliu addeth, that God will not overthow the right. For when we haue no better shift, we flee to this startinghole, that God is almighty and dooth what he list, and we cannot resist him, and that he dealeth crossly and ouerthwartly with vs. And although we speake not so : yet haue wee suche crooked thoughtes, so that vnder the colour that God is Almighty, and that we bee poore and fraile creatures, we woulde make him beleue that he tormenteth vs to sore. But contrariwise, it is sayd, that God peruertereth not the right: that is to say, that he never punishmenteth men without a continuall respect of bearing with them, according as hee knoweth to be expedient. And if there were cause to spare them any more: surely he would do it, because he knoweth what is meete for them. So then let vs practice well this lesson of humbling our selues before God whensoeuer he chastizeth vs : let vs keepe our mouthes shutte that wee replie not agaynst him, and therewithall let vs bee meeke, and let not hypocrisie blinde vs too sooth our selues in our misdoings. Thus ye see in effect, howe it behoueth vs to condemne our selues, and therupon to acknowledge that God is righteous in punishing vs, and that he ouerthroweth not the right that is in vs: so as if we haue a good case he will mainteyne it himselfe, and we shall neede neither Proctour nor Aduocate : for he himselfe will bee our warrant, as who desyreth nothing so much as to quit vs. So then if we bee condemned by him, wee must passe that way, and acknowledge that we haue well deserued it. True it is, that this will well be sayde ingenerall : but it behoueth euerie one of vs particularly, and in respect of his owne person, to haue this lesson well printed in his minde. And specially when wee bee beaten with Gods scourges, so as one of vs is pinched with pouertie, another with sicknes, and a third with some wrong that is done vnto him : on what side soever any aduersitie come vpon vs, let vs acknowledge that it is the hande of God which visiteth vs. And why? There is good reason that we shoulde do so. For wee bee wretched sinners, and ranke rebelles against him : and wee must not go aboue to qualifie our faultes and to say that Gods punishments are vnimeasureable, as though hee had no cause too punish vs. But contrariwise, though he shoulde execute a mucche greater rygour, yea even to the vtter ouerwhelming of vs: yet let vs confesse that it were not too mucche, considering that our sinnes are come to their full measure. Yee see then after what sort wee ought too vnderstande this sentence. And afterward he addeth, who is he whom God bath ordyned too set ouer the worlde besides himselfe? Albeit that the woordes whiche Eliu useth here doth sometimes signifie to visite: forasmuche as the sense is all one, we need not to stande mucche vpon the worde. To bee short, Eliu ment to say, that there is none but God whiche gouerneth neth the worlde, and that he hath not any fellow, neither is there any other creator to haue buildest the heauen & the earth, but he hath all in his hande, and guideth and gouerneth all his creatures at this day: so as nothing is done without his will. Ye see in effect what Eliu ment to say here. But it shoulde seeme that this reason is not fitte to mainteyne the righteousnesse of God. For his mightinesse is not in question here: and besides that, (as I haue touched alredie) sometimes vnder the colour that God is Almighty, men would accuse him of tyranny, as though he had no regard of our infirmitie and weaknesse. Marke then howe men take occasion to aduaunce themselves agaynst God by confessing his almightynesse, saying: It is true that he is the souercine, but yet it foloweth not therefore that he hath not good rray and gouernment of himselfe as he ought to haue. For albeit that men vex & torment his seruants: yet it seemeth that he passeth not for it, nor hath any regarde of them. But contrariwise, Eliu intendeth to shew, that God is righteous. And how sheweth he it? For he onely (sayth he) gouerneth the worlde. This seemeth to be nothing to the purpose. But when al is well considered, it is a pre remptory reason (as they term it) and sufficient ynochough to stop al our mouthes. And this is it which he meeneth by this which he addeth immediately after: namely, shall he which is unrighteous gouerne? True it is that in respect of the worlde, the wicked shall somtimes gouerne. And why? For behold kings which are borne of women, come to the crowne by heritage, and so likewise the princes. And they bestow offices vpon their bawdes, and vpon men of no value, as it is well knowne what maner of ones these Courtiers are: or else they sell the offices, and so all iustice goeth to wracke. And how are things handled where gouernors are ordyned by election and voice of the people? Not in the feare of God, nor in reuerence, as though they ment to ordyne officers that shuld raigne with iustice: but with flocking into tauerns, & there they comit the shamefulllest things that cabe. Then seeing that kings and their officers & magistrates that go by election, come to their degree by so diuelish meanes: the wicked must needs raigne. But it is not so with God. And why? Because that naturally he hath the souercin dominion of the whole world, & the same is due vnto him: he was not chosen to it by rascals that woulde faine haue all confusion to raigne, and which choose stich as shoulde support the in their euill, and do nothing but ouerthrow all good order & comon weale. God was not chosen in a Tauerne by parcialtie, brierie, and wicked practises: he was not called to his office by fauor, neither hath he it by successio of heritage, as though his Peers had agreed that he shoulde succeed after a mortall father: there is none of all this in him. VVhat then? He hath the gouernment of the worlde by nature: insomuch that the immortal being of God, & his authoritie of gouerning, are things inseparable. And this is it which is said in the xviiiij.chap.of Gen. Gen.18.d.15 by Abraham. For there Abraham reasoneth that it is impossible that God shoulde do any crueltie or outrage. Can he that is Judge of the worlde (sayth Abraham) destroy the good with the wicked? Now when Abraham sayth so, he meeneth not to counsell God to bethink himselfe as one of vs might counsell a mortall man, as Moyses speaking to the judges, and likewise Iosaphat say, bethinke your selues, for ye sin not in the seate of a creature, but the living god hath called you into this throne, & whosoeuer sitteth there, must not raigne as a man, but as the lieutenat of God. So then we may well admonishe earthly judges of their office. And why? For they may erre, yea & we see that mendo more comonly swarue aside vnto evill, than hold themselves vnto good and that is, oþt because they Deut.1c.15 2.Cb.1c.15 2.Cb.1c.15 are xviiiij.

are wholy giuen vnto euill, and also because there is no such vertue and stedfastnesse in most of them as ought to be, but though there be a good will, yet is there no such zealous indeuer as were requisite. Thus ye see howe the earthly judges had need to be put in minde of their dutie. For why? they discharge not themselues as they ought to do. But when Abraham alledgedeth vnto God, that it is not for the Judge of the worlde to condemne the good with the wicked, he saith it to another ende: namely to shewe that God cannot transforme himselfe, that he should not be alwayes righteous as well as he is God. Then is there nothing more peculiar vnto god than equitie, & if we accuse God of vrighteousnesse, it is as much as we would make him not to be at al. And why? For he is not God to be an Idoll, or to be a dead & idle thing: but he is God to gouerne the world: he hath his souerain maiestie in such wise in himself, as he must needs be a Judge: and being a Judge, he must needs be so vpright, as there may bee nothing amisse in him. According herevnto Eliu sayth now, that all things which he gouerneth must needs be done rightly, & that there can be no vrighteousnesse in him. And why? Because he hath created the worlde, and mainteyneth it vnder his protection & guiding. Thus haue we the true vnderstanding of this text: & now remaineth to gather the doctrine that is fit for our instruction. And first of a. let vs mark wel, that God hath not created the world to leaue things to hauocke, that fortune (as they terme it) might gouerne all: but he intendeth to mainteyning of his creatures as he doth. Therfore when we call God the maker of heauen and earth, we must nor restraine it too one instant: but we must beare in mind, that like as God hath framed the world, so all power is still in him, and he disposeth things here beneath, so as he hath a care of vs, and the heates of our head are numbred. yea and he guideth our foosteps, so as nothing cometh to passe, which is not foreappoynted by him. And it is expressly laid that besides him there is none set ouer the Worlde, nor none set ouer the earth: and that is, to betoken, that his creating of the world, & his governing of it, are things that go ioyntly togither. Then if we imagin that God gouerneth not all things, but that some things hapneth by chance or fortune: it followeth that fortune is a Goddessesse that hath created part of the worlde, and so is not all prayse due to God alone. But beholde, it were a cursed blasphemie if wee shoulde thinke that the diuell could do any thing without Gods leaue: for it is alone as if we should make the diuell a particulator of the world. Therfore let vs leare that there is an inseparabile bond betweene these two things: namely that God createth all things, and that he gouerneth all things. And that is the cause why it is expressly sayde, that God hath buy'd the Worlde. And do wee then thinke, that he now calleth a companion to helpe him to order his creatures? True it is, that God doth vse inferiour meane to gouerne the worlde: howbeit, that is not to diminish his owne authoritie, or for that he will haue anie companion: for he raigneth continually from aboue. What else are the greatest kings, but onely Gods handes? And hee serueth his turne by them as hee thinketh good. According as he by his Prophete Esay vpreraydeth the proud Sennacherib, who thought himselfe to haue made all things by his owne cunning. Yea (sayth God) what art thou ellē, but the axe in the hande of him that heweth? If a man holde a sawe or a knife to cut withall, and too serue his turne at his pleasure, can the toole turne it selfe against the man? No: but it is to shew that a man hath not onely his handes and armes to helpe himselfe withall: but also that he hath the things that are without him at his commaun-dement. Is there any power in mortal creatures, but frō the liuing God? do they not holde all of him? Then are we nothing if we be separated from him. For it is hee in whom we haue our life, mouing and being. Therfore let vs vnderstante, that when God vseth worldely meane, and serueth his turne by men, as by instruments: that is not to lessen or to streighten his own authoritie, but contrariwise to shew that he hath the guiding of them, & that if he do but commaund or whistle as hee himselfe saith, Esa.55.26. men must needs go forwarde to execute his will, yea & the verie diuels of hell are compelled vnto it. And although they bee vnwilling, and that it be vtterly against their intent: yet notwithstanding God driueth them by violent power, to execute the things that he hath ordene in his prouidence. And so we see nowe after what sort we must consider Gods prouidence: namely that hee hath a care of the whole world, and watcheth ouer all his creatures, not onely to foresee what may happen, (as some fantastical persons imagin that God beholdeth the things as it were aloof, which are here beneath, & then prouideth for them afterwarde) but also (which much more is) that nothing may be done which he hath not determined, so as his will is the rule of all things. Thus ye see what is shewed vs in this text. And therefore it behoueth vs to minde well the prouidence of God, too the entent that when any aduersitie befalleth vs, wee may alwayes go to the first cause. True it is, that diuerse tymes men shall doo vs wrong, as wee see how they had robbed Job of all his goodes. Men then may spoyle vs of our goods by deceyte or violence, or they may oppresse vs by slauders and wicked reportes, yea and a man may be wrongfully slaine. In these things it behoueth vs to acknowledge Gods prouidence as Job hath done. He set not himself against the theeuves which had robbed him, but sayth the Lord hath giuen, and the lord hath taken away: & yet notwithstanding Satan had bin the worker of it. But Job knowe that God which made the worlde, doth alwayes watch to gouern & guide it, as is shewed here. And therfore whosoever we be afflicted, although the same come from men, so as they do vs wrong and outrage: let vs assure our selues that God holdeth the raynes of the bridle aboue, and that it is his will to haue vs so afflicted, & that it behoueth vs to receive the same at his hand as of oure Judge, that we may enter into the consideration of our sinnes & yeld our selues guiltie as hath bin said not long since. I haue seen what we haue to marke in this streyne. And truly when wee see the wicked beare sway heere beneath, let vs knowe that it is a part of Gods iustice. Whereof commeth it, that things are so troubled, and that some men attaine to offices by wicked bryberie and parcialitie, and other some by purchaze, too the ende a non after to make their hande againe of the poore people, by fleecing one, and devouring another. It is because God perceyuing vs unworthie to be gouerned by him, giueth the bryde too Satan. Ye see then that all the wrongs which raigne are Gods scourges for our sinnes, as wee have seene heretofore. Seeing it is so, it behoueth vs to consider, that when the Princes and Judges of the earth are wicked, God intendeth too giue a greater glosse to his owne iustice, that it may be knowne vnto vs howe it is hee that afflicteth vs, and by that meane punishment the offences which we haue committed, shewing that we deserue not to haue him come neare vs, but rather to withdraw him selfe from vs, and to make vs feele that because wee are disordered and haue shaken off his yoke, and are become as wilde beastes, we are worthie to haue the diuell raigne ouer vs, & the wicked men which are his vnderlings and of his setting vp. So then wee see that that God deserueth to be glorified in all respectes, whatsoeuer troubles we perceyue in this worlde : and that it behoueth vs alwayes to come to this point, that seeing he is almighty, it is impossible that hee shoulde doo any wrong. He is no worldly prince reigning at other mens pleasures, nor set vp by wicked practises and pollicies, but he is the same by nature, and as he is God, so also can he not be but righteous : for his righteousnesse cannot bee separated from his mighiness, as I haue said afore. Now herewithall Eliu addeth, that if God turne his heart vnto vs to take away bis spirit and breath, all fleshe shall fayle, and by and by we shalbe changed to dust. Here Eliu matcheth Gods mighiness with his goodness. And so he sheweth, that when we be gouerned by Gods hande, we must needes feele that he is good and mercifull towards vs, in that we perish not euerie minute of an houre. And why ? For what needeth there more to turne vs into dust, and too bring vs vterly to nothing, than onely the loke of God ? It is sayde that if God do but blow vpon men , immediately their freshnesse chaungeth and withereth , and fadeth away. VVhen the Prophet Esay speaking after that maner of the strength of men, likeneth it to an herbe or flowre : he sayth, that if God do but breath vpon vs, hee sereth vs vp as a blasting winde sereth the grasse, and that is it which is sayde in the song of Moyses. True it is, that there is vsed an other comparison, howbeit it tendeth to the same ende : which is, that if God withdraw his spirit and breath, we perish. According also as it is sayde in the hundred and fourth Psalme. And it agreeeth moreouer with the text that I haue alledged out of S. Paules Sermon in the seventh Chapter of the Actes of the Apostles: namely that we haue our life, mouing, & being in God. Seing the that we haue no being any longer than it pleaseith God to shed his spirite vpon vs : If he withdraw that power, we must needes perish out of hand. VVe see then that the creatures continue no longer in their being, than it pleaseith God to mainteyne them : and that assoone as hee withdraweth that power, by and by all returneth too nothing. For a conclusion, the thing which we haue touched standeth fast : namely, that Gods mightie power is heere so matched with his goodnessse, as wee ought too knowe that he never vittereth any such rigour agaynst vs, but that he therwithall also spareth vs, because we should perish every minute of an houre, if he listed to withdraw his spirite from vs. For what is there in vs if we consider our owne strength ? Haue wee any meanes too preserue our selues ? VVhat moueth God to mainteyne vs ? Are wee worthie to inioy the benefites that he bestoweth vpon vs ? No it is nothing so. Againe, I pray you what bonde is there betwixt him and vs ? Furthermore what is our strength ? VVhat meanes haue we ? None at all. Then must we conclude, that there is no cause why God should preserue the worlde, but for that he himselfe is good and the fountaine of all goodnesse, so as hee is not moued by any outward reason to bestow the great number of benefites which we receyue dayly at his hand : but only that it pleaseth him to make vs feele his mercie and gracious goodnesse by experiance . Thus ye see that the onely life which we haue , is a sufficient record howe gracious and mercifull God is towrdes vs: and that although we were handled as roughly as were possible, so as we did but pine away, and were cumbered with continuall trouble and aduersitie : yet notwithstanding we bee conuictid by our onely breathing , that God maketh vs to feele his goodnesse. And why ? For wee liue not but in him, and by him : and if he withdraw his spirite, we by and by perish and turne to dust. But yet is life a precious thing whatsoeuer come of it. Thus yee see that men are alwayes indettid vntoo God howsoeuer hee deale with them. True it is that this poynct deserueth to be layd out more at large. Howbeeit forasmuche as the time will not suffer it : it shall suffice that euerie of vs do bear in minde the things that I haue touched, and that wee looke neerely too our selues, and acknowledge that wee bee nothing at all , so esteeming Gods mightie power, which hee sheweth towrdes vs, as we ioyne it with his goodnessse, and therupon be moued to confess him as he is, namely by submitting our selues wholy vnto him, and by beleeveng that he so gouerneth the worlde, that he doth not any thing but by weight and measure, and that he is iust and vpright in all his workes , and that we must confess him to be so, although it seeme straunge too our fleshly reason.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to inure vs more and more to the considering and knowing of them aright, so as we may learne, not only to confess them, but also to condemne them in our life : and euery of vs particularly to do the things which all of vs ingenerall are exhorted to doo , and therewithall suffer our selues too be guided by his hande, and paciently receyue all the aduersities that it shall please him too fende vs, to the ende wee may not settle our selues too muche vpon this transitorie life , but aspyre vpwarde too the eulasting kingdome wherevnto hee calleth vs , where all our ioy and felicitie shall bee truely accomplished. That it may please him to graunt this grace not onely to vs, but also to all people and Nations of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage of errour, &c.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the.14.and.15.verses, and then vpon the text which is added.

16. If thou hast understanding, heare vwhat I say, giue care vnto my vwordes.

De.10.d.17. 2.Cb.19.c.7. Sap.6.b.8. Ecl.5.b.15. Rom.2.b.11.

Hau tolde you heeretooore, that men are heere put in mind of their owne fraikie, too the ende they shoulde knowe that God spareth them, and that if we abode but one minute of an houre vpō the earth, we ought to think the same a gracious turne of his. And why? If wee haue any life and breath in vs, we haue it all of God. And so we see that he maynteyneth vs of his meere goodnesse. Seeing it is so: let vs not accuse him of too great rigour. For should hee not haue just cause to roote vs out vterly? VVho is he that coulde so cleare himselfe, as God shoulde haue no cause to punishe him? And yet in the meane while we see, that God preserueth the world, & every of vs is kept still in that aray, and so are wee all deters to his mercie. So farre is hee of from vsing any great rigour towrdes vs, that we ought rather to woonder at his pacience how hee can suffer such iniquities; and not thunder downe his vengeance at the firt brunt, and make cleare ridance of vs. Seeing it is so, ought any man to murmur agaynst him? But if we thinke it strange that hee beareth with other men, he may well replie agaynst vs, that he beareth with vs also. Therefore let vs learne hereby to gloriſe God continually in his mercie, no leſſe than in his power. For although he be almighty: yet notwithstanding hee restryneth himselfe bycause hee loueth vs. Also we haue one other verie necessarie exhortation too gather of this text: whiche is, that knowing oure owne fraikie, we shoulde learne to put our life into the hande of God, and not thinke to liue, or continue our state by our owne power, but suffer God to governe vs as it pleaseth him, and be alwayes readie to depart hence when he thinketh it good to take vs out of this worlde. Furthermore what is the meane to liue well? It is to knowe that insomuch as God possessteth vs; and quickeneth vs by his holy spirite, it is good reason that wee shoulde holde all of him, to the ende to bee giuen wholly too his seruice, both in living and dying. VVere this doctrine wellprinted in our hearts, we shoulde not bee such dullardes as we are: for as for the most part of men, when they rise in the morning, do they bethinke them too put themselues into the hands of God? And if they do it for fashion sake, is it for that they are touched to the quick, knowing that their life is but a little blast of winde that may vanishe away in the turning of a hande? Acknowleſe they that? No: So much the more then behoueth it vs too remember the lesson that is shewed vs heere: namely that our life is but a shadowe and a vanitie. And therefore it behoueth vs to put our selues into the hande of him that he will mainteyne vs according too his good pleasure, and also take vs out of the worlde in time conuenient. But as we are counſelled heere to humble our ſelues, and to challenge nothing to our ſelues of our own power: So contrariwise, we haue whereon too reſt our ſelues, in that wee knowe our life is not in euerie mans hande, but in the onely hande of God, who is the keper of it. And the Scripture sayth exprefly, that if he withdrawe his ſpirit and breath, wee die all. So long then as God will preferue vs, let vs boldely defie the diuell and all our enimies. True it is, that if we looke but vpon the rage of men, it ſhall ſeeme that they be as rauening woules, and we as ſillie ſheepe. They gape with open throte to swalowe vs vp, but yet can they do nothing to vs, till God giue them leaue. And it is not without cauſe that he chalengeth and reſerueth too himselfe the power of withdrawing the breath which he hath giuen vs. Therefore let vs be contented, affiuring our ſelues that God holdeth our life, in his custodie and protection, vntill he list to take vs out of the worlde, and haue caused vs to finiſh our course. Nowe if a man ſhoulde demaunde heere, whether our ſoules be as it were a winde, ſeeing it is ſaid that we ſhall perish when God withdraweth his breath: let vs marke, that although men bee immortall: yet notwithstanding, they haue not that of themſelues, but of Gods free goodnesſe. Besides this, what elſe is death, but a departing of the ſoule and bodie asunder? God then withdraweth his breath to himſelfe, when hee ſendeth vs into dust and rotteneſſe: and yet neuertheleſſe, he fayleth not to take vp our ſoules, and to kepe them til the latter day. To be ſhort, Eliu ment to ſhew here, not only that we be weake and transitorie, but alſo that al our ſtrength is nothing, furtherforth than it is vphilde by the onely goodnesſe of God. And when he vndoeth vs to outward appearance, that is to ſay, in effect, he doth but the thing which he had determined as hee thought good. And that is the cauſe why we ought alwayes to returne vnto him, and to content our ſelues in that he hath a faſherly care of vs, as I haue ſayde alreadie. So then let vs not be like theſe giddie headeſ which truſt in their owne ſtrength, and thiſke they are able to worke wonders: but rather let vs with all humilitie and carefulneſſe, hide our ſelues vnder the wings of our God, praying him to guide vs in ſuch wife, as we may liue according to his will. Eliu hauiing ſpoken ſo, addeth an exhortation, ſaying: If thou hast understanding hearken to mee and giue care to my wordes. Here he ſheweth againe, that the beginning of true wiſe-domē, is to yeelde our ſelues teachable. Contrariwise, they that are ſo puffed vp with ſelweenig as they can receyue no doctrine, are ſo full to their owne ſeeming, as no man can tell them more: Suche are vtterly paſt recouerie. And therefore not without cauſe do we ſay, that the firſt entrance and foundation of our wiſe-domē: is to ſuffer our ſelues to be taught. And why? For let vs looke into our ſelues, and ſee whether our owne reaſon be ſufficient to know and diſcern all that wee haue need. Nay contrarywife, God telleth vs that wee be brutiſh, and that all the gay ſheweſ that are in men, are but vanitie, and their wiſe-domē viter follie. Seeing it is ſo, let vs vnderſtande that we haue need to be taught at other mens handes, that God (I ſay) might ſupplie our want. And therefore whosoeuer deſire to haue a well grounded wiſe-domē, let them learne to hearken to the doctrine that is profered them in the name of God, and let them yeelde themſelues teachable and lowly to receyue it. For if we be forepoſſeſſed with pride, we may well brag and crake afore men, yea and haue great reputation to be wiſe men: but beholde, God telleth vs that all is but vanitie and leaſing. And this is the cauſe why Eliu ſayth purpoſely, If thou hast understanding beare mee. For he ſheweth, that if a man haue witte and reaſon, hee will alwayes ſuffer himſelfe to be taught, that he may fare the better by it al his life after. Then on the contrarie part, we muſt marke, that if a man ſtande ſtubbornly in the thing that he hath conceyued, and giue not men leaue to tel him their mind, nor will heare any thing at all: hee is but a foole, or rather ſtarke madde. For it is a kinde of verie madneſſe, when a man ſhutteſ the dore agaynst all good doctrine, and weeneth himſelfe to be ſo wiſe, as hee hath no more neede to be taught, but refuſeſ all things, and ſetteth a barre before him, and if he woulde ſay, God ſhall come no nerer me. So then we haue a good leſſon to marke in this text: which is, that if wee will bee of a good vnderſtanding, we muſt ſhewe our ſelues too bee ſo, by receyuing quietly the things that are ſpoken and tolde vs. And contrariwise, let vs be ſure that God condenmeth vs for fooles fooles and witlesse persons voyde of all reason, if we bee so wilde headed , as not to giue eare too the things that men speake to vs, but reieet all good warnings : I say we are no better than brute beastes, what shewe of wisedome soever there be in vs. And for as much as we know , that we are rade of vnderstanding, and that the things which we are able to know, we know but in part, so as wee haue but a little taste of vnderstanding, and come short (Alas) of any perfection : it standeth vs in hande to practise this lesson all our life long. And therefore in consideration thereof, let vs bee the more moued to profite our selues. And forasmuch as God is so gratiouse as to speake every day vnto vs, and to continue the doctrine that is meet for the ruling of our life : let vs also continually receyue that which is brought vnto vs in his name, & still exercise our selues in it, to the ende we may bee instructed more and more in his will. Behold I say, how it behoueth vs to practise this doctrine. And therupon Eliu to continue his matter, maketh a comparison betwene the smalleſt & the greatest. For he saith vnto Job, baw durſt thou ſay to a king, thou art vnfaihfull, or vnto princes, you are wicked? If thou haddeſt a ſouereigne Lorde that reigned ouer thee, thou wouldſt ſtand in ſuch awe of him, as thou durſt not miſſebeaue thy ſelf towards him. Then let vs ſee if it be not a diueliſh furiousneſſe, for men to preſume too muſture agaynſt God ? For what likeneſſe is there betwixt them ? A king may bee wicked, what maiſtie ſocuer he haue: and when princes and gouernors are wicked, they will very ill diſcharge their duties : and yet notwithstanding me beare with them, by reaſon of their ſtate. But behold, God whiche accepteth no mans person , breaketh theſe great ones that are ſo honored of the world and, razeth theſe out as wel as the little ones, ſhewing wel that he maketh none account of the loftineſſe of his creatures. And herewpon who dareth open his mouth againſt him ? Now then we ſee what Eliu intent is. Howbeit, for the better vnderſtāding of this text, let vs mark that although princesses and gouernors be not ſuch as they ought to bee : yet neuertheleſſe God will haue them to be honored: and although that of themſelues they be vneworthie of it, yet hath God imprinted his marke in them, & will haue men to do him the honor to ſay, very wel Lord, theſe raigne in thy name, and therfore it behoueth vs to be ſubieſt vnto theſe. And ſurely this is no vaine triall. For if all ſuch as are in authoritiē did rule like good fathers, and that we ſawe with our eies that they had none other care but to gouern vs well: what matter were it to obey theſe? VVe would do it in respect of our ſelues, and that were no obeying of God, but only a regarding of our owne profit. Contrarywiſe, when wicked and frowarde persons haue authoritiē ouer vs, and we ſee notable faults in them : If we neuertheleſſe be mild to hold our ſelues vnder their bridle and yoke, it is a token that we reuerence god as he deserueth. Seing it is ſo: wee bee bounde for his ſake : to obey thofe whome he ſendeth, and whome he ordeneſt to be our ſuperiours, althoſh they bee vneworthie of it. And that is the cauſe why it is ſayde in the lawe, Thou ſhalſt not rayle vpon the ruler of thy people . God ſheweth well that there ſhall be Tyrants : and he manaceth his people with that punishment ſaying exprefly that hee will chafe them by ſending them wicked gouernours, whiche ſhall ſeeke nothing but too pill and opprefſe, and too raigne in all outrage: and yet neuertheleſſe hee willett men to honour them. VVhy ſo ? For although they deserue not that men ſhoulde acknowledge them for their ſuperiors : yet notwithstanding will not God haue thoſe to be receyued for his ſake , whiche otherwise are nothing worth ? Ye ſee then that we muſt be ſubieſt too such as haue publike power and authoritiē, bycauſe wee knowe it is Gods will to humble vs after that manner. Yea, and we ſee that the children of God haue bin faine to ſubmit themſelues in bondage too the vnbelleauers, when God did bring them too it. And truely wee ſee Dan.9.b.7. also the example that Daniell ſheweth vs, for hee ac- d.13. knowledgeſt that the raigning of the wicked is by reaſon of our ſinnes: and therefore wee muſt take it as a ſcourage of God : and if we cannot abide ſuſe a disorder, wee ſtrive not agaynſte mortall men, but agaynſte the heauenly Judge. So wee ſee in effect, that wee bee bounde too honour ſuſe as are in anie publike authorité. And why ? Bycauſe they bee not aduaunced by Sap.6.a.3. haphazarde , but it is God that hath ordeneſt them : Rom.13.c.1. according as it is written , that there is no power but it proceedeth from him. And if wee ſee anie disorder in it: wee muſt wyte it vpon our ſinnes : and therewithall, forſomuche as God hath ſtabliſhed the ſayde order, namely that Princes and ſuperiours ſhoulde be obeyed, Ex.22.d.27. and that we ſhoulde be ſubieſt vnto them : it muſt bee obſerued and kept among vs. Notwithſtanding, where- Act.23.a.5. as it is ſayde in the lawe, Thou ſhalſt not ſpeak euill of the Prince of thy people : it is not ment that menne ſhoulde allowe the euill wheresoeuer it bee : for oughte the dignitie of a man that is but a woorme of the earth, too ouerthrowe the rightuousneſſe of God ? Ought not this ſentence rather too haue his curse, namely, that cursed are they that call euill good ? But whereas God Eza.5.a.20. hath forbiden priuate persons to rayle vpon theyr ru- lers : it is to make vs too lie in peace and without trou- ble, and too yecleſe ſome reuerence too the ſeate of Ju- ſtice. For if that were not : there ſhoulde no more bee anie common weale among vs, but wee ſhoulde become worse than wilde beastes. Ye ſee then whervnto God had an eye.

Besides this, wee knowe that when God ſent his Prophetes, it was not to giue Kings and Princes power too doo euill, and no man ſhoulde ſhewe them their ſinnes : but rather it is ſayde , Thou ſhalte rebuke the Mountaynes, that is too ſay, the highest ſtates. And I haue purpoſely ſet thee ouer Realmes, and Kingdomes (ſay- Iere.1.b.10. eth God too his Prophetes) too the ende that all glorie ſhoulde be caſt downe : too ſhewe that the woordē can- not bee preached as it ought too bee, except the prea- chers rebuke the faultes of ſuſe as defyle and vnhallowe the holi ſeate of God , by abusing the ſwoorde that is put intoo their hande. They if there bee euill and wi- ked gouernours , they muſte bee ſharpely rebuked ac- cording too their deseruings . And this was not ſayde for the Prophetes onely : but Saint Paule declareth that wee also ought too obſerue the like in preaching of the Gofpell: that is too witte, wee muſt pull downe all loſtineſſe that lifteth vp it ſelfe agaynſte oure Lorde Iefus 2.Co.10.a.5. Christ. Those then that will needes bee ſpared , and haue their vyses vntouched, bycauſe they bee in ſome authoritiē: muſte go coyne a newe Gofpell : of which number are the kings in our dayes, which will needes be called annoynred and holy , and yet cannot abyde too haue their ſores touched by any meanes, but woulde haue libertie to peruerſe all things, and no man too bee ſo bolde as to open his lippes agaynſt them. But we neede not to go ſo farre as too kings and Princes : even thoſe that after a manner are nothing at all , if they come too anie ſmall degree, thiſke themſelues too bee aſpeti- gods, and will needes bee honoured, though they bee laugheſt too ſcorne of the worlde for their labour. Al- beeit that men ſee there is nothing in them, (as in theſe newe promoted rafcalles: ) yet notwithstanding they R.r.v. treate treade all good warnings vnder foote, vnder colour that they be a little aduaunced. Therefore they muste bee faine too marke this lesson, that is giuen them on the contrarie part: whiche is, that forasmuche as that loftinessse of theyrs aduaunceth it selfe agaynst God, because it stouperth not too the great king our Lorde Iesus Christ: it is for vs in that case to vse the freedome that God hath giuen ys. Thus yee see that the meane too obserue this doctrine, of not rayling or speaking euill of kings and princes, is that we muste (as muche as in vs is) reuerence the seate of iustice, bycause it serueth too procure the peace and welfare of men, and too auoyde troubles and seditions: and yet notwithstanding, that such as doo amisse, must bee rebuked for all their highe state and dignitie. For Gods aduauncing of them is not to the intent they shoulde doo euill, and confounde all honestie: but rather too holde the brydle, and too restreyne all things from confusion. Nowe then, if we must for Gods sake and in respect of him, yeld such reuerence to those that are of equall state with vs (sa- 20 uing that God hath set them in the seate of preferment) as too bee subiect too them: what shall wee doo when wee come to his soueraine Maiestie? For men of what degree of authortie soever they bee, whether they bee kings, princes, or gouernours, fayle not too bee wicked, except God holde them backe by his holy spirite. But the case standeth otherwyse with God. For hee hath evermore had soueraine dominion ouer all the worlde: hee was not ordeyned by wicked practyses: he was not set in heauen by Alehouse knyghtes, nor by I 30 wote not what Outlawes, nor yet by fauour and brybing of folke: neyther was hee chosen by wicked mens voyces, that they might say hee will beare vs oute, wee shall haue libertie too doo what wee list. No, no: God came not too his kingdome by suche meanes: neyther is hee come too it by heritage and succession after the manner of men, nor by chaunce. But inasmuche as hee is the euerlasting God, therefore is hee also bothe King and Judge of the worlde. Seeing hee is so: who daereth nowe open his mouth too checke agaynst him? VVee feare a king: it is well done, hee is too bee feared. Also wee stande in awe of oure gouernours: and good reason it is that wee shoulde doo so, seeing that God hath honoured them. But what is the whole worlde in comparison of him that holdeth all things in hys hande? And hee needeth not too lay open his hande too holde the worlde: but althoughe hee shette it, yet (as it is sayde in the Prophete Esay) hee will holde both kings and gouernours, and all the whole multitude of men, as one little graine of dust.

And seeing it is so, dare wee lift vppe oure selues agaynst him? VVhat a boldenesse is that! Therefore there needeth none other evidence too condemne such as chafe and sette themselues agaynst God, than the reuerence whiche they beare too men. Suche as spewe 60 oute their iniuries after that sort when God handleth them not after their owne lyking, and murmur saying, I cannot tell what God meeneth by it: is it meete that hee shoulde plague mee after this manner? VVhy suffereth hee the wicked too doo the worst that they can, and the good too bee turmoyled, and yet in the meane while hee remedyeth it not? I saye if a man shoulde aske these fellowes that make suche disputations, and are bolde too cast foorth suche blasphemies, whether they durst go too them that haue the swoorde in theyr hande, too rayle vpon them, and too spitte in theyr faces, and too say you are wicked: O I dare not, would they saye. And why? Thou art astrayde of a mortall man bycause God hathe giuen him some little sparke of his glorie: and commest thou too aduaunce thy selfe agaynst him that hathe made and fashioned thee? VVilt thou make no accounte of his power before whome the whole worlde in nothing? VVilt thou check agaynst him like a madde man, and thinke too geete the vpper hande of him? VVhen thou ouershootest thy seise after that sort, it shall bee to thy confusion. Thus ye see after what sort it behoueth vs to sende those that lift vp themselues against God, vnto the similitude that is set downe here.

And likewise, euerie one of vs must of his owne accord come too it when wee bee tempted to impacience, as surely these temptations do happen vntoo euerie man, so as wee bee prouoked too pleade agaynst oure Lorde as often as hee doth not as wee woulde haue him to do. Therefore when we be moued therenvntoo, let vs thinke thus: what? Thou durstest not speake agaynst a king, nor agaynst a prince, that were thy soueraine & had rule ouer thee: For why? Feare bridleth thee, because God hath imprinted some marke of his maiestie in him. And how then darest thou lift vp thy becke against him? Thou wretched creature, who art thou? It is sayde in Daniell that God sheweth well his prouidence, in that kings and princes are obeyed: for wee knowe that nos thing is more contrarie to mans nature, than too bee in subiection. So then if God gaue not authoritie to suche as are set in publike state, men woulde never obey them. And that is the cause why it is expressly sayde, that God putteth his feare into all the birdes of the ayre, and into all the beastes of the earth, so that if men were become vtterly brutishe, yet must they needs keepe still that vnderstanding, that such as are aduaunced too the seate of iustice, ought too bee obeyed. And yet notwithstanding, that is but a verie small portion of Gods glorie. Shall wee then go make open warre agaynst his Maiestie? Is it not the next way to breake our necks? If wee leape but three steppes downe, it is yronough too brooze vs, and if wee leape oute of a windowe, that is but a twoo strydes high from the grounde, beholde wee are deade. Now we would leape aboue heauen, and fetch gambaldes, and kicke against God, and shall we bring it about? So then wee ought well too consider the infinite glorie of our God, to humble our selues vnder it, which thing we do not. And it is expressly sayd, that he will not accept the person of the great: but without regarding eyther rich or poore, layeth his hande vpon all men, and rooteth them out in onenight: and even he strongest shalbe take away with out hande. VVhen we heare this, let vs vnderstande, first 50 that suche as are greate must not truse in their riches, credit, knowledge, or any thing else. True it is, that to the worldwarde they shall be honored, and it will seeme that they are able to mainteyne themselues, because they bee rich, & haue well wherewith, and also because they are in fauor: but all these things are nothing with God. Therefore let no man be proude of his owne greatnessse. For such as stand gazing like Peacockes at their owne tayles, do but run headlong into their owne confusion. For inasmuch as they flatter themselues, they become always the bolder to do euill: and that is no more but a further kindling of Gods wrath agaynst them. Ye see then, that greatmen ought too put this doctrine in vre, of knowing that God accepteth not mennes persons: and by the meanes thereof they ought also too looke that they trample not the little ones vnder theyr feete, and suche as are vnder theyr power. Marke heere too what ende this doctrine is applied, and to what purpose it is tolde vs, that God is no accepter of persons. And why? To the ende ende that he which hath seruantes shoulde not oppresse them, but vse them vprightly as Saint Paule declareth: and that he which is in publike authoritie, shoulde haue such a regarde in gouerning his subiects, as to know the to be his brethren, because that all of vs are the children of God, and he hath done vs so much honour, as to make vs the members of his only sonne our Lord Iesu christ. So then let the great men of this world learne to absteyne from swallowing vp of the little, and from vsing of outrages towards them: and let vs all learne to absteyn from aduauncing our selues proudly agaynst those that be our inferiors. And why? For there is no accepting of persons before God. And if men trust so in the shadow of their riches and credite, let vs assure our selues that God will judge them without regarde what they bee nowe, yea and that their damnation is readie prepared for them, so as they shall bee forced too feele that they are a part of the shape of this worlde which vanishest out of hande, as Saint Paule sayth. And heerewithall let vs marke well howe it is sayd that both great and smal shall bee taken away in the turning of a hande, and that God will make all too bee wyped away at midnight, in the time when folke giue themselues to rest, and when euery man seemeth to be at his ease: yea and that the strongest shall bee taken away without hande, that is to say, without any preparation. God shall not neede too arme manie souldiours, or too prepare himselfe greatly too ouerthrowe the greatest and strongest. Hee needeth no more but too blowe vppon them, or else too turne away hys heart, to the ende too drawe his spirite from them, and all shall perishe as hath beene declared heeretofore. Hereby wee may bee taught euerie man in his owne state. So then let the great ones knowe, that Gods aduauncing of them, is not too the ende that they shoulde dispysse others, nor vaunt themselues in oppressing the lesser sort: but rather let them knowe that they are so muche the more bounde vnto God. For what haue they of theirown? And seeing that all things bee giuen them: ought they not therefore too acknowledge from whence they come? Aboue all things let them remember what S. James sayth, let the brother (sayth he) which is exalted too the worldwarde, glorie in his lowlinesse. And why? For if the rich and such as are honoured, or be men of skil and credite, do glorie in their highnesse: they forget themselues in so doing, and are ynthankful to God, and throw themselues hedlong intoo destruction. Therefore it behoueth them to looke neesly vnto themselues, to know that they haue nothing but of the meere goodnessse of God, and that forasmuch as they hold ali of him, it behoueth them to dedicate themselues wholy vnto him, and not to take occasion to misintreat their inferiors, but rather to stoupe by applying themseluesto their brethrens slendernesse, as S. Paule exhorteþ vs to do. As touching the mean ones, true it is that they may well glorie in their greatnessse, seeing that God hath adopted them to be his children: but yet must we not therefore winke at their owne state. And specially whereas they are nothing too the worldwarde, but are utterly despised: let them acknowledge that they are lesse than nothing before God: sauing that it p'eaſeth him to preserue them by his grace. Ye see then how we haue one common lesson taught here vnto vs all. And therefore let euerie of vs in his calling learne to referre himselfe vnto God, and to holde of him both his life and all the appurtenances thereof. Furthermore, whereas it is sayde, that God will rype away the strongest without hande: it is too the ende, wee shoulde learne too put a difference betwixt God and men. For when the greatest princes intende too bee auenged of their en-

mies, they haue neede too arme men of warre, and too seeke meanes too bring their enterprise aboue. But if God woulde ouerthrowe and deitroy the whole world, hee shoulde finde no ier: hee shall not neede too craye ayde of others, or to wage men, or too bulle himselfe about casting of ordinaunce, or to furnishe himselfe with other artillarie: hee needeth none of all these things. But hee can without mans hande, withoute worldly helpe, and without straying of himselfe (I say) he can destroy all. For hee needeth no more but too breathe vpon vs, or too looke sternely vpon vs, and beholde wee are ouerwhelmed. And vndoubtedly seeing that hys looke maketh the Mountaynes and Rockes to melt, shall hee neede to thunder vpon vs to destroy vs? Shall wee be able to abide Gods looke when he casteth it vpon vs? Shall we bee able to abide his breath when he bloweth agaynst vs? Must wee not needes vtterly quale? Furthermore, this is purposely expressed too ridde vs of all the vaine fancies & presumptions which we haue when we bee wel furnished to the worldwarde. For although men dare not say, that they are sufficiently armed too withstande God, and to ward the strokes of his hande: yet doo they thinke so. And for prooef thereof, if yee threaten a riche man with pouertie, hee wil looke in scorne at you, and say, tush i haue this, I haue that. Hee will not spight God with open mouth: but howsoeuer the game go, he trusteth still in his riches, and ye shal not gaine so muche at his hande, as to perswade him that his goodes shall not warrant him. The man that is strong and in the lust and flower of his age, thinketh not that euer he shall grow olde, neither can they that are in honor, skill what shame meeneth. Lo howe men presume of themselues: and it is seene cheefly, in that the great men of the worlde do stand so stoutly against God, & cannot be tamed. I hee if men haue any fauor or credit, they haue themselues in hand that they haue a bulwark against god and make a rampire of worldly helpes. And not onely so, but also if a man come too tell them their faultes, Gods corrections can haue no place nor enterance vnto them, no, they wil not so much as heare them: to be short, men will never be made humble but by force. And why? Because of the vaine trustes wherein they sette themselues, when they think they are well garded and haue meanes ynough to defend them. And therfore it is purposely sayde, tba: God will destroy the strong without hande, too the ende wee shoulde not think too scape though we haue furnished our selues, and prouided long aforehande for all oure matters, so as it seemeth vnto vs that God cannot come neere vs. Then let vs not ymagine these vaine fancies, for God can tell well ynough how to intrap vs by some meane that we cannot conceyue. Our destruction shall come without hande, or withoute inferiour meane.

Lo howe wee ought too minde these sentences, when it standeth vpon the fearing of God and his wrathe. But therewithall on the contrarie side wee haue a comfort, in that it is sayde, that God will sauе his people withoute bowe, withoute speare, withoute sworde, and withoute the hande of man. Therefore like as wee bee taught there too humble our selues, and too knowe that all the meanes in the worlde shall not availe vs, if God be our enimie: and as euerie of vs is taught to ridde himselfe of the vaine pride wile ewith wee bee puffed vppe by nature: And finally, as wee bee exhorted too modestie, to the ende wee shoulde present our selues afore God, and consider that it hee turned away from vs, he could every minute of an houre chaunge vs and bring vs too nothing, and pul downe the highest of vs ali: so on the contrarie part, when we bee misintreated and oppressed heere beneath, and we see great alterations, so as the Tyrants become like woolues to deuoure the sheepe and flocke of God : let vs resort too this warrant, that God having promised to saue his Church without mans helpe, will put the same in vre, euen vnto the ende. Then although wee bee destitute of all worldly helpes, so that wee seeme as it were left vp to the spoyle , and our enimes are furnished of all things that may serue them too destroy vs a hundred thousande tymes : yet let vs trust in the mightie power of God , whiche is inuisible too the worlde . VVe perceyue not howe God will maintaine vs : and vndoubtedly it is a straunge thing howe hee mainteyneth vs at this day : but that is to the ende wee should be alwayes confirmed more and more in his doctrine, that we shall be saued without the hande of man : that is to say, that God will vster suchē a force, as is yet hidden from vs , and as wee conceyue not, when it shall please him too plucke vs out of the VVoolues throte, and too mainteyne vs. Nowe if God must worke after such a fashion to preferue vs in this temporall life, I pray you what shall hee do for our saluation, which is a farre higher and preciouser thing ? VVill God ayde himselfe with mans hande, when it commeth too the drawing of vs out of hell, and too the deliuering of vs from the tyrranie of the diuell and of sinne, to aduaunce vs too his heauenly kingdome, and to defende vs agaynst so many temptations ? No : but let vs assure our selues, that hee doth it of his owne power, and of his owne meere goodnesse. Ye see then that on the one side it behoueth vs too learne feare and humilitie, that we be not puffed vp with vaine presumption to dispise God, but rather tremble vnder him, considering that we haue not any thing to resist him, nor any other remedie, but to present our selues before him, praying him to beholde vs with mercie. And afterwarde when we be so dismayed and beaten downe, let vs come to the second point, which is to be of good chere bicause God hath promised to saue vs, yea euen without the hande of man. And although wee perceyue not that this can bee done as in respect of the worlde : let vs not therefore doubt, but that he can performe our saluation. For inasmuch as he needeth no helpe, he will not be letted to accomplish his promise, but so performe it as wee shall perceyue that our trusting in him hath not beene in vaine.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him so to opē our eies, that we may not be seduced by hypocrisie, nor presume to aduaunce our selues rebelliously against him, but that we may be pacient euē in the aduersities that he shall send vs, and learne to humble our selues vnder his maiestie, to glorifie him in all things, &c be well ware that we resist him not in any wise, neither with hand nor tong, but be redie to frame ourselues peaceably to his good wil, knowing that he is alwayes iust and vpright: and that wee may so liue while it shall please him too keepe vs in this worlde, as we may consider that our life dependeth vpon him, and that otherwise we should fayle every minute of an houre: and therwithall learne to yeld him thanks for that it pleaseth him to continue his goodnessse towards vs, whereof we be so vnworthie. That it may please him to graunt this grace, &c.

The Cxxxij. Sermon, which is the fift vpon the. xxxvij. Chapter.

21. The eye of God is vpon euerie mans wrayes, and he seeth all the steppes of a man.
22. There is no darknesse nor dimnesse, so thick , vvhile they that vvoorde iniquitie may hide themselves.
23. God layeth not more vpon man, so that he vvalke vwith God in iudgement.
24. He breaketh the mightie vwithout inquisition, and setteth others in their place.
25. For he bringeth their wrokēs to light, and turneth the night to breake them.
26. He smieth them as wicked in the place of the Seers.

E saw yesterday, that if God list to punishe men, hee needeth not too make a great preparation, nor to arme men, nor to borrowe strength elsewhere : for he could destroy all things with his onely looke. Therefore hee needeth not to serue himselfe with mans hande of any necessitie. True it is, that sometimes hee doth so : but that is to shew, howe that all things are subiect to him, and that there is no creature which yeldeth not it selfe to his seruice, yea euē to execute the punishments that he mindeth to haue done. But yet for al that, he needeth not to prepare himself long afore hand for punishing of vs. And hereby we be put in minde too humble our selues vnder his mightie hande, assuring our selues that there is no way in this world, to fence our selues when he is agaynst vs, but that he shall execute whatsoeuer he hath determined in his owne purpose. And so men may well exalte themselves in pride : but in the ende they shall feele, that they are not of power to resist God. And now folowing the same matter which we haue touched alreadie, Eliu addeth, that God dooth these things, not of an absolute [or lawlesse power,] but bycause hee knoweth mens wrayes, and marketh all their steps. So then if any of these great chasticements happen, so as a mighty people hee ouerthrowne in battell, and a Realme conquered : let vs assure our selues that God vitereth not such power without cause, but that he doeth it through his iustice. And though wee perceyue not the reason why God vseth suchē rygour : let vs referre the knowledge of the whole vnto him, as to whome it belongeth, and let vs content oure selues with the knowledge of that which is shewed vs heere, namely, that the wrayes of men are knowne vnto him. Howe happeneth it that oftentimes we enter intoo disputation of Gods iudgements, and thinke them straunge. It is because wee see not so cleerely as he doth. Howbeit, forasmuch as it is his office to iudge of mens wrayes, let vs agree with him, and although we see not why hee doth it, yet let vs assure our selues that his cace will alwayes fall out to bee good and rightfull, seeing that hee ought too chasticē not onely [particular] persons, but also whole Nations and Countreys. This saying, that God marketh mens wrayes, is taken twoo wrayes in the Scripture. For sometimes it is referred too Gods promises, bycause hee is carefull too gouerne vs. But in this text (as also in manie others) it is sayde, that God beholdeth our steppes, bycause nothing is vnkowne too him, but all oure whole lyfe must must come too account before him. Therefore let vs walke as before his eyes : for it shall bee in vaine for vs to hide our selues, according also as Eliu addeth, that there is neither darkenesse nor mist so thicke, that the wicked can hide themselves in it. And not without cause is thys added. For wee see that althoughe every man confesse that God beholdeth all our workes, and must needs be our Judge : yet notwithstanding, men doo for all that bleare their owne eyes , and not consider that God per-

Psal.10.s.11 ceyueth them. And surely it is not for naught sayde in 10 & 94.b.7. the Psalme, that the wicked beare themselves in hande, that God seeth not their craftiness and malice at all. Also they are vpbrayded by the Prophet Esay, that they dig themselves caues vnder the earth , too hide themselves from God. Seeing then that hypocrisie doth blind men so sore : It is needfull too marke this sentence, that there is no darkenesse so thicke, that can bide the wicked from Gods sight. And for the better conceyuing heereof, it behoueth vs first of all too remember what I haue touched :

Ro.14.b.10 namely that men, although they bee sure that they shall one day come before the iudgement seate of God: doo 2.Co.6.b.10 neuerthelesse seeke startinholes ; and therevpon oversleepe themselves in their lurking holes, as though they coulde beguile God. See what an hypocrisie is thys. And therewithall let vs marke, that men deceyue themselves in shrinking away after that sort from God, in that because they themselues haue lost their remembrance, they thinke that hee also hath turncd his backe , and remembreth not their misdeedes. Let vs not beguile our selues with such imaginations. For although he discourence things for a time, yet in the ende hee will shewe that he forgat not his office, which is to be iudge of the whole worlde: and not onely to bring euerie mans works

Psal.7.c.10. to light, but also euuen their deepest thoughtes, according Ier.11.d.20. as it is his propertie to search mens hearts, and it is not in & 17.b.10. vaine that he chalengeth that title to him. Therfore mark & 20.b.12. here two poynts which we haue to consider in this text. The one is, that we must bethinke vs of the vice which is so deeply rooted in vs: that is to wit, that we thinke not to scape Gods hand by our startinholes: and after as we be drunken in our sinnes, so also thinke wee that God hath his eyes shet and blindfolded, or else that he hath a certayne drawne afore him , so as hee cannot perceyue the things that we hide. Howbeit on the other side, and for the seconde poynt, let vs marke howe it is sayde , that all our darkenesse shall bee discouered before him when he listeth. And therby let vs take warning that we thinke not our selues to haue made the better market, where me are not priuie to our naughtinesse. For the very cause that sendeth many too destruction, is for that they go for good me, or at leastwise can stop the mouthes of such as are not priuie to their wickednesse: for the they triumph, and dare spight God himself. But let vs assure our selues that we shal haue gayned nothing by our deceiuing of the world. For how goodly shewes souuer we haue made , in the ende we must come before the heauenly Judge, who will open the bookees that were fast shet before, & cause his great day too appeare, too the intent too bring all the darkenesse to light which as nowe keepe things in huckermucker . And this is the cause why the holy Scripture speaketh so ofte of it. It is not in one place nor at one time onely , that it is sayde, that there is no darkenesse before God .

Psi.139.b.12 But for what cause is this sentence so ofte repeated? It is bycause wee cannot be persuaded of it. For when wee haue eschued the shame of the worlde, we beare our selues in hand that God ought not to stirre our filthinesse, nor to discouer it. But let vs assure our selues he will make the knowledge of it to come even vnto heauen. Seing then that we cannot be perswaded of it , it is no superfluous thing that the holy ghost doth so often tell vs , that God will iudge after another fashion, than mortall men do now adayes. And that is the cause why it is purposely sayd heere that the sinners shall not hyde themselves there : as if Eliu shoulde saye, it commeth dayly to passe, that mens eyes are so dazed, as they take their vices for vertues, yea and are so euil minded, that it dooth them good to bee flattered , according as we see that when euil hath full scope, there is no more condemning of vices , but every man vpholdeth them. So then it may come to passe (as is seene by experiance) that vice shall reigne , and that there shall bee suche a floud of iniquitie, that all things shall bee turmoyled among men , and there shall bee no more iudgement, nor discretion with them : but yet for all that , it must go farre otherwyse before God . VVherefore let vs learne too lift vppe our eyes about the worlde , and by sayth beholde Gods iudgement which as nowe is hid-

20 den, knowing that there all things must bee discouered, according as it is sayde in Daniell, that the bookees shall bee layde open , that is to say, that the recordes shall be layde before vs. VVhat maner of recordes ? Not of paper or parchment , but of oure owne consciences, so as every man shall bring his arraignment , not written, but ingrauen so deepliy, as there shall be no more disguising of it. And besides that, God himselfe shall bee there in the person of his sonne, with such light , as all thinges shall bee knowne, yea euuen which are nowe vnder deepe dungeons. All these things must then bee seene both of the Angelles of heauen, and of all creatures. Let vs bethinke vs of this, to the ende wee may walke in an other maner of feare, than we haue done , and ridde our selues from all hypocrisie : for wee cannot amende our market by flattering oure selues (as is sayde afore.) Finally, let vs learne , not too make oure reckening withoute our hoste : but as ofte as the case concerneth the examining of oure life , let euery of vs cyte hitselfe before Gods presence, and therewithall consider how it is sayde 40 heere, that seeing it is his office too serche mens heartes, yea and euuen theyr deepest thoughtes : it is too no purpose too quittre oure selues as nowe before men , because wee cannot thereby escape his hande. Therefore let vs learne too examiae oure selues after that sort , and furthermore suffer our darkenesse too bee lightned by Gods woerde, seeing that this poynte also is attributed vntoo him. It is sayde in this sentence, that there is neyther darkenesse of death, nor anie mist so thicke, as can byde above that woerde wickednesse. Therefore the Apostle in 50 the Epistle to the Hebrewes witnesseth, that like as God knoweth mennen heartes, so as hee will haue his woerde to be as a two edged sworde to cut asunder our thoughts and affections, yea and too enter euuen vntoo the maree, to discouer the thingsthat are hidden in vs. And Sainct Paules meening is, that when Gods woerde is preached, we must needs bee reproved , as though all our articles were written agaynst vs , and our whole life were layde afore vs, that wee maye bee conuictid , and vtterly cast downe, to the ende to glorifie God , by acknowledging howe greatly we bee guiltie before him. And therefore let vs not onely cyte oure selues before Gods iudgement seate, to the intent to correct all feynednesse : but also as oft as his woerde rubberh oure sores, and rebuketh oure vyses : let vs take it paciently , and not presume too bee wilfull. For what shall wee winne by it ?

VVee see many men nowe adayes which chafe and freite if their vices bee touched: for they woulde that folke folke shoulde bear with them still. And that is all one as if they woulde not that God shoulde haue anie autho-ritie more ouer them , nor bee any more theyr Judge. But if they considered well what is sayde heere : they woulde not bee so dull as they are seene too bee , in that they bee always newe too learne what things are.

If a manne shewe them anye thing that is commonlye knowne : they are as scornefull of it as may bee. And why? Because they neuer felt the auayleableness of this doctrine, how there is no darkenesse in Gods sight, 10 but defyle themselves,hanging their groynes downe to the groundwarde lyke swyne , and sleeping after suche a sorte , as it shoulde seeme vntoo them that all theyr sinnes are nothing, notwithstanding that the number of them is so great, as they may seeme too bee as it were saped in them , but yet their filthinesse stinketh not vntoo them because they themselves are rotten in it. Therefore it woulde behoue them to thinke a little vpon this lesson, and then woulde they bee more quiet when men shew them their vices. And it is a wonder to see , that although many mens wickednesse is apparat to the world, insomuche that euen little children can iudge of it : yet notwithstanding , they aduaunce themselves agaynst God, and despise him, and will not abyde to be rebuked.
And what a shame is it ? I speake not of things vnknowne, neither stande wee here vpon the examination of mens thoughtes,nor of seeking vnder the earth for the things that are vnknowne too men : but the worlde seeth that the mischeefe doth so overflow,as it is pitifull. The very ayre stinkes of it : and yet notwithstanding these good 30 Catholikes that would be taken for good Christians, and haue always the Gospell in their mouth , ( yea to bite it like mastie dogs that are mad) woulde that men shoulde still dissemble it : and they think that men do them great wrongs to discouer their lewdnesse, which(to say truth) is not discouered by vs , but onely spoken of because all men knowe it. Yet neuerthelesse(as I haue sayd) they that cannot nowadays abyde that God shoulde lay open their lewdnesse, to the ende that they might be ashamed of it, and repent it, shal feele in the end that they must be faine 40 too come before his iudgement seate , where there shall be no more darkenesse nor mist to hide them. So then let vs understande , that it is greatly for oure profite , that God doth nowadays sende vs his worde too enlighten vs : that we may well bethink vs of our sinnes: Insomuch that although we haue not knowne them for a time, yet they may come too our remembraunce , and wee put the thing in vre which I haue alledged oute of Saint Paule : which is, to cast our selues downe, and to be ashamed before God , and too condemne our selues by feeling the 50 naughtinesse that is rooted to deepe in vs. Beholde, I say, how God worketh our saluation , by making vs to feele such a power and effectualnesse in his worde,as we indeuer to examin our whole life throughly , to the ende too mislike of it : but as for those that are stubborne and despise God, and come like straught men too iustle agaynst him, and cannot abide any warning : he must send them as unreasonable folke, to the day whereof Eliu speaketh heere, wherein there shall be no darkenesse nor couert so close, but it shall be layde wide open, yea even before all 60 creatures. They cannot nowe indure that God shoulde make them ashamed, to the ende to burie their sinnes for ever : howbeit(sight of their teeth) both Angels, men, and diuilles , must knowe their wickednesse, and they must be ashamed every where by the power of this light which shall discouer all secrets. Thus ye see howe wee ought to applie this text to our instruction. For surely our Lordes threatening of men with the great day , is too the ende they shoulde preuent it: and so the remedie is readie for vs. As I haue earst sayd, God delayeth not the inditing of vs till we appare before him altogether : but he executeth his iurisdiction dayly by the Gospell, according also as our Lorde Iesu Christ sayth : that when the holy ghost cam: he shoulde iudge the worlde. Therefore, when the gospell is preached , then doth God execute a soueraine iurisdiction , not properly vpon mens bodies, as they bee at this day, but vpon their soules:and hee will haue vs to be cōdemned there for our own welfare. And therefore (as I haue touched alredie) seeing that God doth so much and so often warne vs, that we must in the ende come to the great light.let vs not stil shet our eies wilfully, nor wittingly be blinded when he sendeth vs his word to discouer our filthinesse, and to shew vs that we cannot hide our selues from his sight. And so let vs profit our sel-ues by the meane that is giuen vs at this day. But if we play the wilde beasts, and seke lurking holes still: yet in the ende we shall feele (whether we will or no) how it is not sayd in vain, that there is no darkenesse before God.

For he will make vs to beholde those things in his countenance and glorious maiestie, which we woulde not see heere in the mirror of his worde. And Eliu addeth immediately , that hee will not lay more vpon men , that they shoulde come to iudgement with him . This Text is dyuerly expounded : for some take it , as thoughte God would lay no more burthen vpon a man than hee ought, and than a man coulde beare. But when the whole proces of the text is well considered , we shall finde that for-asmuche as this treaſe concerneth Gods iudgements, Eliu vpholdeth, that God affiſteth vs not after ſuch ſort as we may haue occation to pleade agaynst him. It beho-ueth vs alwayes to consider what matter he dealeth with-all. If a man will knowe what is ment by a ſentence, let him conſider with himſelfe : the caſe concerneth ſuch a thing, that is the ground which is treated of, and therevnto muſt the whole ſequel be referred. Then if all things bee conſidered, the generall grounde of this text, is that men may peraduenture grudge agaynst God, but in the ende they ſhall bee confounded. And why? For although God ſeeme as nowe too handle vs with great rigour : yet when things are throughly well knowne, our mouthes ſhall bee ſtopped and God ſhall bee glorified, as it is ſayde in the one andiftie Psalme . Let vs marke well then howe it is ſhewed vs heere, that for all our fayre pleading agaynst God, our caſe ſhall quayle in the ende. And why? For it will bee founde, that God hath not handled vs vnindifferently , nor layde to ſore a burthen vpon vs, that is too ſay, hee hath not affiſted vs oute of measure. For althoughe hee doo nowe and then ſtrike men more than they are able to beare:yet is it not more than reaſon, nor more tha they haue deserued.
And heereby wee bee put in minde of the prude , or rather of the rage that is in vs, which driueth vs too mur-mure agaynst God . For howe doo wee pleade wylhim? It ſhoulde ſeeme by vs, that there is ſome Judge or Vmper by whome hee ſhoulde bee iudged. If God were too make an accounte , ſhoulde wee bee the bol-der too ſpight him, when hee handleth vs not after our owne liking, and that things come not too paſſe as wee woulde haue them? Then let vs learne, that men are heere condemned of the diueliſe prude whiche prouoketh them too pleade agaynst God. Howbeit it behoueth vs too conſider well, that God will not abace himſelfe ſo farre as too anſwe vs when wee ſummon him too the lawe : hee will not in that caſe appear as our counterpartie. True it is (as I haue declared afore) that hee will doubtleſſe come thither : but to what end?
Euen

Euen to shewe the thing that is told vs here: that is to wit, that although we haue the power to cyte God, and that he were to make answere, so as he were bound too cleare himself of all his doings, and we myght haue our tung at will to speake against him: yet would that stand vs in no steade: for in the end when it commes too the vphofft, it will be found that God hath not charged vs to sore nor aboue reason. And why? Because our sinnes are knowne vnto him, yea and so knowne, as he can tell what measure of chastricement we deserue for them. But 10 the welspring from whence this prude commeth, is for that we would be our owre judges to iustifie ourselues. And who hath giuen vs so greate authoritie? Behold, all judgement is giuen vnto our Lord Iesu Christ: and therfore it behoueth vs to come before him with all lowlinesse and reverence, to haire and receyue what soever he pronounceth vpon vs without any gaynsaying. But every of vs wil be beleued in his owne case, and therfore we graunt not somuch to God as to mortall men. For in worldly iustice, he that is set in the judgement seate must not bee both iudge and party, (and yet notwithstanding he will oftentimes inde wrongfully) for men are corruptible. But yet for all that, men chaunge not in that behalf as touching the outward order that God hath set. And what then shall wee do when wee come before his gloriouse maiestie. So wee see, that men are as it were straught from all reason, when they grudge after that sort agaynst God. And wee see also, that the cause from whence this miskeef procedeth, is the same that I haue touched: namely that wee estime our works after our owne fancies. Neuerthelesse ye see here, that God reserueth iudgement too himself. It belongeth too mee (sayeth he) to consider your steppes, It is I that do marke you and serche even too the bottome. It is not for you to medle which that matter. For whosoever trusteth in himself to play the iudge, taketh vpon him that which is not dowe to him: what is too bee done then? when our Lord affilhest vs, let vs referre our matter vntoo him, assuring oureselves that he spicith many vices in vs, which are hidden from our seyses. Behold Lord, true it is that I perceyue not the hundredth parte of my faults: And why is that? Euen because I am blind, because I am shapen in euill, and because the euill hath as it were le witched mee. O Lord that I could fist of all perceyue better the iniquities that I haue committed before thee, and yeld myselfe iuste. nevertheless, forasmuch as I am not a competent iudge to consider of myne owne faults, and yet I culpeste coonecste the boord to become my iuste judge thy self. I put my case into thy hand, estiring myself that thickest things in tunc that are vntowlowne to mee.

Lowly it is expreſſly ſayd in thiſ teſte, that althoſt we went to lawe with God, yet ſhould he not be found, in our daunger. Then let vs not preſume to pleade with him: For how faire ſhewes and colours ſoever we haue before men: we ſhall be conſounded in all that we take in hand, whē we come before God. Thus ye ſee in effect what Eliu ment to ſay in thiſ veſte. Herevnto he addeth, that God will break the mighty, yea euen without inquifition, & put others in their place. And why? For he will bring their workeſ to lyght, and turne the night to the dark, to the end to break itē. Wheras he ſayth that God wil break the mightie without inquifition: it is to the end to make vs feele better the authoritie which wee despize ſo boldly, because wee be to dull. True it is that ſome in ſted of thiſ word inquifition, do tranſlate number: as if it were ſayd, although the mighty were infinite in number, yet notwithstanding God would not ſayle to break them. But word for word it is thus: bee will breake the strengthes or multitude of men: For the word importeth either of both: and afterward there followeth, there ſhall be no inquifition.

Forasmuch as the word inquifition is there: and that it ſignifieth properly to ſerch or make inquierie: no doubt but Eliu ment to ſay, that God needeth not to make any inquifitions as earthly iudges do. For in alſmuch as they are creatures, there is ignorauance in them, and therfore they are fayne to help themſelues by ſuch meaneſ. For they cannot preſhee of thiſ things. But forasmuch as all thiſ things are open before God, he will iudge men without any ſuch kind of proceeding as we ſee in common weales in thiſ world. But yet there is more in it: which is, that Eliu ment to betoken, that God will not alwayes make vs priuie why he executeth his iudgements, but we ſhall be biynd in that behalf. This inquifition then wherof he ſpeaketh, is properly referred vntoo God in chafizing men. As if it were ſayd, when iudges make out a proces, it ſhall be commond of, and the forme and ſtyle of it ſhall be obſerved, ſo as men ſhall knowe the thiſ things, and afterward the ſentence ſhall bee published, that men may knowe the crymes of the offendour, and after what ſort he was conuictid. But wee muſt not meaſure Gods myghty power and authoritie by thiſ laws of men. And why? For he will breake without inquifition, that is to ſay, without ſhewing vs why? He will not alwayes publiſhe his ſentence: mennes offences ſhall not alwayes be reherfed there: neither ſhall it be vittered why wee are puniſhed: that ſhall bee hidden from vs: But yet in the meane whyle, he will not ceaſe to put his iudgements ſtill in execution.

Nowe wee ſee the naturall ſenſe of thiſ teſte. But yet notwithstanding he addeth, that thiſ thiſ thing is not dene vniuſtly: For God (sayeth he) will bring their workeſ to lyght. Although then that God puniſh without inquifition (that is to ſay without ſuch forme of proceeding as is requiſite in worldly pollicy:) yet doeth he all thiſ things with reaſon and vpryghinneſſe. And if thiſ be not perceyued at the firſt daye, let vs tary till all thiſ things be diſcouered, and till he bring the thiſ things to lyght which are now wrapped vp and conſounded together. And here wee haue to take warning, that we flatter not oureselves as we haue bene woont to doo. For behold what is the cauſe why wee do continually followe our owne ſway, when God ſeemeth to ſpare vs, and thinkē we haue libertie too do euill because wee are unpunished. It is because that when God beginneth to chafice vs after the common maner, wee perceyue it not, but are forepoſſeſſed with a blockiſh and fliſhly careleſneſſe. And afterward when it commeth to great roughneſſe, we be ſo diſmayd, as we know not where we be if he thunder vpon the ſuddeynre. Whiſh thiſ he doth whē he thinketh good. For alſt he hath forborne a long time, he needeth no more but tolift vp his hand and men perish in the twinkling of an eye, as hath bene ſayd afore. Therfore to the end that euerye of vs may ſirre vp himſelf with it bothe early and late let vs remember thiſ teſte, that God wil not make log proces in punishing vs, nor is bound to any lawes. Let vs conſider (I ſay) that we muſt alwayes be in a readineſſe, and not delaye till he ſmiteth vs, but rather aduifeſly preuent his iudgement, according as it is ſayd that the man is happy which hath a careful hart. Furthermore let Pro. 28 b. vs alſo remember thiſ horrible theaſting, that when the wicked ſhall ſay peace and all goeth well with vs, then ſhall deſtruſion fall vpon their heads. So then let the 1. The 5. a. 3. faythfull underſtand, that when God liketh too puniſhe them, hee needeth not too begin at one poyn̄t, and afterward to delay ere he can goe forward with his worke, worke, as mortall men do, by reason of the lettes which they haue. And why? He will condemne and execute his sentence all at once: he needeth not to trouble himselfe wth making long proces for vs: we shall haue no leysure to breath vpo the matter, neither shal we pine in distresse, till we may be quite dispatched at his hande, but we shall be confounded quickly, as if heauen fel downe vpon our heades. Then if we will not be ouerwhelmed with Gods horrible vengeance: let vs feele our owne faultes. Furthermore, when we feele them, let vs assure our selues, 10 that we haue wherewith to comfort our selues in him, at leastwise if we be sorie for them, and seek not to hide the, but lay them open before our God, and sorowfully condemne them, that we may receyue mercy at his hand. For it is sayde that he quitteth those that condemne themselues, and bury their sinnes: which haue them before their owne eyes, and willingly confesseth them vnto him. Therfore let vs not dout but that God will wipe out all oure faults if he see that we confesseth them freely. Yea, but yet must we passe this way also: namely to beare in minde 20 this saying, that God punisheth without inquisition: too the ende that euery of vs doo his dutie in entering into himselfe, and in examining his lyfe throughly, that we may be ashamed and humble our selues. And nowe it is sayde, that God having so broken the great and mightie men, doth put other in their places. And againe on the other side it is sayde, that he punishment them in open sight, yea and that he punishment them as offenders. I haue sayde alreadie, that whereas it is sayde, that God discouereth their workes, and punishment them in suche sort: it is too 30 the end: that we should always stande in awe of Gods iustice, and not imagin that hee vseth any tyrannie or crueltie. Therefore let vs keepe vs from surmising anie such power in God, as shoulde be vttered without reason. True it is that the reason which he holdeth, is vnknowne vntoo vs, and wee must bee contented with his onely and single will, as with the onely rule of right: and howsoeuer the worlde go, let vs not wickedly imagine, that God dealeth crossely and ouerthwartly, or that hee iudgeth otherwise than with reason: but contrariwise, 40 let vs fully beleue, that although his iudgements seeme straunge vntoo vs, yet are they ordered by the best rule that can bee: that is to witte, by his will which surmounteth all righteousness. This is the thing that Eliu declareth in this text: And the same ought to serue cheefly for vs. Then if any man be afflicted in his owne person, he ought always to consider that God is righteous, too the ende he may repente him of his faults. for we shall never haue true repentance, except we know that God afflieth vs iustly: neither can we gloriſe god, and confess him to be righteous except we haue first condemned our selues as I haue sayde. Thus ye see howe we must applie to our selues this doctrine, that God discouereth mens woorkes and bringeth them too light when he punishment them. Verely although we examin not word for worde the sinnes and offences that we haue committed: yet notwithstanding the chastizement which God sendeth vs, ought to profit vs in that behalfe. And therfore it is sayde, 50 that God punishment them instead of the wicked, that is to say, in suche sort as the wicked, too signifie that they can winne nothing by their replying, nor alledge any thing too cleare themſelues, specially ſeeing they appear not too bee cleere before men. Marke that for one poynt. And another is, that hee sayeth, that he putteth others in their place. And that is to the ende that we ſhould know the caufe of the chaunges which happen oftentimes in this worlde. According alſo as it is ſayde in the hundred and ſeventh Psalme, which is a right exiſtation of this ſentence. VVe be as it were ſtraught, when we ſee a plague to vnpoeple a country, or if there happen a famine, or if the land that hath bin very frutefull becometh barren, as if salt had bin ſowne vpon it: or else if al things be ſo troubled with warres, as a country is layde waste, or the Princes thereof are chaunged: when we ſee any of theſe things, we are aſtoniſhed. And why? For wee knowe not Gods prouidence which raigneth aboue all worldly meaneſs, neyther do we thiſke vpon men. For if we coniidered after what ſort men behaued themſelues, we would not thiſke it ſtrange that God ſhoulde make ſuch chaunges and alteraſions. Thus ye ſee why it is exprefſely ſayde, that God putteth other in their places: namely, to the ende that when we ſee things chaunge in the world, we ſhould not thiſk it any noueltie. And why? For therein God ſheweth himſelfe to be a ludge. Let vs not father them vpon fortune: but let vs assure our selues that God doth there vter his arme, because men can not mainteyne themſelues in the poſſeſſion of the beſteſes which he had beſtowed vpon them. And therevpon let vs coniider what our vnthankfulneſſe is, that we may amende it. For alſoone as our Lorde hath made vs ſarte, and ſet vs vp in any wealth: by and by we turne our selues too kicking againgſt him, like horses that are too much pampered. And is it any woondre that God layeth his hande vpon vs, ſeeing wee are ſo proude and vnthankfull? Let vs marke what the modeſtie of men iſ, now adayes. VVhen God doth them any good, do they ſo behau themſelues as they may poſſeſſe it long? No: But contrariwife, they ſpight God, to the ende he ſhoulde bere ue them of it by and by. Seeing then that the pride and vnthankfulneſſe is ſo heynous, as I haue ſayde: wee muſt not grudge at the chaunge of things, nor at the great number of alteraſions. And why? For we prouoke God vnto it? Howbeit it is not ynough to knowe that God taketh away one people and putteth another in theyr place, and ſetteth new inhabiṭers in a country, and remoueth men after that ſort: It is not ynough (I ſay) to knowe theſe things, yea and that he doth them iuſtly: but alſo euē when we be in our beſt ſtate, let vs pray him too graunt vs the grace too inioy his beſteſes in theſe wife, as we may ſtill poſſeſſe them, and bee guided by them, too the euerlaſting heritaſe which is prepared for vs in heauen. Thus ye ſee how we ought to put this ſen‐tence in vre: and as for the reſt, it ſhall bee reſerved till to morow.

Now let vs fal downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our ſinnes, praying him to receyue vs to mercie, and therewithall (after he hath humbled vs vnder his mightie hande, and made vs feele his iuſt correſtions to our amendment) to indue vs with the gracious giſtes of his holiſt spirit, and to increase the more and more in vs, till we be fully refourmed to the glorious image of his righteousness and Maiſtice. And ſo let vs all ſay: Almighty God our heauenlie father, we acknowledge and confess, &c.

The Cxxxiij. Sermon, which is the ſixt vpon the xxxiiij. Chapter.

26. Hē striketh them as vvicked in the place of the Seers.
27. Because they haue turned avvay from him, and haue not coniidered all his vvayes.

28. To make the cric of the poore come vnto him, and to make them heare the outrie of the afflicted:
29. And vvhén he sendeth quietnesse, vvho can make trouble? vvhén he hideth his face, vvho shall see him, as vwell vpon a nation as vpon a man?

E sawe yesterday after what sorte God punisheth offenders without inquisition, and yet notwithstanding hath iust reason to do it, so as there is no cause to blame him. And 10 now Eliu addeth purposely, that he doth it in the place of seers. VVherein he sheweth vs, that Gods iudgements ought to be throughly knowne vnto vs even for our instruction. For when God punisheth sinners, it is not onely to the intent that every man should know what offences they haue comitted: but to the intent they should all take example of it. Esa. 26.b.9 According as it is sayd, that iustice cometh vpō the earth, when God doth so execute his punishment in correcting as well those notorious offenders, as other men. So then 20 it is not for nought that this saying is added, that God chastiseth offenders in the sight of men, or in the place of seers [or lokers on]. Hereby wee be warned to take better heede than we haue done, in noting and marking Gods iudgements. It is a great fauour that he sheweth vs, when he teacheth vs by other mens harmes. But if we shet our eyes, or play the dullardes, what excuse haue we? Therefore as oft as God punisheth sinnes: let every man think vpon it in his owne eace, and lette vs receyue a common instruction, to the ende that his corrections be not loste 30 among vs. And surely that is the cause, that after one hath bene chalsticed, every man must haue his turne. For if we could profite our selues by that which God sheweth vs: the punishment of one man might serue for the instruction of fwe hundred, yea or of a thousande. But for asmuch as wee lette all the warnings slip which God giueth vs, and make no account of them: therefore every one of vs is called in his course, and muste answere in his owne person to be punished for his offences. And so wee see what our vnthankefulnesse is, in that it is sayde 40 that God purifiseth the wicked and breaketh them in peeces in the sight of all men. For wee can well skill to talke of the thing which shall be sayde although wee see it not. If there be any report of the taking of a towne or of the sacking of it, or of any discomfiture, or of such other like things: the newes shall be caried abroade, and men will debate of it: and much more can wee wel discourse of the thing that wee see before our eyes. But in the meane whyle, to what purpose doth it serue vs? Do we learne to forethink vs of our faultes, and to humble our selues before God? No: but wee followe still our owne trade, and although wee be as bad as they whom God so visiteth and correcteth so roughly: yet do wee beare our selues in hand, that the blowes shall never come at vs.

See yee not then an exceeding great and intollerable vnkindnesse? So much the more behoueth it vs to marke well, how it is tolde vs here, that God punisheth not offenders secretly, so as no man might perceyue it to be his correction: but [so openly as] all of vs might fare the 60 better by it, if it were not long of our selues. And why? For if god should set vp scaffolds to execute his chastisements vpō: we could not perceyue them more evidently. And so our blindnesse in that behalfe commitheth of our owne wilfulness and vnkindnesse, as I haue sayde afore. Marke that for one poynt. But the reason also is sette downe here: namely because they turned away from him, and considered not all bis wyes. Ouer and besides that wee haue seene already that God striketh not men wrongfully, but to punish their sinnes: here it is shewed vs what is the welspring of all euils: that is to wit, the withdrawing of our selues frō him which is the fountayne of all righteousnesse. For our life ought to be so ruled, as wee should obey God and seeke him, and walke as it were in his presence. And therefore when a man is gone away frō him, he cannot but run into al confusion: and that is the cause of mens destruction. So haue we a very profitable lesson in this text, to shewe vs how we may keepe our selues frō going into destruction. And that is by holding our selues as it were shet vp vnder Gods wing, and by clinging vnto him to obey his will. If we haue this wisedome in vs: it is the thing wherein our welfare lieth. But contrarywise, if wee forget God: can wee scape his hand? If our lyfe stray here and there, wee are vndone, and damnation is at our backes. For it is sayd that God will in open sight and after a terrible maner, punishe those that run away from him. But lette vs marke well, that Eliu speaketh not of such as had bene brought vp in the lawe, and had had the Prophets, and bene taught the doctrine of God familiarly, but of the Heathens which had had but a small taste of the light, and yet notwithstanding for asmuch as they gaue themselues vnto euill, it is sayd that they were withdrawne from God. And why? For although he were not so neere vnto them, as vnto those to whom he had giuen his lawe: yet notwithstanding wee muste holde this for a generall rule, that for so much as God hath set vs in this world and created vs after his owne image: we according to the order of nature, ought to tend vnto him, & to make him our marke to ame at. Therefore when we run astray and give our lustes the bridle, so as they reigne ouer vs: It is a turning away from God, euē with whom we ought to be all one. And so after that sorte Eliu blameth the Paynims for turning away from God. For albeit they had not the doctrine of the lawe: yet had they the instruction that I have spoken of, according also as Sainct Paule declareth in the seconde to the Romanes, namely Rom. 2.b.14. that they needed no paper wryting to shewe them that there is but one God, and a difference betwixt good and euill: for euery man hath it written in his heart. Now if the Heathen menne were condemned for straying away from God, and for withdrawing themselues from his obedience: what shall become of vs with whom God is more familiar without comparison? God thought it not ynough to haue created them after his owne image, and to haue printed therein some knowledge of good and euill: but he hath also giuen vs his woordes, and will haue it published vnto vs dayly. There he sheweth vs his will familiarly: and it is the waye, as Moyles protesteth, wee cannot stray: we haue no excuse of ignorance: but behold, there is our rest as it is sayd in the Prophet Esay. Therefore seing our way is layed afore vs, and we know which way to take: if yet notwithstanding every man starte aside and take leaue to do euill, and to wander in his owne affections and lustes: are we not much more worthy of blame, than those that never heard one woordes of good instruction? Then if the Heathen men are here called backsliders, because they are turned away from God: what are we, seing that our God commeth so neare vnto vs, as to do the duety of a scholemaster and teacher amōg vs, & to entartayne vs in his schoole, to the end we should learne at his hande in the person of those whom he ap-poynteth to preache his woerde in his name? Therefore if wee make no account of the doctrine which is giuen vs: muste wee not be condemned as double renegates or backeslyders? Yes surely.

Then lette euery of vs looke neerely too himselfe, and consider of what value and estimation this grace of God is, when hee hath as it were his owne mouth open, too warrant vs the thing that is good, and conuenient for our saluation. Seing wee haue this, although we had it but with a wette finger as they say: yet let vs assure our selues that we cannot despise such a blessing of God, but it must needes be a withdrawing of our selues from him. Much more, seing we haue his woerde dayly preached in Sermons, and may also haue lectures besides: if all this will not hold vs in awe, and make vs to sticke throughly to our God, and to indeuour too serue him: needes must his had be vitered much more roughly and terribly vpon vs, than vpon those that had but the order of nature to guyde them aright. Thus much concerning this poynct. And it is sayd immediatly, tbat they considered not all his wayes. VVherein it is signified vnto vs, that men are never so ignorant and vnskilfull, but that there is naughtinesse ynoch in the to make them guilty, and to bereue them of all shiffts before God. Heere (as hath bene declared already,) Eliu speketh generally of the whole world: for he was no lewe that he might haue had the lawe and haue spoke of his like, and yet notwithstanding he sayth that those to whom God had giue no more but their naturall wit, as he had giuen to al other men: considered not his wayes. He sayth not that they had done amisse, or erred, because they could do no better, or because they had no light of doctrine (howbeit, that might haue bin said): but here the spirit of God ment to vige men, to the end they shoud knowe that their condemnation was iust, and that they could not alledge it for a cloke, that they had done amisse through ignorauce, for want of one to gouerne them, wheras they themselues were of a good and vpright mind. For if men had a pure and harty desire to come vnto God, surely he would not fayle them on his side.

And vndoubtedly this promis shall not disappoint men: knock, and the gate shall bee opened vntoo you: seke and ye shall finde. Then if wee see that men doo so raunge ouer the fields, and as it were run astraye: let vs marke that they haue not a pure and rightmeening mynd to go vnto God. True it is that they may well haue some shewe of devotion, as we see among the Papists, where many seeme to be the best mynded in the world, and to al likelyhood vterly rauished which deuotiō to Godward. But if a man looke narrowly vpon their doings, he shall find that all is but hipocrisie, and that God doth not giue them the brydle after that sort without iust cause. Ye see then that the thing with we haue to marke in this texte, is that a though the wretched Paynimes dwell in darknesse, & may be likened to blind me which grope and see not the waye, and haue nothing but grosse ignorauce in them: yet notwithstanding they canot be excuzed of maliciousnesse and stubbornesse, and of wilfull turning away from good vnto euill, even of set purpose: For it is written that they considered not the wayes of God. These things are not wyted vpon the brute beastes, nor vpon the stones which haue no vnderstanding: and therfore it must bee concluded, that they which are most rude and barbarouse, (even they I say) haue refuzed too go ryght, and that if they had had a godly desire, they had not bin left destitute of Gods grace. Yet is it not therfore to be sayd that wee are able to do well, and that there is such an abilitie in vs, that we be able to seke God: wee intreate not of that matter: and when the Papists make such cōclusions, they shewe themselues to be starke beastes. For when it is said that men sin not by ignorauce but throughte a certeyne wilfulness: the Papists conclude that seing it is so, it followeth that we haue sufficient reason to gouerne our selues well, and that we be cleersighted, and to be short, that we haue a fredom to do good or euil. But it is to great a beastliness to reason after that maner. And why? For they be not things vnable to bee matched together, that men should haue their eyes as it were picked out, so as they should not bee able to see or to discerne any thing, and yet therewithall also bee altogether wicked. And therfore they are neverthelesse convicted, not to haue considered Gods wayes, nor to haue bene led in the rightway, for that they were caryed away by pridy. Ye see the in what wise we ought to match the one with the other: namely that by reason of sin, we be all of vs bereft of reason and vnderstanding: See how the heritage which we haue of our father Adam, is that our minds are combered and confounded, so as we cannot discerne the thing that is for our welfare, but drawe cleane from it, according as it is said that euen our light is turned into darkness, vntill God enlighten vs by his holy spirit) and yet neverthelesse that our ignorauce is not such, but that wee bee corrupted in our affections, and wype out the goodnessse which God might put into vs: and bycause our nature is foward, therfore we be enimies vnto God, and all our thoughts and imaginacions are enmitiess too his righteousnesse, according as saint Paule speaketh in the eight to the Romaynes. Then are wee ignorant, and yet in the meane whyle ceasse not to be foward. VVee Rem.8.b.7 knowe not which way to go, and yet therewithall wee go astray wilfully. And why? For we mynd not to come vnto God, no, wee must be fayne too bee inforced thither, orelse he must inspire vs with his grace, and enlighten our harts which are full of rebelliousnesse. Then vntill such tyme as God hath so reformed vs. Surely we will always shut our eyes, that we may not see his wayes. Now if this be spokē of such as had not the meanes that God giueth vnio vs: what shall become of vs? for it behoueth vs too come back agayne to the point which I haue touched. I sayd euen now that the heathen men were not to be excuzed in turning away from God: and therfore much more are we double backeslyders, wee I say whom God had drawnen vnto him. Now if it bee sayd that the heathen men haue not regarded Gods goodnessse, nor liued and walked according too godlinest: I pray you in what case are we which haue a farre other knowledge than was giuen vntoo them? For our Lord pointeth vs as it were with his finger, what waye we shall go. And the text which I alledged out of Moyses, (namely this is the way, Deut.30.4. walke therein) is of great importaunce. I take heauen and earthe too witnesse (saythe hee) that this daye I haue shewed you life and death, and that if you go amisse, yee shall bee without excuse before God. For it appeareth that you seeke your owne destruction. And why? For inasmuchas your God teacheth you, and graūteth you such prerogatiue, as to declare his will vnto you: it is all one as if he should put the way into your handes, and you refuse it and choose death. Nowe when men make such a choice, must they not needes become starke diuelles? So then this protestation of Moyses ought to perce our harts and make vs to bethink our selues better. And sith we see that our Lord setteth a doctrine before vs, which is for our behoof, as it were in a glasse or a liuely picture: let vs not playe the blinde and bleareyde folke, nother let vs drawe a curten before vs, to the intent too bee ignorant in that which we ought to knowe, wheras in decide the thing thing is manifest ynough vnto vs. And herewithall let vs marke, that when God speakeþ to vs, it is not to leaue vs in doubt, so as we shoulde not know what his woordes ment: but contrarywise to the ende wee shoulde receyue good doctrine and instruction by his worde. And this is another poynt well worthy to be marked. For many pretend that Gods worde is so deepe, as men canot tell what to take too, or what to follow. But this is an accusing of God, as if so be he mocked vs in putting vs in hope to deceyue vs. Therfore let vs marke well, that whē God speakeþ, it is to the end we shoulde receyue good doctrine, & that wee shoulde become wise and skilfull: to follow the thing that is good, according as it is sayd that the word of God giueth wisdome to the ignorant: which is by knowing their owne slendernes, that they may yeld theselues vnto him. Then shall we alwayes find the layd vse to our owne profite in the woerde of God, if we haue the wisdome to be desirous to go forwarde in the right way of saluation, and to keepe vs in it. And if a man turne aside because he hath not cōsidered Gods wayes: it cannot be sayd that he hath erred for want of better ability: but contrariwise he himself is the cause of all his euill, & it ought to be wytēd vpon him. There is yet one saying more to be noted: which is, that he speakeþ of all the wayes of God. VVherein we be aduertized, that it is not ynough for vs to content God in parte, and to serue him by halues, but we must throughly and wholy frame our liues altogether to his will. For, to give eare to all that he sayeth, & to submit a mans selfe to him without exception come both to one ende: and vndoubtedly those two cōmaundements 20 are inseparable. Like as God himself canot be deuided: so also let vs marke that his righteousnes cannot be deuided. VVhat maner of one is the righteousnes of God? He hath comprehended it in his whole law. He sayeth not only that a man shall absteyne from whoredome, neither hath he only forbidden theft, neither hath he only cōdemned murther: but he hath ioyned ten commaundements together, and will haue men to hold them all. Now if one man obey God in chastitie, and another in absteyning frō fleecing of his neighbour, and a third in keeping himself from doing wrong or violence, or frō taking leaue to hurt or harme other men: is not this a rending of Gods righteousnes in pecces? For (as I sayd) all the cōmandements are inseparable, and there is in them a holy bonde which ought to be kept vnbroken. And so let vs marke well, that if we will be blissed of God, we muste take good heede, not to some one parte of his wayes, but to all. Thus yee see what Eliu ment to note here. And hereby wee see that every man ought to be diligent in looking to himselfe. Therefore if wee intend to examine our life well, and to 30 square out our workes and our thoughts by it: when we haue found any outward or actuall sinne in vs, let vs proceede further, and see whether wee haue not had wicked affections: and therevpon letvs learne to condemne our selues, and pray him to clenze vs from the euill which we feele so in our selues. Lo how we ought to practize this sentence. And furthermore it is shewed vs also, that when men haue once begon to ouershooþ theselues, they run astray further and further, and become every day worse than other, till they haue renounced God, and quite cast him vp. VVe are not so malicious as to give our selues ouer to al vices at the first day: we shall be hild in the feare of God for a while: but if we take liberty to runne at rouers, and God do happen to winke at our sinnes and iniqüities: then Satan taketh possessiō both of our soules & bodies, & thenceforth carieth vs away in such wise as we become viterly vñrecoucable. Yee see then that after men haue once left to frame themselues wholly to Gods will,

and to give themselues to soūdnesse and simplicitie: they do so appyre, as there is nomore consideration in them, but they greeue God, not in some one sinne only, but by all meanes and in all caces, so as they vtterly reject all hi-wayes. And furthermore wee see here yet better than before, how rightfull Gods iustice is in chastizing vs. Awhy? They that had done amisse, rebelled still further agaynst God: they ranne away from him, and had no wyl to be taught good: but gaue themselues ouer vnto euill, wittingly and willingly: then is it not high time that God should set to his hande to correct them now or neuer. Seing it is so, let vs alwayes be fully perswaded, that God neuer punisheth vs, till he haue bene to much prouoked to anger, and that wee haue deserued long time afore to be hundreded at by his hand. Therefore it followeth, that after he hath winced at vs, in the ende wee must needs come to that which is contayned here: namely that in open sight and after a notable fashion, he will breake all those in peeces, that are so turned away from him. Lo what wee haue to beare away in this sentence. And it is sayd immediatly: to make the criē of the poore come vnto him, and to make him beare the exclamatiōn of the afflicted. Here Eliu noteth one kinde of sinne which God punisheth in men. True it is that wee offend many wayes. Howbeit for asmuch as menne cannot be brought to know their faultes, vntill they be more than conuictēd of them: here Eliu hath set downe a kinde of sinne, which is most apparant and easiest to be seene. For when outrages and extortions are committed, so as one man polieth an other of his goodes, and they that are greeued haue no redresse at all: they criē out vnto God, and men heare their complaints, and every body reweth and abhorreth their case. Thus yee see one kinde of wickednesse which is well knowne both to great & small, which is when we see that there is no iustice, but might ouercōmeth right and wee dwell as it were among theeues. For he that listeth too make his hād by pillage, taketh no thought when he hath done all the wickednesse that can be, because there is no redresse nor any order to be taken. VVhen such things happen, every man can speake of them. For this cause the holy Ghost hath chosen a sinne that is most notorious, to the intent we should be the better conuictēd. Herewithall let vs marke that vnder one kinde the whole is comprehended. For in what wise soever we offend God, he hath alwayes iust cause to punish vs, and (as I haue declared already) his law cannot be deuided, it must continue whole in one, and his cōmaundements must be so knit togither, as al of them may make but one righteousnesse. Howbeit for asmuch as we be such hypocrites, and every man writheth himself like a snake to the intent to hide his sinnes: God intendeth here to draw vs as it were by force, and to compell vs to confessē the dette. If a poore man haue any wrong and outrage done vnto him, he will aske vengeance of the partie: and his cōplaynis shal come abroade, so as the ayre shall ring of them: and seing it is so, thinke we that it can be hidden frō God? thinke we that he will let it slippe? what is to be done then? First (as I haue sayd already) let vs marke that although noman in the world complayne of vs, yet will our sinnes criē out agaynst vs, 60 and the sounde of our offences will mount vp to heauē. If a thing be remoued, we see it maketh a great noyse: and when wee breake the righteousnesse of God: is it not more than if we should ouerthrowe a house? thinke wee there is any thing more precious than the order which God hath stablished to make vs walke according to his will? VVe go about to destroy all that. And is not that more (as I sayd) than if wee should ouerthowē some buylding? And do we thinke that the noyse of it cōmeth not to the eares of God? Then lette vs marke well, that as oft as wee breake Gods lawe, the crye of it mounteth vp vnto heauen, and our sinnes aske vengeance of vs. For although men be dumme and opē not their mouthes to say any thing: yet do not our sinnes fayle to be registered before God. Lo what we haue to marke in the first place. But if men themselues crye out agaynst vs, and we be euill spoken of for our wickednesse, and heare their complayntes and grudgings: is there not much more reason that wee should thinke that God heareth all such cries? And lette vs every way marke, that it is not for nought fayde: the crye of Sodome is come vp vnto mee: and therefore I am come downe to see whether it be so or no. But let vs assyure our selues that our Lordes eares are not deafe, so as our offences should not alwayes come to knowledge before him. Neuerthelesse when there is such crying out vpon vs, and such confusion, hee muste needs note it the more. For of very truthe (as I haue touched already), it is a thing of no small wayght, when wee go about after that sorte to ouerthrowe the thing that our Lord hath stablished. And in good sooth what is the rule of goodlyfe? Is it not as it were an Image of God shyning amonst men? And when wee go aboue to ouerthrowe that, I pray you what a confuzion is it? Howbeit lette vs marke by the way, that God will not leaue them vnpunished, which haue wrongfully vexed and troubled the poore. True it is that the greate ones wexe bolde when they see poore men destitute of succour, so as they are not releued, nor haue any freends or kinsfolke too sticke by them. And therewpon it seemeth vnto them that they may do what they list. And that is the cause why they fall to all outrage. But lette vs marke how it is fayde, that God hath a care of them; and therefore the more that poore folke are left vp, to all wronges and no man succoreth them: so much the more doth God declare, that he hath a care of them to reuenge them. If this were well considered, wee would be lesse hasty to trouble our neighbours, and specially those that cannot make their parte good. For it is a breaking of the protection that hee hath set vpon their persons: and in the ende wee muste feeie that he is our aduersarie for it. Do wee then see a poore man? Let vs be as it were stopped there, that wee do him no harme, violence, nor outrage. And why? For God wil steppe before him, and although the poore man do beare paciently the wrong that is done him, yet shall not the cry of it misse to come vp to heauen and to be heard at Gods hande. And like as this doctrine ought to serue for a warning, that every of vs may bridle himself and absteyne from euill doing: so also the poore ought to be well comforted, sith they see that God hath them in his protection, and that though the wicked do trouble and vex them, yet God bridleth their rage, and watcheth ouer the poore, and will in the ende shewe that he neuer forgat them. Then seeing that God taketh our quarrell vpon him: let vs referre it vnto him, and lette it asswage our sorowe and grieve when wee be wrongfully afflieted, so as men do eat vs vp, and we haue no remedy, but seeme to bee as sheepe in the wolues throat. Go to: our Lorde hath promised that the crye of all extorcions which men do, shall come vp to him. Seing wee haue this buttresse, lette vs be contented, and tary till he shewe by effect, that he is neere vs and hath a care of our welfare. Lo how wee ought to practyze this sentence. It followeth, when God giueth reste, who shall make trouble? and when he bydetb his face, who shall see it as well upon a man, as vpon a nation? Here Eliu ment to reresse (in Iobs person) all the quarrels that wee make agaynst God. For wee would control him in all his doings: yea and wee would couenant with him, that hee should gouerne vs after our owne liking. Truely we will not say so: but yet in the meane whyle, it is seene that we haue that pryd in vs. VVhat man is there which could not finde in his heart to abace the maiestie of God, to the end that things might fall out to his owne liking? If we be disconterted when God doth otherwise than we would wishe: it is as much as if wee woulde put a barre before him, to say, I intend not that this thing shal go so. Yee see then why it is nowe sayde: if God give rest, who can make trouble? And if he bydetb his countenance who can see it? Nowe, this rest that God giueth, is of diuers sortes. For the faythful haue the rest whereof the Scripture speakeith: which is, that they leane vnto God, and put their trust in his goodnesse, and doubt not but that he gouerneth them. Herevpon they may sleepe at their ease according as the Prophete speaking thereof, sayeth that every man shall sleepe vnder his sigge tree and vnder his vine when he is so in Gods custodie, and that wee shall knowe it. And this peace is the very frute of faith as the holy Scripture sayeth.

Yee see then that the chiefe rest which menne haue or can inioy, is to commit themselues to Gods prouidence, and that in respect of his fatherly care ouer them, they can say, my God I commit my life vnto thee, it is in thy hande, order it thou at thy pleasure, and I in the meane time will keepe on my course. Marke this for one poynt. But besides this also, there is another rest. For God doth spare the wicked outwardly although hee beateth them within, so as their consciences do alwayes gnaw them, according as it is sayde in the Prophete Esay. For although it bee sayde there, that their thoughts bee like waues beating one agaynst another (yea and as a sinke that is filthy within, because that vnbeleefe must alwayes bring vnquietnesse): yet notwithstanding God casteth them into a sleepe, because he doth not punishe them out of hande. So then it is sayde that if God giue reste who shall make trouble? Hereby it is shewed vs, that when God deferretb and prolongeth the punishment of the wicked, wee must not be ouerhasty. For wee shall gayne nothing if wee pleade agaynst God and say, why doth he not punish the offenders out of hande? That were as much as to trouble those whom God will haue to be at rest. And therefore lette vs learne to submit our selues paciently to Gods will, and to beware that we runne not a head after that sort. For it is sayd that it becommeth not any mortall creature to make trouble where God wil haue quietnesse. And therewithall lette vs understand, that it is to no purpose to haue bodily prosperitie, except wee haue Gods favour with it, that the feeling therof may make vs quiet in our harts.

Agayne if wee haue not that quietnesse, lette vs vnderstande that it belongeth to God to giue it vs. For if peace and warre be in his hande, and that hee can giue trouble and quietnesse when he listeth in the transitorie state of this worlde: much more hath hee the spirituall rest which is farre greater and excellenter. Then lette vs consider, that it lieth not in vs to quiet our selues when wee be in troublle: but wee muste resorte vnto God: for it is a singular and inestimable treasure that commeth from him, to holde vs so i[n] quiet as wee may alwayes in the middest of the turmoyles of this worlde, abide still vpon our feete, and that being tossed as it were with great stormes and tempestes: yet neuerthelesse we may haue our anker fastned in him to hold sil our own. This (say I) is as a singular priuiledge that God giueth to his childre. So the are we cōbred? are we full of anguish, troublie & perplexity? what is to be done? let vs take vs to this quietnesse:
knowing

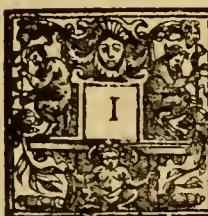

knowing that it abideth within vs. True it is that wee must alwayes seeke the meanes that God offereth vs, to keepe vs to it, and to indeuer to attayne it: but how soeuer the worlde go, let vs fully resolute vs of this, that it is onely Gods office to quiet vs, and to deliuere vs from all vnuquietnesse. This is the thing which we haue to marke. And further although the faythfull haue this sayd peace, so as they bee quiet in the middes of all their afflictions and of all the miseries of this world, yea and that they betake themselues vnto God when they be tempted with distrust: yet is this no let, but that their life is subiect too much vnuquietnesse. Therefore let vs not storme though it please God to turmoyle vs. For it is not sayd that he will so handle vs in thiſ worlde, as that wee muste not be tossed too and fro: but yet for all that wee must hold our selues fast, as we be not vitterly shaken downe with temptations. Lo what wee haue to remember in this sentence. On the contrary part it is sayd, If God byde his face, who can see him? Herein wee are warned, that it is not for vs to searche too farre aforehande what God doth, but that wee must content our selues with the knowledge of that which he sheweth vs. VVhat is this face or countenaunce of God? It is not a shape like vnto a mans visage, whiche hath nose, eyes, and mouth: but the face of God is the record which he giueth vs when we know his will. God therefore sheweth vs his face, when he telleth vs why he doth this thing or that, and it is all one as if wee sawe him before our eyes. Contrarywise he hideth his face from vs, when he afflieth vs, when things seeme straunge to vs, and when wee knowe no reason why he worketh after that sorte. Therefore when God holdeth vs so in ignorance, it is a hyding of his face from vs. And let vs marke well how it is sayd, that we may well strayne our selues to see him: but wee shall neuer attayne to it. Then is it a Diuellish presumption when men do so enter into disputation of Gods works, storming and chafing if God do things otherwiser than they thinke good, desiring to frame him to their will, euen as though they would looke vpon him whether he will or no when he hideth himselfe: or as though they would pull him downe to 30 them. And may they bring that to passe? No: what is to be done then, that wee may take profite of this saying? Truely this lesson deserueth to be layde forth more at large. Howbeit as at this time (to the intent the matter be not broken of): let vs marke that whensoeuer it pleaseth God to shewe himselfe vnto vs, it behoueth vs to know him, and to consider his workes, as he sheweth vs them, and to be attentiu to marke the reason why hee doth so. And when he worketh after a straunge fashion 10 that is vnuknowne to vs: lette vs reuerence such secretes, acknowledging neuerthelesse that he is alwayes righteous howsoeuer the worlde go: and lette vs dwell continually in that beleef, and hold vs quiet, wayting patiently till he sheweth vs more fully the things that are hidden from vs as now: assuring our selues that during this life our knowing must be but onely in parte.

Nowe lette vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to feele the, that al the time of our life we may 20 mourne before him, desiring him of forgiuenesse, and acknowledging our selues exceedingly guilty, vntill that he of his free goodness deliver vs frō the damnations wherin we are, and from the daungers wherewith we are besieged. That so long as wee be in this world, we acknowledging our infirmity and weakenesse, may suffer him to gouerne vs & guyde vs to the right way of saluation, in such wise as wee may neuer be shaken downe, but that whatsoeuer temptations befall vs, we may stand stedfast in the calling of our God till he haue takē vs out of this world, to bring vs into his heauenly kingdome, where wee shall inioy the euerlasting rest that hee hath prepared for vs. That it may please him to graunt this grace not onely to vs, but also to all people and nacions of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage of error and darkenesse, to the right way of saluation, for the doing whereof, it may please him to rayse vp true and faythfull ministers of his woerde, that seeke not their owne profite and vayneglory, but only the aduauncement of his holy name, and the welfare of his flocke: 40 and contrarywise roote out all &c.

The.cxxxiiij Sermon, which is the seuenth vpon the.xxiij. Chapter.

29. And vwhen he hideth his face, vwho is he that shall see him? he is vpon nations, and vpon men togither.
30. In that an Ipocrite reigneth, and there is a stumbling blocke to the people.
31. It belongeth to God to say, I haue forgiuen, I vvill not destroy.
32. But that vwhich I haue not perceyued, teach thou mee: if I haue done vvickedly, I vvill do so nomore.

T was partly declared yesterday, after what maner God hideth his face frō vs, that it be not seene: that is to wit, when men are troubled in this world, & see not the reason & end of his doings: lyke as on the contrarypart, if God graunt vs the grace to see that he gouerneth all things, and to perceyue a fayre and well disposed order: then is it as though his countenaunce shone vpon vs as the Sunne. Do we then see the state of the worlde so troubled, as wee wote not what to say to it? It is all one as if God hid his face from vs. And in that case what is there for vs to do, but to humble our selues? according as it is sayd in the Prophet, that in the time of aduersitie the wise man will lay his mouth to the ground, and hold his peace, verely as one knowing that wee shall gayne nothing by striuing, when God lihest to handle vs so with extremitie. Ye see then that the end wherewnto this sentence tendeth, is to exhort vs to modestie and sobernesse, because our wittes are to rude and to grosse to comprehend Gods secrets, and moreouer because God intēdeth purposely to humble vs, when he withdraweth himself frō vs. And this is done (sayth Eliu) 60 as well vpon a whole nation as vpon one man. Both generally & particularly God can so intangle things, as we shall not know the reason of them: and if we will speake of them, we should not know at what end to beginne. And for the better expressing of his minde, he addeth, In somuch that the hypocrite reigneth. True it is that this present sentence may be layd forth diuerly: but the sequelle of the texte sheweth well ynoch, that the meining is, that when a wicked man, or when a naughtypacke reigneth, and there is a

stumblingblock or a snare caste among the people: for the wordes import eyther of both: it is a trouble to vs when wee see the wicked reigne, so as there is nothing but tyrannie, nor any equitie and vprightnesse remayning: but we be as it were vtterly forlorne, and God is not seene. If enormities be committed, so as there is quareling and snatching on all sides: or if snares be layde so as poore folke knowe not howe to scape: then is God as it were withdrawn from vs. True it is that he is neuer the further from vs, nor hath the lesse care of vs: howbeit wee <sup>10</sup> see it not. On the other side, when wee be not able too consider what is done: it seemeth to vs that God regardeth vs not: wee see nothing but darkenesse: the light that ought to guyde vs shineth not vnto vs. Nowe then what should wee do; but shrinke downe our heads, holde our mouthes shet, and wayte Gods leysure paciently, till he remedie the inconueniences that trouble vs? Also let vs always bee at this poynt, neuer to inquyre further than is lawfull for vs. It behoueth vs to thinke wel, that God doth not such things without cause why: but wee <sup>20</sup> muste enter into the consideration of our sinnes: for if wee wil enter curiously into the discussing of Gods secretes, and incomprehensible determinatiō: it is a pride that will vtterly ouerthrowe vs. And therefore (as I haue sayde afore) lette vs learne, not to be ouerwyse, knowing that God will sometimes leade vs like poore blinde soules. As touching this sentence where it is sayde, that the wicked man reyngeth: lette vs marke that although it be a sore temptation, to see such reigne as are naughty-packes, despizers of God, and giuen to alleuill, and to see <sup>30</sup> that might ouercommeth right, so as a man cannot tell whither to go for refuge: surely it is a great and harde crosse to ouercome: neuerthelesse the holy ghost intended to set it before vs, to the intent that we should be armed against it.

So then, hath vnrightuousnesse gotten full scope? Are the wicked growne so lustie as to confounde all things, and to handle matters with such corruption, as there may bee no more remedie? The holy Ghost aduertizeth vs, that it is Gods will to hyde his face after that maner, to <sup>40</sup> the intent to trie our obedience. Therefore lette vs tarie till he inlighten vs, and then shall wee know howe that he hath not sent these troubles among vs without cause. Thus yee see in effect after what maner wee ought to put this sentence in vre. Nowe Eliu addeth that it belongeth to God to say, I haue forgiuen, I will no more destroy. As if he should say, that God holdeth the raynes in his hande to guyde men at his pleasure, and if it please him to punishe our sinnes, wee haue nothing too replie why hee should not condenne vs: and if hee beare with <sup>50</sup> vs, yea or liste to forgiue vs altogether, who shall resist him, who shall leete him to shewe vs fauour? True it is that this is straunge to mannes vnderstanding at the first sight. For seing that God is no accepter of persons, wee aske why hee forgiueth one rather than another? VVhy doth hee beare with a wicked man, when hee is seene to be altogether out of order? Then may wee well trouble our heads to seeke why God dealeth after that maner: but what conclusion muste wee make, saue onely to referre all things to himselfe in his owne purpose, knowing <sup>60</sup> that it is not for vs to rule him, yea and that wee are not able to comprehend the things that are to high for vs? For when it pleaseth God to humble vs, he hath meanes to do it which can by no meanes sinkē in our naturall vnderstanding. Lo in effect what is sayde vnto vs here. And whereas here is mention made of Gods iudgements, whereby he chastizeth our sinnes: lette vs beare in minde what hath ben sayd: namely that the righteousest man that is shall finde himselfe guiltie, twyce, yea a hundred times more than hee suffereth, and therefore that wee haue no cause to complayne. Furthermore if it please God to forgiue vs, lette vs understand that he doth it not for our deserts, nor for any thing that he findest in vs, but of his owne free mercy. And this ought to bee marked wel, because the thing which I haue tolde you already to come naturally into mens imaginacions, hath bene the cause of bringing false and wicked doctrines into Christendome. And the Papistes are still imbruē with this errore, that God pardoneth the sinnes of those that turne vnto him, euen bycause hee seeth some good motion in them. VVhen the Papistes speake of the forgiuenesse of sinnes, they alwayes imagine, that a manne muste on his owne s̄de dispose himselfe afore hand, and purchace that grace before God: and that although it be not of full woorthinesse, yet notwithstanding there must be a certayne meeting togither, that is to say, it is good reason, that God seeing any good dispositiō in man, should helpe him, as in respect of the same. And what hath caused such dotage, to be alledged? Euen bycause men conceyue not that God hath such a libertie, as is given him here: that is to wit, that it belongeth to him to say I will forgiue. For asmuch as this thing hath not bene conceyued: Therefore the Papistes haue forged this Divilishe imagination, that God forgiueth those which are any whit disposed with a good motion and purpose to repente, and that although they haue not done so many good deedes as they may deserue to be accepted, yet notwithstanding God receyuethe them to mercy, because of the good disposition that he findest in them. But contrarily, let vs holde the doctrine that is contayned here: namely that whereas al men be alike, and that damnatiō is cōmon to all men, so as they be al intangled in it: God pardoneth some, and leaueth the res.due in the damnation wherein they are already. VVhy doth he so? It is not for vs to dispute of it. Let vs hold this to humble our selues withal, and let vs not forge meanes in our owne head, which the holy Scripture speaketh not of. And in good sooth, who giueth such motion vnto a man to mislike of his sinne, but onely God, who hath already touched him by his holy spirite? for naturally we be all euill, and when wee haue committed it, we are stil more and more disposed vnto it: and hypocrisie blindereth vs, by flattēing vs in the same. Therefore when a sinner mislyketh of his sinne: it is a token that God hath already touched him. True it is that Cain, and Iudas were greatly grieved at the feeling of their <sup>a.5.</sup> Gen. 4. b.13. offences: but that was not for any misliking of them: Math. 27. 45. Nay rather they gnashed their teeth agaynst God, & hardened them selues in their euill. Therefore when a sinner Act. 1. c. 18. feeleth remorse in himself, & is touched to hūble himself before God: wee must conclude that it is a marke of the holy Ghost. Now then if God giue vs applicable affectiō to mislike of our selues & to draw vnto him: it is a token that he hath shewed vs mercy. And surely, is it not a good warrant of his mercy? Shall wee then say, that man hath deserued to haue sinne forgiuen him of God, because he wastherevnto disposid? we see thē that the Papists haue in this behalfe falsified and disguised Gods doctrine, saþing that thing vpon man, which belongeth not vnto him. And therfore so much the better ought we to marke & remēber this saying, that when men haue cast theselues into destruction, and are hild in thraldome of sinne, so as Satan possesseth them: none but God hath authority to say, I forgiue. And whom forgiueth he? wee must not tie his grace nether to one thing, nor other, but let him vse his own minde, to dispize all things according to his free goodnesse. Therfore when he forgiueth one man, he may <sup>well</sup> well leue another in damnation, according also as it is Exod.33. d. sayd in Moyses, and alledged by Sainct Paule, as a record of great importaunce aboue others, I will forgiue whom Rom.9. d. 15 I will forgiue, and I will shewe mercy to whome I will shewe mercy. In saying so, God sheweth vs that wee muste not inquyre why he doth it: for hee cutteth away all such questions. VVhom then doth God pardon? euен whom it pleaseſ him. It is not any mortall man that ordereth that matter: it is the living God, who declareth that when he sheweth mercie, wee muste not aske why he doth it, nor to whom, nor whether one man be better disposed than an other, or whether there hath bene any deserſ good motion, or other meane aforehand? No. For God will haue men to cōtent themſelues with his doings. Therefore whereas hee sheweth mercy vnto ſome and not vnto all: it behoueth vs to magnifie his goodneſſe: and if he shewe any appearance of his iuſtice, lette vs affiſe our ſelues that he is not bound vnto vs.

And vndoubtedly this diuerſitie sheweth vs ſo much the better, that when he draweth vs, euen out of death it ſelſe, hee doth it not but of his owne free minde: and that wee for our parte ſhoude bee vtterly forlorne and damned, if wee were not ſuccored by him. Thus then yee ſee howe yee may be the more prouoked to gloriſe God, and to knowe his mere grace towardes vs, and that our ſaluation is grounded ouely upon his good will in receyuing vs to mercie: that is to wit, in that on the contraryparte hee forsaketh whom he liketh, and sheweth not like mercy to all, but letteſ ſome alone, ſo as they are not rayſed to ſaluation. Thus yee ſee what we haue to remember in this ſtrayne.

Now he addeth, that he will no more destroy when he bath ſo pardoned. And herein we haue one good lesson more: which is that when God ſpareth ſinners, he is reconciled vnto them, and fully at one with them. True it is that ſometimes God puniſheth not the wicked, and although Jerem.12. 4. their ſinnes be tolde them and brought to their remembraunce, it wil ſeeme that they are escaped his hande for a tyme. But then is not this ſaying performed, that God 40 wil not destroy. And why? for there he forgiueth not, but nouriſheth the wicked as merrie fat oxen and ſwine to the ende to kill them. VVee ſee that when an oxe hath bene leane all his life long, if a man intende to kill him, he wil beſtowe the more coſte vpon him: and likewiſe will hee do with a ſwine to make him well larded. Now 3. & 51. e. the Prophet vſet this ſimilitude, too ſhewe vs that the ſtate of the reprobates and despysers of God, is neuer the better for that they are not puniſhed out of hand (according as wee haue ſene bothe in Jeremy and Ezechiell, 50 that ſuche as are referred, make neuer the better market for their long tariance,) but as they are worse before God, and haue pylē vnto a greate heape of cursedneſſe vpon their heads, ſo alſo muſt God powre out the greater rigor vpon them.

And ſo althoſh our Lord puniſheth them not the firſte daye: yet caſſeth he not to holde them there ſtill vnder his wrath and vengeance. And therefore this teſte belongeth not vnto them. But when our Lorde doth ſet merrie quyte and cleare, and wil not puniſh them any more: why is that? It is bycauſe hee hath forgiuen their ſinnes. I tolde you that this lesson is very profitablie: And why? For firſte of all wee bee ſo fliſhly, as wee paſſe for nomore, ſobeit that God make vs not to feele his rigor.
 Althoſh he be angry with vs, and reiect vs and as it were baniſheth vs his houſe: all this toucheſt vs not: lyke as if a diſeaſed peron, were as good as rotten inwardly in his body, and yet notwithstanding all were one to him, ſo long as he feeleth no greefe. VVhen a man hath an ague, if he feele no alteracions nor payne of head or backe, al is well, hee ouerpaſſeth it, and yet notwithstanding the diſease lurketh ſtill within, as it becommeth deadiſ. Contrarywiſe if he be ſore a thurst, it were good for him to in-dure it for a time, to remedy the ague which is his cheeſe diſease. But a man is ſo ſenſuall, as he careth for nothing, but for the taking away of the greefe and paſſion of the preſent fitte that troubleth him. Euen ſo is it with vs.

 For although God be offendeth with vs, that ſeemeth to be nothing: we perceyue it not bycauſe of our dulneſſe, and therefore wee heape ſinne vpon ſinne, and continue alwayes harde harted. Somuch the more then behoueth it vs too marke howe it is ſayde in this ſtrayne, that wee ſhall not ſcape Gods hand, except he forgiue vs our ſinnes.

It behoueth vs to go to the roote: lette vs not desire God onely to deliuere vs from our ſickenesſes, wantes, and ſuch other things: but lette vs ſpecially pray him to bee mercyfull vnto vs, and when wee haue once gotten that, wee ſhall be deliuered from all inconueniences. And yet further, for the better conceyuing of this doctrine, lette vs marke, that althoſh wee be in proſperitie, yet if in the meane whyle God be our enemie, the miſchiefe ſhall continue ſtill with vs, and his benefites ſhall turne to our bane. Then if wee vſe Gods giues vnto his diſpleaſure, all the benefites that he beltoweth vpon vs muſt turne too our greater condenmaſion: lyke as on the contrary parte, when wee bee reconcyled vnto God, and hee hath pardoned our offences: althoſh hee chaſtize vs, the ſame ſhall bee a medycine too vs, and all our afflictions ſhall bee blessed before him, in ſo much that they ſhall turne to our ſaluation, as S. Paule ſayeth in the eighth to the Romaynes. Beholde here how it is a right neceſſary Rom.8. 27 poyn̄t, to knowe that we ſhall alwayes bee ſhet vp vnder the curse of God, vntill ſuch time as he hath pardoned our ſinnes.

And herevpon lette vs learne, not to be afraide of miſeries and aduersities onely, but ſpecially of Gods wrath which we ceaſe not to prouoke. And when wee ſhall haue done amifle, lette vs not beginne at the outward afflictions, as who ſhould ſay that our returning vnto God ſhould be to the end he ſhould nomore affiſt vs: but lette vs pray him to bee ſo gratiouſ as to purge and cleaſe vs of our ſinnes, to the ende there may be nothing in vs that may kindle him againgt vs, or diſplease him. True it is that the chaſtizement and corrections which God ſendeth vs, are as ſtokes of a ſpurre to pricke vs forwarde: and when he ſeeth vs dull, he drineth vs by that meanes to repentance: but yet muſt we not be at this poyn̄t to ſay, well: I am content, ſo God withdrawe his hande from mee. No, wee muſt not do ſo: for wee ſhall haue gay-ned very little, if wee get nothing but that. VVhat then?
 Let vs go vnto our God and pray him to be at one with vs, and to do ſomuch for vs, that when wee haue bene gently chaſtized, wee may knowe his goodneſſe towards vs. And I pray you, marke what is the cauſe, why God doubleth his ſnipes and striketh much more roughly vpon vs. VVhy ſo? If a man be chaſtized, hee 60 ſeeth that God viſiteth him, and perceyuethe all things to go better with him. So then a man humbleth himſelfe when hee hath offendeth God, and he deſireth to be deliuered, and that God ſhould take away his aduerſarie at the firſt brunt: but in the meane while, the poore ſoule hath no wiſe to enter into himſelfe, and to ſearch his owne faultes, and to atteyne to ſomuch reaſon, as to ſay: aies, I muſt ſeeke to recover the fauour of my God. He thinks it enough if he be nomore pressed, lyke a dogge that doth ſtaiij. but

But shake his ears when he hath scaped with a blowe of a cudgel. Such a one goeth not so far as he ought to do, he relteth at the outward parte: and therefore God followeth with striking him still. So then we see how lightly men dispatch themselves when God chastiseth them to make them come to repentaunce: for they may well haue some conceypte of it, but the same passeth away out of hand. Now sith that God seeth that although a man perceyue not his owne harme, yet the filthinesse doth settle still within him: he is fayne to presse him, to the end he may know that the disease would increase, if he purged it not to the bottome. Then let vs vnderstād that we do but growe worse and worse, vntill that God haue shewed vs mercy. And therefore wee muste not onely desire him to giue vs health, soundnesse, and whatsoeuer else our fleshe desireth: but also to blotte our sinnes, and to gouerne vs so by his holy spirite, as there may not be any thing in vs to prouoke his displeasure agaynst vs. And this is the cause why Dauid, and the other holy Prophetes, when they felte themselves beaten and tormented at Gods hand, did not say onely, Lorde deliver mee from this affliction. True it is that they desired that too: but firste of all, they desired God to forgiue them their sinnes and to be nomore angry with them. And why spake they so? For they sawe well from whence afflictions come: how that they be the frutes and recordes of Gods anger: and therefore they went alwayes to the roote of the mischief. Euen so must wee do. And that is the thing whereof wee be warned in this place where it is sayd, that God will not punish after he hath forgiuen. True it is that it foloweth not 30 that God forgiueth vs, because he makeith no countenance of displeasure, but doth as it were wincke at our sinnes & wee prosper as though he loued and fauoured vs: but rather our destruction is then neerest at hande. According as wee see howe the Sodomites were then destroyed, when they were come to the fuienesse of their delights and pleasures, in somuch that they despysed both God and the worlde: they were so besotted as they sawe not one whit: and vndoubtedly they tooke the greater libertie, vnder the colour that God had not visited them of a long time: they were as men that had drunke the dregges 40 of wine, as the Prophets terme it. And wee haue seene in Jeremy. 48. Jeremey and Ezechiell, that when God beareth with the wicked, they do as it were settle in their lees, and are so soled more and more in their vices: and when they be imbruied with them to the ful, then is there nomore remedy, nor any more remorse, as the Scripture sayeth. For this consideration let vs marke, that if we leape vp the wood of Gods wrath, altho'g fire be not put to it out of hand, yet muste wee looke for it, and not thinke that wee haue 50 gayned any thing, except wee be reconcyled vnto God. Now after that Eliu hath sayd so, he addeth: If I haue not perceyued trahisshon it mee: If I haue done amisse, I will do so nomore. These things are added here as it were in skorne. For Eliu bringeth in God speaking vnto Job, & offering himselfe to be reproved and amended if he haue done amisse. True it is that for asmuch as these woordes are somewhat cut of, men haue taken them in another sene: howbeit, the naturall exposition is this: We haue scene heretofore that Eliu hath exalted God in such libertie and soueraintie, as all mortall menne must needes stoupe vnder him, and not once open their lippes at him: and that he hath priuiledge to do what he thinkes good, and wee in the meane whyle must acknowledge that all that euer he doth is rightfull and reasonable. Not that hee sheweth a reason of it: for he intendeth to reserue that authoritie ouer vs to himselfe. Eliu therefore hath shewed that already. And nowe he skorneth Iobs ouerwee-

ning, for that he had disputed agaynst God, and misvnderitoode the cause of his affliction. Not that Job had not acknowledged a secret righteousnesse in God, which ought not to be measured by mans imagination (for Job acknowledged that) but in the meane season wee haue seene, that his passions tossed him, so as he chafed agaynst God, and oftentimes he boyled ouer and spake vnaduisedly: This we haue seene. And now Eliu rebuketh him for it, howbeit in way of mockery. I see (sayeth he) that God muste be fayne to come to account, and to say vnto thee, well I haue done amisse, thou arte able to teache mee, another time I will do better, and I will do nomore so, as who should say that God were a little childe. Furthermore lette vs marke, that this is not spoken so much vnto Job, as vnto the whole world: and wee haue neede of such warning. For wee knowe what dulnesse there is in our vnderstanding. If God speake vnto vs earnestly and grauely, wee are nota whit moued at it: for wee see that men are wedded to their owne opinion, and when they haue once conceyued a thing, it is not easie to turne them from it: and if a man speake playnely to vs of the Maiestie of God, and shewe vs how frayle wee be, wee haue always our replies. Seing then that men are not of such capacite that God should shewe them their faultes distinctly and grauely, and in such phrase of speache, as they might bee playnely ledde vnto reason: when God seeth them so wilfull, hee muste bee fayne to mocke at them, and to put them to shame, as folke that are not worthy to be spoken directly vnto. If I see a foole and haue labored to winne him by good meanes, and he in the ende is vtterly paste recouerie, so as he is altogether vnruyl and blasphemeth God: what shall I do? shall I speake to him as if he had good discretion? No. But I shall scorne his beastliness, or else if I see him lift vp into ouergreat prude, I shall threaten him. After the same maner doth the holy ghost proceede now. For he sayeth: goto: God muste be fayne to come vnto you, and say that if he haue done amisse he will amende it if you rebuke him for it. And surely what is to bee sayde to vs, when wee checke God dayly, according as every man knowes that he findeth faultes with him in himselfe, and is discontented when things go not to his minde, and when in effect wee would haue God to turne the bridle, and to do cleane otherwise, than he doth. Then seing we are so malapert: I pray you howe can wee be dealt with, if wee be not mocked and vpbrayded with such prude? and must not a man be needes out of his wit, when headuaucth himselfe after that sort against his maker? who maketh any doubt of it?

Yee see then what wee haue too remember in this streyne. For seing that the words are so couched in skorne, it is certayne that wee be more conuictid, than if a man spake to vs in an ordinary style. And why? For when it is vttered after this maner, go too, God shall come and say, I haue done amisse, rebuke you mee, shewe mee my lesson: is it not a shame for vs to be so spoken too? Yes surely is it. VVhat? Must God come downe to vs to confess his faulte, and submit himselfe to our correction? But we see that that is a detestable monstrousnesse: and there is none of vs, but his heares would stande staring upon his head to heare it spoken: and yet notwithstanding our doings tende to it. VVhen menne frette and chafe after that sorte as I haue touched already, and make their vagaries, and would make God subiect to their imagination: it is all one as if they would bereue him of his soueraintie, and subdue him to such lawe as they listed to laye vpon him, as though hee were a litle babe. Men therefore will vndirectly do that thing which they would,

would be lothe and afayde to heare spoken. And so wee see that the holy ghost hath taken a good waye to spight the diuelish malapertnesse which is in vs, when we murmur so against God, in that he sayeth, go to : I see then that God must be faine to come to you and aske you for giuenesse, and be contented to be taught by you: and whē you haue shewed him that he ought not to do so : he will do so no more. Now when the holy ghost speakest after this sort: it is to shewe men that they are very diuelish in presuming after that maner to set vp their bristles against God, and to murmur whē he worketh not to their liking. So much the more therfore ought wee too way well the words that are cōteyned here. And as often as we betickled with any intents to be to inquisitiue of Gods doings, or to bring him vnder coram: let vs consider what we do, and into what maze wee enter. For it is all one as if wee would rob God of his maiestie, and abace him in this world, and make him subiect to that we think good: Alas, and were not that toogreate a despizing of him? whether go we? Therfore when any such thing commeth to our mind, if we bethink vs not as we ought to do, let vs remēber this saying: If thou grudge after that maner, thou setteth thy self against thy God. Behold, the holy ghost hath already declared and told thee, into what confuzion thou puttest thy self: namely, that it is asmuch as if thou wouldest become the creator of thy God: and if there were no more but this malapartnesse, wert not thou worthy to be drowned in the bottome of hel? For is there any greater pride than to desire to darken, or rather to abolish the maiestie of God? Thou sily worme of the earth, thou cursed creature, thou wretched cario, thou art a sink of al filthinesse, and wist how take vpō thee to check so against thy maker? VVhen we haue any such thoughts in vs, let vs beware that we put them away, yea and vtterly bury them, and that we shet all fansies out of dores, and stand no further vpon our reputation, but say, Lord be thou glorified in our ignorāce: and let vs say nothing else but this, Lord thouart righteous in all thy doings, although we see not a whit as now, but wee shall oneday be enlightened by thee. As now it is greate wisdome in vs to rest simply vpon his will, seing he will haue vs ignorant for a tyme. Ye see then that it standeth vs in hand to put this sentence in vre. Furthermore wheras it is sayd that we teache God the thing that he perceiued not: It behoueth vs here to make comparison betweene God and vs: For he hath bin frō euerlasting, and we be but as snayles of one dayes breedē, and yet we put out our hornes immedietly. And what for that? It is but water. VVherof are snayles made? or wherof come they? ye see then we are but as snayles, and are chaunged incontinent. And is it meete that we shuld pooke out our hornes against God? what strēgh? what courage haue we? of what continuāce of time are we? we be but threescore our fourscore yeres in the world: I speake of the eldest sort: And what then can our vnderstanding be? On the cōtrarypart let vs marke of what continuānce Gods wisdome and knowledge are. From euerlasting: before the world was made all things were present with him: he hath not increased in wisdome nether is he abated in any thing. But he knewe all things euē before the world was made. So thē must not men needs be worse than madde when they giue their affections head after that sort to say, the matter ought to haue gone thus? How now? Hath not God considered how this thing ought to be done? Is he not wyse ynough of himself? Is not this an ouerturning and marring of all things? He is not like mortall men: For except they haue debated vpon a matter afore hand and taken counseil of it, they can do nothing that is good and profitable. Hathi

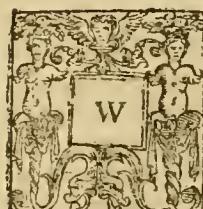

God neede to consult? Hath he neede to debate of matters aſorehand? How ſhould that be? For as I ſayd afore, all things haue bin present with him before all times. VVhat is to be done thē? To ſuffer ourelves to be taught by him, knowing that there is no vnderſtanding in vs, and that we do but glyde through this world, and our life vaniſheth away as a shadowe: we be blind wretches, and although there be ſome reaſon and vnderſtanding in vs, yet is it not able to guide vs, and much leſſe to advise God what he ſhould do: but ſcruth only to make vs vnexcusable. And ſo the reaſon that we haue, ſtandeth vs in no ſteade but to conuiict vs, and cōdemne vs: And therewithall the holy scripture ſheweth vs that we bee blind wretches, yea and we are ſufficiently taught it by expe-rience. And therfore if we take vpon vs to teache God, whether do we rufe? That is the cauſe why I ſayd that it behoueth vs to knowe firſt what our ignorance is. And ſecondly that it belongeth vnto God too diſpoſe of all things, that when we vnderſtand the want that is in ourelves: we may be out of doubt, that it belongeth vnto him only to remedy it. Then do wee lack vnderſtanding? let vs craue it of him (ſayeth ſaint James) which is the Lam. 1. 4. 5. weſpring of it and giueth it without vpbrayding. For God dealeth not nigardly with vs as men do, who when their goods do diſminiſh, are greeued iſ they be to much called vpon. It is not ſo with God: For he neuer ceaſeth to do vs good. Therfore let vs learne to offer ourelves vnto him when we want wiſdome, and let vs not doubt but he will giue vs alſmuch as ſhall be neceſſary for vs. And this doctrine which I haue touched is exceedingly for our behoof. For what hath bene the cauſe of ſo many corruptions in Christendome, in ſomuch as the good do-ctrine hath bene peruerted and imbaced, but because me haue bene deiſirous to be ouerwife as though God had not bene wel aduised. VVhen men preſume to put forth their owne inuentions, and to ſay this will be good, and that muſt be done: and ſuch a thing muſt be remedied; and after what ſort? After their owne fancy. And had not God foreſene it? How happeneth it that he did it not a-fore? VVe ſee what God pronounceth, and thereto muſt we holde vs. He wil haue vs to receiuē al thing, for good and holy which he ſpeaketh. And behold, men ſtep in and will play the ſticklers, and rowe betweene two ſtreames. And why? For they could finde in their harts to do God ſomuch wrong, as to ſay he is ſcarce wel aduised, and that they themſelues are wizer than he. But we ſhal knowe this thing the better by taking of a thing that is groſſe and eaſy to bee vnderſtoode; which is, that the Pope hath gone about to deuide the things that god hath ioyned together, that is to wit, that he hath bereft the people of the cup in the Lordes ſupper, and told thē that they muſt content themſelues with the one kind, namely with the Oſte, and that the cup ſerved but for the priue to ſing masse withal. And what alledged hee? O there would be many inconueniences. True it is, that all those inconueniences are grounded vpon beaſtly ſuperſti.ions, to make men beleue that wyne is no more wyne, but that it is turned into the blood of our Lord Iefus Christ. Then marke here the allegation of the Pope: O ſayeth he, there would be many inconuenience, if the cup ſhould be giuen to all the people: it were better that the priue ſhould drink in the behalf of all the whole company. To be ſhort, it is all one as if he ſayd, we be wifer than God. we ſee things that he ſaw not, and therfore we muſt pro-vide for them. And after what maner? By putting away Math. 26.c. the ordinaunce of Iefus Christ. Behold, our Lord Iefus Christ ſayeth drinck ye all of this cup. He ſayeth expreſſe-ly drinck ye all: And behold, the Pope cometh and cut-Mat. 14.c. 23. 16th teth off that word, saying: it is true that so was the ordinance of Iesus Christ. But we haue not done it without good reason, it is to prouide for incoueniences: I haue forseen it to be so. And what shall we say of Gods son: who is the infinite wisdome it self and the light of the world? Did he see nothing in making this institution? We see then that men overshoote themselves beyond al measure, when they consider not that all Gods doings are brought about by infinite righteousnesse and wisdome. Then let vs hold vs there, and followe the way that he sheweth vs, 10 and not be afryde that we shal erre, if he once shewe vs his will, and we suffer our selues to be gouerned quietly by it.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs feele them better than we haue done, so as we may be sory for them and aske him forgiuenesse, and that therewithall wee may knowe that there is no other helpe for vs, but to put our selues to his mercy, that he may spare vs: not for some litle time only, but so as wee may be always vpheld by his power, and so assured of his mercye, as we may not doubt but that he will guide vs, even vnto the end, vntill he haue deliuering vs from al the aduersities and miseries whervnto wee bee now subiect. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to &c.

The cxxxv. Sermon, which is the eight vpon the xxxiiij. Chapter.

33. Will God performe the thing by thee? For thou hast disliked it: but wilt thou chooze and not I, what knowest thou speake.
34. Ye men of vnderstanding speake you, and let vsise men heare mee.
35. Job hath not spoken in wisdome, nother haue his vvords bin in vnderstanding.
36. I desire that Job should be tried to the vttermost, to the end vve might see the ansyvers for men of vvickednesse.
37. He vwill multiply his sinnes by iniquitie, he vaunteh himself against vs, and multiplieth his vvords against God.

E haue seene heretofore how God (to skorne mennen folly,) offered to heare mens counsell, saying that if he had nor vnderstoode the things 30 that they shewe, or if he hadde done amisse, he would do so no more: and therupon I declared, that it was not without cause that God so skorned this presumptuousnesse: for we see how men exalt themselves against him, and take vpon them to controll him at every turne, and therfore God had neede to dandle with them after that maner. And now Eliu setteth forth the maiestie of God, saying; Will be performe the thing by thee? The like as heretofore, he had (as it were) dalyed, to the end that men 40 might knowe the better, how fond their ouerweening is: so also on the contrarypart, he sheweth that it is no dalying with so greate a Lord as God is. For when wee haue repied never so much, what are we? Is it meete that he should be subiect to our lustes? Should he aske counsell at our hands to knowe what he should do? VVere not that an ouerthrowing of the whole order of nature? So then we see how the holy ghost hauing declared that men are not worthy to be spoken vnto with reason and grautie: doth now touch them to the quick, even by setting the maiestie of God before their eyes, and by telling them that it is not for vs to set him any lawe or rule. Thus much importeth this saying, Will be performe the thing by thee? For although men ouer labour themselves, yet shal they not win somuch, that God should yeeld vnto them, and be subiect to their pleasure: And therfore spight of their teeth they must passe the waye that God hath appointed, according as he listeth to dispose things, and ther as we sayd: For it is not in vs to rule the matter. True it is that here it might be obiectet, that Eliu doth not sufficiently defend Gods righteousnesse, by alledging his mighty power. But it behoueth vs to beare in mynd, how it hath bene declared afore, that whē God is mounted vp into his seate, he doeth not there glory of an absolute or lawlesse power: but that he is therewith the iudge of the world, and that nothing is more peculiar vnto him than equitie and vprightnesse, insomuch that he can no more be bereft of them, than of his owne being. On the other side, the case standeth not here, vpon shewing what God intendeth, but of his making of men to feele their owne fraylery. Therfore here is a compairing of things contrary. For on the one side God sheweth that all power belongeth vnto him without exception: and on the other side, he warneth vs to consider wel what we ourselues are, and what our sinfulness is, and to beware how a mortal man that is but a worme of the earth, should take so stout'y vpon him, as to dare stand in contention with his God, and desire to ouerrule him. And surely so often as wee murmur against God, and cannot accept the things in good worth which come from him: we knowe him not.

So then let vs marke well, that the holy ghost doeth here bring men back to their owne state. For never durst they be so bold as to grudge against God, except they had forgiuen what they theselues be. VVil we then be lowly and mild to glorifie God, as it becommeth vs? Let vs enter into our selues and examin wel what our nature is, and when we knowe that we be but men, it will hold vs short from any presumption. Thus yee see what we haue to beare away in this text. And further it is sayd, thou hast disliked, thou shalt chooze and not I. Here againe in this streyne God is brought in, complauning of mens pride for pleading so against him. For surely they that cannot content theselues with Gods will, do mislike his doings, and by that meanes pretend to haue chooyce & election, as though it were free for them to saye, this is not well done, God must leau to do so. True it is that we would abhor such blasphemies: and if it should be demanded whether any of vs would take vpon him to let God of the executing of his determinacions: every of vs would answere, God forbid that ever I should intend to aduaunce myself so: For it is to diuelishe a pride and to haynouse a blasphemie. But yet in the meane whyle, wee haue our tongs flied to find fault: whensoever God doth not things to our contentacion, yee shall see vs grind our teeth, and make complaints, nother shall we haue neede to haue gone to schoole to learne Retorick to grudge against God. And is not this a plaine misliking of his doings? For at what point are men if they yeeld not quietly to Gods good will? Is it not their mynde to haue the choyce choye of all things, and to saye God must do thus? So then God must be our page. Behold an outrageouse vice which reygneth euery where, and yet men indeuour not to put it awaye, no nor to amend it. Somuch the more then ought we to marke well this text, how God commeth in his owne quarrell against vs, and sayeth: you wretched creatures what intend you to do? For I see you murmur dayly: VVheras the cheef point that you haue to do, is to obey myne ordinaunce, and to take it in good woorthe, and to hold your peace and humble your selues when I afflicte you: you are sofarre of from doing it, as there is none of you all, but he ryseth vp against mee. And must I be subiect vnto you? VVhat reason can you alledge that I should bee bound to that? Seing that God is brought in after this sort: Surely wee are worse than blockishe, if it doo not touche and moue vs. Though our harts were swolne like Toades, yet shoulde the filthinesse brust out: And though they were as harde as rockes, yet ought they too clyue a-sunder.

But wheras God addeth, what? do you mislike mee? And what mislike we, when we fall to accuzing him after that sort? Do we not finde fault with his righteousnesse? where is the welspring of all lyght? Is it not in God? And would wee reject his doings? whether were that too go? Agayne, this importeth therewithall, that wee would haue souereyne dominion ouer him, and that he shoulde be no more at his owne libertie, but that he shoulde do what wee thinke good. And that is the cause why he sayeth then shalt thou choose and not I. And bycause men cannot finde in their harts to condemne themselues, except they bee compelled: here God addeth for a conclusion, what knowest thou? speake it. As who should say, he reprocheth vs for our ignorance. Our tong will be as nimble as may be, and it is hastie to speake a thing before wee haue conceyued it: but God telleth vs that if wee had but one drop of reason, wee should bee as it were dumme. And why? For if a man speake he wote not what: Is it not a sure record of his folly? And yet notwithstanding, wee will bee talking, insomuch that our Lord needeth but to crosse vs with somewhat that misliketh vs, and it whetteth vs too murmur agaynst him.

But now let it bee knowne that we can skill wherof we talke: if al that is in vs be throughly examined, there shall be nothing found but ignorauce. Many woords, and little wit, our tongs shall runne vpon pattins, and in the meane whyle our reasons shall bee vtterly fencelasse. And what a rashnesse is that? wee see then how wayghty this conclusion of Gods is, what knowest thou? I speake it? As if he shoulde say, I give you leaue to speake, sobeit that you shewe by your doings that you be wyze men, and men of vnderstanding: But you are starke fooles, and there is nothing in you but ignorauce: And must you then take vpon you such liberty to speake, and haue not what too saye? Now if wee can make our profit of this streyne, it conteyneth a good lesson. For first wee see, what is the rule of our life, namely to yeed God his dewe authority, that he may dispoze of vs, that is to say, that he may do all things, and yet not by our aduise. Then it is not for vs, to set God a lawe and too point him out his lesson: but wee must agree vnto all that he doeth. Marke that for one point. True it is that wee may well deniaund the things which we thinke to be for his glorie, & for the welfare of his church, or for our own priuat benefit. For he sheweth such familiaritie towards vs, as to say vnto vs, discharge your harts, and your cares. According also as Sainct Paule sayeth, that wee must make him priuy to our desires. Therfore when wee bee in any vnquietnesse, let vs refer ourselues vnto God, and pray him to do the thing that wee thinke good, howbeit let vs rule ourselues alwayes by his word: notwithstanding if it please him not to graunt our desires, yet must we vse thanksgivung as saint Paule sayeth in the same place, and our desires must not be heady, nother must we constraine God to do that which we require, but contrarewaise although he say vs naye, and mynde therein to exercycle our patience, let vs alwayes blisse and glorifie his name, acknowledging that he doeth all things with inestimable iustice, vprightnesse, and wisdom, and that we ourselues knowe not what is good, but are poore blynd wretches, and therfore he must bee fayne to see for vs. Thus then ye see that the first poynt which wee haue to marke here, and to put in vre this streyne, is that God must not doo things at our appointment. Howbeit this stretcheth yet further, that is to wit, if wee finde any thing in the scripture which is straunge to our vnderstanding: let vs assure our selues, that we must not leane so to our owne reason, that God shoulde do what wee thinke ought to be done. How then? let his will reygne and let men stoupe vnto it: For he ought not to aske counsell of vs. Then behoueth it bothe the Angels of heauen, and men vpon earth, to humble themselues, and God only to beare the swaye: Yea even with such freedome, as it be confessed that it belongeth to him to do whatsoeuer he doeth.

And on the other side we be warned, that wee cannot do a worse thing than to repine and grudge at God when things fall not out as wee would wishe them. And why? For it is a misliking of the only rule of ryghteousnesse. And what a thing is that? If a man fall to euill and do amisse through fraylty, he is not therfore to be execuzed: but when he commeth to such a fulnesse of sin, as he is not contented to offend God and to breake his lawe, and to abolish all order, but also would quenche Gods ryghteousnesse and haue the lyght turned intoo darknesse, so as there myght be no more discerning betweene good and euill: what an oueroutrageousnesse is that? And yet notwithstanding, as often as men repyne at God, and cannot paciently beare his doings and glorifie him: therin they mislike of him, as though they would vsurpe authoritie over him to iudge him, and not only that but also condemne his righteousnesse, which is too outrageouse and beastly a dealing. Therfore when we bee tempted to grudging and impatiencie, let this text come to our remembraunce, and let vs say, thou wretched creature, what doest thou? what a maze entrest thou intoo? This is not a simple temptation, but a pushing with the hornes agaynste God. Thinkest thou to blot out his ryghteousnesse? with whom doest thou match thy self? Then if our flesh be so itching, as to make vs bend our selues agaynst God: let this bee as a barre too holde vs backe. And if that suffize not: let vs adde thus much further, that it is to greate a malapartnesse for vs to desire to chooze, specially by taking awaie Gods choyce. That men should haue the libertie to say, this must bee done: and that God shoulde haue the souereyntie to gouerne vs, as he listeth: are twoo things that cannot stand togither. And why? VVe agree with God, as fire with water. VVe be very wellfighted: For if wee looke but half a finger length before vs, wee are dazeled assone as wee open our eyes, and commonly, wee judge that thing to bee euill, which is good: Our desires are corrupt, and so are al our affections and thoughts. So then, how should we agre with God, who is the infinite, and incomprehensible wi-dome, and vnto whose righteousnesse it behoueth vs to be subiect? Seing there is such a contrarietie betweene God and men: If we haue the choyce, God must be packing, or else tyed to the stake: and our lusts must be like chaynes and cordes to say to him, thou shalt not stir. And what a presumptuousnesse were that? So then if wee be tempted to grudge at our afflictions, or at any other thing, when the state of the world is out of order, so as things fal not out to our liking; let vs think thus with ourselves: True it is that I may wish this thing, and thy God giueith thee leauē to aske of him so it be done with humilitie & subiectio. But whē thou hast made thy request, thou must hold thy self quiet, though things fal not out to thy liking: euē though thy God seeme to be minded to greeue thee of set purpose, yet must thou yeld in that behalf, and not play the beast. Seing it is so, let vs marke well this sentēce where our Lord sayeth: VVhat? whether would you go? you shall haue the choyce and I shall medle no more. It is al one as if we would bereue God of his being, and abace him insuch wise, as we might be maisters ouer him. But very nature teacheith vs the contrary to that: and as often as we murmur after that maner, and storme at things because they fall not out, as we would wilshē: it is as much as if we would thrust God vnder our feete. Truc it is that we think it not, but yet must we not fall to such blockishnesse. Then let vs thinke vpon things, and enter into the sayd consideration, to the end wee be no more so rebelliouse as we be. And for an end, let vs also marke well this speche, where it is sayd, What knowest thou? speak it. For (as I haue touched already), if wee meane to twit a man that he is a foole, we will say thou knowest not what thou sayest. If we wote not what we say: it followeth that wee knowe nothing. And out of doubt when all our skill is throughly tried, and that we be serched from top to toe what we be: it will be found there is nothing in vs, but dotage, that maketh vs go astraye. And yet for all that, we must always be prating whatsoeuer come of it: I speake of those that followe their owne sensuality. For it is well sayd, I haue beleued and therfore wil I speake. And marke here how we may speake wyzely: that is to wit, by vttering that which we haue learned in Gods schoole, and by his word. This theē is a good speaking and allowed of God, yea and a sacrifice of good sauour vnto him: namely whē we confess that all things are good which he hath shewed vs, and when we rest wholy vpon his saying. Yee see then in what wize we haue to speake. But when a man auanceith and thrusteth forth himselfe to speake what soeuer he hath imagined in his owne brayne, in so doing he checketh against God. And what knowest thou? Let a man trye well all thy strength and vnderstanding of thy mind, and he shall finde it but stark folly. Therfore when soeuer our toong is to lauishe of talke: let vs remember how it is sayd here, What knowest thou? And it is certayne that in this place our Lord ment to condemne all mannes wīg, like as in other places of the holy scripture where it is sayd that God knoweth the thoughts of men how they be but vayne, and that he sercheth all their secrets, and overtaketh the wylie in they wylinesse, and that men may well bearre themselves in hand that they be sharpwitted and subtle: and yet all is but smoke and vanisheth away strayghte. So then in this text our Lord sayth, go to, if you haue any wisdome shewe it, but, if you haue no skil, why then do you speake? Here we haue a generall doctryne, which is, that we must not clayme any thing of our owne wit to trust vnto it. Therfore as oft as our wit runneth at rousers, so as we presume to talke and iudge of matters rashely: let vs assure ourselues that the holy ghost setteth himself against it as our aduersary partie, & sheweth that there is nothing but foolishe rashnesse in vs. And why? For we haue no skill. True it is that God hath giuen vs reason and vnderstanding: but that is but only to do vs to wit, that the light of God shyneth in our darknesse, of purpose to make vs vnexcusable, insomuch that we haue no knowledge, except God speake vnto vs, and inlighthen vs by his word: and that is the waye wherby we may bee men of vnderstanding, according as it is sayd in the Psalme, that our wisdome is to profit vnder him. And Psal.119. therfore let vs marke that we must vtterly distrust all our Mem.98. owne reason, and knowe, that till our Lord haue inligh- 99.100. ned vs by his word, we are vtterly voyde of all discretion, and there is nother modesty nor honestie in vs. Lo what we haue to beare in mind. Furthermore when we speake let vs be sure aforehand that our Lord hath taught vs, & that we haue the thing of him which wee vtter, and not imagined it of our owne brayne. If all this were well practized, we should see the world in another order thā it is: For there are two things which displace al right. The one is, when we will be wise in our owne conceyts: and the other is, when we give bridle to our affections and lustes. But if we knew well the thing which is spoken here: that is to wit, that we haue no skil at all, and that our speking is but to bewray our owne folly: I say if we were throughly persuaded of that: no dout b̄t God should be exalted, and all men would hold themselues to his word, so as there should be one cōmon accord, and there would not be somuch disputing of this and that. And for proof hereof, why do the Papistes debate somuch vpon all the articles that are in controuersie betweene them and vs? It is not only bycause they cannot finde in their harts to be subiect vnto God: but also bycause they be so sawcy to step forthe with their lordly conclusions, to determinye and bynd mens consciences to their resolutions. Then if the Papists could hold themselues to the pure simplicitie of Gods word: surely wee should in one minute of an houre agree vpon al things that are in doubt at this daye. Agayne, as touching these phantasticall heads that creepe in amongs vs to defile the pure doctrine: I praye you wheroft commeth it, but of this diuelishe pride, that they cannot finde in their harts to receive the thing quietly, which the holy scripture speaketh? If a man aske these madde heade (which would nowadayes abolishe both Gods free election and also his prouidēce and such other like things) what reason they haue: they will answe, mee thinks it very straunge. Ye beasts, though a man were the sharpest witted and the skilfulllest that could be, so as he were a paterne of all cunning and learning: yet is he but a slye worme of the earthe to finde any faulte in Gods doings. But behold, these stark beasts haue nothing but pride wherewith they are ready to burst, and stincking poysen: and yet notwithstanding, they take vpō the to overturne the holy scripture vnder the colour of this saying, that they perceiue it not. In what case are we then? So then (as I haue sayd) let this article be marked, that men which haue no skill, ought to hold their peace and kepe silence, to the end that God alone may be exalted. VVere this doctrine throughly put in vre, surely wee should see a quiet obedience, and that all of vs would say Amen when soeuer the pure trueth of God were layed afore vs. But there is a second mischeef, which is, that our affections are to vnrulie, and we give them leauē to run at rouers. By reaso wheroft God afflict vs, or if things fal not out to our looking, we fall to storming, and euery man is caried awaie, and (which worse is) it is not ynoch enough for vs to take libertie to speake against God: but also it seemeth that we seeke occasion to rayle at his justice if it be not agreeable to our fancies. VVe see this at all times. And ther-therfore so much the more behoueth it vs to marke what I haue sayd: namely that if this sentence were put wel in vre, we shuld see an angelicall order in this world. VVhat is to be done then? let vs not followe our owne reason, nor attempt things vpon our owne head, but be contented to be taught of God. And agayne on the other side, when our affections cary vs awaye into bitternes, so as we be greeued and vexed: let vs shake those things off: because it is good reason that God should reigne and haue al superioritie ouer vs, and that we shuld obey him: to confess that all his doings are good and ryghtfull. For then is he glorified of vs, when we acknowledge, not only that he ought to gouerne vs, but also that he doeth it ryghtfully. Thus ye see what we haue to note. Furthermore whensoeuer we finde any men, that aduaunce them selues after that sort agaynst God: let vs vnderstand, that they be in maner desperate and vnre recoverable, sith they cannot submit themselues to the good will of God, to acknowledge the same to be good and ryghtfull. And therfore let their example teache vs to humble our selues, and to say, Alas, asmuch would betyde thee if thy God preserued thee not. For whence commeth modestie but of the holy ghost? And here thou seest what the nature of euery of vs is. Then seeing the case standeth so: when wee see these lyghtheaded persons that do so aduaunce themselues, and passe their bounds against God: let euery of vs thinke: as muche might befall me, if I were not withild by the spirit of my God, so as he gouerned mee to make mee meeke, that I might glorifie him, and take in good woorth whatsoever he sendeth mee. Lo here in effect al that we haue to remember in this sentence. Now it is sayd consequently, let men of bairt speake, that is to say let men of vnderstanding speake, and let wyse men kerken.

Heere at the first sight Eliu seemeth to speake things contrarie: for to speake and to kerken agree not togither. Yet notwithstanding it is not without cause that he willeth wise men to speake, and men of vnderstanding to kerken.
For a man shall never speake well, except he be willing to heare: nother shall he ever be fit to teache, vnolesse he be willing also to receiuue good doctrine. VVee see then that Eliu matcheth two things togither, which ought never to be separated asunder: and that is the thing which I haue spoken afore, namely, that we may wel speake, howbeit when we haue learned afore, I haue beleueed (sayeth the Psalme) and therfore haue I spoken. Therfore it behoueth vs to keepe that lesson, for how can we beleue, 2.C.4.b.13 vnolesse we haue giuen eare and suffered ourselues to be taught? For we must be teachable when good things are set afore vs, according also as it is sayd that the wise man shall become wiser by hearing. Ye see heere a saying of Salomon, which sheweth full wel, that to speake is no let but a man should kerken: according also as to kerken is no let but that a man may speake. For wherfore is our Lord a maister, but to the intent that we shuld heare him, and euery of vs teache his neyghbours, and therby make the thing auayable which we haue receyued? If God haue giuen mee any gift of grace, I am bound to vter it to my neyghbours when I see them do amisse. So then to speake and to kerken are twoo things, that not only agree verie wel, but also (which is more) are inseparable: at least-wise if all things be well disposed and considered in good order. True it is that speaking is heere set foremost: ne-uerthelesse when as Eliu sayeth wyse men, he therin pre-supposeth that they whidi speake had first learned afore, and knew what to say. And again wheras in the second place he setteth downe that they should kerken: it is to do vs to wit, that our speaking must be after such a maner, as we must neuerthelesse give eare when another man hath to speake, to whom God hath revealed more than to vs: according also as Sainct Paule setteth it downe for an order in prophecyng Let him that is a Prophet (sayeth he) 1.Cor.14.f. speak, and let but two or thre do it at once, for auoing of confusio. Now then in that he calleth them Prophets, he sheweth that it behoueth them to haue what to say, and none must thrust himselfe foorth vni-fle he be called: like as he sayeth in the xiii. chapter of the first to the Corinthians, that we haue receyued the things at our Lords 1.C.12.a.7. hand, which we communicate to our neyghbours. Then must not any man take vpon him an office in the churche, except he be called and haue wherwith to furnish the roome. For it is a record that God wil be serued by vs, when he dealeth his gracie gifts to vs by his holy spirit. S. Paule then declareth and presupposeth, that such as speake, are furnished aforward. Neuerthelesse he addeth that when God hath revealed more to another man, the first must hold hi, peace and giue roome to the spirit of God. And thus ye see why it is said here, that although wise men speake, and that God alloweth them, and also that they be furnished wherwith to do it: yet notwithstanding they must also harken, and be contented to hold their peace when another man speaketh better. For the Prophets do awayes yeeld themselues subiect to the holy ghost who is the fountaine of all vnderstanding. Also, although a man haue receyued very large gifts of grace: yet doeth God deale them vnto him, but in measure: to the intent to abridge all occasion of aduancing ourselues to much, as though any man might be sufficient of himself.

God therfore hath set it as a band of loue among vs, that one of vs should haue neede of another: and it behoueth vs to mainteyne it by brotherly communicating. For this cause (except we wil be rebels against God) it behoueth vs to be willing to receyue good doctrine at his hands, although God haue enlightened vs by his word. Neuerthelesse it is certeyne that here Eliu intendeth to reprove Job, as if he sayd, that Job hath shewed himselfe to be euill taught. And surely although Job were a man of greate learning: yet was he so caried away by his passions, as he was in maner dulled, and his words were out of order.
This is the thing that Eliu ment to say. And in this streyne we haue a good admonition to gather. First of all, if Job, whome God had indued with so greate grace, be con-dened as a man voyde of wit, and be reported to haue bin excessive in his passions, yea and that although he had streyned himselfe to represe them, yet notwithstanding he toke to much libertie: and wadred beastly in his words, what is to be thought of vs? Then let vs take heede too preuent this condemnation, and whensoeuer our mynde is ouersore shaken, so as we haue fretted against God, & would haue entred into disputation and pleading against him: let vs in the end suffer ourselues to be reproved by the holy ghost. And why? For if Job (who was an Angell in comparision of vs) were not spared, what shal we bee?
Specially seeing we be so heady and vrrulye, is we will not yeeld in any one point, which we be inforced to knowe to proceed from the hand of God. but our mindes are so loftie, as we would rule both heauen and earth, and (as you would say) correcte Magnificat. Seeing then that wee be so bold: what shal be done to vs? Shal we not be blamed a hundredfold more than Job was? It is a thing that ought to make vs sorry at the hart, when we see our passions so outrageouse. Furthermore we haue to marke in general, that a man shall never be meete to teache, except he do (with all humilitie) suffer other men to reprove him when he hath done amisse. Lo how God intendeith to hold vs in awe by this text. And therfore let euery man apply it to his owne instruction. For if it be sayd that men of vs-

of vnderstanding must aswell heare as speake: what must they do, that haue no vnderstanding at all? Neuerthelesse wee see nowadayes that it is not for the wyse to speake, or too harken when they haue spoken: who bee they that haue full scope to speake and babble and make other men hold their peace? VVitlesiſſe folke in whome there is nother skill, discretion, nor iudgement. A drunckerd that is dulled with his glotonie, insomuch that when he ryſeth in the morning, he hath scarce diſgasted his eueningſ wine, and is ready byandby to go to a rauerne, and there playeth the beast all day, and the double beast all night: Such a man ſhall now a dayes haue free liberty to ſpeak, and other men muſt kepe silence afore him, and giue him the hearing. And how is that? Full ſhamful. VVe ſee that they which haue leaſt ſhame, haue moſt liberty to ſpeak, and as for ſuch as are men of vnderstanding, they muſt haue their mouthes ſhet, they may in no wiſe be brought in. Lightheaded and diſorderd folke, (and which is the cheef of all miſchief) the diſpayers of God haue their ful ſcope. True it is that althoſh they were the wittieſt men in the world, and of a sober and ſetled mynde, yea and alſo of greate ſkill: yet is it certeynē that they ſhould alwayes be but beaſtes, if they haue nothe ſearc of God. But behold, the diſpayers of God, ſtarke beaſtes, drunckerds and gluttons, vnthriſts, & ſuch as haue nother honeſty nor ſhame, even thoſe (as I haue ſayd) do nowadayes roſt it our, thoſe ſpeak what they liſt, and it is not for any man to be ſo bold as to quetech againſt them. Lo at what point we be. And agayne, as for too be heard: How dare any man nowadayes tell other men their faults? For althoſh ſinnes bee as howge as mountaynes, yet may no man ſee them. If a man ſay, how now? Ought ſuch things to bee borne withall? It will bee anſwered: hah! what is it? we ſee it not. Yee wretched beaſtes, if ye haſt no eyes, ye were the leſſe to be condemned: but you are ſufficiently conuictēd, and there is none of you all, but he bath the ſting of conſcience. Too bee ſhort, althoſh there were nother preaching, nor warning, nor any thing elſe: yet the very hartbytings that gnawe you within, might make you to ſee that there is nothing in you but euil, and yet you aſke ſtill, hah! what i. i. So then we are faire of from putting this doctrine in vre where it is ſayd, let wyſe men ſpeak and let men of underſtanding heare. VVheras none but ſooies, wiſeliſſe folke, and madde men, haue liber-tie to ſpeak, and bynd other men to the ſtakē, ſo as they haue al authoritie yeldeſ to them, yet notwithstanding they haue ne'eares to heare, nor to receyve correſtione. If a man would tell them their faults, they bee ſuch as cannot abyde any bewraying. Neuertheleſſe, if we go againſt the thing that God bath ſtabliſhed, our ſtriuing to ouerthrowe it ſhall bee but in vayne. It is to hard a wall for vs: And therfore let ſuch as rushe againſt it, aſſure their ſelues that it ſhall bee too their ruine and deſtruſion. Lo what we haue to heare in mynde. And therfore ſith wee knowe how things are confounded nowadayes: Let vs leaſne too returne therer as God calleth vs: which is, that his doctrine ſhould bee heard and take place amoung vs, ſo as all of vs ſhould be diligent to receyue it, and he which knowes he hath don amifle, ſhould ſeke to amend it: that by that meanes wee myght all do honour to him that ought to haue ſouereynty ouer vs, and conſider that if Job were condenmed for giuing himſelf the bridle to much in that he mortified not his affections, nor hild them ſufficiently in awe: Alas what ſhall become of vs? Then let vs thiſke vpon it, and be aſhamed to ſee thee wretchedneſſe that hath reynged to much amoung vs. For I pray you, to what purpoſe is it for vs to ſpeak of the reformacion of the gospell, when in the meane ſeazon wee ſtryue after this ſort againſt God? wheras wickedneſſe hath his ful ſcope nowadayes: ſo ferre of are men from repreſſing it, that it is rather mainteyned with tooth and nayle: insomuch that if a man take vpon him to ſpeak, and to ſhewe them their faults: then the lambe doeth alwayes trouble the water. These ſtinking goates that croude themſelues into Gods churche, do trouble and defile all the holynesse that God hath ſet amoung vs by his word: and in the meane whyle theſe ſilie lambes muſt be accuzed, as though they were the caufe of all the euill. Sith wee ſee this, let vs leaſne to ſtrengthen and incou-rage our ſelues, that when we ſee the cuill in others, we may take heede that it bee not alſo in our ſelues. And furthermore, when we feele that our Lord graunteth vs the grace to ſubmit ourſelues vnto him in all mildneſſe, ſo as we ſuffer our ſelues to be taught: althoſh wee ſee wickedneſſe raygne, not only let vs not conſent vnto it, but alſo let vs reſiſt it ſtoutly to the vttermoſt of our power. For he that diſembleth, or draweth a curten before his eyes, when wickedneſſe raungeth abroade, and the diuell carayeth awaie his vnderlinges, after that ſort: is as guilty in Gods iudgement, as if he had maynteyned the cuill. Thus ye ſee how we ought to praſtize this doctrine, if we will do God his dewe ſervice, and acknowledgē him to be Lord and ſouereyng ouer al monarcies and principalities in the world.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs to repente them, that being gouerned by his holy ſpirit, we may fight manfully agaynst all the tem-tacions and afflictions of the world, and whyle that it ſhall please him too kepe vs here, wee may ſeeke to bee altogether ſubiect to his holy commaundementes. And ſo let vs ſay, Almighty God our heauenly father, we acknowledge and confeſſe according to the truthe, that we be not woorthie to lifte vp our eyes to heauen, to preſent our ſelues before thee, nor to preſume ſo farre as that our prayers &c.

The cxxxvj. Sermon, which is the firſt vpon the. xxxv. Chapter.

E Liu proceſſeth ſaying:

2. Diddeſt thou think this aright, vvhenthou ſaydeſt my ryghteousneſſe is aboue God?
3. For thou haſt ſayd, vvhath ſhall it profit mee, or vvhath ſhall it auayle mee, not to haue ſinned?
4. I vvilansvverē thee and thy freends likevvyſe.
5. Looke vp to the heauens and behold them, looke vp to the ayre that is aboue thee.
6. If thou ſinnewt: vvhath doſt thou againſt him? And if thy ſinnes be multiplied: vvhath hur-teſt thou him?
7. If thou bee ryghteouſe: vvhath giueſt thou him? Or vvhath ſhall hee receyue at thy hand?

Iou continueth here still to blame Job for blaspheming the righteousnesse of God: & he groūdeth it vpō this point, that Job had ment that his own ryghteousnesse surmounted God. Not that he vttered those words, or pretended any such thing: but because he had maynteyned his owne ryghteousnesse in such wise, as though God had tormented him wrongfully and without cause. And therepon it shoulde haue in-10 sued, that God dealt not reasonably with him, but affli-eted him out of measure. Howbeit for the better, conceyng hereof, it behoueth vs to call to mynd what hath bene set downe heretofoore. VVhen Job spake of his owne ryghteousnesse, it was only to the end to shewe that he was not punished for his offences, and that he ought not to bee iudged wicked bycause God afflicted him so greeuously aboue all other men. For (as I haue told you) God in afflictiong men, hath not awayes an eye to the punishing of their sinnes, but intendeth too trye their patience, as beefell vnto Job when God gaue Satan the brydle. For it was not bycause Job was a naughty pack, and had prouoked Gods wrathe by greate offences. No, but although Satan found no fault in him, yet notwithstanding he obteyned leauē to torment him. So then the cause why God afflicted Job after that sort, was not for that he was angrie with him, but for that he intended to try his obedience, that it might be a mirrour vnto vs. Therfore Job fought very well in saying that he was not punished for his offences, but that there was some other respect: And therin he deserueth not to be condemned. But his faulthe was, that being troubled with the vehe-20 mencie of his passions, he thought first of all, that God vsed no measure, but was to sore agaynst him, and that a poore creature ought not to bee punished after that sort, and so did he murmur in that behalf. True it is that Job flattered not himself in his infirmitie: but yet had he not so good staye of himself as he ought to haue had. And agayne, the greatest mischeef was, that hee 30 thought vpon nothing but his anguishe, insomuch that at tymes: his fayth was as it were choked, and he looked no more to the heauenly life, nor to the reward that is promised too all the faythfull after their manfull fighting. Hee could not atteyne to that, bycause he was sore possessed with his greef, and as it were troubled and vt-erly ouerwhelmed. Yee see then that Job confesseth 40 ryghtly in generall, that God hath prepared an euerlast-ing heritage, that cannot fayle, for those that are bis, and that the wicked also cannot scape his hand, but although they triumph in this world and take their pleasure here, yet they shall paye very deere for it. Job knewe 50 all these things in generall: but when he ment to applye the doctrine to himself, he could not bring it to passe, bycause his hart was distressed and hee stormed too much.

VVhen he was at that asterdeele, hee gazed here and could not see three foote afore him without dazeling of his eyes: his wits were after a sort bereft him. That was the cause why he could not comfort himself with the hope of the rest that was promised him. For he had as-60 suaged all his anguishe, if he had remitted himself vnto God to say, even so Lord, yet haue I aways hoped that thou wilt make mee feele, that such as shall haue suffered their afflictions paciently, shall be happy in the end. Lord thou giuest me knowledge, that such as wayte vpon thee shall never be disappointed of their hope. For thou wilt still prouide for all their aduersities, and gine them a good end, and although thy helpe appere not out of hand, yet wilt thou never fayle them. Job ought to haue thought of these things, but he did not. For his passion hild him as it were in prison: and his faith (as I sayd afore) was in maner choked. Like as if the we. her bee sore troubled and darke, wee shall paradynture haue some maner of light, but yet shall we not see a whit a farre off. For the darke clouds do as it were dimme our eyes, so as wee cannot diserne any thing. Even so is it with vs when we bee afflicted. According as experience sheweth that when a man is vexed in his conscience, he seeth nother sunne, nor moone, but all is darke vnto him. True it is that he will hold still the principles which the faithfull ought to haue, so as he shall knowe God and his goodnesse, but yet can he not take comfort to chere vp himself in the middes of his sorowes. For he cannot conclude thus with himself: go to, yet will I hold on still. For my God recheth mee his hand, and I shall get out of these distresses and perplexities wherin I am. The man therefore that is so pressed with anguish when God afflieth him and maketh him too feele his sinnes, is dis-maid and cannot come so farre as to say, God hath declared that he will drawe his seruaunts out of the graue: and therfore although I seeme to be vtterly ouerwhelmed, yet is not Gods mighty power diminished towards mee. Lo in what taking Job was. So then although he knewe that the heauenly life is prepared for vs, and that it is our very heritage, and that there wee shall haue the euerlasting ioye: yet could he not comfort himself in his afflictions. And why? For he was ouerraught too much with his affliction, for that it made him feele Gods hand agaynst him: his eyes were after a sort blind folded: his witts were so amazed as he could not chere nor comfort himself to take hold of Gods promises with such talke as the same might assuge his miseries. And this is a lesson well worthy to be noted. For wee see continually, that when wee are afflicted with hartgreeses, wee are so amazed, that wee be as if a man had giuen vs a knocke vpon the head with a betle, yea and wee may well haue some feeling therof also in our bodily afflictions. In winter if there be a greate frost, so as it be able in maner to ryue stones: we could finde in our harts that all were on fire. And why? For we haue the present passion before our eyes, and wee haue forgotten quite what heate meeneth. Cleane contrariwise, in sommer when wee bee ouerwhote, wee would that all were full of yee.

Now if wee come too our minds: forasmuch as the passions of it, are much more excesſive: no doubt but they are able to oppresse vs much more. Ye see also how 50 we ought to go rightforth vnto God, that wee myght bee comforted in him, and imbrace his promises which lift vs aboue the world and make vs behold the glorie which as now is inuisible: But oftentimes, wee cannot come to that point at the first brunt. So then this doctrine is very necessary for vs. For whereinto myght wee fall, if wee take not hold of the rest which is prepared for vs in heauen? wee should fall as it were intoo despaire and blasphemie God. For nothing can bring vs too yeld him glorie, and too confess that he afflicteth vs iustly and ryghtly, excepte wee feele that the presente afflictions are auayable to our saluation, and that God ruleth them in such wise, as they serue vs for medecynes.

If wee beleue not this: how can wee glorifie God? Howe can wee stoupe vnder his myghtie hand, to yeld our selues to him obediētly as saint Peter exhorteth vs.
1. Pet. 5. b. 6. It is impossible. Nay cleane contrary wise, there will be nothing with vs, but fretting and gnashinge of teeth. If this befell vnto Job, what will beset vnto vs? True it is that

that Job ment it not, nother would wee do any more : but yet notwithstanding we be as blame woorthy, as if we would pleade against God, and make our selues more righteous than him. So then we haue good cause to pray vnto God that when he afflicceth vs, he will never suffer vs to forgo the taste and saour of his promises, but that we may alwayes hope that he will bring our miseries to an end : yea and to such an end, as we shall haue cause to prayse him, as a good father that hath procured our welfare. Furthermore when wee feele our infirmitie to bee such, as wee be in maner dazled by our afflictions, and cannot mount vp to the rest that tarieth for vs aboue : let vs understand that we be in the hye way to blasphemie God if he remedy it not: yea and although wee meane not to make our selues more righteous than God, yet notwithstanding let vs assure ourselues that we ame alwayes at that marke when we fall to grudging and repyning: and that is a cursed blasphemy. Then behoueth it vs to condemne all our passions when we be so greeued and vexed, as we knowe not on which side to turne vs. 20 Let vs consider I say, that then our affections do boyle to teruently, and therfore are cōdemned by the holy ghost. Job could well haue replied therenvn: o and haue sayd, I never had any intent to blaspheme God nor to magnifie my righteousness aboue his : Yes but he doeth for all that. For is God more righteous than we, if our mouth be not stopped to condemne our selues, so as we alledge no excuses before him, nor take leue to grudge agaynst him, when it pleaseith him to afflict vs after what sort soever it be? Then if we be not so beaten downe, and that we confesse not that God doeth al things iustly: it is certeyne that we would aduaunce our righteousness aboue his : and that is all one, as if we would spurne against the sunne. Now then sith we be warned therof, let vs learne (as I sayd) to preuent the mischeef. And whensoeuer we be afflicted let vs be fully persuaded and resolved in our selues, that God knowes why he doeth it, although wee see not the reason therof. And furtl e more that we must not be so troubled with the aduersitie that lieth vpon vs, but that we should hope that God will deliuere vs, forasmuch as he hath premised euer to fayle those that are his. VVherefore let vs ouerpasse all the troublies that are afore our eyes, and which hinder vs from looking further off, and let the same serue to comfort vs, so as wee may saye, yet will God haue pity vpon vs in the end. And therfore let vs passe on still, and beldyng go through with our course. Lo what we haue to marke in this streyne. And that the sense is such, it appeareth by that which Eliu gathereth of it. For he layeth it forth saying : thou hast sayd, what shall it boote me not to haue sinned, and what shall it profit mee? The thing then wherin Eliu vþbraydeith Job that he would make himself more righteous than God, is that he had thought it to be an vr profitable thing to haue walked in the feare of God, and to haue absteyned from sin. For if we imagin that : where is Gods righteousness become? It is as good as abolished. For Gods rightfulness cōsisteth not noly in doing no māwrōg, but also in gouerning the world with equitie, and in dispozing his creatures after such a sort, that if we trust in him, we shall not be disappointed, and that if we serue him with a good cōscience, we are sure to haue reward for it. Then if God should forsake those that feare him, and not passe to reward them in heauen: surely he should ceasse to be ryghteous, according also as the Apostle declareth in the Epistle to the Hebrewes. God (sayeth he) is not vnrighteous, that he should not remember your afflictions too giue you relief : For he is faythfull. VVhen he sayeth that God is not vnyrightheouse : hee sheweth that his righteousness is a thing inseparable from his being. Although then, that he exercise men with many afflictions in this world, when they haue behaued themselves stedfastly in their vocation, yet must they comfort themselves with his promis: and it is a point well woorthy to be noted. For we shall see many which imagin that God is asleepe in heauen. Howbeit his Godhead is not a vayne imaginacion, but it importeth the things which I haue spoken concerning the gouernement and soucreyne dominion of the world : namely that like as he hath created all things so also bothe man and beast and all things else, are in his hand and protection, and all things must be brought to a good end for their sakes whiche are his : & that although things be out of order here bilowe, yet in the meane whyle, as in respect of himself, there is nothing at all out of order : and that although he suffer things to be otherwise disposed than wee would haue them, yea and appoint many confuzions also, yet can he well skill to set all things in perfect state agayne. Thus y<sup>e</sup> see a thing that belongeth vnto God, and is peculiar to his beeing. And so let vs marke, that if we will gloriſe God and yeild him the deserved prayſe of his ryghtuousnesſe : we muſt behold his hand and power in all things, and not doubt but that he hath iſt cause to do whatſoever he doeth, although we knowe not why he doeth it. Lo in effect what we haue to beare in minde. Furthermore, the perfeſteſt men that are, may ſometimes be tempted to ſay, what booreth it thee, not to haue ſinned: according as I alledged yesterdaſt, that David entered into the ſame doult, and ſayd, Then haue I loſt my tyme in clenſing my hands : and it is but loſt labour that I haue kept myſelf from filthinesſe and iſfection. Dauid was tempted herewith, and there is not any of the faſthuſt that is not now and then ſhaken with ſuch fanciess: ſpecially when aduerſties oppreſſe vs ſore by reaſon of our infirmitiess, and the diuell assayleth our ſayth through our unbelieef, ſo as wee cannot but bee ſore afrayd, and enter intoo theſe preſent doubts. VVell then, what is to bee doone in the meane whyle? VVe muſt beate them becke and condemne them : and not only condemne them, but alſo abhorre them, ſaying: wretched creature, needes muſt thou bee full of vanitiſe, when thou dareſt ſo ſet vp thy briftles againſt thy God: and what an outrage is that? Yee ſee then how it behoueth vs too thiſte ſare from vs, all the wicked imaginacions wherwith the diuell laboreth to peruerit vs. Howbeit, ſome tymes the miſcheef is ſo great, that we be not ſufficiently ſtrengthened to withstand the auaults of it, according as it happened vnto Job. For he fel at length to repir. and ſayd: what is this? I would I were where no man might think vpon mee more. After what ſort ſpeaketh Job? It is a heatheniſtſe, yea it is a brutiſtſe, to ſay I would I were in my graue: For why? then I ſhuld feele no more miſeries. And where is the hope of the faſthuſt? what becommeth of the threatnings which God maketh to the wicked, that they muſt be fayne to feele his dreadfull hand in the end? Job is become ſo brytish, that he remembreth not theſe things. So then it behoueth vs, to miſtruit our owne affeſtioſ, that we may ſee. Howſo perfect a man, which was like an Angell of heauen, and had record of Gods owne mouthe, as we haue ſene afore, is neuertheleſſe ſo ouerraught with anguifh, as he cannot conſider that when we go to the graue, we be not there medled together confuzedly, but God ſeparateth his owne ſeruants from the reprobate, ſo as their ſoules are in his cuſtody, and he keþeth them in ſafetie. If Job were ſo farre driuen, that he could not remember this: what will betyde vs? True it is that Job was not an infidel, too

to deny the resurrection, and to reieet all the doctrine of the euerlasting life. No, but he wanted a presente aduisednesse to bethink him of it, in the time of his nede he had not his armour alwayes in a readinesse. It is like as if a man shold perhaps be taken vnwares, and so amazed as he could not drawe his sword, but shrinke backe and staggere, yea and paradiuerture receyue some blowe, ere he could defend himself. Euen in like case was Job. True it is that he had both sword and buckler: but he was taken so vnwares, as the diuell had him at some aduauntage: 10 Insomuch that, he began as it were to shrinke and (as I haue shewed afore) could not lift vp his mind to heauen to behold the hope that God giueth to the faithful. Seing it is so, let vs learne to distrust ourselues, and to knowe that there is such a fraylty in vs, as we shold bee borne downe neuer to ryse vpaygne, if our Lord did not pity vs, and reache vs his mighty hand, to the end we might cal vpon him and refer our selues wholy to his will. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in esteem vpon this texte. And byandby Eliu addeth, I wil answere thee and thy compaines, 20 In saying so he sheweth that when men stryue in that maner against God, they shal gaine nothing by it, though they had neuer so great a band and trayne. For God is able ynoch to beat them backe with one word to their confusion. Job had no companions, but spake alone in the mayntenaunce of his quarrell: but Eliu intent is to say, Although thou haddest a greate army with thee, and that you had conspyred together too accuze and blasphem God all with one mouth: yet notwithstanding, myne answere shall bee sufficient for you all. Here then we see how strong Gods trueth is, and that it is in vayne too fight agaynst it, and that although wee bee fensed and haue manye partakers, yet must God alwayes haue the upper hand, so as his ryghteousnesse, shall contynue vnapayred. VVhen wee haue barked our fill agaynst it, wee shall not bee able too bite it, as shal be sayd anone. Marke (I say) what we haue to remember in this strayne. And therefore first of all let vs learne, not to bee lauishe of our tonges when God afflieth vs, and when things go not after our mynd. Let vs not bee impacient therfore in our afflictions, but let vs alwayes humble ourselues vnder him, acknowledging that he is ryghteouse howsoever the world go. For if wee be so bold as to barret with him: it will be to our greate confuzion and shame. Yee see then how all men ought to brydle (and as it were to imprison) theselues, to the end they may neuer murmur agaynst God, nor blaspheme him. Furthermore though wee haue many partakers, yet shall it not boote vs: For God will not suffer himself to bee overcome, by neuer so greate multitudes of men. It shall bee in vaine for vs to assemble men of our owne retinue: For wee shall all of vs bee put too the foyle together. If all the world had made a confederacie to spyght God, he would not passe of it, he would but laugh them to scorne: according as it is sayd in the second Psalme, that when the kings of the earth haue consulted together, and the people haue stormed as much as they list: he that is aboue will laugh them to scorne.

Thus yee see that the second point which wee haue to marke, is that wee must not thinke our case to bee the better, when wee haue many adherents and partakers. For God will condemne all the whole packe of vs. And furthermore wee see also on the other parte, that when wee haue Gods trueth on our side, wee must not stick to maynteyne it. And why? For he will giue vs mowth and wisdome, and also power to beat backe all our enemies. And wee haue greate neede in these dayes to be armed with such assuraunce: For wee see with what suriousnesse the enimies of the gospell set vp themselues: Because wee bee but a handfull of people and they a greate multitude, and that in a maner the whole world agreeeth with them to practize our deathe: They beare themselues in hand, that the goale goeth on their syde: and there is nothing but triumphing amongst them before any stroke bee stryken. VVhat a thing were it then, if wee knewe not that which is shewed vs here? That is to wit, that forasmuch as wee haue the truth on our side: one of vs may alwayes fight agaynst a hundred thousand, and wee neede not to bee afraide, when the Papistes come stoutly agaynst vs with their Ergoes, although they be a greate hoste and wee fewe or none in comparison. No no: her not that abashe vs. And why? For this saying, I will answere thee and thy compaines, is not written alone for the person of Eliu, but the holy ghost giueth vs that promis, to the intent we should not stick to enter into battell, and too stand stoutly to it to the vttermost, sith we knowe our case is good, and that God fyghteth for vs bycause wee maynteyne his quarell.

Therfore, when wee have such a certeynerie, let vs fight boldly agaynst our enimies, for they must needs bee confounded in the end. Thus yee see what wee haue to haue in mynde, and how wee may put this text in vre to applye it to our instruction, specially at this presente tyme, when wee see the whole world imbatayled agaynst God, and the multitude of enimies so greate, as it myght vtterly discourage vs, if our Lord did not comfort vs by telling vs, that wee haue wherewith too answere for him, though there be neuer so many gaynsayers that are so confederate toogether. Now let vs come to the answere that Eliu maketh. Bebold the skyes (sayeth he) look vp to the greatest heauens: they are hygher than thou, and thou cannest never reache to them. This seemeth to bee a very rawe answere: For had he none other reason wherby too shewe the ryghteousnesse of God? Yes: But if this saying be applyed as it ought too be: it is ynough to stoppe the mouthes of al such as blaspheme God. For by the beholding of the heauens, hee leadeth vs to another consideration: which is, that our doing well profiteth not our God, and that our doing euill, cannot hurt him: For what shall he be the worse for it? Seing it is so, he is not to be measured according vnto men: For he is not reuengeful, as who would say he is angrie when a man doeth him wrong, or that he is led by affection, like a man that looks too bee pleased, and thinks himself beholding to another man for doing him any seruice. God is none such. So then wee must not measure him by our owne meteyard, nor imagin any fleshlinesse in him. For the very skyes that are vnder his feete, doo shewe well that he is not like vs, nor medled here with vs to haue any parte at all of our nature. Therfore wee see that this reason (where it is sayd, Bebold the skyes and loke vp aboue thy bed) is sufficient too beate downe all those that dare list vp themselues agaynst God.

But now it is needfull to laye out that which followeth by peccemele, to the end it may bee the better vnderstoode. VVhen Eliu sayeth, if thou doo god. What profit doeth God receyue by it? He sheweth therby, that God is not bound vntoo vs. Marke that for the first point. The second is, that he is not affectioned, as men are: when any pleasure is done them, they are moued with it, bycause they bee paſſible: but God is not so: wee canne neither shewe him frenſhip nor fauour. And so he is not like vntoo vs. And as touching the first point, namely that God is by no meanes bound vntoo vs, do what wee can : It is a very true thing. Notwithstanding we see how men grove proude, yea euen without cause or occasion, and would make God beleue, that he is beholding to them although they can bring him nothing. And this draweth after it a mischeuuouse tayle of superstition. VVhy do the Papists labour so much at this daye for these ceremonies and gewgawes? It is bycause they thinke that God receyueith some profit by them, when they make many gewgawes, and haue babbled and trotted from place to place. They thinke they haue made a fayre worke when their churchstiffe is well decked, and when they haue wel trimmed and wasshed their puppets, as if a man had made a goodly banquet and decked vp a house, and besrawed it with russhes & other things. The Papistes (I saye) surmize that God deligheth in these nyce toyes, and that hee taketh pleasure in them. But wee must not imagin that wee can bring any thing vnto God. And that is the cause why it is sayd in the sixteenth

 then? But I honour tly saynts that are on earth. Forasmuch as God can receyue no benefite by vs, he commendeþ our neyghbours vnto vs : and when wee do good to such as are in necessitie, liuing frendly and vprightly among men, and indeuering to imploye our selues faythfully, where wee bee able to helpe and succour : God accepterþ such things as sacrifices. So then let vs remembre this doctrine, where it is sayd that wee cannot bring any thing vnto God. For it serueth to abate all pride in vs, to the intent wee myght not thinke that God is any thing beholden to vs, nor bee led vnto foolishe superstitions, to gad vp and downe and to do many things of no valemē, as though God tooke pleasure in them. And why? For wee can bring nothing at all to him. But we must also apply this doctrine too the presente intent of Eliu : which is, that God is not like mortal men, which are moued and touched. And why? Bycause they haue neede one of anothers helpe, and cannot set lyght by other mens force.

Thus yee see what the cause is that wee bee moued and caryed to and fro. But there must no such dotages enter into our head concerning God: for he behaueth not himself after our maner, nother can wee do him any good. Contrarywyse also it is sayd that if wee sin, we can hurt him by it. True it is that when wee offend God we do (as much as in vs lyeth) impeache his ryghteousnesse: and by that meanes he is very ill delt withall. Therfore when wee sin, we are blame oorthy no lesse than if wee had impeached the m̄iestie of God. VVe knowe what is the rule of ryghteousnesse which he commaundeth vs, and when wee go contrary to that, it is as much as if wee would barre him from reyning, plucke him out of his seate, and as it were trample him vnder our feete. Of all these things are men giltie : but yet cannot God be either increased or diminished in himself. Therfore let vs marke well that by our sining wee hurt not God. Neuerthelesse as touching them that blasphemē God, true it is that when they spewe out their venom, therby they deface his glorie, according as it is sayd that his name is euill spoken of, and his glorie diminished, when we acknowledge him not to bee good, ryghteouse, and wyze, by confessing it before men. And so is his reyning diminished, howbeit in respect of vs. And, not in respect of himself. But in the meane seazon, what do we by sining? when wee haue done neuer somuch, wee cannot do him any annoyance. Let the best archer in the world shoote vp, and see if he shall hit the sky. VVhen wee haue practized all that is possible, can we come at God? Can wee by any meanes touche him? No surely. But (which more is) all that we cast vpward, must fall downe vpon our owne heads. If I shooote at a man, and hit him, I wound him : but I cannot hit God as I sayd afore. VVe may well runne casting of stones, and we may wel shooote both with bowes and gonne, but yet shall God bee alwayes farre ynough from the dint of our strokes. True it is, as I haue already sayd, that wee may well harke, but wee can neuer byte. VVhen men cast vp their blowes, where lyght they? Shall they passe aboue the skyes? No. But they shall fall backe vpon their owne heads. And so men cannot auaunce themselves agaynst God, but too their owne confuzion.

Thus yee see a text here well worthy to be noted. VVherin Eliu sheweth, that if we do amisse, wee can do God no hurte at all by it. And therupon we haue a double instruction to gather. The one is, that God sheweth a singular and infinite goodnesse towards vs, in that it pleaseth him to accept our seruice although he receyue no profit by it, and that he same touche him not at all. Marke that for one. And this ought to be vnderstoode in one word. But forasmuch as, there be some ignorant persons here: it is requisite to declare it more fully. Yee see then that God might reiect vs, without making account of any of vs. And why? For (as I haue sayd) let all the world strayne it self as much as it can, and yet shall wee not bee able to do any thing that can profit our God. And yet notwithstanding he telleteth vs, that if wee indeuer to do good and to walke in his commaundements, our doings are acceptable sacrifices vnto him. Now, is it not a singular comfort that he giueth, when he sayeth I accept your doings, and although they be not worthy to be esteemed at my hand, yet I take them in good woorth, and bind my self to you as if I were beholding too you for it? Is it not a souereyne goodnesse, when God doeth this of his owne accord? Then let vs learne to magnifie the mercie of our God, for accepting our works wheras they deserue it not, nor he on his side, is any thing bound by thē. Also let it serue to incourage vs to do well, when wee see that God receyueith the thing at our hand which is nothing woorthe, and putteth all the poyns of our works as it were into articles in his booke of account, for that they be acceptable to him thorough his owne goodnesse. And in good sooth is it not an inestimable goodnesse of our God, and such a one as ought too rauishe vs into woonderment, when wee thinke vpon it? VVe see then how gratiouse he sheweth himselfe towardes vs. And on the other side, we must consider the other point that is set downe heere : which is. That do wee neuer so much euill, wee cannot hurt our God.

Therfore let vs assure ourselues, that God will not punishe vs for our sinnes, by reason of any spylght he beareth vnto vs, nor for that he desireth to bee revenged, as a man doeth when he is offended. For when a man hath any wrong done him, so as he is harmed in his owne person, or hindred in his goods, he will seeke to bee revenged. God (I say) is not moued with such considerations. VVherefore then doeth he threaten vs? Bycause he will not haue vs perishe: he sheweth the fatherly regard which he hath of our welfare, and in the meane whyle if he punishe vs indeede, therin he sheweth his iustice. For in this case, there is no going to lawe with him as if he had some priuate quarrel to vs: but he punisheth vs as a iust judge: according as his office and nature do afford. Then seeing that our God procedeth after that maner: what haue wee to do, but to consider his fatherly loue when he chasticeth vs? for by that meane hee draweth vs backe from the waye of damnation wherin we are. Therfore when wee feele his hand, how rough soever foeuer it be, let vs alwayes consider that he sheweth himself ryghteouse. VVhat is to be done then, but only to trust in him, and to comfort our selues by it, and therewithall to desire him to haue pitie vpon vs, that although wee haue offended him, yet he may not forbeare too reteyue vs to mercy? Herewithall let vs be fully perswaded and resolute, that God will not beare such a stomach towards vs, as a proude and stately man will do. But forasmuchas he is the fountayne of all goodnessse and mercy: if wee come vnto him, he will make vs feele how mercifull he is mynded to bee towards vs. And although hee chastice vs now and then, yea euen more roughly than we would: yet will he make vs to perceiue that he doeth it for our welfare, to the end we shoulde not perish, and that his brydging of vs so short, is to humble vs and to make vs bowe vnder his myghtie hand and cha-

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs feele them better than wee haue done, too the end wee may finishe our race with the greater patience through out the miseries and calamities of this world, and therewithall learne so to seeke for the perfection of ryghteousnesse, as wee may neuer bee wery to learne more and more in his schole, and to go forward in the waye of saluation, vntill wee be come too our races end, which is, that being bereft of all the infirmities of our fleshe, wee may bee clothed with his everlasting glory. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to al people and nacions of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage &c.

The cxxxvij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the. xxxv. Chapter.

8. Thy vvickednesse toucheth a man like thyself, and thy ryghteousnesse the Sonne of man.
9. By reason of the multitude of oppressors, men cry not (or hovble) bycause of the mightenesse of maysters.
10. And no man sayeth, vvhether is God that hath fashioned mee, vvhich giueth vs songs in the nyght?
11. VVhich teacheth vs more than the beasts, and instrugeth vs more than the birds of the ayre.

Or a conclusion of that which was declared yesterday, we haue to consider what Eliu vttereth heere in fewe words: which is, that our misdedes do touche men, and not God, and likewise that our righteousnesse, to the end we shoulde not imagin that God is colerick to reuenge himself when wee haue offended, or that on the contrary parte he is bound vnto vs, as if our seruice did him any good. Then let vs not thinke that God is like vntoo vs, nother let vs measure him by our wit. True it is that he abaced himself of his owne good will: For how doeth he speake vntoo vs, but after the maner of men? But yet must this bee no derogation too his hyghnesse. Should God bee despized, bycause it pleaseth him of his infinite goodnessse, too yeld to the rudenesse of men? Nay, Contrariwise he deserueth too bee magnisified the more at our hands. Then were it a greate wrong and iniurie, too transfigure him bycause he frameth himself to our slendernesse and to thinke that he is angrie, bycause men haue prouoked him, or to think that he ought to recompence men, as if he were bound too them, I say it were as an abolishing of his maiestie. For he is not of our number: Let vs yeeld that vnto men as vnto whom it belongeth: but as for him, it behoueth vs to honour his incomprehensible hyghnesse. Thus yee see what wee haue to gather vpon this first verse. And nowe remayneth to see, after what maner God is ryghteouse and gouerneth the world in equitie, and yet in the meane whyle things are out of order. For the wicked haue their full scope, they oppresse, they pill, they powle: and God dissembleth, and maketh no countenance to prouide for it. How is it ment that God hath the guiding of the world, and that he dispozeth all things ryghtly, and yet notwithstanding men see so greate troubles, and outrageouse iniquities without redreffe? Eliu therfore comprehendeth all this, and sheweth that wee must not woonder though God being so pacient doo let things go amisse, and prouide not for them so soone as we call vpon him: For we do it not hartely. Then if God suffer men to be afflicted, he doeth it iustly, bycause they returne not to him with prayer and thanksgiving as they ought to do. Neuerthelesse it behoueth vs too tary his leysure, and although he delaye his iustice, and seeme not to send it, so soone as it ought to come: yet notwithstanding wee must wayte patiently, and do him the honour to trust in him, although he bee as it were hidden from vs. This (I say) is the first poynt which is set downe here. And first of all Eliu declareth, that men are not woorthise that God should succour them at their neede. And why? If they be oppressed, so as they haue any harm or wrong done them, true it is that they crye out, and storne, and can skill to bewayle their case, but yet doo they neuer the more flee vntoo God. A man shall heare the screkes and howling of such as indure aduersitie: but yet for all that God heareth them not although it be his office to reskowe them that be wrongfully oppressed, bycause they haue not an eye vnto him, nor doo directh themselves vntoo him, but make their complainte without order. Should not God then leauethe them there, as in their owne wilfulness? And what is the remedie of it, but to know that God doth not chalenge this title to himself in vaine, that he wil succour the oppressed, and therupon go directly vnto him? But we do it not, and therfore our crying out is to no purpose, for wee deserue to be shaken of at his had, and that he shuld shet his eyes, and not regard to helpe vs. And why? For we seeke him Mat. 7.b. 7 not. It is written, seke, and yee shall find: and we go quite Lk. 11.b. 9. an other waye. Thus yee see a poynt that is well woorthy to bee noted. For it is a stumblingblocke that troublith vs very sore when we see that God suffereth men to languishe after that maner, and seemeth not to pitie them when their miseries are come too most extremitie. For therupon wee conclude that he regardeth not our iniuries, but is so farre withdrawne from vs, as hee hath no care to prouide for our necessities. But in the meane while we consider not that we deserue wel to be destitute of his h<sup>e</sup>lp, because we go not right forth vnto him. And truely euē at this day the confusions are so greate and horrible in the worlde; as we cannot thinke vpon them wit<sup>t</sup> out shuddering. Looke vpon the warres that are in many places: ye shall see a whole Countrey wasted: the poore folke knowe not what to do, their houses are burnd, and their goodes are vtterly spoyled. By meanes whereof the people are in such anguish, as it hid bee better for them too haue had their throttes cut at the first, than to pine after that sort as they do. But yet for al that, they looke not vntoo God. If a man go intoo straunge Countreyes, he shall heare many complaints, and he shall not neede to go verie farre for the matter: for wheresoever bee taxes and impositions, or wheresoever men of warre passe like floods of water, there is no man but hee shall crie, for hee shall bee galled vnto the harde bones. But dooth the world amende for all this? Doth it come with true humilitie to seeke God and to say, Alas Lord it is for our sinnes that thou handest vs so roughly, and it would behoue vs to thinke thereupon, but there is nothing in vs, but pride, disdaine, and rebelliousnesse against thee.

And therefore Lorde thou hast shewed thy selfe to be our soueraine: nowe shewe vs also the fauour that wee may feele thee our father, and succour vs in t<sup>e</sup> ende. Doth the worlde vse any such speeche? Alas it is faire from it, men do rather chafe vpon the bitte, and in the meane while thinke not at al vpon God. Is it not rather a recordē that he cannot beare such despisings of his grace? For like as he pouerth his truth when hee helpeth those that seeke him and sue to him: and as hee sheweth thereby that his promising too bee mercifull too such as seeke him, is not too disappoint them of theyr truste and hope: and like as hee ratifieth his truth, and sheweth himselfe faythfull and trustie, by heiping such as call vpon him. So also on the contraryparte he suffereth those to rotte which seeke not him and lette them wast and consume by length of tyme, so as it is not perceyued that he regardeth them or hath any care of their necessitie, wherin he sheweth himselfe to be ryghteouse, for he punishest the negligēce or rather the pride that is in them, because they despized his grace which was offred them so freely.

True it is also, that sundry tymes God doeth not at the first help those that seeke him in trueth: but that commeth not to passe continually. And when it happeneth yet is it iustly: wee must not bind him to our liking. So then although God so slowe to succour his seruants, even when they call vpon him with al their hart: yet doeth he nevere forsake them. Howbeit the thing that Eliu treateth of here is very common, after the ordinary maner that the scripture speketh. For when it goeth about any doctrine, it is to shew the thing that may bee seene most often. Ye see then what wee may conclude.

Psa.62 b.9. When we haue considered what the worlde is, wee shall finde that such as are smitten and vexed, can wel ynough lament their miseries, but their crying is not vnto God. It is like a beastly howling: they cast out their shrecks into the ayre, but they reache not out their harts vntoo God: they cast not their cares and sorowes vpon him as 1.Pet.5. b.7. he commaundeth vs: and that is the cause why he sheweth not himselfe favorable vnto vs. VVee must not blame him of crueltie or vngrighteousnesse, neither must hee imagin that he doeth men wrong: For wee see they are worthy of that punishment, and to receyue the wages of their vnbeleef, because they rested not vpon the promises that are giuen them, nor were moued in themselves to resort vnto God, as they ought to haue done. Now if it be sayd that men cal vpō God, (as peraduerture some prayers will be made) Eliu sheweth that all that is nothing. And why? For they say not, wher is God that made mee? which giueth songs in the night, which instructeth vs more than the beasts, and teachebeth vs more than the foules of the ayre?

This (as I touched euē now) serueth too awnswere that it myght bee alledged, that wretched men do call vpon God when they are afflited. Yea sayth Eliu, but it is but fayneley, and therfore it is in vayne. For inasmuch as the prayers which the most parte of the world maketh are but hypocrisie: therfore God heareth them not. Thus the reason that Eliu setteth downe, is that they go not vnto God, as to their maker that hath fashioned them, nor as to him that comforteth men, nor as to him that hath giuen them so manye benelites as they ought to magnifie his mercy what miserie soever they endure. Then if we acknowledge not God to be such a one as he sheweth himselfe towards vs, nor esteeme the gratiouse gifts which we have receyued at his hand: I saye if we come not to him thus mynded: there is nothing but feyning and falsehood in vs, and therfore wee must not maruell though he shette the gate agaynst vs, and make no countenaunce to heare our requests. Behold a text iight worthy too bee marked. For yee shall see in these dayes that the Payistes make processions whē God layeth his hand vpon them: If there bee any plague or famine or other aduersitie: true it is that they turne vnto God, and so do the Paynims as well as they. But what? Dothey call vpon him with a true and ryghtmeening hart? Alas they are far wyde of it: all that they do, is but ceremonies.

And for proof hereof, let vs marke well that men cannot seeke God ryghtly, except they knowe him to be such a one as they should feele him by experience. First of al when wee call vpon God, wee must remember that hee is our maker, and that wee are in his hand. But nowe let vs examin those which make countenaunce of prayng. If a man serche their hart: shall hee finde that they haue skill to say, seeing that my God hath fashioned mee I am in his hand, and it belongeth too him to rule mee in my lyfe, and to prouide for all my necessities: I hold all of him, and therfore it behoueth mee to suffer myselfe to bee governed by his hand and according to his pleasure? Shal a man find one among a hundred that is thus minded, and that speaketh with a true hart, to yeeld honour to God, as too his maker? They will confess it well ynough with their mouth: yea (say they) wee were made by him, and hee hath giuen vs life. But in the meane whyle for all their confessing, yet are they not fully resolued of it: it is cleane contrary with them.

So then there are no prayers that are worthy too beare that name, when men are so brutishe as they acknowledge not God for such a one as he sheweth himselfe towards them. Howbeit the matter consisteth not only in acknowledging God to bee our maker: but wee must also therewithall esteeme the gratiouse gifts which he is ready to give vs, according as it is sayd expressly in this text that he giueth songs in the nyght. Some men expound this saying after t<sup>e</sup> is sort: namely that the birdes doo cheare vs with their singing, and that the same ought too bee impured too Gods goodnesse. and that men shewe their vnthankfulnessse it not acknowledging it. Other sonne take in that God doeth comfort vs, by making the l<sup>e</sup>ares to shyne, and therby giueth vs occasio to set soorth his goodnesse. For although the Sun bee be downe, and darknesse ouerspreade vs: yet doeth God lighten vs by them, as by candels, as who should saye, that his maiestie is not quenched, nor altogether hidde from vs. But such expositons are to much streyned. Therfore we must take it simply, that God giueth songs euē in the tyme when men are aſſlēpe. For the night ſeemeth as it were to make all things dead. VVhē the ſunne is down, and all things are whiſt and ſtill: there ſeemeth to bee as it were a kind of deathe, and that God holdeth vs there as it were ſhet vp in a graue. If Eliu had ſpoken of ſongs in 10 the day tyme, it had not bene ſo greate a magnifying of Gods grace: For a day tymes, men followe their worke, the doth their cheſt fulneſſe ſhew it ſelf, the are their wits awake. Therfore it had not bene ſo excellent a thing too haue ſayd that God giueth ſongs in the day tyme, as whe he assigneth them to the night. But this is a ſingular goodneſſe of God, that when as wee be after a ſort dead, and our ſpirits are as it were oppreſſed, and there is no liueli- neſſe in vs: yet notwithstanding, our Lord doeth ſtil giue vs ſongs. For when me wake in the night, they haue wher- 20 of to reioyce, in feeling that God hath them in his protec- tion. They ought to conider that they cannot continue without ſleepe, and that in the meane whyle God watch- eth for them. Therfore they ought to reioyce in that be- half, and to ſay, Alas Lord, I cannot call vpon thee ſo long as I am aſſleepe: behold I am heere as a blocke or timber- log, and yet thou keepest mee, and in the meane whyle I breathe through thy goodneſſe: yea and this ſleeping doeth ſo feede and refreſh mee, as I gather new strength without feeling it. Now when me think vpo these things, 30 haue they not cauſe to bee glad and to ſay, Alas my God, thou ſhewest thyſelf a father towards mee, euē whyle I ſecke thee not, yea and when I haue not any ſenſe, but am like a dead creature? Then ſeing it is ſo, is it not much more likely that thou wilt be neerer mee when I commit myſelf vnto thee, and call vpon thee? Howſoeuer the eage stand, whither I ſleepe or whither I wake, I ſhall alwayes bee in thy hand and ſafekeeping. VVhen men haue ſuch thoughts in them, is it not a ſinging vnto God? So then we ſee wherat Eliu ameth: namely that ofteniymes they which are affliſted haue no truthe in them when they pretend to pray vnto God. And why? For it would become vs to gather together Gods benefits, and to call too mind the good that he hath done vs without end or ceaſing, to thē intent that the ſame might cheere vs vp. But we be ſo ſlouthfull as it is pitie to ſee it, yea and we fall to diſputing how wee may go vnto God, what meane there iſto come at him, and whither he regard vs or not. Yee ſee then that the thing which we had to do, is too cheere vp our minds with the greate number of benefits that he hath beſtowed vpo vs, and which he ceaſeth not to deale vnto vs ſtill from day to day. For firſt of all, that ſerueth to conſirme vs in ſuiche wiſe, as wee muſt not doubt too come vnto him vpon truſt that he will heare vs: and alſo it will make vs to come to him with thankſgiuing, wheras they that haue not taſted his goodneſſe, and the benefits which they haue receyued at his hand, do grudge and re- pine agaynſt him. Therfore when wee haue well weyed the thing that is told vs heere, no doubt but we ſhall bee throughly inflamed to ſeekē him and to ſay, Behold my God, thou giuest mee ſo manie good things, as are y- nougħ to rauish mee when I thiſke vpon them. And ther- fore, ſeing thou haſte ſhewed thyſelf ſo bountiſt full too wards mee: ought I not to bee pacient and too bliſſe thy name, if thou affliſt mee? But men doo no ſuiche thing at all: they forget Gods benefits, and thrusht them vnder foote: and therfore they call not vpon him truely and earnestly. The thing then which wee haue, to marke v-

pon this ſtreyne where Eliu ſpeaketh of nightsongs, is that God neuer ceaſeth to do vs good, in ſo much that in the time which ſeemeth moſte dead, and when a man would ſay that euē God himſelf were hidden, ſo as he ſeemeth not to be mynded too continue his fauour any more towards vs: he ceaſeth not to giue vs occaſion ſtill to magnifie his goodneſſe. ſeing it is ſo, we ought to be touched with another maner of deſirouſneſſe to come vnto him, than we be. After this, Eliu addeth the vniuer- 20 ſal benefit which God hath beſtowed vpon al men. True it is that every man ought in his owne behalf too mynd the benefits of God: according as there is neuer a one of vs which is not exceedingly bound vnto God for the great benefits which he hath done vnto him. If I deſire to know that God is good and liberal, I neede not looke what he hath done to all men indifferently, but onely to enter into myſelf, and to conider the whole course of my lyfe, and too marke the benefits which I haue felt at the hand of God. So ſhall I be as it were rauished aboue the world to ſaye, Lord if I ſhould go about to cōprehend thy goodneſſe, it is ſo deepe a gulf as I am neuer able to bring it to paſſe. For when I take but a little portion of the tokens and records which thou haſt giuen mee of it: beholde I am at my wits end, and how then ſhould I bring it about? Lo how it behoueth every man in his owne behalf too marke the priuate benefits which he hath received of God. Yet notwithstanding if wee thiſke but only vpon the things that are common and general amonge all mankind: the ſame ought to bee ynough to cauſe vs to magnifie God, yea even in ſuiche wiſe that when wee come to pray him to deluer vs from our afflictions, wee ought therewith to reioyce and to yeeld him prayſe for ſhewing himſelf ſo good a father towards vs. But what? wee do it not. And therin wee ſhewe our owne vnthankful and malicioſe mynde: and if wee perceyue it not, it is apparant that there is nothing but hypocriſie in vs.

This in effect is the thing that Eliu meant to ſay here. And his words are, it is God that teacheſt vs more than the beaſtes, and which giueſt vs more underſtanding than to the foulſ of the ayre. Here hee maketh a comparison be- tweene men and beaſtes. For if heauen and earth could ſpeakē, it is certayne that they ſhould neadeſt prayſe God though they haue no underſtanding, nor are auauanced to that dignitie which wee are. And why? It is a greate honour that God hath done them, in that they are the work of his hands, & in that they are his creatures. Now if God haue inhoñored heauen and earthe, and all the ſenſelesſe creatures, in that he hath voutsafed too create them: and if he haue inhoñored the beaſtes, though he haue made them voyde of reaſon: what hath he done to man, to whom he hath giuen ſuiche underſtanding? That is the cauſe why Eliu doeth here compare vs with the beaſtes. For wherof was it long that God made not vs asſes or horses? For the nobleſt and excellentest man vpon the earth cannot ſaye, I made myſelfe, or it was my will to bee made ſuiche a one. For God could weil haue made him a dog, or a ſwyne when he made him a man. Then muſt wee not ſecke the ground in our ſelues why God made vs reasonable creatures, but wee muſt com- mend his goodneſſe towards vs, ſpecially ſeing he hath ſo greatly hoñoured vs, as not onely too make vs of the number of his creatures, but also too aduaunce vs aboue the brute beaſtes, by giuing vs witte and reaſon which hee hath not doone too any other earthly creatures.

And this is the thing which is told vs in the firſt chapter of Saint Iohn: namely that all things haue their lyfe Job.1.4.3.4.

of God, and that the same life hath euermore ben inclosed in his eternall worde. Howbeit, there is one life which is in lighte, and that life serueth for men. VVhereas it is sayde, that the life of men was in it, that is to saye, in the lighte : S. John sheweth, that wee haue not a brutishe moving to eate and drinke : but that we haue discretion, So as God hath giuen vs vnderstanding to knowe good and euill : to atteine euuen to the euerlasting life, and to perceiue that there is one onely God, whome wee ought to honoure as our father. Forasmuch then as God doth so enlighten men : wee see our selues bounde in a farre greater and straighter bonde, than if hee had but simply made vs his creatures. For if there were no more but that God hath created vs with his hande, yet behoued it vs to give him thankes for it. But seeing it hath pleased him to make a difference betwene vs and the brute beastes, and to give vs so noble and excellent a life as wee see: may we not well say, Lord what were we? And yet notwithstanding it hath pleased thee to sette vs heere in the number of thy children, and to give vs thy marke. And whence commeth this vnto vs? Can we finde any thing in our selues to say that we haue moued thee heres vnto, or that thou wert led vnto it by our worthynesse? No, but all proceedeth of thyne owne free goodnessse. Nowe then we see what is conteyned in this text: namely that we haue cause inough to prayse God, though there were no other thing than the generall benefit which extendeth to all mankynde : whiche is, that he hath giuen vs witte and reason to bee aboue the brute beastes. Neuerthelesse: it is true that the reason which God gaue to the first man, is very sore corrupted as now. For as wee bee in our own nature, we are so peruerted, as we cannot judge any thing of God: wee bee blinde wretches, there is no thing but vanitie in vs, and moreouer our lustes doe so carie vs away, as there is no staye nor modeslie in vs. Insomuche (that whiche worse is) if we be compared with brute beastes, there will bee founde more soundnesse in a horse or an oxe, than in a man. For a horse hauing no reason, dorthe notwithstanding retaine that whiche was giuen him: but as for man, he is so sorted, as the reason which hee had is turned into maliciousnesse, and in stead of honoring God for the benefites which he hath receiued, he is become proude and vterly rebellious agaist him. And furthermore wee see that all the reason which wee thinke our selues too haue, is but vter beastynesse. For when wee come to thinke vpon God, do we not see howe men are intangled in their superstitions? VVhat can men conceiue of God but vter vanitie, as the scripture sheweth? Then if men bee so dazed when they thinke vpon God, and forge such a heape of superstitions when they woulde serue him: where is the reason and vnderstanding which Eliu magnifieth here somuch? True it is (as I haue sayd) that all the light which we haue of nature, is turned into darknesse, by reason of the sinne and corruptions which we haue drawne from our father Adam. Howbeit looke what is euill and sinsfull, that must wee impute to our owne faulte, according also as it is not of the nature whiche wee haue receiued of Eue [by our first creation] whereas wee be so enclyned to confusion if we trust our own witte: we cannot say that that commeth of our first creation: I say wee must not impute it vnto God: For God created vs after his own Image, and that Image was marred by the sinne of Adam. And so it behoueth men to acknowledge their owne faulfe, and to yeilde themselues giltie before God, for this disfiguring of our selues, and for turning his lighte into darkenesse. But by the waye heere is yet one other point to marke: which is that in the midst of our ignorance and of all our error and superstitions, our Lord doeth hold vs still convicted and bound vnto him in an inestimable bonde, for that he aduaunceth vs aboue the brute beastes, by leauing vs some discretion imprinted in our heartes to discerne good and euill. And this is it which Saint John meeneth by adding in the forealledged text, that the light shineth in darkenesse: as if hee shold say, although sinne haue Iohn.3.1.a. 5. so peruerted mennes vnderstanding and as it were vtly defaced their nature: yet notwithstanding God dooth still inlighten them in such wise, as a man may perceyue some print of the first creation. Although then we haue not the thing that was giuen at the beginning to our father Adam, nor scarcely holde any little portion of it: yet ought we well to perceyue that God hath giuen vs an inestimable benefite, in that it hath pleased him too make vs men, & to separate vs after that sort from brute beasts.

See heere, howe that from the greatest to the least, no man can haue occasion to murmur agaynst God. For we must alwayes come to this poynt, to enquire what are we? VVhat haue wee giuen vnto God? VVhat can we alledge vnto him why he shoulde be bounde vntoo vs? Nothing: but contrarywise it behoueth vs to yeilde vnto him, that forasmuch as hee created vs after his owne Image, and made vs men, therein wee are exceedingly bounde vnto him. And therewithall let vs marke, that as now if God put a difference betwene man and man, we haue no cause to grudge against him, as we see these fantastical persons do, who if a man speake to them of gods election, & tell them that he choseth vnto salvation whō he thinketh good: they kick and winch agaynst it saying, howso? VVere it any reason that God shoulde haue his creatures so? VVere that indifferent dealing? Yea? As who should say that God were tied to men, and had no authoritie at all ouer them. Seing it was in Gods choyce and power to make vs brute beastes, & yet he hath printed his Image in vs, and giuen vs a far higher dignitie than to the whō should we grudge as now against him, if he put a difference betwene man and man, and do it by his owne Rom.9.22.23. secrete ordinance, without making vs knowe any other cause than his shewing of his goodnessse. For seeing that he hath not made a man a beast, wheras he might haue done it: if he do loue him in his owne nature, haue we cause to grudge against him? No: we see then that such as rayle at Gods election are out of their wits, specially seeing it behoueth them to return to this matter which is shewed vs here: namely that it was knowne, euuen vnto the very paynims: for it appeareth that euē among the Paynims some haue vsed this maner of praysing God. Therefore such phantasicall heades must be set to schole to the Infidels: for they are not worthie too haue their maliciousnesse (which is matched with such pride against god) reprooved by the holy scripture. And further, if the consideration of the benefits which God hath bestowed generally vpon al mankind, ought to prouoke vs to magnifie him: haue we not so much the greater occasion to do it: and to call vpon him with thanksgiving for the benefits which we haue receiued of him, in that he hath giue vs much more: that isto say, in that he hath reformed his Image in vs, offered vs his word, & shewed himselfe more familiarly vnto vs: therfore here we must proceed by degrees. First we must vnderstād, that seing god hath inhonored vs by making vs his creatures, we are alredie bōud vnto him though there were none other cause. But whē he hath preferred vs before the brute beastes, yea euē of his owne meer goodnes without finding any cause why in vs: that is yet another thing wherein hee hath shewed himselfe more louing. And when wee come too seeke him, suche knowledge must make the way for vs, and open vs the gate.

Beholde

Behold I come to my God, and in what maner do I seeke him? Not only as him that hath created mee, but also as him that hath vttered a fathery loue towards mee: For I am created after his own image and like-nesse. What is the cause that he hath aduaunced mee aboue the brute beastes? Is not this then a sufficient matter and occasion of boldnesse too come vnto him? And furthermore if I bee scoured by his hand, is not the forsayd reason ynough to assuage our miseries, howe greeuouse soever they seeme to be. That is to wit, that seeing wee haue receyued benefits at Gods hand, ought wee not to suffer our selues to be chasteiced by him, if he list to vse roughnesse towards vs? Thus it is sugar, (as I may terme it) to seazon our sorowes withall, when wee call Gods benefis to remembraunce, in the tyme of our affliction, by acknowledging and saying: Very well, I am a mortall creature, and God hath put a difference betweene mee, and the brute beastes. Howbeit moreouer I haue bene baptizid in the name of our Lord Iesus Christ: and that is a second marke which he hath set vpon mee, to shewe mee that he is mynded to kepe me in his stocke: howbeit as much as in mee is, I haue defaced my baptisme, I haue bene a faythlesse wretche: and yet behold, my God hath drawne mee backe againe to himself, he hath inlyghtned mee in the middes of the thick darknesse wherin I was: Verely I was plunged to the bottome of hell, and my God hath reached mee his hand, and Iesus Christ the daysunne of ryghteousnesse doeth so inlyghten mee, that in beholding his face in the doctryne of the gospell, I see the gate of paradyce opened vnto mee. Seeing then that our Lord cheareth vs in such wise, haue wee not good cause to magnifie him, and to humble our selues before him? But now let vs see how many there are to bee found that do so. True it is (as I haue declared already) that such as are ouerpessed with miseries and calamities will crye vnto God. But after what sort? Haue they throughly considered aforehand how much they are bound vntoo him? haue they made thir waye, by acknowledging the benefits that they haue recevued? No: But cleane contrary. So then forasmuch as men acknowledge not God as their maker, nor call to mynd the benefits which they haue receyued of him without ceassing, and specially seeing they acknowledge not that he hath created them after his owne image: wee must no more thinke it straunge though God suffer vs, to pyne and wither away in our miseries, and we perceyue no helpe at his hand: For we are not worthie of it. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this text.

But now what must wee do on the contrary parte? Forasmuch as the holy ghost doeth here by the mouthe of Eliu reprove men for their fowardnesse, and tel them that if God do not comfort them nor deliuere them from their aduersities, it is bycause they seeke him not in truth: let vs be we well aduisid to make Gods former benefits

our shelde to set against the aduersities that oppresse vs, saying: True it is that this affliction is so bitter, that if thou looke no further, it were ynough to tumble thee into dispaire: But hath not thy God shewed himselfe a father towards thee? and that, so many wayes as thou must needs feele his fauour and goodnesse. Then behoueth itthee to shet vp all thy senses in it, and not to suffer the affections to debate overmuch. Behold (I say) wherevnto it behoueth vs to come. And furthermore when wee haue well bethought vs of Gods gratiouse gifts, let them serue vs to double vse. The first must be to certifie vs that wee shall not bee disappointed in our praying. For seeing that God hath already shewed himselfe beneficiall towards mee before I was borne, and continued the same all the time of my life, and that his goodnesse is an infinite thing: Should I doubt that he will not haire mee when I come to call vpon him? ye see then how we ought to take Gods benefits to persuade ourselues that we lose not our time in seeking vnto him. Again, the other point is, that we must armie our selues with patiee. Therfore when we think so vpon Gods benefits: let the same serue to comforte vs, in th. time of our trouble, and let vs not be so maliciose as to giudge against him, but rather let vs thinke thus. Seeing my God hath created me, is it not reason that he shoulde haue all right ouer mee, and that he shoulde gouerne mee at his pleasure? Then if wee come to refer ourselues after this sort vnto Gods goodnesse, we shall not cease to submit ourselues vntoo him for any afflictio that he laieth vpon vs. And why? For we haue received benefits at his hand, and therfore wee must not nowe presume too plucke our heads out of his yoke. Thus ye see the two things whervnto it behoueth vs to apply the knowledge of Gods benefits, if we wil call vpon him in truthe.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faulnes, praying him to make vs feele them better than wee haue done: and therewithall to open our eyes, that we may not be so dul-headed as to forget or despize his benefits: but maybe magnifie them according to their worthinesse, and think vpon them in such wise, as we may be prouoked by them to serue and honour him, and to walke aduisedly according to his good will, and take such example of the chasteicements that he sendeth too our neyghbours, as the same may serue vs for corrections, and that if it shal please him to chasteice vs in our owne persons, and to make vs feele the strokes of his hand as wee had neede: he will turne all to the furtherance of our saluation, so that in passing through all the troubles of this world, he may strengthen vs continually with his power, vntill hee receyue vs into the euerlastinge rest, which he hath prepared for vs in his kingdome. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to al people and nacions of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules &c.

The cxxxvij. Sermon, which is the third vpon the xxxv. Chapter.

12. There they shall crye, and God vvil not heare them, bicause of the prude of the vvicked.
13. Surely it is but vanitie: God heareth it not, neither doth the Almighty regard it.
14. Thou hast said he seeth thee not, there is iudgement before him: vvayt fo: it.
15. But nowv his visiting is not in anger (or it is nothing to his visiting in his wrath) neither punisheth he greatly in anger.
16. But Job hath opened his mouth in vaine, and multiplied ywords vwithout vnderstanding.

Orasmuchas the first sentence which wee haue nowe rehersed, ought to be ioyned to the matter that I hadled yesterday, it behoueth vs to beare in mynd what hath bin declared: which is, that when God heareth not these that are in trouble, he sheweth that the blame of it must be wited vpon themselues, because they come not to him with a ryght and pure hart, according as Eliu hath declared that when we come to seke God, we must consider the benefits & gratiouse gifts that we haue receyued at his hand: for else we cannot trust in him. VVhat is the foundation of our faith? the free promises that God hath giuen vs. But yet the experience that we haue of his goodnessse, is a confirmation of the thing that we knowe by his word. And so, they that haue not conceiued the rast of his benefits, can not come vnto him but with hypocisise. Moreouer when we knowe not how much we are bound vnto God, it is impossible that we should bee patient to obey him, and continue quiet without murmuring agaynst his will. Therfore Eliu addeth now, that there they shall crye: as if hee should saye, very wel, it is true that men shall crye vnto God when they bee troubled: but in what plighe are they? Come they before him so minded as they ought to be? No, nothing lesse. For they think not at all of the benefites which they haue receiued at his hand, nether do they profit theselues by them, to settle their trust vpō him. So then men shall crye out for anguishe, but they shall not come at God, there is no opennesse in their hart: and therfore if God heare them not, wee must blame their owne sinnes for it, and not saye that God hath forgotten the world, and doeth not his dewtie, or that he is as it were asleepe. Therfore when men seke God in truth, he is neere them, and his hand will soone shewe it selfe to succour them. But so lōg as they howle like wilde beasts, & loke not ryght forth to the marke which they ought too ame at: their crying shall be to no purpose: let vs marke well that at this day God will not heare vs (at leastwise to make vs feele his helpe) though wee storine never so much in crying if we stand not vpon a sure ground. And the cheef point is, to knowe him for such an one as hee sheweth himselfe: namely a father and saviour, and to rest vpon his goodnessse euē by calling to remembraunce the records which we haue erst felt therof, to the end the same may giue vs courage to seeke him as wee ought to do. And then no doubt but vs shall soone find him, yea we shal not neede to make long windlasses: For he will come before vs. And so we see that prayer consisteth not in ceremonies, but in the rightnesse of the hart afore God: yea and not only the feeling of our miseries must make vs to desire remedy of them, but also wee must through faythe desire him to shewe himselfe our father and saviour: And that faith being grounded vpon his promises, must also bee confirmed with all the good tokens that he giueth vs. And when we shall haue found by experience how good and mercifull he is: we must be able to apply the same to our owne instruction, that wee may be ryghtly fenced. And furthermore, in requiring God to be mercifull vnto vs, we must bring him the sacrifice of prayse for the benefits wherwith he hath bound vs vnto him already. Nowe after that Eliu hath sayd so, he addeth, that such as stoke not hold of Gods prouidence, sayed, tush all this is but vantie, God heareth not, nether doeth the Almighty regard. This obiection is made in the person of the vnbeleuers: For although it be told them that God doeth iustly leaue men weltring in their owne wretchednesse, because they come not too him with faith and obedience: yet notwithstanding they cannot cōceyue the reason, but imagin foolishly that God heareth not, & that he seemeth to let the world go at hauock, and that thigs are ruled here byneath by fortune. Ye see then that the faythlesse do with a brushe and suddeyne conceyte, catche hold of the thing that is shewed to their eyes, without further discerning: as though wee were loch to consider any further reason, than that which commeth next to hand, and would say, O, I see that yonder man hath doone such a thing. Yea, but thou must seeke further, & vnderstand the reason of it. No marie, I wil not be inquisitiue. Is not this a wilful bereeuing of our selues of wit and reason? Is it not a shetting of our eyes agaynst the light? Euen as much do the vnbeleuers. They see that God heareth not those that crye: & therupon they fal to storming, yea & to accusing of god. And therfore no maruel though god make not his succour & fauour to be felt of such as do nothing but chafe in their aduersities, & eyeld him not any obediēce, ne seeke vnto him with such mind as they ought to do. So the, God hath iust cause to let me perish after that maner: And why? Because he calleth the to him, & they come not to him the way that they ought to do. If a mā tel the faythlesse these things: they shet their eyes and think not vpō the. Is it not as much the as if they said there were no prouidence of God at all, and that he had no regard of vs? Is it not an vitter buryng of it? And yet neuerthelesse, that is the thing wherto our fleshly reason caryeth vs, if we be not restreyned with the bridle of lowelenesse and modestie, to deeme of Gods woorks and iudgements according as his woord sheweth vs. This then is rehersed now by Eliu in the person of the vnbeleuers, and it is not for nought that the holy ghost hath set downe such a blasphemie. For it is to the end that every of vs should bethink himself. VVe haue the seede of such frowardnesse in our nature, that we be (at every brayde) caried away with this rage of chasing against God, to cōclude that he doth not his dewtie. Forasmuch then as our stomach is full of much pride, and we passe our boūds so farre as to ouerthrowe all reason: this is set afore vs, to teache vs to hūble ourselues, when wee come to judge of Gods doings and ordinaunces. VVherefore let vs not giue bridle to our nature, but heare God speake, and way well the reasons that he bringeth. And aboue all things let vs marke wel what Eliu ioyneth with it here: For after the making of the said obiection, he addeth: although thou sayest, God stebt not: there is iudgement before him, loske thou for it. Here Eliu remediethe the sayd frowardnesse which hath bene discouered, to the end we should bethink vs of the euill that is in vs, and giue it ouer. True it is that these words are as it were erased by reason of their shortnesse. And bycause it is set downe thus, Bebold thou sayest, or else albeit that thou say, he shall not see it. This saying may be taken also in the person of Job: as though Eliu vpbrayed him to haue thought thus: Thou shalt not see God, nether shalt thou knowe what he is. But when all is wel considered, the sentence must be knit together, and therewithall it must also be distinguisched thus: Although thou say then, he shall not see it. Hereby Eliu signifieth that men aduaunce themselues to much, and that they ought to consider their rudenesse and small capacitiē. For it is not in them too see God, that is too say, too serche him to the bottome. True it is that we must alwayes looke vntoo God, howbeit we must first beseeche him to giue vs eyes: And furthermore also wee must beholde him in the glasse that he offereth vs, that is too saye, in his worde and in his woorkes, and wee must walke in suche sobrietie, as wee must not bee desirous too seeke more than is lawefull or than hee giueth vs leaue to do. There is then one maner of seeing God which is good and holy : which is to behold him so farre forth as it pleaseith him to shew himselfe vnto vs , and to distrust oure owne vnderstanding, so as wee desire to bee inlightned by his holy spirit , and not ouercurious and presumptuous to know more than he permitteth. But if we wil looke God in the face, and not suffer any thing to be hidde from vs , but will enter into his incomprehensible determinations, euen too the verie bottome of these depthes : it is an intollerable pride, and men do vt- 10

terly confounde themselues by it . Then let vs learne what meane we must holde too see God. VVe must not go to it with ouermuch hast, but we must be sober, knowing the small measure of our vnderstanding , and the infinite highnesse of Gods Majestie. Furthermore, seeing he hath declared himselfe vnto vs , so farre foorth as hee knoweth it meete and conuenient for our welfare : let vs holde vs content with the knowledge that he hath giuen vs , and not fall to raunging here and there. Marke then howe Eliu sayth now vnto Job, although thou say, I shall not see it : as if hee had sayde , thou art ouerhastie too speake , and thou thrustest thy selfe further in than thou shouldest. For consider what thou art, and consider what God is, and cast downe thine eyes , and forget the pride that is in thee . And afterwarde he addeth, there is iudgement before his face: or judge thou : For the saying maye bee sette downe twoo wayes . If wee take, Judge thou : It is an exhortation too humilitie and repentance , as if Eliu shoulde say , wretched man I see thou liftest vp thy selfe agaynst God , and what maketh thee too doo so, but bycause thou iudgeth not thy selfe ? Therefore enter into thy selfe , and looke vppon thine owne wretchednesse , and then will all thy prude bee plucked downe. Thus ye see the remedie that is giuen vs heere by the holy ghost, to reprove vs when we runne astray , and haue through our vnbeleefe conceyued anie wicked and hasty imaginations agaynst God . For if wee will bee brought into the right way , wee muste go downe into our owne selues, and examine our owne ignorance and sinfulnesse , and then shall wee bee ashamed, and forget the wandring conceytes wherewith we were caryed to and fro. Lo what sense and doctrine we ought to gather of this saying, if wee take it too bee set downe, judge thou. But the very true meening of this Text is, that there is iudgement before God . And therefore Eliu concludeth, that menshoulde looke for it. Heere is a counterviewe betwene the face of God , and our sight : as if Eliu shoule say, that God ceaseth not too bee righteous although it appeare not vnto vs . Then if we will knowe that God gouerneth the worlde , and ordereth all things vprightly : wee must not measure him by the things that wee perceyue . And why ? For Gods judgement is too high for vs , & we cannot reach vnto it at the first brayde.

Therefore let vs marke well that God seeth what is good and rightfull , whereas wee are moste commonly blind : what is to bee done then ? Nothing else, but euen tari, according as the faythfull man must bee fedde with hope that he may yeld himselfe pleasaunce and obedient vnto God ; and we knowe that it behoueth vs too hope when things are not visible to vs . Nowe haue wee the naturall sense of this text : It remayneth that wee applie the same too our owne instruction . Although thou saye thou shalt not see it. This sheweth vs, that wee muste not haue oure tongue at libertie to shoote foorth whatsoeuer we thinke concerning God . But wee must brydle our tongues, and holde our thoughts as prisoners , assuring our selues that God intendeth to keepe vs in humilitie by concealing the reason of all his woorkes from vs .

Therefore let those that will not bee condemned by the spirite of God , take heede that they rushe not oute too farre. Marke that for one poynt. And why ? It ought to be well considered, that we be not able to see God: howbeit (as I haue sayde alreadie) true it is that God graunteth vs the grace and priuiledge to shewe himselfe vnto vs , howbeit that is but so farre forth as he knoweth too bee expedient for vs . God being inuisible of himselfe sheweth himselfe in a glasse so farre as is conuenient for vs, that is to wit in his worde , and in his workes, but yet must we not be too inquisite of him . And this is also the cause why he sendeth vs alwayes to the meane, which he hath hilde, to allure vs to knowe of him . For he knoweth our ouerbodenesse , and also the fickleness of our witte, and that wee bee so vncertain as it is pitie to see. Truely they are twoo great vices, when men are so ouerhardie , and also haue so disordered lustes. On the other side, there is ignorance or rather beastlinesse , and moreouer also fowardnesse . And therefore wee haue neede to be restrayned by the meane that God hath giuen vs, which is, to be contented with the things that are conteyned in the holy Scripture: assuring our selues that we shall be no more in daunger of straying, if we follow that way without stepping out of it , and consider Gods workes, not to iudge of them after our owne fancie and liking, but only by hearing what he telleteth vs by his word, and by suffering our sciues to be taught at his mouth , so as wee desire to haue none other cunning but that. And furthermore, forasmuch as it is sayde , that our Lorde Iesus Christ is the lively Image wherein to beholde whatsoeuer is good and conuenient for vs to knowe : let vs rest there , according also as it is sayde in another place, that all the treasures of wisedome and knowledge are layde vp in him . Then let vs marke well that wee bee blinde wretches, and that if wee will inquire of God by our owne wit, he shall bee hidden from vs , and we shall never come neare him, and much lesse bee able to come at him. And therefore we must learne to condemne our selues vtterly, confessing that there is nothing in vs , but meere brutishnesse. Haue wee once acknowledged that ? Let vs pray God to inlighten vs by his holy spirite , that wee may not bee full of presumptuousnesse and prude, to say, I am able to seeke them of my selfe. Let vs kepe our selues from suche diuelish presumption , and let vs humble our selues before God, praying him to inlighten vs . And heerewithall also , seeing he hath ordeyned hys worde to be the meane to shew himselfe vnto vs : let vs be as it were tied to it, and not attempt to passe beyonde it. Thus much concerning the first poynt that is shewed vs here. Nowe let vs come to this which is sayde , that there is a iudgement before his face, and that we must wayt for it. I haue touched alredy, that we must not esteeme Gods iudgements by our eyesign, for that is too short : and it is to dimme as is pitifull. VVhat then ? Let vs understande that God dwelling in vnapproachable light (as the Scripture sayth) reserueth to him selfe the knowledge of the things which are to profounde for vs . Therefore let vs conclude, that God is righteous although wee see it not , and that whensoeuer wee finde his dooinges straunge, and are offendid at them we must thinke thus: wretched creature , thou hast eyes in deed , but they are to dimme, yea they are starke blinde . and although thy God inlighten thee, yea euē with some good portion, yet will he stil restrain thee, to the end thou maist do him the honor to confess that he is righteous. Seing the that thy wit and vnderstanding are so weake: what a thing were it if thou wouldest comprehend the infinit wisdome of God ! Therfore refer the things vnto thy god which passe thine vnderstanding for thou seest not the reason in that behalfe, vntill thou beare wel in mind, & fully beleue this lesson in thy hart, that there is judgement before the face of God. Mark I say how it behoueth vs to correcte the ouerboldnesse that is in vs, to the end we may confesse that although we might seeme to haue cause to enter into disputation against god: yet notwithstanding he seeth the things that are hid from vs. And this is the comparison of the contrarie things that I speake of euuen now. Then wheras it is sayde that there is judgement in Gods sight: it is also declared vnto vs, that it is not in our sight: as if Eliu should say, God seeth, and not men: God knoweth, and man is ignorant. VVil we the reserue vnto God his due honor? VVe must rid our selues of the vaine presumption wherein we are puffed vp by nature: for we woulde be to wise: and we are alwayes tickled with this diuelish lust of desirousnesse to inquire of the things that belong not vnto vs. Therefore let vs be contented to glorifie God, yelding vnto him that which is his owne: namely a wisedome that surmounteth all our vnderstanding and capacitie. But it is impossible that this shoulde be done, without hope: for that is the stay that holdeth vs in the obeying of our God, and the thing that nourisheth vs in modestie and lowlinesse: and oute of dout if we hoped not that things shoulde go better, & that God would giue the such an end as we cannot now perceyue: it is certain that our minds shoulde never be quiet. The let vs mark, that if we will giue god the glory which belongeth vnto him, by confessing him to be righteous: it behoueth vs to be hopeful. And although things go amis, so as al is in a broyle, and it seemeth that heauen & earth should be confounded togither: yet must we rest vpon the promises that he hath giuen vs, which are, that forasmuch as he turneth the darkness into light (as he hath shewed Gen. 1.4.3.4 in the creation of the world) and knoweth how to drawe good out of euil: he wil so dispose the things that seemed to be vterly out of order, as it shalbe perceived in the end that he hath a wonderfull wisedome. Neuerthelesse, that is not at the first brunt Therfore here is a good doctrine & warning: namely that we must not iudge of things at the first sight: (for that were too hasty & rash a iudgement) but hope must go before vs, and be as a lampe to shew vs the way. And what is the oyle of this lamp. That is to say, how are we enlightened by it: By sticking to Gods premises. For if we wayte paciently till God worke according as he hath spoken with his mouth, and vntill his hand vitter it selfe in conuenient time: then shal we learne to bee modest, and to glorifie him, by confessing him to be righteous in al his doings: notwithstanding that we be troubled here, and seeme to be in the middes of many gulfes. And this is the true studie of Christians. Furthermore, marke here how we be nowadyses so easily caried, or rather viterly driven out of the way, because we haue no setlednesse, but are tossed with vnquietnesse, yea euene with boylng vnquietnesse, so as we would haue God to make hast according to our fancies. If he do not things as wee imagined in our minde: it seemeth to vs that all things are forlorne and past recouerie, because we vnderstante them not. For so long as we thinke but vpon our selues it causeth vs to bee out of pacience, and there is no obedience at all to be found in vs: and therfore so muche the more doth it stand vs in hand to put this doctrine in vre. So then when we see all things in hurlyburly, so as God seemeth to haue shut his eies, and to haue turned his back vpon vs: let vs understand that it is because of our sinne. Yet neuerthelesse, let the same confirme our sayth, and let vs be quiet, assuring our selues that it is Gods office too inioyne vs silence vntill conuenient time bee come, yea and vntill he knowe it to be conuenient. For it is not for vs to binde him to the stake, and to say, this thing must be done after this maner, and that thing after that. But we must learne to repose our selues in god, and then shall all pride be beaten downe, so as wee shalbinke all Gods doings too bee good, rightfull, and iust, although they seeme strange to vs at the first sight. Thus yee see what we haue to marke in this text. Now Eliu addeth, that Gods present visiting or punishing is not in his anger: and that he knoweth not in multitude greatly. Truely this text is somewhat hard, but the plaine meening of it in effect is this. That although God do now shew himselfe rough and sharpe: yet notwithstanding if we knew how dreadful and terrible his wrath is, we would say it is none of the things which we see in this worlde. And why? For he will not examin things to the vtermost. Hee searcheth not things to deepe: he doth but onely passe ouer them, and as it were with a glaunce (as men terme it). Hereby Eliu ment to shew, that when we be afflited to the vtermost, so as God seemeth to thunder in such wise vpon vs, as if he would ouerwhelme vs: it behoueth vs to consider what his wrath is, and that if he would vitter it too the ful, it were able to destroy, not only some one man, but also a hundred thousande worldes, yea and to consume them vterly, and to bring them to nothing. Ye see then whervnto we be brought by the holy ghost. Furthermore it is a verie profitable admonisshment, to asswage the afflictions that God sendeth vs. For what causeth vs too thinke that we be tormented out of measure? It is because that to our seeming God could not do worse: and we can not offend God more on our part, than whē we conceiue such an opinion of it. So then according to that which I haue shewed, let vs learne to consider what Gods wrath is, that is to say, how dreadfull it is. And although he shewe himselfe very rough towards vs: yet notwithstanding let vs assure our selues it is not the hundred part of that which we should feele, if he would execute such rigor vpon vs as we haue deserued. Seing the that we may know that gods wrath is such as is able in one minute of an hour to destroy a hundred thousand worlds, & that neither men in earth, nor Angels in heauen should be able to abide it, but heauen and earth, & all that else is besides, should be melted away like snow, yea & be brought vterly to nothing: we ought to humble our selues, notwithstanding that god deale sharply with vs, and send vs very rough punishments. Much more the ought we stil to be pacient, seeing that god spareth vs, & bereth with vs. And in good sooth haue we not cause to giue him thanks, seeing he vittereth not his wrath against vs as we are worthie? Is it not a sufficient matter to giue vs hart, & to cheere vs vp throughly in the mids of our afflictions, whē we consider [and can say in our selues] true it is that I am as good as ourwhelmed, & it seemeth to be Gods will that I shall vterly perish, but yet is his rigor nothing so great vpon me, as I might feele it, if he had not respect of my feeblenesse? Forasmuch the as my God beareth with me, I will trust in him, and not cease to seeke him: for he giueth me still some signe that I may haue entrance to come vnto him. Behold I say, how we haue cause rather to blisse God in our afflictions whē we knowe that he beareth with vs. And therewithall also we be taught to trust in him, seeing that he openeth vs the gate to the ende we might still aske him forgiuenesse of our sinnes, and beseeche him too haue mercie vpon vs. And therfore let vs wey well these wordes of Eliu when he sayth, that Gods present punishing is nothing in respect of his wrath: wherefore wee must not say, what? The miserie is great, and I can indure no more. It is certaine, that if a man haue an eye to Gods wrath, and compare it with all that can bee indured in this worlde: hee shall shall finde that in verie deede all that can bee layde vpon vs heere, is nothing to it. Now seeing that all is nothing, and that God searcheth vs not with extremitie, but passeth ouer vs lightly; and as you would say glaucingly, so as he maketh a countenance to trie vs, but examineth vs not straightly, because wee bee not able too beare it: let vs learne to restreyne our murmurings, and if our fleshe prouoke vs to impaciencie (as we be ouermuch giuen vnsto it) let this remedie serue to correct that vice. Howe nowe wretched creature, what intendent thou too doo? VVilt thou spight thy God? Thou seest that he beareth still with thee, thou hast prouoked his wrath so sore, as thou mightest well deserue to be rooted out of the world a hundred tymes: thou art worthie to be drowned in the deepe of hell, and yet thou seest that he maketh his Sun to shine vpon thee: hee nourisheth thee with his bread, and mainteyneth thee in this present life, at his owne charges: Thou art not worthie to bee in the number of the works which he hath created, and yet he giueth thee respite still to returne vnto him. VVhen we thinke vpon these things, we haue wherewith to comfort our selues, that we might not be too much cumbered with impaciencie. Thus in effect ye see the doctrine that wee haue to gather in this text. And heerewithall let vs marke, that although our Lord do not now visite vs in his wrath, nor examine things to the vtermost: we must not therupon fall asleepe: for the great day wil come, wherein nothing shalbe forgotten. As now God winketh at things and punishest not the wicked: they take libertie, as though they were scaped out of the Judges hande, and shold never 30 yeeld an account: but they shall pay deare for the tyme, when they shall so abuse his pacience, which would allure them vnto goodness, by giuing them respit too amende. Seing then that the wicked do so mocke at God: horrible vengeance must needs fall vpon their heade in the ende: and that shall be at the great day. Furthermore if God spare vs, let vs not cease to bee watchfull: and if he chastice vs, and beate vs with his roddes, let vs alwayes consider how terrible our wrath is, and therupon conclude that hee doth but summon vs. And why? To 40 the ende we shoulde preuent his last iudgement. Therefore let vs alwayes thinke vpon the great day, and not tarie till wee bee taken tardie with the comming of oure Lorde Iesus Christ: but let euerie of vs condemne himselfe, when God stirreth vs therewith. Furthermore let vs alwayes beare in remembrance, that God is often-times mindefull of mercie in the middes of his displeasure: and that the same is the cause, why he examineth not the great multitude of our sinnes. For howe great is the multitude of our sinnes? I pray you if euerie man would examin himselfe as he ought to do: should he not finde an infinite number of sinnes in him, yea and of so heynous offences as would vtterly dismay him. But the cause why we consider not the greatnessse of our sinnes, is our hypocrisie which hindereth vs, and keepeth our eyes blindfolded. But if a man woulde examine himselfe throughly: he shoulde finde himselfe a hundred thousand tymes confounded, before hee came halfe to his wayes ende. For God seeth much more clereely than wee do. VVhen we haue spyeid one fault, God wil spie out a hundred thousande, yea euen of millions: what shall the heauenly Judge do? So then let vs marke that God forbeareth vs of his owne mercie, to the ende hee woulde not trie vs in the multitude [ of our sinnes ] that is too say, not searche vs too the vtermost. And Eliu sayeth expressely heere, in multitude greatly [ or in great number] to signifie that it were impossible that any creature should stande out, if God of his goodnesse did not spare them, and continually abate the rigour of the punishments which we haue deserued by our sinnes. And here vpon (as I haue sayde alreadie) wee must needs thinke that there is a farre other iudgement, than can be perceyued in this woride, howbeit we knowe it not as yet, and God beareth with vs. And when wee bee come too the lowlinesse to condemne our selues, and to craue forgive- 10 nesse at his hande, let vs not dout but that when we shall appeare before his iudgement seate at the latter day, al our sinnes shal be wiped out there: and let vs understand that the examining of vs, which he doth now put vs to in part: is to the ende he may not examin any thing at all at the latter day, and that the remembrance of our offences may be so abolished, as they may come to account before him, but that we may be received there as righteous, as though there had bee nothing in vs, but all innocencie and soundnesse. Yee see then that it behoueth vs so too ap- 20 plie this doctrine too oure vse, as wee may learne so too walke in hope, as wee may alwayes go forwarde to the comming of our Lorde Iesus Christ, and also profite our selues when we see that our Lorde sheweth vs tokens of his wrath and vengeance as at this present: Alas, what calamities are too bee seene through the whole worlde? And we might say that God is vtterly alienated from vs, if wee had not his doctrine too fense vs withall. Surely when wee do throughly consider the outrageous iniquities that raigne euerie where: it appeareth plainly that God beareth with the worlde, and proceedeth not with such rigour as men haue deserued. Therefore let vs learne heeraby to returne vnto him with the better hart, not doubting but he will receyue vs. And besides that, let vs holde our thoughtes and affections fettered and bridlede: And forasmuch as Eliu hath heere condemned all wicked thoughts, wandring wordes, and false ymaginations: let vs beseeche God, first too clenze our heartes from all the wicked fancies wherein we be too much intangled, and therewithall to brydle our tongaes, that we 30 may not vter any thing but to his honour, according to the request which Dauid maketh, saying: Lord open thou Ps.51.d.19. our lips, that my mouth may set forth thy prayse. So then we haue good cause to pray God so to gouerne both our mindes and our tongaes, that all our thoughts and words may be to his honour. For if Dauid who was so holy a Prophet, needed to craue this at his hande: what had we neede to do, which are so euill taught? Seing it is so, let vs be well aduisied that whensoeuer we think of God, we esteeme him good, wise, and righteous in all respects: 40 and that whensoeuer we speake of him, it may be to call vpon him, and to yeelde him thankes for his goodnessse, which hee maketh vs to feele in these dayes, wayting till we be filled with it to the full.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to touch vs so to the quicke, as we may learne to returne better vnto him with true repentance, so bethinking vs of our life past, as wee may amende it heerafter, and henceforth learne to giue our selues wholly too his seruice, in following his holye commaundements as they are shewed in his lawe, whereby wee ought to rule our whole life. And so let vs say, Almighty God our heauenly father, we acknowledge and confess according to the truth, that we bee not worthie to lift vp our eyes too Heauen, too present our selues before thee, nor too presum: so farre, &c.

ELiu spake againe and sayde,

2. Hearc me and I vvill argue vwith thee, for yet haue I vvordes to speake of God.
3. I vvill extende my knovvledge a farre off, and proue him to be righteous vwhich mademe.
4. My vvordes shall be voyd of vntruth, and the perfect of knovvledge shall be vvith thee.
5. God being mightie, yea being mightie in strength of mind, enuieth not, [or reiefteth not.]
6. He quickneth not the vvicked, but giueth iudgement to the afflicted.
7. He vwill not turne avvay his eycs from the righteous.

Hey that had heeretofore vphilde that God leaueth no sinne vnpuni-shed in this worlde, are beguiled as hath bene declared more tully alreadie. And sure we see that God eserueth the punishment of many faults, to the end to make vs looke the further. For it should as now execute a ful iudging 20 wherein nothing were missing: we shoulde haue no occasion to hope for the coining of our Lorde Iesus Christ: he shoulde haue no more to do in iudging of the world: for all would be done afore hande. So then Gods punishing of sinnes in this world, is not at all times, nor all after one rate: It is ynough that hee giueth vs some tokens and markes that he is Judge of the world. The like also is per-ceyued in mainteyning the Godly: It is sayd that god go-uernehis seruants, and is the preseruer of those that commit themselues vnto him and haue deliuereth the from 30 all their aduersities: yea, howbeit that is not done in such wise, but that he suffereth the Godly to be now and then afflicted, yea & seemeth not to be minded to succor them though they call vpon him. Therefore it behoueth vs so to acknowledge Gods prouidence, as we consider that he reserueth many things till the last day. And thi. is the matter that Eliu shoulde treat of here. This Chapter then importeth none other thing, but that if we open our eyes, wee may easily see that God holdeth the brydle of all worldly things, and sheweth hi. nelfe to be carefull over 40 vs. True it is that we see not so perfect and good a state as were to be wished: no, it is farre wile of it. Howbeit the reason is, apparent: namely, that God is mynded to exercise vs heare with manye battayles, and againe, that hee intendeth to drawe vs further, namely to make vs to knowe that a day will come, wherein all things shall be stablished againe, so that whereas things go amisse as nowe, it is to the ende, that wee shoulde bee the more prouoked too desyre the appearing of the Sonne of 50 God, to sett all things in order againe, according as it i. his office, and as hee hath promised so to doo. But before Eliu treat of the foresayde matter, namely that God gouerneth the worlde, and disposseth things in suche wise, as his iustice is shewed by experiance: hee vseth heere a Preface. Hearc me (sayeth hee) for I haue yet matter to speake concerning God. And what matter? I wil extende my knowledge a farre (sayeth hee) to prove that he which made me, is righteous. Eliu in saying that he had yet to speake of God: sheweth that a faithfull man must not giue ouer the maintenance of Gods squarell, too the 60 ende to stoppe their mouthes, whiche murmure agaynst him, or blasphemie him. And truely if wee had but a little peece of the zeale that is comaunded vs in the holy scripture: we woulde be much more earnest in mainteyning Gods honour than we be. It is sayde in the Psalme, that the reproches which are offered vnto God, ought to light vpon our heades, and so touch vs, as wee may feele them at the heart, and bee more greeued and sorie for them, than if men did vs all the outrage that were possible to bee thought. For who are we? If we were a hundred tymes misused: ought our owne honour too bee so much set by at our handes, as the honour of God? No.

But yet we see the contrarie, so as if any of vs be defamed, by and by he will reuenge himselfe, or at leastwise seeke justice, and is never contented til his honor be repaireed, and yet his honour is nothing. For what are we? But as for the name of God, that shall be rent in peeces: one shall villainously skoffe at it, another shall speewe out cursed blasphemies agaynst it, and a thirde shall rayle at it:
And this geere passeth and slippeth away amongs vs, no man is moued at it, and if we speake but one woerde a-gaynst it, wee thinke we haue done more than ynough.
Therefore when we suffer Gods doctrine to be flaudered, his Maiestie blasphemed, and his name runne in mennes mouthes with reproch: therein wee shewe that there is not one droppe of good zeale in ours heartes, and this cowardlynesse of oures, deserueth that God shoulde disclayme vs for his children. For if wee tooke him for our father: coulde wee abide that men shoulde aduaunce themselues after that sort agaynst him? A childe that is of a good nature, woulde couer the reproch of his carnall father, although he were of no value. And what shall we then do, when the matter concerneth him that is the wellspring of all righteousnesse, and the king of glorie, and which deserueth all prayse, as the scripture speaketh, and as the effect it selfe sheweth. Then if we clayme him for our father, and yet notwithstanding haue our mouthes shette, when men go about to pervert his truthe, and his name is reviled, and too bee short, hee is made an open scoffing stocke, and wee bee not touched nor greeued at all with it: are wee woorthise to bee acknowledged for his children? So then wee ought too marke this Sext better, where it is sayde, that there is yet more to be spoken of God.. This worde yet importeth that when a faythfull man hath settel hiselue agaynst the wic'ed whiche impeache Gods honour, hee is not discharged for shewing onely that hee consented not vnto them: but as much as in vs lyeth, we must to the vttermost withstande and resist those that offer wrong vnto God, and go aboute to diminishe or deface his glorie by any maner of meanes. VVe must I say, be their enimies to the vttermost, and neuer give ouer the battaile, in so holye and iusta quarell. But in the meane while, we see the wicked are alwayes readie to mainteyne euill caces: and in these dayes the wickedest man shall finde most bearers and bolsterers, insomuch that a man might conclude, that if he will bee fauoured and borne out, hee must giue himselfe to all euill. And againe euerie man will sell his conscience and his tongue for a little good cheere or some other suche corruption. These things are manifest, and yet in the meane while, they whiche say, they haue some zeale of God, are dumbe, and dare not open their lippes. Seeing then that these villaynes are so outragious: I pray you shallthere neede any other recordes

record to condemne those that haue had no courage and stoutenesse too mainteyne Gods honour, than the wickednesse that is seene in the wicked, in that they doo so linke togither in all euill. Thus as for goodnesse, yee shall not finde a man that will hazarde himselfe for it.
The wicked may spight God in theyr mainteyning of wicked matters, vnder the colour of some present that shall bee giuen them: and in the meane while, no man shall haue the minde to mainteyne goodnesse. Therefore let vs learne to be more zealous of Gods glorie than we haue beene. And first of all, when we see mengo about to overthrow the good and pure doctrine: let vs shewe what sayth there is in vs, and make confession of it, by withstanding Satans lies, and such as seeke nothing but to bring troubles and stumblingblockes into the Church of God. That is one poynt. Againe, do we see God scorned and dallyed withall, and men talking of the holy Scripture to bring all religion in disdaine? Let vs be inflamed with a holy anger, for it is a cause which ought too moue vs, and greeue vs, when wee see Gods honor wounded, and his religion misused. So then let vs shewe that wee haue yet too talke of God. Thirde-ly, when wee heare blasphemyes flying abroade in the streets, or in the markets, or in vittayling houses: let vs labour to resist them to the vttermost of our power, that we may ridde and clenze away such abomination from among vs. VVherefore as muche as in vs lyeth, let vs not suffer Gods name too bee reuyled. And for a conclusion, whensoeuer wee see any euill raigne: let vs cast a stope before it, and labour to amende it, and then will God do vs the honour too acknowledge vs for his Proctors and Aduocates. But if wee do otherwise, wee giue Satan the vpper hande, and are guiltie of betraying the name of God, for that we made no account of the thing which is principall, and so ought to be taken. This is it which wee haue too marke vpon the wordes where Eliu sayeth: that yet he hath still to speake of God. Afterwarde hee goeth forward with the same sentence, according also as it is a cace, well woorrihie that the faythfull shoule imploy themselues in it too the vttermost, yea and streyne themselues aboue all their forces, for when hee sayeth, that bee will extende his knowledge a farre: ther-by hee sheweth, that when we speake of God, wee must list vp our mindes higher than oure naturall vnderstanding mounteth. And in geod sooth, shall a man euer attaine vnto God, if hee it dge according to his owne fancie and fleshly reason? No. But we shal rather darken his glorie.

So then, if wee will glorifie God, let vs learne to reach out our knowledge farre and wyde, according as example is giuen vs heere. And howe? For a man shall neuer reach out his knowledge as he ought to doo, too speake of God, except hee knowe that his Majestic is higher than all our vnderstanding, and therefore that he must be faine to come downe to vs, and to list vs vp vnto him. Thus must we humble our selues with all re-uerence, to the ende that God may list vs vp too him, and shewe himselfe to vs, and make vs partakers of the doctrine which otherwise wee coulde neuer attaine yn-to. Ye see then how we must reach out our knowledge a farre when we haue to deale concerning God. Nowe, were this well obserued, we shoulde profit after another maner than we do, bothe by sermons and lectures. But what? As for them that come too Sermons, howe are they disposed to receyue the doctrine that is set foorth?
It is ynough for them to come to the Church, and too shewe themselues there. And therefore they go theyr wayes as ill as they came, or rather worse: for it is good reason that god shoulde punish the with blindnesse, which doo so despise the inestimable treasure of his Gospell.

VWhen men come thither lazily without any minde, and there fall into their dumpes, and consider not that it is God which speake vnto them, that they might do him honour, and receyue the thing that is gone oute of hys mouth: are they not traytors to God, in yeelding so little honor to the doctrine of iauiations? That is the cause the why God blindest them. VWhen we read the holy scripture, either we will bee proude, so as we do but overrun matters vpon trust of our owne wit, as though wee were sufficient judges to determine vpon all things: or else we mingle Gods worde with our worldly affections. And furthermore, we are so farre off from reaching out our knowledge a farre: that wee bee as it were forepostesse with our owne sond and trifling imaginacions, and with our wicked lustes; which holde vs as it were locked and towed downe, so as we cannot lift vp our heades vntoo heauen. That is the cause why we see so slender profiting: and that such as beare the name of faythfull, knowe not what God is, neither do desire too knowe. Therefore let vs learne by the example of Eliu, to list vp our knowledge, and to reach it out a farre when there is any talking of God: and let vs learne also to do him the honour, too dispose our selues too looke reverently vnto him. For that also is an accomplishing of this saying of the holye Scripture, that God is neere vnto the lowly, and sheweth himselfe to such as distrust in them selues, without challenging to them any drop of goodnesse as of themselues.
And finally as often as we speake of God, let vs not give our owne braine the bridle, but let vs learne to reach out our knowledge further. Eliu addeth, that bee will proue him to be righteous whiche made him. Here we see whervnto all our talke ought to tend whē we speake of God: namely to the mainteyning of his glory. And what doctrine soever is referred to that ende, we must hold it for good & holy: like as when men reason and dispute too dimishe the honour of God, it is certaine that there is nothing in them but fowardnesse, howe faire colours soever they pretend. So then whensoeuer we speake of God, let vs beare in minde to proue him righteous, that is to say, to yeelde him his duetie, so as he may bee magnified at our handes, and we acknowledge him such as hee woulde bee knowne to bee, that all mouthes may bee shette, and haue no occasion to mislike of him. Thus yee see that the talke which we ought to haue concerning our God, must bee to sanctifie his name: according also as we desire in the prayer that wee vse euerie day. And Eliu addeth immediately, that his woordes shall bee voyde of vns truth, and that bee will shewe vntoo lob that his knowledge is perfect.

Heere hee protesteth that hee will not mingle anie thing with the good doctrine, nor go about to disguise it. And surely it is one poynt further which wee ought to marke well, that when wee open our mouth to treate of God and of his workes and worde, there must not bee any mingling with it, but purenesse must be kept, so as all that euer we speake be whole and sound. For as for him that mingleth good matter and euill matter togither, what dooth hee else, but bring good meat, and well seasoned too the taste, whiche yet notwithstanding is poysoned? Euen so is it with all such as make a fayre shewe, and do indeede alledge good and true sayings: and yet notwithstanding doo interlace them with lyes and errores. Let vs marke well then that he which executeth the office of a Teacher, muste not onely regarde to haue good sayings, but specially indeuer too haue tiis simplicitie, that hee neyther adde nor diministhe anie thing

thing from Gods pure doctrine. And therefore if wee will haue a well ruled sayth, wee must go by that lyne, and take good heede, that in teaching, wee vse nothing to guide vs, but the pure will of God, and that all oure wordes bee referred and conformable thereto. But if we handle things otherwise, and deale not with suche soundnesse as id vprightnesse as God requireth, who (as wee say) wil haue his worde preached in singlenesse, I say if wee haue not that minde with vs: wee shall perceyue in the ende, that wee haue beene out of the way. 10 Heere then wee be taught too receyue the pure and holy doctrine as wee ought too do, and to see that it bee not mingled. For what a thing is it, too mingle poysion with good drinke or good meate? This is the thing which wee haue to consider in Elius wordes. And whereas he sayeth, that bee will bee perfect in knowledge towardes Job. It is of some men referred vnto God, as if Eliu shoulde say, that in the ende Job shoulde perceyue, that it was not for him to set God too schole, as wee haue seene heretofore that hee went about to do: not of sette purpose, 20 but bycause that by his murmuring it might seeme that hee woulde haue ruled God after his owne manner: and that bycause hee contented not himselfe with his dooings, hee woulde haue founde fault with him, and haue reuersed his ordinaunce. For this cause (as some thinke) Eliu sayth here, that God shall be found perfect in knowledge. Howebeit this saying ought rather too bee referred too him that speaketh: as if hee shoulde say, thou shalte perceyue that I am a faythfull teacher. His meening then is, that forasmuche as hee will speake 30 in Gods name, Job ought well too admitte his woordes, bycause hee woulde not mingle nor adde any thing of his owne, but handle the true doctrine perfectly, even as he had receyued it of God. Therefore when a man that preacheth God, magnifieth his doctrine, it must not bee taken as though he aduaunced himselfe too much: for we must exalt Gods truth aboue all losiuenesse, so as nothing may deface it.

Thus yee see after what maner Eliu speaketh heere.
It is not to vaunte himselfe in his owne person, but too the ende that the doctrine whiche hee bringeth, (according as it is of God) might bee receyued, and every man humble himselfe vnder it. And doubtlesse it is a monstrous thing, when men fall too stryuing agaynst it.
VVherefore let vs vnderstante that there is such a perfection in it, as all the worlde ought too holde their mouthes shette, and acknowledge that God shoulde bee so honoured when he speakest to vs, as euery man ought to obey him.

But nowe let vs come too the generall matter that is conteyned heere. Hitherto Eliu hath vsed a Preface, and nowe hee entereth intoo the pleading of Gods cace, and sayth , that God being strong despyseth no man , Verely (sayeth he) that is of strength and courage. Heere hee taketh a grounde to separate God from men, and too take him out of their number, too the intent we shoulde not thinke of him as of oure selues . For the verie cause why wee iudge amisse of him , is for that wee woulde alwayes fashon him after our smalnesse , as who shoulde say there were not an infinite difference of power betwixt him and vs . Then if men go about to resemble God vntoo a mortall man , it is a defacing of his Majestie, and yet for all that , it is more than ordinary , insomuch that wee finde it in all caces by experience . If God vse any rigour , wee fall too surmising this or that , and take occasion too repine agaynst him : and if hee threaten vs , wee are not awihte moued at it , For wee beare oure selues in hande , that his anger will passe o-

uer. And what is the cause of so beastly a presumption? It is for that wee discerne not God from his Creatures. Also on the contrary part, when God promiseth too receyue vs too mercie , wee cannot bee perswaded that it is so. For wee bee letted and hindered by oure owne imaginations [whiche make vs too thinke ] what? I haue offended him so muche , and so muche. VVee make him alwayes lyke a mortall man , and therefore it is sayde in the Psalme , Looke howe farre the Hea- Psf.103.b.ii. uens are from the Earth, so farre are my thoughtes from yours. And hee confirmeth the same saying by his Prophete Esay . Howe nowe sayeth hee , thinke Esay.55.c.9 ye that I am angrie after your manner? Thys serueth too shewe vs , that although wee haue prouoked hym too the vtermoste , yet will hee bee mercyfull still: and that aloughhe wee bee tootoo vnwoorthie, yet will hee not ceasse too reache oute his helpe vn-too vs.

So then wee see that this doctrine of Eliu is not superfluous, but exceeding muche for oure behoofe, because there are verie few that can withhold from mingling God with men, so as no difference can be perceyued betwixte hym and his creatures, and yet notwithstanding it is tolde vs, that there is greater difference betweene God and vs, than there is distaunce betweene Heaven and Earth. Therefore wee muste not measure his thoughtes by ours, nor speake any thing of him after oure owne imagination : For that were an viter peruerting of all. Then let vs remember howe Elius meening is in effect, that G O D oughte too bee so exaltered aboue all Creatures, as menne may not presume too iudge of him after their owne naturall reason, nor after the disposition of things whiche they see heere bylowe : but consider that hee is a farre other thing, and as farre differing from vs, as the day differeth from the night. And for prooef heereof, he sayeth, that God beeing strong reieceth no man. For what is the cause that a mortall man seeketh too hurt his neighbour, and puncheth him with his elbowes to ouerthrow him, or too make him too stumble by some meanes or other ? Euen the envie and spight that one beareth to another, and also the feare that they haue whiche maketh them too saye , suche a one may doome mee harme, and if suche a man bee aduaunced I shall bee plucked backe by it.

So then, bycause there are so manie infirmities in men, they are alwayes afraide, least their neighbours shoulde bee aduaunced too muche. That is the cause why they are full of contentions and quarelles : That is the cause why they woulde alwayes haue them diminished that are in too great authoritie and credite. That is the cause why menne labour after that sort too bring their neighbours lowe. Nowe let vs see if we can finde anie such poynt in God. No, no : For hee is too greate too enui vs, hee passeth not what men say. For could wee eyther hurt God, or diminishe his honour though wee were never so great? There is no king nor prince that can aduaunce hys Throne aboue the Clowdes : but as for God, hee is aboue the Heauens, yea and aboue the Angelles : and as for men, what are they? The Pro- Esay.40.f.
22. phete Esay speaking of mennes pryme, when they would so aduaunce themselues, sayeth that they are like Grashoppers. Yee see that when Grasshoppers skippe, they make a great leape, bycause their legges bee long, but yet are they fayne too fall by and by too the grounde againe, or else they be as Frogges.

Thus yee see what comparison the Prophete setteth downe, too scorne the vainegloriousnesse of men.

For admittē wee coulde flee aboue the Clowdes, admit wee were fellowes with the Angelles: yet wee see that they do worship the soueraine Maiestie of God, and are fayne to hyde their eyes with their winges, according as it is sayde in the prophecie of Esay. God then is not afraidye that wee can doo him any hurt, neyther will hee beare vs any enuie as thoughē wee were able too anoy him: his Maiestie shall alwayes continue vnappeached spight of our teeth. Seeing it is so, wee must conclude that there is no proportion betwixt him and vs, nor imagin that when God is offended hee hath good cause to bee angrie, for feare least men shoulde bereue him of his right.

True it is, that men are blameworthie for so doing, but yet can not any thing preuidice him at all. So then there is no infirmite in him, that hee shoulde enuie hys creatures: for he is great. And Eliu addeth moreouer, that hee is great in strength of heart, or that hee is mightie in virtue of minde. Herein Eliu toucheth another vice which is in men. For even they which are mightie, and ought not to enuie their inferiours, are notwithstanding so womanish hearted, that they are afraide of them: according as wee see, that even kings and princes whiche are of a spightfull nature, are sorie when they see any vertuous man. And why? For there is no true noblenesse in themselues, to say, God hath ordyned me too aduaunce men of vertue, and to esteeme them and honour them: but cleane contrariwise, forasmuche as they bee base minded themselues, they would haue all the world like them, and are ashamed to see an honest man. If there bee a prince that would wallow in all filthinesse, and keepe a stewes in his Court: It greeueth him to haue his lewdnesse discouered, whereas whoredome reigneth euerie where, yet doth hee seek still to get more libertie to giue himselfe to all lewdnesse. For alsmuch then as men are seene to bee so base minded: Eliu sayeth, that wee must not imagine God too bee after that fashion. And why? For besydes that hee is mightie, and men are notable to reache vnto him, hee is also mightie in vertue of minde, hee lyketh well of vertue, Justice pleaseth him, he alloweth goodnesse, and hee seeketh by all meanes too shewe that the more vertue that there is in men, the better hee is serued and honoured. For the thing wherin the glorifying of God consisteth, is that men shoulde bee vertuous. If a king see any of his subiectes more woorthisie of commendation than himselfe, it mislyketh and greeueth him. VVhy so? Because the thing whiche is in others wanteth in himselfe. But it is not so with God. For why? Haue men any goodnesse of their owne nature? No: but wee muste bee faine too receyue it of God, hee is the well spring from whence it muste come.

Seeing it is so, God needeth not too feare that his honour should be darkned by mens vertues. But mark here what we haue to consider: wee shall never knowe God to bee righteous and mightie in himselfe as wee ought to do, if wee consider him but by our naturall wit. And why? For oure mindes are too grosse and heauie too mounte so highe. But when wee see the vertues and graces which he dealeth vnto men: those are fayre myrtours and lively pictures wherein hee sheweth himselfe: and the more that men walk in righteousness, the more is he continually magnifyed, as in the thing wherwith he is serued and honoured. So then wee see nowe, that wee must no more match God with men, nor iudge of him after our guize and fancie: but he must be viterly separated from them, accorcing as in verie deede the heauen is not so farre off from the Earth, as there is distance betwixt him and vs, as I haue alledged alreadie out of the Psalmes and the Prophete Esay. And nowe after that Ps.103.b.11. Eliu hath spoken so, hee addeth that which I haue tou- Esay.55.c.9 ched alreadie: that is to witte, that although many things bee out of order in this worlde: yet a man may perceyue the markes of Gods prouidence. And vndoubtedly, althoughe God doo not as nowe keepe one vnehaungeable rate: yet notwithstanding it is well seene, that God is aboue all the things in this worlde: and that if he guis ded not the sterne, thereloulde bee a horrible confusioneuerie where. Therefore let it suffice vs too haue heere some markes of Gods prouidence, too the ende we may give him his due glorie, and say, Lorde thou arte ludge of the worlde howesoever things fall out. And althoughe thou leauē many sinnes vnpunished, and cause the righteous and innocent too suffer many afflictions: yet neuerthelesse, wee perceyue that all things are guided by thy hande, and thou haste souereyne dominion ouer all things. Yee see then what Eliu trea- treath of heere, and first of all hee sayeth, that God quicketh not the wicked, that he giueth judgment to the afflicted, and that he turneth not away his eyes from the righteous. These sentences whiche Eliu taketh, are generall: and also it behoueth vs generally too conclude, that God is righteous euē when wee perceyue not any signe of his righteousness. And wee muste remember the thing that hath beene declared afore: which is, that when wee see that things are not set in so good order and per- fection as wee wouide wifhe: it must put vs in minde, that God will one day iudge the worlde in the person of his sonne, according too the article of our beleefe, that Iesus Christ must come too iudge both the quicke and the deade: and truely (as I haue sayde) if all things were disposed as were too bee wished: what a matter were it? VVe shoulde no more looke for the last resurrection. Doo wee then see that God executeth not all his iudgements, but reserueth some too himselfe? Let the same confirme vs in the hope of the last daye, and of the comming of the Lorde Iesus Christ, vnto whom God his father hath giuen all power, too the intent hee shoulde appeare in his Maiestie, too right all things that are out of order, and too set them at a stay. And when wee see that God punisheth some offences, and delyuereth those that are his: whether it bee our selues or others, let the same suffise vs too allowe of his prouidence. I see that God hath punished suche a fault: then muste I conclude that hee hath shewed mee as it were a myrrour of his iustice, and that the wicked shall come to account before him. For why, he accepteth no persons, hee is not an earthly ludge that will doo good iustice by startes, so as if there bee some fault committed, it shall bee punished with great rigour, and in the meane while, many others shall bee let slippe throughe some briberie or parcialitie, and so shall the Judge be quite and cleane chaunged.

This is evident, insomuch that all the Justice in the worlde, yea cuen the best that is too bee feunde, is but theeuishnesse because it proceedeth not of a good and sounde minde that holdeth out continually. But there is no suche thing in God: he is not moued with fauour, nor corrupted wyth rewards. VVhat then? Hee iudgeth according too the truth. Seeing it is so: wee muste needs conclude, that when God punisheth an offence, therein he sheweth vs that nothing escapeth him but that all our woorkes must come too account before him, and that althoughe they be hidden at this day, so as they be not perceyued at the first, yet we shall be neuer- thelesse guilty when we come thither.

So then, let vs learne too practise this lesson that is shewed vs heere, that is to wit, that God turneth not away his eyes from the righteous, nor quickneth the wicked. And howe shall we knowe that? Not alwayes, nor all after one rate, as I haue sayde afore: but yet God giueth vs sufficient proothes, too conclude that hee watcheth ouer the Godly, to the ende to mainteyne them, and that hee keepeþ them in his protection, pitying them, and deliuering them from all daungers. I say, wee see such examples heerof, as wee must needes haue this matter fully settled and concluded in vs. Furthermore, we see also that God lifteth vp his mighty hande too reppresse meynes iniquities, howbeit not alwayes: For hee leaueth many of them unpunished, winking at them, yea and making countenance, as though hee fauoured the wicked in many cases. But I haue shewed alreadie, that the same must confirme our fayth, and that wee muste bee fenced agaynst such stumbling blockes, by knowing that God reserueth those things till the latter day, which hee accomplisheth not as nowe. But howesoeuer the worlde go, we see that inasmuch as God punisheth such offences, hee hateth and abhorreth sinne. And therefore it behoueth vs to judge therepon, that he quickneth not the wicked. But as this doctrine is set downe heere too teache vs, too glorifie God in all respects: so also let vs marke that it must edifie oure fayth, and teache vs the feare of God. Do we then see that God turneth not away his eyes from the Godly, but hath pitie vpon them to helpe them? Let vs bee stablished in trusse of hys goodnessse, that wee may resort vntoo him as oft as wee bee afflicted. Haue wee seene that God hath deliuered any man, or that he hath deliuered our selues? Let the same make vs to returne too him, and say, howe nowe? My God hath made mee too feele by experiance, that hee is readie too helpe all such as trust in him: and the

Scripture sayth vntoo vs, Come vnto mee all yee that labour, and are heauie laden, and I will refreshe you. Ye see then, that all the recordes which God giueth vs, witnessing that hee will not turne away his eyes from the Godly, muste confirme vs in the promises of his goodnesse whiche hee giueth vs. Also on the contrarie part, wheras it is sayde, that God quickneth not the wicked: let vs learne to take the vse of it. Do wee see any crime punished? Let it prouoke vs too walke in feare, and to say, there is no dallyng in this case with God. VVhy so? For hee chasteneth such a one to the intent too instruct vs by his harmes. For it is a great fauour that God sheweth vs, when hee giveth vs such examples of his rigour and wrath, as we neuerthelesse without being touched, maye take warning, too eschue his vengeance, which wasreadie for vs, and which he might haue made vs to feele.

Thus yee see that all the examples of the chasteaignments and corrections which God doth in this worlde, ought to serue to our learning: True it is that wee can well say, God is righteous, and such a one hath his due reward: we can skill to condemne such as haue done amisse, and too allowe the corrections that God sendeth to them: but in the meane while, we applic not the thing to our owne yse, and yet were that the principall poynt. VVhen I see that God punisheth a man, I must enter into my selfe, and looke if I bee not attainted with the same vice, or whether I bee not as guiltie in some other respectes. And therupon I must humble my selfe, and walke more aduisedly than I haue earst done. Furthermore, we haue yet one other frute too bee taken of the chasteaignments that God sendeth. Therein wee see also that God hath care of his children. If God beate downe those that haue troubled one and wronged another: why doth he it but too take our quarrell in hande? So then we ought to be the better minded to serue God, when we see him set himselfe agaynst our enimies, and thunder vpon them, after he hath suffered them to haue their scope for a time. And therefore (as I haue declared afore) we ought to bee the more confirmed to leane vnto his promise by fayth, without doubting that hee will shewe himselfe a father towrdes vs. And therewithall we must bee hilde in his feare, that wee may preuent all the vengeance which we see too light vpon the wicked, and vpon the despisers of his maiestie.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of oure good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs feele them in such wise, as we may learne to bee sorie for them, yea and to be angrie and greeued at our vices, and sinfull lustes, so as wee may seeke earnestly too haue his righteousnesse raigne in vs, and too bee refourmed too his holy will, and that moreouer forasmuche as wee haue too fight agaynst the temptations of this present life, hee will give vs armour to defende our selues withall, that althoûgh wee knowe much miserie and wretchednesse in our selues, yet we may not doubt but that he will vphold vs, and supplie our wantes by his grace, according as we knowe that all perfection of vertue and goodnessse is in him, too give the same vnto vs, according as hee knoweth vs too haue neede. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also to all people and nations of the earth, bringing back all poore ignorant soules, &c.

The Cxl. Sermon, which is the second vpon the xxxvij. Chapter.

6. He quickneth not the vvicked, but giueth iudgement to the afflieted.
7. He vvill not turne his eyes avvay from the righteous, he vvill set kings in their seates and they shall bee exalted for euer.
8. If they be in the stockes, and bound vvith the cordes of affliction.
9. Hee vvill shew vthem their faultes, and make them feele their sinnes, and they shall bee touched vvith them.
10. He vvill open their eare to the ende to amendethem: he vvill speake vnto them, and make them depart from iniquitie.
11. If they heare him and obey him, they shall passe their dayes in prosperitie, and their yeares in glorie.
12. If they heare not, they shall passe by the syvorde, and be consumed vvithout knovledge.
13. The hypocrites of heart do putto vvrath: they crie not euuen vwhen they be bounde.
14. Therefore their soule shall die in youth, and their life among the vyhorciongers.

After that Eliu hath generally sayde that God turneth not his eyes from the righteous, but hath a care of him : and contrarywise, that hee quickneth not the wicked : he addeth particularly for the better prooфе of Gods prouidēce, that he giueith judgement to the afflicted. For if a poore man that is utterly deſtitute of ſuccour, and an outcast in the world, is neuertheleſſe deliuereſ from vexation and trouble : the ſame muſte needeſ proceſſe of God, yea I ſay, it muſte needeſ be fathered vpon God. For if we haue no ſtay in the worlde, and yet haue ſtrong and mighty en-emyeſ : what iſ to be ſayd, but that we are vndone, and that there iſ no more hope of our life? Then iſ we recouer, it iſ manifest that God worketh in that behalfe. So, it iſ not without cauſe that Eliu doth purpoſely ſet downe this ſaying for a prooфе that God gouerneth all thiŋgs here beneath. Also he ſetteth downe a ſecond example of Gods prouideſce : namely the gouernment of Princes and of men that ſit in the ſeate of iuſtice : wherein wee perceyue that God iſ righteous, and that he will not haue thingſ to be out of order. And althoſ there be not a continual rate evenly kept at all tymeſ (as was declared yesterday) yet notwithstanding when wee ſee that there iſ any order in the world, therein we may ſee as it were in a glaſſe, that God hath not ſo lette looce the reyneſ to all confuzion, but that he doth ſtill ſhewe vs ſome ſigne and token of hiſ iuſtice. And vndoubtedly iſ a man conſider on the one ſide what the nature of man iſ : and on the other ſide after what maner the gouerners and maſtrates and ſuſh as haue the ſwoorde of iuſtice in their hand do diſcharge themſelues : he ſhall ſee and eaſely diſcerne it to be a miraicle of God that there iſ any common weale amongſ vs, yea and we muſt needeſ know iſ and perceyue it. I ſay that the nature of men iſ ſuſh, that every man would be a Lord and Maſter ouer hiſ neyghbores, and no man by hiſ good will would be a ſubieſt. Seing then that our Lord ſuffereth not the ſtrongeſt to preauyle, but that there iſ ſome feate and obediēce towards thoſe that are in preheminenſe : therein iſ to be ſene, that God doth not onely brydle, but also fetter mens nature, to the ende that the ſayd prydē auance not iſelfe ſo high, but that publicke gouernment ſhould bee aboue iſ. And a-gayne wee ſee that ali men are giuen to euill, and their juſteſ are ſo boylng, that every man would haue libertie to do as he liſt, and no man be vnder correction. Therefore it iſ to bee conſiuded that the ſtate of gouernment commeth of God, and that therein hee ſheweth that hiſ creatieng of men was to the end they ſhould behaue theſelues honeſtly and modeſtly. And for the ſecond poyn̄t, we ſee how Kings and Princes and ſuſh as are of meaneſ ſtate, behaue themſelues when God hath armed them with the ſwoorde of iuſtice, and how they turne al thiŋgs upſide downe, in ſomuch that it ſeemeth that they intended to ſpite God, and to diſanull hiſ ordinaunce. Now if they which ought to maynteyne peafeably the order that God hath ſet, inforce themſelues to ouerthrowe iſ, and fight as it were of ſet purpose to bring thiŋgs to confuzio-n: and yet for all that the ſtate of gouernement continueth ſtill in the world, and thiŋgs are not ſo utteſt confounded, but that there abide ſtill ſome marks of the thiŋg that God had ſtabliſhed: Is it not too be ſene therein, that God is double righteous? And therefore it iſ not without cauſe, that Eliu, after hee hath ſpoken of the ſuccoring of the poore by God, addeth immeadiately one other kinde, namely that God ſtabliſhetb Kings, and that not for one day, but too the intent that the ſame order ſhould ſtand for ever in the world. True iſ that there are many chaungeſ off and on, and that there fall great alterations vpon Principalities and Lordſhippes : and thereiſ God ſheweth alſo that iſ hiſ office to pull downe the prowde. But yet neuertheleſſe, euen in deſpite of men and of all their rage, there ſhall ſome order remayne (till here bylowe, I ſay euen in reſpecte of tyrants). If a King reygne wrongfully, ſo as hee be a despizer of God, and full of crueltie, outrage, and vnsatiabie couetouenſe : yet notwithstanding he muſte bee fayne to keepe ſome ſhadowe and countenance of iuſtice, and hee cannot go beyond it. VVhereof commeth that, but biſeue God ſheweth hiſelfe there? And therefore lete vs leaue to proſite our ſelues in ſuſh wiſe by the thiŋgs that are ſeene in thiſ world, as God may be glorified at our hands, as he deſerueth : and ſpecially when wee ſee him deliuere the poore that are utteſt oppreſſed, & nother haue, nor hope for any ſuccour at mens hands : lete vs there conſider hiſ migitie power and goodneſſe, and diſpoze our ſelues to yeeld him hiſ due prayze. This (ſay I) iſ the thiŋg that we haue to note. Howbeit herewithall, to the intent to proue our ſelues to be Gods childefl, lete vs beware that we lend our helping hand to ſuſh as are wrongfully perſecuted, & that according to the abiitie which God giueith vs, we do ſuccour ſuſh as are trode vnder foote, & haue no means to reuenge or beare out themſelues. VVee muſt (I ſay) do our indeuer in that behalf, and ſtreyne our ſelues to iſ in good earnest. Secondly, ſith we ſee gouernours and men of authoritiſ ſo froward and ſpitefull, and yet notwithstanding that God ſuffereth them not to fall quite out into all disorder : there lete vs humble our ſelues to honour hiſ prouideſce, affiuring our ſelues that if he reſtreyneſ not their wickedneſſe, we ſhould be ouerwhelmed with an horrible fludde, and all ſhould bee swallowed vp and drowned out of hand. Therefore it behoueth vs to magniſie God in that we ſee there remayneſ ſome iuſtice & good order, although that ſuſh as are reygne and holde the ſwoord in their hand, be utteſt wicked and giuen to all naughtineſſe. So then, lete vs conſider the ſame, and lete vs (aſmuch as in vs iſ) maynteyne the order of iuſtice, for ſo much as iſ a ſoueraine benefit that God bestoweth vpon mankinde, and that therein alſo iſ hiſ will to haue hiſ prouidēce knowne vnto vs. And ſith we ſee that Princes and Maſtrates and all officers of iuſtice are ſo far out of ſquare : lete vs be ſory to ſee the order ſo peruerted which God had dedicated to the welfare of men : & not only lete vs abhor ſuſh as are the enmyeſ of God, & withstand the order of gouernment which he had ſet ouer the: but alſo lete vs know, that they be the frutes of our ſins, to the intent we may impute the fault & cauſe of the whole miſchieſ to our own ſelues. Thus ye ſee what we haue to remeber in thiſ text. Now lete vs come to that which Eliu addeth : He ſayeth that if the good men, or elſe if the great men of whom he had ſpoken, whom God had exalted to high degree and dignitiſ aboue the reſt of the world, bee at any time ſet in the ſtockes : I ſay if they be at any time brought downe, euen to ſhame and reproch, ſo as men put them in pryon and fetter them, and they be tied to confuzion with coardeſ : yet notwithstanding God forſaketh the not in ſuſh necessitiſ, but maketh them to ſeele their ſinneſ, and telleth them the faults that they haue comiſſed, to the end that vpon knowledge of them, they may amend them & returne into the right way, and he openeth their eareſ, to the end they ſhould bethinke theſelues the better, and know theſelues. Eliu then ſheweth here, that where God ſeemeth vnto vs to ſhet hiſ eyes, and to regard no-more the gouerning of men : he hath iuft cauſe ſo to do : and that although wee thinke it ſtrange, yet muſte wee Vu. acknow-

acknow'edge that he is iuste and righteous in all his doings, and that wee haue cause to glorifie him. Truly it behoueth vs to beare continually in minde all the things that haue bene treated of heretofore : that is to wit, that things are not ruled in this worlde all after one rate, and that God reserueth a great part of his iudgements which he intendeth too execute, vnto the latter day, too the intent that wee should alwayes liue in hope, wayting for the comming of our Lorde Iesus Christe. And it muste suffice vs to haue some tokens whereby to perceyue the things that are tolde vs here.

Nowe then, the intent of Eliu is to preuent a stumblingblocke that menne might conceyue, when they see good and righteous folkes trampled vnder foote, and God layeth them open too the tyrannie of the wicked, and the worlde troubleth them without cause, so as although they haue not done any bodie wrong, yet neuerthelesse menne ceasse not too molest them. For when wee see that : it seemeth too vs that God thinketh not vpon the worlde, ne looketh so farre as vnto vs, but letteth fortune alone with the rule of all things : Lo how our eyefight is immediatly dazeled at the beholding of things that are out of order, and there is nothing more easie with vs than to stumble. For this cause Eliu sheweth vs here, that although good menne be persecuted, or else if such as were aduaunced too great estat bee ouerthrowne, so as God seemeth to confounde heauen and earth togither : wee muste not therefore bee to sore dismayed in our mindes. And why ? For God hath some iuste reason to do it, which wee be not able too conceyue at the firste brunt. But lette vs tarie with pacience, and wee shall knowe that God will make such afflictions to do vs good, and that they tende to a good ende. And why ? For then (sayeth hee) doth God shewe them their sinnes that are so tormented, and maketh them to perceyue what they be : & that is to the end to bring them to good amendment.

Nowe then, here wee see, firsste of all that wee muste not deeme things by outward appearance, but gage deeper & seeke the cause that moueth God to do the things which wee thinke straunge at the first sight. It seemeth cleane contrarie to all reason, that a good man should bee so persecuted, and that euery man should ouertūne him : howbeit God knoweth why he doth it. Therefore wee must haue an eye to the end, & not be to hastie to shoothe foorth our verdit at the first dash, as they do which iudge at all auentures. Now then wh<sup>c</sup> is the ende of our afflictions ? It is to make vs to perceyue our sinnes : and it is a very notable poynt, whereof wee may gather a very profitable lesson. True it is that we heare it oftentimes spoken of : neuerthelesse we cannot heare of it to much : for we know that afflictions are so irksome to vs, that euery of vs falleth to chasing as soone as wee feele any strype of the rodde at Gods hande, and wee cannot comfort our selues nor keepe our selues in pacience. And therefore so much the more behoueth it vs to marke well this doctrine, that when God suffereth vs to bee vexed euen wrongfully as in respect of the world : euen then doth he worke our welfare, in that it is his will to make vs feele our sinnes, and to shew vs what we be. For in time of prosperitie wee be blinde : and surely wee shall not know a right what is conteyned here, vnlesse God bring vs too it by his chastizements. Are wee at our ease and in pleasure ? Euery of vs falleth asleepe and flattereth himselfe in his sinnes, in somuch that our prosperitie is as a drunkennesse to cast our soules into a dead sleepe. And (which worse is) when God letteth vs alone in peace, although wee haue offended him a thousand wayes : yet we ceasse not to sooth our selues, bearing our selues in hande that we be in his fauour, & that he loueth vs because he scourgeth vs not.

Yee see then that menne cannot perceyue their owne sinnes, if they bee not driuen by force to knowe them selues. And therefore seing that prosperitie maketh vs drunken after that sort, and that when we be at rest, euery man flattereth himself in his sinnes : it standeth vs vpō to suffer God patiently to scourge vs. For affliction is the true schoolemistresse to bring men to repentance, to the ende they may condemne themselues before God, and being so cōdemned learne to hate their sinnes wherin they weltered afore. Therefore, when wee knowe the frute of the chastizements that God sendeth vs, wee will bear them with a meelder and quietter minde than wee do. But it is a piteous case to see howe rechelesse wee are, bycause wee know not that God procureth our welfare by afflicting vs after that maner. Furthermore lette vs marke well, that wee muste not iooke vpon the visible hande of God for the feeling of our sinnes. For it may come to passe, that God will giue menne the brydle, so as they shall persecute vs, yea euen vniustly, when wee shall not haue done them any wrong. But yet euen in that case it behoueth vs to learne, that God calleth vs vnto his schoole. For his forbearing too smyte vs with his owne hande, and putting of vs into the handes of the wicked, is too tame vs and meeken vs the better : and then doth hee put vs too the more shame. Then if the wicked haue their full scope, so as it lyeth in their bande to torment vs, and they doo the worst that they can vnto vs : It is all one as if God shoulde tell vs, that wee bee not woorthie to bee beaten of his owne hand, and that he intendeth to shame vs. So much the more therefore must wee bee prouoked too thinke vpon our sinnes, and too bee sorie for them, and therewithall too marke how Eliu addeth, that God dooth then open our eares. That saying betokeneth twoo things in the holy Scripture. For sometimes it signifieth but too speake too vs : and sometimes it signifieth too touche our hearts in such wise as we heare what is sayde too vs. God therefore openeth our eares, when hee sendeth vs his woerde, and causeth the same to bee seide before vs : and agayne hee openeth our eares, or hee vncouereth or vnstoppeth them (for the Hebrewe woerde doth conueniently imprese as much) when hee suffereth vs not to bee deafe too his doctrine, but giueth it enterance into vs, to the ende wee may receyue it and bee moued with it, and that the power therof may shewe it selfe. These (I say) are the two sortes of opening our eares, which wee dayly perceyue God to vse towards vs.

Also hee openeth the eares of those whom hee afflieth, in that hee giueth them some signe of his wrath, thereby too teache them to bethinke themselues better than they haue done. If a man demaunde, what then ? doth not God speake too vs when wee bee in prosperitie ? Yes surely doth he : but his voyce canot come vnto vs : for we be fraughted aforhad with our owne delights and worldly affections. And vndoubtedly wee see, that when men haue their fill of good cheere, and may make merry at their owne pleasure, and liue in helth and welth, they ouerioy theselues. There is none other talke with the then, but of sporting : in such wise as God is no more heard among them. But afflictions are messengers of his wrath, and then are wee touched with greefe for offending him, so as we call our selues home againe. And so afflictions muste generally serue for instruction to such as receyue the, so as they may drawe homeward vnto God, from whom they haue hilde themselues aloose before.

Marke

b.7.

Marke that for one poynt. Yet notwithstanding men suffer not themselues to be gouerned by God, vntill he haue softened their harts by his holy spirite, and opened the passage for the warnings that he giueth, and perced mens eares that they may yelde them to his seruice and obedience, as it is sayd in the Psalme. This is it which we haue to marke. And therefore when wee be afflicted, first let vs remember, that it is all one as if God should speake vnto vs and shewe vs our sinnes, and indited vs to the intent to drawe vs to repentance. Howbeit forasmuch as wee be dull vpon the spurre, or (which more is) wee bee vtterly stubborne and deafe vnto all the warnings that he giueth vs : It behoueth vs to pray him too perce our eares, and to open them in such wise to his instructions, as the same may turne to our profite ; and that he suffer not the ayre onely to be beaten, without touching of our heart : but that he moue vs too come and returne vnto him. Otherwyse let vs be sure wee shall do nothing but chafe at him, and reject his corrections : according as experience sheweth in moste men, that such as are smitten with Gods scourges amende not for all that, but rather wexe worse and woorse. Then sith wee see such examples, let vs learne that all is to no purpose till God open our eares, that is to say, till he haue made vs to heare him speake to vs by the woorking of his holy spirite, and also to obey him in that which wee haue so heard. Lo what we haue to marke vpon this streyne. Now he addeth immediatly, that if they beare and obey, they shall spende their dayes in weale, and their yeres in glory : but if they berken not too him, they shall passe by the swoorde, and dye. Without 30 knowledge. Here Eliu sheweth vs yet better, the profite that wee haue by being in aduersitie. It is vndoubtedly a great benefite, and which cannot bee sufficiently valued, when we be drawne to repentance, and that whereas we were in the high way to damnation, our Lord bringeth vs backe to himselfe. I say it is a thing that ought to asswage all the sorrowe of our afflictions. Howbeit there is yet much more in it : namely that our Lorde sheweth vs by prooef, how profitable the same is for vs, to the end wee may be deliuerned from our aduersities and succored by him, and he shew himselfe fauorable to vs by that meanes. Seing then that all this is found by experience : haue wee not cause to be glad when God deliuerneth vs after that sorte ? For if he shoulde suffer vs to be sortid in the pleasures of this worlde, in the ende wee would growe paste grace, and therefore he is fayne to remedie it in due season. And if he do it by afflicting vs, and therupon deliuerneth vs to the intent wee should perceyue his hande : is it not a singular prooef of his fauour, and of our fayth ? If God should suffer vs to welte in our own filthinesse and 50 to settle in our owne lees (as the Prophets terme it) wee would rotte away as I haue sayde afore : and besides that, we would not esteeme his grace towards vs to be such as he sheweth it by taking vs out of the aduersities wherevnto we were fallen. Lo here a double benefitte that redoundeth vnto men by Gods correcting them after that manner. For first and foremost they be brought backe vnto him : and secondly they perceyue his fatherly goodnesse when they be deliuerned by this grace. Thus yee see what wee haue to marke in this streyne. Nowe a man might demaund, yea, is it so ? are we sure that Gods intent is to drawe vs to repentance, when hee scourgeth vs himselfe, or when he suffereth vs to be troubled by men ? VVhat can wee tell whither his purpose and will be such or no ? Herewnto we answere : In asmuch as wee see that afflictions last but for a time, and God deliuerneth vs from them : lette vs understand thereby, that he mindeth not 60 to vndo vs vterly, but is contented that wee be beaten downe and humbled vnder his hande. But if our neckes be of brasse to withstand him, so as wee will not bowe for the corrections that he sendeth vs : wee do nothing else but continually double his strokes. Then on the contrary parte, if wee feele our sinnes so, as wee crave forgiuenesse of them, and hee perceyue vs to bee rightly touched : then maketh he our aduersities too turne to a wholesome medicine to vs, and therupon he deliuerneth vs from them.

VVee see all this (I say) euен with our eyes. So then lette vs not grudge any more when wee see God sende such troubles into the worlde, neither lette vs bee offended at it as though hee had his eyes shet. For he knoweth well ynough what he doth, and hee hath an infinite wisedome which appeereth not too vs at the firste dash : and in the end we shal see that he hath dispozed things in good order and measure. Also lette vs learne herewithall, not to be too much greeued when wee bee afflicted after that manner, assuring our selues that God doth by that meanes further our saluation.

Agayne, would wee bee healed when wee bee so in trouble and payne ? would wee haue a good and desireable ende of them ? Then lette vs folow the way that is shewed vs here, namely to heare and obey. How to heare ? By beyng taught when God holdeth vs as it were in his schoole, so as our afflictions may bee as many instructions to resort vnto him. Then let vs heare these things, and lette not that slippe out of the one eare which entered in at the other : but lette vs obey, that is to say, lette vs yelde God such obedience as wee ought to do : and lette vs not seeke any thing else than to frame our selues wholly vnto him. Lo by what meanes wee may bee ridde of our aduersities. But what ? wee muste not maruell though menne linger in payne, yea and bee plundged dayly deeper and deeper in their miseries : for which of them giueth ears vnto God when hee speaketh ? It is apparent what a number are afflicted and tormented, and it is evident that Gods scourges are occupied euerywhere now adayes. But how fewe are there that thinke vpon them ? Yee shall see a whole Realme oppressed with warres till they can no more : and yet shall ye scarce find a dozen men among a hundred thousand, that heare God speake. Belold, the yerkes and lashes of his whippes do sounde and roare in the ayre : there is horrible weeping and wayling everywhere : menne crie out alas and wo is mee : and yet of all the whyle they looke not too the hande that smyght them, according as the Prophete Amos. 4. b.6. vpbraydeth the stubbornharted, that whereas they feele the strokes, yet they perceyue not Gods hande. VVee see the lyke in plague times and dearth. So then, is it any woondre if God sende incurable woundes, and put that thing in vre which is sayde by the Prophete Esay : namely that from the sole of the foote to the crowne of the head, there is not any soundnesse at all in this people, but all is like a leprosie, so as they bee rotten and filthie ; and their sores past recoverie ? Is this to be wondered at, seing that now adayes menne are so thanklesse to Godward, that they shet him out of the doores ; and will not heare him that they might obey him ? wherefore whensoeuer we be beaten with Gods scourges, let vs learne to come by and by vnto him, and to herken to the warnings that he giueth vs, so as we may feele our sinnes & mislike of them. That done : lette vs be hartely sorie for them, to the ende it may please him to have pitie vpon vs. If wee go to woorke after that sorte, God will not forgette his owne charge of instructing vs and of deliuering vs from all our aduersities. But if wee will needs play the restle lades, bee will hamper vs well ynough, according as it is sayd here, that we shall passe by the swoorde and bee consumed without knowledge, that is to say, in our owne folie. VVhereas it is sayde that wee shall passe by the swoorde: the meening is that the woundes shall bee vtterly vncurable, so as we must hope no more for any healing, for there shall be nomore remedie for vs. If wee be not wilfull when God warneth vs of our faults: he will shewe himselfe a good Phisition towards vs in purging vs of them, at leastwise if wee bee not past amendment. But if there be nother reason nor amendment in vs, so as we chawe vpon the bridle without feeling of our sinnes to be sorie for them: lete vs assure our selues that all the afflictions of this worlde shall be deathfull vnto vs. If wee learne not to returne vnto God when he calleth vs, and giueth vs space of repentance, that is too say, if wee come not in tyme conuenient, and enter when the gate is open to vs: I say if we do not so: all the chastizements that were giuen vs for our welfare, do turne to our greater damnation, and they muste be as many summonings, insomuch that the fulnesse of all miserie muste bee accomplished vpon vs. So muche the more must wee be thinke our selues, that wee prouoke not such vengeance of God vpon vs wilfully. For is it a small matter that it is sayd to vs, that the wiifull sorte must be wounded by Gods owne hand, namely because menne (asmuch as is possible) do defie him and will not yeeld vnto him when he is so fauourable to them as to warne them, and giueth them an enterance vnto him? And in good soote, when menne checke at God in that wise, is it not an open defying of him? Is it not a treading of his grace vnder foote? But God cannot away with such spitesfulness: for (in his Prophete Esay) he sweareth by his owne maiestie, that when menne make a scorning and say, lete vs eate and drinke when God calleth them to repente: it is a sinne that shall never be blotted out. Beholde I say, God is so displeased with that sinne, as hee sweareth that hee will beare it in remembrance for euer. So much the more therefore ought it to prouoke vs to humble our selues, when God giueth vs any forewarning: assuring our selues that he procureth our welfare in that behalf, to the end we should not shake off his yoke when he intendeth to lay it vpon vs, nor beate backe the strokes of his roddes which hee giueth vs, as though he smote vpon a Stith. And it is sayd exprefly, that such as giue no eare vnto God shall die without knowledge, that is to say, their owne folly shall vndo them. This is sayd to the end that men should be left without excuse. Trye it is that wee will shewd our selues with ignorance when we go about to qualifie our faults, or else to wipe them quite away. VVee will say, I thought no such thing, I wist not of it. But let vs learne to know that when any mention is made of mens ignorâce: it is to condemne them the more because they played the beasts and had no reason at all in them. And euen so doth the Prophet Esay speake thereof. The very cause (sayeth the Lord) why Hell is open, and why the graue swalloweth vp all things, and why all my people are consumed, is for that they had no knowledge. God complayneth there of the sinners for casting themselues wilfully into destruction: and therewithall sayeth that that befell them for want of knowledge: yea but immediatly he vprebaydeth the Lewes that they were become brutish. For the Lorde on his behalf doth sufficienly warne vs, that it is long of none but of our selues that we be not well taught. Truly God is a good scholemayster, but we be ill scholers. God speaketh to vs, & we be deafe: or els we stoppe our eares to the intent we would not heare him. So then, the ignorance whereof Eliu speaketh here, is wilfull, because men cannot finde in their hearts that God should poynct them their lesson, or teach them to come vnto him, but had leuer to folow continually the common trace, and therefore shet their eyes & stop their eares. Thus ye see an ignorâce that is ful of wilfulnesse and stubbornnesse. Now it is true that for a time the wicked do like well of theselues when they feele not Gods hande. Howbeit it is so much the worse for them, as wee see examples of it day by day. If a man speake to these vnthrifts that are giuen to al naughtinesse, and threaten them with Gods vengeance: they do but nodde their head at it, & make a mocke at it, bearing themselues in hand that it is but a sportingmatter. Againe, they take sermons in scorne, and turne all the holy Scripture into skoffing, to the ende it should haue no more reverence nor autoritie. VVe see this before our eyes. Howbeit, they do always impaire their cace: for surely this saying shal not fall to the ground, namely that whosoeuer will not heare God in affliction, must needs perish without knowledge: that is to say, the ignorance wherin he is ouersettred must cause him to haue the greater fall, and plundge him the deeper in Gods curse. Now sith we see this, let vs learne to be teachable: and assoone as God speaketh, let vs give eare to him and be ready to submit our selues to his woord, and let nothing hinder vs from returning vnto him. This is the thing which we be taught in this sentece. And surely our own nature would otherwise alwayes egge vs to striue against him, as it is sayd here. Furthermore here appeareth més foolishnesse, in that although they will not be counted fooles and vndiuized: yet they labour to excuze themselves by follie and ignorance, when it commeth to the making of their account afore God. But all this shal not auayle them at al. And therfore it stádeth vs the more in hand to labour for humilitie betimes, and to resort to this comfort that God giueth vs when he sayeth, that hee teacheth vs by double meanes. For on the one side he maketh his woord to bee preached vnto vs: & on the other side he beateth vs with his roddes, to the end that every of vs in his own behalfe should be moued to returne into the right way. Therfore let vs haue our eares open to receyue the doctrine that is set afore vs in the name of God, to the end he speake not to deaf folkes, or as it were to blockes of wood. And therwithall also let vs be pacient, to abide the afflictions that he shall send vs: & when any thing falleth not out to our liking, let vs not therfore ceasse to magnifie God and his grace still, assuring our selues that by that meanes he maketh vs to feele our sins, to the intent we should not be so saped in them as to perish. Ye see then that vntesse wee will spite God wilfully after we haue heard his woord, it behoueth vs also to vnderstand what he intendeth by his chastizing of vs, and by sending of aduersities vpon vs, on which side so euer they come: for there shall never happen vs any thing but at his hand. By and by Eliu addeth, that the Hypocrites of heart do put too wrath, and that they crien not when they be bound: that their soule shall die in youth, and that they shall perish with the whoremongers. He sayeth Hypocrites of heart: and why doth he terme them so? He meeneth those that are imbruied with naughtinesse, and haue a backenooke to shrinke into from God, and cannot be drawne to any soundnesse. For wee shall see many poore soules that sinne through ouersight, because they be vncostant, so as they bee easly thrust out of the way, and yet there is no malicious nor rooted wilfulstubbornnesse in them. But there are othersome which are Hypocrites of heart, that is to say, which haue in them the roote of contépt & of all stubbornnesse, so as they mocke God and haue no reverence of his woord, but the Diuell hath so bewitched them, that they condemne the good & follow the cul, or at leatwise allow it, & could find in their harts

Esay. 5. c. 13.

harts to delight in it & to feede it Thretherefore let vs marke well that whereas Eliu speakeſt here of hypocrites of hart : he meeneth ſuch as are ſo wholly giuen ouer vnto Satan, that they not only ſinne through ouerſight, but are ſo wholly framed vnto euill, as that they be fully bent (as they ſay) to doing of miſcheſ and to mocke God: and of ſuch maner of me there are to many exaſples to be ſene. For if a man cōpare thoſe that are vnonconſtant and offend through frayltie, with the wicked & the diſpizers of god: the number of the wicked will be far the greater. And ſo let vs marke, that it is not without cauſe that Eliu calleth them hypocrites of heart, or frowardharted, that is to ſay, vterly giue to extreeme naughtineſſe & malicioſneſſe, ſo as they will not in their aduerſitie by any meanes ſubmit themſelues vnto God, but rather do put to wrath. And let vs marke wel this ſaying of putting to wrath: for it is as muſch as to kindle the fire ſtill more and more, and to throw wood into it to increaſe it. And in good ſooth, what do the froward ſorte when they ſtrive and ſtomacke againgſt God in that wize? Do they amend their caſe and ſtate? Alas, they do but heape vp wood more and more, and the wrath of God muſte neeſes burne the whotter. So then let vs marke, that if we reſiſt Gods chaffizemēts, thinking to beate them backe by our wilfulneſſe & frowardneſſe: we ſhall but increaſe wrath, and Gods curse ſhall augment more and more, till we be vterly cōſummed by it. Now whē we heare this, what haue we to do but to pray God, firſte to purge vs in ſuſh wize, as wee may not haue the ſayd rooted ſtubbornneſſe and priuie ſpitefulneſſe in vs: but that although we haue done amifle through 30 infirmitie, yet there may alwayes bee ſome roote of the feare of god in vs, ſo as we become not vterly paſt amēdment. Also let vs euer indeuer to inure our ſelues to the ſayd soberneſſe and ſinglenesse of hart, to the end we be not ſo ſnarled in our ſinnes, as to like well of them and to foster them. And moreouer let vs marke well, that if wee will worke wyles & pollicies with God, our market ſhall not be amended awbit by it, but we ſhall rather increaſe his wrath towards vs. Ye ſee then that me ought to looke well to the amēding of their euill doings, ſeing that Gods curse ſhal be ſo increased vpō them. And here is expreſſe mention made of the increaſing of Gods wrath, because men thinkt themſelues to be ſcaped, whē God hath deliuered them frō ſome one miſchaūce, for then they think all the worſt is paſt. But wee think not vpon the meanes that are hidden from vs, namely that God will anon after bring foorth new roddes, that he will draw new ſwordes, 10 and that he will ſuddenly thunder vpō vs when we looke not for it. For aſmuch then as wee are not ſufficiently afraſyed of Gods wrath: therefore it is purpoſely ſayd that the ſame increaſeth, and that we heape it more and more vpō vs: in ſo muſch that a hundred thouſand deaths muſt needs wayte vpon vs, when we ſhall haue diſpysed the message which God ſent vs to bring vs backe againe and to guide vs into the right way. Therefore when we ſhall haue diſpized Gods warnings after that ſort, we muſt be ſayne to feele his horriblie vengeance vpon vs, whereaſ o- 20 therwife he protesteth that he is alwayes ready to cōforde ſuch as ſubmit themſelues willingly to his good wiſe.

Now let vs fal downe before the face of our good God • with acknowledgemēt of our faults, praying him that his correcting of vs and our feeling of his ſtripes may not be in vayne, but that we may leaue thereby to returne vnto him, ſo as we may not taric till he ſhewe vs ſome ſigne of his wrath, bu: that for aſmuch as wee be dayly allured by his word. (& that after ſo louing and gēte a fashio as we ſee,) we may not grow hardharted, but rather giue diligēt care to that which he shall ſay, that wee may prevent his judgement: and that whenſoever he liſteth to execute a ny rigour vpon vs for our ſinnes, wee may nor therefore ceaſe to have an eye continually to his promiſſe, and to hope that after he hath made vs to feele our owne miſeries, he will deliuer vs from them, namely vpon condition that wee leaue to be ſorie for them and to forſake them. That it may please him to graunt this grace not onely to vs, but also to all people and nacions of the earth, &c.

The.cxlj Sermon, which is the third vpon the. xxxvj Chapter.

15. He ſetteth aside the poore in their affliſtion, and openeth their eares in their oppreſſion.
16. Truly he vould plucke thee out of the mouth of diſtreſſe & ſet thee in a large place, vvhile there ſhould be no ſtrayghtneſſe: and the reſte of thy table ſhould be full of fat.
17. Thou haſte filled the iudgement of the vvicked: but yet ſhall iudgement and iuſtice holde out.
18. For beholde the vvrath, to the ende that he deſtroy thee not vvithe thine abilitie, and that the multitude of giftes deliuer thee not.
19. He vvill not regard thy greatnessſe, nor all thy prouision, nor all thy force.

E haue ſene heretofore, that men gayne nothing by ſtriving againgſt God, but rather impaire their caſe. For their hardhartedneſſe increaſeth Gods vengeance, and kindleth the fire of it more and more. And now moreouer it is ſayd for a conuincional, that ſuch as wil neeſes play the rebelles after that maner againſt God, ſhall dye in the florie of their youthe and with the vboronongers: as if a man ſhould ſay in our common language, looke vpon yonder vile ribaualde, he will be hanged. Euen ſo is it ſayd that the diſpizers of God ſhall die with all their ſtrength. For when they fee themſelues at their eaſe, they be full of fiercenſeſſe & pride: but yet ſhall God conuife them well ynough. And Eliu doth new againe ſet downe that which he had ſayd afore: namely, that God of eneth the eares of thoſe whom he affiſſ*eteb.* And not without cauſe is this reſeted for aſmuch as it is hard to make me beleue it, & yet notwithstanding we may well coniider that this doctrine is more than neceſſary for vs. For afflictions are hard and cōberſome to vs, in ſo muſch that we chafe & fret and cannot abide Gods hand: but rather thinkt he doth vs wrōg, bycauſe we know not the ſiute that commeth of it. Therefore it cannot be told vs to oft, that God openeth mes eares when he affiſſeth the: and for the ſame cauſe it is ſayd also, that God ſetteth them aside [or ſholeth the out] in affliction. True it is that ſome tranlate it Deliuer, according alſo as it is taken in that ſenſe. Howbeit it is not ment here that God taketh them out of their affliction, but it is ſette downe in [or by] affliction. So then it is a ſimilitude that Eliu vſeth: as if hee ſhoule ſay, that God ſholeth out and gaſtereth to himſelfe thoſe whom he chaffizeth, bycauſe that when menne are in proſperitie, they wander and dote in their owne imaginacions : but as soone as God layeth his hand vpon them, and maketh them to feele his rigor : it is all one as if he shoulde take them aside to himselfe, to shew them their faults, and to bring them to repentance. Now we see in effect what Eliu ment to say . And let vs marke well, that the opening of mens eares by affliction, is bycause that whyle wee liue in ease and pleasure, our eyes are blindfolded, according as the Psalme sayeth, that when men are in prosperitie, their eyes strout with fatnesse, so as they see not a whit : and therefore they be vtterly sotted in their sinnes. Also wee haue our eares stopped in prosperitie, and cano not heare a whit : and therfore our Lord had neede to open them with afflictions. Truly this doctrine is sufficiently proued by common experiance, and we neede not to fecke any exposition of it as of a darke thing. For we see that such as are not pinched with any aduersitie, cannot away with any correction. Assoone as they are but spoken too, they are in a chafe : and this is to be seene not only in every severall person, but also in the whole bodie of a realme. So long as there is no warre, pestilence, nor famine : we see that if men be rebuked for their sinnes, they murmur at it, and there is nothing but resistance with tooth and nayle. And why so? As I haue sayde, it is because mens eares are stopped with fatnesse, and cannot abide that God shoulde in any wise tell them of their sinnes. Or else if men be not so proude as to striue agaynst admonisments: yet shall it little auayle to speake to them, it is to no purpose to finde fault with them, they passe not for it. VVhy so? For every man is full fraught afrehande with his owne delights and pleasures. To be shorte, wee be nevere touched, till Gods hande nippe vs by chastizing vs. And that is the cause why so many calamities happen to the worlde. For in asmuch as men give no eare vnto God, ne make any account of his woord, longer than he vseth force of hand agaynst them : when he feeth them so puffed vp with pryde, and that he can not otherwise weeld them : he tameth and subdueth folke by mayne force. And yet the same is not ynoch enough at all times : for how many are there to be seene, which resist Gods hand of wilfull stubbornesse, and continue alwayes hardharted, so as they growe woorse and worse when they feele the strypes? And this is too common a thing. But in this place it is precisely spoken of those to whom God intendeth to shewe favour. For in afflicting men, he ameth at twoo endes. As for the reprobates, he purposeth to make them vnexcusablie : and as for the godly, hee intendeth to tame them in such wise, as they may returne to him with a lowly mind. So then, in this sentence there is no mention made, but of such as God will not suffer to perishe, and for that cause doth he chastize them. Nowe if it be needfull that God shoulde worke so towards his chosen : what had he neede to do generally to all mankind? Here is no mention made but of those whom God knoweth and auoweth for his children, and whose saluation he intendeth to procure by gouerning them with his holy spirit : and yet notwithstanding, euē they should haue their eares stopped, and they should be sotted in their owne pleasures, if God drewe them not to himself by afflictions. Therefore let vs learne here, that there is a horrible frowardnesse in our nature. Furthermore although our Lord haue touched vs, so as we haue some good will & desire to come to him : yet let vs be sure that we haue stil neede of this help, namely that our Lord shoulde pricke vs and spurre vs foreward, and by all meanes possible subdue vs to him. And it standeth vs in hand to serue our owne turnes with all the troubles & aduersities that he sendeth vs, so as we may apply them to the sayde vse, assuring our selues that there would be nothing but rebellion in our flesh, if it were not subdewed after that maner. Thus ye see what we haue to beare in minde. Furthermore lette vs learne, not to be stubborne againſt God when he afflieth vs : but ſeing wee know that his intent is to open our eares : let vs pray him that our afflictions may ſo auayle and profit vs, as we may come vnto him, and he make vs to go foreward ſtill in the good way when he hath once brought vs into it. And to bring that to paſſe, let vs learne not to gad after our own lustes, as wee ſee moſt men do, who are caried away, and when God calleth them to him, runne from him, and can finde no way to come to him. Therefore let vs ſet our ſelues aſide, that is too ſay, lette vs as it were bee gathered vnto God, and not be ſo ſotted in our owne vanities and wicked affections, as wee ſee our ſelues to much giuen too them. Thus ye ſee in effeſt what wee haue to remember in this ſentence. Nowe hee addeth immediatly, that God will plucke a man from the brim (it is properly from the mouth) of anguish and afflictio, and ſet him in a large place where he ſhall bee no more in diſtreſſe, and the reſt of his table ſhall be full of fatte. The woord Reſt may be taken as wel for the things that are ſet vpon the table, ſo as it ſhall bee ſorniſhed with all good things: as also for the eafe and quietneſſe that ſhall be at the table. And this is purpoſely ſpoken vnto Job, because he had felt Gods bountiulneſſe: and doubtleſſe Eliu vþbraydeth him with his vñthankefulneſſe. Come on (ſayth he) haſt thou not knowne heretofore that God made thee to proſper? VVhence came all the riches which thou diſdiſt poſſeſſe, but of the bounteouerneſſe which God ſhewed towards thee? And surely he would ſtill ſhew himſelfe the ſame, if thou wart meete to be haſled ſo gently at his hand. It is certayne then that he would go through as he began: but thou haſt performed the iudgement of the wicked. Thou ſeefte then that thou canſt not abide that God ſhould do thee good. Now it is true that Job is accuſed partly wrongfully. Neuertheleſſe it is not without cauſe that Eliu condenmaſt him for grudging againſt God, and telleth him that iudgement and iuſtiſe ſhall hold ouut, notwithstanding all his murmurings. In the meane whyle, wee may gather a god leſſon out of this verſe: which is, that whē God ſcourgeth vs, we muſt cal to minde the good that he hath done vs, to the end we be not troubled, but conſider that the chafizemēts of his hand are not done without cauſe. And that is the poynt also wherevnto Dauid bringeth vs: for after that God had exalted him to the ſeate of the kingdome, and giuen him ſo many viſtories againſt his enimes: whē he came to be extremely afflieted, and it ſeemed that he ſhould be vtterly ouerwhelmed: he acknowledged that for asmuch as we be Gods creatures, it behoueth vs to be in his haſd, that he may diſpoſe of vs at his pleaſure, and wee muſte beare paciently the chafizemēts which he ſendeth. Therfore let vs learne to apply this ſentence to our iuſtrictiō, ſo as when we be beatē with Gods roddes, we may call to minde what benefites he hath beſtowed vpon vs, to the eneſe we may yeeld our ſelues wholly to his will, and ac‐knowleſge it to be good reaſon that hee ſhould turne vs to and fro at his pleaſure. And therwithall, this remebring wil alſo ſerue to affwage our greefes: for if we had neuer felt other than rigor at Gods haſd, we would be ſo far out of pacience in our afflictions, as wee ſhould haue no heart to call vpon God, or to flee to him for refuge. But when wee knowe that hee hath ſhewed himſelfe a father towards vs, and drawne vs to him by gentlenesse: then ma‐keth he vs to feele, that ſuche as truſt in him and ſuffer themſelues to be gouerned by his haſde, are happy. Thus ye ſee what giueth vs courage and comfort, euē in the middes of all our troubles. And therfore let vs marke well, well, that when wee be pinched with aduersities and afflictions, the things that wee feele presently muste not so amaze our wittes, that we should not thinke vpon Gods goodnesse, and vpon the comforts that he hath giuen vs. For it were a goulfe of hell to thinke vpon nothing but our present chastizements. VVhat then? Lette vs mingle Gods goodnesse with his rigour. Haue we receyued good at Gods hand? Then lette vs not cease to flee vnto him when he afflicthe vs, hoping that he will bring our troubles to a good end, seing he hath made vs to feele already by experience, that such as do so referre themselues vnto him, do finde him a good and pitifull father. Thus yee see what the holy Ghost ment to teache vs here by the mouth of Eliu. Nowe let vs come to the verse where it is sayde, that Job had fulfilled the judgement of the wicked. True it is that these woordes may also be taken, as though it were sayd, that he had filled iustice and iudgement, with the iudgements of iniquitie. But the true meening is, that Job had overshot himselfe so farre, as to cupple himselfe with wicked men. Neuerthelesse, this is not ment of his life, as though he had bene a theefe, a whoremöger, or a murtherer, or as though he had bene a blasphemer or a looce liver: Eliu ment none of all those things: but the meening is, that Job had not glorified God in his aduersities, but had repyned to much against him, yea and had gone aboue to exalte himselfe, as though God had done him wrong, and vsed crueltie towards him. Thus ye see wherein Job is condemned here. Not that he had led a leude life: but for that he had not borne his aduersitie paciently ynough. And that is called a fulfilling of the judgement of the wicked, that is to say, an agreeing to their fashions and enormities. For wee haue also to note, that nothing is more precious vnto God, than the glorie of his owne name. True it is, that when menne give themselues, some to whoredome, some to outrage, and some to gluttonie: therein Gods iustice is impeached, and the order that hee hath set among vs is peruerced and broken: and (as much as in vs lieth) Gods maiestie is alwayes defaced. But yet notwithstanding, when a man blasphemeth God openly, and humbleth not himselfe vnder his hand: no doubt but it exceedeth all other sinnes, and is to bee condemned more greeuously. Therefore wee ought to marke well this streyne, where Job is vpbrayded with fulfilling the judgement of the wicked. Now, that we may take the more profite of this sentence: it behoueth vs to marke firste of all, that as soone as a man steppeth out of the way, streytwayes he beginneth to intagle himselfe with the wicked, and (as much as he can) bereeueth himselfe of Gods grace. Howbeit we stumble not so grostly at the first brunt. For it will seeme vnto vs that the faultes bee but meane. But in the end we runne so farre as to blasphem God, and to despize him in such sort, as the very Diuell himselfe shall stirre vs agaynst him, and we shall be inflamed as it were with a rage or madnesse to spite him, and that cannot be done but to our destruction. Lo what befalleth vnto men. But as for Job, it was not so with him. For he had liued so holily, that he was as a mirrour of angelical perfectio. VVhe haue seene what he hath protested heretofore: namely how he had bene the defender of the fatherlesse, the maynteyner of the widowes, the eye of the blinde, the foote of the lame, that his table had bene free for al poore folkes to come vnto, that he had clothed the naked with the woull of his sheepe, & that he had not abused his credite to oppresse any body withall, although he had the world at will, and might haue done many extortio. And yet notwithstanding we see he overshot himselfe when God hand pressed him with such vehemécie. VVhat a thing is it then if we despite God wittingly and willingly, as I tolde you euernow that when men steppe out of the way, forthwith (as much as in them is) they separate themselves from God, and take the high way to cast themselves into Satans snares? Therefore let vs take good heede to our selues, and though we haue liued never so rightuously: let vs be sure that if wee be not hilde still by the grace of God and by his holy spirit, we shall soone giue him the slip, in somuch that wee shall be as good as giuen ouer, euern in the turning of a hand. And if there be such frayltie in vs that wee may so soone fall into euill: what shall become of vs when wee shall haue gone forward & continued a long time in prouoking Gods wrath, and (asmuch as lay in vs) quite quenched the light of his holy spirit? VVherefore let vs bethinke vs well to walke in such feare, that vpon knowledge of our owne feeblenesse, wee may not be blinded with any presumption, but rather pray God to guyde vs and hold vs with his mighty hand, and not suffer vs in any wise to fall: And that if he happen to suffer vs to swarue, he neuerthelesse so hold vs vp, as we may not come to the full poynt of iniquitie, but that as soone as we shall haue done amisse, we may by and by be sorie, and flee to his mercie. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this verse. And that we may be hild the better in the feare of God: lette vs marke well, how Eliu addeth, that judgement and iustice shall hold on still. As if he should say, that men may well play the mad bedlems, but yet shall God continue still in his full state, and in the end (of force) become their iudge. Though men aduaunce themselues never somuch, yet shall they not for all that come vnto the maiestie of God. VVhe may well take cousell agaynst him: but we shall neuer attayne so high. And although we could plucke the Sunne out of the skie: yet could we not touch God. Therfore let vs learne, that here men are warned, not to skirmish agaynst God as they are wont too do, as though they were able to ouermatch him and to get the vpper hand of him: for we know that (as it is told vs here) iudgement & iustice shal hold their owne still. Now that we see the intent of Eliu, lette vs apply his sayings to our vse. I haue told you already, that men make no boanes at all to pleade against God. And why so? For they measure him by the knowledge that they haue of themselues, and conceyue not the infinite maiestie that is in him: for that would soone dash all their prattle. And therfore whësoever we be tempted to set our selues against God, and to grudge against his iustice: let it come to our remembrance, to thinke what we shall gayne by it. For yet shall iudgement and iustice hold out still: that is to say, we cannot let that God should not reigne, nother can we further our deuice at al against him. So then, seing that Gods iustice is infinite, and that his iudgements shall continue evermore in full strength & force: what remayneth for vs to do, but to shrinke in our heads, & to submit our selues wholly vnto him? This is it that we haue to beare in minde, if we purpose to receyue good instructio of this text. And lette vs not beguyle our selues with vayne presumption, as we see that most men bleare their own eyes wittully: but let vs yelde God his duetie, that is to wit, a rightuousnesse that cannot bee diminished by vs, and a iustice which wee cannot by any meanes prejudice. VVhen wee haue once concluded that: then shal we be more aduisid and sober than we haue bene woon to be, and wee shall not haue our tungs flied to plead with God, but wee shall with all humilitie acknowledge our faultes, and be sorie that wee haue offended him. And if wee be in trouble: wee shall perceyue that it is for our behoofe to be chastized at his hande, and that that schoole is passing profitable for vs, cosidering that we herken not to his woordes, except hee drieve vs thereto as it were by force.

Thus yee see what we haue to rememb're concerning this lesson. Now it is sayd, that his being angrie, is to the ende that a man shoulde not be confounded in his abilitie: for ther (sayeth he) there were no remedie: he will not passe for golde, nor for siluer, nor for all the force of the world. Lo here a goodly confirmation of that which we haue touched already: that is to wit, that Gods causynge of vs to feele his wrath, is to the end wee should not be vterly destroyed: for if he spare vs, wee do nothing else but harden more and more. VVhen men haue once stepped awry, and God beareth with them: the more that he forbeareth them, the more do they grow brutish. For althoug' that in vsing gentlenesse towards vs, his intent is to winne vs by that meane: yet notwithstanding our nature is so froward, that in steade of comming to him, we dradge still from him. To be short, we see it is to common a thing amog' men, to dally with God when he serfeth them gently, and to do nothing else but mocke at his goodnessse and patience. For asmuch as it is so, God must needes vnter his wrath, or else we should all of vs perish, and his leng forbearing of vs would be an augmenting of our damnation. And that is it which Saint Paule meeneith when he sayeth, that Gods afflictiong of vs is to the end we should not perish with the world. Therefore it behoueth vs to be of good comfort in the middes of our troublis, seing that God hath a regard of our saluation, and procureth the same by shewing himselfe rough towards vs. For we cannot abide that he should be a louing father to vs, and that he should handle vs tenderly: wee abuse his goodnessse continually: and therefore he is fayne to make vs 30 feele his displeasure, or else wee should vterly perishe. This is it in effect which Eliu ment to say. Nowc, wcre this well put in vre, truely it would be no peyne to vs to blisse Gods name in our aduersitie. In steade that wee gnash our teeth, and ecury of vs storneth and thinkeith that God doth vs wrong, or else conceyue such bitternessse as our hearts are shet vp, and we cannot consider our sinnes: wee should bee gentle and meeke, and take pleasure in the minding of Gods gracious goodnessse. But what? Although we confesse this doctrine to be true: yet 40 when it commeth to the putting of it in vre, we shew full well that we haue quite forgotten it. Yet notwithstanding it is not without cause that the holy Ghost doth so often lay afore vs and bring to our remembrance, that Gods shewing of himselfe angrie with vs, i because he loueth vs, and that if he should alwayes shew vs a louing countenance, it woulde ouerthrowe vs and destroy vs. Therefore it behoueth vs to feele his anger effectually. Neuerthelesse, the same is a record of his goodnessse, and a meane whereby he calleth vs to him, to the intent wee 50 should not follow the way of destruction whercinto we were entred. Lo how wee ought to be put in minde of the ende and marke whereat God ameth when he scourgeth vs. Herewithall wee be warned once agayne, howe stubbornour our nature is. Is it not a shame that whereas he would handle vs gently, and as it were dand'e vs in his lappe, we spurne at him with our feete, and scratch him, and (to be shorte) cannot away with such goodnessse and gentlenesse, which he would be readie to vse continually towards vs? Is it not to be sayd that we be of too slauish and churlish a nature? Truely the Scripture auoucheth, that it is Gods nature to be gentle, longsuffering and louing, to beare with the weake, and to shewe mercie althoug' men haue offended him. Seing it is so: surely he transformeth himselfe, and after a sort followeth not his owne nature, when he chastizeth vs and sheweth himself hard and sharpe towards vs. Neuerthelesse he is fayne to vse such roughnesse by reason of our wilful stubborn-nesse, bicause we be wilde beasts, and fling so farre out of square, that when as he would gather vs gently home to himself, we fall by and by to biting of him and to kicking agaynst him. Therefore it behoueth vs to thinke vpon our owne frowardnesse as oft as God vseth any iigour towards vs. And therewithall wee must also take comfort in our aduersitie, for asmuch as wee see that God doth neuer forget his mercie, in somuch that eu'en when he seemeth full minded to thunder downe vpon vs, as he striketh vs with his one hande, so he setteth vs vp agayne with the other: and if he send vs to the graue, it is to list vs vp afterward aboue the heauens. Seing then that God doth in the middes of his anger shew vs his goodnessse & yeelde vs record of it: haue ween't wherewith to comfort our selues in him? And this comfort ought out of hand to engender quietnesse of cōscience. If we be afrayd of Gods rēgour, and thinke that he will destroy vs: then is it vnpossible that we should be pacient. Contrarywise also seing that God sheweth vs that he is not minded to destroy vs vterly, but that he is a father to vs if we flee to him for refuge, and repaire to him with humilitie: the same ought to rid our hearts from all rebelliousnesse and bitternessse, and make vs to submit our selues to his obey-sance, so as wee may say, Lorde, sith thou art so good to mee, suffer me not to striue against thy hand, specially seing it is so fatherly. Thus ye see, that to the end we may be comforted in our afflictions, it behoueth vs to yelde our selues in subiection vnto God, that he may gouerne vs, and to thinke well of his iustice, to the ende that wee kindle not the fire of his wrath more and more through our rebelliousnesse, as hath bene sayde of it afore. And this is sayd purposely: to the end that God do not vterly ouerthrow him and confame him with his abilitie. This serueth to abate mens prude in that they will needes strengthen themselues continually agaynst God's hand. And for that cause Eliu addeth, that there shall be no rauisoming: for we may well bring great presents, but yet shall nother gold nor siluer be able to deliuer vs from the hand of God: but rather the same shall be an occasion to destroy vs. And here wee muste vnderstand, that God intendeth to abate mens aduauncing of themselues against him. For if one man be riche, another in good credite, and a third in good estimation and woorthship: wee make bulwarkes of these things agaynst God, & we thinke our selues well ynough fenced to withstand his hande. Or if wee haue not that foolish conceypte: yet will there alwayes bee some blockishnesse in vs. For vntill such time as men be brought to nothing, so as they knowe there is nother strength nor ought els in them: they thinke themselues able to withstand God. VVhat is to be done then? Let vs learne that all our abilitie is lesse than nothing, specially when wee haue to deale with our God, for he will do no more but blowe vpon it. VVee may well gather togither all the strength in the worlde, not onely which might be in any one man, yea though he were the strōgest that euer was: but also all the strength that is in all creatures aboue and beneath: and yet shall it be nothing woorth at all if wee haue the hand of God agaynst vs. And therefore lette vs marke well, that if we wil humble our selues before God, we must dispatch away all vayne presumptuousnesse, and not thinke wee haue any thing remayning in vs: in so much that although we think we haue some courage and strength in vs for a time, yet it behoueth vs to know that all the same is but a smoke, if it please God to consume vs. And therupon let vs returne vnto God, praying him to giue vs abilitie by his power, that is to say, to make vs to rest alwayes vpon him, knowing that wee hold our life and all the appurtenances thereof, of his onely free goodnessse.

nesse. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in this streyne where it is sayd, that God will destroy men with their abilitie, and that they shall bee consumed notwithstanding all their strength. And whereas it is sayd that there shall be no rauisement: it serueth to expresse the better the thing that we come to say. For although all men graunt, that nother gold nor siluer are able to raunsome a man from the hand of God: yet we see that they fall asleepe in their riches, credit, and such other things. And when they haue graunted that they cannot withstand God: yet doo they make bulwarkes of them, as though they were able to beate backe all harmes, and so they fight agaynst God. How so? whence commeth such presumptuousnesse? Beholde, a worme of the earth, which is but carion and rotteness, aduaunceth it self agaynst God: & must not that needes be a horrible and more than beastly blockishnesse? Yes surely. Specially when a man is riche, so as he thinketh he hath I wote not what to be esteemed for, or that hee would purchase himselfe estimatiō by vaunting himselfe so farre as to lift vp himselfe agaynst God: although he speake not one woerde, yet is he so doted, that he beareth himselfe in hand, that his gold and siluer are able to deliuer him. Then must wee not regard what men confesse with their mouthes: but wee muſte haue an eye to their doings, which giue a true prooſe of the sayde Diuelish prude, namely of trusting in their gold and siluer, and that in steade of putting it to good vſe, they gather ſuch a prude by meanes thereof, that they fall to iuiting agaynst God. Then ſeing it is ſo: it behoueth vs to thinke well therevpon: for the holy Ghost vſeth not here any ſuperfluous ſpeach. True it is that at the firſte biuſhe it may ſeeme needelesſe to tell vs that God regardeſt nother gold nor siluer. For who is he that knoweth not that the very babes haue ſkill to ſay as much. Yea, but in the meane whyle, the wiſteſt (that is too ſay, they that take themſelues to be wiſteſt, and are ſo counted among men) are ſo blinded at euery turne, as they beare themſelues in hand that they may be bought out with gold and siluer. For vnder colour of ſomewhaſt which they haue, for that men feare them and honour them: yee ſhall ſee them ſo beſotted, as they take themſelues no more to be mortall men. They thinke not that God can in one moment ouerthrow them: for if they beleeued that, they ſhouer haue the ſayd diueliſh pride of exaiting themſelues after that fashion agaynst God. Now ſith it iſ ſo: lette vs learne to profit our ſelues better by Gods chaſtizements than we haue done. Furthermore althoſt he ſmyte not vpon vs: yet let vs haue the wit to ſate the better by the corrections which he ſheweth before our eyes. For God vſeth ſuch goodneſſe, as to teach vs by other meshammes, and to ſet ſuch chaſtizements before vs, as may ſerue to our instruction. Therefore let vs thinke vpon it, and not

aduaunce our ſelues agaynst him. Moreouer, ſeing we cannot bring any thing to redeeme our ſelues out of his hand: let vs reſort to the raunſome which he haſ given vs in the perſone of his owne Sonne, according unto as S. Peter telleth vs, that we be not bought with gold nor illuer, but with the precious bloud of the vnsportted Lamb. Thus ye ſee that the poynſt wherevnto we muſt come for the concluding of this text, is that after wee once know that we be bereft of all meanes to ſcape Godſ hand, and <sup>10</sup> that we ſhould of neceſſitie be vitterly conuerted, but that he vſeth pitie towardes vs: wee muſt understand that he hath giuen vs a good remedie, in that it pleased him to offer vp his onely Sonne in ſacrifice for vs: for then were we fully raunſomed, and that is a ſufficient diſcharge to put away all our faults, ſo as the Diuell ſhall not haue any intereſt in vs. For although we were ouerwhelmed with the infinite multitude of our ſinnes: yet notwithstanding if the bloud of Ieſus Christ anſwere for vs, it is a ſufficient ſatisfaction for all our oſences, and ynough to appeaſe the wrath of God. Ye ſee then wherevnto our reſuge muſt bee. But we cannot come to the bloud of Ieſus Christ, vntill wee be bereft of all ſtatelinenſe, as well paſt as to come. Paſt, to the ende wee may conſider that we ſhould vterly periſhe in our ſinnes, & be quite and cleane ouerwhelmed if God had not giuen vs this meane of being purged by the bloud of his Sonne. And to come to the ende, we be no more caried away with ſuch rage, as to lift vp our ſelues agaynst God, as though wee could ſcape his hande, but rather holdie our ſelues in ſuch awe, even with a willing minde, as wee looke not that God ſhoulde cheyne vs vp lyke wilde beaſtes, but as every of vs may bridle himſelfe of his owne accord. Let vs haue ſuch mo-destie in vs, as not to attempt any thing agaynst him: but whenſoeuer it ſhall pleafe him to chaſtize vs, lette euerie of vs thinke thus in himſelfe: Go to, my God chaſtiſeth mee for ſuch a ſinne, and after ſuch a maner: and it behoueth mee to make my proſite of it. Therefore let vs not be deafe when God warneth vs after that fashion: but let vs looke narrowly to our ſelues, and be watchfull according to the examples that he giueth vs, to the intent we growe not paſt grace, and ſo the thing beſal vs which is ſpoken heretofore, namely that wee heape vp continually a greater wrath and a more horrible vengeance of God vpon vs.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our ſinnes praying him to giue vs ſuch repenſance of them, as we may reſort wholly vnto him, to ſubmit our ſelues fully to the guyding of his holy ſpirite, that wee may walke rightly according to his good will, in ſuch wife as his name may be glorified in vs, all our life long. And ſo let vs all ſay, Almighty God our heauenly father &c.

The cxlij Sermon, which is the fourth vpon the xxxvj. Chapter.

20. Conſume not the night to roote out the people vnder them.
21. Keepe thee from turning to iniquitie, for thou haſt chozen it rather than affliction.
22. Behold, God exalteth by his povver, vvhio is like him to teache?
23. VVhom hath he ſet ouer him in his vvayes (or who bath ouerlooked him in his way?) vvhio ſhall ſay vnto him, thou haſte done amifle?
24. Remember thou to magnifie his vvorke vvhich men behold.

I knowe it is a good and profitable thing to thinke vpon Gods workes. And that also is the thing whence wee muſte fetch all our learning and wiſdom through our whole life. But ſpecially in the night time when wee be alone by our ſelues, wee haue leſure to be occupied in applying our mindes to that ſtudie. For we ouerpaffe the things that we ſee a day times: but in the night we thinke vpon them with more leſure and ſettledneſſe, and we comprehend them better. Neuertheleſſe wee muſte keepe a meaſure in musing vpon Gods workes. That is to wit, if they be to high for vs and paſſe the reache of our vnderſtanding, wee muſte ſtoppe there

there and glorifie him, specially when it pleaseth him too conceal the reason of his doings from vs. And that is the cause why he sayeth in the text, that we must not spend the night in musing to much how the people are rooted out vnder them. It is good to seeke how God rooteth out nacions, to the end to learne humilitie. For it behoueth vs to reason in this wise: namely that if God passe not to destroy a whole countrie and the inhabiteres thereof: what shall become of any one poore man? Shall one man be proude and thinke to haue an euerlasting state, when he seeth before his eyes that God sweepeth away a great multitude of people in the minute of an houre? Ye see then a profitable comparison. How? If God spare not a whole countrie when they haue offended him: what shall become of me in whom he knoweth an exceeding great number of sinnes? For I am but a wretched creature. Furthermore when wee shall haue muzed vpon such things, and now and then our mindes are troubled and amazed, by reason of sundry doubts that come in our heades, which we be not able to resolute: what haue we else to do, but to holde our selues within such sobrietie, as to reuerence Gods iudgements although we comprehend them not? Therfore it behoueth vs to take good heede to Gods workes: but yet must we beware that we overshoot not our selues in making to long and deepe search of them. And that is the cause why we be forbidden in this text, to consume or swallow vp the night. Marke that for one poynt. And further let vs marke, that whereas it is sayd, that the people are rooted out vnder them: it is to magnifie Gods power the more, in that he causeth me to sinke as it were into a bottomlesse pitte in the same place that he shall haue giuen them to dwell in. If a whole nacion were driuen out before our eyes, and conueyed into some farre Countrie, and continued still the same that it was: that were no matter to make vs too wonder so much. But when suddayne chaunges come in the world: it will seeme that God maketh men to melt away like snow. And in very deede we see that some Countrie hath bene very well peopled, and now at this day it is layde waste. VVhat is become of the inhabiteres? True it is that they be scattered here & there: but yet the remembrance of them is as it were razed out, forasmuch as a man cannot poynt them out to knowe where they are become. Thus yee see what is imported in this sentence, where it is sayd, that nacions shall be rooted out of their place, and as it were under their foote, as though the earth had opened and swallowed them vp, so as a man might not perceyue the print of their path. VVhen God worketh after that fashion, it is a wonderfuller thing, than if the people were remoued from place to place, and that it were seene how God dislodgeth a whole countrie too giue them a newe dwelling. And hereby we be warned, that in considering Gods iudgements, wee muste looke higher than our owne wittes can reach vnto: for that is the cause why we feare not God so much as we ought to do. Yet notwithstanding we diminishe not his power, in not fearing the highnesse that is in him, which ought too make vs afrayd. Therefore as oft as we set our mindes to the considering of Gods iudgements which he executeth in this world: let vs learne to consider with our selues, that it is to high a thing for vs, & that when we haue throughly thought vpon it, we must be faine to stop short, for our wittes reach not so far and wide. Besides this, here is also one other good admonition: which is, that God needeth not to vse the inferiour and visible meanes, if he liste to consume vs: for when wee stand fastest, he can make vs melt away. The earth that beareth vs to day, shall fayle vs [to morrow]. Although we haue none enemy to assayle vs, and although God sende no great armies agaynst vs:

truly he needeth no more but to giue vs one angry looke, and we shall be consumed, yea euen without putting any hand vnto vs. He shall not neede to chaunge our place, he shall not neede to remoue vs a farre off, hee shall not neede to cast vs downe to breake our neckes: for when we stand surest vpon our feete, and we seeme best able to hold our selues in good plight: euen then shall we soonest perish if God be agaynst vs, and no man shall bee able to rid vs from his hande. Seing that this is tolde vs, lette vs learne to humble our selues and not to haue any other fundation than the souerayne power from aboue. And forasmuch as God promiseth to reache vs his hand, let vs trust therewithal and referre our selues wholly vnto him, therewithall acknowledging our owne vanitie and vnsufficiencie, to the end wee be not puffed vp with any presumption that maketh vs drunken. Thus ye see in effect what we haue to beare away in this verse. Now it is sayd immediatly, keepe thee from turning to iniquitie: for then baste choozien it rather than affliction, or else bycause of affliction: for the Hebrue woerde and maner of speache importeth both twayne. First & formest Job is warned here, that he should not turne vnto euill. And vnder that terme wee meane not cyther robberie, or murther, or spitefulness, or such other like things: but we vnderstande the hartburnings agaynst God, and the grudgings and rebellings that proceede of impatiencie. The cause then why it is sayd that Job must keepe himselfe from turning vnto euill, is for that he shewed not himselfe to bee pacient y-nough in submitting himselfe vnto God, and in acknowledging his righteousnesse during the time of his aduersitie. And it is purposely sayd vnto him, that he should stand vpon bis garde: for it is a harde thing too forbeare falling, when we be pinched with aduersitie. Againe, looke what is sayd vnto Job, ought to serue vs all. And so lette vs take this saying as an exhortation of the holy Ghosts to vs all in common, that we should be watchfull when we afflicted, so as we swarue not aside vnto euill. VVhat is the reason? For assoone as Gods hand toucheth vs, we be greeued out of measure, and there needeth no more to put vs out of pacience. Specially if the affliction be great and violent, then are we vtterly dismayed, what stoutnesse soever there were in vs afore: and whereas a man would haue thought vs to be invincible, we be quite out of hart, and wote not where to become. Seing then that there is such frayltie in vs, it standeth vs in hande to looke well to our selues, and to do our indeuer to holde fast that which is good. Yea verely: for although a man strayne himselfe to the vttermoste, yet shall he haue much a do to stand out, that hee stumble not by some meanes or other. Yet notwithstanding we haue cause to be of good cheere, for somuch as we see that the spirite of God considereth how harde our battells are. For if wee labour to keepe our selues from euill, lette vs not doubt but that God will holde vs vp euen when he seeth vs at the last cast. And if we holde on and inforce our selues therewithal, although there be feeblenesse in it, and that we do not our duetie to the full: yet will God accept the paynes that we indure and take them in good woorthe. Behold the thing that ought to give vs courage. But yet must we be diligent in that behalfe, according to that which is shewed vs here. Therefore let vs not flatter our selues, but sticke to it that wee turne not aside vnto euill, that is to say, that we be not ouermuch greeued when God heateth vs with his roddes. I say, let vs labour to keepe our selues from striuing agaynst him, that wee murmur not at his iustice. For (as we haue seene heretofore) it is extreeme wickednesse when men lift vp them-selues after that sort agaynst God, and are so stubborne as they cannot thinke well of his doings to glorisie him in the same. And although it appeare not to be such an euill in the iudgement of men : yet doth God esteeme it as a most heynous crime, and not without cause. VVherfore as oft as wee feele any aduersitie, let vs looke well to our selues, that we be quiet and submit our selues wholly vnto God. And that is the thing which Eliu sheweth more euidently when he addeth, that Job had chosen euill rather than affliction, or because of affliction. Both these translations tende to one ende : which is, that Job bare not his ease peascably with humbling of himselfe, but lifted vp himself agaynst God in his affliction, and considered not that it behoued him to haue stouped vnder the hande of him that hilde him in his power. If a man aske how Job can be condemned of such sturdinessse, seing he is set before vs as a mirour of pacientnesse : I haue answered that question already: namely that God accepted him for pacient. And certesse that vertue is commended in him, not onely by the record of mortall men, but also by the record of the holy Ghost. Yet notwithstanding that is no lette but that he had imperfection in him, and did amisse in some respect. Now if Job hauing indeuered himselfe to be quiet that he might glorisfe God, and knowe & publish his mighty power, was blamed neuerthelesse : I pray you what shall become of vs : if we make comparison betweene the pacientnesse that was in him, and the hartburnings and repinings that are in vs : we are so coy, that if God do but ticke vs with his little finger, we are by and by in a pelting chafe, and there is nothing else with vs but murmuring and spiting. Seing then that we be so farre of from the vertue of Job : do we not deserue to be a hundred times more condemned than he ? And therefore let vs vnderstand, first of all that although affliction be sent vs to tame vs withall : yet doth it stirre vs to rebelling agaynst God : not of it owne nature, but because of our sinfullnesse. VVhen God chastizeth vs, it is to the end to deale the better with vs : according as he sheweth vs our sinnes, to the intent that in condemning them wee should flee to him for refuge, and hauing knowne him to be our iudge, beseech him of pardon and grace, & learne nomore to delight and sooth our selues in our vices. Thus ye see to what end God chastiseth vs. But we turne our afflictions to the contrary : for in steade of stouping vnder Gods hand, we do nothing but fret and grinde our teeth, and storme. To be shorte, wee cannot abide to be eyther poore or sicke, or to suffer any other miseries in this worlde, but wee would sayne that God should let vs alone in peace, yea and that he should gouerne vs after our owne fancies, and not do ought at all to our misliking. And so by reason of affliction we swarue aside vnto euil. Seing then that there is such a fowardnesse in vs, that the meanes which God ordyneth to holde vs in awe vnder his obedience, are turned by vs to the cleane contrarie, in so much that they make vs to play the wilde beastes, and to chafe agaynst him, and to kicke agaynst the spurre : seing (I say) that there is such sinfullnesse in vs : lette vs learne to resist it as much as is possible. And seing that Job, for all that he could do, is blamed here to haue chosen iniquitie in his affliction : let vs consider that the same will much more happen vnto vs, if we looke not well about vs. Furthermore whereas it is sayd, rather than affliction : (for that is the most conuenient and fit translation, notwithstanding that bot' of them (as I sayd) do come to one end) : that maner of speaking hath a certayne grace in it, whereof wee may gather instruction. It is sayd then, that Job chose iniquitie rather than affliction: And howe ? VVhen a man chafeth agaynst God, doth he therefore scapeli his hand ? No : but he holdeth not himselfe in his aray, for aduersitie ought to make vs to stoupe, but wee fight agaynst the hand of God. True it is that our so doing is in vayne, for wee shall bee disppoynted of all our hope, and wee shall gayne nothing by it : but yet for all that, as oft as we gnash our teeth after that maner againt God through impaciencie, our meening is (if it were possible) to be no more subiect vnto God. And that is the cause why I sayd that this saying importeth a good doctrine. For if we perceyued throughly that all such as cannot yeeld meeekely vnto aduersitie, are loth to be subiect vnto God, and could finde in their hearts to beate backe all his force : wee woud abhorre impacientnesse much more than we do, yea and we would thinke it to be an intolerable blasphemie. Then if we sticke not to chafe and turmoyle when Gods hande is vpon vs : it is a token that we be not acquaynted with that which is sayd in this text, namely that all such as are vnpacient are loth to bee subiect any more vnto God, and woulde fayne haue the soueraintie and authoritie abolished which he hath ouer them. This is a thing that ought to put vs in minde to be more patient than we haue bene wont to be, whosoeuer it pleaseth our God to frame vs to humilitie. And after this Eliu addeth, That God exalteþ by his power, and who is like him in teaching? or Who is such a law-maker as he? Othersome translate it, Who is he that ruffeth or casteth forth as he doth? For the Hebrew woord betokeneth also to cast or throw. Neuerthelesse, the processe of the text sheweth, that forasmuch as Gods wisedome is treated of here, it is better to take the woord for to teach or to taske men to a lawe or doctrine, according as the woord betokeneth most commonly. Nowe then it behoueth vs to take this sentence after the first maner : which is, That God bath not his lyke in teaching. This is not referred simply to the woord of God, but also to the inward power which God vittereth, when it pleaseth him to touch vs to the quicke, and to perce our hearts in such wise as we come to him. Truly whensoeuer Gods woerde is preached, or when men reade the holy Scriptures, then is God our teacher, and it is he with whom we go to schoole, and it may wel be sayd that there is no teaching like vnto his. For when we shall haue bene taught by men all our life long : yet shall there be nothing but vanitie in vs, vntill we be grounded in the wisedome of God, because there is no substantialnesse, but there : all other things vanishe quite away. And in good faith, were the wise men of this worlde never so highly learned and sharpwitted : yet was their vnderstanding darkened continually with some cloudes, in somuch that there was no certaintie in them, but they were euer newe to seeke. As much is to be sayd of all such as are taught of men. Therefore it is a very true saying, that there is no teacher like vnto God : for we shall never be taught perfectly, till we haue knowne the woord of God. But Eliu procedeth here yet further : that is to wit, that we be then taught of God, when it pleaseth him to touch our hearts inwardly by his holy spirite, and that hee woorketh after such a sort as wee know his maiestie and obey the same. But there is not that creature to be found, which can do that : that is the peculiar office of God and of his holy spirite, yea and he reserueth it wholly to himselfe, and experience sheweth that he onely is worthy of that prayse. For though we should reade the holy Scripture continually without ceasing, and that it were expounded to vs by men of excellent skill and great cunning : yet should all their labour be vnauaylable, and we shal profitte nothing at all vntill God iulighten vs by his holy spirite, touch our harts and soften them, perce our eares (as hath bene seene heretofore) and open our eyes, so as our hearts which are as hard as flint may be turned into flesh, and we know vnto his obedience. Vntill such time as God do thus : it shall be to no

to no purpose for men to speake to vs, for all their teaching will slip and vanish away from vs, and yet shall never be able to take roote in our mindes. Therefore not without cause is it tolde vs here, that there is no teacher like vnto God. Furthermore this is not sayd, only to the ende wee should repayre vnto him to be iightly taught: but also to the end we should learne not to be selfwise in the discourses and imaginacions which we receyue. And why? For that were the next way to shet our selues out of the doore, that wee might not come to Gods schoole. 10 VVhat is to be done then: let vs learne to be vtterly ignorant, till our Lord haue taught vs his will. And moreouer let vs content our selues with the knowledge of that which we haue learned at his hande: and whatsoever else commeth in our head, let vs thrust it under foote, assuring our selues that it is euery whit of it but leasing and falsehood. Thus ye see what Eliu ment in this streyne. And that also is the cause why he sayeth, Bibold, God exalteth or aduanceth by his power. Hereby he sheweth, that if God worke with vs, we must not go about to know the vttermost of all things that he doth, as we may trie the workes of men: for in as much as we haue them before our eyes, wee behold them and looke euery corner of them, and also wee be able to handle them with our hands, and to tossie them and turne them at our pleasure. It is not so with the workes of God. And why? For he exalteth in his pow're: that is to say, hee is wondersfull in his doings. Therefore men must not attempt nor preache so farre, as to search the vttermost of his doings, or to iudge at aduerture of them and to give bridle to their rashnesse, when they comprehend not all that is in them. And why? Seing that Gods workes are so high, (as which do proceede of his infinite power,) it behoueth vs also to stay at them. For wee be couched here by lowe, there is a great distance betweene them and vs, and we cannot flic so high. VVherefore let vs holde vs contented with that which God sendeth, and suffer our selues to be gouerned by his holy spirite, and nother couet nor desire too knowe any thing, save that which he shall haue shewed vs. To be short, let vs be his scholers, assuring our selues that all our wisedome consisteth in bridling our owne fancies, so as they raunge not abroade. Nowe wee see what the meening of Eliu is. And therefore for the better confirming of the matter which I haue dealt with heretofore, let vs folow the sayd admonition. It hath bene sayd that it is a good thing to apply our minde to the considering of Gods woorkes, so be it that we deale soberly, acknowledging the slendernesse of our owne vnderstanding. Therefore whereas it is sayd, that God exalteth in his power: lette vs understand that he intendeth not to let vs wander after our own liking. And therfore let vs not be so proude as to say, that his workes ere to be esteemed as mens workes: but let vs assure our selues that he will haue men to magnifie them and to honour them. Furthermore for as much as wisedome fayleth vs, and yet notwithstanding our fleche tempteth and tickleth vs to be desirous to seeke more than is lawfull for vs to know: let vs beare in minde that there is none like God in teaching, & therefore that it behoueth vs to come to him, to the end that he may enlighten vs, and that our mindes may bee gouerned by his hande and direction. VVhen we be taught in that schoole: we shall profite y-nough in Gods woorkes, and therewithall wee shall haue wherewith to barre all our own curiosities. And vndoubtedly it behoueth vs to be alwayes watchfull, that we may restrayne our selues. For although the faithfull bee modest, and framed along while aforehande to receyue instruction at Gods hande: yet notwithstanding there are still some curiosities fluttering in their heads, so as they be haled away, and many imaginations come in their minds, causing them to say, why is this? and why is that? But let vs alwayes come backe to this conclusion, that for somuch as we be not able to comprehend Gods woorkes, no nor any creature else is of power to do it: it behoueth vs to come vnto him, and hee muste not onely teach vs by his woerde, but also enlighten vs and order our thoughts, and bring vs vnder his lure, to hold vs fully in awe. Thus yee see in effect what we haue to remember in this sentence. Now it is sayd anon after, Who shall ouersee him in his way? And Who shall say to him, thou hast done amisse? or else, Whom hath he set ouer him in his way? for the Hebreue woord signifieth to give preeminent and lordship, and sometime to visite or ouersee. Neuerthelesse the meening of Eliu is euident ynough: namely that it is not for mortal creatures to controll God, or to make search to finde fault with his doings, and to blame the as though he were misadvised and knewe not howe to order things as they shoulde bee. This is the summe of that which is contayned here. Now to the intent wee may gather a more familiar doctrine of thi sentence: lete vs set it downe for a ground, that men muste bee judged by God, and that they haue not authoritie to be judges ouer him. That is the thing which is shewed vs here by these woordes which Eliu vseth. Esay. 45. 8.

 VVill wee then judge God? It is high treason: for wee 23. vsurpe that which is his. It is written that all knees shall Ro. 14. b. 17.
 bowe before him. And why? To come before his iudge- Phil. 2. b. 10. mentseate, as Sainct Paule declareth in the fourteenth to Ro. 14. b. 10. the Romanes. Seing then that God reserueth the iudg- 2. Cor. 5. b. ing of vs to himselfe alone: what remayneth for vs to 10. do, but to abstayne from that Diuelish boldnesse of desiring so to controll him and to strive agaynst him, as though there were any fault to bee found in his doings and hee were blameworthy, and that wee were of some better discretion and skill than he? Nowe were this well put in vre we should see another maner of modestie in men to like of God, and whereas blasphemies flush out of mens mouthes, wee should heare Gods prayses sound everywhere, so as there should be one agreeable melodie too magnifie his inestimable righteousnesse, wisedome, power, and goodnessse. But what? Although eueryman confesse at the first blush that it is good reaon that God shoulde worke after suche a maner as no man might ad-uaunce himselfe agaynst him: yet notwithstanding all men do it, and there are very fewe that can refrayne such pryme, when they see themselues inclined thereto by nature. Therefore it standeth vs the more in hand to holde fast the doctrine that is giuen vs here by Eliu, or rather by the holy Ghost: which is, that wee must be mindefull to magnifie Gods woorkes, yea euen those woorkes of his which are knowne to men. Now then, after that Eliu hath sayd that noman can reprove God in any of all his workes: he telleteth vs that We must remember to magnifie them. And why? For at length wee shall finde men to be conuincid by experiance, that God doth not any thing but in all vprightnesse and equitie. Therefore lette vs consider it, that our mindes may be restrayned, to the end wee fall not to straying and to gadding ouerall the fields.
 And it behoueth vs to ioyne these two sentences together as they be matched here. The firsste is, Who is he that can say vnto God, thou hast done amisse? And the other is,
That we must remember to magnifie him. Truely moste men can well ynough presume so farre, [as too accuse God of misdealing]: and in very deede a man shall heare nothing but grudgings agaynst God: and although he be vpright in all poynts, yet do not menne ceasse to finde fault with him: But yet for all that they bee not able too reach vnto him. And that is the cause why Eliu skorneth

that foolish ouerweening of theirs, in that he sayeth, that no man is able to charge God with any misdealing. Men may well spew out their blasphemies: but yet shall they vanish and shedde away like water, & in the meane while God shall continue in his perfect state still, and laugh such presumptuousnesse of menne to skorne, when they will needles rush after that maner against him. Then lette vs marke well, that such as hold not themselues in such modestie as I haue shewed that they ought to do, shall not auayle at all whē they haue replied, never so much against God. And why? For he hath not set any persone over himselfe. Herein it is shewed vs that men are ouerfoolish and destitute of reason, when they dispute so against God: VVhy? for who liath set them in any such office? If a man shoulde take vpon him to iudge those ouer whom he hath no authoritie, and to set taskes and tallages vpon them, and to giue sentence vpon their doings: would the world think well of such presumptuousnesse? would it not take such a man to be a starke foole? But wee bee farre more fond in lifting vp our selues against God. If a poore Begger shoulde giue away Dukedomes and Lordships, and appoynt Judges and Lieuetenaunts in a countrie: every man would laugh him to skorne. But we do much more when wee take vpon vs to rule God, and to giue him his lesson. And what a presumptuousnesse is that? If wee would take in hand to subdue all Princes to our lufe, it were not so greate and furious stateliness as this. Nowe then Eliu sheweth here, that if wee be tempted to iudge ouerhastily of Gods workes, and that our reason wexe to holde and prowde: we must come to this poynt to say, VVhat? when all things are throughly considered, is it meere for vs to looke vnto God to controll him, or to spie out his doings to finde faulfe with them when they haue passed his hands? Haue we the oversight of him? Is it for vs to examine his wayes? Then if wee be once fully resolued of that poynt, it will be ynoch enough to barre all curious questions, and to hold vs in awe. For (to be short) it behoueth vs to cōcludē, that Gods shewing of his workes vnto vs, is to the end that we being vnder the, should looke vpon them and consider them. It is sayde here, who is he that shall ouersee [or ouerlooke] him? This saying importeth much: for there are two sortes of looking vpon Gods woorkes. The one is when we perceyue our owne smalnesse, and acknowledging that wee do but crepelie bylow, do lift vp our minds aloft by faith, assuring our selues that wee be not able to comprehend so high and profoud secrets, and (to be short) when with our fayth there is matched this lowlinesse of honoring the things that are vnyknowne to vs. Thus yee see one good maner of looking vpō Gods workes: for it is vnder him. Therfore when we be so lowly and meekecharted, and having considered our owne measure, do lift vp our heads and cast vp our eyes, desiring reverently to know what it pleasest God to shew vs, and no more: then do we looke vpon Gods woorkes vnder him. But contrarywise it is sayd in this text, who is he that shall ouerlooke him [or looke aboue him] in his wayes? Lo here a contrary way of looking, when men aduaunce themselues and mount aboue with their Ergoes and with a desire too ouerlooke Gods workes as though the same were vnder them. But when they mount after that maner, they muste needs breake their neckes: for what maner of ladders haue they? A gayne, let vs labour as much as wee can in our vayne imaginations, and it is certayne that wee shall have no fundation to beare vs vp. So then it is an vntoward and cursed fashion of looking vpon Gods workes, when menne steppe to him as though they would thrust all his doings, vnder their feete, and call him to account, and sit in iudge-ment vpon him as though they had superioritie to ouerrule him. Let vs keepe vs from such diuelish pride: for it is added as an appurtenance, that wee muste rememb̄er too magnifie Gods workes. And that is the second sentence, which I sayde was to bee matched with the other former one. But why is it sayde, that wee muste rememb̄er it? for it seemeth that Eliu might haue sayde at one woerde: Magnifie thou the workes of God: but he sayeth, Remember thou. VVhy so? For wee be willingly occupied about our owne wicked imaginacions, which hinder vs from yeelding God his deserued and due glorie. And therefore it standeth vs in hande too quicken vp the remembrance of our minde, seeing we be so forgerfull of God. As for example. VVhen wee shouide thinke vpon God, the first thing that will come to our thought, shal bee some illusion of Satans, to make vs fall in a rage, or to cast vs into despaire, or to snarle vs in some distrust, or else to make vs tumble into our destruction.

Yee see then that our wittes are ouerwrapped with such ignorance, as wee thinke not vpon God, and in the meane whyle Satan is wylie ynoch too put some wicked fancie in our head, to turne vs away from God if it were possible for him. True it is that many menne know not what this meeneth: for they be veterly blockish: but they that know it are warned to bethinke them of the disease that is rooted in all menne. And forasmuch as wee may bee tempted with wicked conceyts: therefore it is sayde that wee muste bethinke our selues, and not suffer God to bee as it were buried, but call too remembrance that which God himselfe hath printed in all menne, that is to wit, that the Creature muste not exalt himselfe agaynst his maker: and the same muste serue vs for a bryde too holde all our affections in captiuitie, and too thrust them vnderfoote, so as wee may say, wretched creature, where art thou? Comnest thou here to dispute agaynst thy God and to subdue him? Is it reason that thou shouldest take vpon thee to controll him, and make him too passe as it were vnder thy hand? what a malapertnesse is that? then if men enter into suche an examination of themselues: it will drive away all the lewde imaginations that come in their mindes, and are a hinderance too them to magnifie Gods woorkes as becommeth them. And therefore lette vs beware that the Diuell put no lewde conceyts in our heads, but lette vs warde them a farre of by magnifying Gods workes as they bee woorthie. And how shall wee magnifie them? not by iudging of them after our owne knowledge. No: but wee must honour them althoough they passe our reache: and although wee perceyue not the reason why they bee done, yet lette vs not ceasse to say, Lord thou art iust, righteous, and full of equitie.

Thus yee see that the thing wherein we must occupie our selues all the time of our life, is too knowe that the greatnessse and excellencie of Gods workes is such, as we cannot yeelde them such prayse as they deserue, without aduaancing them aboue our selues. And Eliu also sayeth exprestly, that men know them, to do vs to wit, that when menne haue fought their fill agaynst God, (according as wee see that prude alwayes in vs): yet in the end we must needs be overcome. For God will peraduenture suffer vs to inquire of him vnaudizedly: but when we haue so giuen the bryde to our foolish lustes, and Satan hath carried vs away in our fleshly affections: in the ende wee shall perceyue (howbeit all to late) that God is righteous, and that he shall continue so, spite of our teeth. So then seeing that experiance sheweth that Gods workes deserue all prayse, what is to be done? Shall wee take vpon vs to inquire of all his doings to the vttermost? let vs shunne that:

that : and let vs rather learne to honour him with all humilitie, and in so doing to yeld him the rightuousnesse which he deserueth, and to confesse that his wisedome, his iustice, his goodnessse, and his mightinesse appeare in such wise in all his workes, as he must needes be knowne to be such a one as he is, that is to wit, a most louing fa-ther towards those that are his, and a iuste judge towards those whom he hath forsaken.

Now let vs fal downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him so to touch vs, as we may viterly condemne our selues before him, namely to the ende wee may be acquit through his mercie : & that therewithall it may also please him to remedie all the vices that are in vs, and so to cleenze vs, as we may draw neerer and neerer to the heauenly life. And forasmuch as wee be so much inclined to prude and presumption, as we cannot bow vnder him as were requisite : let vs pray him to graunt vs the grace to submit our selues to him with al humilitie & feare, so as we may be fit to receyue instrucciō, both by his woord, & by his holy spirit, to the intent that in all poynts and all respects wee may yeeld him his dew honour, and he guyde vs as obedient children vnder the gouernment of their father. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, &c.

The cxlij Sermon, which is the fifth vpon the xxxvij Chapter.

25. Men behold it, every man seeth it a farreof.
26. Beholde, God is greate, the number of his yeeres is not knovyne, there is no counting of them.
27. For he restrayneth the droppes of vvater, and afterward maketh the rayne of his moysture to poure dovvne.
28. He maketh it to come from heauen, and it sheadeth dovvne vpon the multitude of men.
29. VVho can knovv the diuersitie of his Clovvdes, and vwhat is the heape of his Tent ?
30. He stretcheth out his light and couereth the rootes of the Sea.
31. By them doth he execute iustice vpon the people, and giue abundance vvhervvith too liue.
32. He clotheth his dry stremes vvith the clovvdes, and commaundeth them to go agaynst them.
33. His companion brings him tidings of strife, and there is anger in mounting vp.

Ee haue teo beare in minde the matter that was glaunced at yester-day : namely howe it is shewed vs here, that although me would shet their eyes, yet can they not bring to passe that God shoulde not set himselfe afore them, and that his workes shoulde not be knowne to them. Hereby wee be warned, that if any man know not God, the same commeth not of simple ignorance, but rather of stubborne-wilfulnessse, bycause he turneth away from him. For (as I haue sayde afore) Gods woorkes are to manifest vnto vs : they shew theirselues everywhere : and therfore we cannot be ignorant of them, except wee list our selues. In respect whereof it is sayde, That men behold them a farre of. For this similitude importeth, that they bee so excellent, and that there is such a greatnessse and maiestie in them, that although there bee a farre distance betweene them and vs, yet are wee able to see them. VVee knowe that if a man be ferre off from vs, our eyysight will not reache thither, but it fadeth by the way : or if there bee a great Castle, it will seeme to be but a little cabban if wee looke at it a farre of : and a whole Tounē will seeme to be but a twoo or three houses. Thus doth farre distance diminish the outward appearance of things, which are great when wee see them neere at hand: VVee haue experience yrough of it in the Sunne. For it seemeth to be scarsly twoo foote broade : and yet notwithstanding if a man know the reason, and the things which the Philosophers and those that are acquaynted with the seeretes of nature do shewe, hee shall perceyue that the Sunne is much greater than the whole earth. And here it is sayd exprely, that men beholde Gods woorkes a farre of. How farre of? So farre, as our eyysight must needes be vterly dazed. But yet as farre of as it is, wee perceyue howe God woorketh : and therefore it foloweth that there is such a maiestie in Gods woorkes, as wee ought of duetie to honour him therein. Nowe then lette vs marke, that such as glorifie not God as they shoulde do, cannot cloke theirselues with ignorance : for it is but a vayne couert, bycause his woorkes cannot but be knowne vnto them. In so much that if wee alledge that our eyysight is too weake, and that Gods woorking is to high for vs : it is to be replied, that although Gods woorkes be not nigh vs, yet wee ceasse not to perceyue them, so farre forth as is needfull for the magnifying of them. And although our eyysight be very feeble, yet is there such a greatnessse, excellēcie, & worthinessse in Gods workes, as we haue some incling of them. Therfore lette vs learne to apply our mindes to the knowing of the things that God sheweth vs. Furthermore let vs marke also, that it behoueth vs to know God and his workes according to our owne measure. If he shew himself a farre of, let vs content our selues therewith. True it is that we may well desire to haue him to come neere vs : and on our part also it behoueth vs to streyne our selues from day to day, to haue a more familiar and full knowledge of him and of his workes. But yet for all that, we must walke in humilitie, & if God list not to be knowne to the full, but only in part : let vs holde our selues to that which pleaseth him. And in the meane while (as I sayd) let vs not play the purblind or starkblind buffards wilfully : but let vs suffer God to shew himselfe to vs, and when he hath shewed himselfe and wee know him, let vs honour him & yeeld him his deserved prayse. Now herewithall Eliu sayeth, that because God is great, we know him not, neither is there any numbering or accounting of his yeeres. This sentence should seeme to repugne that which I haue sayd already : for to know & not to know, are things vterly contrary. VVee saw in the last verse, that although God be far off from vs, yet notwithstanding his workes are so great that we see them : and now it is layd, that God cannot be knowne. But by the knowing that is spo-ken ken of here, it is ment that we cannot comprehend God in such wise as he is in his maiestie: wee come farre short of that: it is ynoch for vs that we haue some little taste of it: we be not able to cōprehend the infinite light that is in him: it suffizeth that wee haue some little sparkes therof. Thus then ye see in what wise God is not knowne: namely in that our capacitie is to small to conceyue and cōprehend him. Yet notwithstanding his meening is not to be vterly hid frō men: for he sheweth himself ynoch to be honored at their hands. Therefore this knowledge which we haue of God, is not to be able to determine of him, and to say throughly what is in him: but yet neuerthelesse we are vnxcusable if we honour him not, for so much as he hath shewed himself in such portion vnto vs, as he knoweth vs able to beare, and as is for our profite. Now we see after what maner we behold God, and how he may be knowne of vs: that is to wit, by looking at him as it were in a glasse when he claddeth himselfe with that visible maiestie which is seene in heauen and earth. Lo in what wyze he ought to be looked vpō And for that cause it is sayd, that the creatures are as his seate: those are his ornaments: and as a Prince that appareleth himselfe in his royaltie to haue the more reverence: even so Gods ornaments are in the heauen and in the earth: and there it is that he must be looked vpon. For as for his substance or being, that is invisible and hidden from vs. But he vitereth his vertues in such wise, that although wee were blind, yet might we grope them, according also as S. Pavle vseth the same similitude in the 17. of the Actes. Seing it is so, let vs learne that we do then see God, when we consider his workes: for his mighty power appeereth there, and sheweth vs that he deserueth well to bee glorified at our hands. But yet must wee not presume to knowe him perfectly, so as we should be able to define what his glory is: for that passeth all our vnderstanding: wee muste cast downe our eyes and confesse that he dwelleth in vnapprochable light. Therfore our knowing of God is but in part: and therewithall it beloueth vs to confesse, that we be so ignorant and weake, as it is ynoch for vs to haue some tast of Gods maiestie, and we must hold our selues at that stay sith we see that our wits fayle vs, and that we be as good as forlorne. I say it behoueth vs to holde our selues within our owne slendernessse, praying God to rid vs of this mortall flesh, to the intent we may behold him ashe is, when we be become like unto him, as it is sayd in S. Iohn: and furthermore that in wayting for that day, he reforme vs presently after his owne image, to the end we may behold him the better. For thereafter as God clesseth vs from all our fleshly vices, and from all the heauy drosse that wee feele in our selues: so maketh he vs the meeter to behold him. And so vpon the knowledge of the weakenesse of our owne wittes, wee haue to pray vnto God to reforme vs more and more, to the end we may profite and increase in his knowledge. VVhereas mentiō is made of the numbering of his yeeres: and whereas it is sayd, that they cannot be reckened: truly a man may thinke it rude geere at the first blush: for in asmuch as God had no beginning, it needeth not to bee sayd of that euerlastingnesse, that the yeeres thereof cannot bee reckened: and therfore that saying might seeme superfluous. But if wee consider what Eliu ained: we shall finde that saying greatly to our profite. And why? As I haue sayde heretofore, men are so caried away with pride, as they find fault with Gods doings, and will needes controll him. And whereof cometh such saucinessse, but that in effect they thinke theselues wizer than God? Now to beate downe such ouerweening, it is sayd here, that a man cannot reckon the number of Gods yeeres. Therfore whēsoeuer we would be iudges ouer him, and are tempted with the sayd presumptuousnesse and desire to mount higher than becōmeth vs or is lawfull for vs: lete vs bethinke our selues thus: wretched creature, thou art but as a snayle, it is not past three dayes age since thou camest first vpō the earth (I meene euē them that haue liued a foure or fiftscore yeeres) & yet thou wilt take vpō thee to iudge thy God. And in what plight art thou? For when thou shalt haue reached to the very creation of the worlde: it is nothing in comparison of the euerlastynge that is in him. So then, thou seest now thine owne follie, and that thou art out of thy wittes when thou enterest into such a maze, as to go aboue to iudge him. Therefore let vs learne, that here is not only told vs that Gods age is endlesse: but we muste also compare it with the shortnesse of our life, according as we be warned to do. For we know that wee be Psalm. 90. transitorie and slippe away like a shadow. Then must we compare the sayd shortnesse [of our life] with the endlesse time of God, and the euerlastynge which hath nother time nor bounds; and that will serue well to keepe vs from aduauncing our selues into such presumption as we haue bene woonted to. Thus wee see in effect what Eliu telleteth vs here. Now must we come to the declaratiō of that which he sayeth concerning Gods workes. For he alledgedeth the Rayne, thunders, and vapours, and such other like things, as Hayle, tempests, and whirlwindes. VVhen wee see those things, God giueth vs suche signes of his maiestie, as wee muste needes honour him, or else wee be to vnthankfull and blockish. True it is that God hath other woorkes higher and harder to comprehend than these: but the intent of the holy Ghost was, to teach vs grossely according to our rudenesse and homelinessse: and therfore Eliu setteth downe here an exāple of the workes of nature, which we say are common. VVe neede not to go to schoole nor to be great Clerkes to haue knowledge of Rayne, of hayle, of fayre wether, and of the chaunges that we see in the ayre. True it is that the reasons of them are not very common and ordinarie. For if a man should aske a poore sillie soule how Rayne is engendred he could not resolute him of it, because wee see not howe the water mounteth vp, nor also howe the water can be engendred in the ayre, and it might seeme a thing agaynst reason. So the playne countrymen cannot disculpe the things that are to be knowne by Plilosophie: as how the rayne is engendred by drawing vp of the vapours or steames, in somuch that when the Sunne striketh vpon the earth, forasmuch as the earth is full of holes, and not so cloce shet but that there are little vaines in it: he draweth vp the vapours aloft, and by little and little they become thicke, and when they be in the middes of the ayre, there they ingender Rayne. For by that meanes the moystures are drawne vp by little and little, vntill that al of the grow ripe to giue vs rayne. Agayne the countryfolke vnderstand not whereof it cometh to passe, that there is not so great heate in the middle roome of the ayre, although the same be neerer to the Sunne. For the cause of it is, that the heate setteth it self here vpō the earth as vpō a harth, whereas in the ayre it spreadeth abroade in such wise as it cannot rest there. And that is the cause why hayle is ingēdered there, as we see. It is a straige matter, in so much that we would hardly beleue it if it were not a common thing among vs, that the hayle should thicken in the ayre, and that although the Sunne be neerer thereto than to vs, yet notwithstanding(as we see) there must needes be a great co'dnesse there. The ignorant therefore haue no knowledge of these things, nother can they finde out the reason of it, but are amazed at it. Howbeit although wee know not the reason, yet the thing it selfe is sufficiently knowne, knowne, in somuch that it appeereth that the drawing vp of the vapours from the earth after that maner, and the engendering of Rayne afterward, and also the holding of the rayne in the ayre after it is engendered there, (according as it is sayde that the clowdes are bottels, barrels, or zubbes) are a wonderfull worke of God. And in good sooth if there were barrelles in the ayre to hold the water in, it were not a notabler miracle, than too see the clowdes hanging ouer vs. VVhat letteth that they fall not downe to ouerwhelme vs and to destroy the earth? Muste it not needes be an excellent power whereat our wittes must be amazed? This is the cause why I sayd that without any going to schoole, or without any curious great booke learning, a man shall find sufficiēt knowledge of Gods workes in the order of nature, to make him vnu-excusable, bycause the same is so common among vs. As for example, when wee looke vpon the rayne, hayle, thundrer, and such other like things, the same shewe vs a certayne maiestie of God to make vs afayde, so as wee muste needes be moued spite of our teeth: for by that means our Lord inforceth vs to know the maiestie that is in him, notwithstanding that we through our vnthank-fulnessse indeuer to quenche it to the vttermoste of our power. Now then we see why mention is made here vnto vs of the rayne & such other like things. Not because that God hath not other workes more wonderfull and excellent: but to the ende we should not pretend ignorance: for the holy Ghost setteth before vs the things that are scene and knowne of the whole world. Seing it is so, what haue we to do but to worship God, yeelding him his de-serued honour: & to beate downe al pryde in our selues, so as we learne to submit our selues to his ordinance, and allow whatsoeuer he doth or dispozeth? Howbeit, it will bee good for mee to expound the woordes, before I gather the generall doctrine. It is sayd, that God restrayneth [or holdeth backe] the droppes of water. And it serueth to expresse better his excellent power, which would not bee beleueed if men sawe it not with their eyes. If a man should tel vs that the droppes of water were hild vp, (that is to say, that the water which is so fine and subtle a thing that it shadeth and soketh away and hath no fastnesse in it, is neuerthelesse hild vp in the ayre, notwithstanding the great number of the droppes, and the great quantitie of it:) we would thinke it straunge, if we had not experiance of it. If water were a firme and substantiall thing, there might well be some mountayne of it for God to hold together. But wheras there are a hundred Millions of drops in one little clowde, and ebery droppe is of it own nature readie to fall away and to disperce all the rest of the bodie, (as soothly nothing is more sheding and slipperie than water, in somuch that looke how many little portiōs there are, so many diuisions there are) and yet notwithstanding they are all hild togither: if we knew it not and perceyued it not, wee would never beleue it. Must wee not needes then acknowledge an infinite power in God, when we see the things that could not be beleueed? And so Eliu in saying that God holdeth togither the droppes of water, ment to expresse better the mighty power that God shewet: vs in holding vp the rayne in the ayre. And afterward he sayeth that of this vapour he maketh Rayne. If a man demaunde whereof rayne is engendered: i say, of nothing. The vapour of it owne selfe would not ryze vp from the earth, which hath hir steames within hir holes, for that is hir nature: but the rizing vp of it is by the drawing of the sunne, which sucketh vp the moysture to hale it vp on high. Otherwise what ropes needed there [to draw it vp?] VVere it possile to beleue it, if wee sawe it not? But it is scene manifestly. Yee see then that the vapours which were nothing, (that is to say which appeared not at al in our sight,) do rize vpward agaynst their nature. And when they be vp aloft, rayne is made and fashioned of them: and afterward the earth is moystened with it, and bringeth forth frute, and men take their nourishment thereof. Behold our Lord drieth the earth by drawing the vapours from it after that maner: and it is asmuch as if a man should drawe the sappe and iuice out of a thing, so as he should leaue nomore strength in it. Ye see then that it withereth. But God findeth a contrary meanes. VVhe he hath so dried the earth, and drayned as it were the bloud and substance out of it: he moysteth it agayne with the same, and we see that rayne giueth abundance of frutes, according as it is shewed here. Seing then, that we perceyue it to be so: muste it not needes be that we are cōuictid of the Maiestie of God which we would not cōsider before? Although then that we shet our eyes, yet doth God(spite of our teeth)shew himself to vs, & his maiestie is visible to vs in all sortes. Immediately it is declared, that God hath as it were his Pavilions [or Tents], according as we know how it hath bene declared heretofore, that the clowdes and all the cope of heauen are termed Gods Pavilions or Tents. And diuers times it is sayd Psalm.104.

infinite goodness towards vs. Contrariwise, when he purposeth to shewe his rigour, the Clowdes execute his vengeance vpon vs, and hee vttereth his displeasure there. And why? For when Raynes are outrageous they doo great harmes, and make such flouddes that both hay and Corne are swapt away. Moreouer there followe other wastings also, according as it is diuers tyme seene, that the Sea drowneth a great Countrey. Ye see then howe God dooth by rayne execute his iustice, and also on the contrarie part make vs to feele his goodness. And that is the cause why it is sayde, that he covereth the rootes of the Sea. For when wee beholde the raine and the Clowdes: at the first brunt it toucheth vs and maketh vs afrynde, and it is meete also that wee should be stricken with some feare. But when God withholdeth the waters, so as they poure not downe vpon the worlde, ne swallowe vs vp here at the first dash: that maketh vs to perceiue Gods prouidence the better. Now then we see what Elius intent was. And finally hee sayeth, that God will mingle darkenesse and light together. For when the Sunne shineth, there commeth newe end then suche a sodaine storme, as men are abashed at it: as in the Sommer tyme the weather shall bee so calme and fayre as can bee denysed, and in the turning of a hande, ye shall see such a tempest, as it shall seeme that the worlde shoulde go too wrecke. And who doorth that? Muste not hee needes bee an excellent master which commaundeth it? Must not that excellencie of God be wondersfull?

Furthermore it is sayde heere, that God commaundeth the Clowdes too mount vp, and againe, hee commaundeth the fire which is in the aire, that is to say hee commaundeth the streamings which being of fire nature are whote and drie. God then commaundeth them too iustle agaynst the Clowdes that are about too mounte vppwarde, and therupon followeth a battell, as if two armes incuntered togither with mortall anger. Euen so is it in the encounter that is betweene the Clowdes, and the drie gleames that are aboue. Then is there as it were an anger when these Creatures meeet, and eche of them is as yee woulde say at deadly foade with other. And who doth that? Needes must God be the commaunder of it. For if wee shoulde say it were done by haphazarde, we shoulde bee too bruylshe, and the verie babes might laugh vs too scorne: for there is no man but hee knoweth that God woorketh heirein, and that hee ruleth from aboue. Ye see then in effecte what wee haue too gather of the woordes. But the cheefest matter is togather the doctrine that is conteyned heere. Truely the woordes are right worthie to be well weyed, too the intent that they maye bee referred too the ende whiche I haue touched. Howebecit by the way we haue to remember heere, that there needeth no great cunning too proue vnto vs, that there is but one God whiche reigneth and guideth the worlde, and disposes all the order of nature according to his owne will. VVhy so? For if we haue liued neuer so little while in the worlde, so as wee haue but seene it raine a three or foure tymes: beholde God, yeeldeth vs sufficient recorde of his Maiestie, so as there is no more excuse for vs if we shette our eies: for(spite of our teeth) we shall vnderstande, that there is a God which ouerruleth all things that wee can see heire beneath. Thus ye see what wee haue to remember. And becreby we see that suche as scoffe at all religion, and are not moued at the Maiestie of God, are as good as bewitched by Satan. For (as I sayde) wee neede not to haue gone to schole too learne this lesson. Yet notwithstanding, there are men euen of great skill, that thinke not thselues wyse ynough, if they despise not God. And howe is it possible that they shoude become so beastly? It is (as I sayde) bycause God hathe vtterly giuen them ouer, and they bee so dulled that Satan raigneth in them, yea euen with such darkenesse, as they be not worthie to be accounted for men. Notwithstanding, let vs marke therewithall, that they haue alwayes sore hartbytings: and althoughe they labour too wype out all knowledge of God: yet haue they such a heartburning in their conscience, as they are faine(spite of their teeth) to feele the maiestie which they would vtterly abolish: and they can not shift it off, but that God must pursue them, and shew himselfe to them.

Then let vs conclude, that the thing which is conteyned heere, is seene by experiance: which is, that if menne doo but open their eyes, they muste needs beholde a Maiestie in all the order of nature: and that althoughe they shette their eyes, yet dooth God make them too feele him. Lo what we haue to marke heere in the first place. Truely this doctrine deserueth to bee layde oure more at large: howebecit, forasmuche as wee haue spoken of it heretofore, its suffizeth too call too minde what I haue earst declared, without taryng long vpon it.

But by the waye let vs marke, that the holy Ghost doth here set downe those woorkes of God which are best knowne to all men, both to great and small, too the intent that vpon the knowing of them, euerie manne shoule take the more courage too prayse and honur God when they knowe him. VVhy so? If the manner of teaching in the holy Scripture were curious and high, so as none coude fasten on it but the learned sort: wee woulde drawe backe, and moste men woulde take occasion to say, Alas, what can I do? I never went to schole, and God vouchsafeth not to shewe himselfe but to learned men. But when as we see that God chaweth oure morselles too vs, and dresseth vs like little children, and frameth himselfe too our rudenesse, giuing vs things in suche wise, that euen the smallest and ignorantest may haue their part and share (as menne terme it) of them: I pray you ought not wee too take the more courage too learne and vnderstande what God is, and too comforte our selues in the great goodness which hee sheweth towrdes vs. For if he had not an inestimable care of our welfare, he woulde not vouchsafe too come downe so lowe. But sith it is his will to stoupe vnto vs in his creatures, and forsoomuch as he seeing what is meete for vs, sheweth himselfe to vs in such wise as we may conceyue him: perceyue we not therein how much he loueth vs, and howe he procureth our saluation? Ye see then what wee haue too beare in minde. And therefore when as mention is made vnto vs of Raine, Clowdes, VVhirlwindes, and Haile, let vs not imagine but that GOD coulde reason more clearly with vs if he listed. For who gaue witte too the Heathen Philosophers too treate so well and skilfully of the secretes of nature? It is God that gaue them that knowledge. But in the meane while he teacheth vs after another fashion. And why? For he will haue men to preache and set forth the doctrine of salvation vnto vs, to guide vs too his owne kingdome, and he will haue it not onely to make vs kings and princes, but also to list vs vp aboue the whole worlde, to make vs fellowes with the Angelles, and to mount aboue the heauens.

Forasmuche then as God intendeth too list vs vp on high: he commeth downe vnto vs too make vs all partakers of the benefites that are conteyned in his woordes. VVherefore let vs learne not too despise the holy scripture ture as a common thing : but let vs understande that Gods minde is to frame himselfe to our infirmitie after that maner. Ye see then what we haue to marke. Herewithall let vs learne also not to despise Gods workes because they bee common among vs. VVhat is the cause why we esteeme not Gods doings to bee a myracle, but for that we be inured to them by custome? I see it raine: verie well, I am not moued a whitte at it, because it is an ordinarie matter too mee. But surely it is a villaynous vnthankefulnesse, that whereas God doth dayly worke a myracle, wee shoulde bee as it were dulled thereby, and not thinke vpon it any more. So then althoough rayne, hayle, and the ryng of tempests by the order of nature, bee ordinarie things : yet let vs not forbear too marke well all those things, and to consider by percelmeale how oure Lorde layeth foorth the infinite treasures of hys power and maiestie, to the ende to be honoured at our handes. Thus ye see what wee haue to beare in minde. Howbeit before I passe any further, it might be demaunded to what purpose Eliu alledgedeth these things, seeing hee reasoneth of a farre other matter: which is to shewe that God is incomprehensible in his doings, and that men must not presume too striue agaynst him, nor too mainteyne their owne quarelles as though they were rightfull, and that God were cruell in afflicting them. This seemeth too bee nothing at all to the purpose. But I haue resolved this question alreadie. Onely I will say a worde of it sleightly, to renue the remembrance of the thing that hath bin spoken heretofore at length. VVhich is, that the inferior things are set generally heere afore vs, to make vs mount vp higher to Gods secrete and incomprehensible iudgements.

VVhen wee see the raine, the clowdes the stormes, and the hayle, surely they bee naturall things (as men terme them:) they serue for this transitorie life, and they concerne the worlde, and things heere beneath. Yet notwithstanding we be so confounded by them, as we be inforced to reverence the maiestie of God. For when we shall haue inquired, how it is possible for those things to be done: our wittes fayle vs, and there remayneth nothing for vs, but too humble our selues before God. Now if these small and lowe things compell vs to honour God, and that our infirmitie bewrayeth it selfe therein: what shall become of vs when we fall to mounting aboue the Clowdes, yea and aboue all the Skies, and when we come to the euerlasting purpose which God holdeth there as it were hidden in himselfe? Then if it come too that poynt, I pray you what shall become of mennes wittes? They may well flitter and fiske about: but a man may sooner breake his necke a hundred thousand tymes, than attaine vntoo God. Yee see then, what the manner of Elius teaching is heere. For by these things whiche seeme small bycause custome hath made them common among vs, hee sheweth that God in his highnesse ought of duetie too bee honoured at our handes: for wee shall never comprehend what hee is. And why? VVee comprehend not what the Clowdes are, but our wittes misse of that? For we see it is no stryuing in this behalfe agaynst Gods doings. Shall I go set an order in the Clowdes, to say, it must not bee so or so, and that it is but a tale of a tubbe, that the raine is engendred of the vapours of the earth, and that the Sunne draweth vp the things here beneath after that maner by the heate of his beames? Shall wee (say I) stoppe God from dispozing all things according too the order which hee hath set in nature? Alas, that were too damnable an outrage: euerie man will graunt that. Nowe seeing that oure weakenesse sheweth it selfe in these small things, whiche are ryse and common, and which God setteth before our eyes: ( for yet neuernethelasse, we know that it behoueth vs to fall down before God to worship him, & to confess that our vnderstanding is nothing at all, specially sith it comprehendeth not the things that we see day by day: ) much more reason is it that wee shoulde bryde oure wittes, and reyne them short when we come to his secrete determinations and iudgements, which hee executeth not euerie day, and which are not so common and ryse among vs. And why so? For it is a diuelishe pride when a man wyll mount so high, and therefore he must needes fall into so vitter ruine, as he can never get vp againe. Then let vs kepe vs from this statelinesse of desiring to rise vp against God, namely in his secrete determinations which surmount the whole order of nature, and all the things that we are able to comprehend by our vnderstanding. This is in effecte the thing that Eliu looked at and aimed at. Nowe by the way let vs marke for an ende and knitting vp, that whereas it is sayde, that God executeth bis iudgements, and giuetb men abundantly wherewith to live: It is to the ende we shoulde knowe, that all the order of nature is in Gods hande, and that the ayre is not gouerned by it selfe, nor the raine commeth at the appoyntment of the Sunne. How theo? For we see contrarie effects. Beholde, water drowneth men and sweepeth them quite awaie: and againe, it mainteyneth them. Yee see heere two contrarie woorkings: nourishment on the one side, and walsing on the other, so as God destroyeth and ouerwhelmeth all. Both these twaine we see: and what is the cause thereof, but that God ouerruleth things from aboue. So then, let vs learne to magnifie God in this, that wee see him applic his creatures too such vse as hee thinketh good. Furthermore, when on the one side we see his rigour: seeing that hee myndeth too punishe our sinnes, wee ought too consider that therein hee sheweth himselfe a Judge, to the ende we shoulde condemne our selues before him, and flee for refuge to his mercie, for somuch as he vittereth the treasures of his goodnessse, and sheweth himselfe liberal. VVhich thing he doth at such time as he declareth himselfe to haue a care of vs by sending vs prouision by the Clowdes, wherby he maketh the earth frutefull: to the ende it shold yeeld vs sustenance. VVhen we see this on the other side: let vs bee satisfyed with the goodnessse of our God, to put our whole trust therein, and to rest therupon, concluding that sith hee sheweth himselfe a father in the cherishing of oure boadies, which are but fraile carcasses: much more reason it is that seeing hee hathe fashioned vs anewe vnto hys owne glorie, we shoulde not doubt but he is chare of our saluation, and that he sheweth himselfe a father in that, more than in all the rest. This is it that we haue to marke in this streyne, where we see that God as nowe applieth his creatures to his owne pleasure, vsing them on the one syde, as Roddes too execute his iustice, and on the other side, making them too serue our turne, even by employing them too relieue the necessities of this present lyfe. Therefore let vs beare all these things in minde, that wee maye bee taught in his feare, both too reioyce and rest in his goodnessse, and also too settle our trust wholly vpon the same.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs perceyue them better than we haue done: and that therewithall we may knowe that we must mislike of our selues still more and more, to the ende to correct the sinfulnessse that is in vs: & that forasmuch as it hath pleased God to drawe vs alreadie vnto him, we may consider the grace that he hath begonne in vs, and therupon take corage too go foreward still more and more, till wee bee come to the perfection that he calleth vs vnto, and never be wary of traueling thitherward : and that in the meane season we may haue our eyes open to behold his goodnesse, power, justice, and wisdome which he sheweth vs : and he reforme vs wholly to his obedience, so as we may seeke nothing but to dedicate our whole life to his service. That it may please him to graunt this grace not on- ly to vs &c.

- ALso my hart trembleth at it for feare, and it leapeth out of his place.
2. Herken to the noise of his voice, and to the sound of his mouth.
  3. He diresteth it vnder the vvhole heauens, his light is vpon the vving of the earth.
  4. Again he brayeth vwith a greate sound, he thundreth vwith his myghtie voice, and he taryeth not after that his voyce is heard.
  5. God thundereth terribly vwith his voyce, he dooth v wonderfull things, and vwhich a man cannot comprehend.
  6. For he commaundeth the snoevve to fall dovvne vpon the earth : and [likevvise] the syveete shovvers, and the raynes of greate force.

His serueth at leastwyse, that whyle we be in this world we shuld haue our eyes open too consider the woorkes of God that are neere vs and easie to be seene, though we be no learned nor deepewitted folk. For even the veriest idiots perceyue the order of nature to bee such, that they see the maestie of God there as in a mirrour. True it is, that wee 30 ought to lift vp ourselues yet hygher too consider well what God sheweth vs. Howbeit (as I sayd) we ought at leastwise to consider the things that are present afore vs. Notwithstanding, it is not ynoch too vnderstand that God having created the world doeth also gouerne it : it behoueth vs to knowe moreouer to what ende the thing ought to be referred. If we knew no more but that it is God which sendeth rayne and faire weather, it is God that thundereth, it is God that maketh the lightenings to run flashing through the ayre : that were an attributing 40 of a soueraine power vnto him, and so shoulde he bee knowne to bee almighty. But there is yet more : For when God sendeth rayne, it is not only to shewe what he can do : but sometimes it is his mynd to challice men for their sinnes, and other tymes it is his intent to yeld forth the treasures of his goodnessse and bountie. So then it is not ynoch to haue knowne that God is almighty, and that all creatures are in his hand and at his disposition : but we must marke also how and after what maner hee 50 vseth them: that is to wit, to iudge the world with, when he hath borne long ynoch with our sinnes : and againe to make vs feele his fauour, and to knowe him to be our father and sauour, and the partie that maynteyneth and nurrissheth vs. VVe see then that Gods iustice, goodnesse, and wisdome must be linked with his almightynesse. And why? To the intent we may on the one side be taught to feare him, and to walk in his obedience: and on the other side rest our selues vpon him, seeing we haue so fayre recordes of his loue, and that we may call vpon him, assuring our selues that hee regardeth vs and pitith vs, and that we be vnder his protection, and that if we resort vnto him when we be destitute of counsell, he will instruct vs by his holie spirite.

Nowe then wee see, that the order of nature beeing well considered, serueth not onely too set out a soueraine power in God, to the ende men shoulde honour him by acknowledging him too bee almighty : but also to make vs immediately too take holde of his grace and goodnesse, too rest therupon, and to seeke oure whole refuge there. Also it behoueth vs too knowe, that men shall not scape vnpunished, bycause hee sheweth them before hande, that all things must come to accounte before him. And that is the thing whiche Eliu hath treated of, according as it was shewed yesterday, that by raine, hayle, and tempestes, God doth sometymes iudge the worlde, and sometimes give men abundantly where-with to liue.

And now he addeth, That his heart leaped out of his place at it, and that he was afrayde at the sight of such things: as if he shoulde say, that our knowing of God maste not be a gazing in the ayre after our owne lyking, and in the meane while to conceyue but only some dead thoughts: but it must bee a lively touching of our heartes, and of all our powers to the quick. And this is general to all men. But the vnbeleeuers (do as muche as they can) kill this feare wherewith they ought to bee touched, whereas the 40 faythfull make their profite of it, and willingly prouoke themselues to the sayde awfulnessse, to the ende too doo homage with all reverence to the Maiestic of God.

Then let vs beare in minde, that Gods manifesting of himselfe vnto men, is not onely to put some fleeting conceyte into them, so as they might say, There is a God, and fall too reasoning of him: but also therewithall too give them a lively instruction inwardly, so as they maye become the better minded. This (say I) ought to bee in all men. Howebeit wee see that the vnbeleeuers doo (to the vitermost of their power) beate backe the feare which they haue conceyued, and labour too play wyth God, and to get libertie to be quite and cleane oute of awe of him. Lo at what poynt the faythlesse sort are, so as they fight agaynst their owne naturall vnderstanding, and indeuer themselues too become brute beastes, that there may not be ought in them to trouble them any more. And why do they so? For God is agaynst them, forasmuch as they be given too all euill. They see that God cannot away with them, and therefore they shunne him, and labour too ridde him quite away, lyke as an Outlaw or a Theefe woulde faine that there were no ciuil Magistrate in the worlde, to the ende that his sinnes might escape vnpunished. In like case is it with all worldelings: forasmuche as they cannot disbarre the hande of God, so long as hee sitteth in his maiestic too iudge: they would fain exempt themselves from his iurisdiction: and that is the cause (as I sayd) why they labor to quench the light of reason which was giuen the. But they cannot bring it to passe : and therefore they are as Mules that chawe vpon their brydles , and fall to repyning agaynst God , and howsoeuer the worlde go with them, they growe hardhearted , and wexe euerie day more blockishe than other, till God haue giuen them quite ouer , so as they feele no more remorse of mynde , as

Eph.4.c.19

Saint Paul speaketh of them . And surely it is the extreemest of all miseries, and the verie vpshotte of theyr decay, when they feele no more greefe , that is too say, whē they haue no more remorse of conscience, but beare with themselues in sinning , and go on still in their common trace , according also as Salomon sayeth, that the wicked man is then come to the guife , and dungeon of iniquite , when hee hath no more feeling to returne vnto God , and to humble himselfe , and to miflyke of hys faultes.

Contrarywise, when the faythfull are touched with the Majestie of God, they kindle the fyre more and more , like as if a man hauing alreadie some Coales or fyrebronde , shoulde kindle it more . Euen so deale all they that couet to walke vprightly . For after that God hath once touched them , and that they themselues by beholding the order of nature, haue once perceyued that there is a soueraine Majestie , which guideth and governeth all things : they applie that reuerende feare to their owne instruction , so as they pricke and prouoke themselues in their heartes, too resort vnto God, bearing him continually in their remembrance . And as oft as they haue occasion too looke vpwarde or downewarde, they prepare themselues too the knowing of God, so as they gaze not aboue at aduenture , but bethinke themselues throughly aforehande , that they must looke vpon God the maker of all things. VVe see then that whereas the wicked and heathenish sort labour to become blinde, and therewithall to wexe hardhearted agaynst God , and finally too become brute beastes , voyde of vnderstanding and discretion : the fauill take profit of the knowledge which god giueth thē by the meanes of his creatures, and consequently the said light increaseth & growtheth strong in them, & they inforce themselues to it to the vttermost of their power. And that is it which Eliu met here by saying, that bis heare trembled and leapt out of his place. True it is, that the wicked shall be afryad of thunder and lightning, and spite of their teeth the Majestie of God must touch them, to make some secrete alarum within them : but yet for all that, they dispatche away such thoughtes , and tread them vnder foote. On the contrarie part, suche as desire to knowe God , do yppon occasion of such beginning, set and applie their whole studie to aduauntage themselues by that feare and dreade which God sendeth into their heartes. Furthermore, Eliu vseth goodly similitudes here in describing the thunder, lightning, frost, & tempestes. He sayeth that a man may heare Gods voyce, yea euen a voyce of great noyse (sayeth hee) and a sounde that proceedeth out of his mouth. Heere Eliu speaketh not of the woerde , which is dayly preached vnto vs, for vs to take learning by it , and wherein God deth familiarily shewe vs his goodness : but by Gods roaring voyce, and by the noise that proceedeth out of his mouth,hee meenneth the thunders that are made in the ayre : and therein hee declareth by a similitude , that our Lorde hath a maner of speeche which is able too make all Creatures too quake, And not onely in this place , but also in the nine and twentith Psalme it is sayde, That the voyce of God thundereth, the voice of God maketh the Mountaine of Libanus too rore, the voyce of God cleaueth the greate trees, the voyce of God maketh the Hindes to cast their Calves, the voyce of God is hearde in the Mountaynes, the voyce of God maketh the whole Earth too shake.

This voyce is none other thing, than the same n oise that is made by the thunder : neverthe lesse it serueth too reproue men of their vnthankfulness, in that they giue not eare too Godsthundering : according also as it is a common prouerbe when men play the madde men, too saye that they are so lowde , that a man could not heare God thunder for them.

Yee see then that the Scripture vpbraydeth vs with such blockishnesse, and bereueuth vs of all excuse . For if men say, Tush we never had any learning, the scripture was never opened vntoo vs : what then ? Did it never thunder in all our life ? Did God never speake ? Haue we not conceyued such a majestie in him, as we ought of right to stoupe to honour him , and to submit our selues vnder his obedience ? But all that we do, is to no purpose, we bee as bad as brute beastes , there is as it were a madnesse in vs matched with pride, if we cannot consider that he hath all authoritie ouer vs. Ye see then that men are sufficiently conuicted when it thundereth. For they ought to consider the voyce of God, namely the greate and lowdsounding noyse whiche maketh the ayre too roare.

Againe, if men say they bee ignorant and as it were in darkenesse : what matter makes that ? The lightnings do as it were clyue asunder the Skies, and wee see suche a brightnesse, as God sheweth himselfe sufficienly, yea euen to take all couert from vs , that no man might flatter himselfe in his hypocrisie, nor go about too justifye himselfe , as though wee had knowne nothing of God. For the lightning is ynough to shewe vs the glorie that is in him. Thus ye see why Eliu speakest heere of the greate noyse and sounde that proceedeth oute of Gods mouth. And hee inlargeth the matter because menne are to retchlesse , and if one tell them in fewe woordes, the matter which I go aboue to lay forth, they haue no greate regarde of it , it slippeth away from them out of hande.

Heere therefore Eliu standeth longer vpon his matter, and pursueth it further, bycause wee ought to consider well the order that is in the thunder and lightning, and also in the raine and deawes , and in all the stormes that we perceyue. And he speakest expressly of sweete and gentle showers , and also of the boystousnesse and violence that are seene oftentimes in that behalfe, as in pursuing that which he had touched alreadie concerning Gods judging of the worlde, sometime by sending raine from heauen, and somtime by giving abundance of food. For if a sweete raine come in due season, it will make the Earth frutefull : but [ otherwise ] the raine will marre and destroy all the benefites whereby we looke for sustenance. Therefore wee perceyue both twaine of these things in God : and that deserueth well to be considered. Also that is the cause why it is sayde, that God dooth wondervfull things whiche wee comprehendē not , by the thunders which hee sendeth. For in verie deede , after it hathe so flashed, and that the Lightning hathe flowen throughout, and the Thunderclappes haue beene heard : immediately there commeth a tempest, and God letteth the raine, and the storme, and the hayle to poure downe without tariance:and whersoeuer the dint of the tempest lighteth, there insue incredible things. For ye shall see a man consumed to ashes. He shall keepe still his shape, and hardly shall yee finde a hole so bigge as a pease, and yet notwithstanding the man shall bee quite consumed. A hard swoorde shall bee vterly molten , and the scabber that yeeldeth shall be whole still. Trees shall be somtyme rooted vp, somtyme wrung asunder, and somtyme vterly consumed, so as there shalbe nothing left of thē. As much

is done too houses. To bee short, if a man consider all the effectes of a tempest, they be things that coulde not bee beleued, if they were not knowne by experience. And therefore it standeth men in hande to humble them-selues, considering the weakenesse of theyr owne witte, and the mightyngesse of Gods woorkes. If wee bee not worse than blockishe, wee muste needes learne heereby, too submitte our selues vnto him, and to honour him, and to yelde him all glorie and soueraintie. This in effect is it that Eliu sheweth vs. But first of all let vs 10 beare in minde what hath beene touched : that is to wit, that it is not ynoch for vs too conceyue God too bee the maker of the worlde, and too father all power vpon him: but we must also knowe him to bee our father, because he draweth vs too him with so gentle and louing a care, as if we were his owne children. What earthly father dooth so much for those that are descended of him? Then to knowe rightly what God is, it behoueth vs too taste of his goodnesse, which hee vittereth too vs, and maketh vs too feele, and whereof wee receyue the 20 frutes and the inioyment euen in this mortall lyfe. Now when we do so taste Gods goodnesse : it is too leade vs further, that is too witte, that wee shoulde trust in him, and consider that hee hath not put vs into this worlde, to the ende wee shoulde perishe as brute beastes : but too bring vs too the euerlasting heritage whiche hee hath promised vs. Therefore wee may well grounde a right trust in God, by reason of the benefites which wee receyue of him : and we may well conclude, that oure soules are more precious to him, than our bodyes : and that if hee vouchsafe too serue vs the things that are requisite to mainteyne vs in this worlde, he will not leave the cheefe poynt. Vee see then, that if wee had our eyes open to beholde Gods prouidence, and the order of nature that is set afore vs : the same woulde serue too teache vs too put our whole trust in him. And when wee repose suche trust in him, wee may also call vpon him, assuring oure selues that sithe hee watcheth ouer vs, our prayers shall not bee vnknowne vnto him, but hee will accept them. Lo what we haue too put in vre. 40 And surely it woulde be our true wisdome, if wee coulde minde these things, and settle our thought vpon them. Vee shoulde fare the better all our life long. But what? Vee do nothing else but wander in fonde speculations, and therefore we reap none other rewarde but oure owne vanitie. Vee see howe men are intangled in these earthly things : and if a bodie speake to them of the heavenly kingdome, they vnderstande him not : for surely they be not worthie of it,

So muche the more then behoueth it vs too take 50 heed to that which is conteyned heere : namely that we acknowledge the goodnesse of our God in that he nou-risheth vs, and that wee bee boide too call vpon him as our father, and too flee too him for refuge, seeing hee sheweth himselfe to bee our father, and that we haue so good a gage of it, in that he not onely telleth vs it by hys owne mouth, but also hath his hande open too make vs feele wherewith. On the other syde, let vs learne too feare, when wee see him execute his iudgements, yea, euen by meanes whiche sometymes are for oure welfare. So then let vs learne there, that God myndeth to subdue vs to himselfe, and too teach vs to serue him, and not to prouoke his anger wilfully: but rather to come vnto him with all reverence, sithe we knowe that hee is armed with such power to reuenge himselfe of the dispysers of his maiestie, least he poure oute that greate and terrible priuance vpon vs. And that also is the cause why Sainct Peter bringeth vs too these considerations, namely, that God did once destroy the worlde, and wipe away all the inhabitants of the Earth by water, whiche notwithstanding is the beginning thereof. If a man de-maunde whereof, or of what stiffe the worlde was made : wee see in the holy Scripture, that it was a confuzed matter, which God did let downe at the first beginning, and that the same was water, wherein there was nothing but depth and confuzednesse. VVell then, yee see that suche was the originall beginning of the worlde : and when God intended too destroy all mankind, wherewith armed hee himselfe? Hee sente a floud. Yee see then, that the water from whence wee drawe oure lyfe, and whiche hath beene as it were the groundwoorke of the whole worlde, hath neverthelesse beene the destruction thereof. Sith we see thys, let vs consider that we haue no being heere bylowe without the hand of God : and that whereas we be lightened by the Sunne, whereas we drawe breath from the ayre, and whereas we be nourished and fedde with breade : it is not the Creatures themselues that doo giue or main-teyne our lyfe. And why? For God will turne all into death when he listeth : and the instrumentes of hys goodnesse shall be turned into deadly swordes to destroy vs. So then let vs learne, that when God sendeth vs either hayle, or noysom rayne, or sore frostes : his shewing of himselfe terrible in those things, is too the ende that wee shoulde knowe our sinnes, and enteringe into our selues, beseech him of forgiuenesse for oure offences past, and learne to stande in awe of him hereafter, and to obey him better than we haue done heretofore. Moreouer, whensoever wee haue felt one stripe of his hande, let it not sticke in our minde for one day onely, but let it serue vs too thinke vppon euerafter. Hath God sente vs any drought? Or hath hee sente vs any raine? Vve must beare it in remembraunce, and not looke to haue it beginne againe, but bethinke vs thus: Go too, during the time that I haue liued in the worlde, I haue seene sometymes that the rayne hath marred all the seede that was layd into the ground: in steade of Corne, men haue had Darnell, or nothing at all: and againe, God hath so parched the earth with heate, that all hath beene seared away: or else there hath beene some winde that hath shaken downe or blasted all that was for the sustenance of man and beast. I haue seene all this, and I haue seene also that by such meanes God hath sent famin. Nowe then, I must not tary till God strike againe, but it must bee a learning too mee for all the tyme of my lyfe. Thus ye see in what wyse wee must put thys doctrine in vre.

Moreouer, es oft as we haere it thunder, let vs vnderstande that it is a sounde whiche proceedeth from the mouth of God: For our wittes must not friske and wanze awaie in the ayre, as though the Thunder were ingendered there, wythout the commaundement of a superior maister. Then let vs come vnto God, and assure our selues that the thunder must needs bee ingendered by the power of his mouth. And when the ayre is so troubled, and all on a rore: let vs vnderstande that the same is no dead thing, but the very order whiche God hath stablished, whereby hys power is manifested vnto vs.

Ye see then what we haue to remember. But if we can perceyue that God moueth mens heartes by lightning, raine, and tempests: let vs assure our selues that we bee doublefolde guiltie before him, when wee haue familiarly taught, not by a confuzed noyse, but by his woordes, so as hee offereth vs a doctrine that is certayne, and wherein we may be edifyed. And doubtlesse we deserue too bee much more greeuously condemned, if we take not profite of the hearing of this voyce, whereby hee dooth not strike vs in feare, but comfort vs. True it is that when souer Gods worde is preached, the ende whereto it tendeth is to make vs feele our wantes. For it is not withoute cause that Gods woerde is tearmed a twoo edged sworde, to examine men, and to search all their thoughts and affections. And for the same cause it is sayde also, Heb.4.c.12. that we must be sacrificed vnto God by the meanes of the Gospell. There must then be a kinde of dying in vs, or else Gods worde shall neuer preuaile in vs. VVe must renounce our selues, & whatsoever is of our own nature must be beaten down. Thus ye see how our Lord thundereth and lightneth by his worde. But on the other side, by the selfe same worde he also quickeneth vs, conforteth vs, and (to be short) giueth vs a full ioy, in that hee calleth vs to himself, & offereth vs his sonne to guide vs thither, telling vs that in him we be assured of our saluation. So then seeing that God speakest so familiarly vnto vs, if wee hearken not vntoo him too gloriſie him, lyeth there not a more greeuous and horrible damnation vpon vs, than vpon such as never had any teaching, more than theyr onely beholding of the order of nature, and their hearing of the Thunder, and yet were moued inwardly at it?

True it is that this perceyuerance shall be ynough to condemne vs (as I haue sayde alreadie,) and although men had never heard eyther lawe or scripture: yet notwithstanding, if they lyued in this worlde, they haue nor any excuse: for God is sufficiantly declared vntoo them too reprove them of malice and wilfull stubbornnesse. And vndoubtedly wee see that God hath tormented and as it were racked the greatest despysers of his Maiestie that ever were, by histhunder: Reade the Storyes of the Heathen men, and yee shall see that the greatest scorneres of God that ever were, haue beeene so frayde and afflighed, that mauger their heartes, they haue shewed at the hearing of the thunder: yea and confessed that there was a God above the thunders and tempests, whome they were inforced to feare. God hath distresst the in such wise, that they were set (as ye would say) vppon a scaffolle, as if open execution shoule bee done vppon some man that had wrought high treason agaynst his Prince. Euen the greatest Princes of the worlde haue taken knowledge by thunders and tempests, that there was a God in heauen which gouerneth all. And that is a prooef, that the thunder ought to bee ynough to bowe the hardest heartes that can bee, seeing there is such a marke of Gods Maiestie in it. Then needeth there none other thing than the tempests and lightnings that are seene in the ayre, to condemne the dogges and swine that make a mocke of all Religion. Although there were neither lawe nor doctrine in wryting: yet doth the onely thunder holde them conuictid, so that spite of their teeth they must bee faine to graunt that there is a God in Heauen.

So then this voyce whereof mencion is made heere, will be ynough to condemne all the men in the worlde, although they had never heard nor read so much as one worde of doctrine. Howbeit we must alwayes come to the comparison that I haue touched: which is, that if Gods thundering in the ayre with a confused sounde be a sufficient speaking to condemne the vnbeleuers, and his making of the lightnings too flash abroade, is a sufficient light too condemne the blinde: what shall follow when hee speaketh gently, and vseth so amiable a manner of teaching, yea and euen lisbeth with vs, too the intent we might ynderstande him the better? VVhen he not onely affrighteth vs not, but also allureth vs with gentlenesse and courtesie too come vnto him, if wee bee stubbornre agaynst him, what shall become of vs? VVhat excuse will there be for vs? And heere ye see why (in the Psalme that I haue alledged) it is sayde, that in the Psal.29.b.9 Temple of God euerie man shall giue God glorie. For after that the Prophet had spoken of this mighty voyce of God which maketh the mountaynes too remoue, the Rockes too melt away, the Earth too quake, the trees too fall downe from mounte Libanus, and the wylde Goates too slinke their Kiddes in the Forrestes, and which moueth and shaketh the whole worlde: afterward he addeth, that God shall bee glorifyed in his Temple. And howe then? VVhen the lightnings flash through the wings of the Earth, that is to say, ouer all the borders of the Earth, and the Thunderclappes are hearde from the one side of the worlde, to the other: ought not God to be knowne in all things, and ought not both greate and small to do him homage? Yes verely. And wherefore then doth the Prophete speake specially of the Temple of God? It is according to the comparison that I haue touched: which is, That God affrighteth and wakeneth the Heathen men when he thundereth: howbeit, that is not to bring them to saluation, but onely too cenuince them vtterly, to the ende they shoulde not pretende any tryſling excuse that they knewe not God nor his Maiestie. They knewe him sufficiantly to their viter condemning, but as for vs, Gods intent is to drawe vs too saluation when hee speaketh vntoo vs. For there hee thundereth not too make the ayre rore, neyther maketh he a confused noyse, as I haue sayde: but hee speaketh gently and familiarly, he vttereth his heart vnto vs, hee sheweth vs which is the way of life, and he enlightneth vs with the brightness of his worde which shineth vpon vs. Thus ye see why God deserueth too bee glorifyed in hys Temple. For although he bee manifested to the whole worlde, and all creatures are inuited too prayse him, yea and that they be constreynd and inforced therewith: yet is there a farre other more mighty and royall power in the worde that is preached vnto vs. For there God sheweth and vttereth himselfe in such sort, as wee must needes be worse than brutish and blockish, if we thinke not vpon him too submit our selues too all that is spoken to vs in his name and authoritie. Thus ye see what we haue to beare in minde.

And by the way let vs consider howe malicious the worlde is, seeing that the woerde of God (for all that it is so well preached and knowne,) is notwithstanding so ill receyued of most men, and so little reuerenced, insomuche that it shoulde seeme that men are purposed too spight God in reiecting all doctrine, notwithstanding that they knowe and are fulye assured that it is of him.

See ye not how rebellious the Papistes are at this day? But let vs not go so farre, let vs come home among our selues. Men professe themselues to be minded to holde of the Gospell: and yet notwithstanding, let them be spoken to in the name of God, let things be laid open before the, let matters be made so plain vnto them, that euen the veriest diuels of them be conuictid, that the things which are preached are taken out of the holy scripture: and yet they continue still in their stubbornnesse, without making any conſcience to striue against God. Their maliciousnesse is matched with shamelesſnesse, insomuch that me are come to such point, as we neede not to go out of Geneva to see most manifest rebellion in setting light by God, or to see such diuelish pride as to say, Tis he God shall not raigne ouer vs, let them prattle and talke what they list, and yet

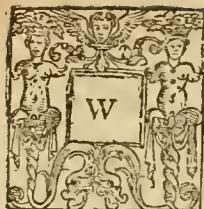

yet will we not yelde a whitte for them. Verily there is such rebelliousnesse to be seene that men make as much account of the things that are spoken in Sermons, as of Fables. This thing is too notorious, the examples thereof are too open, and woulde God they were not such to our great confusion. But yet in the ende, they that haue dallyed so with so great a mayster, must bee faine too knowe him whome they haue wounded and pricked as the Prophete Zacharie sayeth. So then, it behoueth vs to marke well this sentence, and so to marke it, as we may bee more apt and willing to bee taught at Gods hand, than these wilde beastes are, which sharpen themselves agaynst him, too reiect all that concerneth his doctrine and pure woerde. For there is yet some shamefastnesse in the Papistes. VVhen they fight agaynst the holy Scripture, for the maintenance of their Idolatries and abhominations, they seeke false glozes and shifftes, and to bee short, although their couering of themselves be but with a wette sache, yet notwithstanding they confess that their intent is not too resist God. 20 But when men steppe foorth with such vngodlinessse, as they cannot finde in theyr heartes to receyue one worde of that which is knowne too bee Gods truth, but frette and chafe agaynst it, so as there is not so much honestie in them as to admitt the thing which they knowe to be good, but doo the cleane contrarie: is it not manifest therein, that we bee much worse than the wretched Papistes? VVherefore (as I sayde) at leastwise let thys serue vs for a warning, that we bee not doublefolde condemned. And specially aboue all things, sith he com- 30 meth vnto vs, and speakest too vs, and gathereth vs together in his name, to the ende to be hearde, and to sitte in such wise among vs, as all of vs both great and small may referre our selues to him: let vs bethinke vs to glorifie him: not only with our mouth, by confessing slightly that we be his: but also [with our deedes] by giuing proof in effect that we be desirous to be his heritage. And sith he vouchsafeth this incomprehensible benefit, grace, and honour vpon vs, to give himselfe to vs, and to be our life: let there also bee an interchaugeable gift on our 40 side, let vs put our selues wholy into his hande, let him possesse vs, and let him enjoy vs. Furthermore, whereas it is sayde, that God dooth great and mightie things in thundering, and in sending forth lightnings and tempests, and that we comprehend it not: let vs be sure that in speaking both by his lawe, and by his Gospell, hee intendeth to lift vs vp aboue all our vnderstanding, as in verie deede we shall never profit in the doctrine of God, nor in his word that is set forth vnto vs, if we haue not this principle, that is to wit, that God exerciseth vs in secrets that surmount all our capacitie: according as it is sayde, that God hath prepared suche things for those that loue him, as never Esa.64.4 eye of man sawe, nor eare of man hearde, nor never entered into the heart of anie creature. Then if wee haue not that grounde, wee shall never taste the things that are preached to vs euerie day. Nowe to the intent wee may taste them well, what is to be done? Let vs consider that our Lorde calleth vs to his heavenly kingdome, and is minded to draw vs out of this worlde. Intend we then to be good schollers, and to profite in the doctrine of our Lorde Iesus Christ? Sith we see that we be plunged [ouer heade and eares] in this worlde, and in these corruptible things: let vs labour too wade out, and let vs from day to day fight against our owne affections, that we may draw neere vnto God, and be made alone with our Lord Iesus Christ, according as Saint Paule sheweth vs in the thirde to the Colossians, that if wee minde to haue part Col.3.1.5. in heauen, and to cleave vnto Iesus Christ, who is gone vp aloft, and to bee made one with him: it behoueth vs to mortifie whatsoever is of the earth. Furthermore, let vs consider that oure wittes are too rude and feeble too conceyue what God is in full perfection, insomuch that we shall never haue any smali taste of him, except hee guide vs by his holyc Spirite, according also as Saint 1.Cor.2.12.10. Paule maketh the same conclusion in the foresayde text 12. which I touched, where he cyteth the saying of the Prophete Esay. Therefore after hee hath sayde that the sensuall man comprehendeth not the secretes of God: he sayeth we bee renued by the holy Ghost, too the ende we may haue knowledge of them. True it is that wee haue not beene of counsell with God, according as hee declareth there againe afterwarde. But yet dooth hee admit vs counsell so farre foorth as is expedient for vs. Therefore when as wee knowe our owne infirmitie, let vs pray him to inlighten vs by his holy spirite, that wee may know the things which otherwise would be to high and profounde for vs.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs so to feeie them, as we may bee touched with them, to condemne ourselues for them, and to mislike of our selues: and that in the meane while he will so worke by his holy spirit, as we may be renued to obey him, and to walke in his feare: and that we may profit therin more and more, vntill such time as being quite rid of all fleshly corruptions, we be clothed againe with his righteousness and heauenly glorie. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heauenly fath~~o~~&c.

The Cxlv. Sermon, which is the second vpon the xxxvij. Chapter.

7. He sealeth the handes of all men, to the ende to knovve the men of his vworke.
8. The beastes shrinke into their dennes, and keepe themselves vwithin their lodgings.
9. He maketh the vvhirlevvinde to come out of a heape, and the colde commeth from the scaterring vvinde.
10. At the breath of God the frost is giuen, and againe abundant vwaters oute of a narrovve place.
11. Hee maketh the Cloudes to labour to moysten, and sendeth rayne, and maketh the Claude to shedde out through his light.
12. Hee maketh the circles to turne about by his gouernance, to the ende to doo vwhat he commandeth ouer the vvhole vvorlde.
13. VVhither it be for a scourge, or for his Earth, or of mercie that he taketh it avvay.

Ee saw yesterday, that the astonishment which men conceyue of the thunder, is as a prooef of Gods maiestie and power. According therewnto it is sayde heere, that God in thundering, doeth as it were set a seale vpon mens handes, to keepe them close, namely, to the ende to knowe the men of his making. And the beastes also are faine to shrinke intoo their dennes. As if it were sayde, that God draweth men a part, as if some bodie shoulde gather all his folke togither, a householder his householde meynie, a prince his subiects, or a Capitaine his souldiours, too the intent to muster them. Thus yee see the cheefe intent of this streyne. And the same extendeth even too the wilde Beastes, too shewe that even they also are in the hande of God. And hee proueth that they are at his commaundement when it pleaseth him, if by nothing else, yet even by the thunder, in that the same compelleth them too bee as it were shet vp in prisyon. In verie deede this verse is commonly translated, That God setteth as it were a Seale vpon mennes handes, to the intent they shoulde knowe their owne woorkmanship: as who shoulde say, that all the frowardnesse which men haue too applie themselues to one thing or other, is by reason that God hath printed a marke vpon them, and that they haue it not otherwise than by instruction gien them from heauen. But the text will not suffer it too bee vnderstoode so. VVorde for worde it is, to the ende to knowe the men of his making. It followeth therefore that God doth then knowe men, when he holdeth them after that maner as it were locked and shet vp within their houses. To the ende that this may be vnderstoode the better: when men haue libertie to go and run, it seemeth that they be as it were exempted from subiection. If it be fayre weather, one goes into the feeldes, another in the streetes, and somen sceme not too bee hilde any more vnder subiection. But if it bee fowle weather, so as it thunder, or that there is any blustres sing winde abrode: then men are faine too keepe within doores. Therefore it is like as if a man should assemble his householde and say to them, I will know how they behauie themselves, and what euerie man doth, and euerie man shall make me his account. Lo howe God appoynteth men a time to be gathered togither, to the ende too make his musters, and to shewe that all are in subiection vnto him. And this (as I sayde) extendeth even too the wilde beastes. For when the beastes wander abrode, they seeme not to be in subiection to God. But when he maketh some tempestes, so as the bec driven home to their dennes: then must men needs perceyue, that God hath a secrete bridle to holde them with, when he listeth. VVe see then, that the thing that was treated of yesterday is declared heere yet more expressly: that is to witte, that the thunder is the messenger of Gods Maiestie, not onely in that it astonisheth men: but also in that it compelleth them to hide themselues in their houses: which is all one as if God shewed that hee holdeth men in hys hande, and that mennes going and comming abrode, is because hee giueth them leaue, howebeit that he could holde them shette vp at his pleasure. Sith wee see this, let vs learne too yelde obedience vnto God at all times. For if wee acknowledge not the subiection that wee owe vnto God, but when it thundereth: we shall haue profited but slenderly in his doctrine. Neuerthelesse the same is a yutting of vs in remembrance, to consider that he ruleth all our steppes, and that wee cannot stirre one finger withoute his guiding. Therefore let vs acknowledge it, and learne too bee subiect too him at all tymes, and to suffer our selues too bee gouerned by him. Lo what wee haue to haire away in this streyne. And if we haue not this advisednesse and discretion with vs, behold the vrie beastes are able too teach vs. For wherefore do the Lions, Beares, VVoolues, and all other wilde beastes, keepe themselues in their Caues and Dennes: but hycause God sheweth himselfe too bee superiour ouer them. Therfore if wee will needes runne astray, and not suffer God to holde vs as it were shet vp vnder his hand, but will shake off the signet or Seale that is spoken off heere: the Beastes shall condemne vs by their example. Beholde yet further what wee haue too haire in mynde, that wee may the better profite our selues by the whole sentence. The Hebrewe woordē that Eliu vseth heere, signifieth properly too Seale, as when men seale a Letter, to the ende it shoulde not bee looked intoo. Also a man maye seale a Coser, or a Cupboorde, by setting a Seale vpon it, when he will not haue anie bodie too looke intoo it. God then vseth a dreadfull kinde of sealing, when hee sendeth thunder and tempests. Heere is no printing of waxe with a ring or other materiall Seale: but he compelleth men too keepe themselues as it were shet vp, so as they be after a sort close prisoners in theyr owne house. It is not with their owne good wittes: and therefore let them consider that there is a mayster aboue them, and that no part of their whole life is in their own hande. Thus yee see howe this similitude is set downe heere, to the ende we shoulde compare the incomprehensible maiestie of God, with all the things that we can see among the worldly creatures. And it is sayde immediatly, that God maketh the tempest to come out of the heape of Clowdes, and againe, that it is the scattering windē, or the Northwindē that causeth the colde to come. These chaunges heere do set forth Gods mightie power the better, to the ende hee shoulde bee glorified thereby. Truely if God kept alwayes one ordinarie rate, so as there were never greate heate, nor great colde, nor anye windē or raine, but that the ayre were alwayes temperate, and suche a measure were kept, as men might continually feele themselves disposed after one manner: it were a thing more to our lyking. If wee were delt with after oure owne desyre, wee coulde finde in oure heartes too haue a continuall springyng me, so it might bee too oure profit. Then like as the heate combereth vs, so also the colde greeueth vs, and wee would faine bee exempted from them both, and haue the ayre so temperate, as nothing might bee disliked, nor nothing go agaynst our myndes. But in the meane while, Gods glorie is better perceyued in the chaunges that are made: as when hee causeth raine too fall vppon the grounde, and anon after scattereth the Clowdes, and remoueth them, rayseth vp whirlwindes, and causeth colde to succeede heate: the same doth better set out his Maiestie, and also waketh vs, to the ende we shoulde thinke thereon. For we see how dull mens wittes are, and therefore it is requisite that we shoulde be touched more to the quicke. True it is that if we had the witte too looke vpon God with a cleare and pure eyght: his giuing of vs lyfe and sustenaunce in this worlde woulde bee ynough for vs.

But forsoomuch as we be so gresse, and therewithall also so malicious, that wee never come vnto him except hee drive vs perforce: it is for our behoofe to be touched by the chaunges that are made. For when wee see the weather fayre, and then sodainly the ayre is troubled: when the Clowdes thicken after a heate: when a raine commeth and cleareth the ayre, and by and by followeth a frost: when there is suche as drought a it maye seeme that the Earth shall bee brunt vppe, and

anon God sendeth the clowdes and maketh them labour to releeue vs if he intend too giue vs seasonable weather: I say when we see such alteracions: then must wee needs be woorse than blockish if we thinke not vpon God. And vndoubtedly (as I sayd afore) he bringeth himself to our remembrance, and sheweth himself after a more manifest and visible maner, than if things should alwayes kepe on in their owne course. This is the cause whi Eliu standeth so much vpon this text, to lay foorth and expresse the alterations that are made in the aire by fayre wether to and fowle, by heate and cold, by clowds & cleere wether, by whirlwinds and frosts, and by diuers other things. And for the same cause also it is sayd, that God by his government maketh the Circles to turne about: for I expound this as though it were sayd, that the world is renewed when such alteracions happen. If there were but one season all the yeare long: things would looke alwayes after one sort. But when as the Sunne shyneth one day, and anon after is suddeinly hidden and couered: behold, there are as it were two diuerse worlds, and such varietie protoketh vs to consider the better, that there is a God which governeth all things. For howe is it possible that things should alter in suchwise, and that there should bee such a turning about: but that God woorketh it aboue? VV<sup>e</sup> see one whyle that the earth is shet vp with cold, and that the ayre also is possessed with it: and contrarywise we see that all is set at libertie again by fayre and pleasant wether: Lo heere new worlds. And so it is not without cause that Eliu addeth for a conclusion, that God maketh the Circles (that is to say the world) to turne about, making them too chaunge now after one fashyon, and now after another. And why? To the intent that if wee bee not sufficiently taught by one meane, wee should lift vp our countenance to heauen, and looke round about vs, that at leastwise by beholding the sodein alteracions that are made, wee myght be prouoked the more to knowe God, that hee myght be glorified, according also as we haue more occasion so to do. This is it that we haue to remember in this streyne. And now wee see that the mo meanes that God giueth vs to come to him, that we myght bee taught too feare and honour him: so much the leſſe can wee excuse our vnthankfulness, and so much the more shall we bee to blame if wee cannot profit ouरselues by them. Therfore there is nother fayre weather nor fowle, heate nor cold, hayle nor tempest, which shal not set it self against vs at the judgement of God. They shall beare witnesse agaynst vs, to discouer and shewe the lewdnesse that is in vs, because we haue not honored him that hath shewed himself so many wayes, and on all sides allured vs to behold his maiestie. And therfore as oft as the weather chaungeth, although the alteracions be troublesome too vs at the first sight: yet let vs vnderstand that they bee for our welfare, for by that meanes God wakeneth vs, as I sayd afore. The having of fayr weather were ynough too besotte vs, if there should be no chaunge. But if rayne come, then wee thinke with ouरselues, verie well, God can make a new world in the turning of a hand, yea euen without perishing of the substance of it at all: Howbeit the fashyon of it shall be so defaced, as it shall seeme to be new turkined. Now then, when wee consider this: wee knowe that Gods vsing of such alteration as we see, is for our welfare and saluation. Furthermore let vs marke well the fashyons of speeche that are set downe heere. For if there be a greate drought, the skye seemeth to be of yron or brasie, and after the same maner also doeth the hollye Leuit. 26.c. scripture speake of it. VVhen God threateneth to punish 19 & Deut. men by taking away the Rayne, he sayeth, I will give you 8.e.23. an earth of yron, and a heauen of brasie: the earth shall be shet vp so as shee shall not open her breſts to giue you ſucke, and the heauen also ſhal bee ſo hard, as it ſhal giue you no rayne. Now if Rayne come after a great drought: the ſame is the more woorderfull: for men would not haue looked for ſuch a chaunge, if they had not ſeen it come to paſſe. Therfore they maruell at it. But the woondernesse dimmeth our eyſight, and maketh vs not too eſteeme Gods miraclēs as we ought to do. Nevertheleſſe, when the wether is ſo ſoone chaunged and altered, and ſo ſuddeinly darkened: the thing in it ſelf ſheweth a ſingular woorking of God. Also it is ſayd, that God maketh the clowdes to labour to moisten the earth: namely as though they cliued afunder and emptied themſelues, that the earth might receiuē nurriſhment. Marke this labour wherunto God imploreyeth the clowds for our ſeruice, in that he dreepeth downe the Rayne from them, and afterward when they haue ſucked vp the moſture from beneath, they yeeld ouer their nurriſhment backe again, and in the end wanze away and conſume to nothing. Therfore whē wee heare that God guideth his creatures after that manner, to implorey them too our vſe, as if he ſhould ſend vs menſeruants and maydſeruants for wages: let vs therin acknowledge his infinite goodneſſe. And this is not ſayd of the clowds only: but alſo of the Sunne and the Moone, which are right noble creatures, & yet neuertheleſſe God Deut. 4.c.19. voutsafeth to implorey them to our vſe.

Seing then that ſo much is ſayde of the Sunne and Moone whom God imploreyeth to our ſeruice: therin we ſee the loue that he beareth vs, and how hyghly we are in his fauour, and how preciouſe our life is vnto him. Truly this commeth not of our owne woorthineſſe, for who are we? And yet notwithstanding, behold howe God ſubmitteth the heauens to our vſe. So much the more then haue men playd the beaſtes in woorſhipping the Sunne and the Moone: and for the ſame cause God telleth them in way of vpbrayding, that he had appoynted them to do them ſeruice. Therfore ſeing that God maketh the clouds and the earth alſo to labour and trauell after that ſort: let vs remember that bothe aboue and beneath, he ſheweth vs more than a fatherly loue, making vs to feele his goodneſſe, to the intent we ſhould conſider how dere and welbeloved we be of him, notwithstanding the wretchedneſſe that is in vs. For we be not woorthie to be reckened among the residue of his creatures. If men bee compared with the earth, with the aire, or with the verie brute beaſtes: it is certain that they are vnwoorthie to bee nurriſhed heere. And why? Because we be corrupted and marred: and therfore we haue ſo much the more cauſe to magnifie Gods goodneſſe towards vs. Furthermore, wherasit is ſayd, that he driveth away the clowdes with his brygtnesse: it is yet one chaunge more, which is woorderfull and ought to make vs too perceyue the hand of God. For behold, when the wether is cloſe, it ſeemeth to vs that wee haue quite and cleane lost the ſight of the Sunne. And if wee were not acquaynted with ſuch alteracions, wee would think that the water threatened too burye vs out of hand. And in good ſoothe what are the clowdes when they haue ſo ouercast the whole ayre, and that the earth is ſo wet as men ſee: Are they not as it were a graue? Now then, God maketh the clowdes to vaniſhe away in a minute of an hour: and to whom may that be imputed? Truly wee will ſay, to the order of nature: we will ſay, to custome. But howſoever it be, yet muſt we needes perceyue the hand of God if wee bee not to blockiſh. Therfore let vs beare in mynd, that it is no ſuperfluous talke whē Eliu vſeth this diuerſitie of matters, to ſhewe the maiestie that God ſetteth forth in the world by the ſayd varietie of tymeſ, to the intent to drawe vs vnto too him. And he sayeth expesly that he sendeth both clewdes and wylwyndes : and all to do the thinges that he hath ordeyned iþrough the whole world. As if he should say, that it behoueth vs alwayes to consider Gods myghtie power and dominion ouer all thinges which wee see, that we may learne to perceyue our owne sinnes when he punisheth vs, (as he will adagin anon) and also to the end we may so taste of his goodnesse, as we may be throughly filled with it when it pleaseþ him to handle vs gently. To the end then that wee may knowe these thinges: let vs consider that the creatures gouerne not themselves, but that God disfozeþ of them as he thinketh good: and that is, too do whatsoeuer he commaundeth vpon the earth. Heerof wee have a good lesson too gather. For what is the cause that wee bee so afryd of thunder and of other things, but for that wee feare not God? And it is a just punishment of our vnbeleef. Men will not feare God: and whither sendeth he them? Euen too the senslesse creatures: and that is to put them to the greater shame. Looke vppon a despizer of God, which trampleth all religion vnder foote: he is carryed away with a diuelish rage: he shaketh off all difference of good and euill: and yet notwithstanding he is inforced too bee afryd of the thunder, insomuch that hee is as it were out of his wittes and in a traunce. Marke the payement which all they deserue that are loth too yeld obedience vnto God: they stand in awe of a senslesse creature.

So then let vs learne to graunt our God the myghtie power which belongeth vnto him, to the end wee may bee exempted from this fearfulnessesse which the ignorant and vnbeleeuers haue, and all the carkeridharted sort, and the despizers of all religion. For if wee knowe that God guideth and gouerneth the tempestes: then shall wee perceyue that being in his hand wee shall bee free from all daunger when it pleaseþ him. The thunder can doo nothing. And although wee see it flye abrode, and shooþe from heaven to the earth in a moment: Yet is it still in the hand of God. And therfore like as a swoord cannot wound men when it is eyther flat vppon the earth, or when it is in the scabberd: euen so is it with the thunder and lyghtening: they can do nothing simply of themselves, but God darteth them where hee listeth. If wee once knowe this, wee shall not bee afryd of the thunder. True it is that it will abashe vs, but therewithall it will serue vs for a spurre too pricke vs forward, that wee may bee confirmed in the feare of God, and profit more and more therin. Neverthelesse whatsoeuer come of it, wee cannot bee dismayed at the thunder, bycause wee are sure that God dispozeth of it, and that we ourselves also are in his custodie, so as the thunder cannot doo anye thing against vs more than pleaseþ him, likewise wee must not bee afryd of the hayle, but of him that sendeth it. VVee must not bee ouerfearfull of a tempest so as wee should bee dismayed at it: but wee must tremble before the maiestie of our God: and when wee haue trembled, wee must mortifie all our fleshy affections, and take the comfort which he giveth vs on the contrarie part in shewing himself a father towards vs.

Behold (I say) how wee ought to put this sentence in vre. But these creatures also must serue vs for example. Forsooth wee see that the rayne, the wyndes, the stormes and all things do excuse whatsoeuer God commaundeth them, what ought wee to doo? Hath the rayne care too heare what God appoynteþ? nether Sunne, nor earth, nor clouds, nor ayre, haue any reason or vndeystanding: and yet wee see that all these creatures serue and obey God. There falleth not one drop of rayne too the ground, without his will. The Sunne doeth nother ryze & 10. b. 13. nor set, otherwyse than God hath limited his pace and & 14. d. 22. assigned his course, in somuch that hee missteth not one twincing of an eye of it. As much is too bee sayde of all other creatures. As for vs then which haue speche, which haue eares too heare, which haue vnderstanding and reason: haue wee not sufficient evidence too condemne vs, if wee apply not all those things to the obeying of our God, seing that the whole order of nature is nouȝt else than a proof of the obedience whiche all creatures bothe above and beneathe doo yeld vnto God? VVee (as hath bene sayd alreadye) are men of his making: for (as it is also sayd in the Pselme) It is not man that made himself, but it is God that made him. Seing Psa.100.43 then that wee hold all things of him: ought the strength (which he hath giuen vs) to bee as a furie to rush against him and to resist him, and to stop his will from hauing free course? And yet notwithstanding, that is the marke 20 that all our indeuers shooþe at. For if wee consider wherin men are moste foreward: we shall finde that they never leaue resisting of God and fighting against him, so as all their seeking is to abolishe his truthe, wherin wee see so much the greater spytefulnessse. Therfore let vs bee sure, that the rayne, wynde, stormes, tempests and such other like things, shall give a glosse too this diuelissh rebelliousnesse of ours, in that wee ceasse not too prouoke Gods wrath, and too plucke men from obeying of him, and from submitting themselves too his will, too bee quyetly governed by him. Lo what wee haue to marke in the second place of this sentence, where it is sayd, that through the uniuersall world the creatures doo whatsoeuer God hath ordeyned. Nowe in effect wee see heere the prouidence of God in the order of nature. Howbeit wee must come backe too that which was treated yesterday, as Eliu bringeth vs to it. Hee sayeth, Whither it bee for his scourge, or for his earth or for his mercie. In saying so, he sheweth (as was touched yesterday) that it is not ynoch too knowe that all things are vnder Gods hand, and that nothing is doone but by his will and disposing: but wee must also marke the end of his purpose, and the causes why he woorketh so. But as nowe our witts are feeble, insomuch that although God chawc our meate too vs, yet can wee not digest it in our minds.

The doctrine is set forth vnto vs by percellmeale, and God maketh it as familiar as can bee: and yet we bee so dulheaded, that wee understand it not as were requisite. How should wee doothen if wee had but only a generall knowledge of Gods gouerning of the world, and that wee had not a better and more particular instrucion wherby to knowe his goodnesse, iustice, and wiſdom: too the end wee myght bee drawne to his feare, and settle oureselves vpon the trust of his mercie? That is the cause why it is sayd heere agayne, Whither it bee for a scourge, or for his earth, or for his mercie. VVheras it is sayd whither it bee for a scourge: therby Eliu sheweth, that God chastizeth the world by rayne, heate, cold, tempests, and stormes. These then are every one of them Gods scourges, wherewithal he smiteth vs for our sinnes. Yet notwithstanding it is not for vs only that he hath created the world: considering that he pitith the earth saying that it is his. Also men are not worshipp that hee shoulde vse mercie towards them: Howbeit he myndeth too maynteyn the earth as his owne woorkmanship, whiche afterward serueth for them. Then may he sometimes lave an eye to himself and to the thing that he hath created, so as he restrayneth his rigour, and executeth it not to the fail, but moderateth it, notwithstanding that wee haue prouoked him. Therfore it behoueth vs to consider his gracieuse goodnesse in that point aboue all other. For vnsesse he forgiue vs our sinnes, or at leastwise beare with them for a tyme: surely the earth should perish vnder vs, and all the world should bee consumed, yea euen to our vtter destruction. So then, God giueth a ryght greate record of his mercie, in that it pleaseth him too spare vs after this maner. And this conclusion ought too serue vs to double purpose. The one is to confirmee that which hath bene set foorth alreadye.

And the other (as was told you yesterday) is too make vs feare God, and to serue him, and too put our whole trust in him. I say that this discourse concerning Gods gouernement in respect of the world, is the better warranted when wee see the diuersc fashyons of it, with the varietie of chaunges. As for example: Peraduenture God too chaste vs, sendeth some dearth. Now the dearth commeth of some one of the causes afore mentioned: namely eyther of frost, or of drought, or of noysome rayne, or of tempests, and so the aire punisheth vs. But the aire is a senslesse thing. Is it the rayne that be thinketh it self to correct our faults? Men may alledge vs naturall reasons, and saye that the rayne, the wynds, and the stormes are ingendered by suche meanes and such.

The Philosophers can well bring reasons, too saye that it hath some beginning, and that it is dispozed by some inferior causes. But in the meane season, doo not the chasteizements that God sendeth vpon vs, come of him? Shall any man father them vpon inferior causes? Behold, there is a countrie that was misgouerned, and it was meete that Gods hand should passe vpon it, according wherevntoo there commeth a rough scourge vpon it: nowe shall wee saye that this was of natures woorking? Ought wee not too acknowledge, that it is the iudge of heauen which chasteizeth countries, and sheweth vs that wee cannot scape his hand when wee haue donee amisse? So then let vs bee sure that God vttereth his fauour and goodnesse when hee sendeth vs seasonable and pleasant weather, and contrariwise, that hee punisheth our sinnes and transgressions, when hee sendeth vs foule and vnseasonable weather. Now if we knowe this, namely that the rayne is not rayzed of his owne naturall mouing, nor the stormes and tempests ingendered without Gods sending and appointing of them to whatsoever he thinketh good: this doctrine shall bee so much the better ratified. Lo howe this speciall conclusion leadeth vs so much the better vntoo God. But there is also a second poynt: which is, that seing that the rayne, whirlwyndes and hayle are Gods scourges, wee must learne too humble ourselues when hee correcteth vs. Let him not stryke vpon vs in vayne, but let vs bee pliable vnder him, too the end too humble ourselues in such wyse, as he may reygne quietly ouer vs. Truely it is a fowle shame for vs that wee must bee driuen too his seruice by force and by mayne stroks of the cudgell, seing that he allureth vs so gently: Is it the nature of a child too looks too bee so inforced, and too bee loth too come too his father but by compulsion? Yet notwithstanding God is fayne too woorke after that fashyon with vs, and considering our stubbornnesse and vntowardnesse to bee handled, he is constreyned to vse roughnesse. At leastwyse yet let vs then bow vnder him, when wee feele his rough strokes, in stryking vs with hayle, rayne, thunder, wynd, frost, tempests, and drought. Therfore when as wee feele so smart blowes, and the hand of God maketh vs to quake, and that the same feare serueth not to dismay vs, but to bring vs vnder his lufe that wee myght craue for-giuenesse of our sinnes: let vs learne that wee bee woorthie too bee so beaten, and let vs further understand: that wee shall not ceasse to prouoke his vengeance more and more, except he giue vs harts by his holye spirit. So then ye see how Gods scourges ought to stirre vs vp to come vnto him, to the intent too feare and honour him. Heerewithall let vs marke, that wheras it is sayde for his earth: God hath a respect to himself when he destroyeth vs not vtterly. Do wee then see that God suffereth vs too liue? Although it be with manye aduersities: yet doo we see a fauour and forbearing in him. For needes should we be vtterly wyped away at the first brunt, if he should deale with vs after our deseruing.

And therfore let vs marke how it is sayd, that God doth it for his earthes sake. Yea: for we be not woorthie to haue it doone for our saks: and therfore he sherteth his eyes and voutsafeth not to thinke vpon so shameful creatures as we bee. Yee see heere a disdeyne set foorth vntoo vs: that is to wit, that if God had none other consideracion than of vs, he myght rend vp bothe heauen and earth to destroy vs. And this serueth to bereeue vs of all our pride, and to make vs so much the more ashamed, to the end we might leaue our flattering of our selues: for wee see that men would fayne hyde their owne filthinesse. In what plight so euer they be, they ceasse not to like well of themselues, and to conceyue I wote not what a vaine imaginacion that they be of greate valewe. But it is sayd heere, that God estemeth and valeweth the earth at more than we deserue to be esteemed at. Neuerthelesse, too the intent we should not be dismayed, he addeth purposelly, that therethrough, God setteth foorth his mercie. Hath he then abashed vs by saying that he disdeyneth to haue respect to vs? He turneth again and sayeth, yet will I vse pitie, and make you feele my mercie. I will spare you. Yea: Howbeit, not bycause we be woorthie of it, (for we must awaies conclude, that whatsoever God doo for vs, he hath not respect vntoo any thing that is in vs) but when we bee once come too humilitie, and acknowledge that wee haue deserued too be destroyed at Gods hand then doeth he shewe vs that hee by his goodnesse surmounteth our naughtiness. This is the cause why hee addeth in the end, That God doeth it euen of his mere goodnesse and mercie. Now herof we haue to gather, that if raine come in due season, and faire weather also when wee would wishe it: wee haue not deserued that God should deale so gently with vs, neither must our myndes romaypon any wages that he yeeldeth vs, as though he were bound to vs, and that wee on our side were such as he of duetie ought to vse so tenderly as his childre. What then? It is his mere mercie: for we deserued wel to starue for hunger.

Then is there no reason why he should send vs nourishment, but only bycause he is good and pitifull. VVee deserue to be rooted out of the world, and he reacheth out his hand too feede vs as a father doeth his children. Therin therfore we see his vndeserued goodnesse. Lo howe wee ought too magnifie God in all the benefites that he dealeth vntoo vs, not taking them as any wages or hyre (as I sayd) which he ought too paye vs, and which wee haue deserued at his hand: but as free giftes of his mere goodnesse and liberalitie towardes vs. And herevpon we haue to conclude, that in as much as he beareth with vs, and that euen after we haue offended him and ought to be ouerwhelmed by his hand he ceaseth not to play the father stil, yea euen vpō our bodies which are but carions, smoke, & things of nought: insasmuch (say I) as our Lord woorketh so bountifullly towards our bodyes: wee ought ought to bee confirmed in a ryght trust, that he will receyue vs to mercie, and be readye to sorgiue vs our faultes whensoeuer we ask forgiuenesse at his hand. So then we see how our Lord doeth dayly call vs to saluacion. For we cannot eate one bit of bread, nor vse any of the temporall benefits that he bestoweth vpon vs : but he openeth heauen vnto vs to say, come to mee, and I will bee your fater and haue mercie vpon your sinnes. Yee shall always find mee readye to receive you, so ye desire to bee maytayned by my mere mercie.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good

God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him so to touche vs to the quick, that we misliking ourselues, may desire earnestly to be clezed by his grace : and therewithall that inasmuchas in all the order of nature he giueth vs so faire lookingglasses of his glorie, goodnesse and iustice, wee in beholding them, may be rauished to walk in his feare, so as we may serue and honor him, and yeld our selues wholly too his obeysance, too the end that hee may leade vs peascably whither it pleaseth him. That it so may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to al people and nacions of the earth, &c.

The cxlvij. Sermon, which is the third vpon the. xxxvij. Chapter.

14. Hear these things o Job: stay thyself, and consider the vvonders of God.
15. Knowest thou hovv God hath set them a lavve, and hovv he maketh the lyght too shyne out of his clovvede?
16. Vnderstandest thou the scatterings of the clovvds, and the miracles of him that is perfect in knovvledge?
17. Hovv thy clothes are * vvarme vwhen he maketh the Sovvthvvind to blovve?
18. V Vart thou vvith him to stretch out the heauen, vwhich is fast as a molten glasse?
19. Tell vs vvhat vvee shall say too him : for vvee cannot order our matters bycause of darkenesse.
20. If thou speake, vwho vvill report it too him? and if any man tellit him, shal he not besyvalloved vp?
21. VVhen the Sunne is hid men see not his lyght : and again the vvind blovveth and bringeth cleernesse.
22. Fayre vvether commeth from thenorth : and therfore God ought too bee exalted vvith prayse.
23. He is myghtie in his goodnesse: he is strong in povver, in iudgement, and in iustice: and he afflictesth not.
24. Therfore doo men feare him, and hee vvill not regard any that are vvize in their ovyne concyyt.

F we knewe what is sayd heere of the woorks of God, that is to witte that they be woondersfull: there is none of vs but he would take much more peyne to consider them, specially seing our witts are so slender and frayle. But what? we think ourselues tooski full, that euene with one little cast of our eye wee haue learned all that is too bee knowne, and in the meane whyle we esteeme not Gods woorks according to their woorthiness: they are but vs common thinsgs to vs, bycause we be accustomed to them, and so wee ouerpasse them lightly. Therfore it behoueth vs to marke wel what is conteyned in this verse, where on the one side Eliu protesteth: that all Gods woorkes are miracles: and on the other side it sayth it behoueth vs to stay vpon tbē, namely bycause our wit is to feeble to haue any true knowledge of them out of hand. Therfore we had neede to bestowe all our studie therupon. Furthermore we be commaunded exprefly too berken: for except God speake vnto vs, as for vs, we may wel apply all our witts to the considering of his woorks: but we shall never come to the cheef point. Ye see then how we haue three poynts to beare in Go mynd. The one concerneth the excellencie and maiestie that is to be seene in all Gods woorks, so a, they bee not to bee despized. The second is, that forasmuchas men are rude and grossewitted, their looking vpon the things that God setteth afore them, must not bee with casting their eye aside at them with a glaunce and awaye: but they must stay vpon them, and settle their minds throughly to them, and be diligent in them to the vittermost. The third is, that they must not trust in their owne reason, nor thinke themselves to haue skill ynough to iudge of them: but consider how it belongeth to God to shewe vs by his woord what wee haue to conceyue, and that that is the point wherat wee must begin, and that till wee haue bene at Gods schole, wee shall haue but a dim eyght, so as his woorks shall passe away before vs, and wee not perceiue them as were requisite for vs to do: and to be short, we shal haue no discretion at all vntill God haue made vs wize. Yet these things neede not so greatly to bee layd foorth at length, as to bee well weyed of every of vs. And therfore as oft as wee come too the considering of Gods woorks, let vs lift vp our witts aloft to reuerence them: that is to say, to honour Gods infinite wisdome, power, & rightuousnesse which appeare in them. Let that serue for one point. To bee short, whosoeuer thinketh vpon Gods woorks, without reuerencing of them, that is to say, without yelding him honour, and without acknowledging them to be full of wisdome, power, and goodnesse: he i. vnyknd and trayterouse vnto God. And therfore as oft as any man speaks to vs of Gods works, let vs yeld this reuerence to them, to take them as miracles that surmount all our witts, and wherein God vtereth his maiestie after such a sorte, as wee haue good cause to honour him. Besides this, (as I haue touched already) we must on the other side consider what is in ourselues, to the end we take not our selues to be so sharpwitted, as too knowe al things in a moment. Then let vs be contented to breathe vpon the things that we conceiue not at the first sight, and let vs not bee weerie of that studie. If wee haue liued a good whyle in the world, and bee stiil but as nouices; and haue haue not that perfect vnderstanding which were to bee wished: yet let vs not be out of hart, but go foreward stil with our studie, for we shall haue profited much, if we can in our whole life haue learned to vnderstand the woonders that are conteyned in the woorks of God. Howbeit it is true that it behoueth vs to go on still foreward: and wheras in this place heere is mention made of staying, it is not ment that wee should bee ydly occupied in gazing about: for our musing vpon God must not hinder our seruing of him nor our employing of our selues about the things that he hath appointed. It is cleane contrariwyse: that is to wit, the more a man considereth Gods woorks, the more ought he to bee stirred vp to do his duetie, and the more ought he to bee prouoked and thrust foreward therunto. Truely they that stay in thinking vpon Gods woorks, do but as it were go backe too leape the better. For the end of it is that wee should not be wanderers as we see men do, which runne trotting vp and downe from place to place, and could find in their harts to remoue the world with them when they be so letted in their enterprises. But what for that? They may well breake their armes and leggs, and yet be never the further foreward, if they hold not the right way. VVhat is to be doone then? Let vs be guided by sober aduisednesse. And so let vs stay in such wise vpon Gods woorks, as we may bee restreyned from wadering after that sort, and not become stragglers. Howbeit therewithall let vs also apply ourselues to that which God commaundeth, and let that be our marke too shooate at. Furthermore let vs assure ourselues that of our owne nature we haue nother wit nor reason to gue eare vnto God: for it belongeth to him to shewe vs what wee ought to consider in his woorks, that we may fare the better by them. True it is that the heathen men haue disputed curiously of the secrets of nature, and in a maner nothing hath bene hidden from them. Yea: but all was but a musing vpon the world, and not a comming vnto God. And what else is such wisdome than a confuzed dungeon? For what an vnthankfulnesse is it, that men should so curiously serche out all Gods woorks, and not thinke vpon the maker of them, nor any whit regard him? Therfore cursed be the wisdome, which buzieth it self about the curiose serching out of the inferiour or lower causes, and in the meane whyle despizeth the maker. Yet notwithstanding it is certaine that God gaue vnderstanding to thosse that treated so curiously of the order of nature: howbeit forasmuch as they heard not God speake, ne had his woord to guide them aryght: they missed their way. For the cheef point was that they should haue submitted themselues vnto God, and considered his glorie which appeareth to vs in all his woorks: but they did it not. So then let vs marke well, that whensoever we reade these greate philosophers, or heare them speake, & perceyue how they knewe the things that seeme incomprehensible to vs: they be as lookingglasses of the blindnesse that is in all men, vntill that God haue taught them in his schole. Are we sharperwitted than those men were?

VVe come farre short of them: and yet wee see they had not any taste of God. And therfore if we be desirous to comprehend Gods woorks: let vs not trust to our owne skilfulness, nother let vs presume vpon our owne natural power. But let vs herke to that which God speketh to vs, & whē we be taught by his words, let vs go on after his guiding, & then shall we knowe his works in such sort, as wee shall apply them too our vse and instruction. Thus much concerning this first verse. Now Eliu goeth foreward immediatly with his matter. He asketh whither Job can tell what commaundment God hath giuen to all his creatures, what ordinaunce he hath set in the clowdes, how he she-deth the lyght through thē, & whither he know the order and disposition of the clowds, and the woonders of him that is perfect in knowledge. VVhen he sayeth, knowest thou bw<sup>t</sup> God did set a lawe to his creatures? there are here two things to be noted: One is, that God not only hath created his woorks once for a do: but also that he gouerneth them still, and applyeth them to such vse as he thinketh good, according as I haue declared these former dayes. Howbeit, forasmuchas this saying is set downe heere newe againe: let vs wey it throughly, for it imporetteth a good lesson. For what a thing were it, if a man shuld tell vs that God did but only create the world, & that as now things fall out as they may? It were a verie slender and cold tale. And yet so did the heathen men almost every one of thē. I meene those that had some good spark of religion in them. For I let passe those braysnische beasts which are of opinion that the world was without beginning, as the wi-zest of them that euer was (I meene Aristotle) supposeth: He neuer had his match, and yet notwithstanding he resteth vpon that point, and the diuell did so carie him awaie, as he knewe not the maker of the world. And although he knewe that there was a God, yet knew he not the creation of the world which is as yee would say the face of God, which he will haue men to looke vpon. But as for all thosse which had any seede of religion in them, although they knewe that God created the world: yet vnderstoode they not his prouidence wherin al things are conteyned, insomuchas the things that were created by his power, continue still through his goodness, wisdome, and iustice. This thing was vnkowne too the heathen men. Therfore let vs rem<sup>r</sup> well the doctrine that is conteyned heere, which is coniformable to the saying of our Lord Iesus Christ, that the father woorketh yet still, and he with him, who is the same wisdome wherof Salomon speaketh in the eygitht of the prouerbes. So then, will we knowe surely that God is the maker of heauen and earth, as we confesse him to be? Let vs therewith call to remembrance, that he guideth all things, and that hee hath not forgotten his creatures, but ordereth them after his owne pleasure. And therby we may conclude, that the clowds gather not togither in the aire at aduenture, nother are ingendered at the pleasure of the earth: but it is God that guideth all things, and setteth an order bothe for fayre weather and for fowle, so that bothe of them come of his souerain dominion, insomuchas there never falleth any one drop of rayne, nother is there euer any fayre weather, nother is there euer any little pufse of wynd, but our Lord hath commaunde<sup>t</sup> it, and the creatures (though they be senslesse) haue a secret mouing, from him that gouerneth all and is aboue all. Thus much concerning the first point. And in the second place it is shewed vs, that we understand not this, nor are sharpwitted ynochough to know it, and therfore we must stoupe vnder the woord of God, and sayth must be all our vnderstanding. Ye see then that on the one side Gods prouidence is warranted vnto vs, to the intē we shold not doubt but that al things are gouerned by his will. And therewithall it behoueth vs too take knowledge of the rudenesse that is in vs, to the end that although we cannot iudge of all things, but manie things passe our reach: yet we shuld not therfore think that they be nothing: but run back to that which is sayd here concerning herkening. Then if our witts be to small and feeble, let vs resort to our God, who will shewe vs the things that are hidden and vnkowne, and wee must not iudge of them after our owne fancie, for there is not a more horrible confuzion than mannes rason when ir cannot submit itself to God and his woord. Now if wee cannot iudge of the visiblie things and of the things that concerne this this world, furtherfoorth than God inlyghteneth vs by his holie spirit, and guideth vs by his woord: what can we do concerning Gods euerlastinge kingdome, which is farre hygher without comparison, than all the thingsthat are spoken of heere? VVe be not able to iudge of worldly,visible,corruptible, and flyghtfull things: and how then shall our iudgement reache to the spirituall kingdome of God? Must we not needs come short there? Therfore let vs learne to humble our selues and to be modest by all meanes. And whē we come to the knowing of the things that belong to our saluation, if wee mynde to profit well therin, let vs first acknowledge that we bee not able too knowe aught otherwise than God teacheth vs, therfore let vs referre ourselues vnto him, and be contented to bee guided by his woord. And when wee see not the thing that we couet to knowe, let vs assure our seluesthat our Lord intendeth to humble vs: and let vs not in that case play the braynlesse sorte,to iudge after our owne imagination, but be contented to remember the lesson that is shewed vs in Gods woord. Thus yee see howe wee ought to 20 put this sentence in vre. Now by the way Eliu speaketh here of the things that are to be seene: and yet the reason of them is incomprehensible. True it is that men may say somwhat of thē:but in the end they must needs cōclude, That Gods wonderfull woorks are to hygh for vs. Therfore he sayth, Come on, canſt thou diſcuſſe me why thy clothes are warme when God giueth rest to the earth by the southwynd? That is to say,in sommer whē the weather is whot, and the Sunne beareth power, if the wind drawe not northward, but that the southwynd reigne: yet notwithstanding the wind is none such as a man may perceyue it. Like as in Sommet time when the wether is calme, true it is that the coole gales come peraduenture frō the sowth: but yet it is no such wind as may bee perceyued, for the weather shall be so still as a man shall not perceyue that there is any wynd stirring. And then do men swelt with heate, because the weather is then whottest. And that is the cause why it is said, that God maketh the earth to be quiet by the Southwynd. Canſt thou at such tymes so much as judge why the sweate issueth out of thy body? Thou seest 40 thy clothes wet with it. And besidesthat, thy clothes shall burne thee if the Sunne haue shone so long vpon them as to heat thē through,so as they shal not be able to fence of the heat from thee. Cāſt thou tel the reason herof? Again, Wart thou with God (sayeth he) when he did ſpread out the heauen? VVe see this woork as amirrour of molten glasse. Lo what a maruelous molten worke this ſpreading out of the heauen is. Art thou able to Cprehend the inestimable power of God which sheweth it ſelfe in all these things? Now we haue in effect to gather vpon these sayings, that althoſh there be ſome naturall causes of heate and cold: yet doeth it not followe that wee vnderſtand what is in them. ſpecially wheras the southwind beareth ſway in Sommertynie, and men burne for heate without feeling any greate blaſt or gale of wynd: wee may well perceiue ſome inferiour reaſon therof: neuertheleſſe whē we haue knowne what we cā, yet muſt we come to the power that is hidden in God, yea and ſo hidden, as all our wittes are forced to fayle of it, & to be dazed at it. Hereby then we ſee how proude men are in flinging out at rourers to diſpute againſt God, and to ſet him to Schoole, and to reply vpon him, and too murmur at his doings, and to ſhewe ſome token or other of miſliking. That is a diueliſh pride. And why ſo? For we be not able to perceyue ſo much as the cauſe of our ſweating, and of the heate of the ſunne. VVe will perchaunce ſay that the ſunne is whot. Yea: but howe is the sweat ingendred? It is bycauſe the bodie is then loozened, and the ſame loozening doeth ſo open the bodie, that the moysture cannot tarie within. Again when it is cold weather the poares are ſhet vp, and the moysture shrinketh inward too nurriſh a mannes lyfe, wheras the contrarie is doone by heate. Again, the heate ingendreth feeblenesſe, and that feeblenesſe maketh the humors to melt: and ſo yee ſee the cauſes of sweating. Men may well diſpute after that ſorte. But when all is doone, muſt it not needs bee acknowledged that there are maruelouſe ſecretes in the bodie of man, and that God hath planted ſuch a woorkmaſhip there, as wee bee at our wits ende when we haue well conſidered it. If we thiſke not ſo, it is to much shame for vs, & our vnrhankfulneſſe is to beaſtly. Again we will perchaunce diſcouer how the heauen was made in ſuch roundneſſe, and how muſt bigger it is than the earth, and moreouer of what matter or ſubſtance it is made, that is to wit, of a ſirie matter, and how it is maynteyned in ſuch perfect ſtate and order as it is, and finally after what maner it wheeleth about. But whē all is ſayd, we muſt needs acknowledge that God woorketh with greate reaſon in that behalf. And with howe greate? Even with infinite, wherat all menneſ wit muſt needs ſtoupe, and ſay: Surely there is a wonderfull woorkmaſter, there is a God that woorketh in ſuch ſorte as we muſt needs honour hiſ ſecrets, and woorſhip him in al hiſ works, and acknowledge that it is not in our power to atteine to ſuch hyghneſſe. Thus ye ſee whervnto the holie Ghoste intendeth to bring vs in this text. And therfore as oft as wee ſee any reaſon in the things that are doone by nature, ſo as we perceive by what meanes God woorketh, and therewithall, vnderſtand hiſ iuſtiſe, power, and wiſdom: let vs alwayes learne to conclude, that yet notwithstanding we cannot cōprehend all, no nor the hundredth part: it is verie muſh that we haue ſome little taste of thē, ſo as we get a likke at them as it were with the tip of our tung, and yet can we not haue that taste nother, except it be giuen vs from aboue. Howbeit let vs by the way marke well, hat all the knowledge which we can haue, ſerueth but to make vs ſeele the rawneſſe of our owne vnderſtāding, that wee might humble our ſelues before God, and vpon the knowing of our vniabilitie ſeeke to be taught & too profit more and more. Furthermore let vs neuer bee wearie of ſetting our mynds too the conſidering of Gods woorks, ſeing wee may get an inestimable treasure by leſting neuer ſo ſmall a portiō, yea though it be but the entering into ſome taste of them, as I ſayd afore. For when we ſhal haue ſpent our whole life in thē, we ſhal haue done if wee haue come halfe way, vntill ſuch tyme as our Lord do gather vs wholly and fully to hiſelf. Thus ye ſee that as touching the heate that is ſpoken of heere, and as touching the woorkmaſter that we ſee in the ſkies: they be as it were a molten looking glaſſe, and yet notwithstanding the ſcope of them is infinite: and therfore needs muſt the woorkmaſter of them be wonderfull. Lo how we ought to put this lesson in vre. Now it is ſayd immediatly, Tel vs what we ſhall ſay to him: for we cannot order our matters by cauſe of darkneſſe. Heere Eliu mocketh Job: but in the meane whyle the doctrine toucheth vs all, which is, that he which wil preſume to take hold to talke with god, & to reply againſt him muſt tel vs how we ſhould ſpeak vnto God, & what we may alledge to him, to the end we may ſhew him that there is ſome fault to be found in him, and in hiſ works. It is all one then as if the holy Ghost ſhould ſay, go to, ther is none of you al but he is ſo ſelfiſh as he wil take vpon him to picke ſome quarell to Gods woorks. And ſoothly if we conſider the ouerboldneſſe that is in all men, wee ſhall ſee that God cannot content vs, and that if it were in our power, every of vs would put too hiſ pece, and haue a ſnatch at him, [ſaying]: VVhy is not ſuch such a thing doone? And this or this were good. To bee short, there would be a terrible hotchpotch, if God shuld berken to our wiſhes and followe the. And wherof commeth that? Of diuelish pride, for that wee will needs bee wiſe in finding fauſit with Gods doings. But behold heere howe the holie Ghoste ſkorneth ſuch presumptione, and ſayeth: Seing that every of you taketh vpō him to be ſo greate craftes maifters: tell vs how we ſhal ſpeak vnto God. If yee come to him and ſay, go too, I wil haue ſuch a thing done: ye muſt ſhewe him ſome reaſon why. And what reaſon can ye bring vnto God? This is told vs of ſet purpose, bycauſe men intangle themſelues in their owne fantasticall imaginacions, when they be diſcontented with God and his woorkes. And I bēſeſh you, who giueth vs ſuſh leauē to miſſebehaue our ſelues againſt God, & to reply this and that, but only for that we regard not his maieſtie: for had we any regard of that: it is certayne that we would quake for feare. So then it is not for nougat that the holie Ghost bringeth vs to ſpeaking with God, as if he ſhould ſay, Go to, tell vs what we ſhall ſay to him: for you fall to muttering as it were behind his backe, as ſome cowaridly wretch would do when he ſeeth a man of corage and authoritie, whose doings he miſliketh. Such a one wil find fault: but yet he dares not open his lippes at him to his face, but goes away moyling to himſelf to work ſpyte and to forge ſlaunders behind his backe: and when he is amōg his mates, then ſpeweth he out al that he had conſcived afore, ſaying: Behold I pray you, ſuch a man thinks himſelf verie wyſe and of greate ſkill: but I like not of him, and I maruell how men can ſuffer him to talk after that fashion. After the ſame maner deale we with God. For we be not ſo hardie as to ſpeake openly againſt him, (and in verie deede nature teacheſheth vs that it ought too make vs ſhudder, when we do ſo lift vp ouरſelues againſt him that hath made and fashyoned vs) but in the meane whyle wee ceaſſe not to be ſo ſpitefull and wicked as to grudge and repine againſt him in huckermucker, and too picke quarrels to this and that. VVherfore as oft as we be tempted to finde fault with Gods woorkes: let vs leaue to come before him, and to be thinke vs of that which is conteyned heere: namely how we muſt ſpeake vnto him, and at what point we may begin. And then ſhal we haue cauſe to repreſſe our ſelues, and the foile that was in vs before, muſt needs be ſubdewed and fall vterly to the ground. Thus ye ſee how we muſt take this ſentence, where it is ſaid Tel vs what we may ſay vnto God. And wheras it is ſaid, we cannot order oure matters bycauſe of darkneſſe: therin the ignorantneſſe of men is the better exprefſed vnto vs. For heere we be as it were wrapped in darkneſſe, ſo as we ſee not a whit. And how then can we order our matters? Behold, God dwelleth in lyght, ſo as he ſeeth, not only when the Sunne ſhyneſh, as a mortall man doeth. For if a man walke at hygh nonedayes, he ſeeth his way: and when he giueth himſelf to the doing of anie thing, [the light of the Sunne] is his guide and direcſion: and again if he intend to vew his grounds and poſſeſſions, he looketh round about him. God therfore not only hath that: but also dwelleth in ſo great & infinite light, that nothing is hidde from him: al things are open vnto him: there is no time past nor time to come with him: he reacheth euē into the depes & dungēos as we haue ſene heretofore. How the ēa we teach him his leſſon, ſeing that we dwell in darkneſſe? It is as if a man were ſhet vp and fawe no whit of light, & yet ſhuld ſay to another man, thou wotest not what thou doest. Shall a blind wretch tell a welſighted man that he knowes not his way, or that he ſeeth not what he doeth? Now if wee compare oureſelues with God: it is certayne that we be worse than blind. As for him, he ſeeth not after the maner of me, but hath a farre other maner of ſight. Therefore, muſt we not needs be worse than mad, if we preſume to gainſay him, or to finde occaſion to reaſon againſt him? That is the cauſe why darkneſſe is ſpoken of heere. Then leuſ consider our owne ſtate, and alſo the ſtate of God. and we ſhal ſhet our mouthes, & not preſume any more to pleade againſt him with ſuch libertie as we do, but there ſhall be a lowelinenſſe in vs to allow whatſoeuer God doeth, and confeſſe that there is nothing but rightfulneſſe, wiſdom, goodneſſe, equitie and iuſtice in him, ſo as there remayneth not any thing for vs but to glorifie him in al respects. If we knew no more but ſome onelitle pece of his doings: yet ſhould wee needes condeſme our owne infirmitie, in that we cannot glorifie God as wee ought to do, by reaſon of our ignorance. And here by the way, let vs marke well, that men are rebuked for their rafhneſſe, in that they make haſte too ſpeake before they knowe any thing. VVe ſee howe tickle our tongues are, ſpecially if it be to talke of God and of his wonders. VVe deſcanc upon them. And how? At all aduenture. And yet notwithstanding we be as it were in darkneſſe. Therefore let vs leaue to rule our talk according to our owne ſmalneſſe. Howbeit therewithall on the other ſide, let vs conſider the infinite goodneſſe of God in that he inlightneth vs in the middes of darkneſſe by his worde, and that althoſh we underſtande not perfectly in all poyns, howe he made the world, nor perce, ue the meaneſes whereby he worketh ſtill: yet he cauſeth not to make vs privie of his minde, ſo farreforſh as is needfull for vs. And that is the cauſe why it is ſayde, that Gods wiſdom kept him company, when hee made the worlde, rayzed vp the mountaynes, ſunke downe the valleyes, & ſtabliſhed the order which we ſee. But it is ſayd alſo that the ſame wiſdom cryeth out in the ſtreetes, ſaying, come and I will giue my ſelfe to you: I am redie to talke familiarily with men, yea and my deliſht is in them, and it is my whole pleasure to dwell with the inhabitants of the earth. Seeing then that Gods wiſdom which of it ſelfe is incompreheſible too vs, protesteth that hiſ delight and pleasure is to dwell with vs, & to be familiar with vs: I pray you haue we not cauſe to be of good cheere, and to be watchfull to take profitie of the things that God ſheweth vs, howbeit with ſuch ſoberneſſe and modeſtie, as wee may not couet to knowe ought but that which he teacheſheth vs, and to glorifie him, by yeelding him hiſ deserved prayſe? Thus ye ſee what we haue to marke in this verſe. Nowe it is conſequently ſayde, If I ſpeake, who ſhall report it vnto him? I ſhall not bee be ſwallowed vp that dareth vter one word! Here Eliu expreſſeth yet better the thing that I haue touched afore: that is to witte, that all the vnaudied wordes which we ſhoote forth concerning God, and all the wandring iſſaginations which we conceyue in our braynes, are as it were grudgings that are made in huckermucker.

And therunto tendeth the ſimilitude which I alledged of a coward that durſt not ſtirre one finger, and yet notwithstanding failes to moyling againſt thoſe to whom god hath giue more diſcretion, and ſeeketh to be wiſe by backbiting of othermen. Euen ſo deale we to Godward. For there is none of vs but he hath to much boldneſſe & ſkill to reply againſt Gods doings: but yet for al that we do but brabble: and as for him he voursafeth not too heare our words. So the ē Eliu ſheweth heere, that men ſhal gayne nothing by ſetting theſelues after that maner againſt God. And why? VVho is he that ſhall report it to him? This is as if ſome begger ſhould ſpeake of a greate king and ſay, O, it were meete that the king ſhould be better aduized than to do this or that. For it might be anſwered, my freend, you muſt then gette ſome messenger, to goe giue aduet-aduertisement of this which you speake, for seeing that the king hath not aduice and wisdome ynoch except you be of his counsell: you were best to go to him to giue him your aduice, or else too find out some messenger too send him your counsell by. If a poore begger shoulde speak so, every man would mocke him. But there is more cause to mocke at our follie when we take vpon vs to speake so vnadvisedly of God and his woorkes. Therfore let vs marke well this maner of speaking which is set downe here, namely who shal report it to him? wee debat matters heere bylowe: and yet in the meane whyle wee bee but froggs. The froggs can make a greate croking well ynoch in their marshes and puddles: and yet men passe by them and stay not for all their croking. Euen so is it with all the talk that men hold: forthere is no reason in it. They do but babble, and yet they beare themselues in hand, that God will hold his peace, and doo all that they would haue him to do. But it is cleane contrarie. Therfore let vs learne that whensoeuer we lift vp our nebs against God, we shall win nothing by it, but our woordes shall slip into the aire, and vanish away as smoke. Neuerthelesse let vs marke by the way, that our woordes shal not fall to the ground, but must be registred to our greate and horrible confuzion. Then if our pride be such as we dare murmur against God: such blasphemousenesse must needs come to a reckoning, and not scape vnpunished. Therfore let vs not imagin too gayne any thing against God: but whensoeuer we be tempted to stand in contention with him, let vs call this saying to remembrance, namely who shall report it to him? True it is that God hereth it, and nothing escapeth him: but yet for all that, he voutsafeth not to stoupe to our bubblebabble, as though wee were his matches. Tush wee be but froggs, as I sayd afore. To be short, this serueth to shewe vs, that wee shall never get the upper hand in pleading against God: and more ouer that there is no seaso why he shuld abace himself so much as to answer vs. And why? For it toucheth him not, we cannot come neare him with our babbling: although we fyle our tungs, so as they cut and fleyce smoothesly in the aire: yet shall God abyde still safe and seund, and he needeth not to streyne himself to reply against vs, or too finde any excuse, for that were needlessse. So then let vs learne to speake with such reverence, that the words which we shall viter, may be made of prayings, so as God may accept them. And how may we do that? By his purging of our tungs, that is too saye, by vittering nothing but that which commeth of his woord, and which we haue lerned in his schole. And for a conclusion let vs marke what Eliu addeth, If any man speake (sayeth he) shal be not be swallowed vp? He sheweth vs heere, what confuzion is prepared for all such as dare so set theselues against God, and would faine finde fault with his works. VVhat shall they gayne then in the end. They shall all be swallowed vp. VVee see that al creatures must needes tremble at Gods maiestie. And what shal be done then when there is manifest rebellion? God can with one frowne make the mountaynes & rocks to melt, emptie the sea, & destroy the whole world, if he list. And surely there is no rebellion mothe in the earth nor in the water, nor in any of all the rest of such creatures. But behold, man who is but a handful of dust, will needes wage battel against his maker: and I pray you, can he stand out? All the world should perish as sore as it came vnder Gods hand: and behold a worme, a wretched carion wil put God to silence. And not only so, but he wil also rob God of his honour, and not haue him too bee counted wyse and ryghtuouse as he is woorthie. Alas, must we not needs be worse than blynd when we come ruffling with such boldnesse against him? Therfore let vs marke well (according to that which I haue touched) that when we set vp our bristles after that sort against God: wee seeke but our owne destruction, and too bee quytte swallowed vp. VVill wee then bee mainteyned vnder the hand and keeping of our God? Let vs learne to humble ourselues to him, and to pray him to shewe himself too vs, and according as it shall haue pleased him too shewe himselfe, so also to graunt vs the grace too walke in continuall modestie, and to haue our eye alwayes vppon this marke, namely that he deserue: to bee honored at our hand, and that wee acknowledging ourselues to owe him such reverence, may learne too submit vs wholly vnto him. I hus yec see how we may approche vnto our God without feare of the fire of his terrible wrath. Nay rather let vs be sure that he will be as a refreshing vnto vs, so as we shall bee maynteyned by his grace, condicinaly that wee come too him with all humilitie, without preacing ouer farre too inquyre of him and his secretes. Therfore wee must content ourselues with that which he sheweth vs by his woord, assuring our selues that it is for him to reache vshis hand, and for vs to go as he guideth vs.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs feele them continually more and more: And that forasmuchas it pleaseth him to graunt vs so greate abundance of worldly benefits, as too haue applied and ordyned all his creatures to our vse: wee by receyuing such bountifullnesse at his hand, may learne too knowe him for our father, assuring ourselues that seeing he hath a care of our bodies in this world, he wil not fayle vs in the things that concerne the spirituall lyfe of our soules: and that although in this world wee bee tangled in manye affections which comber our wits, so as they bee not at libertie to consider Gods woorkes accordingly: yet wee may not therfore ceasse too take corage to muze vpon them: and that in the meane season he guide vs in such wise by his holie spirit, as wee may learne too like well of all his dooings, and too gloriifie him in his justice, truthe, and goodnesse, and in all his other vertues which he sheweth vs dayly in his woorkes. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to al people and nacions of the earth, bringing backe al poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage of error and darknesse, too the ryght waye of saluation, for the dooing whereof &c.

The cxliij. Sermon, which is the first vpon the. xxxvij. Chapter.

THE Lorde ansvering Iob out of a vvhirlynde, sayde:

2. VVho is he that darkeneth the Secretes in vwordes vwithout knovvledge?
3. Girde vp thy loynes like a valiant man: and tell methe thing that I shall demaunde thee.
4. VVhere vvarst thou vwhen I layde the foundation of the earth? tell it, if thou haſte vnderſtanding.

Job.33.4.6.

E haue seene heretofore, that Eliu intending to rebuke Job, protested that he himself was a mortall man as Job was, to the end he shoulde not cōplayne that he was handled with too hygh a power. And so he shewed that Gods will was to win him by reason and gentlenesse, according also as he dealeth towards vs. For he beareth with vs, making his word to be preached 10 to vs by men like our selues, so as wee may come the more familiarly to heare things that he telleth vs, and the doctrine is chawed and put into our mouthes. VVe see then that God pitith vs, when he appoynteth men to be the ministers of his woord, and to teache vs in his name and authoritie. For he knoweth our abilitie, and that forasmuchas we be feeble, wee shoulde out of hand bee swallowed vp of his maiestie, and ouerwhelmed with his glorie. And that is the cause why he stoupereth downe to our lowenesse, in instructing vs by the meanes of men. Yet for all that it is requisite also that wee shoulde bee 20 touched, to yeeld him the reuerence that he deserueth. For without that, wee would abuse his goodnesse, and wheras he commeth vnto vs, wee in the end would play haylfellowe well met with him. And that is it that is, rehersed to vs heere presenty. For God perceyuing that Job was not sufficiell subdewed with the matters and reasons that Eliu had alledged: maketh him to feele his greatnessse by a whirlwynd, to the end that being therwith put in feare, he shoulde yeeld himself to the acknowledging of his fault, and wholly obey whatsoeuer shoulde be sayd to him. And so we see that God applieth himself to vs after al fashyons, to the intent to win vs. For one while he stoupereth downe [vnto vs] And why? Because he per- 30 ceyueth vs to bee too grosse and rude to mount vp vntoo him. Neverthelesse forasmuchas there is ouergreate pride in our nature: it beloueth vs to feele him as he is, to the end we may learne to feare him, and too heare his word with al humilitie and diligence. And that is a point which we ought to marke well. For therin wee see the loue that he beareth vs, and the care that he hath of our welfare. For needs must he bee carefull of vs, when he doeth (as yee would say) so transfigur himself, as he not only voutsafeth to talke familiarly with vs, but also too stammer and lisp with vs when he seeth it meete and conuenient for vs. And again, forasmuchas he seeth that this goodnessse of his myght turne to contempt: he doeth also aduance and magnifie himself as is meete for him too do, to the intent wee shoulde knowe our owne state too submit our selues wholly vntoo him. And so much the more ought we to desire to bee taught by his woord, sith it is agreeable to our capacitie, and that therin God hath not overslipt any thing that is requisite and profitable for our saluation. Seing then that our good God hath voutsafed to stoupe downe in that wyze vnto vs, and yet therewithall aduaunceith himself to frame vs to his obedience: let vs bee the willinger too heare him when he speakest. And let vs no more make this fond excuse, that Gods word is to hygh and dark for vs, or that it is to terrible, or that it is to simple. For when wee shall haue well cast vp our account: we shall find for a certaintie that our Lord setteth vs forth such a maiestie in his word, as is able too make all creatures to quake: and yet is there also a simplicitie, to the end to make it to bee receyued of the most ignorat and vnskilfull: [moreover] there is so great light in it, as wee may understand it without going to Schoole, Ps.19.c.8. at leastwise if wee bee teachable: for it is not without & Mat.11. cause that he calleth himself purposely the scholemayster d.25. of the lowely and little ones.

Thusye see that the thing which we haue to marke in the first streyne, is that Gods speaking too vs by the mouth of men, is to the intent we shoulde come the more freely too him, receyue the things with better leysure which he on his behalfe telleth vs, and not bee astonished out of measure. Howbeit forasmuchas we be dull vpon the spurre, and yeeld him not the honour which he deserueth: he maketh vs to feele him as he is, and exalteh himself in his maiestie, to the intent that the same shoulde bring vs to do him honour. And it is purposely sayd, tbat the Lord speake vntoo Job out of a whirlwynd. It was not y-nough for him to haue giuen some token of his presence, but he did also rayse as it were a vehenient tempest. VVe shal finde in the scripture that sometimes God raysed thunder after the same sort, when he listed to speake too his faythfull ones. But we haue specially to marke heere, Exo.19.c.16. 1.King.19. c.11.12. the circumstance of the place, that forasmuch as Job was not sufficiently tamed: God was fayne to shewe a terrible force to him. The cause then why he thundred and rayzed this whirlwynd, was that Job shoulde knowe with what a Lord he had to deale. In generall, it is commonly sayd, that God dwelleth as it were in a dark cloud, or rather that he is compassed about with light: and therefore that we cannot come at him, insomuch that if we would looke vpon God, our senses dazzle by reason of the thicke darknesse betweene him and vs. This then is verie well spoken in generall of the glorie of God, to the end wee should not presume to bee ouerinquisitive of his incomprehensible determinatiōs, but taste so farre of them as it pleaseh him to discouer them vnto vs, and therwithall consider that all our senses fayle vs if he rountsafe not too come to vs, or else to lift vs vp to him, and yet neverthelesse, that for another respect, (that is to wit, bycause of our sturdinessse) God must be fayne to shewe himself terrible to vs. True it is that he would fayne drawe vs to him by gentlenesse, and we see that when men be well disposed to submit themselues vnto him, he vseth the sayd louing maner of inviting them vnto him as gently as may be. But whē he perceyueth any sturdinessse, he must needs 40 first of all make vs to stoupe, for otherwise what should he win by speaking to vs? And that is the cause why in Exod. 19.c. publishing his lawe, he rayzed thunders, blew trumpets 19. in the ayre, and made al to shake, insomuch that the people were so afryd, as they sayd, let not the Lord speake vnto vs, for then are we but dead, we bee vterly vndone. VVhy did God shake the earth after that maner? and why did his voyce roar with such terribenesse? Mēt hee to driue awaye his people that they shoulde not heare him? Truely it is cleane contrarywise sayd, That he gaue not Heb.12.d.19. Leu.18.a.5. his lawe in vayne, but that he ment to give the people a certaine rule, to the end they myght knowe the waye of lyfe. So then his raysing of whirlwynds and tempestes in the ayre, is not too scarce vs: that (say I) is no part of his meening: but it serueth for a preparatiue to subdue the lostinesse of those folk, which would never haue obeyed God and his word, nor never haue acknowledged the authoritie of him that spake, without these tokens which were added. And therfore let vs mark wel, that gods speaking to Job after that fashyon out of a whirlwynd, was no more than needed. Now if such a holie man who had applied his whole indeuer to the honoring of God, needed to be subdewed after that maner: what had wee neede to be? Let vs compare ourselues with Job. He was a mirour of Angellyke holinesse: we haue the protestations that he made heere before: and although he were extremely afflicte, and by reason thereof did murmur and let slip many wyld words: yet did he alwayes hold himself to the ground of worshipping God, and of hembling himself Yy. vnder vnder his hand: he hild still that generall point, though he swarued aside in some particulars. But we be as fleshly as may be, and our vanities do so carie vs away, as we be in maner stark drunken. Hardely can wee discerne that there is a God in heauen: and if a man set his woord afore vs, we make slowe haste to it, yea and wee be duller than Asses in it. Had not our Lord neede then to make vs feele his maiestie, and too touche vs with it in good earnest? Now truely God needeth to rayze vp stormes & whirlwynds to make vs know that it is he which speakest: but he must dispose vs after another maner too come vnto him, according also as he doeth. Then if one man haue hartbytings and troubles in his conscience, and another bee afflicted with diseases, and the third be touched with aduersitie: let vs understand that it is God which calleth vs to him, bycause wee come not to him, of our owne accord, nor doo drawe neere him too heare his woord: he subdeweth such harthardnedesse as meete is it should bee, to the end that our minds shuld bee humbled in true obedience. Doeth God then see such rebelliousnesse in vs? He must needes vs the manners and meanes aforesayd to drawe and win vs to himself: and to the end we may heare him, he must be sayne to speake to vs as it were out of a whirlwynd, not that this preuyaleth vs al men. For we see some that kicke against the pricke, and play the restie iads: & although God quicken the vp, yet witteth he nothing at their hand. How many of these wretches are to be seene whō God chastizeth so manye wayes, stryking so hard blowes vpon their heads with a beetle, that if they were never so hard they must needs be softened: & yet notwithstanding they never leaue gnashinge their teethe at him: VVe see they cannot be trayned, neither can they by any meanes be moued: so full of pryde and stibbornnesse do they shewe themselves against God, even spiting him to the vitemoste of their power. So then, it were much for the schoof of al those whom God chastizeth, that they were dispozed to come vnto him, & that is his intent. Therfore let vs beware that we disappointe our God: but as oft as he sendeth vs anie aduersitie, let vs learne too resort to him, as well as though he speake with thunder, or thundered vpon vs to make vs heare him. Let vs consider this, and let vs so cēsider it, as our minds may be truly subdewed vnto him, & our whole seeking may be to be wholly humbled vnder his obesiance. Lo what we haue to marke in this streyne. And let vs marke further, that although God doo not in these dayes thunder frō heauen: yet notwithstanding all the s̄gnes that haue bene given in old time for the warranting of his woord, ought to serue vs also at this daye.

VWhen Gods lawe is preached vnto vs, we must immediatly match therewithall the thing that is spoken in the nynecenth of Exodus: which is, that the lawe hath bene duly warranted, and that our Lord gaue full authoritie therewnto, when he sent thunder and lightenings from heauen, and made the aire to ring with the noyse of his trumpets: and that all this was doone, to the intent that the lawe should be received with all reuerence even too the worlds end. As much is imputed in this verse. For whereas it is sayd that god appeared in a whirlwynd: it behoueth vs to vnderstand that his intent was to warrat the thing that is conteyned in this booke: and not only that: but we must also extend this authoritie vnto his whole word. There is yet this one thing more to be considered, that if God begin to cal vs to him after a louing maner, & shewe himself rough & sharp in the end: we must not think it strange, but rather examin wel our life, to know whither we haue obeyed him or no: and in so doeing let vs on the one side acknowledge his apparent goodness,

& on the other side consider that he must needes vs the second meanes to win vs, when he seeth that he gayneth nothing by his favorable dealing which he had shewed vs. As for exāple, God doth somtymes cocker vs when he intendeth to take vs for his owne and to haue vs of his flocke: and he setteth forth his woord vnto vs without sending vs any affliction. Verye well, wee see it is his wil so to do, and wee like well of it. But yet in the meane whyle we profit not ourselues by it, to be confirmed in his goodnessse as we ought to be, to renounce our owne wicked lusts, to forget the world, and to give our selues wholly vnto him. He beareth with vs for a tyme: but in the end when he seeth vs so rechlesse, he beginneth too smyte. Heerin we ought too perceyue, that his speaking to vs as it were out of a whirlwind, is not without cause, for so much as we had no will to hear him whē he speake graciously vnto vs and after a lindchanted and fotherly maner. Therfore it is requisite that God should speake to vs with such vehementie, sith he perceyuethe that wee will never come to him, til he haue prepared vs after that fashyon. True it is that he wiinneth some by his bare woord: howbeit when he seeth eterosome stubborne, he sendeth them some trouble and aduersitie. And doubtlesse there are a number that had never come to the Gospell, nor r̄uer bin towched rightly, at the hart to obey God, if he had net sent them some token that he was minded to chastize them. Hereupon when they felt once by afflictions, that there is nothing but wretchednesse in this world: they were inforced to mislike of the selues, and to cut off their pleasures wherin they had bin plundged herfore. Ye see then how God draweth men to him after diuerte sorts. But let vs profit ourselues by the meanes that he vseth towards vs, and again, when he speaketh not to vs in a whirlwynd, let vs on our side bee familiar with him, & suffer our selues to be ruled by him as sheep & lambs. For if he spie any hardhartednesse in vs he most needs subdue vs whither we will or no. And although he suffer vs to play the locce colts for a time: yet at length we shal feele his terrible maiestie to make vs astrayd, at leastwise if it please him to shewe vs fauour: for God doeth vs a singular goodturne when he wakeneth vs after that maner, & thūdereth so with his voice, as it entereth into our harts and wōdeth vs. I say it is a priuiledge which he grauntheit not to all men. Again, his thundering vpon the vnbeleuers, is to late: for there is no more hope of their returning vnto him, but he summoneth them to heare their condēnation. So much the more the ought we to receiuie quietly this help which God giueth vs, when for the subduing of all the stibbornnesse of our fleshe, he raizeth some whirlwind, that is to say, maketh vs too feele his maiestie. Ye see in effect what we haue to marke vpon this sentence. Now let vs come to that which is sayd in these woordes: who is he that darkeneth the secretes in wōdes without knowledge? Gird vp thy loynes like a valiant man, & answer me to al my demandes. In the first place here God mocketh at Job, bycause he had strived with him, & horn himself in hād that he could mend his eace by his disputing. And that is the cause why it is said, who art thou? Now whē the scripture sheweth vs who or what we be: it is to make vs vtterly nothing.

True it is that men wil make greate account of themselfes, and beare themselfes in hand that there is some greate worthinesse in them. And wel may they esteeme hyghly of theselues, but God in the meane whyle knoweth that there is nothing in them but al filth and stinche, and therfore he shakest them off, yea euē with a lothing of them. And so although we be so foolish and ouerweesning, as too glorie of the wisdome and vertue that is in vs:

Ro.9. d.20. vs : yet notwithstanding God to deface vs and put vs to shame, vseth but only this word, what art thou ? I haue art but a man. The pronouncing of this is as it were an vtter bereueing of vs of all occasion of Loasting. For we know there is not so much as one drop of goodnesse in vs : and then haue we no more cause to vaunt our selues in any maner wyse. That is the cause also why God addeth, Gird vp thy loynes like a valiant man : that is to say, Set as much store by thyself as thou listest, beare thyself in hand that thou art as a Gyant, be thou furnished throughly, 10 and be thou armed from top too toe, and what shalst thou gayne by it in the end ? Thinkest thou to stand, if I set myself against thee thou wretched creature ? VVhat haste thou ? Heere we see what Gods meening is. For (as I sayd afore) this foolishnesse of self estimation, and of self-weenning that we bee of some valew, is so rooted in vs : that it is verie hard to bring vs to a ryght vnderstanding of our owne wants, so as wee myght bee cleere from all prude and presumption. So much the more then behoueth it vs too marke the text of the scripture, where 20 it is shewed vs that there is not any thing of estimacion in vs. And let vs way it well: for it is not spoken of some one part of the world only, but of all mankynd in general.

1.C.1.6.19. Therfore let bothe the greate and small learne to bee ashamed of themselues, seing that God byndeth them vp all in one bundle together, when he sayeth, that the wisdome of men is but folishnesse and vanitie, their strength but weakeynesse, and their ryghtuousenesse but vncleanesse and dung. For when God speaketh in such termes: 30 it is not to twoo or three men, but to all men vniuersally. Therfore let all of vs from the greatest to the least, learne to stoupe, acknowledging all our glorie to bee but confuzion and shame before God. And for that cause let vs thinke vpo a this saying: who is this ? Let vs not take it to bee ment only of the persone of Job, but of all mortall creatures, as if our Lord should say, How now ? Is there such malapartnesse in man that is but as a pot of brittle earth, in man that is but a vessell full of all filth and naughtinesse, and in man that is lesse than nothing ? Is 40 there such malapartnesse in him as to dispute against me, and to bee so inquisitiue afore hand ? whither were that to go ? VVho art thou o man ? According also as we see that Sainet Paule setteth the same woord as a stoppe in our way, saying: VVho art thou o man which reasonest with God, and pleasest against him ? And this he setteth downe after he hath alledged the obiections wherein men thinke themselues to haue a fayre colour to dispute against God, and too deuaund why he shold destroy those whom he hath created, and why he shold put a difference betweene one and another without knowing any cause, so as the one shold be called to saluation, and the other be reiecte. After that Sainet Paule hath set downe thof things: although men take pleasure in such obiections: yet he sayeth, O man, who art thou that settest thyself after that fashyd against God ? And this is it which we haue to marke vpon this saying, who is this ? Therfore whensoeuer any man is tempted to prude, let him thinke with himself, Alas, who art thou ? Heere is no entering into battell against such as ourselues are, and against our matches : but if wee will needs bee so bold as to be inquisitiue of Gods secretes, and to let our fancies and toungs looce to imagin vnprofitable things, or to talk against God and his honour : we must be fayne to think, Alas, who am I ? when every of vs shal haue entered into himself, and considered his owne feeblenesse, and perceyued that in effect we be nothing : wee shal bee coolded wel ynough, al this prattle and al our former conceyys wil be layd a water : yea and al our imaginacions will bee bridled and imprizoned, as shal bee declared yet more fully hereafter.

Now it is sayd expresly, Gird vp thy loynes like a valiant man : to do vs to wt, that when the whole world hath layd their force together, and vitered the same, al is nothing. Yee see heer how God spyteth or defyeth Job in bidding him to furnishe himself, and to come armed and weaponed as a Gyant, or as the valiantest man that could bee found. Heerby he expresseth yet better the thing that I haue sayd alreadye : that is to witte, that the condemning of men in the scripture, is not ment simply of the common sort, and of such as are despysed and out of credit and estimacion: but extendeth even to the greatest, and to such as thinke they touche the clouds with their heads. So then although men imagin themselves too haue some apparaunce of honour : let them assure themselves that the same is nothing before God. As for example, They that are excellent in comparison of their neyghbours, will surely conceyue some opinion and wel-liking of themselues. if a man bee counted skilfull, of good wit, and of good behauour, he will let much by him self in respect of those that haue not the same qualities, finaily if a man bee indued with greate and commendable vertues afore men, the hauing of such speciaill indue-ments wll perchaunce make our hearts hoppe in our belly (as they say) and to set much store by our selues : but when we come vnto God, then must all of it quite quayle. There is not then so lusty and stout a fellowe, that hath [in that case] one whit of strength at all: all holynesse, all wisdom, and al that ever else is, sayleth viterly in that behalf. Therfore at a word, let all the world knowe, that their furniture shal not boote them before God, but wee must bee viterly defaced and emptied by God, so as he leaueth not one drop of power or strength in vs, other than we shal take of him as by way of borrowing, acknowledgging that al proceedeth of his mere goodnesse. Now then we see what this word valiant man importeth, It doeth vs to witte, that what special power or vertues so euer wee haue, the same must not puffe vs vp with pride against God. Furthermore it is sayd also, that Job wrappeth (or dar keneth) secretes in wordes without knowledge. Heereby God sheweth that when we haue to deale with his secretes, wee must bethink our selues wel, that we may proceede soberly and with all reverence. For vnder this woord secretes God intended too signifie the hygh things wherof Job had spoken. VVe may well dispute of manie petie tryffles, yea and discourse of them at randon : and in so doing our talk shal be but vaine and foyl, but yet shal there 50 not be any blasphemie therin, either shal Gods name bee vnhaulded. But when we enter into the doctrine of saluation, and into Gods works, and fall to dispuring of his prouidence and wil: then must we not go to it so vnatudely, for we do but wrap vpon or intangle secretes in vnskilfull words VVe see then wherin God rebuketh Job: namely for speaking to hastily of things that outreached his capacite for although he had excellente gifts of grace: yet ought he alwayes to haue humbled hym self with acknowledgement of his infirmities, and also to haue brydled hym self, sith he was wel neere out of his wittes, and wist not what to think of Gods judgements. And forasmuch as he felt himself at such an afterdeale, he shold haue had an eye to the feblenesse of his own vnderstanding, & acknowledging hymself to be a mortal man, he shuld haue said, Alas there is nothing but ignoranee & folishnesse in mee. Herewithal he shuld also haue looked vpo the inestimable maeislie & incōprehensible purpose of God: & that should haue meekened him. Howbeit he did rather the one nor the other. So then, although he were not quite strayed from the right way, but went foreward still too the true marke: yet do we see heere, that he is rebuked by Gods owne mouth. And this text putteth vs in mynd of the reuerence which God will haue vs to beare too his hygh mysteries, and to the things that concerne his heauenly kingdome. If we reson but about our owne matters, we neede not to goe too it with so precise carefullnesse: for they be but earthly things, which passe away. But whensoeuer we fall to talking of God, or of his woorkes, or of his truthe, or of the things that are conteyned in his word: we must come to it with reuerence and feare, and not open our lippes to flush out whatsoeuer commeth to our tungs end: nor haue our witts to busie to inquyre of the things that belong not to vs nor are lawfull for vs: but we must restrayne our desires and brydle our tungs. And why? For they be the secretes of God: that is to say, they bee to darke and hygh things for vs to meddle with.

Therefore we must not think to attaine to the, further forth than God listeth to instruct vs of his owne mere goodnesse. And would God that this thing were well put in vre: for then shold we not haue the bickerings that are nowadyses through the whole world. But what? It is to be seene that verie fewe are touched with the maiestie of God. VVhen wee treate of his woord, and of the doctrine of our saluation, and of the holie scripture, eucry one falls to it at aduenture, and every man shoots forth his verdit, as though they reasoned but of moone shyne in the water. They be such things as passe al vnder standing of man, and yet notwithstanding it is manifest that we be bolder too treate of Gods so hygh mysteries, which ought to rauish our witts to wonder at them, and which we ought to honnor wi h all awfulnessse, I say wee be bolder to babble of them, than if a man spake but of a matter of fve shillings valew, or of some trifle I wote not what. And what is the cause hereof, but that men haue not considered howe God hydeth and ouercasteth his owne secret determinations, and hath in his holie scripture vttered vnto vs his will whervnto it behoueth vs to be subiect? VVe see on the one side how the Papists blasphem God, wresting, falsifying, marring, and corrupting the whole holie scripture, so as they sticke not to skorne God and all his word. And why? For they neuer tasted what this woord Secret meeneth. Also there are drunkards among vs which could finde in their harts to subdue God to their fantalall mynd. Though they were the wisest men in the world, and the best seene in the holie scripture: yet shold they bee fayne to come to this point. That Gods secret determination is aboue vs. But they be vterly dull and brutish, there is nother skill nor reason in them, the wyne ouermaystreh them like swyne: and yet they will needs p'aye the diuines, and controll things in such wise, that if a man shold nowadyses beleue them, he shold be driven to frame and forge a new gospel. And therfore let vs remember how it is shewed vs heere, that when wee talke of God, wee must not take libertie to pleade and babble as wee ourselues thinke good: but consider that he hath reueled his secrets vnto vs in the holie scripture, and that bothe greate and small must submit themselues therenvntoo too honour them. And that is the cause why heere is mention made of woordes without knowledge. Now then God sheweth vs heere, that whensoeuer wee speake of him, and of his woorkes, it is a matter of secrecie, a hygh matter. On the other side, what is it that we can bring forth? what is that little which wee can conceyue in our vnderstanding? It is but woords without knowledge. Let men put themselues into the balance, and they shal bee found lyghter than vanitie itself, as it is sayd in the Psalme. So Ps.62.b.10. much the more then behoueth it vs too marke this doctrine, that there is nother skill nor aptnesse in vs to treare of Gods woorks, except he teache vs. The way for vs to become wyse, is too bee gouerned by the spirit and word of God.

And therfore when we finde not the thing in Gods word, which we desire to knowe: let vs vnderstand that it behoueth vs to abyde ignorant of it, and therupon to keepe our mouthes shet. For whensoeuer we go about to speake, there shal bee no knowledge nor any thing but vntruthe in vs. This then is the accusation that God setteth downe heere against lob. And therupon he sayeth, Answer mee too all my demaundes. At least wise, if thou haue understanding, make mee also too understand that which I would knowe of thee. Heere God proceedeth in mocking the foolish ouerweening of men, in that they weene themselves to be so fine witted, that they are able to dispute and pleade against him. Therfore he sayeth, Verye well, no doubt but you be verie able men (to your owne seeming,) when you speake and I let you raunge [at your will.] But I also must haue my turne to speake too you: and reply you vpon mee, and then shall you well see your default. VVhat is the cause then that men are so rash to adauauce themselves so foolishly against God? It is for that they take libertie to speake and occupie the place, bearing themselves in hand that God hath nothing to reply against them.

But behold the remedie that God giueth vs to abate this our foolish rashnesse, is to bethinke vs what he may demaund. If God begin to question with vs, what shall we answer. Surely if we bare this thing well in mynd, wee should bee vterly restrayned: and although our myndes be verye eygre, and that to our owne seeming we be able to remoue the whole world: yet should wee bee as it were brought home to our owne state, to followe the things simply which our Lord sheweth vs, conditionally (I say) that wee can thinke with our selues, Alas, if wee come before God, is not his mouth open as well as ours? or hath not he authoritie and maistership too question with vs? And what shall wee answer vntoo him? Yee see then whervnto it behoueth vs too come: and that is the thing which we haue to consider in this text to be rightly instructed by it. Forasmuch thenas we be hasty to speak, that is to say, forasmuchas we have naturally this vice of thrusting our selues further forward thā becometh vs, let vs lerne to restrayne our tungs. For what is the cause that they runne byandby at libertie too flushe out things that wee can no skill of? It is for that we consider not that it is our dutie rather to answe God, than too put foorth our selues to speake. For is it not a peruerting of the order of nature, that a mortall man which is nothing, should incroche vpon his maker, and cause audience to be gien to himself, and God in the meane while should hold his peace? VVhat a dealing is that? And yet notwithstanding wee doo it as oft as wee murmur against God, or teare his woord in peeces, or cast foorth woords at random to say: Thus and thus doeth it seeme to me. VVhat is the cause hereof, but that wee would put God too silence, and haue our selues heard aboue him? Is not this a starke madnesse? Therfore too correct this statelinessse that is in vs, let vs lerne, not too presume too answe our God, knowing that when wee come before him, he hath authoritie too examine vs, yea even according too his owne will, and not after our lyking and appoyntment, and that it shal be toto much to our shame when he shal haue stopped our mouth & begōne to speake himself.

And

And why? VVherof will God examin vs? Of things that are more than hidden from vs, and wherin all our witts sayle vs. Lo whervnto God bringeth vs, to shewe vs our beastlinesse and frentike presumption. Seing that God hath such questions to put to vs, and is able too alledge things wherat we shall bee more than confounded: let vs learne so to humble our selues, as it may be too learne at his hand, and when we haue learned, he may make vs to see his light in the midds of the darknesse of this world. And in the meane season let vs learne also too serue and honour him in all respects and all points. For then shal we haue profited well in Godsschole, when wec shall haue learned to magnifie him, and to yeeld him such glorie, as to haue good opinion of all that proceedeth from him. And moreouer let vs also mislike of ourselues, to the end we may resort vnto him, to find the goodnes there which wanteth in ourselues, that therupon it may please him so to gourne vs by his holie spirit, that being replenished with his glorie, we may haue wherof to glorie, not in our selues, but only in him.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as wee may returne too him with true repentance, and he therupon vourfase so to reforme our whole life, as our whole seeking may bee too submit ourselues to his holie commaundements. And so let vs al say, Almighty God heauenly father, we acknowledge and confess as truthe is, that we be not woorthe to lift vp our eyes too heauen too shewe ourselues in thy sight, &c.

The cxlvij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the. xxxvij. Chapter.

4. VVhere vvaſt thou vwhen I layd the foundacions of the earth? ſhevve mee, if thou haſte vnderſtanding.
5. VVho hath layd the measures therof? canſt thou tell? or vvhio hath ſet the compaſſe vpon it?
6. VVhervpon are the foundacions thereof stayed? or vvhio is lie that hath layd the cornerſtone therof.
7. VVhen the Starres of the morning reioyced together, and all the children of God ſoong in triumph?
8. VVho hath ſher vp the ſea vwithin doores, vvhich in emptyng itſelf commeth foorth as out of a vvomb.
9. VVhen I made the clovydes as the garment thereof, and the darknesſe as the ſvvadling bands thereof.
10. I haue ſtabliſhed myne ordinaunce vpon it, I haue ſhet it vp vwithin barres and doores.
11. And I ſayd, hither ſhalt thou come and not paſſe any further, and here ſhalt thou ſtay the lifting vp of thy vvaues.

E graunt well ynough all that is rehersed here concerning Gods woorkes as we ſee them bothe in heauen and earth. But if wee mynded them earnestly, we could hardly be made too ſpeake one woord. Neuertheleſſe if we wiſt how too profit our ſelues by the things that are conteyned in this doctrine: it would be ynough to teache vs loweliness, ſo as wee ſhould no more open our mouthes to grudge againſt God or too complayne of him when hee doeth not things to our lyking. All this geere would be layd awate. For the incomparable greatnessſe and hyghnesſe of our God, his woonderfull power and might, and his infinite goodnesſe and wiſdom which ſhewe themſelues in his woorkes, would ſuffiſe to humble vs, and make vs aſtoniſhed, and wee would do nothing but honour him, and do him homage with ali feare and reverencē. VVe haue then twoo things to conſider heere. The one is, that when God ſpeaketh of his power, and therewithall ſheweth it vs to our face even in the things which we may ſee: the ſame is not more than needeth: for we conſider things verie ill though they be neuer ſo manifest to vs. And ſecōdly it behoueth vs to come to the end and iſtent that God per̄iſotheth, for it is not ynough for vs too confeſſe that God made the earth, and ſetid it in the midds of the ſea. True it is, that Gods ſhetting vp of the ſea after that fort, ſo though it were incloſed with great wailes, is a wonderfull thing, and of good ryght ought we to confeſſe, that the workmaister is excellent. Howbeit it behoueth vs to paſſe yet further, and to apply our whole indeuer too gloriſe God in ſuch a wise, as we confeſſe all his doings to bee iuft, iulioſ equi-

tie, and right, and by that meanes be bridled when we bee tempted to grudge and repine at him, or to finde fault with his woorkes. Then let the things that are conteyned heere, ſerue to ſubdue vs and to hold vs in ſuch humbleſſe and modeſtie, as we may do nothing else but honour him. And if the reaſon of his woorkes be ynkowne to vs: let vs not therfore ceaſe to take them all for good and rightfull, and to reſt therupon without any gaynſaying. But now let vs come to the words that are conteyned heere. The firſt queſtione that God deauandeth, is where Job was when he layd the foundation of the earth: as if he ſhould ſay, wretched creature against whom ſetteth thou thyſelf? It would behoue thee firſt to bee my match: it would behoue thee to come neare myne underſtanding. And how faire art thou off from it? Again he ſayeth, come on, let mee ſee if thou haſte underſtanding? Who hath layd the measures of the earth? Tel mee if thou knowest him. Or who hath ſet the compaſſe vpon the ſame, to make it to be ſo well proportioned: who hath ſetid the earth vpon bir corners and vheres vpon it is stayea? Job, tell mee all theſe things, ſayeth God. Truely when we behold the greatnessſe and weyghtinesſe of the earth, wee be abaflied at it: the how genefſe of it dazelth our witts: and we be not able to comprehend it. VVe ſee well ynough and we bee conſtreynd too confeſſe, that it is made with a greate reaſon as can bee, but yet we come ſhort of it, wherin God ſheweth vs oure own frailtie and feeblenesſe. Now ſeing it is ſo, that even in the thiſſes that are ſene before our eyes, wee want ſufficient iudgement to comprehend them: I pray you what ſhall wee doo in Gods narrowe and hidden ſecrets, wherby he ordeneſt and appointeſt what he liſteth in heauen? And if we ſpye not the reaſon thereof, what ſhall Yy. iiij. wce we say? Is it meete for vs to bee so selfwyse as to judge of them after our owne fancie, seeing that they surmount our vnderstanding? Shall we comprehend that which the verie Angels cannot comprehend? Is it not an ouergreate folie, or rather madnesse for men to preace so farre? Then let vs be well aduised to what purpose this is sayd. And for the better vnderstanding therof, let vs make this comparison. Take mee all the masons and carpenters of the world, yea and all the cunningest builders that can bee chosen, and yet is nother mason nor carpenter so excellent in his art, but he had neede of lyne, compasses, rules, plommets, and such other like things too build withall; or else his building wil be crooked, and he shall not rayse it twoo poles hygh without some fault in it. Now if those woorkmaysters (how cunning and excellent so ever they be in their art,) are fayne to help themselves with lynes, compasses, and measures, and yet the greatest palaces or castles that shall be so builded, are not a hundred pole hygh: what is it in comparison of the building of the earth and the Sea? A man shal be curstly com- 10 bered if he intend to make but a castle of hewen stone. For first of all, if there be not a good foundacion and sure groundwoorke, all the building is in vayne that is layd vpon it.

Again if the reering of it bee not in good proportion and order, the woorking of it wil not be wel borne. And I pray you if all palaces and castles were put toogether, what are they in comparison of the sea and the land? VVhat proportion is there betweene the one and the other? Seing then that men, (be they never so cunning,) have neede of helpe, and seeke heere and there for ayde and succour, yea euen in the things that are nothing in comparison of the most excellent and houge woorkmanship which appeareth in the earth alone in that God hath so settled it vpō the waters as we see, & made it in so goodly order: must we not needs be worse thā wittlesse, if we take vpon vs to controll God in those his doings, which are farre beyond al comparison more hidden from vs, than the things that are to be seene in the order of nature? Therefore whensoeuer these things come to our remembrance, let them serue to rauish vs into wonderment, and to gloriſe him that hath made such a building by his only will, and not by long continuance of time. VVee see that men cannot at the first day build and make perfect the thing that they go in hand with, and that they are faine to bestowe much labour & tyme about it. But it is not so with God, for we see that he did quickly finish all this goodly workmanship that is seene in heauen and earth. Too bee short, we see heere that God mocketh mens pride, in that they presume to controll his works. If I speake but of some 40 meane work to such as are cunning in masonrie and in carpenters craft, and shold say to them, it were better for you to do thus or thus, so as I would play the maystermaſon and yet haue no skill in the matter: should not the maistermasons and carpenters haue iuft cause to lawgh mee to skorne and to say, how now? This fellowe can not skill to make a windowe of half a foote ouer, and yet he falles to controlling of vs. VVill not the skilful in any art, take skorne that any man should come so foolishly to controll their woorkmanship? will they not ſend an ouer- 50 weener backe again to his apce? Yes surely will they. Now if we stand in ſuch awe of maystermasons and carpenters, as we dare not ſpeakē of their worke but with modestie, and with protestation that we be vnable to iudge of them, what ſhall we do when we come vnto God? Behoueth it not vs to be much more humble and modest? VVe know after what maner men will ſpeakē of a handicrafts workmanship, when they be no craftsmen themſel-

ues. True it is (will they ſay) that I am not ſcene in this occupacion, it is not my trade, neuertheleſſe ye ſhall here mine aduice: howbeit I referre it ſtil wholly to ſuch as haue ſkill of it. Then if wee vſe ſuch modeſtie when it ſtandeth but vpō the iudging of a building or ſome other meane work of a handicrafts mannes making: I pray you what honour ought we to yeeld vnto God, when the caſe concernehis works? In what estimation ought wee to haue them?

Now then we ſee what God intended in this text, in ſpeaking of the lyne & the compasse. As if he ſhould ſay, how now? If I were a mortall and corruptible creature, yet would men in beholding my works do me the honour to ſay, Behold, heere is a verie excellent, and ſkilful workmaſon, he is verie cunning, his work ſpeak for him. Yea if ſome handicrafts man (as I ſayd afore) had done ſome meane pece of work, men would not be ſo bold as to finde fault with it: or at leaſtwize they would not do it which had no vnderstanding in ſuch workmanship. But as for mee that haue made ſo excellent a work, which haue created bothe heauen, earth, and ſea, and all of nothing, and which haue finished them in ſo goodly order and aray as men ſee: men vpon them neuertheleſſe to controll mee. And what a dealing is that? VVhat are all the works of men if they be layd to my workmanship? Shall they come neere myne? I haue wrought with incomprehensible power and wiſdom, and yet ſhall I not bee free from mennes iudgements? Shall any man dare ſay, why doest thou this, or why doest thou that, it were better for thee to doo ſo or ſo? VVhat a pride is that? Shall men preferre mortall creatures before mee that am the liuing God? before mee that am almighty and alwize? Is not that an intolerable vnthankfulneſſe? If a mortall man make a pece of woork, men will do him the honour not to iudge of it without greate modeſtie: and haue not I deserued to be honored a hundred tymes more, which haue builded the world?

Then let vs learne to looke better vpon Gods works than we haue doone: ſo as if we cast our eye vpon the earth, wee may bethinke vs of the terrible howgenesse therof. It is not as ſome greate castle well wrought, whervnto none other commeth neere: but we ſee what a weyght it hath, inſomuchas it may well ſeeme imposſible for any foundacion to bee found able to beare it vp. And whervpon is it grounded? Euen vpon the water. The earth muſt needs hang in the ayre (as it doeth in Pſa.24.6.2. deede) and it hath the water round about it. Truely euen the Philosophers which conſidered not God the maker therof, did well perceyue by reaſon how the wa- 60 ters do compaffe the earth, and how the whole masse together hangeth in the ayre. They haue diſputed verye curiouſly therof, and alledged ſome reaſon for it. But yet for all that, they were conſtreynd ſpite of their teethe, to graunt that it was a thing aboue nature, to ſay that the waters ſhould ſo ſhrinke aſide, to the intent that men myght haue roome too dwell on. This could not come of itſelf, needs muſt it be the woorking of ſome diuine prouidence.

After that maner ſpalte they. And although they were blinded through their owne vnthankfulneſſe: yet neuertheleſſe they could not denye but it was ſo. Howbeit (as I haue ſayde) it is not ynoch enough to acknowledge that God created the earth: but wee muſt also behold his woondersfull wiſdome therein, and acknowledge it to be ſuch a miracle, as our wiſs come ſhort of. VVheras it is ſayd that God created all of nothing, & again, that he hath ſettled the earth vpō the waters: is it not a thing to rauish vs into wonderment? If we looke round about about vs, we shal see that the waters do inuiron the whole earth about: and yet notwithstanding wee see that the earth abydeth stable, and what a miracle is that? True it is that sometimes men shal see an earthquake, and it will seeme that all should go to wrecke: and so also might it come to passe, if God prouided not for it. But howsoeuer the world go: wee see that the bodie of the whole earth standeth stedfast still. And is not that a wonder to vs: what excuse can we pretend, if we can find no leysure to think vpon such a woork of God? doeth he not viter his power 10 and mightinesse therein so many ways, as we must needs be sufficiently conuicteth therby? But we see and will not see one whit to magnisise god in his works. And his leaudenesse is vnexcusible. For when men fal asleepe heere, and take not payne to think vpon Gods works: are they not woorse than vnthankfull and churlish? So then, how ignorant so euer we be, there is none excuse for vs, but we be alwayes blame woorthie, if we glorifie not God in his works which are so open and manifest. Ye see then what we haue to beare in mynd in this streyne. Now by the 20 way, wheras mention is made of Compasses, and of measuring of the earth: we see wel that there needed a wonderfull power and incomprehensible wisdome for the setting of all these things in order. For the earth would never haue settled and stood stil as it doeth if it were not in the middle of the aire, in such iust measure and proportion, and in such conuenience and temperature, as nothing were amisse. Furthermore when wee behold the greate and farre distance not only betweene the earth and the clowds, but also betweene that and the skye where the 30 Starres and Planets are: should we not be more abashed? And now when we consider the hyghnesse which we see in the skye aboue the earth: what is the Earth? As greate a masse as it is, and as weyghtie and howge as men see it to be: if we compare it to the greatnessse of the heauen, must we not needs confesse with the Philosophers that it is but a little Bali? VVhat proportionablenessse is there betweene the one and the other? And yet neuerthelesse if wee looke but vpon the mountaynes that are on the earth, wee shall finde even there wherat too maruell, 40 and wherefore too glorifie the woorkmayster that made all.

Again, when on the other side we behold the steddiennesse of the earth, ought it not to ravishe vs into woonderment? Although wee see greate varietie in it: yet doeth it alwayes abyde in his place without fletting. Ye see then, that the hygh mountaynes which doo as it were imboisse the earth, and the vnlcuenesse of the places, seeme able to shake it, yea and to ouerturne it quite and cleane. But God hath peyfed the earth in such proportion and measure: as it keepeth alwayes his owne place stil, and although it seeme that the mountaynes should oversway it, yet notwithstanding one of them is so answerable to another, as the counterpeyse abydeth alwayes stedfast.

To be short, whatsoeuer betydethe, the earth shall stand stedfast and bee perserued still too the end, by the proportionable and eueneleued counterpeyse of it self, and it shal not be any whit remoued whatsoeuer happen to it. Neuerthelesse, when wee see how it is inuironed with the water, and that the howge mountaynes auance themselves as it were to tumble it into the sea, &c yet notwithstanding it continueth steddie still: must it not needs be sayd that God hath wrought after a passing woonderfull fashyon in that behalf? Yes certainly. VVhat is to be done then, but only to worship our God, confessing ourselves to come farre short of so houge greatnessse, and so incomprehensible wisdome? For of a truthe it is good reason that we should walk in all hymblenesse and feare, when we come to the considering of Gods woonderfull woorks, which shewe themselves every where in the order of nature. And so we see verie clearly what is conteyned heere. Yet notwithstanding it behoueth vs too come backe too this point, namely why God setteth the earth before vs as a lookingglasse. It is to the end we might behold his infinite glorie, wisdome, power, and myght, to guide vs and leade vs, as it were by the hand, to the considering of his woorks which are exceeding greate and excellent, therby to be rauished into woonderment, of purpose to humble ourselues vnder his incomprehensible greatnessse, and to honour him. VVee see that God adoranth himself so excellently, as there is no more replying against him, nor no more entering into such boldnesse, as to desire to controll him as though he had doone amisse. VVho is he that shall comprehend his infinite hyghnesse? Let vs but open our eyes, and we shall be confounded For on the other side, if we looke to the earth, it is as our fo-stermoother that feedeth and cherishest vs, and yet notwithstanding we wote not how. VVee see wel ynoch enough how it is tilled, and we can tell well ynoch enough how to talk of it: but yet must we needs be astonished even in that behalf. And that is the conclusion of the text. Seing then that we haue a mirrour of Gods incomprehensible power and wisdome, even in the verie earth that wee treade vpon: what shall we haue if wee looke vp too heauen which is farre aboue, and wherunto we be not able to atteyne? Is it meete for vs to reply against God, and to aske why he doeth so or so, or why he suffereth this thing or that? Alas, who are we? So then let vs marke well, that when wee haue looked wel vpon the earth, it ought to serue to hold our affections in awe, to the end wee attempt not to aduance ourselues aboue the skyes, but rather yeeld the glorie to our God in all things that it pleaseth him to do, knowing that he is the souereine God, and that he hath a perfect and substanciall glorie, and that his woonderfull power and myght are matched with infinite ryghtfulnesse and wisdome, so as there is no fault to bee found in him. If we conceyue this well, wee shall haue profited greatly for one day.

Now let vs come to that it is sayd, That the starres sung prayses, and the children of God rejoiced in triumph, at the creating of the world. By these words God betokeneth, that as soone as the starres were made, it was a sette song or melodie to glorifie him. Not that the starres sung, nor that they be sensible creatures: but for somuch as god did therin set out his owne greatnessse, goodnessse, power, and wisdome: it is al one as if he had spoken lowd and shirle. Do we then lift vp our eyes to heauen? VVee must needs heare the melodie of the starres, according as they began to sing at the creation of the world. And surely such melodie ought of ryght to waken vs, and to stirre vs vp to sing the Lords prayses and to glorifie him: Yea though wee were starke deaf, yet ought we to giue eare to so melodiousse songs and to receyue them: for behold, euene the Angels of heauen are prouoked so to do. But wee bee to blockishe in that behalf, insomuch that when we lift vp our eyes to heauenward to behold the starres, wee consider not too what purpose they should serue vs. Yet notwithstanding it behoueth vs to apply this text to our instruction, to the end we may fare the better by it.

Now then it is sayd in the first part, that the starres began too sing from their first creation. After what maner? As I haue told you already, not with tung, for they bee sensesse and dumb creatures: but the goodnessse, power, and wisdome of God which shyne foorth in the starres, ought to serue vs for as many songs. If the aire rung with shirle and cleere voyces, we ought not to bee more stirred to glorifie our God, than when wee see the woorderfull order which he hath set before our eyes. Howbee it too moue vs yet better to glorifie him, it is sayd that the Angelles reioyced at that sight, and at the hearing of such melodie of the speechlesse creatures, insomuch as it made them for to triumph. Heerby we ought to bee moued too glorifie our God, and such a joy shal bee a ryght and true joy, and a farre other one than the joy of these made to worldlings and vnthrifits, which cannot bee merrie but in displeasing God.

VVee see heere a farre other gladnesse set afore vs, which is, that the Angells of heauen did as it were leape for joy, when they sawe the excellent course and wonderfull order of the heauē by Gods appointment. They were then moued to such a reioycing as is mencioned heere. Seing that the Angells do guide vs to the glorifying of God, & to the singing of prayses vnto him: ought not we to be glad when we behold the goodly order which is in the skye? Is not that the point whervnto wee ought too come as oft as we lift vp our eyes aloft? But what? we be farre off from putting the thing in vre which we bee exhorted to heere: for truly when we heare any text of that doctrine, it slippeth away. Although we be warned never so much that wee ought to glorifie God in looking vp to heauen and in reioycing at the light of the Sunne: and although we be sufficiently put in mind to do it: yet doeth it slip from vs. But seing that the cheef seruice which God requireth of men, is to be praysed at their hands, and wee make none account of it, but (which worse is) doo rob him of his honour, and disestate him of that which is his, in that we glorifie him not as he deserueth: surely wee shall pay dearely for it when it commeth to the reckening. True it is that our Lord knoweth well ynoch that he cannot drawe any thing from out of vs wherby to be magnified as he is worthie: but yet he is contented that men should exalt him and glorifie him in his works, and that we shuld be moued to prayse him, by the beholding of them. Now if wee do not so, are wee not worse than traytors? Yes doubtlesse are wee. So then let vs learne to profit in the doctrine that is conteyned heere. By the way let vs mark, that the Angels are termed Gods children, to the end wee should be the more perswaded to runne too the triumph that is spoken of heere, and ioyne with them in triumphing out Gods prayses, and in glorifying him with one common accord, when we heare the sayd melodie bothe aboue and beneathe, inasmuch as God hath spred out his glorie euery where. Truely this title of being termed the children of God is graunted to the Angells by a speciaill priuiledge, because they approche neere vnto him, and have such a noblenesse in them, that they be aboue all other creatures. They are not only Gods messangers: but also are called principalities and powers, because that by them, as by his handes he executeth whatsoeuer hee thinketh good.

Col. i. c. 16. Behold how the Angelles are surely the children of God: but yet are wee called so as well as they. VVhy so? Because God created vs after his owne image and likenesse. And although this were defaced by the sin of Adam: yet was it repayred again in the chosen by the comming of our Lord Iesus Christ, who is the lyuely image of God, and we were so exalted by his spirit, as wee bee now set in our former state again, and Iesus Christ hath doone vs the honour to come of the line of Abraham, that is to say, to clothe himself with our nature, too the end to reconcyle vs to God his father. Then seing it is so, let vs marke that God sheweth vs in this text, after what sort we may be sure to bee children, and consequently to possesse the heauenly heritage, which is ordyned for vs, as well for vs as for the Angells of Paradise. For although wee creape heere vpon earth, and bee creatures so wretched and fraught with infirmities, as we may bee ashamed of our want and wretchednesse: Yet will God find the meanes to couple vs with the Angells of heauen. Herewithall let vs understand, that the Angells tremble when they behold heauen and earth, and although they be excellent creatures, yet are they driven to bee abashed at the beholding of such a sight as is in heauen and earth. Now seing that the Angells, which are so excellent aboue men, bee neuerthelesse abashed at the greatnessse of God: ought not wee to bee more than rauished into woonderment, when wee open our eyes and behold Gods woorderfull woorks, and when wee heare the goodly melodie that is in all his woorks? Alas, should we be so vnrthankfull as to shet our eyes that wee might see nothing? Should wee play the deaf men that wee myght heare nothing? So then let vs followe the Angells, who are set foorth to vs here as guides, to the intent that God myght be glorifyed at our hands. And if wee glorifie him in all his woorks, he will take and auow vs for his children, and shewe himself alwayes a father towards vs. Thus ye see what we haue to consider vpon this sentence where it is sayd, that all Gods children rejoiced in triumph, when they sawe the starres of the morning reioyting toogither. And it is puposely sayd All, too the end wee myght knowe, that such as giue not their myndes earnestly to the magnifying of God in his power which he vtereth in his woorks, shall be cut off from his house, and are vnworthie to be reckened in the number of his children. Now let vs passe further. Our Lord commeth to the Sea. VVho bath set barres (sayeth he) to the sea? Who bath shet it vp within barres and doores? Thou shalt not passe any further, thus farre shalt thou come and no more. VVhen the sea swelleth, it seemeth that it shuld drowne and swallowe vp all: yet notwithstanding we see it is all the whyle as is were in prison, yea and God holdeth it as a nurce should hold a little babe. He hath set the clouds and mistes about the sea, as little swadlingbands, and as a garment to couer it. The sea then seemeth to be as a little babe whom God weeldeth as he listeth. And heerin also he continueth the magnifying of his woorks, to shewe vs that such an excellencie ought to suffyze to make vs walk in humblenesse, and not to be any more so bold as to set vp our bristles against him, according also as he speaketh by his Prophet Jeremye: Feare ye not mee (sayeth he) me which haue set the bounds of the sea? He sayeth this, because the sea is aboue vs. True it is that the simple and ignorant perceyue not that the sea ouerpeereth vs, and that it is hygher than the earth: but they suppose that the water is vnder the earth and farre beneathe it. But it is cleane contrarie. And when wee bee neere the sea, wee see and perceyue eu'en by eyesight, that it is hygher than the earth. Now seing that the sea is so aboue vs: wherof is it long that wee bee not swallowed vp every minute of an houre, seeing that the water mounteth farre aboue our heads? And specially when mention is made of the flud that did once drowne the whole earth, it is sayd that God opened the springs and all the windowes of heauen, and also that he opened the deepes, so as the waters were not restreyned, but let looce. By that dreadfull iudgement of the flud, God shewed vs as in a mirrour, the thing that shoulde be continually vpon the earth, if he withhold not the waters by miracle. VVee see then that the sea shoulde ouerwhelme all. And what letereth it? See yee not an open miracle? Are wee not convicted to be to be worse than churles, if this cause vs not to worship God, and to feare him according to his power, so as hee may haue al soueraintie ouer vs, and we be vtterly beaten downe? And if men presume to set vp their bristles so against God: let them but pick their quarel to the sea, and see if they shall be heard aboue it or no. And what else is the Sea with his great surges and hideous waues, than a signe of the power of him that made it? Now if the waues of the Sea astonish vs: Alas howe much more terrible must the maiestie of our God be to vs? VVhen the Sea 10 casteth vp his boylings with such hideousnesse as we see: wee tremble at it: and shall we not feare the maker of it, but rather bleare out our tongues at him? VVhat a dealling is that? Must it not needs bee sayde that men are stark madde? And that is the cause why God vþbraydeth men by his Prophete Ieremie (according as I haue alledged the texte before,) saying: Feare ye not me? me which haue bounded the Sea with sandes for an euerlasting ordinance? But nowe let vs come againe too the wordes that are placed heere. God sayth, that be bath boun ded the Sea. And what are those bounds? Like as ewhile he made mention of the compassing of the earth: so now he speketh of the bounding of the sea. Yea and what manner of boundes are they? For the better expressing of that which he had sayde: he addeth, That the Sea is in his hande as a little babe is in the wombe of his mother, so that the child lieth not more stil in his mothers womb, than doth the Sea within his boundes. True it is that it maketh a great noyse: and specially if it bee tossed with windes and tempestes, and that it swell: then it seemeth 30 that all the worlde shall be ouerwhelmed. But yet can it not passe beyonde his boundes. And what restreyneth it? Like as we see a myracle in that a childe is kept close in his mothers wombe, as in a graue, and howsoeuer hee fare, yet he getteth not out till the day of his birthymye be fully expyred, according to the common order of nature: Euen so is it with the Sea. Besides this, God addeth yet another similitude: which is, that the Mistes serue to restreyn the Sea, that it shoulde not passe out of his boundes and borders, like as Swadlingbandes are to keepe in a yong babe. The childe woulde faine pull oute his armes and legges to make sport: but he is so hild in with his swadlingclothes, as hee is faine to tarie there like a prisoner: Euen so is it with the sea. It riseth in suche wise, as it would (by ali likelyhoode) neit onely leape out of one place into another, but rather (as I haue sayde alreadie) swallow vp all and put the whole worlde to confusion. VVe see then that the sea fareth so: and is there any cheyne to restreyn the headinesse that wee see in it? Although they had neede too bee verie great lettes that shoulde restreyn so furious a creature: yet doorth not God vse any violent meanes to stay it, but onely hath appoynted the Mistes to holde it backe: and thereby we see that he handieth it as a little babe, according to his owne saying. And for proofe thereof, we see that the Mistes are nothing but vapours engendered in the ayre, and it is a wonder that the same shoulde get the vpper hand of the Sea, so that as soone as a mist ryseth, by and by the sea becommeth calme. VVhereof commeth that? of nothing? VVhat shall a man say then, but that the Sea is as a little babe that is tyed vp in Swadlingcloutes? Now although these similitudes seeme verie straunge at the first blush: yet notwithstanding it is impossible too finde fitter kindes of speache to make vs perceyue the incomprehensible maiestie of our God. VVee neede not too mount vp to his maiestie to know it as it is: his wðderful workes which he setteth dayly before our eyes, do prove his greatnessse and highnesse so sufficiently, as wee cannot denie it. And it is a fowle shame ffor vs if we acknowledge not his incomprehensible power, in that it is sayde here, that the Sea is restreyned by the Mistes, as a little babe is hilde in by his Swadlingclothes. For what though the Sea be as hideous as men see it? Yet is it hilde within his bounds: it may well leaps and mount aloft, but it cannot passe any further. And therfore let vs learne to gloriſe our God in his wonderous workes better than wee do: and let vs be ashamed of our carish vñthankfulness towards him, in not acknowledging his goodnessse power and wisedome, that we might yelde him the prayse that belongeth to him. Therupon let vs retorne to Gods principall intent: which is, that we must not stay vpon the sea, to consider the thing simplie in it selfe. True it is, that men might take some good instruction, by beholding howe God restreyneth the sea from swallowing vs vp. VVhen we know this, is not euery of vs more than conuictid that the life which God giueth vs, is gauen by myracle? But that were not yet ynough if wee went not further? Beholde, God sheweth vs his woonders, and maketh vs to perceyue them: in these visible things, which notwithstanding are so high, that we be dazed at them. Now if we be constrainyd to honour him in acknowledging our wittes to weake to comprchende his highnesse in the very things that are seene with our eyes: what shal we do to his incomprehensible secretes, and to his priuie and hidden determinations, when both generally and particularly hee worketh after such a fashion, as seemeth straunge too vs, and farre outreacheth all our capacite? Becommeth it vs to presume in that case too iudge at all aduenture, and to give our verdict vpon it as though wee were able to comprehend the things that he doth so beyonde our wit and capacite? He sendeth many aduersities and miseries: One man loseth his goodes, another is smitten with sicknesse, another falles into reproch and flaunder, and another is wronged and beaten. It might be thought that God is farre overseene in handling men so roughly. No, not so. In all these things it behoueth vs to learne to confesse, that God is alwayes righteous, and that he knoweth cause why to handle vs so, and that the same cause is good and rightfull though it be vñknowne to vs. And if we acknowledge no. this, yet forasmuch as we be still in his hande, we shall gaine nothing by all our grudgings. Do wee see the wicked and vngodly haue their full scope in this worlde? Do wee see the dispisers of God liue at their ease? Do wee see them in credit and authoritie, and too bee as the maisters and Lords of the worlde? Do wee see that they spite God dayly, and yet notwithstanding are not punished at the first brunt? Do we see on the contrarie part, that wee are faine to indure one while shame, another while trouble, and another while to be intrapped by treason, and that god succoureth vs not so soone as we would haue him? Let vs wayt paciently till God deliuer vs, as who knoweth what is expedient for vs. And therewithall let vs vnderstande, that if we wonder at the things which he doth here bilow eu'en in our owne persons, and in the things that we may beholde as it were before our feete: much more reason is it that we shold wonder at, yea and honour the secrecie that surmounteth eu'en the capacite of the Angelles. And therefore let these lower things teach vs to settle our selues to the magnifying and glorifying of our God: and so long as we shal be in this world, let vs suffer our selves to be guided and governed by his holy spirite, to the end he may order vs after his good pleasure.

Now let vs fal downe before the presence of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him too make vs feel them better than wee haue done, and specially to know what we bee, how there is such frailtie in vs, as we fail in all pointes and our wits are so rude and grosse, as we cannot attaine to his glorie, that thereby we may learne, to be vterly cast downe in our selues, and yet not ceasse to seeke to be listed vp by fayth in our good God, namely so it bee alwayes with sobernesse and modestie: and that we knowing how much wee bee beholding and bounde vnto him for the number of benefites which he bestoweth vpon vs dayly, may be stirred vp, yea and wholy inflamed to yeeld him thanks, that by our example the poore ignorant and misbeleuing soules may be drawne to one selfsame fayth & knowledge of the truthe, so as all men may with one common accord, prayse, magnifie, and exalt him as hee deserueth: And that for the bringing hereof to passe, it may please him to rase vp true and faithfull ministers of his worde, &c.

The cxlix. Sermon, which is the third vpon the xxxvij. Chapter.

This sermon is yet still vpon the 8. 9. 10. and 11. verses, and then vpon the Text that is added.

12. Hast thou since thy dayes commaunded the breake of the day? or hast thou appoynted the light his place?
13. That it might take holde of the Corners of the earth, and that the vvicked might be shakēn out by it?
14. It is transformed as clay vvhēreōn a marke is set, and they holde themselues as a garment.
15. And the light shall be hidden from the vvicked, and the arme that is lifted vp shall be broken.
16. Hast thou entered into the deepe vvaters of the Sea? or hast thou searched the bottome of the depthes?
17. Are the gates of death knowyne vnto thee? or hast thou senethe gates of the shadowy of death?

He thing that causeth men iudge folisly of Gods works, is that they make too much haste, and tarie not for the ende, that they might know 30 howe God hath prouided for all things. And so all of vs do put this prouerbe in vre, That haste maketh waite. Therfore we haue need to refraine our selues, that we be not to hastic in casting forth our iudgement afore hand: and therof the things ought well to warne vs which are spoken here concerning the sea. For if we looke vpon the mouing vp of the waues, it seemeth that they should ouerwhelme all, and that the worlde should be swallowed vp: and we perchaunce will say, that God ought to have 40 remedied it. But when the waues retire againe, & breake in themselues, and cannot passe their bounds: then do we by and by perceyue Gods wonderfull wisdome & power the better, forasmuch as we see that although the sea rush forth with such headinesse, yet notwithstanding he holdeth it back as a man should weeld a litle babe, as was declared yesterday. Then if we be once able to comprehend Gods workes in their perfection: we shal haue wherfore to glorifie him in all respects. But if we fall too shooting foorth of our iudgement in post haste, as we be woont to do: our rashnesse will shew it selfe, and confuzion shall befall vs for our overboldnesse. Therfore let vs beare well in minde how it is sayde here, that God bath given the sea a law, to say to it, thou shalt go but thus farne and no further. If the sea were euer calme, and that there were never any storme or tempest: men should not so well perceyue gods prouidence, and his fatherly care which he hath of men to maintaine them where he hath planted them. But whē as the sea hath leauē to lift vp it selfe so high & mightily, & yet it cannot passe his bounds, but is restreynd by this ordinance of God: therby we may perceiue that god hath dispozed all things in good measure and reason. Now this may be extended further. For whē we see warres moued, it seemeth that all things both high and low shoulde bee mingled togither, and by sond by we woulde condemne God, if it lay in our power, or else wee fall to iangling against him, for suffring all things too go after that maner. But if we tary the end of them paciently, we shal perceiue that on the one side God chastizeth men iustly by styring vp warres among them: and on the other side, that thereby he intendeth to shewe his power. For when the fire is so kindled: it shall anon after be quenched in a minute of an hour. And then doth God execute his office, wherof it is sayd in the xlvj. Psalme, that it belongeth too Pf. 46. b. 10 him to breake the speares, to knap astinder the swordes, to ouerthrow the Chariots, and too appease the things againe that were so troubled afore. VVe must then haue Gods ordinance alwayes before our eyes & in our mind, wher by he so guideth and gouerneth the troubles that seeme to tend to an euill end, as he turneth them altogther vnto good. For God thinketh it not ynochough to cure the mischeif, but he also vseth it to a good end, insomuch that we be driuen to confess, that it is much better for vs that these troubles should happen, than if we shoulde alwayes liue in peace and rest. And therefore if we consider well the causes which moue God to sende such troubles into the worlde: we will no more murmur against him. And although we conceiue thē not: yet let vs not therfore cease to honor reverētly the seceret determination which God kepereth to himself, but let vs tary his leysure paciently, acknowledging our owne small capacitie & rudenesse: and then shal we follow the rule that is given vs here, according as it is further saide, Hast thou in all thy dayes commaunded the morning light? hast thou made it too knowre his place whence it ought to come forth? Here our Lord procedeth to mocke at mens pride when they take vpon thē to iudge of him, saying: how long is it since you were born? VVa there no light nor day before you were? Seing ye be so wise as to finde fault with mee, it is as much to say as there was no order in the world before you were borne: the morning light wist not whence to come, nor whither to go: without you there had bin no orderlinesse: nothing had bin made, if you had not bin. Sith ye thinke your selues so wise, and will needs control me: I do but only ask you whether you haue at any time appointed frō whence the light shall arise; and [although ye neuer did it, nor can do it] yet you are still finding of fault with my doings. As for me, I haue alwayes set the difference betwixt light and darknesse ever since the beginning of the worlde: I haue appoynted the night time for darkenesse, and caused the breake break of the day to come forth at my pleasure. I haue set an euerlasting order which ought too bee wonderfull. And if ye were not to churlish, ye could not but confesse that these things are as excellent as can be. Now all this was done before you were borne, or any of all your auncetors : yea euen before any man was created. And what meane you then to fall to controlling of me? VVhy set you vp your bristles against me? Do but recken the yeres a little, which the world hath continued. I haue gouerned hitherto, yea and that in such wise, as all creatures must needs confess, that they be astonished at the sight of that which I shew them. And yet to your seeming, I haue don nothing at all before times. Do ye knowe howe the light should be disposed, and how to draw it out of darknesse, as wise as yee weenes your selues to bee? Here then first of all, our Lorde bringeth vs backe to our birth, as if hee shoulde say, recken your yeres, how long is it ago since yee came intoo the worlde? Beholde, men are but as Snayles: as soone as they be borne, death threatneth the. Go too, if God graunt them to liue any time here, they

Psa.90.2. do but make a walke of it, as it is sayde in the fourscore and tenth Psalm. They must backe againe by and by, & when they haue made twoo or three turnes, and leaped a while like frogs, God draweth them away to himself. And yet notwithstanding euē in such shortnesse of life, which passeth as a wind, and slippeth away incontinently, men which are but rotteness will needes contend and go to law with their maker. And what a dealing is that? Let men consider a little his euerlastingesse. Therfore when soever we be tempted to be so buzie aforehand with God and his works: let vs consider that the time is of no lēgh̄ since we were borne, and that during the time of our life, we haue scarcely lifted vp our eyes vnto heauen, to consider any whit at all the euerlastingesse which is in god, and contrariwise the shortnesse of our owne life. Had we once bethought our selues throughly of that: we would soone stop our mouthes, and all our wits shoulde be shet vp, so as we woulde not by any meanes go about to murmur against God. Now let vs compare our life with the long continuance of the world: and yet must we passe further: that is to wit, that God continued by himself & with his maiestie before the world was made. Sith it is so: let vs learne to referre our selues wholy to him, knowing it too be an intollerable thing that we shuld so passe our boūds, & desire to rānge out in iudging of things that we know not. That is one point which we haue to marke vpon this saying, Hast thou in all thy dayes commauded the breakē of the day? For before we were created, God hath alredie set all things in order, yea and that so well, as it shall be to no purpose to carpe at them. VVherefore let vs humble our selues seeing that god had such a fathery care of vs before he sent vs into the worlde, that he prouided all things necessarie for vs aforehand. Furthermore, whereas here is mention made of the morning light: let vs therin acknowledge Gods infinit wisdome, and his power therewithall. If we were not inured to see the breakē of the day: should we not be sore afryde, when hauing seene the darknesse which did daunt and dull vs afore, sodainly as it were in the turning of a hande, wee see the whole worlde so enlightened as it is? VVould we not say it were impossible, if we were not acquainted with it? But we esteeme not Gods working when it is once knowne vnto vs: and the woontednesse of it which hee giueith vs, bringeth vs too that vnthankefulnesse: not of it selfe, but through our naughtinesse. VVherefore not without cause doth God say heere, that when a man looketh vpon the morning light, hee must needes bee abashed, if hee consider from whence it commeth. For although the East standeth alwayes in one certaine Coast: yet notwithstanding men see that the Sunne ryseth sometymes higher, and sometimes lower, according too the seasons of the yeare. In VVinter time, because the Sunne is somewhat further off from vs, hee riseth in a further Coast. And againe in Sommer time, as hee draweth neere too vs, so riseth hee higher and higher till he seeme too bee a mōst over our heades. To be short, like as the East, so also is the morning light. Nowe seeing there is such an order, set out as it were by a payre of compasse, so as the Sunne swaruerh not one hearebrede from the circuit that God hath appointed him, but commeth alwaysump to the point: is it not a thing that we may well wonder at? VVee see that the Sunne never goeth out of his way, insomuchē that if a man marke all things well, hee shall finde that there is a diuersitie in euerie day of the yere, and yet notwithstanding, if he compare one thing with another, yea euen through the whole yere, he shall perceyue that all goeth in one continuall race: so as though the Sunne rise at one point[ of the skie] too day, and at another too morow, and likewise do set: yet when the yere commes about, he returneth again to follow the same trace which he hath continued euer since the making of the worlde, keeping his orderly course in such wise, as a man can nothing neare make a Clocke to keepe so iust compasse as the Sunne doth in his going about. And what a masse is it? It is a thing much greater than the whole earth. Againe, it were verie much if hee had no greater race too go throughout all the whole yere, than he goeth in one day: and yet neverthelesse seeing that he keepeth his order so iust, is it not a thing that ought to rauishe vs into wonderment, that wee might honour the incomprehensible maiestie of God? Yes, if wee were not worse than brute beastes. VVee haue eies and see not. God maketh his dumbe creatures to sounde by imprinting his glorie in them: and wee heare nothing of that melodie. So then it is long of nothing but of our owne naughtie lewdnesse, that we take not holde of Gods glorie which is visible to vs, and sheweth it selfe too vs in all his creatures, and in the order whiche hee hath stablished in the worlde, and which hee mainteyneth as stedfastly as hee doth nothing more. It is sayde by and by that the breakē of the day spreadeth abroad and lighteth vpon all the wings (that is to say, vpon all the vittermost partes) of the earth. For in the Hebrue tongue, the worde wing signifieth t.c borders or vmost partes of anie thing. Yee sae then, that the light casteth it selfe al roade, and spreadeth ouer all the worlde as soone as it is in it. VVhen we beholde the darkenesse of the night, wee woulde say that there must needes bee some great battell too chace the same awaie. How so? VVho is he that could rid the earth of darknesse, so as men might be euerie where about them, wheras they were earst as good as shet vp in a dungeon? VVho would think that the light should so preual with some great and terrible battell? And yet notwithstanding, the morning doth no sooner open his eyelids, but he sheddeth forth his light ouer the vittermost partes of the earth: and anon after, the Sunne commeth too take possession of his dominion, according as God hath gyuen him soueraintie euer the day, to execute his office which he hath committed vnto him. VVee see lie entereth possession so swiftly, as we ca scarcely cōceive it in thought. As soone as we open our eyes, the Sunne stryketh in hys beames, and the darkenesse is driven quite away. Nowe, shall wee fater this vpon the Sunne whiche is a lifelesse creature? It is impossible. Then muste wee go too the VVorkeman, and acknowledge his Maiestie too bee so excellent, as all men ought too humble themselves then selues and to shike vnder it, and to give their neckes to the yoke, in honouring the greatnesse and excellencie which appeare in all Gods workes, and not repine any more against him whatsoeuer he do. For if we must needs be confounded, and our wits faile vs in the things that are visible and open before vs : needs must we of good right stoupe and wayr for the ful discouery of the last day, whē the cace concerneth his incomprehensible secrets. So thē, let it nowe suffice vs to conceyue those things by fayth, which we cannot yet perceiue till we haue learned more: which shall be when our good God hath bereft vs of this mortall flesh, drawne vs home to himselfe, and fashioned vs like to himselfe in glorie. It is sayd immediately, that the wicked shall be shaken out of the earth. Some expounde this, that the Sunne ingendereth many diseases, & therefore that when the day breaketh, it is as ye woulde say, a clensing of the worlde from wicked men, inasmuche as some disease dispatcheth them. But that agreeth not in any wise to the matter. For first and foremost the breake of the day doth rather releue men, forasmuch as at that time we haue our bodies most weeldie and best disposed. Yea and euen the poore soules that are sick, and haue beene turmoyled all the night, are somewhat cheered when morning is come, insomuch as yee shall see them well eased by it. And that is the cause why the Prophete Malachie speaking of our Lorde Iesus Christ, calleth him the sonne of Righteousnesse, wherein he taketh his similitude of the day sunne, and of the things that we finde by experience, namely, that hee bringeth vs health in hys wings, that is too say, in his beames, and that the same 30 clengeth the earth, and cheereth our bodyes that were dumpish with humors, according as wee knowe that the night bringeth such things. And truely if the breaking of the day engendred diseases, good men should be subiect to them as well as ill men. And therefore the fittest exposition is, that the wicked shall be shaken out of the earth, that is to say, they shall be discerned or spoyed out. For if there were darknesse continually : men coulde not discerne blacke from white. But when God hath so spred out light ouer all the worlde, then it is seene how euerie 40 man behaueth himselfe. True it is that the wicked ceasse not to misbehave themselues all the day long : for they haue no feare of God, and although they be ashamed of men, yet fall they to all licenciousnesse, insomuch as they ceasse not to play their looce prankes euen at high noone day: but yet do we perceiue some footsteps of that which is spoken here. Things are out o<sup>r</sup>der in the worlde, and yet notwithstanding, Gods order appeareth in them, and is seene through them : so that we may say, it is true that God giueth Satan head, & restreyneth not the wicked so 50 much as he could do, but giueth them libertie to triumph in naughtines, & so are things in a broyle on the one side: and yet notwithstanding, for the preseruation of mankind, Gods intent in sending the light, is to reppresse the wicked. For what a thing were it, if the wicked were not bridled by the secret prouidence of God? Surely we should perish at euery turne. Yea, and into what rage would Satan the driver of them thrust them headlong, if god wrought not in that behalfe? VVe know that Satan is the deadly fo<sup>r</sup> of all men, and desire nothing so much as to make cleane 60 riddance of al creatures, and to wipe the remembrance of God out of the worlde: and therfore needes must the order come of God and the troubles and disorder come of men. So then although the wicked do still dwell vpon the earth in the brode daylight, and put their disorders in practise : yet doth God continually discouer them, and by that meanes bryde them, so as the earth is after a sort clenched by the rising of the Sunne, I meane not from vapours that had raigned in the night, nor from other corruptions that gathered togither when the ayre was so thickned : but I meane that God purgeth or clengeth the earth from wicked folke, by abridging them of their libertie, because men can poynt ouerte the naughtipackes with their finger, and they are as then somewhat ashamed: I say that euen the shamelesse which haue (as ye woulde say) sealed vp their own eies, haue notwithstanding some inward remorse, so as they suffer not themselues to rush out into the extremitie of their lewdnesse. Thus ye see that the breake of the day purgeth the earth after a sort, howbeit not altogether, for God maketh dayly purgings. Now he addeth one other effect of the Sunlight : which is, that the earth taketh as it were a newe shape, and that the things whiche the earth conteyneth, serue it for a garment when the Sunne shynet after that maner. For in the night season the earth is shapless, a man seeth nothing of it. It is then (as ye woulde say) a great Quamire, where nothing can be discerned. But when the Sunne beginneth to rise, it is as a man had taken pottes ouete of a lumpe of earth, and made them and well trimmed them. Then is the earth fashioned, which before was without fashion. Therefore when God sendeth the light of the day, it is all one as if he fashioned the whole earth by giuing it beautie, to the ende wee shoulde beholde it with wondering : and so whereas it was naked, shet vp and barrein afore, (at leastwise as in respect of our eyes:) he clotheth it againe. For here the cace concerneth mens sight. The earth in the night is as it were desert and wast, and there is nothing seene vpon it. But in the daytimes it is clothed againe, bycause that which way soeuer wee turne our eyes, we see the godly deckings that God hath put vpon it, according as he sayth, that he crowneth the yeare with Psalms. 65.6.12. his blissing : insomuche that when hee replenisheth the earth with frutes, it is all one as if hee did put on goodly garments, Crownes, Garlandes, and suche other things vpon it. VVhen wee see that God worketh after that maner, haue we not whereat too bee astonished, yea and cause to confess that the greatness of his woorkes surmounteth allour wits, and that we vtterly fayle of them? For although we may in part tast of his goodnes, power, wisedome and iustice : yet notwithstanding we must bee faine at length in conclusion to cry out with David, Lord how wonderful and deepe are thy works! They be a bottomlesse pit, and who shall reherser them vnto thee? True & 92.b. 6. it is, that David streyneth himselfe too recken vp Gods & 104.e. works, & not to babble of them without knowing ought 24.& 139.c. of them. God then had shewed him that which he sayth: and we also may partly well iudge of the things that God 14. sheweth vs in the whole creation of the worlde, & in the order which he hath stablished therein. There wee shall see some footsteppes of his iustice, goodnesse, power and wisedome (as I touched before:) but as for the comprehending of all things that wee perceiue to the vttermost point, we shall come farre short of that. Then must we be faine to cry out with wonderment, Lord how maruelous are thy works? Lo what we haue to marke in effect vp on this streyne where it is sayde, that the earth taketh a newe shape or fashion, and that the things which God hath set vpon it, are as garments wherewith it is decked. And wheras this is done day by day : yet if common custome inured vs not vntoo it, surely wee woulde say they were wonderfull things. VVherefore let vs learne not too measure the worthinesse of Gods woorkes by our dayly inioying of them: but too bee so muche the more styrred vp too say, that there is a woarker whome wee must not touche too carpe at any of his dooings, but rather submit our selues too him with all humilitie. Nowe God addeth addeth immediatly, that the wicked shall not inioy the light, and that the loftie arme shall be broken. This serueth to prevent a question that might bee obiectet. Howe nowe, [might some man say?] Seeing that God hath ordeined the Sunne to giue light to the worlde, and set things in so goodly order: why suffereth hee the wicked to inioy that benefit? For he ought too haue set it aside for his owne children which serue and honour him. It should seeme therefore that he doth amisse in this case, that the light of the Sunne is common both to good and bad. But 10 truely, herein wee ought to consider Gods goodnessse the better, according also as our Lorde Iesus Christ tellet vs. Follow your heauenly father (sayth he) who maketh his Sun to shine euuen vpon the vnworthie. therfore do good to your enimies, &c to such as haue done you harme. Iesus Christ would not haue spoken so, if we had not iust cause to gloriſe God for inlightning the whole world after that maner, notwithstanding that the most part bee noug̃t worth and wicked. Howbeit in this streyne there is yet somewhat more shewed, that is to wit, that God calleth vs after a sort to his iudgement, as if he shold say, True it is that the Sunne doth for a time shine vpon the wicked as well as vpon the good, and the one of them liueth as well as the other: But tarie a while, for the wicked are not heires of the worlde: and although that as now they receyue that which belongeth not to them, and haue their eies open to receive the light of the Sunne: yet shall they be vtterly bereft of it in the end. Therfore he sayth, their light shall be taken from them. VVhen he sayth their light, he sheweth that for the present time wee haue no more 30 aduaantage (to outward appearance) than the dispisers of God and the heathnish sort haue. For they draw the ayre as well as we, they haue the light as well as we, and they eat and drinke as well as we. Ye see then that it behoueth vs to beare paciently such mingling as now. Neuerthelesse it is not without cause that God dooth heere lende the light vnto the wicked. For it is too make them the more vñexcusabile, yea and in verie deede it is but such a light as shal not continue with them for euer. But wheras we on our part do homage vnto God, as well for our life 40 as for all the appurtenances thereof: it is for that we shall be heires of the worlde as his children: and not without cause doth S. Paule in the fourth to the Romanes couey the same to Abraham, and to al the faithfull. Therfore let vs learne that whensoeuer the Sunne shineth, the same is a part of our inheritance: and forasmuch as God hath adopted vs to be his children, the Sunne is a detter vnto vs, and we may recken it as a part of our goodes. As much is to be thought of our eating and drinking, and of our inioying of all the things that the earth bringeth forth. It is not due to vs on Gods behalfe, but it proceedeth of his mere liberalitie. But forasmuch as he hath chosen vs to be his childrē, & we do with a pure hart claime him to be our father: the earth oweþ vs nourishment, and al creatures are in our hand, that is to say, we may vſe them freely. And the same vſe of them shal continue to vs for euer: not that wee shall haue any neede too eate or too drinke, when we be once gone out of this world: but my terming of the vſe of them to be continuall or everlasting, is for that it is blessed and blisfull: and our present vſing of Gods creatures is a helpe to further our saluation: for by that meanes god maketh vs to feele his goodnes & loue. And when we be made partakers of the heauenly glorie, the worlde shall then be more ours than euer it was, notwithstanding that we shall not haue any neede of meate, or of drinke, or of rayment. For yet shall we haue a better and perfecter possession of it than wee haue at this day. So then, not without cause doth God adde heere, that the light which the wicked haue, and which they claim to them selues, shall be taken from them. And that may serue vs for a declaration of that which was touched afore, namely, that the wicked shall be shaken out by the breaking of the day, that is to say, that they will disguise themſelues, but our Lorde doth then restreyne them, and that although there be ſome disorder, yet men ſee ſome order intermixed with it, whereby the great troubls are affwaged, which without that, were ynough to diſtroy the whole worlde. Therefore if nowadayeſ wee ſee that the wicked maye boast of their hauing of the light as well as wee, yea and (which worse is) that they haue their full ſcope, and that the poore children of God are troden vnder foote, troubled and put to open shame, and ſcarcely haue wherwith to feede themſelues ſlenderly: it behoueth vs to beare it paciently. And why? For in the end the light ſhall be ta ken from the wicked. It is ſayde alſo, that the loftie arme ſhall be broken. By the loftie arme, God betokeneth the power and credit which the wicked haue in the world, in alſmuch as he giueth them their full ſcope for the exerciſing of his children: for it is for our behoof to be tamed. If we had the world at will, we ſhould no more know what it is to beare Gods yoke. Therfore it behoueth vs too paſſe through the troubls & miſorders that are ſene. Alſo it is to trie our faith: for had we a Paradise here in this worlde: where were our hope? VVe could not be mo ued to ſeekē the ſpirituall life. Yea and althoſh we be as miſerable as may be: yet can we not perceyue that there is a better ſtate to be desired: and what would we thendo if we had all things as we woulde wiſh? So then it is re quisite that God ſhould quicken vs vp to ſeekē his ki ngdome: & that is the cauſe why he giueth the wicked their full ſcope, and ſuffreth them to lift vp their arme. Truly it is a very ſore and troublſome temptation, when we ſee the wicked to be after that ſort as it were Lords and maiſters of the world. And wherof commeth that, but because God hath reached them his hand, and is minded to magnifie them after that fashion? VVe ſee then that the ſillie weakiengs ſhalbe troubled: but let vs content our ſelues with that which is ſaid here, namely that the armes of the mighty ſhalbe cruſhē & broken in the end. So the, as oft as we ſee the wicked beare ſway in pride and crueltie, and vaunt theſelues of their credit: let vs reſort to this doctrine for our coſort: that is to wit, that wheras they haue thei r armes vpō vs as now, & it ſeemeth that they ſhould break our heads: God can welinough brooſe and breake them asunder. And therefore let vs tary paciently till God per forme that which he hath ſpoken, & then ſhall we not be disappointed, ſo our mindes be quiet to give place to his prouideſce. For he knoweth the conuenient times of wor king, and it is not for vs to appoint him any thing. Furthermore, the wicked ought here too bethink themſelues well. True it is that this doctrine ought to ſerue chiefly to the comfort of the faithfull, that they may bee vphilde in the mids of their aduersities and oppreſſions, when men trouble them and wrong them. Let them at ſuch tymes call to remembrance, that the armes of the wicked muſt be aduanced for a time, vntill God breake them. Yet notwithstanding the holy ghost ment also too threaten the wicked, because they be ſo outragious, & beare themſelues in hande, that they be able to worke wonders, and remoue mountaynes. God ſayth to vs in one worde, Tarie ye till the armes that are nowe lifted vp bee broken: and that muſt needes come to paſſe. VVill wee not then haue God to be our enimie and aduersarie partie? Let vs not lift vp our armes: that is too ſay, let vs not ſtretch them ouſe (as the Scripture ſayeth) too comitt outrages: Let vs not go aboue to hurt or harme our neig hbourſ, bours, but let every of vs modestly consider what is lawfull for him. Let vs so restreyne our armes, as they may be ruled by Gods worde, and no man presume beyonde his owne calling. If we proceede after this maner, god wil always give vs new strength. And although our armes be wearied, yet will he strengthen them again in the end, according also as hee sayeth, that the doctrine of the gospell

Heb. 12. c. 12. must serue to strengthen vs when we be weake. But who soever lifteth vp his armie aloft, that is to say, whosoeuer taketh more vppon him than he ought to doo, must 10 i n the ende haue his armes broken by God. For God is an enimie too all these great takers vppon them, whiche mounte vpp so high in pride, and haue no myldnesse in them. Thus much concerning that poynt. Nowe it is sayd by and by after,
Diddest thou ever attaine to the drops of the Sea? The Hebrue worde which God vseth here, betokeneth Teares, for it commeth of a worde that signifieth to weepe or shudde teares. And if a man translate it, 20 vnto the great deepes of the Sea: the woerde will also verie well agree with it. But by the way, it behoueth vs too marke the similitude: which is, that God meaneth that the springs which are in the great deepes, are as Teares. VVhence commeth the infinit abundance of water in the Sea, but of the droppes that are there, whereof flow the waters? Nowe the sayde abundance is as it were Teares. And surely the welsprings are termed (as ye woulde say) the eyes of the earth. For looke as the eyes dooshedde forth teares in a man: so doo the fountaynes ooze oute moysture in the earth. God therefore in this streyne vseth that similitude and sayeth: Come on, diddest thou 30 euer go downe into the bottome of the Sea, to search out the drops that it yeldeth forth? That is to say, didst thou euer enter intoo the deepes, to see the waters that sewe out there, and too knowe whence the abundance commeth which thou seest, and whereat thou art abashed? And for the better confirmation hereof, he addeth, Hast thou seen the gates of Death? or hast thou behilde the gates of the shadowe of Death? Heere and in the things that he will adde afterwarde concerning the great roomth or largenesse of the earth: hee intendeth too shewe in effect, that our wittes are to slender and feeble, too comprehend what is in the things that are most apparant and neare vnto vs: and that we must needs(spite of our teeth) confess that God sheweth vs such woonders, as serue to rauish vs aboue all our vnderstanding. Then if we be inforced to confess that there is such wisedome in God, yea euen in respect of his workes which are open too vs, and which he sheweth vs as it were with his finger: what shall we do in the things that are hidden, and which hee reserueth to himselfe till the last day? As when he suffreth or appoynteth many things to be done in the world, which seeme straunge and secrete to vs, and wherein wee perceyue no reason, for they be [perchance] some of his spirituall Secretes. VVhat will we say to them? If wee cannot comprehend the things that are heere as it were before our feete, and wherevpon wee treade, I say if we cannot fasten vppon them: what shall wee say too the things that are aboue Heauen, and which surmounte all creatures, and outreache the common order of nature? Lo in effect what Gods meaning is. But nowe let vs 50 learne when our wittes are too eger in iudging of things that are not lawfull for vs, let vs learne (I say) to thinke vpon the Sea, and vpon the deepe places of the waters, and saye, Go too wretched wyght, what intendest thou to doo?

It is sayde that Gods Secretes are so deepe a gulf, Psa. 36. b. 7. as a man can neuer come to the bottome of them: and that those gulfs do farre exceede the gulfs of the Sea.

Canst thou but draine a Riuier, to see from whence the waters spring? No, thou canst not so much as conceyue what the spring of a little fountaine is, whereoutof neuerthelesse there issueth a great Brooke. VVhen thou hast bethought thee throughly, thou canst not tell howe to drayne oute a Ryuer or a Fountaine: and howe canst thou then enter into the gulfes of the Sea, too spie oute by inchmeale whence that abundaunce of water commeth, which is gathered togither there? Nowe if thou comprehendest not a materiall thing: howe darest thou pleade agaynst God, and be so rash and full of presumption, as to replie agaynst thy Judge, and to go about too subdue him vnto thee? Lo what we haue to marke vpon this streyne. True it is that this doctrine seemeth too be common among vs: and there is no man but he vnderstandeth it. But what for that? Doo we fare euer the better by it? [No, no:] we see that euerie man taketh leave and libertie to iudge foolishly of Gods works. And why? Because wee bee not acquainted with our owne smalnesse, nor haue at any time learned that God intendeth to holde vs in awe, to the ende we should not presume aught of our selues, when he giueth vs such instructions heere bylowe. VVe need not mount aboue the clowdes to know the incomprehensible maiestie of our God: let vs but cast down our eyes, and looke to our feet (as I haue sayd afore) and we shall be confounded out of hand. How then should it be possible for vs to enter into the secret purpose of our God, to know al things so as no thing might escape vs? Our nature were rather too go downward than to mount vpward. VVho is he then that hath giuen vs wings to stie so high? Nay we bee solumpish, that we fall always to the ground: and yet notwithstanding, if we looke but euen vpon the things heere beneath: beholde they be as bottomlesse pittes to swallow vs vp. And howe shall we then mounte vp to heauen, to searche the things that God hath shette vp there? Must it not needes bee a marueilous ouerweening, and such a one as commeth of forgetfulness? For if we had but one dropte of settled witte, surely wee woulde rather 40 learne too be modest.

Ye see then, that this doctrine is not superfluous, at leastwise if men woulde put it well in vre. But for a conclusion let vs learne, that God hath granted vs a singular benefite, forsoomuch as in this our weaknes & rawnesse of vnderstanding, hee hath giuen vs a farre better thing than the sight of the bottomlesse deepes. VVhy so? For in the Lookingglasse of his Gospell he maketh vs to beholde the secretes of heauen, so farre forth as is expedient for vs. Yea, I say so farre as is necessarie for vs: for it is not for vs to followe our owne foolish and inordinate lustes: but we must content our selues with that which God openeth vnto vs, and not be curious in searching beyonde his worde. Let it content vs that he enlighteneth vs with his holy spirite, to the ende wee may iudge of his workes as becommeth vs. And if wee do De. 30. c. 14. so, then shall the thing be fulfilled which Moyses sayth: namely, Say not any more, who shall go downe intoo the deepes? VVho shall climbe vp aboue the clowdes? VVho shall go ouer the Sea? Beholde, the woerde of God is in thy mouth, and in thine heart: Content thy selfe. Sothen, seeing that God graunteth vs this prerogative of teaching vs all things in his schoole which he knoweth to be for our profite: it is as good as if he made vs to passe ouer the Sea, or too go downe intoo the deepes, or too climbe aboue the Clowdes, or(too be short) too come as it were intoo his besome. VVhat desire wee more? Then let vs bee contented with the knowledge which hee giueth vs as nowe by his worde, and by the 60 learning

lerning of his Gospell, wayting till he discouer it more fully and largely vnto vs, which shal then come to passe, when he maketh vs too see the things face to face, which we see now but in part.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as we may thinke better vpon the wanis and corruptions of our nature than wee haue done, to the end that we distrusting our selues, and being vitterly at our witts end, may runne vnto him, and 10

not desyre any thing but that he vsill so gouerne vs, as we may be clenched from all our vyses, and so reformed after his image, as al the sinfullnesse of our nature may be beaten down and killed, to the end that we feling how his power hath wrought so in vs, may glorie in nothing but in his mere goodness. That it may please him to graunt this grace not only to vs, but also to al people and nacions of the earth, bringing backe al poore ignorant soules from the miserable bondage of errore and darknesse, too the ryght &c.

Lthough the matters that are rehersed heere do seeme to bee none other than such as are commonly knowne alreadye : yet if wee looke well to all things, every man will deeme it needfull that our ouerweening should bee repressed, not with a woord or twayne, but with long declaracions, such as God maketh here. For although wee haue graunted that our witts are to weake to comprehend Gods works : yet notwithstanding there needeth but the turning of a hand to leade vs into some foolish curiositie and prelumption : and that foolhardiness carrieth vs awaie headlong like a madnesse. And therfore let vs not thinke it straunge, that our Lord vseth here so long talk to make vs perceiue how it is not for vs to iudge of his works, but that it is ynough if we knowe them in part according to our rudenesse, and that he giue vs some taste of the. And that is the meane wherby we shall to our profit beare away the things that shall bee spoken therof. Now let vs looke vpon that which is sayd heere. Mention is made of the earth, and God demaundeth whither a man be able to measure it or no. And there is a dubble measuring of the earth. The one is too knowe of what largenesse the world that is inhabited is of : and this may after a sort be comprehended by conjecture. Also there is the whole earth in it selfe in comprehending the same parte that is so couered with the sea as it is not seene : and it is impossible to iudge of the greatnessse of that. But put the case that men could determine of euery whit of it : yet not withstanding when men had knowne such a miracle, 40 they ought too bee abashed at it and too gloriise the maker.

So then, it is not without cause that God demaundeth whither we be able to do it or no. Neuerthelesse it is impossible. For (as I sayd afore) scarsly haue men any substantiall proofs wherby to knowe the length and breadth of the world that is inhabited. And if a man speake of the whole masse and bodie of the earth : it is impossible too bring it too passe, that the largenesse therof should bee knowne. There is not then any wit of man that atteyneth thervnto. And what a thing is it then to go about to inclose the maiestie and secret purpose of God within our vnderstanding ? It is sayd that God holdeth the earth as if I hild three or fowre graynes of dust in my hand. I neede not to open my hand for it : I keepe my hand shet, & yet hold the dust still within it. God vseth the same similitude by his prophet Esay, too shewe that when wee speake of him, or think of him, we must not measure him by the things that are seene. For the earth is infinite in respect of vs, and yet notwithstanding he can hold it cloe in his fist: that is to wit, there is no proportionable respect betwixt his incomprehensible being & inestimable glorie, & the whole masse of the earth as greate as it is: the earth is nothing at all in comparison of those. Ye see then that the thing which we haue to marke in this streyne, is that when we consider that the earth is of so greate largenesse as it outreacheth our vnderstanding : it behoueth vs to be wel assured, that he which holdeth it or is able to holde it in his fist, hath another maner of greatnessse in himself, & ther-

therefore that there's no more for vs to do , but to confess our owne feeblenesse, and that we bee to rude and grossewitted. Herevpon let vs honour him, and acknowledge that all his doings are of such perfection, as there is no fault to be found in them, and that it is not for vs to replie against him, because we bee to ignorant. Thus ye see what we haue in effect to gather vpon that which is sayde here. By and by after there is speaking of the way of light, and afterwarde of the thunder and lightnings, according as mention was made of them afore. And not without cause is this matter repeated : For (as wee sawe yesterday) as soone as the breake of the day appeareth, the whole worlde is by and by lightned throughout, and the wings of the Earth, that is too say, the vttermoste partes of it are discouered, so as the earth taketh a newe shape, and all this is done in one instant of tyme. Seeing then that such a myracle appeareth before our eyes : is it not reason that God shoulde bee gloryfied thereby? And if wee will needes play the iolie fellowes heere : do wee not deserue to bee punished for our ouerweening , and too be laughed to scorne at Gods hande for this foolish lust of ours, which haue to comprehend the things that are too high for vs ? By what path shoulde the light go? Is it in vs to appoynt it ? If wee woulde appoynt it his way howe farre and wyde it shoulde spreade, howe is it possible for vs too go beyonde the whole masse of the earth, and too attaine to the vttermost part of the world? VVhat a surious madnesse were it for vs too presume to judge of Gods woorderfull workes ? Sith wee cannot conceyue howe it commeth too passe that the ligh.<sup>tis so</sup> 30 soone spredde abroade, when it hath once taken possession by the name of the Sunne, to reigne ouer the day? So then let vs learne to exalt God in such wise in all his creatures, for the greatnessse and highnesse of his workes: that wee on our side acknowledging our owne slendernesse, may bee as it were bridled to hiruble our selues before him. For, the way for men to honour God accordingly , is by no meanes to glorie in themselves , nor to take anie thing vpon them aboue him. For if I magnifie God never so muche , and in the meane whyle, 40 will needes bee as his companion : too what purpose is that? VVee cannot doo God greater wrong, than too compare our selues with him, or to desyre to abace him vntoo vs, too say that hee shoulde bee our mate and fellowe. God then shall never bee duely honoured of vs, except wee bee first as it were brought too nothing , and that wee acknowledge that there is nothing in vs but wretchednesse.

Lo what we haue further too beare in minde, when mention is made heere of the way which is hilde by the light, cyther when it setteth , or when it ryseth too the worlde. It is sayde afterwarde, That no man knoweth the treasures of the Snow and the Hayle. It is not here onely that God useth the same similitude of treasures. For when hee speaketh of any of the chastizements which hee sendeth vpon men, he sayth he hath terrible sortes layde vp in his treasures, which no man knoweth of. And this similitude importeth twoo things . The one is, a greate store ( for a man will not saye that a dozen of Frenche-crownes are a treasure, but there must bee a greate masse 60 or quantitie of them : )and the other is, that a treasure is hidden or layd vp. Therefore when God speakeith of the treasures of snowe and hayle , he meaneth that there is a store of them so farre passing the vnderstanding of man, as wee must needes bee astonisched too thinke vpon it : and therewithall he betokeneth also that the cause thereof is hidden from vs.

VVee see the Snowe and the Hayle wellynough : but doo wee perceyue any thing of the making of the haile and snowe? Doo wee knowe howe it commeth too passe ? True it is, that the Philosophers can well dispute of it, and men shall see some causes by them alledged: But yet is that a verie small insight of the wonderfull order that God hath set in nature : hee hath a secrete priuicie by himselfe whiche is further off from the reache of our capacite, so as wee come short of it. Nowe wee perceyue wherefore God speaketh after that maner of the Treasures of Hayle and Snowe. It remayneth that we put the same doctrine in practise. VVhich of vs is able too make one handefull of Snowe by arte or cunning? VVho can turne the water or vapours into hailes or hoarfrost? Let men beate their braynes aboue it as much as they list, yet are they neuer able to compasse it. VVe cannot make one heare of our head white or black. Now sith it is so, haue we not cause to magnifie the inestimable power of God when hee couereth the whole earth with snow? VVhence taketh hee so great a quantitie of waters? Truly men will say it is ingendered in the middle roomth of the ayre which is colde, and that when a great quantitie of vapours bee drawne vp thither, at length the same cometh togither and freezeth, & therof ingendreth the snow: & if the same stiffe be more harder bound, the is haile ingendred, because the thing is become more fast and substanciall. Men may well say so , and it is true : but yet is it not a straunge thing that in so short a time, so great store should viter it self, which had beene hidden afore ? Sometimes the weather shall be very faire in winter , and within a two or three dayes the snow shall fall a twoo or three foote deep vpon the ground? I pray you ought not such a change to make the heares stand vp stiffe vpon our heades (at leastwise if we were not to dull) to the ende to leade vs to some feare of God? Furthermore, if we be rightly minded, ought we not to be moued to beare such reverence to our God, as to acknowledg his power to bee so high aboue vs, yea euen in the visible & earthly things, as it giueth vs cause to glorifie him by confessing our own ignorance ? Ye see then what we haue to gather vpon this worde Treasure, for the well applying thereof to our owne vse. Besides this, let vs call to minde how it is sayd in the song of Moyses, That God hath his chastizements layd vp in his treasures, which we comprehend not : to the ende we steppe not out of square as wee see men do, which oftentimes worke spite against God, bearing theselues in hand, that they be scaped Gods hand. For if he haue deliuered them from any inconuenience: it seemeth to them that the worst is past , and so they doo but shake their eares, as the prouerbe sayth. Let vs call too minde this which God telleteth vs: know ye (sayth he) the roddes that are layd vp in my treasures? As if he should say, whe I shall haue beaten you after one fashion, and afterwarde haue pitied you, thinke not your selues too be quit for all that: for I haue other meanes which you cannot coeiuie. VVhen we haue beene chastized after one maner, there are a dozene scourges mo which you neuer thought of. Therefore stand ye in feare of me, and prevent mine anger, and tempt me not hereafter, leasl I vter my scourges more and more vpon you. And that is the cause why it is sayde here, that God keepeth the treasures to the time of aduersitie, and to the day of encounter and battell. As who would say, they be his artillerie, his speares & his swords wherewithal to fight agaynst his enimies. No doubt but God in vsing this similitude of encounter and battell, meant too betoken that if wee haue any warre with him, he is fenced and furnished alreadie after suche a sort, as wee muste needes go by the worse : for wee haue no strength nor power too stande against his hande. VVee may may well put on armour, and assemble all the ayde of the world: but which of vs can scape his hand when he shall haue set al his creatures in battell after that maner against vs, and commaunded them too giue charge vpon vs? And therefore lette vs learne firste of all, that God needeth not too borowe helpe, when he would be auendged of his enemies: it is ynough for him to determine it in his owne purpose, or too speake the woorde, or to shewe but his will: and immediatly both heauen and earth will bring him armes out of number. For sith hee couereth the earth a foote or twayne thicke with snowe, is hee not able to ouerwhelme vs when he listeth? thinke wee that his power is abated that hee cannot sende snowe thirteyn poles deepe aboue our heads? Againe, sometimes wee see the earth frozen, and the winde doth so binde it as it becommeth as harde as yron: and what letreth that God should not leauie it alwayes in the same pligthe? Lette vs markethen, that God needeth not to make any great preparation to incouter his enemies, and to put them to the soyle: Let him but onely say the woorde, and the whole world shal be on fire, and there is not that creature which shall not serue to destroy men. Sith we heare this, lette vs learne to stoupe vnder the mightie hand of our God, and not make warre with so mighty a Lord: for what shal we gayne by it? Then let vs learne to obey him: for eyther we must be vphild by his hand, or else we must haue it against vs, there is no meane betweene the. True it is that God will beare with vs for a time, according as it is sayd that he wayteth for menne as it were in couert: but yet must we needs be vnder his protection, or else haue him 30 our enemie, and so will it appeere in the end. Therefore lette vs yelde our selues vnto him that he may preserue vs and wee continue vnder his gouernance: and if he be the keeper of our welfare, lette vs assure our selues that we be safe agaynst both hayle and all other stormes and tempestes. And why? For the hayle is not ingendered of it selfe, nother doth the snow fall without his commaundement: they are bothe of them his treasures. VVhen a man listeth, he will lay forth the things which he keepeth locked vp: and even so is it with all creatures, for God 40 sendeth them foorth at his pleasure. Therefore we neede not to feare the hayle nor the stormes, so long as we be in Gods keeping: but contrarywize we must needs be disquieted and vexed continually, if God be against vs. And herewithall let vs marke howe it is sayde, that he referueth them to the day of battell, and to the day of aduersitie. As if he should say, men neede not to vaunt themselues as they be wont to do, when God scourgeth them not: for prosperitie doth so rocke vs asleepe, as we bethink vs not of our faults, nother enter into account with our selues, to know 50 in what case we be to Godward: but as long as wee haue any respit, wee be like euill paymesters and vnthrifits that wast away all. For he passeth not for the owing of a hundred crownes so long as he is not called vpon nor his day of payment come: but he maketh good cheere so long as he hath one pennie in his purse. Euen so play wee with God. If he giue vs any respite, wee do nothing else but ruffle it out, and we thinke nomore vpon him. Therfore according to that which is shewed vs here, if God sende 60 nother hayle nor thunder, nor skare vs one way or other from heauen: wee muste not therupon runne astray, nor fall asleepe. And why? For he can spie fitte time too chastize vs. Then lette vs preuent him, and not tarie till the day of battell come. For when the trumpets sounde alarme and the battell is ioyned, it is to late then to say, let vs fall to compoition, let vs deuize some meanes of agreement: yea, yea, for the tyme is past. VVherefore whyle God forbeareth vs, and giueith vs leyture to bethinke our selues, so as wee haue as it were a tyme of truce to looke about vs, and to enter into iudgement of our selues. Let vs preuent his rigour, and become our owne judges, to the end that we be not iudged of him, and let vs cōdemne our selues, to the intent wee may bee quit by his infinite grace and goodnesse. Thus ye see what we haue to marke vpō thisstreyn where mētion is made of Gods reserueng [of things] to the day of battell: namely that it serueth to shew, that we haue warre with him before it come to the giuing of the onsette: like as when warre is proclaymed betwene two princes that are enemie, there will be many bickerings as they go abrode for booties and forage: but when it cometh once to a pitched field, then is it knowne who hath wōne or lost. Euen so is it with vs when we displease our God, & plucke our selues frō his hand, & become stubborne against him: for then is open warre proclaymed on our side. VVe desie not god with our mouth, nother do we send a herald to him to desie him: but yet forasmuch as our sinnes proceede of a furious rage, it is a proclayming of warre agaynst him. And seing he is our enemie, what tarie we for? neuerthelesse the battell is not giuen at the first day, but God letteith vs alone so as wee stand vp still for a tyme. But let vs looke to come to ioyning of hand strokes at length, howbeit in looking for it let vs not linger for it: that is to say, lette vs bethinke vs of it a long whyle beforehand, but let vs not welter in our sinnes and wicked deedes, least wee kindle the fire of his wrath by casting more wood into it to make it too consume vs. Vpon the knowledghe hereof, let vs take the aduaantage of the tyme, and craue pardon at his hand. Beholde then what wee haue too marke yet further. True it is that God doth oftentimes punish the righteous as well as the vnrighitous both by hayle and tempests, (for afflictions are common to bothe parts, and contrarywise he maketh the Sunne to shyne both vpon good and bad:) Math. 5. g. 45. but yet behoueth it vs too bee always persuaded, (as the Scripture tellet vs) that they be Gods scourges, whereby he intendeth to correct our sinnes in sending vs hayle, tempestes, and such other like things. Yet notwithstanding the righteous haue whereof to reioyce: For they know that Gods chastizing of them is through a fatherly good will, to the ende they should not perish, as S. Paule 1. Cor. 11. g. 32. sayeth: The temporall chastizements ought to put vs in Hebr. 12. b. 5. minde of our sins, according as they be records of Gods displeasure. Neuerthelesse if we walke in his feare & put our trust in him: he will alwayes pitie vs, and handle vs with mercie & not with rigour: and although he correct vs, yet shall it be for our profit & welfare. God the sheweth well by outward signes that he maketh warre agaynst those that serue him and walke in his feare. But yet what soever befall them, all redouēdeth to their welfare, because he abateth his rigour towrdes them, and maketh the temporall chastizements to serue the for medicines & salues, notwithstanding that generally corrections do put vs in minde of our sinnes, and therewithal shew vs that we be at warre with God, and that we deserue to haue him fight agaynst vs, and arme all his creatures too our destruction.

Lo in effect how we ought to practize this text. Now consequently it is sayd, that God will rayne vpon the wildernes where no man dwelleth, and that the earth shall be so moystened as it shall yeld fruite. VVherin this matter is still cōtinued, namely that God worketh after such a sort even in the common order of nature, as wee bee abashed and our wittes bee dazeled at it. No doubr but wee shall see his doings, yea and conceyue some reason of them: but yet when wee haue cast our cardes throughly, wee shall alwayes bee driuen to conclude, that Gods wisedom is hidden from vs, (I meene even in all these manifest things) and that there is a cause aboue vs wherevnto we be not able to reach. Therefore it behoueth vs alwayes to come backe too this poynt, to comprehendethroughly what is conteyned here. VVee see the rayne fall, and wee know in effect that it is engendered of vapours: but when wee see that the rayne causeth the earth to budde, yea & that the very wildernes where dwell no inhabiters were greene also: wee see a thing to wonder iustly at. It will trouble a man iustly to water a garden: and 10 for all his trauell and labour he can bring nothing about, except God giue influence from heauen. All the waternings in the worlde will do no good, vnsesse some rayne or dewe fall from heauen. One of these hath more workfulness in it, than all the waters that can be brought by mannes deuyce. Therefore when wee see the deserto-nes growe greene: therein God intendeth to shewe by assured tokens, the effectualnesse of the rayne which he sendeth.

For in little Gardines men are continually watering of them, and afterward commeth the rayne and the 20 deawe, so as things growe there euuen apparantly to sight.
But looke vpon a waste grounde which is burnt vp too day, and noman watereth it, and the soyle is drie of it selfe: and yet notwithstanding God maketh it to bring forth abundance of hearbes and grasse, by meanes of his rayne.

Sith we see such things: the more familiarly that God sheweth himselfe to vs, the iuster cause haue we to glori-fie him: and if we do it not, wee cannot by any meanes excuse our selues of vnthankfulness. Is it not a great 30 matter that wee see Gods miracles with our eyes, (yea he poynteth vs to them with his finger, and the thing is not seene onely once in a mans life, but it beginneth newe a-gayne day by day): and yet notwithstanding wee thinke not rightly vpon them? VVee tread vpon the grasse with our feete, and yet wee vouchsafe not to caste our eye thither to say, blissed be God that maketh the earth beare frute after this sorte. Furthermore let vs therewithall bethinke vs of our owne rudenesse and dulnesse: I cannot tell how one braunce of on hearbs springeth forth: I see it with mine eye, but the cause of it is so hidden from me as I am at my wittes end. I see that whē a grayne of corne rotteth [in the earth] it springeth againe, and bringeth forth a number of graynes for the nurisiment of men. I see all these things: and are they not all of them miracles of God? and yet for all that, I consider them not as I ought to do. Surely a man would thinke at the first blush, that this lesson were superfluous, and that it were a needelesse thing to treat of the growing of corne and grasse. For doth not every man see it? And are we not wellynough acquaynted with it? Yes truely: but yet for all that, who is he that yeeldeth God his due honour? Do we not deface his glory and maiesticasmuch as we can? Therefore this knowledge which wee weene to haue, shall make vs the more guiltie, because our vnthankfulness bewrayeth it self therein. But howsoever the world go, let vs alwayes beare in minde, that euuen in the basest things, there is an incomprehensible wisdome of God. VVee will perchaunce say, that this is knowne both to great and small: but if we come once to the souerayne cause, it will be found that euuen the wizest of vs are to seeke in that behalf: and the more that they would shew the finenesse of their wit, the more will God be avenged of their prude, according also as it is good reason, that he should make vs perceyue how wonderfull his woorkes are, and that when we haue any knowledge of them, the same is but in parte thereafter as it pleaseith him to deale it vnto vs, and that (as hath bene sayd) he alwayes reserveth stil soime part to himself, in somuch that hee keepeth the causes of things hidden and secrete in his owne minde, whereinto it is not for vs to presume to enter as now. And it is a goodly lesson to know how to put a difference after that maner, betwene the things that God reveleth vnto vs, and the things that he keepeth to himselfe, according also as Moyse speaketh thereof. Our God (sayeth he) keepeth his secrets to himselfe: and the things that are reueled belong to vs and to our children, according as is conteyned in the Law. True it is that there Moyse speaketh of the lawe that was published: as if he had sayd, let vs bethinke our selues, for God hath graunted vs a singular benefite in vouchsafing too shewe vs his will, and in giuing vs peculiare instruction howe to walke in his commaundements. Therefore let vs receyue this record, let vs suffer God to schole vs, and let vs be good scholers to him: and in the meane whyle let vs let him alone with his secretes, that is to say, lette vs holde vs contented with the doctrine that he hath set downe vnto vs, let that bee our meteyard, and lette vs passe no further. VVhy so? For our Lordes secretes (sayeth he) belong to himself, and the things that he reueleth belong vnto vs, and no more. By the way wee may apply this text to that which is sette downe here. VVhy so? For we see what God sheweth vs in the order of nature. Howbeit but in small porcion: for he intendeth to holde vs alwayes shorte, and to shewe vs that wee bee to dull and simplewitted to mount so high as to know Gods secretes. So then let vs learne to take this instructiō which God giueth vs, and to profit our selues by it, and let vs go no further. This is a very necessarie admonition, considering on the one side the rechlesnesse, and on the otherside the fond presumptuousnesse that is in men. For if God hyde his secretes from vs, it should seeme that we would go about to know them whither he will or no. Is it not apparant howe desirous and eager menne are to knowe things that are not reueled vnto them? O (say they) I would fayne know this, and I would fayne knowe that: and therewithall they streyne themselves to enter into discourse. Of what things? Of the things that are concealed from them in the holy Scripture. Lo how menne have alwayes ouerlabored theselues, to knowe the things that God ment not to teache them, because he knoweth that it is not good for them. VVee see then the madde presumptuousnesse that is in men, to be desirous to cocencye in their brayne the things that are not graunted to them, and to enter into Gods secretes whither he will or no. Againe, on the otherside they be as rechlesse to take holde of the things that God teacheth vs. God declareth vs his will, so farforth as is for our behoof, & he chaweth our meatē to vs to the intē we might swallow it downe the easlier, & because he knoweth vs to be but weaklings, he teacheth vs familiarly according to our owne nature.

Verely the holy scripture is as playn a discouerie of things as can be: the good will of God appeereth there outright: and if wee applied our mindes therenvnto, we should find all things there which are requisite for our welfare. For there God applyeth himselfe to our rudenesse, hee talketh familiarly with vs, yea and he lisbeth (after a sorte) as a nurce would do with her little babes. But yet are not wee carefull to profite our selues by folowing him. And therefore seeing wee be so rechlesse and negligent to pro-fite by the holy scripture: & yet in the meane while be so curious & inquisitiue, or rather so foolish & madbraynd, as to couet to know more thā is meete for vs: let vs bear in mind how Moyse telleteth vs that our Lordes secrets belong to himself, & therfore that we must not be inquisitiue of the things which God listed not to disclose vnto vs, but be contented to be taught here by the meane that he hath hath ordeyned, and in the meane whyle let God alone with his secrets without assayng to reach aboue him, and gloriſe him, knowing that we be not yet come to the perfection of beholding him face to face, but that it behoueth vs first to be transformed into his image, which thing 1. Cor. 13. 6. shall not be fully done, till he haue ridde vs cleane of all

 10. d. 12. our fleshly imperfections. So then let vs remember in effect, that when we haue tasted of Gods wiſdom, iuſtice, and goodneſſe in all his creatures: wee muſte conculde that we come not to the highest degree, but fayle thereof in the middes of our way: & thereby let vs take warning, to honour him and to ſubmit our ſelues wholly to him. Now after that mention hath bene made of the earth, of the deepes, of the waters, of the ſnow, of the rayne which moyſteneth, and of ſuch other things: by and by here is ſpeaking of the ſkie and of the ſtarres. Here our Lord ſetteth downe the thing we haue feene before: which is, that in the order of the ſkies a man ſhall perceyue many recordes of his goodneſſe and loue towardes vs, and also many ſignes of his wrath when it pleaſeth him to viſite vs for our linnes, and to make vs feele that he is our iudge. And for that cauſe it is ſayd purpoſely, Come on, warſt thou borne when I created the Planets, and the other ſtarres, and all the ſignes of beauen? Warſt thou there? Or art thou able to bid them go that they may go, or canſt thou reſtreyne the pleasantneſſe of the Pleyades, or canſt thou vntie (or unkitte or loozē) the bandes of Orion? Here are certayne of the celeſtiall ſignes named, wherein the Hebrues themſelues do not agree: but yet notwithstanding, a man may perceyue that the * firſt woord which is ſet downe here, betokeneth certayne ſtarres that appeere in the ſpringtime, and bring a ſweete rayne to open the earth and to make it yelde frute. For that cauſe it is ſayde, Canſt thou bynde vp or reſtreyne the pleasantneſſe of the Pleyades which cauſe the earth to become fresh and geene? Canſt thou reſtreyne God from ſending men the pleasant ſpringtime to glad them withall? Afterwarde hee ſpeaketh of Orion, which is a cleane contrarie ſigne, and bringeth great bluſtering ſtormes and waterſtuddes. Othersome tranſlate it Arcturus, which is termed a keeper of the things that can be ſliet vp or reſtreyned, and of the vapours that are haled vp into the ayre. But it is not needefull too ſtanide much vpon that poynt: it is ynough for vs to know that it is a ſigne which betokeneth great tempeſts and rage of waters. Therfore it is ſayd, Art thou able to vntie his bands? as who would ſay, wee haue no ſway in the ſkie, in ſomuch that wee cannot but be rauished out of our wittes to thinke vpon it.

 Nowe firſt of all let vs marke in this text, that men are warned of the ſhortneſſe of their life: and that ſerueth to reſteſſe them when they would ouerſhoote themſelues to farre. For whom do we thinke our ſelues to be? much ado haue we to be borne, and yet will wee needeſ blame Gods doings, Yea? and ſhall wee teach him his leſſon, as though hee had no ſkill to gouerne the worlde? where were we at the time that all things were created? were we of counſell with God to help him, when things were put in ſo goodly and wonderfull order? There is nothing at all in vs, in ſomuch that wee could hardly get out of our mothers wombe: and yet notwithstanding wee will take vpon vs to be his iudges. It were a fayre ſight that a yong babe which coulde ſcarce ſpeake, ſhould take vpon him to gouerne the whole world, and chalenge all wiſdom and diſcretion to bee in himſelfe alone. And what are wee in comparison of God? Although we were come to foureſcore or a hundred yeeres of age, what is it in reſpect of the euerlaſting time and wiſdom of God, who was before the worlde was created? And againe, what is it in reſpect of the gouernement that hath continued ſo long time. Therefore whenſoeuer wee thinke vpon the ſhortneſſe of our lyfe: let vs be ſure that by that meaſure God rebateth our prude, to the intent wee ſhoulde not be ſo ſelfewyze, as to take vpon vs to diſpute agaynſt him. And this is the firſte and chiefe leſſon that wee haue too leaue in Gods ſchoole. Very well, no doubt but wee ſhall haue whereof to make our boſt, when we ſhal haue profited in that poyn̄t: and therefore ſo long as wee bee conuerſant in this worlde, lette vs be contented to heare God ſpeak, and to beare in minde whatſoever he telleth vs, that wee may profit more and more by it. And moreouer lette vs not go about to aduaunce our ſelues againſt him, for if there were no more but this onely ſaying, that our life is nothing, were it not ynough to holde vs in awe and meeldenſe? Lo what we haue to beare away on the oneſide. But herewithall we haue alſo a good comfort to gather: which is, that for ſomuch as wee ſee that God hath preſerued the world ſo long a time in good ſtate before wee were borne: wee neede not doubt but he will prouide for the time to come. Therefore whenſoeuer we be vexed and troubled with any great thought of minde, and thereby pronoked to this or that: let vs put our ſelues into Gods hande, for he knoweth how to gouerne, he is no yong beginner. So then ſith wee ſee that this order hath continued euer ſince the creation of the worlde, and that (for all the chaunges which haue hap‐pened in the meane whyle) men perceyue that all things haue bene ſo well diſpozed, that the world hath ſtill bene preſerued in his right ſtate: I ſay if wee bethinke vs well thereof, we haue cauſe to gloriſe God, and ſeing that his iuſtice, goodneſſe, wiſdom, and power appeareth therein, let vs bee contented therewith, and affiſe our ſelues that he will as well continue the ſame to the ende as he hath begonne it. Lo what we haue to marke. Againe, whereas mention is made of commaunding the celeſtiall ſignes: lette vs alwayes marke that it is imposſible, that this orderlinneſſe which we ſee, ſhould come eyther of the starres themſelues or of any other mouing, than of the hande of God which gouerneth from aboue. And ſo although the starres haue their ſeasons to mount aboue vs, & likewiſe to go downe againe out of our ſight: yet notwithstanding lette vs affiſe our ſelues, that the ſame happeneth not at all auenture, but that it is God which commaundeth it, and although he haue giuen them their influences from beauen, yet hath he the guyding and ouerruling of them ſtill. And for proofe hereof, the Planets moue all yeeres a lyke: and yet it is appaſſant that there is great oddes in their mouing. VVhat is the cauſe that the earth is fresh in the ſpringtyme? It is bycause the Pleyades reygne then: howbeit, not that God reygneth not ouer them. For although he haue giuen the celeſtiall ſignes their influences: yet do they not any thing of their owne peculiarity motion. For what a thing were that? VVe ſhould ſee the ſpringtyme cotinue in one even and measurable rate: that iſto ſay, that there ſhould never be nother ouermuch heate nor ouermuch cold, that there ſhould never fal one droppe of rayne more in one yeere than in another, nor that there ſhould never bee any other alterations. But ſith there is ſuch diuerſtie, that wee ſee the yeeres farre vnlike one another: thereby wee perceyue that nother rayne nor ſnowe ingender of their owne power: but that God, (although he haue giuen ſome properties to the starres,) reſerueth ſtill the ruling of them to himſelfe, and declareth that it is he which hath the ſouerayne gouernment, and diſpoſeth all things as he knoweth to be expedient. So much the more then behoueth it vs too marke these texts, wherin god telleth vs, that although the starres haue their naturall courses and properties : yet notwithstanding they be not driven by their owne power, neither do they give influence to the world, otherwise than God commaundeth them, so as they obey his soueraygne dominion which he hath ouer all creatures. Therefore let vs not learne too gaze at the starres as though they had power of theriselves to do either good or harme : but let vs pray vnto our good God, that when it pleaseth him to make his creatures serue to our vse, he will also graunt vs the grace so to profite thereby, as he onely may be glorified. Moreouer when wee see thunder, lightning, tempests, and stormes : let vs assure our selues that seing they be at his commaundement and he maketh them to serue at his pleasure : we shall be safe if we be in his protection, which we shall then be, when we haue the [inward] witnessse that he hath receyued vs to mercie, and takeith vs for his children. Furthermore, whensoeuer wee thinke vpon Gods workes, let it be with such sobernesse & modestie, as we may learne, not to be to inquisitiue of Gods maiestie, but to hold our selues contented to bee taught 20

according to our measure and capacitie. And therewithal when he openeth things to vs by the ordinarie meanes of his woord, let vs open our eyes to consider them as wee ought to do, and yelde our eares to him to herken what he telleth vs, so as we may not be rechlesse in that behalfe. But as for the things that are to highe and profound for vs : let vs let them alone, and wayt for the day of full discouerie, wherevnto our good God calleth vs, which shall be at such time as we be transformed into his glory.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs feele them better than we haue done, and generally also to bewray our wants, to the intent to deface vs vterly & to make vs seeke our whole welfare in him : and therewithall to apply vs so to his seruice, that he may be exalted more and more among vs, so as wee on our side may acknowledge him to be our God, and he on his side acknowledge vs for his people. And so let vs all say, Almighty God our heauely father wee acknowledge and confesse according to the truth, &c.

The clj. Sermon, which is the fifth vpon the. xxxvij. Chapter.

And the first vpon the. xxxix. Chapter.

33. Knovvest thou the vway of the heauen ? or canst thou set the rule therof vpon the earth?
34. Caust thou crie out alovvde to the clovdes, that the abundance of vvater may couer thee ?
35. Canst thou send the lightenings ? canst thou make them to vvalke, or vvill they say vnto thee, Lo here vvee bee ?
36. VVho hath put vvisdome into the hart, and giuen it vnderstanding ?
37. VVho is he that by his vvisdome can appoynt the heauen vvhat it shold do, or vwho can stay the barrelles of heauen, 38. VVhen the dust cloddethe and the earth hardeneth ?

1. Wilt thou hunt the pray for the Lyon, or giue the Lyons vvhelp vwherevvith to satisfie him,
2. VVhen they be in their dennes or vvhen they lie lurking in their couertes ?
3. VVho prepareth meate for the Rauens, vvhen the yong ones crie vnto God and vvander vvithout meate ?
4. Knovvest thou the time vvhen the vvilde Goates do yean, or knovvest thou the caluingtime of the Hyndes ?
5. Canst thou tell the time of their goyng vvith calf and vvhen they should calue ?
6. They bovv theniselues, and make their yong ones parte from them, and cast out their ovyne sorovvses.
7. Their yong ones vvex fat and grovve vvith Corne : they go out & returne not to thē againe.

Ere the same matter is pursued still, that hath bene treated of these former dayes : which is, that men comprehend not the whole order of nature, but rather are conuictid of their own vnskilfulness, whereby they ought to take warning to humble theniselues before God, and to admittie all his doings for good and well done. Therefore it is sayd, that men know not the way of heauen : that is to say, that they wote not what order should be kept there, and yet notwithstanding that for asmuch as they see what God hath done, they ought to be amazed at so great wisedome as is shewed there. If we were put to the building of a heauen, at which side woulde wee begin ? Nay, if it were bur the making of the bodie of some one Starre or Planet, could wee bring it to passe ? Nowe, there is a great number of Starres, and therewithal great diuersitie in them, & more-ouer great distinctiō & distance betwixt them : yea & the Planets are placed in such order, as that the Moone is neerest vnto vs, the sunne far aboue that, and other planets yet far aboue the sunne, and againe the starres of the skie hold the highest roome of all. Considering then that there is such varietie in the heauē, which of vs were able to cōpasse it in his vnderstāding, so as he might by parcelmeale set forth all the courses and order of them, in such wise as we see them ? and therfore not without cause doth the scripture say, that the starres are (as yee would say) the Esa. 34. 4. 4 hosts or armies of heauē. For God hath there a furniture which ought to astonish vs all. Sith it is so, let vs learne to honour god : & for asmuch as he sheweth so infinite wisdome in the things that we see in the skies : let vs acknowledge that he hath wought aboue our capacitie, yea even in such wise as it is great wisdome in vs to taſt some parte of the things that are seene with our eyē, that is to say, to know the reason of thē & to referre them to a right end.

Now it followeth not by and by, that because we haue a thing in estimatiō, therfore we be able to do it our selues. If we looke vpon a singular peece of woorke, wee shall be constreyned to commend him that made it (I meane euē among mortall men:) but yet doth it not therefore follow, that wee can do it as well as he: but contrarywise the same welliking of ours is a record that we vnderstand nothing at all of it in comparison. And now let vs come vnto God. Is it ynough for vs to cōmend him as a persone that hath made an excellent peece of woorke? No: but we ought to be rauished at his doings. Seing it is so, let vs come backe to this poynt: namely to submit our selues wholly vnto him, and not to attēpt any thing aboue our abilitie, nor to be hasty in iudging as we haue bene wont to be. It is sayd immediatly, who is he that shall restraine [or stay] the barrelles of heauen? The clowdes are so termed, not only in this text, but also in the Psalme, to make vs vnderstand Gods wonderfull power in holding backe the waters as it were against their nature. For wee know that the water sheadeth and sinketh downeward because it is of a heauie nature. And yet for all that, the waters are hanging in the ayre, and stay there nevertheleſſe. And whereof commeth that staying, but because God holdeth them fast shet vp, as it were in barrelles, tonnes, or tubbes? For the Hebreue woord that is set downe in that place, betokeneth properly a Tubbe or a Waterpotte. Yee see then that the clowdes are as it were Gods ve Telles, (howbeit not made of wood or of earth:) and without any thing to holde them in Gods onely commaunding of the waters to keepe themselues there, suffyzeth to make them stay there. And herewithall it is shewed vs also, that it stādeth vs greatly in hand that God should so shet vp the heauē, that it might not rayne continually. For what a thing were that: The earth shold be alwayes in one Clodde, &c men could not sowe. Likewise on the contrary part, if there should come no Rayne at all, the Earth would be so barde, so as it could yelde no frute, but would become like yron, so as men could get nothing out of it. Now then it is needfull that God should make it to rayne in conuenient seazon, and that hee should also reserve some time for fayre weather. VVe see it, and wee thinke it a thing woorthie of admiration: and must we not then be ouer-froward, if wee glorifie not God by confessing that it belongeth to him to order all things according to his will, and that it belongeth vnto vs to accept all his doings for good and righfull, even with acknowledging the weake-nesse of our owne wittes? For whosoeuer presumeth to murmur agaynst God, maketh him self wyzer than he, euen in despite of him. If wee yelde God his deserued prayse by acknowledging our owne ignorance, wee will take good heede that we iudge not of his workes. And so we see wherevnto all the woordes tende that are alledged here. Also it is sayde here exprefly, that it is not in vs to sende foorth the lightening, or the Planetes, or stormes to haue them in such wize at our commaundement, as they shold say, lo, beere bee bee. VVe may well commaund the Sunne and the Moone: but can wee cause the to make euer the more haste? Can wee eyther hinder or further their course a whit? No. Seing then that wee perceyue that by the one cōmaundement which God gaue at the creating of the world, whē he sayd, I will haue the Sunne to reyng over the day, and the Moone over the night, and that there shall bee a diuersitie of seazons, as Spring-time, Sommer, VVinter, and so forth: I say, Sith we see that by this onely one cōmaundement the heauen maynteyneth his course, and keepeth as perfect order as can be: ought not wee to confesse that it belongeth to God to gouerne all things, and that if wee take not all his doings in good woorth, there is a diuelish prude in vs which shal not scape vnpunished? Therefore lette vs wey well this speech, where it is sayde, that wee cannot sende foorth the Planets, Thunders, and Lightenings. True it is that Iosua did once stay the course of the Sunne by saying, Sunne, Iohn. 10.12. Stande thou still in thy place, and go not foreward. But did he that by his owne power? Nay rather, God shewed in the mouth of a mortall man, howe mighty and effectuall his woord is. Iosuaze woordes were but a sounde that vanished away in the ayre: but for asmuche as hee spake them by the authoritie of God, and attempted not any thing vpon his owne head, the Sunne could not but obey him. Then if the Sunne obeyed a mortall mannes voyce because it was the commaundement of God: is it not a much more mighty thing when God hath in his owne Maiestie, in his glory, and in his everlasting Being, spoken & settled the course of the sunne and the moone and all the order of heauen? Therefore if we marke well these woordes to our owne profite, they wil make vs exalt our God as he is woorthie, and to submitte our selues wholly vnto him, & to holde al our cōcēyts and thoughts captiue, to the ende wee take not vpon vs more than is lawfull for vs. And surely it is to no purpose for vs to start out of our boundes agaynst him: for it is sayd here, that the Planēs and the lightnings will not say here, I am. Ought they to be at our commaundement? VVhen men will needs take more vpon them than is meeke for them, when they will needs worke spite agaynst him, yea and when they leape so farre out of square as to blasphemē him, can they chaunge any thing in the order of nature? Can they make the Sunne, or the ayre, or any part of the worlde to stande in awe of them? Is there any creature that will moue for them? God therefore doth mocke at our folie and pride in speaking after that maner. On the contrarie parte, wee see that the Sunne and the Moone and the Starres do say vnto him, lo here we be. For without speaking they do whatsoeuer God appoyneth them. They haue nother witte nor vnderstanding: and yet for all that, they be led by a secrete inclinatiō to execute Gods will, and whatsoeuer he bade them at the creation of the world. Sith wee see this, ought we not to reverence the Maiestie which evē the ſenflesſe creatures obey? Yc see then what wee haue to gather vpon this saying. Nowe it foloweth consequently, that it is not in vs to bunt the pray for the Lyons, and to feede the Lyons whelpes their fill: nor to ḡ.ue the Rauens wheron to feede and to nurrishe their yong ones when they criē vnto God. VVee know what manner of feeding the Lyons and other wilde beasts craue. It is not a two or three morselles that will satisfie them, but they require much sustenance bycause they bee beasts that deuour and swallowe vp much. Nowe who is hee that can finde them prouision? True it is that a Prince may well keepe some Lyons for his pleasure, or some other wilde beasts: but what Prince is able to finde foode and sustenance to all the Lyons in the world? nowe were there nothing else but this, that all the wilde beasts (as wee see) haue wherewithal to susteyne them, and specially of Gods prouision: is it not a ſufficient miracle to stirre vs vp to acknowledge the goodnesse of God? But wee shall ſee Gods meeting in this text yet better if wee haue an eye to our selues. VVhat letteth the Lyons & other wilde beasts to deuour all the men in the world? How happeneth it that wee be not a pray to them? If God ſhould let looce the Lyōs, Beares, Elephants, & al other wilde beasts which are many number and of diuers kindes: I pray you ſhould we not be destroyed out of had? what is the caufe then that the Lyōs are ſatisfied (notwithſtāding that they haue neede of great nourriſhment.) and that therewithall

Psal. 104. c. 22. the world is preserued and continued in his state, but for that God prouideth a remedie for the matter? According also as it is sayd that the light of the Sunne dtrueth away the wilde beastes, and maketh them to get them to their dennes, that men may haue libertie to go about their busynesse. For if God should not shet vp the wilde beastes after that maner, and giue men the earth to traffike and labour vpon, what a thing were it? Should wee haue any one corner to hide our heads in? Yee see then that the thing which is ment in this text, is that if God gaue not the Lyons their foode, all men should be quyte and cleare ridde of from the earth, and all should go to hauocke and destruction, and that Gods working after that maner compelleth vs to commend his gracious goodnesse, in that he pitieith vs, and holdeth vs vnder his protection so as wee perish not, as we must needes haue done if he had not a fatherly care to preserue vs. True it is that sometimes Lyons may well deuour men, and that happeneth chiefly in the deserte Countries and in the whole landes where there is greater store of wilde beastes. And when it commeth so to passe, God warneth vs thereby, that the same mischief should be vniuersall, if he prouided not otherwise for it. For when we see that wilde beastes deuour men after that sorte, therein wee haue fayre lookingglasses. VVhereof is it long that they followe not on forward, and that they raunge not out vnto mens houses, and consume not all? Muste not the setting of that stop in their way needes be of Gods hand? It is not mans pollicie that preuenteth it. So then, let vs magnifie our God for vouchsafing to feede the wilde beastes in such wize, as we liue in the worlde and inioy the benefites that he hath bestowed vpon vs: and furthermore vpon the reading of this text, let vs remember also how it is sayd in the foure and thirtith Psalme, that although the Lyons be so strong and seeke theyr pray with such violence, yet they suffer hunger: and although it passe mannes power to satisfie them and that they suffer hunger: yet will God alwayes nurishe those that are his. And this comparison is well worthie to be marked. For if God feede the Lyons which are wilde and terrible beastes, yea and irksome to our nature: how shall he not feede men which are created after his owne image, and whom he termeth his children? Specielly, ought they to doubt that he will nurishe them, whē they call vpon him as their father in true fayth, and when his holy spirite reigneth in their harts? Thinke wee then that God will forsake vs if wee flee vnto him for refuge, seeing he feedeth the wilde beastes, and giveth foode to the Rauens, as shall be sayd anon?

So then we see that this serueth vs to double vse. The one is, that wee muste holde of Gods wonderfull goodnesse in that he prouideth foode for the Lions and all other beastes, so as we be preserued in the middes of them: and the other is, that if God feede the Lions and wilde beastes: it is much more lykely that he will bee carefull to feede vs, because we be his children: and that seeing he comandeth vs to come vnto him, and to seeke him, he will deale vs our ordinarie bread, & feede vs because we haue not any thing but that which he giueth vs. This in effect is the thing that wee haue to marke vpon this text. Now it is sayd immediatly after of the Rauens, That God feedeth them, both them and their yong ones, when they crie vnto him. True it is that the little birdes haue not vnderstanding to crie vnto God, neither haue they speache to speake with, and much less are they led in that case by true faith: but yet notwithstanding for asmuch as they lacke foode, and haue no means to susteyne theselues in this world: therefore it is sayd that they crie vnto God, according as it is sayd in the Psalme, where the selfe same maner of speach is v-

sed. And this saying ought to bee weyed well, for it is a great confirmation of the things that haue bene sayd: that is to wit, that if God feede the wilde beastes which howle and crie and bray without knowing that there is a maker which should nurishe them: what ought they to do which are sure that God who hath set them in the world, reserueth to himselfe the office of maynteyning them, & of giuing them whatsoeuer they haue neede of? Thinke wee that he will fayle them? Againe, lette vs first of all marke what is ment by this woord Crie. The Rauens birdes do crie vnto God. VVhy so? Not for that they crie in fayth or vnderstanding, not for that they pray as men are taught to do: but for that they crie for want of means [to helpe theselues.] Behold then, the Rauens birds are a hungred, their darmes flye abrode to seeke their pray, and somtimes they finde none. In the meane whyle their yong ones are halfe starued, and no bodie prouideth for them. Now is God fayne to put to his helping hand, whither it bee by giuing them wormes to iobbe at, or by some other secret meanes. Thus ye see how the yong Rauens do crie vnto God. The like may be sayd of all other beastes: namely that when they be helplesse, they resorte vnto God: not that they do it of any vnderstanding, but the case is such as they may well wander in the world & be still destitute of al succour, so as there is no shift but that God much reach out his hande, and of his goodnesse giue them the thing they haue neede of. But now let vs return to the foresayd comparison betweene our selues and the brute beastes. For seeing it is sayd that God sheweth himselfe [bountifull] when the beasts are destitute of naturall meanes to helpe theselues, and that it is all one as if they repayred vnto him: what ought we to do? for although we haue abundance euuen till we be readie to perbrake our goods vp agai...: yet muste we alwayes vnderstand that the things which wee haue are giuen vs of Gods owne hand: and if we happen to suffer penurie and want, we be so much the more prouoked to repaire vnto him. Therfore men must not shrink backe, nor chafe vpō the bridle when they find theselues destitute of help. VVhat must they do then? Let them thinke thus with theselues: behold God calleth vs to him. And in good sorh he declareth and protesteth that his mind is (after a sort) to prouoke the beastes to repayre vnto him, and therein also to shew himselfe to be the [souerayne] gouerner: for otherwize he should leaue nothing in the world, but all should lie wast: howe much more then ought I to repayre vnto him? Now then let vs marke well, that whensoever we want prouision, so as we wote not where to become or which way to turne vs: it is asmuch as if God tolde vs that it is his charge to giue vs whatsoeuer is meeke for vs, & that by the same means he will haue our whole trust settled in him. And when wee haue such beleef and inward feeling: prayer & supplication must be matched with it out of hand. For whosoeuer braggeth that he wayteth for his sustenance and foode at Gods hand, and yet in the meane while vouchsafeth not to call vpon him for it, doth he not shew that there is nothing els but hypocrisie & leasing in him? Therfore faith must stirre vs vp & drie vs to cal vpō God, to the end we may confess him to be our fosterfather, and receyue our foode as it were at his hand, and vpon the receypte thereof acknowleage our selues to be nurisched by his mere goodnesse. Thus yee see after what maner we ought to put this text in vre. Furthermore it behoueth vs to come yet to a hygher comparison: which is, that sith we understand that God feedeth our bodies after that sorte, it is much more reason that wee should also seeke the nourishment of our soules at his hande. Although wee had meate and drinke in this worlde, and wee needed no more but too bowe bow down our heads to be filled with it: yet is the foode of our soules to precious a thing to bee found here by lowe. Neuerthelesse, euен the corruptible foode is giuen vs by Gods hand, and he sheweth exprefly that it is hee onely to whom it belongeth to feede our bodies in this present trāistoric life. So then it behoueth men to repayre vnto him, cheefly when they will be fed spiritually. And if we haue not this consideration & skill with vs: the yong Rauens, the fowles of the ayre, and all the beasts of the world must be witnesſes and iudges to condemne vs: for God sheweth vs as it were to eyesight, that he calleth the to him when they be succorleſſe. And if he call the brute beaſtes to him, so as hee do his office in their behalfe: ought not wee to haue a right minde and true beleefe towardes him, so as wee may be throughly perſwaded that wee ſhall not bee diſappoyned in demaunding of him whatſoeuer wee haue neede of? This is in effect all that we haue to remember in this text. Now it is ſayd afterwarde, knowest thou the time when the Wyld Goates or the females of them doo kidde? knowest thou the tyme of the Hyndes, or how they boore themſelues at their Caluingtyme? Truly the example of all mankinde which wee haue in our ſelues, ought to be ynoough to reproue mennes follie in being ſo ſelfwize as to take vpon them to reaſon with God. For if a man ſhoule aſke them, howe wart thou created or begotten? Howe wart thou caried and nurriſhed by the ſpace of nine monethes after thou wart begotten and haddeſt taken ſhape in thy mothers womb? Howe cameſt thou out agayne in the ende? Couleſt thou anſwere direcely to all theſe things? They would ſtande a- bashed.

So then, man (without ſtepping a whit from himſelfe) ſhall finde it more than ſufficiently proued, that God worketh wonderouſly in his begetting. VVhat a thing is it, that a little creature ſhould bee ingendred, yea euен of corruption and filthe, and yet notwithstanding receyue ſuch ſhape as wee ſee paſtored in our bodies? Agayne, what a thing is it that the childe ſhould bee nurriſhed in vncleannessē and infection in his mothers wombe euен among all the excrements: and yet notwithstanding receyue ſuſtenance and growe ſo big as to finde meanes to come into the world? what maner of things are all theſe? Are they not ſuch excellent miracles of God as we ought to bee rauished at them? And therefore (as I haue ſayde already) we needed not to be ſent to the wilde beaſtes, nor to the Hyndes, nor to the Sheegoates, it had bene ynoough if euery of vs had conſidered after what maner he was borne and nurriſhed in his mothers wombe, and how he came out from his mother into the worlde. Neuerthelesſe it is not without cause that God ſendeth vs too the wilde beaſtes. And why? For women haue yet ſome helpe when they come to their deliueraunce: they haue other women to do them ſeruice, and one of them can ſuccour another. Agayne they be taught by cuſtome and experience, and they keepe themſelues from daungers: they conſider what is expedient for them, and prepare & furnish themſelues aforhand. Ye ſee then that the ſame ought to be eſteemed a greter miracle in the brute beaſtes than in women. For when the poore beaſtes are great with yong, they know not what they beare, onely they feele a cuberſome burthen, they may be greeued, they may rush their bellies agaynst ſomething to make their yong ones ſlinke, and the ſtruggling of their yong ones within them may after a maner caſt them in despayre. Howbeit God preſerueth them in ſuch wize as they keepe their frute: and althoſh the ſame be heauie and troublousome to the, yet is it preſerued as it were by miracle. For it is ſeen that the redde Deere, (I meene the Hyndes,) cannot indure their owne fatneſſe: in ſomuch þat if they growe too fatte, they fal to fasting, and it is a proprieſe of theirs that they cannot beare with any thing that hindereth them: and yet notwithstanding they carie their yong Calues ſtill, yea euен with great payne: and ſpecially it is reported of them, that they haue exceeding great payne and greefe in caluing: according also as mention is made thereoſ in this text, where it is ſayd that they boore themſelues as though they ſhoule clive aſunder, and ſtrayne themſelues exceeding ſore. True it is that women alſo are fayne to ſtreyne themſelues: but the ſtreyning of the Hyndes is greater: in ſomuch þat they which haue had ſkill of the ſecretes of nature, ſay they are fayne to uſe a medicine, which is the taking of a certayne hearb to help themſelues withall, and that otherwise they ſhould ſtand at a ſtay, if they tooke not ſomewhat to haſte their deliueraunce. VVee ſee then here how it is: not for nougħt, that God ſendeth menne to the Hyndes and Sheegoates (for the kinde is not al togither certayne, but that is no matter of importance.) And why? For it is a ſtrauge caſe that the beaſtes which know not what they beare, ſhould notwithstanding haue the wit to beare out the burthen and to fence themſelues againſt it, as though God had taught them, or that it were ſayd vnto them, it behoueth you to preſerue your owne kinde and offspring. Seing then that the beaſtes haue ſuſh an inclination, is it not God that worketh it from aboue? For what would become of them if he gouerned them not? Againe, when the beaſtes come to bee deliuered, their brutiſhneſſe is ſuche, as it is no telling of them that they muſt keepe themſelues quiet, and that they muſt haue yong ones, and that they ſhall bee gladde of it, as it is ſayde vnto women that they ſhall Iobn.6.c.21. haue wherof to reioyce when they ſee a manchilde borne into the worlde. None of theſe things can bee ſayde to the beaſtes, for they knoƿe not what ſhall paſſe out of their bodies, nother can they tell whither the thing which they carie ſhall buſt their bellies and make their bowells fal out. And yet notwithstanding they keepe it ſtill, & afterward when they come to the bringing forth their yong, they know how to remedy their needes, without any ſucour. They make their yong ones cleane, and for all the peyne that they haue had, yet do they go abroade after them, ſo that they miſcarie not through their default. Seing then that wee perceyue all this: haue wee not cauſe to magnifie our God? And ſpecially when wee conſider the diuersitie of beaſtes, and yet ſee that they multiply after that maner; I pray you is it not proued to our faces, that God ſtretcheth out his arme and worketh by way of miracle? Neede we to go to ſchoole to vnderſtād it? Neede we to be of high capacitié, or to haue the matter debated with great and profound reaſons? There is not ſo ſlenderwitted and ignorant a person, but he knoweth as well the begetting of menne, as the ingendering of cattell and beaſtes to be a miracle of God, and that Gods hand muſt neeſes be perceyued there, according also as it beareth the whole ſway. And in knowing this, ought we not also to wonder at the goodneſſe of our God, which extendeth it ſelfe euен to the brute beaſtes? VVhen wee ſee him pitifull in that behalfe: ought wee not to glorifie him for the ſame? Ought wee not at leaſtwyzē too yeeld him the ſacrifyze of prayſe, when we ſee his power and wiſedome? Lo howe the ignorant are conuicted of vnrhankeſuſneſſe, if they ſet not their minde to the conſidering of Gods wiſdomē, power, iuſtice, and goodneſſe, which ſhewe aſviter themſelues euery where, yea euen toward the brute beaſtes. Now although mention be made here precisely of the Hinds and of the ſhee rockgoates or other wilde Goates: yet haue wee a generall lesson Aaa.iii. to ga-

to gather of all beasts : namely that God muste needs stretch out his hand in guyding the sayde order when he intendeth to multiply living creatures, and that by his guyding thereof they haue offspring and increase, and that without the same guyding, all things would come to horrible confuzion. And specially sith we know the sayd secretes, how there are peculiar difficulties in Hyndes ouer that there are in other beasts, as I sayd afore, and that therefore God giueth them the skill too seeke out the sayd hearbe : Let vs profite our selues by that knowledge. And who hath bene the Phisitiof of the Hyndes ? In what schoole haue they learned the skill to seeke outan hearb, and to know that it is expedient for their deliuerie, & for the voyding of their yōg ones out of their bodies? VVho hath shewed it them? VVho hath bene their teacher? Ought not God to be knowne and glorified in this cace? So then we ought to marke well these particular kindes that are set downe here before our eyes, wherein Gods glory sheweth it selfe lively. But yet must we also gather this foresayd generall lesson, that God worketh throughout, as shall be sayd hereafter of the Egges which fowles do lay, and whereoutof their yong birdes do come : for euen there also must Gods prouidece be acknowledged. Howbeit when we haue so applyed our whole indeuer to consider Gods doings in the wilde beasts, it behoueth vs also to come backe to our selues. For the cheefe poynit is that me should know Gods goodnesse, power, wisdome, and iustice according as they be shewed vnto them, and as they perceyue them and are partakers of them. Therfore whereas it is sayde here, that the caluingtyme of the Hyndes is not knowne vnto men : that is to say, that it is not in men to appoynt it : let vs vnderstand that we must not trie maystries with God, in going aboue to wreste our selues out of his subiection. And why? For before wee were borne, God hath shewed that our life is not in our owne hand, but at his order and disposition. It is well y-nough knowne how long time Hyndes do go with calfe, and men may iudge it by certayne coniecture. Nor that men do looke so narrowly to it : but if men marke from the time that the males and females go to rutte, he shall finde that they go full eight moneths. Very well, their caluinctime then may wel be knowne. But here it is sayd, knowest thou the Caluinctyme of the Hyndes? Yea : for that is not to the purpose that God speaketh : but yet hath he so ordered it. It is not for vs to know how long the Hynds should go with calfe : that is to say, it is not we that haue appoynted them eyther their monethes or their dayes. VVe be skilfull folke. Nowe then, seeing that God will haue the Hyndes to go with calfe full such a time, & that when the terme is expired, he deliuere them, giuing the helpe and guyding the matter as he himselfe hath ordeyned : It behoueth vs to conclude therepon, that he hath reserued the Lordship of all beasts to himselfe, and that in asmuch as he fedde them in their dammes bellies, he holdeth them in subiection after they be come foorth, so as he guydeth the at his owne pleasure. And when we haue so thought vpon the beasts, lette vs come to our selues. I would fayne start out to play the subtleheaded fellow in replying against God, saying : why doth God deale thus or thus with mee? VVhy doth he not sende mee mine owne desires? But when we enter into such murmurings to lift vp our selues after that fashion against God : let vs come backe to our birth and say, Alashowe cameſt thou out of thy mothers wombe? who tooke thee out of it? True it is that there were helpeſ: but yet must we come to that which is sayde in the two and twentith Psalme, that it was Gods had which tooke vs out of our mothers wombe. All the women in the worldc may beate their braynes about it, but they can do nothing in that cace, except God worke with them, even by a wonderful power. Therfore if we do no more but thinke vpon our birth, we must needes stoupe to say, Lorde, before I came into the world thou diddest well shewe that I was in thy guiding. For in what cace was I when thou tookest mee out of my mothers womb, yea and of all the whyle that thou diddest maynteyne mee there? VVere it not a passing straunge thing, if the shetting vp of children there, were not an ordinarie matter among vs? VVee liue by the ayre : and whensoeuer we cannot take breth, by and by we be choaked out of hand : the life of man consisteth in his breath : do but stop our breath, and we be dispatched immediatly. True it is that the little babes haue some vent to take breath ar in their mothers wombe : but whereby? even by the nauill. And in the meane while, wherewith is the childe susteyned? with all maner of corruption : he lieth there among all maner of excrements, and all kinde of wretchednesse : in somuch that if it be considered how he is borne there by the space of eyght moneths, and howe he is maynteyned : a man may see Gods mightie hande, yea and that so passingly, as wee must needes be amazed to thinke vpon it, and acknowledge that it is God which gouerneth all things and which hath the ordering of vs all. And if wee bee not moued with such and so mightie workes of God, and stand astonished at them : I pray you must wee not needes be worse than hardharted? And if wee will not be touched by our owne record, the brute beasts must condemne vs, and beare witnesse agaynst vs at the last day. So then let vs learne to profit our selues by this doctrine, specially to confess that God is wonderful in all his woorkes, and that the order of nature is such a rootingglasse, as wee must needes be rauished to wonder at the knowledge of the things that are seenē there. Howbeit let vs alwayes knit it vp with the bridling of our selues, knowing for a certentie that wee be not of power, wit, and capacitie to judge of Gods doings, and therefore that wee must not fall to controlling of him, to aske why this or that is done. No: but let vs vnderstand, that when soeuer we go about to find fault in his doings, we shall be confounded, yea and bee driuen to perceyue our owne ignorance and weakenesse, euen to our vndoing if wee presume to auance our selues beyond our bounds. Then sith it is so, let vs learne to be contented with that which it pleaseth God to reueale vnto vs, and let vs restrayne our selues from this diuelish ouerweening which we see to be in ſome men : ſpecially when the cace concerneth matters that paſſe our capacitie : like as when it is sayde that God doth ſo dispoze all things, as it is not for vs to finde fault in any of his doings, notwithstanding that all bee guyded and performed by his prouidence. Herevpoſome do reply : as for mee, I canot beleue it : for I vnderſtand it not : and therefore I conclude that it is naught. How now thou vnhappie wight? wilt thou ſhet vp God in ſo small a roome as thy foolish brayne is? It is all one as if thou ſhouldſt ſay, I beleue not that there is a God, except I may ſee him before mine eyes and as it were betweene my legges. And what a dealing were that? But we must not do ſo. VVe muſt not presume to draw downe Gods maiestie vnto vs : but it behoueth vs to mount vp alofte and to ſend vp our wittes thither, to honour the incompreheſible greatnessſe that is in him. Yea and wee muſt mount vp thither with humilitie, without presuming any thing of our selues, but rather acknowledging that we do nothing but creepe here bylow. Thus ye ſee how it behoueth vs to put this doctrine in vre, according alſo as it is ſet before vs to the ſame end.

Now let vs fal down before the face of our good God

with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to open our eyes, that wee may learne to perceyue howe wee ought to be so beaten down in our wants and wretchednesse, as wee may be cleerely bereft of all pride, so as wee attempt not to vaunt our selues, nor too chalendge any thing at all vnto vs, but that we acknowledging that there is no goodnesse in vs, and that we be altogether vnprofitable, may resorte to our good God to receyue power and strength at his hande to follow his will, to the end that in walking according to the same, wee may be brought to yeeld him prayse and thankesgiuing. And for the doing thereof, it may please him to tame the pride that is in vs, and which hindereth vs to prayse him as he deserveth, to the end that being all of vs made cleane, we may returnde vnto him with one comō accord, framing our selues peascably vnto his woord. That it may please him to &c.

The. clij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the. xxxix. Chapter.

8. VVho hath set the vvild Assē at libertie, or vwho hath loozed the bondes of the vvild Assē?
9. It is I vwhich haue set his house in the vvildernessee, and his dvelling in the saltplaces.
10. He laugheth the multitude of the Citie to skorne, he heareth not thecri of the Extercioner.
11. Heseeketh out the mountaynes for his pasture, and searcheth after euery greene thing?
12. VVill the Vnicorne serue thee? or vwill he tarie at thy crib?
13. Canst thou tie the sayd Vnicorne vwith his line, (to labour) in the furrovves? or vwill he breake the cloddes of earth in the vallies after thee?
14. VVilt thou trust him because his strength is great, and yeeld vp thy labour vnto him?
15. VVilt thou beleue that he vvill bring home thy corne, and gather it together into thy barne?
16. Hast thou giuen the Peacocks their goodly vvinges, or feathers to the Stork and the Estrich, 17. VVhich leaueth hir egges on the earth, and maketh them vvhott in the dust:
18. And forgettest that the foote may treda vpon them, or that the beast of the fielde may breake them?
19. Shee shewveth hir selfe cruell tovards hir yong ones, as though they vvere not hirs, or as though hir labouring vvere in vayne, vwithout any feare.
20. For God hath depriued hir of vvisedome, and not giuen hir vnderstanding.
21. VVhen time is, shee mounteth on high, and skorneth the horse and his rider.

F wee had no more but some one only kinde of thing to looke vpon in the whole world: yet ought the same to suffyze to make vs to give glorie vnto God. For there is not any thing wherein he sheweth not himselfe such a one towards vs, as wee be compelled to honour him. But God perceyuing men to be still to negligent and slowe in knowing him, purposed too stirre them vp with such varietie, as they should no more excuse themselues of their not knowing him, after they had seene the infinite number of things that offer theselues to our sight both aboue and beneath. I say that if a man did but only thinke vpon himself without passing any further, he should well haue wherfore to magnifie God: or else if hee looked but vpon any one kinde of creature, wee may say the like. But if wee make our circuites and discourses, & after we haue seene Gods glory in one part of the world, wee turne our eyelight to another, and make as it were a numbering or perusing of his creatures: it is certayne that wee must needes be then moued, to confesse that there is such a perfection in his workes, as we be not able to magnifie him sufficiently. Lo why God doth here set vs downe many sundrie sortes of them. Not that here is a perfect storie and full reckening vp of the properties of living things: but yet notwithstanding, in the examples that are set downe here, we haue so much as ought to suffyze vs: like as now when mention is made of wilde and vntamed Asses, God sayeth it is not for vs to give them libertie. It is all one as if he sayd, that when we behold the wild Asses, we must thinke that if all the whole world were gathered togither, they could not giue the wilde Asses such a nature as they haue. Therfore lette vs confess that God hath disposed all things aboue our abilitie and power, and that our finding of fault with them commeth of to foolish rashnesse: and that there is no more for vs too do but to lift vp our eyes to honour him which sheweth vs so infinite a power & mightinesse. After mention made of wilde Asses, hee speaketh of Vnicornes, or some other such kinde of beast: howbeit men commonly agree that it is the Vnicorne which is spoken of here. It is sayd, that the Vunicornes will not be in subiection to vs, and that wee cannot occupie them as we do Oxen and Horses & Asses: nor by any meanes tame them, that they might till the ground, or drawe home our corne into the barne, or vnto the threshingfloore. Sith it is so, let vs vnderstand that it is not for vs to ouerrule Gods workes: wee may well streyne our selues to it, but we shall never bring it to passe. For if wee cannot tame a wilde Ass or some other wood beast: how shall we rule the whole worlde? And if we cannot do that: how dare wee lift vp our neb against our maker, who hath ordered all things with such wise-dome, as no fault can be foud with him? Finally he speakeketh of Peacocks and Estridges or els (as some haue vnderstood it) of Storkes. Howbeit although the Storkes are spoken of in the second place: yet notwithstanding, the things that are added in the ende, cannot agree but to the Estridges, that is to wit, that they despise the borse and the borseman by reason of their swiftnesse: and agayne that they forget their egges, and are so foolish that they lay them in the Sande and thinke no more of them. There is then a great fondnesse in that foule, which agreeth to the Estridges rather than to the Storkes. So then the effect is, that if one mirour of Gods glory be not able to cōtent men: at leastwise the great varietie that sheweth it selfe euerywhere ought to stirre vs vp and moue vs to seeke God, and to submit our selues to him when wee haue founde him, yea euen with such obediēce, that although we perceyue not the reason of his works: yet we may not ceasse to hold our selues as prisoners, so as we grudge not against him in any wyze. Now let vs come to every part. VVhere the wilde Asses are spoken of: it is sayde that God vntietb item and set:eth them at libertie, and that they go to seeke fesding in the mountaynes, and that they dwell in wildernesses and salt places : and that therewithall they shewe such as are in Cities and are subiect to tallages, imposts, and such other charges. The wilde Asses knowe not what any of these things meane : for they haue a free state. Now when God speaketh after that maner, it is to rebuke men for setting by themselves, and for forgetting their owne state. For most men are vnderlings, and yet we see how they brag themselves, so as it seemeth to them that the earth is not woorthie to beare them. And whereof commeth such ou-uerweening ? For if they compare themselves with the wilde Asses, they shall find that the Asses haue a more desirable thing than they haue, that is to wit, libertie or freedom. Euery man cōfesseth freedome to be the chief be-neſite that we can enjoy. But so it is, that we be in bondage, and the wilde Asses are free. And yet notwithstanding we fal to boating, and beare our ſelues in hand that there is ſuch an excellent woorthinesſe in vs, as we ought to be caried aboue the clowdes, and God ought to reach out his hand to ſet vs vpon his ſhoulders. Thus ſee wee the folie of men in that behalfe. And therefore lete vs marke well that God ment here to humble vs, and to correct the pryme that is in vs, because we cannot refrayne fro eſteeming our ſelues beyond measure. And why is that ?

Because wee think not vpon him, nor vpon his workes.
Howbeit we neede not mount ſo high as vnto his maiſtie to humble vs : the very beaſts can teach vs and be our ſchoolemaſters : for we be not woorthie to haue other teachers than them. Neuertheleſſe it might be demauded whither the wilde Asses are to be preferred before me for that they rome abroade everywhere, and are not hilde in awe or ſubiection, nor can be tamed by man. The aſwer is, that if men had continued in their vncorrupti-on, they ſhould haue bene ſubiect to reaſon, not as in the way of bondage, but every man ſhould haue had ſuch rule of himſelf, as God ſhould haue reigned everywhere: there ſhould haue needed no lawes, no iuſtices, nor no ſwoorde to haue executed menne for doing euill : there ſhould haue needed none of all thoſe things. For every man ſhould haue bene as a lawe and rule to himſelfe : he ſhould haue had Gods lawe printed in his hart. And ſuch a willing ſubiection ſhould haue bene more noble and excellent, than all the dominions in the world. But for as-much as wee be corrupted, it behoueth vs to be hilde in thraldome : for therein God ſheweth vs that wee be not able to rule our ſelues, ſith he will haue vs to be brought vnder awe of others. And not onely by lawes and ciuill order are men hild vnder the yoke : but also God ſuffereth hard and combersome charges to be laid vpō them, 50 according as we ſee diuerſe times that when tyrants beare ſway in the world, they be ſo farre of from being fathers to their ſubiects : that they vexe them, pill them, poll them, and bite them as much as they can. In this behalfe then our ſtate ſerueth as it were too shame vs : and God teacheth & telleth vs that the beaſts in ſome reſpect haue a better time than we. Yet notwithstanding it is not to be ſayd, that God hath in all reſpects ſo viterly reiected me, that the beaſts are in better eace than they. For wee ſee that when he compareth his people of Iſraell to a wilde Aſſe by his Prophete Oſee : it is to ſhewe that there was nother reaſon nor manhood in them. Thou wilt be alone by thy ſelfe (ſayeth he:) that is to ſay, I cannot tame thee.
For our Lord intendeth to hold vs in his flocke, and when we haue his woord, his meening is to play the teacher among vs. Now if we canhot abide to be gouerned by his hand : it is againſt kinde, and we ſhew our ſelues to haue an vnamendable nature. Moreouer it is certayne that in this ſubiection which God hath layd vpon men, we ſee ſtill ſome print of his goodneſſe, ſo as it is much more for mennes behoof to be ſubiect, (yea though they be handed amife and rigorously) than for the wilde Asses to bee ſo vntamed, and to stray abroade in the mountaynes. For in the meane while men are warned of their ſinnes when God chauſizeth them roughly and with mayne blowes :

and his ſo doing is to draw them backe to repentance. And againe, whatſoever come of it, he ſheweth them that there is a diſference betweene good and euill : whereaſ the Asses are let alone ſtill in their brutiſhneſſe. Then let vs leare, that whatſoever ſubiection God hath layd vpō men, yet hath he not ceaſed to vſe continuall goodneſſe and fauour towards them. Howbeit, the warning that is giuen in this text, tendeth to this poyn̄t, that if men will needes be proude and make too great account of their owne worthinesſe and nobilitie : they deserue well to be ſent to the wilde Asses, and that God ſhould mocke the ſaying : Go to, what are you ye wretched ſoules ? For it ſeemeth to you that I ought not to reygne any more ouer you, but that you ought to be fellowlike with me. But yet for all that, you ſhall be ſubiect to many charges, ye ſhall not be able to liue togither without many troubls, com-playntes, and oucries, and every man ſhall ſtand in doubt of other : according as wee ſee that men cannot liue one with another, but there ſhal be miſtrut and hartburning, and one ſhall do another wrong by guyle, ſtill practizing one thing or other, and indeuing to ouercome their en-emisies by treacherie and maliciouſneſſe, ſo as they be full of poyon, and grinde their teeth when they ſee they cannot redrefſe their own harmes. Lo what the ſtate of men is : and in the meane while the wilde Asses ſpoil themſelues in the mountaynes, ſeeking for paſture and ſcorning all the policies wherewith men tyre themſelues ſo much. Then ſeing it is ſo, let vs leare to ſet leſſe by our ſelues : for the wilde Asses that wander in the mountaynes muſt teache you your leſſon, and make you to perceyue that ye are not ſuch as you weene your ſelues, that you ſhould make ſuich vaunting. Now we ſee after what maner it behoueth vs to apply this text to our inſtructiō.
On the one ſide let vs vnderſtand, that God intendeth to humble vs by the example of the beaſts, too the ende to ſubdue all pryme in vs : and on the other ſide lete vs conſider, that althoſh our ſtate bee in ſome reſpect woరſe than the ſtate of the brute beaſts : yet notwithstanding God neuer ceaſeth to holde on with his gracious goodneſſe towards vs, & to turne the euill into good.
In ſomuch that whereas wee haue not a free and vnbri-ſled life in this worlde, by that meanes wee bee taught to come ſo vnto him, as the ſubiection of men becometh better than the libertie of the beaſts, and our being in bondage is more for our behoofe, than it is for the beaſtes to ſtray abroade without maſter or refreynt, or without knowing of any lawe or aught elſe. Thus ye ſee how on the one ſide we haue to conſider of Gods grace : and on the other ſide, to ſtoupe, that wee exalt not our ſelues in our own worthinesſe : but vnderſtand that our Lord ſub-dueth vs to himſelf. Now after that mention hath bene made in that ſort of the wilde Asses : by and by there is 60 ſpeaking of the Vnicornes, which is a matter like vnto the other. God ſayeth that the Vnorne cannot be tamed : that we cannot vſe him to our coimmotiſe : that althoſh he be ſtrong and light, yet will he not till the earth at our plea-ſure, nor drawe the plough, nother will he draw the cart to bring home corne into the barne : to bee ſhort, hee is not to ſerue mans turne, but altogether for himſelfe. Here wee haue to note, firſt of all, that whiſreas the beaſts do vs ſer-vice, it is becauſe God tameth them, and putteth them into our

to our hands, to the end we should injoy them. And for proose thereof, why doth a horse suffer himselfe to bee ruled by a man, and draw the plough or the harrowes, and carie a rider or other burthen on his backe? How happeneth it that men do breake Mules, Asses, and Oxen? For a horse is strong ynough to withstand a man, and wee see he is a stoute and coragious beast. Howe then doth man get the maystrie of him? And surely if a man were not acquaynted with the taming of Oxen, their hornes were a terrible thing to looke vpon: the very shaking of their head were ynough to abashe a man: their great eyes and thicke neckes [would agast him]: and if they should bend their hornes at him, they were ynough to runne him through if he came neere the. Againe we see what huge bodies they haue. And how could men haue any vse of them, if it pleased not God to giue vs the maystrie of them? For as well might the Vnicornes be tamed as horses and oxen, if God had not giuen them that [diuerse] nature. So then let vs behold Gods goodnesse in applying those beasts to our seruice, which otherwise were abie to amase vs with their only looke, so as we durst not come neere them. A little childe will rule oxen, in somuch that when they be accustomed to the yoke, he shall keepe the there with a little sticke, he shall make them bow downe their thicke neckes, and stoupe with their brode hornes, and (to be short) he shall weelde them in such sorte, that whereas they were able to beare downe all things afore them, there shall be no resistance at all. Sith wee see this, let vs acknowledge that God hath shewed himself bountifull towards vs, seeing hee hath after that maner made such beasts subiect to vs, as were able to haue made vs affrayde (as I sayd afore) and will neverthelesse haue them apply themselues to our seruice, so as menne may tame them. Behold, the Eliphant is tamed, which is a passing terrible beast: for the very looke of him ouercommeth all other beasts. Truly he is as a muuntayne, and seemeth to serue of purpose to destroy vs: and yet notwithstanding, when he is subdued, he becometh after a sort tame: not that he keepeth not still some incling of his owne kind: but yet is it a wonder to vs that me can after some maner ouermayster him, and make him too serue their turne. On the contrary part, the Vnicorne being but a small beast, and hauing no more but a certaine nimblenesse in him, keepeþ alwayes his sturdinessse, in somuch that all the men in the world cannot by their cunning and strength bring him to subiectiōn. Sith wee see this, let vs be conuicted at leastwile by such comparison. And when we haue learned to acknowledge Gods goodnesse in that he applieth the beasts to our vse and profite, which do vs seruice: lette vs marke also on the other side, that it were not in vs to rule a Snyale, (as ye would say) if our Lord did not giue vs power ouer him. True it is that at the Creation of the worlde all beasts were giuen vnto Adam to haue Lordship and dominion ouer them. But we haue lost the possession thereof in that we be gone away from God, like as when a subiect committeth any lewdnesse or treason agaynst his Prince, his goods are forfeyted and he himselfe is quite out of fauour. Euen so is it with all me. For we should haue reigned feasably ouer all beasts, if we had not bene vnthankfull to our God, in breaking the allegiance which wee ought vnto hym. That then is the cause why we be bereft of the Lordship and souerayntie which was giuen vs ouer all beasts. Nowe seeing that the beasts should rise vp against vs, and wee could not injoy them, but that God reserueth the vse of them vnto vs, yea and subdueth some of them too vs according as wee haue neede of them: thereby we be warned, that it is an exceeding great madnesse for vs to lift vp our selues against our maker, and that the beasts can wel ouermaister vs if neede require, & God needeth not to arme the Lions or Vnicornes, but can giue vs battell by lyce and fleas if he thinke good, and so make a scorne of all our prydē. Therefore seeing that sometimes we cannot by any meaſe rule the beasts: lette vs remember from whence the same commeth: that is to wit, from Adams sinne and our own naughtinesse, in that wee be stubborne against him that had made vs Princes of the worlde, and put all creatures into our hande. Let vs consider this and be sorie for our sinnes: and as oft as the wilde beasts do vs any harme, let vs bethinke vs thus: Behold, God sheweth vs our owne wants: and therupon lette vs pray him to graunt vs the grace to obey him in such wise, as we may beare his mark, that the beasts may know the power which he hath giuen vs as his children: and yet for all that, lette vs assure our selues that he intendeth to holde vs always in awe. Lo what we haue to marke in the second place. But now a ma might aske a question, why God keepeth still such kinde of beastes, seeing they do men no seruice. For it should seeme that the cause ceaseth why God should nourish them any longer: but let vs marke, that they cease not to be as beautifyngs of this world, to the end that men might behold the maiestic of God in them. And that is one reason sufficient ynough of it selfe. Againe (as I haue sayde already) they serue for our learning: God sheweth vs diuerse sightis in them, to teach vs by that varietie to vnderſtand his power, goodnesse, and iusteſſe the better. On the other ſide, they are a good instruction to vs, because that ſith we cannot haue the vſe of them, we muſt not preſume to exalt our ſelues to high. For even the very horses and oxen would rufe againſt vs and ouerrun vs: in ſomuch Iohn.6.21. as although God haue put them vnder vs, and will haue them to ſerue vs: yet notwithstanding now and then one ſtroke of a horses foote is ynough to ſlea a man. Sith wec ſee this, haue wee not alwayes a good leſſon to ſhrinke in our heads, and to giue ouer the making of too great braueries? Yee ſee then what wee haue to beare away here. Furthermore whereſore mention is made of the breaking of the cloddes, and of tilling of the ground, and of carrying the corne into the barne: it is to the ende that men ſhould be the better warned, that they had neede to be prouided of many helps at Gods hand. VVe could not continue in the world, if we had not meate and drinke: we could not liue two dayes, if we were not nourished. And who is he that giueth vs bread? Are men ſo able of themſelues as they can till the earth alone? No: they may well imploym all the ſtrength of their armes, and they may well digge and delue: but alas, al that is not ynough to make the corne growe for their ſuſtenance. And who ſhall clothe them while they be tilling of the earth? where ſhall they get coates, hozens and ſhooes? who ſhall furniſh them of all their neceſſaries: for wee ſee we be ſubiect to ſo many things, that onely meate and drinke will not ſerue our turne. VVhat a number of helps haue wee neede of to mainteyne vs in this wretched life? conſidering then that God had neede too giue vs ſuche an innumerable ſorte of helps: let vs therefore thiſke vpon the great number of benefits which he hath beſtowed vpon vs: as in that he hath ordeneſſed hoſes and oxen to till the grounde for vs, and to bring home the corne into our Barnes, and furthermore giuen vs ſuch ſkilfulness; that when we haue done amissiōn, by and by we haue a remedie at hand. Seing that God hath made vs to beholde his goodnesse after that manner before our eyes, let vs alſo conſider how deepeſly we be bound and indetted vnto him to ſerue him with all lowlinesse. For heſhold, the clafe poynſt that is ſhewed vs in this booke, is that menne ſhall neuer yeeld God his due due honour, except they stoupe vnto him, without presuming to grudge against him, or without taking vpon them to teach him his lesson. And vndoubtedly it is not our schoole, that he ought to come vnto. He hath suche wisedome in himselfe, that (as hath bene shewed heretofore, and as shall be shewed further hereafter) we be constreyned, (I say wee be constreyned) to be abashed at the sight of Gods doings. And as wee be abashed in that behalfe, so also behoueth it vs to learne to gloriſe him: for that is all that we can do. Now let vs come to that which is sayd of the Peacockes and Estridges. VVho is he (sayeth God): bat bat bgiuen so goodly wings to the Peacockes? God sheweth vs in one woord, that one only fether is ynough to proue vs starke fooles, in that we cannot be contented with his doings. Let vs looke vpon a Peacockes fether: is there not so woderfull a workmanship in the same, as we wote not what to say to it, but only to gloriſe God? I say that euen the vnbeleeuers are compelled therewith. Seing it is so: I pray you are our witties able to reache so high as to the skanning how God gouerneth the world, and to the things that are much higher without comparison? Must they not needes come short? If one feather of a Peacocke rauish vs, and hold vs as it were in a gaze at it: what shall all the workeſhip which appeareth in the wholē worlē do? what shall the ſpeciall gouerning of mankind do? And yet notwithstanding, that is the thing whereat men do vitter their blaſphemies: that is the thing for which they chafe and ſtorime againſt God, beyng deſirous that he ſhould gouerne by their aduice and after their fancie. And that is because they haue not their own liking, nor are dealt with at Gods hand as they theſelues would wiſh. Yet muſt we needes be proued to haue fayled of our dueſtie, if we can conſider what he telleth vs. Thus yee ſee Gods meening in this teſte. Afterward he maketh a comparison with the wings of the Estridges: but that is rather to ſtay vpon that which is added concerning the fondneſſe, lightneſſe, and ſtrength that is in them. Alſo he ſpeaketh of Storkes: and that may be the rather to bring vs to the reaſonableneſſe that is in them: for there is more kindneſſe to bee ſound in them, than there is oftentimes in men. For when the yong Storkes are growen great, they reknowleſe their cammes, and feede them in their old age. — require that which they did to them in their youth. Surely if this were well conſidered, there needed none other doctrine to condenme the vnhankfulneſſe of children that are ſtubborne to their fathers and mothers, and could finde in their hearts that they were in the bottome of the ſea, and therfore would be very loth to ſpend themſelues in their behalfe, or to ſpare the meate from their own mouths to giue it vnto them. So then ye ſee a ſayre mirrour which we haue in this birde. But are not we more than guiltie, ſeing we acknowledge not our ſouerayne father that created vs all, which nurriſheth vs, in whose hand we be, and which wexeth not old that he might haue neede of vs? he giueth vs innumerable good things: and we conſider not ſomuch as to yeelde him his due prayſe: now ſeing we be ſo lewde and froward, neede there any other witness(es) than the Storkes to condenme vs? howbeit for aſmuch as God stayeth here longer vpō the Eſtriche: lette vs come to that which is ſpoken of it. Behold (ſayeth he) the Eſtrich mocketh both the boſe and his Rider. This ſerueth to ſhew the nimbleneſſe that is in that great birdbeaſt: for it is half a bird [of the ayre] and half a beaſt of the earth: and he hath ſuch a weightie boſie, as he can not mount vp to flie aloft, but flickereth in ſuch wiſe as he cannot be out gone. A man may well runne poſte after him, but he cannot ouertake him. For what with his halfe leaping vpon his Clees, and what with his halfe flying [with his wings,] he paſſeth all the ſwiftneſſe that can be in horses, or in any other beaſtes. Marke that for one poyn̄. An̄ the ſame ſwiftneſſe is matched with pollicie, ſo as thofe beaſtes can take vp ſtones by the way and throwe them at ſuch as follow after them. Thus ſee yee two things in this Birdbeaſt: on the one ſide foolishneſſe, howbeit matched with aduiſedneſſe in gathering vp ſtones as he runneth, and in caſting them backward at ſuch as pursue him. This (I ſay) is one wonderfull thing that is to be ſcene in Estridges. On the otherſide there is ſuch foolishneſſe in them, that if they may once hide their heads, they thiſke that all their bodies are hidden, and yet the huge carkeſſes of them are ſcene ſtill. And as touching their egges, they ſitte not vpō them, but for aſmuch as they keepe in whote countries, they hide them in the ſand, & the Sunne giuing warmth vnto them, doth by that meanes hatch them. If a man conſider, on the one ſide the forecast of theſe Birdbeaſts [in defending themſelues,] and on the otherſide their foolishneſſe in hiding their Egges: ſhall he not ſee a wonderfull worke of God in guyding all after that ſort? Furthermore whereaſ mention is made of the ſtrength and ſwiftneſſe of this Birdbeaſt, lette vs underſtādē that in those things it ſurmounteth vs. VVe may well make our brags: but the Eſtriches go beyōd vs in that caſe. Marke this for one poyn̄, that men muſt not ſet ſo much ſtore by themſelues as they haue bene wont to do: for God will ſende them backe continually too theſe examples, which ſerue to mocke their foolish boasting. On the otherſide when wee ſee that theſe Birdbeaſts which haue ſtrength and nimbleneſſe, yea and pollicie also in other things, are ſo fond in one poyn̄, that they ſhewe neither wit nor ſkill: ought not wee to gloriſe Gods goodneſſe towards vs? For who hath giuen vs more underſtāding than the Estridges haue? Haue menne gotten it by their owne power? Is there eyther Gold or Siluer that can buy ſuch a marchaundize? Then let every man acknowledge how much wee be bound vnto God, for giuing vs ſuch diſcretion: and lette vs beare in minde that it behoueth vs to yeelde him his due prayſe. Thus yee ſee what Gods meening is in this teſte. Alſo whereaſ it is ſayd, that God bat bat bereft the Eſtrich of wifedome: lette vs underſtādē that it is to warne vs, that in aſmuch as wee haue reaſon and diſcretion, wee be ſo much the more bound vnto God, for giving vs ſo inestimable a benefitte and priuiledge. For what a thing is it to diſcernē betweene good and euiſſe, and to know what is our dueſtie, not onely for wal-king in this worlē, but alſo to attayne to the euerlaſting lyſe? what a principal thing is it, that we know how God hath created vs after his owne image, and prepared our heritage for vs aboue? ſeing then that we haue the ſkill to diſcernē betweene honestie and diſhonestie, and betweene vice and vertue: and that moreouer God doth ſo inlighten vs by his holy ſpirite, that the heauens are after a ſort opened vnto vs, and we paſſe aboue the world to come to the compagnie of the Angelles, and to the endleſſe glorie which is purchased for vs by our Lord Iefus Christ: in aſmuch (ſay I) as wee haue all this: how much ought wee to make of ſuch a treasure? And by the way, who is he that giueth it vs? For (as I haue eſt ſayde) we ſhould bee lyke theſe foolish Birdbeaſtes that are ſpo-ken of here, and wee ſhoule haue no more witte than the Eſtriches: but that God prouideth otherwyſe for vs.

Thus then yee ſee howe men ought to bridle themſelues, and to apply all their wit and reaſon to the hono-ring of God, and not aduaunce themſelues any more agaynſt him. But the cheſte thing is that they muſte obey him, him, and consider that there is infirmitie still in themselves: & that it is yernough for them if they can in some small quantitiie discerne the greatnessse and heights of Gods workes, and that in creeping vpon the earth, they go forward still with all hūblenesse and modestie, knowing well that they cannot as yet attayne to the depth of Gods secretes. And that is the thing which I touched at the beginning for the better confirmation of this texte: namely that God on the one side intendeth to make vs perceyue his goodnessse, to the ende wee should haue no cause to be greeued or to be out of patience, as though he had given a better stare to the wilde beasts than to vs: and yet neuerthelesse to the intent to humble vs, wee see our selues in such plight, by reason of the corruption that wee caught by sinne, that the beastes do passe vs in some respects and particular poynts. True it is that we shall alwayes bee preferred before the beastes, and be placed in higher degree above them. Yea and whereas we haue not so great strength and nimblenesse as the beastes haue: the same is to our profitte, that is to wit, to humble vs with all: for otherwise wee would never be tamed. VVee see that although wee be put in minde of our weakenesse by many things which we behold: yet notwithstanding God is fayne to complayne of vs, that we be like wilde beasts, as hath bene sayde. And (which worse is,) an Oxe will know his owners cribbe where he is fedde: and an Asse or a Horse will know his maysters stable: but we will not know our maker: to be short, he can by no meanes tame vs. Therefore it is good for vs that wee haue not such force and strength as the wilde beastes haue: for what a 30 thing were it? how could we be delt withall? Moreouer by the way let vs alwayes beare in minde, that wee must haue recourse to the number of benefites that God hath specially bestowed vpon vs, and not vpon the beastes: according as it is sayde here of reason and vnderstanding. Howbeit lete vs not simply consider the reason that is common in all men: but let vs also come to that it hath pleased God to enlighten vs with the wisedome that is conteyned in his Gospell, and to open our eyes by his holy spirite, so as wee bee able to see his secretes which else should be hidden and incomprehensible to vs: [and therefore] let vs learne to magnifie him for the same. These be the two things we haue to beare in minde. And by the way lette vs marke, that whereas mention is made here of the Estridges egges: if God extend his prouidence to the hatching of his egges, even when they be left and forsaken: it is much more likely that hee will never forget vs, vs (I say) which are more excellent creatures. And in good sooth we see he hath prouided much better for mankind, than for those cattell. For hehold, the hennes of them are so foolish, that they forget their owne egges and their chickens that should come of them: but our Lord hath printed a kindnesse in women, that they know their yong babes, and nurrishe them with their own bloud and substance. Seing then that our Lord hath set such an order in mankind: thereby wee know that he hath a fatherly care of vs. Howbeit wee muste not measure his goodnesse by that only: but let vs come to that whiche he sayeth by his Prophet: Can the mother forger her child? Although all the mothers in the world should forget their children: yet will not I forsake thee, (sayeth the Lord). God then on the one side sheweth himselfe a father, in that he holdeth the mothers at such stay in giving themselves willingly to the charge of nursing their children. True it is that we see not this in all mothers: for there are a number of these tender and nice things, that cannot finde in their hearts to take payne with their owne children, but a nurce shall bee more kinde to a childe that is none of his owne, than the owne mother is. Neuerthelesse the sayd kindnesse appeereth commonly. And whence proceedeth it? Euen of God, whose will it is to maynteyne mankinde by that meane. Moreouer when wee know his fatherly goodnessse which sheweth it selfe to his creatures: very well, surely God doth afore hande make vs to feele his fauour, and the care that hee hath of vs: howbeit let vs vnderstand, that in himselfe he surmounteth all that euer we can perceyue in this worlde, and that if we come vnto him with humblenesse, he will alwayes shewe himselfe as he is, that is to wit, the welspring of all mercie, and will pitie our aduersities and succour vs in them. Therefor let vs haue the sayd trust: and although we be wretched creatures, yet let vs not therfore ceasse to trust in him and to glorifie him: assuring our selues that if we yeeld vs teachable to him as his obedient people, he on his side will shewe vs that our acknowledging of him to be our God is not in vayne.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good God with acknowledg'mēt of o're sinnes, praying him to make vs feele them better: and generally too open our eyes, that we may no more be puffed vp with prude and presumption, nor be any more drunken with our own vayne fancies, to stande in our owne conceyt, and to boast our selues: but that wee may rather learne to submitte our selues to him, to holde all our goodes of him, and to do him honour for them, acknowledging that if he continue not his mercie towards vs, we be vterly vndone at every minute of an houre: that by that meane wee may be alwayes held in his feare and subiection, and profite therein more and more, and that moreouer he may vouchsafe to beare with vs still, so long as he leeth vs yet hemmed in with so many infirmities and corruptiōs, vntill he have vterly bereft vs of them, and transformed vs vnto his glory and image. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only to vs, but also to all people and nations of the earth, bringing backe all poore ignorant soules from the miserable &c.

The. clij. Sermon, which is the third vpon the xxxix. Chapter.

22. Hast thou giuen strength to the horse, or invironed his necke vwith neying?
23. VVilt thou make a horse afryad as a grassehopper (or Locust:) the neying of his nostrilles is terrible.
24. He diggeth the earth vwith his foote, he reioyceth, he goeth vwith boldnesse before the armed man.
25. He passeth not for scaring, he feareth not, nother shunnethe he the syvoord.
26. Let the Quier rattle, and the steele of the speare and of the shield.
27. He svallovveth yp the earth in rage and fiercenesse, and he passeth not for the noyze of the trumpet.
28. VVhen he heareth the trumpet, he sayeth, ha ha: he smellethe the battell a farre off, and the noyze of the Captaynes, and the shouting of the armie.

29. VVill the hauke take him to his fethers by thy vvisedome, or vvill he spred out his vvinges tovvards the South?
30. VVill the Eagle mount vp at thy commaundement, and make hir nest in the high places?
31. Shee dyvelleth vpon the rocke, and abideth vpon the hygh mountaynes in fortresses.
32. And from thence shee espieth hit pray, and hit eyes looke farre of.
33. Hir yong ones sucke vp bloud, and haunt vvhile dead bodies are.
34. And the Lord ansvered and sayd vnto Iob.
35. Is it learning to stryue vwith the Almighty? let him that reproueth God ansvere to this.

If we were dispozed to be taught of God, hee also on his parte would deale so with vs, as all his teaching should be to lift vs vp out of hand vnto himselfe, yea and that after so familiar a fashion, as a father talketh to his children. Howbeit, forasmuch as wee be harde to be gouerned, and in steede of yeelding our selues teachable, wee will needes bee ouerwyze: God is sayne to send vs to schoole to the beasts, as wee haue seene heretofore, and as hee proceedeth to do here still. For in speaking of Horses and of their nature, he sheweth that men knowe not his workes, when they will needes auaunce themselues after that sorte agaynst him. And therewithall he sheweth that vnlesse it please him, he will not vouchsafe to answeare any of our replies, but it shall be ynough for vs to be disproued by the brute beasts: Yea euен by the horses which are of householde with vs, so as he shall not neede to go farre to stoppe our mouthes. For he shall haue aduocates ynough to pleade his case, in the streetes, in the fieldes, and in the houses, and he will not rayse vp great Oratours among men, but will (as I sayde) content himselfe to haue the brute beasts [to pleade for him.] Furthermore here is no curious discoursing of the nature of horses: for God ment not too deale with such maner of processe, but he alledgedh simply the things that are knowne to the ignorantest sort. A man neede not to bee greatly practized for the vnderstanding of the things that are spoke here: for little chil- 40 dren knowe them, lyke as when hee spake of the starres and planets, he did it not after the maner of the greate doctours and Philosophers. VVhy so? Bycause fewe folke shoulde haue fared the better by it: for all haue not capacitic to conceyue it: but hee spake grossly of the Sunne and the Moone and of the things that are to bee seene. VVho soeuer hath eyes although he haue nother skill nor aught else, nor be a great Clerke: may notwithstanding comprehend the things that haue bene spoken alreadie concerning the Sunne and the Starres: he needeth no Astrologie in that behalfe. In like case is it here, where he speaketh of the beasts. Now then he keepeth on the self same course: and that is, to the intent that none of vs shoulde take excuse, as wherevnto wee be inclyned. Truely men are loth to confess their owne ignorance: but yet when it commeth to the excuzing of themselues before God, then they make a buckler of it, saying: This passeth mine vnderstanding, this is to curious geere for mee, I cannot fasten vpon it. For asmuch as most men take such lurkingholes: he sayeth that euен the ignorantest sort shall haue it proued to their faces, that they haue bene vnthankfull & malicious to him, and that they haue not knowne the things that were vterly apparant vnto them.

Thusthen yee see the cause why that when mention is made here of horses, the things are rehearsed simply in such sorte as they be knowne to all men both to great and small. Yea (sayeth God)? Is it in man to giue such strength as is seene in Horses? Or specially to giue them so lustie and corageous a nature? For besides that horses are strong of limbis, wee see that they be partly b edde of purpose for the warres Men see how they cast themselues into the middes of daunger: and they are inflamed with such a furiousnesse, as a man would say that they bee of one minde with the Trumpettes and with the great shoutes, yea and that they do euē incourage the menne. Sith wee see this, and that there is terriblesse euē in their nozelbrils, so as he is a dreadfull beast of himselfe, and yet menne know but a small peice of Gods working in that behalfe, for he hath not vttered all his power there to the full, but hath onely giuen a little signe, and marke what he is able to do: if men consider it throughly, ought they to striue or checke any more? dare they nowe set themselues agaynst the living God? they durst not answeare a horse, they durst not rubbe him vpon the backe, they would be afrayde of him: and yet they bee not afayde of the infinite power whereof they see but a small droppe in all the horses of the worlde.

Ye see then what we haue to remember in effect vpon this streyne. And euē in the same we see that God hath vsed no superfluous language in speaking heere of the bardinessse of borses, and of their strength, and that men cannot scare them as Graweboppers, but that they runne vpon the speares and arrowes. It was needfull for him to speake so. And why? For wee be hardie and bolde ynough to carpe at God when we know not his glorie. And it is our ewne blockishnesse that giueth vs that boldnesse: for in asmuch as wee drawe a curtayne before our eyes, which keepeþ vs frō the sight of Gods glorie, that is the thing that maketh vs so brutishe. So then, because wee play the sharpsighted menne, and will needes comprehend all things in our owne fancie, to know the infinite power of God: therefore doth God treatise here of Horses, and set before vs the strength and power that is in them. And why so? To the ende we should bee rauished in wondering at his guyding. For it behoueth vs always to come backe to this poynt, that God hath not vttered his power altogether in horses, nor giuen vs there to vnderstande the vttermost that he is able to do: but hath set forth but onely as it were one droppe of his prouidence there. And yet for all that, if wee consider well what is sayde here: were it not that wee bee accustomed with the sight and handling of horses, euery of vs would runne away before them, and they would be terrible beastes to vs, specially at the sight of their boldnesse which they shewe in battell.

Thus ye see how wee must apply all the things to our instruction, which are rehearsed here particularly cōcerning horses. Yea and on the other side we must note the goodnessse of god, in that he tameth horses after that sort, to subdue them vnto men and to apply them to their lervice. Thinke we that a horse which is vntame of his own nature, yea and bredde as it were of purpose for battell, would suffer himselfe to be so ruled and weeldeed, if God had not cooled that great corage of his, to the intent that mennes mennes turnes might bee serued? Durst wee do this of our selues? Then let vs conclude, that God sheweth vs his power in that he hath giuen such boldnesse vnto horses, and made them so fierce: and that he hath also giuen vs a singular record of his goodnesse and loue, in that we which are nothing, are able too breake horses after that maner to our owne vse, so as they suffer vs to trauell them, to put them to the Chariot and cart, too labour them in tilling the ground, and to take their backes to ride vpon them.

Seing then that horses suffer themselues to be so governed: no doubt but our Lorde sheweth vs how beneficiall he is towardes vs, and maketh vs too knowe him. Thus much concerning that poynt. But the chiefe poynt is the lesson that I haue touched: namely, that the same muste serue vs to reppresse our boldnesse. Therefore when wee bee tempted to murmur against God, or to gaynesay him in any thing: wee must cast our eye vpon the brute beasts, for they can teach vs, and we also are woorthie of such schooling, when wee will not hearken peaceably to our God to obey his simple voyce. Afterwarde he speakeith of Hawkes and Eagles. Hast thou (sayeth he) giuen wings to the Hawke? or will be fly at thy commaundement when beforeth towards the South? or when it seemeth that he would sticke vp into the Sunne? Haste thou shaped the Eagles (sayeth he)? Is it thou that giuest them their nestes in the Rockes, and in the towers of the mountaynes? that is to say in the high and loftie places? Art thou able to set such an order in nature? And whereas their yong ones feede vpon bloud, and are bredde therewith: is it thou that haste invred them to bee fedde and nurished with such a sustenance? The Eagles finde where the dead bodies are, and they smell them out afare of: yea and they be so sharpe sighted as they bee able too spie them out everywhere: and surely it is certayne that this soule hath the sharpest sight of all others. Is it thou then that hath giuen such nature to the Eagles, sayerh God? VVe see how God both aboue and beneath offereth vs mirrours (or rather liuely images,) wherein wee may perceyue his mightie power to humble our selues: and yet notwithstanding wee must consider also, that in the same there is wherewith to stoppe vs, when we bee so foolish or madde as to runne rushing agaynst him. And he needeth not to pleade his owne case or to open his mouth to speake one woerde: for looke how many creatures there are aboue and beneath, as many witnesses are there to confound vs viterly. No doubt but wee will be bolde ynough to aduaunce our selues agaynst God, as though wee would plucke him out of his seate with our blasphemies, and wee beare our selues in hand that wee may preuayle by our ouerboldnesse: but he hath stoppes ynough to cast in our wayes: for there is nother beast on the earth, nor bird in the ayre, which shal not beare witnesse agaynst vs. VVe see then that Gods case shall bee pleaded by his creatures without troubling himselfe with it: and yet notwithstanding, all that wee shall haue deuized agaynst him muste returne vpon our owne heads. Now although this lesson be easie ynough: yet is it very ill minded on mens behalfe. And for proof hereof, wee see the foules flie in the ayre, and wee see the beasts go vpon the grounde: and yet howe fewe are there of vs that wake vp, to thinke vpon God? dayly we haue store of temptations, and the Diuell breatheth into vs the spirite of grudging and hartburning against God: If wee bee not handled to our owne liking, by and by we fall too carping and wrangling, saying: who was aware of that which is shewed or done heire? VVe graunt well ynough that the thing is utterly apparant: and yet notwithstanding wee forget it, and it never commeth to our minde agayne. The easier then and the commoner that this lesson is: the lesse excuse shall there bee for vs, and the more blamewoorthishie shall wee bee before God, for not minding the things which wee ought too haue knowne vnspoken too, or without putting in remembrance. And ought not this to be vnderstood of every one of vs? If wee thinke not vpon God when the Diuell commeth to pricke vs so againts him: what lettereth vs too do it but our owne malice and vnthankfulness? Seing then that wee bee so slowe, and the things that ought too be euer rediest with vs, come not to our mind: we ought so much the more to marke what is touched here, howe euery man should furnish himselfe aforhand with such warnings. Looke me then vpon the hawkes that fyle in the ayre. It is a straunge thing, onely to see that a liuing creature can cast forth it selfe and mount vp with such force, as it seemeth that it should pearce through the clowdes: and no doubt but wee would bee exceedingly abashed at it, if wee were not accustomed with it. For do wee surmyze that the same is done by haphazard? VVere it possible for the birdes to mount vp after that fashion, if God had not giuen them that nature? Nowe if wee see Gods hande apparant in a birde: which of vs shall take vpon him to teache God his lesson? for wee be confounded in a very small thing: and what proportionableness or nerenesse shall there be, if we make comparison betwene God and his creatures?

Agayne, if wee compare a hawke with the residue of the whole worlde: it is nothing. And if so small a portion of Gods woorkes ought to rauish vs and amaze vs: what ought all his woorkes to do when wee come to the full numbering of them, so as wee fall to discoursing of all the things which wee see bothe aboue and beneath? Moreouer when wee consider that the maiestie of God is yet hygher aboue all the Heavens, and so farre of from vs as wee cannot reache vnto it: doth it not become vs to stoupe to honour and reuerence it, and to bee restreyned from passing any further, whensoever the Diuell shall labour to make vs carpe agaynst it, or to grudge at it by any maner of meane? As for the things that are spoken heire concerning the nature of Eagles: it may beo takē, that their yong ones do sucke bloud anon after that they bee vnclozed, bycause that one kinde of Eagles do caste their yong ones out of the nest, so as they bee driven to shifte for themselves: and it is sayde that they bring vp none but the blacke ones: howbeit they that write of such matters, do varie in that poynt: for soone say that the Eagles do caste away their yong ones as bastard eagles, if their sight be not strong ynough to looke full vpon the shyning Sunne. But wee haue not to do with the curious poynts of the Philosophers, it is ynough for vs that God doth here shew vs the nature of Eagles in such wyze as it is knowne: and he vseth (as yee would say) that grosse fashion, to the intent we should haue no cloke nor excuse of ignorance. Looke mee then vpon the Eagles that are bredde to the pray: yea euen from the shell they haue the properte of sucking bloud: and it is a straunge thing that a bird should so feede and nourish it self with bloud.

Behold what a crueltie is put into them, needes therefore muste they haue that nature giuen them of another. And whence commeth the diuersitie that is betweene the birdes that live by pray, and the other foules? Must not that difference bee of Gods putting, who thereby sheweth vs suche signes of his prouidence, as wee bee forced to confess that it is he which gouerneth and ordereth all thynge, and that as the birdes made not their owne bodies, so also they gaue not themselves that inclination which which they haue, but the same commeth from elsewhere, and God sheweth him selfe in such wyse, as we must needs worship his Maiestie? Thus yee see the chiefe poynt which wee haue to remember in this text. And therfore a man needeth not to go to schoole for the matter: lette him do no more but open his eyes, I meene euen the veriest idiot: for the thing that is shewed here is knowne to all men, and therefore wee must needs be condemned if we be so brutish and blockish, as not to know the things that are vterly apparant, specially seeing it is added, that the Eagles resort thither as they perceyue any dead bodies too bee, and that they smell the dead carcasses afarre off, and spie out theyr pray too make their flight thitherward. Nowe when wee see such things, lette vs vnderstante that our Lorde hath put a secrete moving into them: for it were impossible that the Eagles should haue it of themselues, but that God hath inured them to it, & imprinted I wote not what a thing in them, whereby he sheweth himselfe to be wonderfull.

So then, when wee looke aboue vs and beholde the diuersitie of workes, we be inforced spye of our teeth, to knowe that there is a Creator or maker which beareth sway: for if all beasts were of one nature and inclination: Gods prouidence should bee more darkesome than it is. Then by all likelihood it seemeth to be sayde, that it is nature which beareth the sway, according as wee see that when the Philosophers themselues had searched and considered things throughout: in steade of worshipping and magnifying God in his woorkes, they bent all their witte and understanding to forge a nature that should serue to deface God and his glorie, and therein the Diuell ruled them to their great and horrible damnation. But when as we see such varietie, that one bird is of one nature and another of another, and that the beasts also do differ: it can not be sayde, that this is one nature, as it might be if all living things went by one line, and men sawe one answerable conformitie in all beasts. If things were so dispozed, menne would by and by say, Nature, Nature: and they would never thinke vpon God. But now sith we see that one birde haith fearfulness, and another hath not: therein Gods working appeereth the better. The dooues (as wee see) are as fearefull foules as any can be: and contrarywise wee see that the Gosshawkes and all other birdes of pray are as hardie. Againe there are other foules that are very great, which yet notwithstanding giue not themselues to the pray. As for example, looke vpon the Swannes: will they feede vpon Carion? are they birdes of pray as the Eagles are? Seing then that there commeth such diuersitie before our eyes: God doth therein shewe vs his prouidence the more apparatly, and we be so much the more conuictid. And that is a thing well woorthis to be marked. For without going any further, if all men had one countenance, and all women likewyze, so as they were all of one stature, of one colour, of one making, of one looke, and of one mind: we should not so wel know that there is a creator that shaped vs, nor that hee dealeth forth the graces and giftes of his holy spirite in such measure as it pleafeth him: It would seeme that our mothers wombe shaped vs, or that it was the seede of our father that gaue vs substance and shape and all that euer wee haue. To be short, men would not thinke themselues beholding to God for any thing, nor yeeld him any honor. But when wee see such diuersitie of menne, so as one is bigge and another small: and their dispositions differ, so as one is sharpewitted and another dull, one is of great eloquence and vterāce in speech, and another is as good as halfe dumbe: when wee see all these things: muste wee not needes (if we be not tootoo malicious and fro-ward) confesseth that God at his owne pleasure distributeth vnto vs the giftes of his holy spirit, and that it is hee which hath made vs and fashioned vs: according as wee haue seene heretofore, that like as when a woman hath Leb. 11.b.10. milked her kyne shee maketh her cheese of what fashion shee her selfe listeth, so God also dispozeth vs in such wyze, as wee wote not what to say to it, but that it is his hande that woorkest it, yea euen after a marauylous fashion. And therefore lette vs learne not to be blinde in suche diuersitie of things as God setteth afore vs: but whensocuer we open our eyes, and so many things come to our sight, so as one man hath this shape, & another hath another cleane contrary: lette vs vnderstand that God draweth vs to himselfe, and that forasmuch as he seeth vs slow in coming, he cheereth vs vp and pricketh vs forward, so as we be in a maner forced to go onward, except we will of malicious stubbornnesse withstand him, and carpe at him in saying, I see and will not see. There is yet another poynt, in that it is sayd, that the Eagles gather togidher to the place where carsons are: that is to wit, that sith the birds which liue by pray haue skill to seeke their feeding, and specially that the Eagles do smell a farre of where aught is for them to feede vpon: much more reason is it that wee should resort to the place where God sheweth vs that our life is. And therefore seeing that the birdes resort togidher for corruptible foode, yea and runne thither and take payne for it: what excuse is there for vs if wee on our side refuze our [spirituall] foode when it is offered vs, and haue not the wit to resort to the place where our life is? Shall there neede any other witnessesse against vs than the Eagles? according also as our Lord Iesus setteth foorth the same similitude vnto vs. For after he hath spoken of the greate troubles that shoulde bee in the world: he sayeth that where soeuer the dead carcasse is, thither will the Eagles resorte, according wherevnto Luke. 17.g. wee of this countrie may say the like of Rauens. Yee see then that these poore birdes haue a naturall inclination too seeke their meate and pray: and where shall wee on our side finde our lyfe? Should we bee so witlesse, when our Lorde Iesus Christe calleth and allureth vs vnto him, telling vs that when wee be come thither wee shall finde all that wee want, and bee inriched with all maner of good things, so as wee shall bee fully replenished with his nurishment and strenght, euen too our full contention?

Therefore lette vs thinke vpon it: for seeing wee haue such assurance, muste not the Eagles haue witnessesse agaynst vs at the great day, if wee bee rechlesse now? But lette vs come backe too the principall poynt which I touched at the beginning, according also as God concludeth with the same: namely, Is it learning too contend with the Almighty? Lette him that correleth God answe too it. Thus then serueth to shewe vs to what purpose so many things haue bene discoursed. For a man might thinke it straunge, that God intending to maynteyne his righteousnesse and to stoppe mennes mouthes that they should not carpe agaynst him, should speake of the Starres, of the tilling of the ground, and of the maner of sayling, and sette foorth the natures of beastes. To what purpose is all this? It should seeme that God seeketh rousing reasons. Yea: but when wee shall haue considered the poynt that I touched, we shall finde it much more auayleable for vs that hee maynteyneth his righteousnesse after that maner, than if hee had disputed of it without setting his creatures afore vs. And why? For wee must come backe to this conclusion, that although he should let vs alone with our babbling, yet shoulde we winne nothing by it: for wee coulde not criē so lowde as too beate his cares

cares with it : hee could set many stoppes in our way : looke how many creatures there are in heauen, on earth, and in the sea, all of them shold rise vp & bend them selues agaynst vs, so as we shold not be able too come nigh God. Nowe we see that this maner [of dealing] which God vseth to daunt Job, and in his person all such as are impacient, or which will needes aduaunce themselves to high) is as fit as may be, and that he could not haue taken a better way to teach, than that which he hath hild heretofore. And that is the cause why I sayd, that it behoueth vs to marke well that conclusion. Doth he then shew himselfe to be wise, which contendeth with the Almighty? True it is, that forasmuch as the Hebrewe woerde that is sette downe here, signifieth as well to Teach, as to Correct, (for woerde for woerde it is thus: Is it learning or correcting too striue with the Almighty?) It might be taken as though it were sayde, doth the man that so quarelleth and striueth with God, prepare himselfe to bee chastized? No: but contrariwise he hardeneth himselfe. Now our true wisdome is to haue skill to challice our selues, and to know our own wants, that we may be sorie and ashamed of the, & haue none other helpe but to pray God to receyue vs to mercy and to pitie vs. That is the true wisdom of men. Then must we conclude on the contrary part, that such as do so lift vp themselues agaynst God, are starke fooles. And the meening will come awayes to this poynt, so as there will be no diuersitic of matter, but the doctrine wil tende awayes to this one marke: namely, That men are not onely misaduised, but also vterly destitute of witte and reason, when they take so vpon them to plead against their maker. And for the better vnderstanding heereof, let vs holde these two degrees that I haue spoken of. Let the first be, That our true wisdome is to ouermayster our selues. So long as a man standeth in his owne conceyt, or looketh so loftily, or is ouer scornefull: he dooth nothing but throwe himselfe headlong into decay, and the ende of it cannot be but deadly. Therefore there is nothing better for vs than to correct [or amende] our selues: that is to say, to beate downe our selues in such wise as God may weelde vs, and we acknowledge that we be nothing, but that we bee so full of wretchednesse as hee must bee faine to gourne vs, and we take our selues too bee beholding to him for all good things. Againe, for the seconde poynt, seeing wee bee needie, vnfurnished, and destitute [of all things:] let vs runne vnto him: who is the weispring of all power, wisdome and righteousnesse, and (to be short) let vs vnderstarde that it is he of whom we holde our life, and all the appurtenances thereof. Ye see then that the way to bee well taught or learned, is to be ashamed of our selues, and to flee vnto our God, and therewithal to condemne all our wicked deedes & sinnes, and too acknowledge that in our nature there is nothing but fowardnesse & corruption. When we haue learned to hate our selues after that maner: we be sure that wee haue greatly profited. But now, can a man amende himselfe when he intendeth to plead agaynst his God? Surely it is even as good as a draught of poysone to make vs madde, if the diuell can bring vs too the poynt too take priche agaynst God, or to bee discontented with him, or to accuse him of doing wrong, or to take displeasure that he shoulde handle vs otherwise than we our selues woulde haue him: I say, the diuell putteth a furiousnesse into our heades, so as we become starke madde. Then is it a verie awke thing for vs to chastise our selues when we be in such a chafe, and chawe vpon our brydle, and that although God afflxit vs, yet notwithstanding in stead of humbling of our selues, we ceasse not to be on fire againt him.

And therefore it is no teaching of ys, that is to say, it is no seeking of true and good learning, nother is it any right wisdome to stande so in contention with our God. Lo here a poynt which comprehendeth verie much, if we can skill to put it in vre as it shold be. But forasmuch as we be so giuen to toyes and so wilfull withall: God addeth that if we take vpon vs to correct him, wee must answere to this: that is to say, to the things that hee hath alledged afore vs. True it is that some restreyne that saying to this verse, That wee must answere for it if wee pleade agaynst God to correct him: and that forasmuch as we see it cannot bee, and that it is aloug: her apparant: wee must therefore conclude that wee haue no cause to pleade. But if all bee throughly considered, it is certaine that God ment to make heere a generall conclusion of the matters that hee had discoursed heretofore.

So then let vs marke, that when we wil not correct our selues willingly, yea euen by vtter absteyning from all murmuring, so as we keepe our mouthes shet, and go not about to finde fault with God by any meanes: we must bee inforsed to come to it: and when wee haue pleaded our fill, God hath ynoch wherewith to revenge himselfe of our foolish attempts. And why? For hee will arme all his creatures, and hee shall haue as many Aduocates and Proctours of law agaynst vs, as there are birdes of the ayre, fishes of the sea, or beastes of the lande. To be short, a man needeth not to go out of himselfe too bee disproued: for do we not see a wonderfull workeman-schipe of our God in euerie of the tippes of our fingers endes? Is there any of our nayles that witnesseth not that God is so excellent a workemayster, as we ought to be confounded as oft as we thinke vpon the least thing that he sheweth vs there. Nowe then we haue the true and naturall meening of the sentence, where it is sayde, Let him that reproacheth the Almighty answere to this. How beeit, it behoueth vs to marke howe profitable this doctrine is for vs. True it is, that all of vs will at the first sight say, that it is to lewde and heynous a dealing too gó about to reprove God: but in the meane while, who is hee that forbeareth to do it? We will well make countenance to haue that modestie: but yet there is none of vs all but hee starkleth if Gods hande bee anye thing rough to vs, or if things fall not out to our liking. And at whom do such starklings pushe? If wee thought that the afflictions came to vs from Gods hande, and that all the troubles whiche are seene in the worlde are iudgements that procede fr̄ m̄ him: and that euen when the good are persecuted, and the wicked beare sway, it is his will to exercise our pacience by that meanes, and too clenze vs from all our vanities, and (to bee short) to mortifie vs to the worldwarde: [I say] if wee wist this, they that are offended when they see that the Church hath no peace nor rest, and that good men are troden vnder foote and vexed, so es one is pinched with sicknesse, and another with pouertie, and in the meane while the wicked have their full scope, and are free of such inconueniences: I say, if wee knewe this, wee woulde learne to humble our selues. But contrariwise, when wee do so ranckle inwardly as wee cannot holde our selues from murmurung agaynst God, though it bee but euen within our teeth: I pray you do wee not accuse God of crueltie, as though he had no reason too handle vs after that maner? We will not with open mouth say that God is cruell and vniust: no truly, we will not say so: but yet do we tende to that ende.

So then wee see that this is a lesson that belongeth to all men: namely, that if wee take vpon vs too res-

proue God [or to finde fault with him] wee must aunswere to all his workes. But nowe let vs applie all our wittes, and let euerie of vs do what he can: and yet when wee haue debated vpon all the things afore rehearsed, I pray you is it possible for vs to aunswere them, and too replie vnto God in the things that he hath done and disposed in the nature and creation of things? No doubt but we shall finde store ynoch of follie in our selues, according as we see howe men ouershoote themselues, and the diuell also blindest them in such wise, as they sticke not at all to carpe at their maker. But it behoueth vs to come to the pith: Can we (say I) gaine say the order of nature as it is settled? Can wee denie the prouidence of God? Can wee abolishe his power which sheweth it selfe? Can wee say that hee hath not done and disposed all things with wisdome? Againe, can wee displace his justice which appeareth to vs matched with his goodnesse and wisdome? Can wee bring any of these things too passe? No, it is vnpossible. Now then, must not men needes bee blockish, when they will aduaunce themselves after that maner agaynst their maker? But what is to be done? To the intent we may fare the better by this doctrine, wee must begin at this ende: namely to feele how weake we bee to answe the thing that God will put to vs. Seeing then that we bee not able to fur-nishe our selues for it: let vs learne too humble our selues. After what sort? Let vs runne too the foresayde wisdome: which is, to correct our selues. Therefore when men haue looked well to themselves, and considered their owne wantis: there will bee no more cause for them to stande any more vpon their owne reputation, or too sooth themselves, or to beare themselves in hande, that they be able to do this or that: but they shal be faine to fall out with themselves, and to bee ashamed of theyr owne filthinessse. They will hate and abhorre themsel-ues when they be so mortifyed: and it shall behoue them to offer God the sacrifice that is spoken of in the Psalm Psa. 51. d. 19 that is to witte, the sacrifice of a broken heart. VVhen wee bee come to that poynt: then is it true wisdome. Let the despyzers of God ruffle it oute, and let them fling abroade as it were at random as muche as they list: for they doo but worke their owne mischiefe, and in the ende after their mounting vppe, they must tumble downe againe. But let vs bee sure that in humbling our selues we shall haue a good foundation and stay, and wee shalbe vphild by the grace of our God. Thus see you the wisdome and power of our God, the which it behoueth vs to magnifie as in respect of his creatures, sith hee maketh vs to inioy so many benefits in this worlde. Also ye see our wisdome: which is; that in looking vpwarde and downwarde, too beholde the diuersities of his creatures which he sheweth vs there, we must alwayes resort vnto him to bee certified of his prouidence. And seeing hee hath graunted vs the grace to call vs once vnto him: let vs learne to come quietly vnder his hande, and to let him gouerne vs at his pleasure. And in the meane time if hee handle vs after a fashion that seemeth hard and combersome to vs: let vs take al paciently, and pray him to comfort vs, and strengthen vs in such wise in his loue, that howsoeuer we fare, we may not at any time go about to murmur agaynst him.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him that we may be so touched with them, as it may throughly beat vs downe before him, and make vs flee to his onely mercy, as the onely remedie for vs: and that hee not onely forgiue our sinnes past, but also gouerne vs in such wise by his holy spirite henceforth, as oure whole desire may be to walke in his obedience. And so let vs all say, Almighty God heauenly father, &c.

36. Job ansvering the Lorde, sayde:
37. I am of base degree, and what shall I ansvere thee? I vvill lay my hande vpon my mouth.
38. I haue spoken once, and I vvill ansvere no more: yea tvice, but I vvill not turne againe,

The xl. Chapter.

- And the Lorde speaking out of the vvhirlevinde sayde vnto Job, 2. Girde vp thy loynes lyke a valiant man: aske me, and I vvill make thee vnderstande.
 3. VVilt thou disanull my iudgement? vvilt thou condemne me to iustifie thy selfe?
 4. Hast thou an arme like God, or thunderest thou vwith such a voyce?
 5. Cloth thy selfe vwith glorie and maiestie, be excellent, put on thy costly apparell.
 6. Spread out the indignation of thy vvrath, looke vpon all the proude to bring them dovvne.

Iob. 38. 2. 1.
 E haue seene alreadie that God too teach Job right humilitie, spake to him out of a whirlwinde. For al-though his onely voyce ought to be ynoch to astonish vs: yet notwithstanding, thereby hee sheweth yet better how hard we bee, in that hee is faine too vse some further meanes too abate our pride, or else hee shoulde not bring it aboue. True it is, that humilitie proceedeth of Gods spirite, and that suche as are stubbornly bent vntoo naughtinessse, do never submitte themselves willingly vntoo him, though hee giue them sufficient warnings and experience too leade them, and as it were too drue them therewith: but yet for all that, God in vsing the same violent meanes towrdes those whome he governeth by his holy spirite, intendeth therby to shew vs the lewdnesse and frowardnesse that is in our nature, considering that he is faine to thunder and rore, or else we continue blockish still, so as we perceiue not his maiestie & power to submit our selues vnto him. Nowe is shewed vs the frute of the things that God hath done. For wheras hee sayth, that Job graunted himselfe to be of base state, and that it behoued him to holde his peace, and to keepe his mouth shet: therein it appeareth that God magnified not himselfe in vayne, and that his speaking so oute of a VVhirlewinde, was not withoute effect. And why? For lo, Job is tamed as a little lambe, and he goeth not about to repile anie more. Heretofore he had stryued, and taken vpon him to contend with god in mainteyning his owne case: but nowe is all that geere layde a water, and he sayth that hee dares not speake anie more: and whereas hee had gone farre forwarde in the matter, hee leaueth off and forbeareth vtterly. Then let vs learne that if God thunder vehemently agaynst vs, it is for our welfare, although wee thinke it rough at the first sight. God (say I) must bee faine to scare vs: for wee on our side are dull vpon the Spurre, and not easie too bee brought in subiection, and therefore wee haue neede of great violence to abate the pride that is in vs by nature. Howebeit let vs marke also heerewithall, that when God shall haue spoken so, as it were oute of a whirlewinde, there is no excuse for vs, if we follow not 10 Iobs example in acknowledging the wretchednesse that is in vs, too the ende to become altogether quiet. And it is a poyn特 worthie too bee noted. For wee see dayly howe sharpe and rough God is, to the ende to ouermayster men, and to bring them home to him, and yet they be neuer the better for it. If God touche one with sicknesse, and chastize another with pouertie: is it not all one as if hee spake to them out of a whirlewinde? Yea and doth he not then rappe vs with maine blowes vpon our 20 heades? And yet for all that, verie fewe of vs doo amende. VVe shall see that some gnashe their teeth at him, some fal into a furious rage of rayling, and otherfome become wilfull and hard hearted, so as all that God can do to them shal not moue them. Iobs example will condemne such bluntnesse and sturdinessse. And why? For although Job was impacient for a while, and were carryed away with some pang that were in him: yet in the ende he gaue eare to the roring voyce of God, and the whirlewinde strake such a feare into him, as he corrected himselfe and hilde his peace. Euen so must we do: and therefore let vs bethinke our selues to come too conformitie. For after that God hath beene boystous towards vs, and scared vs: if wee continue wilde beastes still: surely wee shall pay verie deere for it. So then, although wee haue overshotte our selues, yet let vs not stande in it. If we cannot yeld our selues vnto God at the fist blowe: yet at leastwise, let vs beware that wee bee not wilfull, when we see that hee presseth vs, and compelleth vs in maner by force to bee obedient to him. Then if God vs 40 his ordinarie meanes, let not vs resist them. For what hope we to gaine by it? In the ende we must be sunken vnder his hande. Thus ye see what we haue to marke in the first place.

But heerewithall let vs learne to beare paciently the stripes that God giueth vs, assuring our selues that that is the meane whereby he intendeth to make vs readie too be subiect vnto him. And sorasimuch as it is good for vs, that of wi<sup>d</sup>e beastes hee shoulde make vs too become as sheepe and lambes: let vs not take such preparatiues too hart, but after Iobs example let vs say, Lorde I see now I am of base state. Truly it should seeme that this saying carrieth no great pith in it: but if we consider well the foolish ouerweening that is in men; we shal see that Job had profited greatly in that he could say, that he was of base state. If it be demaunded of whence wee bee come, [and what we be:] we will answere, that we be wretched creatures, taken out of the earth, so frayle as it is pitie to see, and fraught with store of infirmityes. VVee will confess these things with our mouth, but yet in the meane while wee will not ceasse to esteeme of our selues: wee forget from whence wee came, and whither wee must returne, and what our present state is: none of this commeth too our minde. Men then are (as ye woulde say) drunken, by bearing themselves in hande that they bee muche worth, and they challenge a worthinesse to them through fantasticall imagination. And therefore whensoeuer a nienan doth truly and vnfeynedly knowe howe to despise himselfe, and that he hath not aught in him wherfore he should aduaunce himselfe: it is verie much, yea it is great wisedome. And let vs marke well, that we shall neuer come to such reason, till we bee [throughly] touched with the Maiestie and glorie of God. For so long as men looke one vpon another, they take occasion too esteeme of themselves, saying: Am not I as well too bee lyked as hee or hee? This comparison then which men make one with another, blindeth them, and maketh them to thinke alwayes that they be I wote not what. But when we come vnto God, and he sheweth himselfe as he is: all this ouerweening of ours must bee faine to vanish away, and to disperse and come to nothing. And so wee haue to beseeche God to make vs perceyue his glorie, too the ende wee may enter into the sayde examination of our owne wretchednesse, and disable our selues in such wise, as none of vs may beguile himselfe any more by hi. owne foolish ymaginacion. And that also is the cause why Abraham (when God appeared to him) sayde, Alas, I am but dust and ashes. VVe will wellynough say so (in a maner all of vs) though God be farre out of our minde, & that we thinke not at all of him: howbeit, all is but hypocrisie and feinednesse, and we neuer do it hartily and earnestly till we haue felt what God is? And therefore let vs marke well the order that is set downe heere: which is, that after God had spoken to Job out of the whirlewinde, Job confesseth himselfe to be nothing, and that hee ought not to be so bold as to speake one way or other. Howebeit let vs bethinke vs well also, that whensoeuer God is so fauorable as to appere to vs, wee must not bee so foolish as too make any account of our selues or of our vertues. It is no maruell though the wretched Papists imagine a freewill, and ground the obteyning of Paradise vpon mens owne meritis, weening too make God their detter: And why? For they never were acquainted with the light of the Gospell, which bewrayeth mennen wantes, inasmuch as God vttereth his owne righteousnesse there. These sible soules then, neuer hauing felt what the power of God is, do abuse themselves with such deceytes. But as for vs, seeing that God telleth vs howe perfect his righteousnesse is, and therewithall discouereth our filthinessse, and sheweth vs that there is nothing but abomination in vs: wee must no more bee tyed too suche dotages, but vtterly disable our selues, that all pride may bee beaten downe in vs, and our God bee glorified. Those therefore that haue beene taught purely in the Gospell, must come too this poyn特 of wisedome, of vtter disabling themselves. And that is the cause why wee saye, that sayth bringeth menne too loftinessse. For after as God reuealeth his goodness vntoo vs, so must wee assure our selues, that his dooing so is by cause there is nothing but cursednesse in vs, and that wee shoulde bee vtterly vndone and forlorne, were it not that hee vouchsafeth too succour vs by his mercie. And so the doctrine of the Gospell bringeth vs to the meeldnesse of vtter abacing and disabling our selues in all things.

Nowe heerewithall Job sayeth, that he will lay his bandes vpon his mouth, and whereas he bath shoken once, bee will not fall to it againe: and that whereas he bath spoken twice, bee will do so no more. VVhereas he sayth he will lay his hande 60 vpon his mouth, it is a signe & protestation that he will not proceed any further: & that maner of speech is rife in the scripture. And it serueth to do vs to understande, that wee must restraine our foolish appetites, & that when our flesh tickleth vs to ipeake, we must resist it, as if it were by putting a muzzle or a bridle vpon our mouthes to refreyne them. If a man were so wise of himselfe as hee woulde not be tempted too speake amisse, hee shoulde not neede too laye his hande vpon his mouth, for hee woulde refreyne refrayne of his owne accord, and hee shalld neithir stoppe nor barre. But nowe on the contrarie part, whereas it is sayde that we must lay our hande vpon our mouth: it is to do vs to wit, that we haue to fight against our fonde lustes and lykings, which do continually make vs to hastie in speaking, insomuch that our tongue shall still be sharpe sette to cast forth some thing or other that is nought worth, agaynst God. Heere then we bee warned of a vice that is great, wicked and hurtfull: which is, that we will needes be sharpe witted in pleading agaynst God, and set forth our selues with a brauerie, to the end to cloke our wantes with vaine excuses. Ye see then that the thing whervnto me tend & are wholly inclined, is that they woulde faine cloke themselues by hypocrisie, and rather condemne God, than suffer themselues too bee brought to reason, so as they will alwayes haue some lie or startinghole, yea and in the ende fall to spewyng ous of blasphemies. For when our tongue is venomous and altogether soked in lying and falsehooде: at the last it bursteth out [euē] against God. Sith we know this, haue we not good cause to mislike of our selues? And therefore whensoeuer we heare this maner of speech, that the holy men layde their hande vpon their mouth: let vs remember howe forwarde we bee to speake amisse. And specially when wee compare our selues with Job, if hee could not holde his peace without streyning of himselfe: alas, what shall we do? For we come farre short of profiting so much as he did. Ye see then that as touching the first poynt, men ought alwayes too mistrust themselues, whē they haue occasion to speake, knowing welthat their nature doth continually prouoke the to speake amisse, & that their tung is nothing else but a warehouse of leasing & hipocrisie, and that in the end it appeareth that there is nothing but poysen according as it is said in the Psalme, that the poysen of Aspes is vnder the tungs of those that are vnreformed. Vntil such time as god hath made cleane our mouthes, they can skill to viter nothing but cursednesse & bitternes. And therfore let vs learn hereby to refrayne our selues, even with a hatred towarde the euill that we haue heretoo much accustomed to, and to frame our selues to the meeldnesse and obedientnesse that are shewed vs heere by the holy Ghost. For inasmuch as we be so forward to speake amisse: it standeth vs in hand to indeuer to amend suche faultiness. And out of doubt it is not ynochough too haue acknowledged it, no nor too haue condemned it: but it behoueth vs also too redresse it. Did Job then lay his hande vpon his mouth? Haue the other holye Prophetes done as muche? Let vs follow them in so docing: that is to wit, whensoeuer we be prouoked to grudge agaynst God, though we haue never so fine shifstes to disguise the truth, and too turne it into a lie: let vs resist such lewdnesse, and fight agaynst such vngaciousnesse, seeing it is so vntowarde and condemned of God. And howe shall wee do that? By laying our hand vpon our mouth, that is to say, by putting a stop in our owne way: for it behoueth vs to brydle our selues as wilde beastes.

Therfore let every man looke neerely to himself: and if we happen to be afflicted, or to be crossed with some ouerhward thing, so as one of vs fretteth, another chafeth, and the thirde is so ranckled with poysen, as we be prouoked to speake amisse: let vs restrayn our selues. It were good wee did so (will some man say) but I finde it verie hard for me, and I do alwayes incline to the other syde. Yea, but it is ynochough if wee resist agaynst it. Not that wee bee not worthie to be condemned though we ouercome it: (for the verie onely ymaginacion and conceyuing of it in oure thought, is wicked and sinfull before God:) but for that hee of his infinite goodness taketh it in good worth, when hee seeth that the euill lyketh vs not, but that wee labour to represso it. God then perceyuing vs to haue that inclynation, fayleth not to accept vs. VVherefore seeing hee is so gracious towarde vs: wee ought to haue so much the more courage to stoppe the wicked woordes, blasphemies, and moylings, that might burst out agaynst God. It is sayde that Job, hauing spoken once, leaueth off: yes and that seeing hee had spoken twice, bee woulde do so no more. VVherby he betokeneth first of all, that if wee haue gone too farre in speaking amisse, we must not therefore harden our selues as we see many doo, who when they haue once overshotte themselues and raunged farre out of square, wil not be brought backe againe, but play double or quit as they say. VVee must not do so: for although the euill be of continuance, and wee haue followed it to farre alreadie: yet must wee turne heade so soone as God warneth vs of it. Therefore let not men play the bedlems when they haue done amisse a long time togither, and doubled their euill doing: and when they haue cast forth a foolish heorde unadvisedly, and clapped two or three mo in the necke of it, let them not therefore growe spyefull agaynst God: but let them condemnē themselues double and treble, and therupon returne agayne into the right way. Thus ye see that the thing which wee haue too marke in this streyn, is that although we haue cōtinued to offend God a long time, it is neuē out of season for vs to turne a new leafe. The seconde poynt is, that we must not flatter our selues though we haue many occasions to do it, as we see of Job heere, who had many fayre colours: he alledged not some one reason alone for the maintenance of hys case: he had great store, and doubled his prooves in diverse sortes, insomuch that hee seemed to haue had matter ynough: yee woulde haue sayde that hee had beeene fully perswaded of it, and that hee had looked determinately to haue gone away with the victorie, and that hee had no sooner set downe one article, but he was able to haue come to another: and yet notwithstanding, nowe he giueth ouer all his replyes, and all the goodly likelyhoodes that he had to plead with agaynst God. VVhereas I haue spoken once or twice, (sayeth hee) I renounce it euery whit, and I will no more do so. Heereby we be taught (as I sayde) that although wee had neuē so many faire clokings, and thought our selues to haue verie good reasons and well grounded to mainteyne our case: they bee nothing worth, all must fall to the ground. And therefore let vs not any more flatter our selues in our fondnesse: for in the ende we must be faine to come to that which hath beeene treated of heretofore: namely that God will haue a thousand articles for one. Then let vs keepe vs from entering into contention with him, and also let vs stoutly withstande all the fancies which the diuell putteth intoo our heade. If hee go aboute to make vs chafe agaynst God, or if he tempt vs, and set vs on fire with grudging and stubbornnesse: let all this be thrust downe, though wee had whole hundreds of replyes that might seeme fayre and good.

This done, it is sayde that God began yet once againe to speake out of the whirlewinde, saying vnto Job, Gyrdē vp thy lyones lyke a man, whiche saying wee haue hearde heretofore. Nowe a man might thinke it straunge that God shoulde still speake terribly vntoo Job, and as it were desie him, and mocke at his presumptuousnesse: seeing hee was vtterly caste downe in himselfe. But heereby a man may see, that when we be humbled, there is yet still some remanant of pryde hidden in vs, which appeareth not but before God, and hee must bee fayne to purge vs of it. It is certaine that when Job confessed himself to be a wretched creature, and a man of no value, he vseth no feynednesse, but spake as his heart gaue him. Ye see then, that hee was fully tamed and come too a meeke and humble minde, desyring to be wholy obedient vnto God, and yet for all that, he needed to bee chasteized still, and to be better schooled, to the end he might acknowledge himselfe to bee as he was, and therewithal yelde all glorie and prayse vnto God. And why so? Because (as I sayde) there is always some backnooke: and although men be brought vnto God, and be desirous too frame themselues to Gods will: yet are they not throughly clesed of all pride at the first, but God perceyeth that there is still some secrete disease behinde, the which it behoueth him too amende. Lo heere a verie notable text. For haue wee once slightly confessed that Gods afflictiong of vs is rightfull, and acknowledged our sinnes: wee woondre that he shoulde go forwarde still in handling vs roughly. It will make vs to say, howe now? Ought God to be so rigorous towardes mee? For he knoweth that I haue humbled my selfe: and whereas I haue done amisse, I haue acknowledged my faultes, yea euen my faultes, I confess them, I accuse my selfe of them. Is not that ynough for him? VVhat would he haue more? It seemeth then to vs, that God after a sort doth vs wrong, if hee strike vs still when wee haue once in a woord or twaine confessed our selues to be sinners. Yea? But let vs looke at Job: he had not onely confessed himselfe to bee a man of no value, but also thought it [with his heart,] and had restreyned himselfe from replying any more, and was striken in feare with the glorie of god that had appeared vnto him: and yet notwithstanding he needed still too haue God to thunder at him, and to shewe himselfe terrible too him in a whirlwinde to make him more astrayd. If Job hauing bin throwne downe after that sort, had neede too bee put in feare still, to the ende hee might knowe himselfe better, and feele his owne wretchednesse, & forget al rebelliousnesse: alas what had we need of? And yet notwithstanding ye shall see a number, which haue nothing in them but hipocrisie, and yea very shamelesnesse, who wring their mouth aside too say, It is true that I haue done amisse. And when they haue once said that word, as it were but in way of scorne & mockerie: if men accept them not in posthast as righteous, and handle them not verie nicely: it seemeth to the that they bee vnreasonably dealt with. But (as I sayde afore) although wee haue felt our sinnes yea euen earnestly, and confessed them without feyning, and desired harteily that God shoulde governe vs, and haue all dominion ouer vs: yet dooth it not followe but that there is some naughtiness lurking still behinde, though it bee not knowne of. Truly (to our owne seeming) there is no pride in vs, because we see it not presently: but within a day or two it woulde bee seene if God remedied it not. And therefore let vs not thinke it straunge, that God shoulde speake vnto vs in a whirlwinde as in a thunder, euen when he shal haue scourged vs till we can no more. Let vs not wonder though God continue to speake vntoo vs so, for hee knoweth good cause why too do it. And although we perceyue no faultes in vs, yet let vs not ceasse to condemne our selues. Yea and although there were none at all in vs [presently:] yet doth God know that we might fall into them to day or too morowe, yea euen euerie minute of an houre: and [therefore] God in chasteizing vs, vseth a preservative medicine. VVherefore let vs beare paciently the afflictions that God sendeth vs, assuring our selues that by that meanes he procureth and furthereth our welfare. But nowe let vs come to the matter that God handlith here. First of all, hee defyeth Job in saying, Gyrde vp thy loynes lyke a lustie stowte fellowe.

True it is, that in the Hebrewe there is but the one woordeman: howbeit the same importeth as muche as a valiant, hardie, stout, or courageous man. His meining then is, Shewe all thy valiantnesse. And therein we see that God speaketh not onely to the person of Job: but also to all mankinde without exception: as if he should say, let men bring all the force that they can, let them put themselues in as good array as they list, and let them come with all their furniture: and what shall they gaine agaynst mee? This therefore is as a defiance that God maketh both to great and small to shewe that they cannot bring any power that shall be able to match his: and that is the first poynt. Howbeit it seemeth that this is verie commonly knowne: for there is no man but hee woulde bee adrad, to take vpon him to match himselfe with God. If it were demaunded of them whether it were their intent to mount so high, as to dispossesse God of his superioritie ouer them: they woulde aunswere, no I trowe: were we not worse than madde then? But yet notwithstanding, in carping agaynst him wee do it. If wee justifie our selues and excuse our faultes, is it not a spying of God? Is it not a warring agaynst him? Therefore when we enter so into battell with him, wee beare our selues in hande, that wee bee able to make our part good, according as in verie deede if a man bee not afraide of Gods Maiestie, hee will presume to compasse the things that hee taketh in hande, and hee will not by anie meanes bee hilde backe. Then if our rashnesse do carie vs so farre away as to fight agaynst God: it is a token that wee imagine there is as great power in our selues as in him.

And therefore not without cause doth God defie vs heere everyone of vs both great and small, shewing that it is a madnesse in vs too bid him battell after that sort, and that wee shall never bring our enterprise about. And let vs marke well, that when God sayeth, Gyrde vp thy loynes lyke a man: therein he declareth, that our presuming so vpon our owne strengthes, is to no purpose. VVhat maketh vs so bolde as to presume to bee righteous, and to desire too seeme wise: but that wee surmize the thing that is not? If wee were not overtaken with that fonde opinion that there is some valour in vs: wee would never be so bold as to encounter after that fashion with God. Therefore here is expresse mention made of mens power and strength, to the end to shew that all that they weene themselues to haue, is but smoke: and that they may wel make theselues beleue that they be strong, but yet God knoweth and taketh them to be as they be. Herewithall he sheweth that he will haue no counterfeit humilitie, as we see the woon of many men is, which do but lie when they pretend humilitie before God: that is to say, they confess the thing with their mouth, which they thinke not with their hart. Among the Papists there is much preaching of humility: but yet for al their saying they be but wretched sinners, they cease not too haue a cleane contrarie meining: which is, that they deserue well before God, and that although they bee sinners, yet they haue their satisfaccons to redeeme themselues out. Ye see then that the Papists are swolne with pride like toades, and yet in the meane while pretend to condemne themselues always as guiltie before God. Yea and what a number are there euen among vs, which are ful fraught after that maner with pride? To bee short, men cannot shew any signes of humilitie but in way of mockage, because they beleue themselues to be of some valour. For this cause God declareth heere, that when wee haue throughly tryed all our owne strength, and well considered what is in vs: we shall finde in the ende that all is nothing, and that it is not for vs too arme and apparell our selues any more, to encounter agaynst him. Ye see then that the thing which wee haue to marke in effect, is that our Lord bereueth vs not of the things which we haue, to the ende too haue any aduantage of vs: for when wee haue well looked about vs, let vs but onely consider what maner of ones we be: and then shal we wel see that there is neither power nor strength in vs wherewith too bende our selues agaist him. Whereas mention is made of girding vp the loynes: it is spoken after the maner of that time, and of that countrey also, bycause men went in long garments: and when they did set forth eyther too battell, or to journey, they gyrded vp their loynes to weeld theselues the better. God the shew eth here, that when me haue done al that they can, in the end they shalbe cōfounded. And therefore let vs not attempt to vaunt our selues, for it shall always but argue the more foolish pride in vs. But let vs win our spurres by condemning our selues, as which is the onely meane for vs to get favour in Gods sight, according as it is sayde that we shall bee quitt at his hand, if we leaue to condemne our selues. But if through pride we fall to iustling against his hand which is to strog for vs: wee muste needes bee crushed and broken too peeces vnder it, and seele that it is to heauie a load for vs to beare. Nowe it is sayde further, VVilt thou ouerthrowe my iudgements, and condemne me to iustifie thy selfe? If thou intend to do so, se [first] if thou beest able to leate downe all the proude folke in the wорlde. Here God entereth into the case which he hath to pleade agaynst lob: that is to wit, whether of them shall be more righteous: Not that lobs intent was to blasphem God so lewdly, as I haue sayde afore: for hee would rather haue dyed a hundred thousande times, than to haue conceyued so cursed a thought, as to purpose to condemne God. But yet for al that, whosoever a man will iustifie himselfe, or hath that imagination running in his head: he must needs condemne God: and if he will needes mainteyne his owne case, he must needes ouerthrow the judgement of God: This matter hath beene layd forth afore: neuerthelesse it must needs be brought to remembrance againe, and it is no superfluous repetition which the holy Ghost setteth downe heere. Therefore let vs marke well, that whosoever a man undertaketh too mainteyne his owne case as rightfull: his meening is too condemne God, howbeit not directly. And although he intende it not of set purpose in his heart: yet dooith hee it [in effect.] VVhy so? For God cannot bee iust, and a judge also, vntill wee be all damnable.

So long as men haue any righteousness in themselves, howe shall God be their Judge? But he condemneth vs all at once: nowe if there bee righteousness in vs, then doth hee vs wrong. Therefore must all our owne righteousness be cast downe: that is too say, wee must acknowledge that there is nothing but iniquitie in vs, and that we haue not one sparke of vertue in vs that is allowable, but all is starke filthinesse, dung, and infection. Til we be come to that point, god cannot be ludge of the worlde. And therefore whosoever will mainteyne his owne quarell, and make himselfe and othermen belieue that hee is pure and innocent: ouerthroweth gods judgement to the uttermost of his power, and therewithall condemmeth him as cruell. It is sayde that too the ende that God may bee righteous, all mouthes must bee stopped, and all the worlde confesse themselues indaugered vnto God. These are Sainct Pavles wordes in the thirde too the Romanes. Sith it is so: on the contrarie part there shall bee no more righteousness in God, but hee shall bee viterly defeated of it, if wee on our side, haue our mouthes open, so as we may come too replie agayste him, and too pleade our owne case. VVee see then that it is not for naught sayde heere vnto lob, that hee ment too ouerthrowe Gods judgement, and to condemne him in iustifying himselfe. Now if this befell vnto lob, who had an angelicall holynesse, and did always euuen in the middes of his temptations protest himselfe willing too give the glorie vnto God, yea and gaue it him without feyning: alas, what shall become of vs who are so frayle? Haue wee beeene trayned long aforhande in the feare of God as he was? Haue we had practise of it? Haue wee giuen our selues too it? Haue wee such knowledge as was giuen vnto him? Haue we such humilitie? Alas we bee farre wide. And yet notwithstanding we see he ouershorte himselfe, yea euuen so faire as to condemne God by clearing himselfe. Then let vs consider what our murmurings are, when God layeth any affliction vpon vs. Howe go we to worke? Like wood beastes: our passions are so headie as it is pitie too see. And therefore it may rightly bee layde too our charge that wee labour to ouerthrowe Gods iustice, too the intent he might no more be judge of the worlde, and that we condemne him in going about to mainteyne our owne righteousness. This ought to teache vs well too holde our selues short as oft as wee intende to pleade agaynst God, and thinke our selues too haue a good case. [It ought to make vs say thus in our heartes: ] Alas who am I, that I shoulde fall to exalting of my selfe agaynst him that hath made and fashioned me? Or that I shoulde intende to rob him of his righteousness? It cannot bee but that God hathe all perfection of righteousness in himselfe. And therefore if I ouershoot my selfe after that sort in striuing agaynst him, must hee not confound me, and must not the same needes turne to my destruction? Lo what ought to holde vs in awe. Therefore whosoever we happen to grudge agaynst God, and cannot recyue afflictions at his hande: let vs enter into our owne minde, and consider with our selues that it is all one as if we woulde bereue God of his righteousness, and put him off from beeing anie more ludge of the worlde. And seeing it is so: let vs keepe oure selues from suche blasphemies, and abhorre too come therewithal: knowing that if wee bee once entered into it, it is as a deepe Dungeon wherout of it will bee harde for vs to get out againe. Then let vs not lift vp our selues any more against God, but rather let vs in all cases humble our selues too him. Lohowe we ought to do. The residue shall be reserved till to morow morning.

Nowe let vs fall downe before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him too make vs feele them better than wee haue hitherto done, and that we may learne more and more to glorifie him, yea euuen in such wise as we may be viterly throwne downe, knowing that there is nothing but all wickednesse and cussednesse in vs: and that in glorifying him, wee on our syde may haue our mouthes shette as in respect of presuming any thing, and not be carryed away by the example of the proude, which thinke themselues to bee as much rule as God, but learne to knowe what wee be, to the ende we may yeeld our selues wholy subiect too his Maiestie, that by that meanes hee may acknowledge vs and auowe vs for his people, and wee on our part consider howe muche wee bee bovrde vntoo him. That it may please him too graunt this grace, not onely to vs, but also to all people and Nations of the earth, &c.

Ec sawe yesterday, that when men chafe and frette in their aduersities, they go to law with God, intending to condemne him by iustifying themselves.

For although a man speake it not with his mouth : yet in verie

ende if hee go about to cleere himselfe, he condemneth God.

And who shall haue the better ende of the staffe ? That is the cause why it is sayde, that when we haue layd our strength together, it shall be nothing, neyther shall we ever be able to match him that hath created vs, and holdeth all things in his hande.

And now it is shewed vnto vs what we bee in respect of God, to the ende to make vs lay away all our crowing at him. And in good sooth, the loking of men to their own state, and their considering therwihal what the glorie and maiestie of God are, is the thing that should bring them vnto lowlinesse.

For if men looke but singly vpon themselves, they will not leauue for that, to presume and to lift vp themselves still vnto some vaine trust. But when they lift vp their eies aloft, and beholde God, and afterward come downe to themselves : then are their combes quit cutte.

Therefore it is sayde, Is thine arme like the arme of God ? or rarest thou with such a roye as he doth ? Now if a man looke vpō his own arme, yea or vpon all the force of the world:

what shall he find in comparison of the infinte power that beareth sway ouer all ? True it is (as I haue sayd alredie) that men are foolish ynoch to think their own strength great, so long as they looke no further. But as soone as

God sheweth himselfe, all other things must needes be as it were brought too nothing. And too the end that this thing may touch vs the better, Job is willed to cloth him*selfe with glorie, power, and maiestie.* After the same maner Psal.104.4. speaketh the Scripture of God. And (as the thing it selfe sheweth) what else is the heauen than an imperall or kingly robe of God, so as we be inforced too a reverent-nesse by the beholding of his creatures ? For there is not any thing which serueth not to set forth the maiestie of God, to the end that we should honor it as it becommeth vs, and as it deserueth. But now let vs go seeke out the like apparellings : who shall be either the Tayler [to make them] or the imbroderer [to decke them ?] VVhere shall we finde such stuffe, that we may clothe our selues with the like glorie that God is clothed ? Needes then must men bee out of their wittes, when they will bee so blinde and forgetfull, as too grudge at God, and to take part against him, and to prouoke him against themselues. 'Do they not deserue an horrible condemnation ? Yee see then that the thing which we haue to marke heere in effect, is that whereas mention is made of Gods arme, we haue an exposition of it heere. As howe ? Gods arme of it selfe is inuisible : not that hee hath anye armes or handes : but in speaking so, we meene his whole beeing. God then in himselfe is vknowne vnto vs : howebeit, he sheweth himselfe in his woorkes, insomuch that the heauen (as I sayde) is his garment. Somtime it is termed his seate, but therewithall it is sayd also, that it is a visible shape of his maiestie. As much is too bee sayde of the Earth. Too bee short, both aboue and beneath God sheweth himselfe to vs, not in his beeing (as I said afore) but in the things which we are able to comprehend, insomuch that they are a witnesse too vs that there is an infinite Maiestie in God. And therefore let vs learne, that although we cannot attaine too mounte so highe as too know God : yet notwithstanding, forasmuch as he leaueth vs not without witnesse, but sheweth himselfe to vs as much as is for our besy bofe : let vs learne (I say) to behold him euuen in his creatures, and to applie all thingsto this vse, namely that wee may perceyue how there is one God which hath made & doth gouerne all things. Moreover astouching that which is sayde of the roring voyce : True it is that men will cry out too lowde, according as wee see howe they whet their tonges to blasphemie and spye God. It is sayde in the Psalme, that the wicked Psa.73.b.9. thinke it not inough for them to be proude among men, and to accuse one falsely, and to defie another, and too worke treasons and wicked practises : but they also cast vp their groynes agaynst heauen, and assault God himselfe : and theyr prude is so greate, that they dare busle agaynst the Maiestie of God. Nowe then yee see that men rore, but yet will God make them holde their peace wellynough if hee list. And after what maner ? VVee haue scene heeretofore (according also as it is sayde in the Psalme) that the Thunder is Gods voyce.

Then sith the Thunder maketh the hillies too rore, so as the ayre is after a sort clouen asunder, the Earth quaketh, Trees are torne vp, and the Rockes are shaken: I say when wee heare all this, whiche of vs shall presume anie more to speake agaynst God: For he hath a voyce that can welynough put vs to silence. Let vs crie alowde with full throte, yet will God be heard spite of our teeth, and all our moylings must fall to the ground. Furthermore, although God thundre not after such a fashyon, yet must he needes stoppe all our mouthes in shewing vs his will, and make all our outcryes to be layd downe. He needeth not to come downe from heauen to doo it, nor to shewe himselfe heere in visible shape: but like as hee made all things by his woord, and all things are vphilde by the power therof: so will hee by the same cause vs to folter, not only in our tongues, but also in our wits and in all our powers. God then hath diuerse maners of speaking, whereby he putteth men so to silence, that if they would carpe agaynst him, they shall haue no audience: and therfore let vs learne to holde our peace willingly, and too put in vre yesterdayes lesson: which was to lay our hand vpon our mouth (that is to say, to resist the diuelishnes of our pride, notwithstanding that naturally we be bold to aduance our selues against God) and therewithall learne to giue glorie 20 simlie vnto God, in confessing that there is nothing but wretchednes in our selues. VVhe we be once so contouned with our owne good will: Gods voice will not onely not be dreadful any more vnto vs: but also it wil cheere vs vp, and he wil opē our mouth that we may speake freely. VVherof commeth it that the faithfull can vaunt th̄selues against the diuell & despise death? VVherof cometh that boldnes of ours, that we cā cal vpō god as our father, & protest our selues to be his childrē: It is because we hild our mouthes shet when wee were condemned, and haue 30 learned that we be nothing but vanitie. Therfore when we haue our mouthes shet after that sort, so as we chalēge not any thing to our selues, ne maintein our own quarel, but passe vnder condemnation willingly: God of his infinit goodness giueth vs libertie to speak, not only among men, but also before him, & to call vpon him frankly, not doubting but that our voice is caried vp to his throne by his Angels, & there both heard and accepted. Ye see then that the things which they gaine that simlie hold their peace to graunt that all glorie belongeth vnto God, & to 40 disable themselues vitterly: is that they haue their mouthes opened, as hath bin declared. But contrariwise, all they that will be talkative, and pufse vp themselues with their pride too maintaine their owne righteousnesse, must bee faine to feele how terrible Gods voyce is, and besides that, let them crie out as much as they list, yet will God spye of their teeth breake them in peeces, and then shall all their crying ceasse and vanishe away. And howe shall that bee done? For he hath an ouerterrible voyce. Nowe after the speaking of this: there is also another reason alledged to humble men withall: which is, that God defyeth them, to wit, whether they can destroy the prowde with a looke: or whether they can roote out all the wicked. If they can do that: then shewe they themselues, that they haue somewhat whereof to boast. But if they cannot: bowe dare they commence any quarell agaynst God? Heere is still the same comparison that I haue touched: which is, that when we knowe what God is, and what his nature and office are: wee must fall to considering of our selues on the other side, too the ende the same may give the greater glosse, both to Gods incomprehensible glorie, and also too the manifolde miseries that are in our selues. To bee short, we be done too understande in this Text, that it belongeth too God too destroy the prowde with his onely looke, and to roote out the wicked vitterly, insomuch that when they shall seeme too haue their full scope, and to be in their cheefe ruffe: then shall they be swēpt away cleane from the earth. God chalengeth this to himselfe. But nowe, can men doo the like? Haue wee a looke that is able to destroy our enimies, and specially to make cleane riddaunce of the wicked? Furthermore, let vs marke heere, that God speaketh not of an absolute or lawlesse power (as I haue sayde erst) but of a power that is matched with rightfulness. And that is the cause why mention is made purposely of the prowde and wicked sort.

Therefore let vs marke well these two things: namely, that God doth here magnifie himselfe, forasmuch as hee can with his onely looke ouerthrow and destroy the wicked: & yet notwithstanding spareth his creatures, and vttereth not his sayd power but vpon the prowde and the wicked. God then is almighty: but yet howsoeuer the worlde go, he will haue his righteousnesse knowne to go with it, and he will haue men to confesse (according as the thing iselfe sheweth) that his so doing is to vanquish the affections and lustes of all such as yeelde and submitte themselues to his maiestie: and that on the contrarie part, he thundreth vpon al such as presume to much vpon themselues, and becomme prowde, and vse replying and encountering with God, too make him their mortall enimie. And as we haue spoken of Gods voyce before, so must wee nowe speake of his looke or countenance. The faithful beseech God to shew th̄ his countenance: for that is the thing wherein consisteth all our ioy, happinesse, and welfare, according as it is sayde in the Psalme, Lord shew Psa. 80.4. b. 8.4.20. vs thy countenance and we shalbe safe. That is all our welfare, that is al our contention, that is al that we can wish. VVhat is the thing then that is most to be desired of vs? It is Gods countenance: like as contrariwise when he turneth his backe vpon vs, and hydeth himselfe from vs, we must needs be as forlorne and out of heart: for there is not any thing wherein a man may finde rest: but onely in knowing that God hath a care of him. So long then as God vouchsafeth too haue his eye vpon vs, wee haue whereof to be glad, for we be sure that he will mainteine vs, and that wee shall not neede too bee afraide of anie thing. But if God forget vs: we be at our wittes ende, and not without good cause. For we be as it were left vp to Satan to pray vpon, and an hundred thousand deathes beset vs rounde about, & there is no remedie for vs. VVee see then that Gods looke is a thing to be wished for, specially if we come to him with all humblenesse, and with a desirousnesse and true intent to stick vnto him. But if we looke aloft as it is sayde in another place, and haue a forehead of brasse, and be puffed vp to vaunt our selues before God, as it were in spite of him: then must he be faine to looke vppon vs with another maner of countenance, which shall not serue too cheere vs vp, but to destroy vs vitterly. Then needeth there no more but one looke of God too rid all men quite and cleane out of the worlde, when they cast a prowde looke against him. And therefore let vs learne that which is sayde heere, namely that Gods looking vppon the prowde sort is to destroy them vitterly. And why? Because that they haue had a wicked looke. VVherefore let vs cast downe our heades, and go vnto God to do him obeysance: & therewithal let vs pray him to lighten our eyes, that we may seeke him as our father, and he looke vpon vs in such wise, as we may haue thereby all perfectnesse of ioy and true contentation to rest our selues vpon. But by the way it is shewed vs in this streyne, that (as the Scripture speaketh oftentymes) it is Psa 18.6.28 Gods office to ouerthrow such as aduaunce themselues, Mat. 23.4.12 according as it is sayde that who souuer exalteth himself Luk. 14.5.11 shall be brought lowe. G. 18.6.14.

Then let vs marke well, that God is at deadly & vnreconciliable fode with al such as kepe not within their boouds

Psa. 37. b. 9. ne acknowledge their own slendernes by humbling the selues, but will needs make themselues greate men, so as God must be sayne to incouter them, and they two must iustle together. VVere this throngly well considered, wee should not neede so many sermons to bring vs to lowelennesse. For is it not a horrible thing, that woormes of the earth should come of set purpose too fight against God? But yet so it is, that all such as presume of themselues, all such as think they be of anye valour at al, all such as beare themselues in had that they be eyther wyse, or vertuouse to or ryghtuouse: al such (say I) do make warre against God. Though they speake it not with their mouth: yet is it all one: for so it is in verie deede: and therfore God telleth vs that a man cannot iustifie him self, but that in so doing he assateth heauen. Now then, if we were throughly per-suaded of this doctrine, that all proud folkes are Gods enimies and prouoke his wrath against themselues: wee would walk in another maner of meeldnesse and simplicite than we do. But what? It seemeth to vs that God ought to shrink away to make vs roome. Marke I pray 20 you how men besorte themselues. Neverthelesse if wee would nowadayes herken to this doctrine to frame our selues therafter: wee should at length perceiue by expe-rience, that it is not for nought sayd, That the countenance of the Lord is upon the lofty ones, too roote them out of the world, and that none but the meeke ones haue the euer-lasting heritage. Howbeit to the intent we may profit the more by this lesson, let vs marke well who be the proud ones. For the prude is not always knowne vnto men too condemne it: but whosoeuer trusteth in his owne strenght, 30 whosoeuer presumeth vpon his owne ryghtuosenesse or wisdome, whosoeuer setteth himselfe in his owne greatnessse and credit, and (to bee short) whosoeuer [wilfully] overpasseth his bounds [in any thing:] the same is a proud bodie before God. And how is it that men ouerpasse their bounds? Euen when they thinke them-selues to haue any spark of goodnessse of themselues. For vntill such tyme as we bee (as yee would say) quyte and cleane emptied: there is nother meeknesse nor meeldnesse in vs. Furthermore when God shall haue giuen vs 40 any grace and bestowed the giftes of his holie spirit vpon vs: let not the same make vs to set vp our bristles against him to offend him. If we haue a good and sharp vnder-standing, the same commeth not of our owne moother wit: and therfore we must not take occasion to exalt our selues for it: for we bee so much the more bound vntoo God. Again, let him that is greatest, indeuer to serue the smallest, and let him not despize those whom God hath inhonored, by setting them in like degree with him. Then if we imagin that there is any thing in vs, or if we be puf-fed vp with prude to disdeyne our neyghbours by reason of Gods gracieuse gifts: it is a presumptuousnesse that offendeth God and prouoketh his vengeance against vs. VVhat is to be doone then? If wee will not haue God against vs, let vs learn to distrust the things that are in our-selues, and not conceyue any presumption that may lift vs vp, but (to be short at one woord) let vs say, wee be no-thing. Again, if God aduaunce vs in honor aboue other men, or if he indue vs with any vertues: let vs acknow-ledge the same to come of him. And furthermore let vs be louing, and forbear to do our neyghbours wrong, or to despise such as are Gods children as well as wee, or at leastwise are created of one selfsame likenesse and nature with vs. Thus much concerning that it is sayd, that it is Gods office too beste done the pride of all men with his looke. And he addeth therunto the wicked, to shewe that he is an enemie to all wicked folk in generall. Howbeit forasmuchas it can hardly bee auoyded that prude and lofti-

Ab. 2. 2. 4. 5 nesse should not beare sway, forasmuchas the wicked sort rushe foorth into all euill, as who bee despysers of God: therfore heere is a more expresse and long discourse of these lofty ones, which forget themselues and beleue, that they bee able to woork woonders of their owne power. For if men were not so proud as to despysse God: surely they would hold themselues still, and not giue the brydle so to their lustes. Needes therefore must prude carye vs away, when we vse violence and outrage towards our neyghbours, for when we deuour one, and fleece another of all his goods, and shewe all the spye and malice that we can: it is a token that there is no feare of God in vs, and that we know not so much as that we be mortall men. For he that knowes how he hath but as a iourney to passe through this world, and that his lyfe is brittle and transitorie: will certainly brydle himself, if it were but euē in that only one respect. And therefore needs must men be bewitched, and vtterly ignorant what themselues are, and what their state is, when they ouer-shoote themselues. And verely that is the cause why the Prophet Abacuck (when he sayeth that the rightuorse man shall liue by faith) auoucheth on the contrarie part, that all loftiness shall bee beaten downe. VVhat mee-neth he by all loftiness? he meeneth all sturdinessse against God, and all skornefulnessse against men.

Howbeit hee vseth the woord loftinessse, because men forget themselues, and are as it were out of their wits, when they ouershoote themselues after that sort to chafe against their God. But now it might bee demaunded, whither God doeth roore out al proud folks out of the world. For by al lykelyhod he rather spareth them, and layeth the reynes of the brydle looce in their necke, so as they triumph at their pleasure. Howbeit let vs marke, that it is not for vs to appoyn the terme, too say that at such an hour God shall confound and de-stroy all proud folke: he will doo it, howbeit in his due season. And therfore although the proud folke do beare sway, and God seeme to let them doo what they list, yea and that they laugh [in their sleeues] as though there were no power to represse them: yet hath he still his of-fice which belongeth vnto him, namely of rooting out the proud and wicked sort with his only looke. Yea, but (as it is sayd in the scripture) sometimes he hydeth himselfe from his faithfull ones, not that he euer forgetteth them or is not carefull of them: but he sheweth not himself in outward working, to the intent to try our fayth and pa-cience. It may seeme to vs that God hath forgotten vs when we be in any danger, and specially when wee feele the blowes, and finally when we see death present, and in 50 the meane whyle we perceiue not that God myndeth to reache vs his hand, and yet euē then we crye vntoo him, Alas, Lord where art thou? why hast thou forgotten mee? Such complaints make we according to our fleshly vnderstanding: and so God seemeth not too looke vpon the proud, when he suffereth them to cast foorth their poysen after that fashion, and beareth with the numbers of outrages and enormities which they commit. Yea, but forasmuchas their tyme is not yet come, let vs tarie till God open his eyes vpon them, and then shall they be de-stroyed. Then if they be borne withall for a tyme, and God winke at them: let vs assure our selues that their tyme is not yet come wherin he will looke vpon them in his wrath, to roote them out, as I sayde afore. Now this lesson ought to serue to double vse. For the faithful ought to take comfort at it: and although God deliuer them not from the tyrannie of the wicked at the first brunt, yet haue they cause to rest vpon him. VVhy? For he hath not giuen ouer his office, no though they exalt themselues against gainst him: but their tyme is not yet come. He stall feedeth them as men do Oxen: and like as men knowe when it is tyme to kill the Ox, so doeth God knowe well yngough the day of the destruction of the proud and of all the wicked. Ye see then how first of all the faythfull ought to be pacient, when they see God delay the rooting out of the proud and wicked sort, and therfore that they must hold themselves quiet till the thing bee doone. In the meane whyle let the proud sort bethinke themselves, and let vs be afrayd to flatter our selues. If God spare vs, let vs not thinke that wee be scaped out of his hand: nother let vs gather the more boldnesse to attempt one thing or other, vnder colour that he beareth with vs and winketh at vs. And why? for in the end he will looke vpon vs, and then shall our faults be bewrayed to our greater confuzion.

So then, let vs marke well that although men perceiue not Gods iudgements in eyesight day by day, yet must they not therfore ceasse to walke in feare and carefulnesse, but the rather bee bridled by the wrode of God. 20 For herein also doeth our sayth shewe it self: namely if in the midds of our aduersities we can fasten our eyes vpon Gods gracieouse promises. And on the other side when the state of the wicked seemeth too bee better than the state of the godly, let vs not ceasse to hope continually for the euclastisg lyfe, although it bee not to bee seene. VVhyso? Bycause God hath promised it, and whatsoeuer commeth out of his mouth cannot bee deceyuable. Yee see then after what sort wee ought to put this lesson in vre. But now let vs see if wee can doo the like thing 30 as is reported heere of God. Can wee destroy the wicked with one only looke? Can wee rid the earth of all proud folke, as God can doo when he thinketh good? Alas, what are wee? So then, let vs learne to give glorie to him which sheweth himself to be iudge of the world, which hath all power in his hand, and which vseth such order and vprightnesse in it, as no fault can bee found therwith. And although things seeme oftentimes troubliseme and out of orderto vs, yet let vs not ceasse too looke still to the p̄dwer that God sheweth therewithall, 40 and to his goodnessse: And then if wee have cleare eyes, surely wee shall never misse to espye and discerne that God gouerneth the world ryghtfully. Yee see then that the way to put this lesson in practyze, is that when wee knowe God in himself as he is, and that he hath vittered himself by effect and experience: wee must come downe to ourselues, and examin our owne weaknesse, that wee may humble our selues, and not attempt to quarell with Ged who hath the perfection of all ryghtuousenesse and power in him. This in effect is that which wee haue too heare in mynd. And specially let vs wey well the saying that is added for a conclusion: that is to wit, that if a man had that [power] he were able too sauē himself by his owne hand, as it is were sayd, that God confesseth, that then a man myght passe him. Therfore when any of vs hath the power that is spoken of heere: he needeth not to resort any more to heaven for refuge, nor too call vpon God to sauē him: for every man myght sauē himselfe. The saying of this, is to bring men to knowe that they haue neede of another bodie to sauē them than themselues, and that they haue not their lyfe in their owne hand, nother can by any meanes warrant it. Let vs consider then that we liue not of our selues, nor haue any meane to maynteyne ourselues, yea and that although the whole world fauored vs, so as it myght seeme that wee had all things at will: yet are we nothing, but must bee fayne to depend wholly vpon our God, and be sauēd by his hand. Let that serue for one poynct. Now at the first sight, it seemeth too bee a meetly common thing, and men are taught by nature to resort vnto God: but yet for all that, see yee not the drunkennesse or rather madnesse which caryeth vs away, so as euerie of vs is of opinion that he can sauē and warrant himself? And who hath told vs that, but Satan, who hath put this false dotage into our brayne that there is some power, some ryghtuousenesse, and some wisdome in ourselues? So then, let vs marke, that Gods vpbrayding of vs that none of vs can be sauēd by his owne hand, is no common schoole poynt. For it serueth to shewe vs that wee must distrust ourselues and all our owne powers, and be so vtterly disabled, as wee may haue no rest, stay, nor contentment but only in him. VVhat is it then that saueth vs? It is the hand of God. And wherfore? Euen for his owne mere and free goodness only. For if man had any thing of himself, God would not enuye him for it, but would rather say, verye well, let vs part stakes, this is mine, and that is thine. For hath God anie neede to borrowe of vs? Hail he neede to catch any of our due and ryght from vs, to furnish out himself withall? No no: let vs not imagin any such conceyts, but let vs confesse that there is not so much as one droppe of safetie in ourselues, but that we must run simly vnto our God.

This is it which wee haue too marke in this streyne. Neuerthelesse it is true that sometymes the wicked shall bee destroyed and throwne downe by mannes hand, for to that end is iustice ordeyned: but can they that set in the seate of iustice and hold the sword in their hand, do any thing of themselves? Is it not bycause God hath appoynted them, and bycause it pleaseſt him to bee serued by them as by instruments? So then, it is not meeto that the meanes which God hath ordeyned in this world to set out his maiestie, power, and ryghtuousenesse, shuld deface him and hinder the knowing of his glorie: but rather that they should giue him the greater bryghnesse. Furthermore wee see how he woorketh when it pleaseſt him, without the putting to of mannes hand. In conclusion it is told vs heere, that God hath created beastes, bothe in the Sea and on the land, even terrible beastes which are able to make vs to quake, to the intent we shuld bee no more so saucie as to come to set ourselues against him.

And heere is expresse mention made of Bekemot. Now the wrode Bekema signifieth simply a Beast, and vnder that name are Oxen and all other beasts comprehended. Heere it is sayd in the plurall number, looke vpon Bekemot whom I created with thee: and although the wrode Bekimoth bee the plurall number in the Hebrew: yet is it spoken but as of one beast and no mo. Howbeit forasmuch as God ment too betoken heere one sort of beastes: that is the cause whiſt he setteth Bekimoth in the plurall number. Neuerthelesse it cannot bee coniectured what kynd of beast it is that he speakeſt of, except it bee an Elephant, by reason of the howgenesse of that beastes bodie. But it is evident that he speakeſt not heere nother of Oxen, nor of Horses, nor of any ſuch other beastes: for it is sayd, locke mee vpon Bekemot which eateth bay as an Ox. Ged then maketh an expresse difference betweene that kynd of beast wherof he speakeſt and Oxen. And therfore without troubling ourſelues to much [for the matter,] let vs marke that God in this text hath chosen a kynd of beast more wonderfull to vs than any other. The ſame is the Elephant, which hath ſo ſtrong a bodie, that it is sayd of him, that his [greate] bones are as brasse, and his little bones or griftles (as men terme them) are as barres of yron. For it is an incrediblē thing to vs which are not acquaynted with it, but they which see those beasts ought to be afryd at the only looke of them : the bignesse of them is so howge, as they seeme to bee things made by arte [and not by nature.] But if wee were wyze ynoch, we needed not too go out of ourselues to behold the maiestie of God: howbeit men must bee sent to the beasts bycause of their vntankfulness, in that they knowe not God as he sheweth himself vnto them. Therfore by reason of our blockishnesse and vntankfulness, we haue neede of such mirrours as are set before vs here in respect of the Elephants 10 and other like beastes. Seing then that wee perceyue that God hath created those beasts of such bignesse and shape although wee had none other warrant of his power: yet haue wee good cause too hold downe our heads and too worship his hygh maestie which sheweth it selfe in those wilde beasts. And it is purposely sayd, that these Elephants were created with vs, to the intent too shewe vs, how God hath made the difference [betweene things] as he himself listed, and that he hath set a wonderfull order in the world, so as men must needes bee rauished besides themselues when they thinke theron, at leastwyse if they haue the discretion too marke the things that are wyde open before them. Behold, a man that hath but a little bodie, is neverthelesse appoynted to bee a Lord and mayster in this world. VVherfore are all things created, but only for our vse? And wee see an Elephant is so strong, that he is able to strike downe a greate sort of men with one stroke of his foote. Then sith wee see such things, and that there is such order in the world: it doth well shewe vnto vs, that God hath doone vs greate fauour in making vs so little as wee bee, and yet notwithstanding that he hath shewed himself in the brute beastes also. In somuch that if the knowledge of the things that be put into ourselues be not ynoch for vs: if we looke vpon the beastes, there wee shall finde things too astonishe our witts. And therewithall also let vs marke wel, that if gouerning should go by greatnessse, then myght the Elephants well reygne ouer vs. But what? wee see they suffer themselues too bee ruled by men like little colts in a stable. Also wee see on the other side, that God hath left them destitute of manie things. Behold what howge bodies they be, and yet notwithstanding they cannot bow their legges, but are fayne too stand continualy: for if an Elephant bee downe vpon the ground, hee cannot get vp again.

Now when we see such a force on the one side, and such a default on the other, (that is too witte, that those beasts cannot bow their legges, but are fayne too sleepe standing, insomuch that if an Elephant bee layd flat, he cannot ryze again alone, but a man were as good too rayze vp a whole house): ought not such a sight too make vs to glorifie Gods goodnessse? For wherof is it long, that the Elephants deuour vs not all? They eate hay as Oxen doo. Seing then that these beastes which were able too excute such crueltie as to roote out all mankynde out of the world, doo feede of grasse in the mountaynes, and hyde themselues vnder the shadowes of trees, and yet notwithstanding breake not out intoo such rage as they myght doo by reason of their howgenesse: wherof commeth it but of that it was Gods will too tame them, too the end to giue vs roome to dwellon here beneath? Again, wheras wee bee hemmed in on all sides with so manie sortes of other wyld beastes, could wee continue vndeuered one day in this world, if God restrayned not their rage with a secret brydle? Therfore let vs learne to looke so vpon Gods woorks, as we may worthily magnifie his power, goodnessse, wisdome, and rightousenesse, by humbling yea and even by vtter disabling of our selues, according as in dedee we be nothing.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him to make vs so to feele them, as wee may allearne too walke in his feare, and to put vs wholly intoo his hands without presuming any thing vpon our selues, but rather acknowledging our weaknessse and infirmite, and beseeching him to help vs: and that forasmuchas wee should be ouercome a hundred thousand tymes a day, if he were not our defence, sheld, and safegard: it may please him to gard vs from all our spirituall foes, and too deliuere vs from all our temptations by giuing vs power to outstand them, till he haue taken vs out of this earthly lyfe, which is a continuall battell. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only to vs, but also too all people and nacions of the earth, &c.

11. Smoke steameth out of his noze as out of a seething potie or cauldron.
12. His breath setteth coles on fire, and flame flassth out of his mouth.
13. In his necke dvvelleth strength, and labour is reiected before his face.
14. The parts of his flesh are knit together, every one is substantiall in it self vvithout fleeting.

18. For he regardeth yron as stravve, and brasse as rotten vvood.
19. The Archer cannot put him too flight, the stones of the sling are turned into stubble vntoo him.
20. He esteemeth darts as much as stubble, and laugheth at the shaking of the speare.
21. Vnder him are sharp stones, and he spreadeth out sharppoynted things vpon the myre.
22. He makeith the deepe too feithe like a cauldron, and maketh the sea like a pot of oyngment.
23. He maketh a path too shyne after him, and esteemeth the deepe as an old thing.
24. His dominion is not vpon the earth, and he is made to bee afayrd of nothing.
25. He beholdeh all hygh things : He is king ouer all the children of pryde.

Shewed you yesterday, that after God had set foorth many living things of the earth too witnesse his power and glorie, heere he bringeth in, on the one side the Elephants, & on the other side the whales. And it serueth to conclude this matter, that al though men see noi Gods being, yet ought they to perceyue what his maestie is, only by beholding the beastes which he hath created, and specially such as are able to fray vs with their looke, to the end that God might be glorified so much the more at our hand. Again, wee sawe yesterday what was discoursed concerning the Elephant, which is a terrible houge beast, and ynough too scare vs out of our wittes. Now then if we tremble at the sight of a beast: should we play the bold fellowes against God, to contend with him when he chastizeth vs, and to stomacke the matter when he intendeth to humble vs? Should we be such fooles as to murmur at his iustice, or to gaynsay him in any thing, or to desire to deface or diminish his soueraintie? So then, seeing that the beastes do make men to tremble, let the consider their owne madnesse in matching themselues with God. Howbeit before I go any further, wheras heere is so long a discourse vpon the sayd kind of beastes of the land which I sayd was an Elephant, (albeeit that it be named heere by the generall terme of Bebemotb) and also vpon the Leviathan: we haue to marke therupon, how men haue bene of opinion, that by an allegorie the diuel is spoken of heere, rather than eyther the Elephant or the VVhale, and that they haue gone about to proue that fantasticall deuyce of theirs by this, that in the end it is sayd, that the sayd whale is the king of the children of pryde. But in speaking of the other kynd of beastes that I touched yesterday, it was sayd, that God maketh them to eate bay and grasse like Oxen. VVe see then that his intent is to shewe vs Gods myghtie power in the things that are to be seene, and not to descrie the diuell to vs. As touching the woord Leviathan, through the whole scripture it signifieth a VVhale: and we see it to be so in the hundred and fourth Psalme, where the Hebrew woord Leviathan is translated a VVhale: and it is well y-nough knowne, that there the Prophet speaketh of Gods wonders which men see in the sea, yea much more than vpon the land. There is one peremptorie reason to shewe vs that we must take this text simply as it stádeth, and not shifstingly. For we haue seene heretofore how it was gods intent to teache men after a grosse and hornely maner, according to their owne small capacite, and that his dooing therof is to the end that his mightie power should be the better proued vnto them. Moreouer he ment also to vprebrayd them with their follie, in that they dare set themselves against him, forsoomuch as the verie beastes are able to reprove them. VVherfore let vs marke well, that heere God giueth men a lesson, therby to skorne their pryde, in sending them to the brute beastes: but this could take no place, if it were spoken of the diuell. And wheras his will was, that the whale should be the king of all the children of pryde: it is not for that the beast hath any such affection. But rather it is sayd to compare men with the VVhale, as if our Lord should say, It is true that men will lift vp their sheelds verie hygh, and fetch leapes aboue the cloudes: but when they haue gathered all the force they can, and presumed to the vttermost, what is it in comparison of the VVhale? VVhen a man hath vaunted himself to the vttermoste, let him but come to encounter with a whale, and the whale shall haue more cause to vaunt himself than he. For if a man compare him with a house or a Tower, if a man compare him with artillerie, or if a man compare him with a mountayne: he shall finde all these qualities in him, yea he shall finde such terrible force in him, as is able too turne vp shippes vpside downe. And where is the man that can approche vnto such strength? VVe see then that God hath shewed expresly, that wee shall always be ouercome by the VVhales, and that therefore our pride is to fond: and specially that when wee become so bold as to lift vp ourselues against him, and too go about to plucke from him the things that belong too him, and to robbe him of his ryghtuousenesse: in so doing wee must needs bee put to shame, yea euen without Gods comming downe from heauen, and without any shewing of his maestie: for the verie beasts are inough to maynteyne his honour. Neuerthelesse truely, by conueying the discourse from the one to the other, a man myght wel vse this similitude of the whales and the Elephants, to make men perceyue how greatly the power of the diuell ought to fray vs, seing he is termed the prince of the aire and of the world. Not without cause doth God give him that title: for it is to the intent that seeing we be so weake of our selues, and haue so myghtie and strong an enimie, we should walke in feare. Therfore we may well from the one to the other take a good warning, that if we wil not be subiect to God, we must be bondslaves to Satan, and he shall ouermayster vs well ynough, so as wee shall haue no strength to withstand him. As for example, wheras the creation of the world is spoken of, Moyses treateth not of the Angels: for he ment to be a teacher to the little and vnlerned ones, and therfore he setteth down but only those things which are seene with our eyes. But yet for all that, the present lyght which is perceyued, must leade vs yet further: that is to wit, to the espying out of the lyght of the heauenly kingdome by fayth, though it bee hidden from vs presently. And forasmuch as we see Gods maestie shyneth foorth euery where: let vs vnderstand that there is a farre greater fulnesse and perfectiō of lyght in the Angels, and in all things that concerne the heauenly lyfe. Yee see then that it is a good conueyance, when we goe so by degrees from the least things too the greatest, and from the lowest to the hyghest. But yet howsoever we deale, wee must hold vs still too the simplicitie of the text: for it is an euill thing to dally with the holie scripture by transforment of it into allegories, norther ought allegories to be drawnen but out of a naturall mee-

Gen. 1. 22. 22. as we see that Sanct Paule doth in the Epistle to the Galathians and in other places. Therfore let vs come backe again to the matter we began with. God doth heere make his triumphes bothe by sea and land, to the end that men should knowe, that they shall alwayes be confounded in their pryme, if they set themselves against him. And after he had spoken of manie other sorts of beastes, heere he setteth the Elephants before vs, which are so terrible, as they must needs amaze vs: for in the howge bignesse of their bodies, we behold miracles without number. VVe see on the one side how they surmount vs; and we see on the other side how god hath not giue the things which he hath voutsafed to giue vs, yea euen of his owne free goodnessse. And therfore let vs learne that we shall gayne nothing by exalting ourselues: for we shal be surmounted by the brute beastes, when we haue done all that we can & yet notwithstanding our vnthākfulnesse bewrayeth it self, in that we yeld to slender and nigardly a recōpence vnto God, for the benefits that he hath bestowed vpon vs. For of whom is it long that we be not brute beastes? As it was said yesterday, Was not the Elephant created with vs? Are we made of any preciouser mould than he? Is there any qualitie in vs, why we should be more excellent? No: there is nothing that maketh a difference betwixt vs, but God. Now we see that the Elephants which haue so terrible a force, are notwithstanding not so hold as to bend themselfes against vs: they go and hyde themselves in moist places, and cannot haue any couert that is commodione for them. Seing it is so: we see on the one side how greatly we bee bounde vnto God, and therfore wee ought of good reason to acknowledge our owne weaknessse when mention is made of the brute beastes whom we durst not come neere, no nor so much as looke vpon them. How should we do then, if God restreynd them not? Now after this, God leadeth vs too the sea, and sheweth vs that there also we haue wherwith to pull vs downe: not only by reason of the greate multitude and diversitie of fisshes that are there to be seene, insomuch that euen the heathen and misbelieveng wryters were constreynd to say, that wheras men sawe manie miracles vpon the land, the sea was the true storehouse of the woonders of nature: but also euē in respect of anye one sorte or kynd of the: as for exāple let vs take but only the whale, and is it not an increible thing to see sohouge a creature, living in the water, who were able to fashiō the mould off so great howge, & strong a beast as that is seene to be? For by lykelyhod it should come foorth to pray vpon the land, and there shuld not be foode ynough to suffize him in the water. Also we see what is in his bones, or in his backebones, which are more than bones: they bee (to see to) yron and steele: and it is a woonder to looke vpon his fleshinessse. Therfore a man had neede of greate riches that shuld intreteyne such a bodye. And who can sted his turne but only God? For he hath appoynted the world to keepe him, and therfore hath he provided all things for him. VVherfore, sith wee see this, let vs learne to submit ourselues to him, or else there shall neede none other judges to condemne vs than the brute beastes, nother shall there neede any other euidence too cast vs, than the creatures that are dispersed through the world, as well in the waters as vpon the land. If we beare away this singlenesse, it will stand vs in better sted than all the curiosse expositiōns that can be deuyfed, as when these Allegorimakers searched out his ribbes and backebones, and treated also of his skin and of this and that, and to be short, there was not that pece of him, wherein they found not some toy or other. But this is as it were to make the holie scripture a noȝe of wax, by transforming it from the naturall sense. VVherfore if wee beare away but this one foresayd article, that there shall neede none other witnesse to cast vs before God, thā the things that are shewed in the brute beastes: shall wee not haue profited greatly? Howbeit before we come to that condeming in Gods sight, we haue a good instruction now giuen vs to receyue. And first of all, to the intent wee may not be ashamed to be taught by the VVhales and Elephants: let vs vnderstand that Gods sending of vs too them, is euen bycause of our vntowardnesse, for that wee bee so spytfull, so stroward, and of so wicked and crabbed a nature, as we cann̄ be brought to reason. Therfore is God fayne to shame vs by sending vs to the beastes. Also there is such wilfulstubbornnesse in vs, that whatsoeuer is told vs, though our wants be layd opē to our faces: yet do we euer seeke some startkingholes, & shun Gods iudgement to the vttermost of our power. God then must be fayne to breake this hardenesse as it were by mayne force, and to make vs to bow vnder him. And therfore if the Elephants should treade vs vnder their feete, and trāpē vpon the bellies of vs: we be well woorthie of it seing wee wil not glōrifie him that hath made them as well as vs, nor yeld him his due honour. Howbeit let vs take it in good worth that God st̄ndeth vs to the to schole, to learne to humble our selues. Besids this, we deserue to be swallowed vp of the VVhales and too haue the sea to ouerwhelme the whole earth, and so it should do (as hath bin declared heretofore) were it not that God of his graciuose goodness voutsafeth to lodge vs heere, and to maynteyne vs notwithstanding that we deserue to be drowned every minute of an houre. VVherfore let vs be contented that God gineth vs instruction bothe vpon sea and land, and that all things are ordeyned to turne to our welfare, according ding also as they shall, if we turne them not away by our owne rechlesnesse, ignorance, and naughtiness. Thus yee see the cheef poynt which wee haue to marke in this text. Howbeit before I vnfold this description peece by peece, let vs mark what is sayd here: for God declareth to what intent he speakest so of the Vvhale. Vvhale is he (sayeth God) that can stand in my presence? Seing that no man dareth waken vp a whale, no nor come neere him (sayth he): who is he that dareth maynteyn himself before mee? This is the comparison that I haue touched a'readye: that is to witte, that if the creatures (which being nothing of themselues are but a small portion of the power that is in God,) do astonish vs: what will his infinite maiestie doo?

Esa. 40.6.12 What is all the whole world in respect of God? It is sayd that he holdeth bothe heauen and earth, and that he needeth not to stretch out his armes too imbrace that greate circuit, but it is al of it shet cloce in his hand. Now a whale (how houge a masse of fleshe so euer he haue, yea and though he can do neuer so much in the sea) is but a verie small peice of it. So then besides the infinite number of other fisshes greate and small that are in the sea, (all which God hath made and gouerneth,) the whales also are comprised there. Seing then that God in his glorie comprehēdeth all things, yea and comprehendeth them as nothing: ought not wee to be sore astonished before him, when a sillie beast scareth vs, as is shewed hierer? And for confirmation therof it is sayd, rhat all things are bis. For if a man should say, it is true that a whale is a terrible thing, but God is not so: Yea, would God answer? and what is a whale but as a dart that I shall cast, or as a stone out of a sling? Then it behoueth vs to knowe, that God hath printed some marke of his power in whales and other greate beasts, to the intent that men should knowe how that the same proceedeth from his hand, and that he serueth his turne with them, to apply them so such, vse as he listeth, insomuch that a whale ought in our sight to bee considered as if God shuld cast a stone out of a sling, and the ayre rang of it, so as we were astonished at it. Seing then that al things are so in his hand: we haue good cause to tremble before him. Neuerthelesse our Lord meeneth not too drive vs from him: but yet must wee needs bee abashed at the first brunt, to the end we may yeeld him his deserued reverence. So then, he calleth and allureth vs to him, to the intent that we should find all ioyfulnessse there, but yet can we not come at him, till we haue bene vtterly beaten downe.

Therefore there must first go afeare before, to daunte vs in such wise as wee may not be able to stand, but may find ourselues vtterly vndone and cast away, if God shuld vtere his power against vs. It behoueth vs to knowe this: and then shall all our feare be asswaged, that is to wit if we hold him for our father. But yet for all that we shal never yeeld him his due reverence, except he daunte vs and tame vs in such wise, as wee knowe not where to become. That is the thing which we haue to remember in this streyne. And so let vs followe this generall lesson, that it is vnpossible for a mortall creature to stand before God. And how should he stand? For first and formest he must needs cast vs flat to the ground, and afterward set vs vp againe. But if we will hold our owne, and fail to playing the lustie tall ladds: we shal never bring our purpose to passe, but it shal rather be the cause of our decay. The woord stand then betokeneth that a man can never haue a good case in maynteyning himself to be ryghtuouse and wise, but must first of all be vtterly disabled, and acknowledge that God hath all myght, power, and ryghtuousenesse in him, and that we cannot be but ouerwhelmed in our owne nature. True it is that God not only would that we should stand, but also lifteth vs vp aboue the heauens: not in respect of our bodies as yet, but by raysing vs vp when we be beaten downe.

Then let vs marke well that there is greate oddes betweene mennes desy ring to be somewhat of themselues, by taking vpon them to bee wise and ryghtuouse, and betweene vtre disclayming of all goodnessse, and therupon to resort vnto God, and to pray him to set them in good state for somuchas they be vtterly bereft of all glorie and haue nothing in themselues but shamefull confusion. When we haue learned this lesson, that no man is able to stand before God, so as we acknowledge that there is nothing in vs but filthinesse and dung, that all the gay like lyhood which wee weene ourselves to haue, is nothing but vanitie, and that all the opinions which we haue conceyued do but beguile vs, when we be once throughly perswaded of this, then wil God lift vs vp, and we wil think ourselues so behoden too him and to his mere grace for all things, that we wil glorifie him as our father, and as the giuer of them vnto vs, yea even without being bound therunto, and without finding anie desert in vs. And it is a general principle of our faith, that all flesh must keepe silence before him, and that it behoueth vs to vnderstand, that if there be any lustinessse in vs, it withereth away out of had: there needeth but one blast vpon vs, and by and by we fade away without hartinessse or strenght, and al our ryghtuosenesse is but cursednesse. I pray you mark this general principle of our faith, to the end that the grace which is manifested to vs in our Lord Iesus Christ, may be knowne, & we haue our recourse thervnto, not looking eyther for the beginning or for the full perfecting of our saluation elsewhere, than in Gods voutsafing to work the same freely: that is to say, without any bynding of him too it on our side, or without bringing any thing of our owne in that behalfe. And that is the cause why he expressly addeth, wbo wil preuent mee, and I will satisfie him? As if he should say, that if wee will pleade against him, he must needes be in our det, and bee bound vnto vs, and we must haue some ryght and interest. And where shall the man bee found that may preferre his title vnto God, to say that God is bound yntoo him? But wee see cleane contrariwise, that wee hold all things of him, and that he on his side oweth nothing vnto vs: and yet notwithstanding we be so wilful as we wil needes contend with him.

Now let this be extended generally to teache vs that wee must humble our selues vnder Gods myghtie hand, confessing him to be bothe wise, ryghtuouse, and myghtie in al things that he doeth, as Sainct Paule sheweth in the eleuenth to the Romaynes. For although he alledge not that text as taken out of the holie scripture: yet doeth he reherse the same doctrine. And to what purpose? There Ro. 11.35. he treateth of Gods free election, and sheweth that God chose whom he listed to be heires of euerlastinge lyfe, and also that he forsooke whom he listed. If a man should demaund the reason why: it is not for vs to knowe it, neither is it lawful for vs to seeke any further than his will, which ought to bee in sted of al reason vnto vs. Not that he doeth any thing vniustly: but bycause the secrete of his mynd are hidden and incomprehensible to vs, and his wayes are vnkowne to vs. Howbeit forasmuchas it is hard for men to hold themselues quiet, when they heare that doctrine: (according as we see how these doggs bark against it nowdayes, and these gloriouse beggers intending to play the greate doctors, say they comprehend it not: and who art thou thou wretched dogge. Dost thou not comprehend it? Get thee vp vpon thy dunghill and learne to knowe what thou art) forasmuch then as men are so proud that they cannot find in their harts to submit them themselues to that doctrine: Sainct Paule twiteth them with this saying: VVho hath giuen aught vnto God? You step foorth here with greate boldnesse, yee alledge your owne vertues and your owne strength: therfore it is meete that you should shewe God what he shoulde do, and that nothing be doone otherwyse than you appoynt, and so, that he is greatly bound vnto you. Now if ye pretend such matter against him: come on, and let vs knowe what it is that you haue giuen him. And if yee knowe that he is nothing behoden vnto you: how dare yee murmur against him? Now seing that Sainct Paule dealeth after that maner, and wee knowe his meening in the case of Gods everlasting election: therevpon wee haue to remember, that it is one of the principles of our fayth, [to beleue] that God holdeth not any thing of vs, and that we can not alledge that he hath receyued aught at our hand: but that all glorie must be giuen vnto him, and wee not think that he is our vnderling, or that he is any thing bownd vnto vs. But all the matter lieth in the well practizing of this lesson, specially that when our flesh tempteth vs to presumptio and pride, we may be restreyned with this bridle: and consider: How now? with whom matchest thou thyself? For if thou wilt go to lawe with thy God, it behoueth thee to be well armed to answer him. And what wilt thou say to him? Seing thou haste nothing but wretchednes & cursednesse in thee, would it not stād thee in hād to submit thyself to him with all obedience and humilitie? And further let vs marke also, that by those words, all the righteousenesse of men is beaten downe, and it is shewed vs that all that euer we can imagin concerning the merit or deseruing of works, is but a drunkennesse of Satan, who hath so bewitched mennes understanding with an opiniō of deseruing to Godward, that the kingdome of heauen was made as it were a wages. In poperie nothing is more common than to say that men can purchace heauen. And how? By their meritorious woorks (as they terme them.) And although the papists be forced to confess that wee can do nothing without Gods grace, and that wee haue always some imperfections in vs: yet doo they mingle their owne woorks with Gods grace. A man (say they) must prepare himself to receiue Gods grace: not of worthinesse, (they be forced to graunt our owne vnwoorthinesse) but of conuenientie, bycause (say they) it is conuenient and seemely that a man should offer and dispole himself afore hand to receive Gods grace. But is not this an expresse belyng of the holie Ghoste? Behold here a saying which is cleere ynough and needeth no gloze, who is he that bath preuented me [or bene a fore hand with me] sayeth the Lord? Then let vs marke well that heere God bereeueth all mankynd of the false and diuelish opinion wherwith they are so besotted, by saying that he is not bound vnto vs but we vntoo him, so as wee cannot bring aught vnto him, nother doth he receiue any recompence at our hands by the seruice that wee do vntoo him, for he hath no neede of vs. Now we see in effect, that all the wis-dome and righteousenesse of man is beaten downe and brought to nothing. For there are twoo things that make vs to lift vp ourselues against God: the one is when wee weene ourselues to be wiſe, and the other is when wee think we haue some righteousenesse and worthinesse of ourselues. Howbeit God sheweth vs on the one part, that we may wel prate and prate, but in the end he will put vs to silence well ynough. VVhyso? For what title can wee pretend against him? Then let vs forbeare to be selfwyse, and learne to be sober and lowly, and let vs acquaint our selues with Gods woorkes so farre foorth as he sheweth them to vs, always restreyning our selues with this bridle, that wee passe no further than is shewed vs in the holie scripture. If we do so, we shall be gaide alwaies by the holie Ghoste.

Let vs then keepe ourselues from saying, O I would faine know such a thing. Let vs not be selfwyse in seeking whatsoeuer we haue a mynd vnto, when we ought not to knowe it: but let vs be contented with that which is opened to vs in the holie scripture, and specially with the things that may edifie vs in faith and the feare of God. And if we meete with a thing that seemeth strange to vs, yet let vs consider that God hath spoken it, and therfore we must receiue it without gaynsaying. Furthermore if God let a thing alone and tel vs it not: it behoueth vs too stoppe there without going any further, and we must not be inquisitive after our owne fancies. Therfore mark it for a schoole point, that it behoueth vs to bridle our toungs, & to suffer ourselues to be the schollers of our God, seing he doth vs the honour too teache vs as well by his owne mouthe, as also by his holie spirit. The second point con-cerneth our righteousenesse, that being conuictēd to haue no worthinesse at all in vs, and that when we haue done neuer so much, yet we can bring nothing vnto God, wee shoulde yeld ourselues giltie. But (which is much worse) men are so farre of from giuing themselves to do good: that they employ all their force and powers to do euil, vntill God haue reformed them. So then, if we knowe (and put it in vre,) that we must not pretend to haue any worthinesse or deseruing in ourselues, but yeeld God the honour to graunt him to be almighty, then are we throughly humbled in all respects. This in effect is the thing that we haue to beare away in this text. Now too knyt vp the matter, although it were not needfull, no nor expedient to stand vpon euery woord of this long discourse that is made of th<sup>e</sup> whale: yet let vs assure our selues that this is not superflououse. VVe looke but sligly and as it were glaucingly vpon the recordes that God giueth vs of his maiestie. But were our Witts well setled too marke what God sheweth vs, to the end we might honour him accordingly, we needed not too go out of our selues: for wee shuld find presidents ynow bothe of his power and of his will, so as we should behold bothe his myghtiness & his goodnesse within vs, without going any further. And that is it which S. Paule meeneth by saying, that forasmuchas we haue our life, mouing, and being in him: we be sufficiently conuictēd. Though we ope not our eyes, yet doth God make vs to feele with our fingars, that he dwelleth in vs: and he setteth forth himselfe in such wise as wee ought of dutie to do him honour. But what? we notwithstanding do fall to studioresse: wheras if we were well aduised and of good discretion, there shuld neede (as ye would say) but the tippe of ones little finger to hold vs in obedience vnto God. Howbeit forasmuchas wee ouer-passe that, and make no greate reckening of Gods woorkes: therfore here is made a long discourse, yea and that altogether vpon beasts. Seing then that God maketh here a long anatomie: it semeth long in deede, but yet is it not super-flououse. And why? By cause we be so fleeting, that wee despise Gods miracles how greate and noble so ever they be.

Thus ye see what we haue to marke in the first place. Now herewithall it is sayd, wilt thou hold him in thy service? or wil thou put bookes into his nozze? or wil thou play with him as with a spancell or a bird? It is too doo vs too wit, that wee bee so much the lesse to bee excused, if wee acknowledge not our maker, seing wee finde our selues confounded in making comparison betweene vs and a whale. And yet for all that, when m. indisperte of Gods woorkes, in their owne brayne, and controi him and are not contented with him if hee woork not a ter-their lyking: it is all ope as if they would ouerthrowe him. And is that possible? Behold, there is a brute beaste which men cannot tell how to tame. True it is that this comparison is not peculiarly fit in all respects, neither is it requisite that similituds shuld match fully and answerably in every poynt. But it serueth to shewe, that if a sillie beaste which hath nother reason nor vnderstanding, hath such force in him as to make vs afraid of him and to runne away: what shali he do which hath made and fashioned all things? Again, if a man dare not waken vp a whale: how dareth hee 10 step forth to make warre with the liuing God, as all they do which fall to carping and quareleng with him as much as in them lieth? Behold, our Lord would sayne shewe himselfe gentle and louing towards vs: and in verie deede we see how he is willing to beare with our weaknesse, & we play the madmen and wild beastes, and fall to carping at him openly, as though we were at defiance with him. And are wee able to abyde his presence? Shall it not bee much more terrible to vs than the presence of a VVhale? Again, seeing it is said that the whales doo make the deepe too seethe like a cauldron, and iumble the sea together like a pot of oyniment (according also as it was sayd of the Elephat, that he would make the Riuere of Jordā to passe through his throte) I pray you if we were agast too see a beaste at that point to swalowe vp houge waters: how much more agast ought we to be at the maiestie of God? It myght seeme to vs that the VVhale might be choked in the middes of the waters: and yet notwithstanding he is so greate and houge a beaste, as he cutterh the sea asunder, maketh it to boyle like a pot with his snorting and neezing and (as it is termed heere) ouerturneth shippes, and is like to swallowe vp all that commeth in his way: and shall our Lords neezing be no greater than a whales? Yes, he hath a snorting that is spoken of in the Prophet Esay and also in the hundred and fourth Psalme, insomuch that if God do but 20 104. i. 29. suffice or blowe vpon vs, we must needs be destroyed at the first blast. Seing then that there is such terribleness in the nozethrils of a beast: what is there in the breth of god which is the welspring of ali power, eyther to set vs vp & quicken vs, or to ouerthrowe vs and vndoos vs? VVee see then that these parts are not set downe and touched there without cause, and that these kinds of beasts are not picked out from all other, but for good instruction: at leastwyse, if we haue the discretion to apply all these thinges to God, and to make such comparisons as I haue spoken of. VVheas mention is made of the baranesse of the whales flesh and of his bones: it behoueth vs to come to this consideratiō: How now? VVhat shal become of vs if God list vp his hand against vs? See how the whale ouerturneth greate shippes and drouneth them in the sea, and hath not God barres of yron farre harder to strike vs downe if he list to touche vs with his hand? Now let vs go iustle with him [when we wil. Seing then that we perceiue so well how infinite the power of Gods had and arme is, specially whē he is armed against vs: we may well see that this treaſting after that sort of the VVhales flesh and bones, is no ſuperfluouse talk. But on the other ſide let vs conſider alſo, that if a beaſt haue ſuch power in him, in ſomuch that it is ſayd of him, that he laugheth at the ſhaking of ſpearēs, and is not afraide of the ſword or of any other weapon: thereby it is ſhewed vs, that if wee be armed with the power of our God, we be in good ſuretie, and haue no cauſe to be afraide or to take thought for any thiſg. VVee ſee that it is God which hath giuen ſuch ſtrengthe vnto beaſts: and why theſhould not we truſt to his protection? Furthermore let vs mark wel, that al the ſtrengthe and power that is in VVhales or in any other beaſts, ſhal perifhe, how terrible ſo euer it be, according also as it doth perifhe when it pleafeth God. Therfore it behoueth vs to beare in mind, that wee muſt not truſt in ourelues, for that is to great a folly: but wee muſt repaire to him who hath al power and might in him ſelf. And that we may profit the better by this leſſon: let vs mark, that forſomuch we ſee Gods had lifted vp, & troublē to be through the whole world: we muſt on the one ſide leaſne to diſtruct ourelues, and as it were diſable our ſelues by knowing our owne infirmities: and yet notwithstanding not ceaſe to glorie in God, ſeing we be vphilde by his power. Lo how we ought to walk in lowelinenſe on the one part. And on the other ſide, whē we reſorte to our God and leane vnto his fauour and protecſiō: we may defie al our enemis, not only of this world, but also euē Satā himſelf with al his power, & al that euer he is able to praetize. I thus ye ſee that the two thiſgs whiſh are requiſite, (ſpecially when our Lord warneth vs of any peril, and we ſee thiſgs out of order) are that wee muſt haue an eye to our owne weakeniſſe, and vtterly diſtruct our ſelues, and yet notwithstanding, in diſabling our ſelues not ceaſe to looke vp to heauen, not douting but that we haue a good warrant, forſomuch as we be mainteyned by him, but in any wiſe not preſumyng vpō ourelues. For as for him that thinketh he hath any power in himſelf, what caſe he do but ouerthrowe himſelf. Then let vs leaſne, not to chalendge aught to ourelues, but rather to abace ourelues vtterly: and yet notwithstanding to conceiue ſuſh boldneſſe vpon truſt of Gods protection, as we may not doubt but he is able yrough to defend vs from a hundred thouſand deathes, ſobeit that we reſerue our ſelues wholly vnto him, & truſt that he wil always guide vs with hiſ hand, and that al though we muſt be ſaine to paſſe through the troublē & diſordres of this world, and be inuironed with a hundred thouſand deathes: yet notwithstanding he will make vs to feele hiſ help, & giue vs power to get out of it, till he haue drawne vs fully to himſelf, and that we bee come too the endleſſe reſt which he hath prepared for vs.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our ſinnes, praying him to make vs ſo to fele how poore and miſerable we be, that vpō the knowing of hiſ goodneſſe and loue towards vs, wee may couet nothing but to yeld him hiſ due glorie for beſtowing ſo many of hiſ gracieouſe benefits vpon vs, as in that he hath made vs Lords and Maifters of hiſ creatures here bylowe, which were 2ble to ſcarce vs out of our witts, ſo as we may not be vntiaſful for ſuſh priuiledge and prerogatiue as he hath graunted vs, but do him homage for all the benefits that we haue received at hiſ hand, wayting to haue him increase them, euē till he haue brought vs too the full perfection. And ſo let vs all ſay, Almighty God heauenly father, &c.

E sawe heretofore the frute that grew of the declaration which God made vnto Job : and wheras he doubbled his woords, it appeered more euidently vnto vs, how much he profited by that correction. He had alredye repented : and now is he touched more to the quicke. And so we see that whē God hath once taught vs, oftentimes the same profiteth vs but in part : and although we think there is nothing amisse, & that we be come to the right point: yet shal it be but a little preparatiue to it. God therfore must be fayne to hold on in teaching vs, that the doctrine which wee haue herd may be the better rooted in our harts, and wee be the more moued with it and settle our selues wholly in it. To be short, we see that repentance is not perfected at the first dash, but that after God hath planed vs, he had neede also to poolish vs : like as when a man maketh a pece of woork in wood or stone, he must haue much heawing about it. The same way also must our Lord take with vs: or else we shall haue but a small entrance into re-pentance, and the same wil vanish away byandby, or else continue a rude and vnperfect thing. And that is the cause why we must suffer God patiētly, if after once correcting of vs for our faults, he cōtent not himself with one stroke of the rodde, but pay vs double : for that is for our profit. Furthermore when wee haue herd any good instruction for our welfare, if we haue receiued the same, let vs assure ourselues it is but with smal tast, so as we be not yet rightēly repented, but haue neede to go to it new again. VVherefore let vs not leave the doctrin which we haue herd, but let vs indeuer to profit dayly more & more, knowing that it behoueth vs to draw neerer & nerer vnto God all the days of our lyfe, & to be stablished stil more and more in his feare and loue. Or else without that, we be vnstedfast & returne to our old byasse: & whē we think ourselves to be wholly brought home, it shal be nothing but a smoke that will vanish away out of hand . Ye see then what wee haue to beare in mynd. Also according to Iobs example, when we haue cōsidered our faults one day, let vs streyne ourselues to knowe them yet better the next day, and to be the more greeued at them. For if we think we haue discharged our dutie with the saying of one word, or with the conceyng of some one good thought : we deceyue ourselues. So then repentance must always be a conquerour, insomuch that if it be vnfeyned, it must be doubled. But now let vs come to that it is sayd heere, I knowe that thou canst do al things, and that no thought shal bee kept backe [or letted] from thee. Some expound this, as though Job yeelded all power and might vnto God, and therewithal also an infinite forecast to prouide for all things & to guide them: as though he should say, Lord I knowe thou haste al things in thy hand, and that nothing is hidden frō thee, and that thou art priuie to all things. But it is a common maner of speche among the Hebrewes, to say, No thought shall bee letted from thee, that is to say, whatsoever thou haste ordeyned and commaunded, yea and whatsoever thou haste intended in thy mynd, shall euery whit of it be redily executed, so as thou shall not neede to trouble thyself, as though thou were letted or as though thou couldest fayle in any thing. Then let vs marke that this is spoken simply of Gods infinite power, and the twoo sayings are verified bothe of one thing. God therfore is almighty. As how? For looke what he purposeth in his mind, he can execute it byandby without any lette. But it should seeme that Job heere confesseth not all that hee ought to do: for he had protested heretofore, that God ruleth the world: but yet he ceassed not to murmur against him. It seemeth then that he hath not profited a whit, and that he returneth stil to the foresyd article, that although God be almighty, yethe fayleth not now and then to vse ouergret rigour, so as the poore creatures suffer to much, and are tormented to excessively at his hand. Howbeit we must cōsider, that heere Job acknowledgeth God almightyssse after another maner than he had doone at ore, that is to wit by humbling himself vnder Gods mighty hand: in acknowledging that it is not for mortall men too resist him nor to checke against him. Sometymes wee can say that God hath all things in his hand and guiding : but in the meane whyle we will not cease to fret and repyne if he do not all things to our lyking. And wheroft commeth that? Euen of that we haue not throughly conceyued his hygh power to submit our selues to it, nor considered that he being almighty guideth all things iustly and vprightly, so as it is good reason that he should handle vs and weelde vs as he listeth, and we keepe out mouthes shet, without replying to any thjng which he doth. Therif we acknowledge Gods almightyssse by viter disabling of ourselues vnder him, and by confessing it to be good reason that he should reigne and haue all authoritie ouer vs, and that we should obeɪ him, yea and that not by constreynt, but of a meeke and meeld mind: that is doubtlesse a true cōfessing that God is almighty. But if we will take vpon vs aboue him, and handle him after our mind, & have him to followe our wills, and to do according to our conceyts and imaginacions: alas, it is an euill acknowledging of his almightyssse: for we would bee his fellowes, yea and we would be aboue him to in that point. Therfore let vs mark well, that Job treateth of Gods almightyssse in an other sense heere, than he hath done heretofore. For he worshippeth God in his souerein dominion, and acknowledgeth that althings must needs be guided by him, & that it is his office to governe men, and that we haue no cause to murmur when he affliccteth vs, and that although things be hard & troublesome, yet we must always come to this point, that inasmucha he is righrouse he cānot deale amisse, and that it becometh vs to please him and to yeeld ourselues prisoners to him, to be handled and guided as it pleaseth him, and moreouer to bold al good things at his hand. Thus ye see in what wise we ought to acknowledge God to be almighty. Now in the second meber, Job defineth what Gods almightyssse is, and how it behoueth vs to cōceive of it: for he speaketh of Gods thoughts. VVe see many fantastical persons, who when they talk of Gods almightyssse, fal to gazing at this and that, saying: If God be almighty, why doth he not such a thing? If God be almighty, then can he do this. Yea, but we must ne traunge abrode so after our own imaginacions, Gods almightyssse ameth not at our dotages nor at any common thing. VVherat then? Gods almightyssse and his wil are things inseparabla. God is almighty: but is it to do whatsoever man hath forged in his brayne? No sic: but it is to accomplish whatsoever he hath ordeyned in his owne purpose. So then let vs learne to knit these twoo thingstogither, as meily his almightyssse and his will. And that is the cause why Job said, that no thought shall be letted, kept backe or re- streynd frō him, that he shuld not execute it; not the things that men conceiue and determine, (for it is not for thē [to have their wills]) but the things that God hath ordeyned & which he knoweth to be good. Now we see after what maner Gods almightynesse ought to be knowne of vs: namely to the end we shuld not doubt but that al things shal be done which he shal haue determined, not by taking cōsell at our hāds, but bycause it is at his aſignment to appoint what is good to be done forſomuchas he is the fountaine of al wiſdome. For al these things are ſo in his hand, as nothing can hinder his accōpliſhing of whatſoever he hath deuiled. This wil bee the better vnderſtode by the practiſing of it. Such as blame Gods almightyneſſe without cause or reaſon, fall too ſeeking of by matters, ſaying: VVhy doth not God ſuch a thing ſeing he is almighty? yeſt Is it for vs to make him play tricks to and fro? It belōgeth to him to determine & appoint, & afterward to bring it alſo to paſſe. Yet notwithstanding, thoſe [foreward' fellowes] take no heed of graūting al power vnto God, whē it cometh to the point that they ſhould truſt in him. And yet 20 the verie thing whervnto we ſhould apply Gods almightyneſſe, is that he wil not faile to keepe his promis, and that forasmuchas our welfare is in his hand, wee are ſure that none euil can betide vs, and that ſith he hath vs in his protection, we be out of doubt that no enimie ſhal preuayle againſt vs. This (ſay I) is the cauſe for which we ſhould mind Gods almightyneſſe, according as it is ſhewed vs where it is ſaid that no man ſhal plucke vs out of Christs hād who hath taken vs into his keping. And why? For the father who hath committed vs to him, is stronger than al. VVhy & to what end hath Ieſus Christ alledged to vs the invincible power of God his father? It is to the end wee ſhould be quiet, and not doubt but he wil ſave vs, notwithstanding all the attepts that Satā can do or deuife: for God is almighty. Herein we ſee that we muſt ioyne Gods almightyneſſe with his good wil, euen ſuch as he ſheweth it to be by his word. If we be once at that point, we ſhall not give ourelues the bridie to gaze & raunge abrode: & yet ſhal we haue alſo wherwith to beate backe the ſkernes of ſuch as can find in their harts to play with Gods almightyneſſe as with a tenniſbal. As for example, looke mee vpon the Papiſts, who wil neeſt haue the breade to be chaunged into the bodie of Ieſus Chrlte, and that the thing which was but bread before, ſhould become god: & to proue their ſaying, they alledge, whynot? is not God almighty? Yes: but is it to that end? Then wil him to darken the ſunne, & to turne the moone into water, and to make the earth too be in heauen, and heauen to be in Earth. Is it not a playne mocking of God when we fall to treating of his almightyneſſe after that maner? Is it not an ouerthrowing & peruerting of all order, and [a laboring] that there might be no more diſference betwixt whyte and blacke? Is it not a wicked rending alſunder of Gods mightyneſſe power, and a laying of it opē to all reproche? And wherof cometh this? It is bycause the Papiſts haue not yet learned the leſſon that is ſhewed vs heere: that is to wit, that God is almighty to accomplish whatſoever he purpoſeth too doo. But where is there any purpose of God in this behalf? It becommeth vs to looke whither God do will it or no. There fore when we haue Gods will [for our warrat]: thē muſt we alſo extend his mightyneſſe power to the performing of the things which he hath ordeyned in his will. But let vs not think that our Lord wil haue mē to make his almightyneſſe roue and raunge where they think good. VVherefore let vs beare the leſſon in mind that is ſhewed vs here, for ſeing that God hath ſhewed vs his wil concerning our welfare & ſoulhelth, affiuring vs that he wil mainteyne vs to the end, ſuccour vs in all our necessities, liſt vs vp whē

we be downe, and ſtrengthen vs in our weakeſſe, ſeing (ſay I) that we haue Gods wil apparent in al theſe things, let vs not doubt but he hath his hād ſtretched out to per forme whatſoever he hath ſpoken to vs. Ye ſee then that Gods hād and his mouth muſt agree togither. His mouth (that is to ſay his determinacion or will) muſt go before: and afterward his hand muſt bring to paſſe the things that he hath determined. Now haue we theſe two things that is to wit, first we muſt ſubmit ourelues wholly to Gods ordinance in this world. And why? For his will is good & beſides that, wee knowe alſo that it is his charge or office to gouerne, and that it is good reaſon that all creatures ſhould ſuffer themſelues to be ruled by him; and not take libertie to rule themſelues, but ſubmit themſelues to him in al points and al respects. VVhen we be once fully per ſuaded of this, we ſhal haue profited greatly for al our life after. Now heere followeth immediatly, Who is he that hydeſt ſecrets without knowledge? God hath heretofore vp braided Job herewith. And it ſhould ſeeme that Job met to cōfesse it to be ſo in deede, that is to wit, that he had wrapped vp Gods wiſdome in his own foolish words. For if we reaſon of Gods woorks after our owne abiliſie, and take vpon vs to be iudgers of them: it is a hyding or wrapping vp of his ſecrets: that is to ſay, a brabbling (as men terme it) even without ſkil. For we would be to wiſe when we talk after that faſhyon, and haue not bene taught afore. Ye ſee then that: wee may take this teſt for a confeſſing of the thing that had bin caſt in Jobs teethe: as if he ſhould ſay, a laſ Lord, rightly haſte thou condemned me heere before, 30 in that I tooke vpon mee to wrap vp thy ſecrets without knowing whervnto my words and reaſons ſeſted. I know now that I haue delt foolishly: for it was for mee to haue accepted ſimply whatſoever it had pleased thee to appoint, and I haue taken vpon mee too play the maſter before I had gone to ſchole myſelf. So then, Lord I acknowledge that thou haſte of good right bewrayed my folly. Now if we take it after that maner: then dothe Job make a confeſſion, wherin he attributeth ſuch a wil vntoo God, as is matched with al knowledge: for here is as it were a cōtrarietie betweene God and men. God keepeth his will and determinacion ſecret: howbeit he knoweth cauſe to do ſo, and he hath always a reaſon redy ſhaped. On our ſide, when we go about to diſcouer more of Gods will than is lawfull for vs, we do but intangle it more and more: & all that is done without ſkil, inſomuch that the more wee go about to ſhewe ourelues ſkiſful, the more we bewray our owne beaſtlieneſſe. So on the one ſide let vs learne that it is for God to keepe his ſecrets to himſelf without making vs priuie to thē, ſpecially when he ſeeth the ſame too ſurmount our ſmal capacitie. God openeth the things vntoo vs, which he knoweth to be meete and expedient for vs, as hath bin declared heretofore, but yet muſt he refue many dark things to himſelfe. And why? For we bee too weake as yet to mount ſo hygh. Thus then yee ſee that God may conceale his ſecrets: howbeit, that is with knowledge, for he is not ignorant of any thing, nother is it bycause he is not able to ſhewe vs why he doth this or that: but bycause we be not able to conceyue the things which as now are incompreheſible to vs. Now as for vs, truly 40 when we would knowe more than is permitted vs, wee will well ynough alledge ſome cunning ſhift, and deuize many cauſes: but yet at length wee muſt needs bee conſounded in our owne woords, and wheras men ſtreyne themſelues too bee wyſe without following Gods woord, they alwayes ſhewe their owne fondneſſe, how wauering their wittes are, and that there is nothing but lying in them. VVill wee then haue a pure and cleere vnderſtanding too ſpeakе of Gods woorks according ding to skill? Let vs come to his schole: let vs heare him speake: let vs beare away his sayings: and specially let vs haue such sobernesse, as not to couet to knowe more thā he sheweth vs. VVhen we be come to that point, then shal we speake rightly, and to the edifying of our neighbours, so as they shal bee confirmed in it more and more. But if we passe the bounds that God hath set vs, and will needs gad astray further than we haue leauie: there will be nothing but vanitie and vntruthe in our doings. Thus ye see what we haue to remember vpon this verse. And therfore Job addeth, I haue spoken I wist not what: these things are maruelous aboue mee, and I haue not understande them. This confirmeth the thing that I said euen now. Job confesseth that he had spokē without skil. As how? Because I understande not the things that I speake of, sayeth he. It is as much as if he had sayd, I haue put foorth myself to vnadvisedly. And why? Because those things were to maruelous for me, and I haue not knowne them. And heere we haue to marke, that the cause why Job graunted himself to be ignorant, is the lyghenesse of the secrets wherof he would haue spoken. 20 God made him to feele his hand, but yet did he not conceyue the cause why he shold be so afflited, and ther-

16. 17. 19. not God finde in his hart to dispatch mee out of hand? I
23. would faine that he had destroyed mee. He maketh mee to linger in peine. He knoweth that there is nothing in me but frailtie, and that I am but a wretched creature: and why then suffereth he mee to be so long time in extremitie? If I were the wickeddest wight in the world, he could 30 do no worse to me, and yet notwithstanding he knoweth that I haue serued him vncorruptly, & that I am no such persone as I ought to be so cast out frō among men. These are the debatings wherinto Job was entered. And why? For he preaced to farre into Gods secrets. Now to correct himself he sayeth that those things were to woorderfull for him.

Therefore let vs marke wel, that when we come vnto God and fall to talking of his works, we ought to consider that they bee to hygh secrets for our weake wit to reache vnto. And I say it behoueth vs to haue the same persuasō, as wel of Gods prouidence in general, as of the things that belōg to his spiritual kingdome. Then if it be told vs that God ordereth al things, & that there is not any thng done in this world without his wil: it is a secret which it behoueth vs to mark wel. For although euery man graunt that God is souerain Lord and gouerner: yet notwithstanding whē we come to this point, that the things which we se to be so troublesom & out of order, ceasse not to be guided by the secret prouidence of God, who holdeth the sterne aboue & turneth things to such end as he thinketh good: we wote not where we be. And what is to be done in that case? VVe must reverently consider that wee be not able to mount vp to so hygh a secret, and therfore honour god in the things that wee knowe not, vntil he revele vnto vs the things that are hiddē frō vs as yet. VVerē this throughly wel knowne, these doggs that bark so against Gods prouidence, and rayle vpon the doctrine that is conteyned in the holie scripture, would sone ceasse their pratling. There are at this day certaine drunkards or braynlesse fellowes, which wil say, that if god gouern al things, it must follow that men sin not any more, or else that their sins ought to bee fastered vpon hi n. Such blasphemies shal a man heare. And why? Because such naughtipacks cannot finde in their harts to yeeld vnto this point, that Gods prouidence and his maner of gouerning the world, are a wonderfull doctrine ou'reaching their capacitie. They leauie nothing vnto God, but wil needs determine all things after their owne mind. And what a gaunging is that! Therfore let vs marke well, that Job telleteth vs heere for a general principle, that when Gods works and the scanning how all things are done heere bilowe, do come in questio: it behoueth vs to bee alwayes so reuerend mynded aforehand, as to think, How now? Heere is a dungeon to deepe for vs, and therfore we must not presume to speake after our owne vnderstanding, but simply worship God, and be sober without inquiring ouerfarre: and in the meane whyle conclude that yet notwithstanding God guideth al things, and nothing commeth too passe at aduenture, but according as he hath determined of the same, as this doctrine hath often bene handled more at large heretofore. Marke that for one point. And for a second, let vs learne that whatsoeuer things concerne the spirituall kingdome of God, ought to be taken for woorderfull things aboue vs, accordingly as saint Paule speaketh of them. The sensual man (sayeth he) vnderstādeth not the secrets of God: 1. Co. 2. 19. d. 14. according as it said that the benefits which God hath prepared aboue for his chosen, are so excellent, as no eye can Esa. 64 b. 4. see them, nor mynde [of man] conceyue them. Then seeing it is so, let vs learne to pray God to inlyghten vs by his holie spirit, and too make vs stye aboue the heauens, namely by the power of faith (for our naturall wit can neuer atteyne thither): and that when wee have obteyned, that we may also haue the fore sayd modestie of not passing beyond the measure of our faith, as Job treatheth therof anon after.

Ye see then that the first point which we haue to mark in this streyne, is that Gods woorks, and specially his promises cōcerning our euerlasting welfare which are cōtayne ned in the gospel, are woorderfull things aboue vs, and therfore that we must step not rashly, malapertly, nor presumptuously to them, but reverently pray God to make vs to taste his secrets so farre fyorth as is for our behoof, and to open the things from day to day which are dark to vs, and not suffer vs to passe our bounds, but that wee may take profit by the things that he shall open vnto vs, and tarye his increasing of our faith. And so let vs neuer speake nor thinke of Gods secrets, but with all reverence and humilitie.

Furthermore wheras Job confesseth that he speake he wist not what, forasmuch as he accuseth himself of rashnesse, let vs also learne by his example, to cōdemne all the talk that we shall haue cast foorth before wee haue bene taught by the mouth of God. And let vs not be ashamed to confess our owne follie, when wee haue shewed our beastlynesse [in speaking] without good ground. Let vs not do as they do which clatter when they be rebuked: for such do but gather more poysōn, and they think it well done of them to go through with the matter, and to say, Tush I wil never say otherwise, I am stil of the same mind that I was. Let vs not haue any such hardhatednesse in vs: but when we haue bene ouerbōld in speaking to hastily, and some wandering woords haue scaped vs, before wee were wel grounded in Gods truthe: let vs acknowledge our follie: and renouncing our overhastiness in speaking at aduenture, let vs say with Job, I speake I wist not what. But herewithall it behoueth also too bee wel aduisēd for afterward, and to practize the forealledged lesson of beleeuing [or of being sure of our matter] before we speake. And let vs beware that wee beleue not aught, but that which our God hath shewed vs. So then wee must come to this point, that our fayth be grounded vpō the woord of God, and that the holie scripture be all our wisdome. VVhen we be once come to that knowledge: then may wee speake, yea wee may speake of the things that passe our vnderstanding, inasmuchas God shall haue haue shewed vs them by fayth, as wee haue sayd afore. Howbeit, it is not ynoch enough for vs too acknowledge our faults: but we must also resort to the remedie out of had, according as Job hath gien vs example therof. For after he had sayd he had put foorth himself without vnderstanding wel what he spake: he addeth, Heare me and I will speake: I will aske of thee, to the end thou mayst teache mee. Heere Job pretēdeth to repprese himself, because he sawe he had plaid the looce colt, in not keeping himself within his bounds. Then his confessing of his fault is not after the fashion of many men, which think themselves quite discharged with saying at one word, I haue done amisse, and by andby after returne to their old byasse, and are alwayes new to begin: he doth not so: but he sayeth, Lord, seing there hath bene such folish rashnesse in me, and that I haue so farre ouer-shot myself and run astray: now poze thou mee, & when I haue bin well taught in thy schole, let me speake simply as thou haste taught mee, and let it not be fal mee any more, to put foorth the things wheroft I haue no skill. This is in effect the matter that is cōteyned in this verse. And wher-as Job sayeth, beare mee, I will speake: his meening is not too crave audience to speake what he listeth (for he had done so to much alredy): but he excuseth himself in saying immediatly that his questioning with God shall be to be taught at his hand. Therfore let vs mark, that there are two fashions of speaking vnto God. The one is when me pleade against him, and lay forth their interrogatories, and make their obiections, and think themselves too be very wyse. It is a lewd maner of speaking whē we presume to enter so into disputation with God, or to reply against his doings. Let vs keepe ourselves from that kynd of speche, for it were better that our tungs were plucked out of our heads. Although this be an ouercommon vice: yet is it a detestable vice, and such a one as is not in any wyse to be borne with.

Therfore (as hath bin sayd afore) let vs learne to keepe our mouthes shet, that we speake not of ouerown head: but when any imaginacions come in mynd, let them all fall to the ground. For wheras I say it is not lawfull for vs too speak: I meene that it behoueth vs to haue stay of ourselues, not only for our tungs, but also for all our affections. Not that we be able to do so much, that we shuld not still feele some tickling lust of desirousnesse to seeke somewhat to farre, and of disputing against God: but because it behoueth vs to fight against it and to beate it down. And that is the sōbrietie whervnto it behoueth the faithful to be brought by the gospell, that they may simply giue glorie vnto God by confessing theselues to knowe nothing. Then must all Gods children practise this point: namely, not to presume to speake so at randō of whatsoeuer thing they thinke good. But there is another kind of speaking that is good and holie, which they must followe: and that is to inquire of God that he may teache them. For we see many that foade theselues in their beastliness, and if a man labour to bring the to the truthe, they be both too come at it: they play the brute beasts that they might knowe nothing, & so they become vtterly dul. Therfore it behoueth vs to speake, howbeit but as in asking counsell of God, that is to wit by desiring him to teache vs, after wee haue cōfessed that we haue no skill at al, that we be void of all light, reason, and vnderstanding, and that there is nothing but darknessse and lying in our owne wit. After wee haue confessed this, let vs come to aske counsell at Gods hand, saying Lord we beseeche thee voutsafe to shew vs whatsoeuer is good for vs to know. Neuerthelesse, verely it behoueth vs euēn in that behalf also to haue a bridle to hold vs backe: for else we might aske God more than shall bee requisite, as many men do, who would haue all things too passe through their heades. They wil peraduenture come vnto God, and aske at his hand. But how? with such excessiue curiositie, as their asking is never at an ende. But when we aske ought of God, it must be alwayes with this exception: Lord shew vs the things which thou knowest to be expedient for our welfare, so as our knowledge may be to our edifying, both in trusting to thy goodnessse, and in the feare of thy name. And further, forasmuch as thou Lorde knowest our slenderesse, shewe vs thy will according to our abilitie. For when we eate honnye, no doubt but it is sweete in taste: and yet notwithstanding wee see that a man shall be swolne with it, and the sweetnesse will go neare to make him burst. Euen so is it with vs: if wee seke too high knowledge, the same wil in the end turne to bitternes. VVe may be beguiled at the beginning, because it will seeme to be a goodly thing, and suche a one as wee may attaine to the knowledge of it. Yea: but let vs consider what hapned to our father Adam. He would nedes know Gen. 3. 4. 4. the difference betweene good and euill, more than God 5.4.22. had given him, and therby threw himselfe headlong into the dungeon wherein we be yet still at this day. Sith it is so, let vs not couet too great a glorie: for in the end it will be no glorie to vs, as Salomon sayth: but like as honnye Prov. 25. 4. euen by reason of his swetenesse, turneth into bitternes 27. if a man eate to muche of it: so is it with vs when wee bee more inquisitive of Gods will and works than is lawfull for vs. Therefore let vs not couet to know more of them than we may wel away with, except we intend to be overwhelmed. Nowe it is expressly sayde, Heare mee, and I will speake, I will aske of thee to the intent to bee taught. If wee come to God to learne at his hande: it behoueth vs to yeelde our selues teachable. And what is the first point of teachableness? It is that we take him for our mayster and obey him fully in anything that he shal list to tech vs. For when a yong child comes first to schoole, if he will needes chooze his bokes after his own lyking, to say I will learne such a science, or I will bee taught suche a thing or such a thing, before he haue gone to his Apece, so as he will be a great Doctor, before hee haue the meane whereby to bee taught, or be come to the place wher learning is to be had: I pray you is that a scholerlyke modestie? But if a scholer that takes a man to teach him, ought to submittre himselfe wholly to him: what ought we to do to God? VVhat comparison is there in that case? So then let vs marke well, that if we desire vnfainedly to be taught of God, wee will not followe our owne lustes, to say that hee should shewe vs whatsoeuer wee haue conceyued in our owne heade: but wee will ho de vs contented with that whiche hee knoweth to bee for our welfare: and to deserue that it belongeth vnto him. And for that cause Job concludeth, that heeretofore bee had bearde speaking of God, but nowe bee badde seene him wibbis eye. As if. hee had sayde, Lorde, it is true that heeretofore I haue hearde speaking of thy maiestie, but nowe I knowe it after another manner: and that is to the ende to submittre myselfe wholly vnto thee. Job maketh comparison heere betweene the knowledge that hee hadde hadde before, and the Reuelation wherein God opened himselfe so manyfestly vnto him, that hee was vtterly abashed and touched with suche feare, as hee could doe nothing but glorifye God, as wee see hee dothe. Howbeit, it ought too suffize vs too haue hearde God spoken of: for thereof also proceedeth knowledge. Fayth (saythe Saint Paule) commeth by Ro. 10. 4. 17. heering. And fayth bringeth vs perfect wisedome, as it is saide in another place. And what desire we more, than to 1.Cor. 3. 4. 6. know that we be the children of God: & that it is known 1.Iob. 3. 4. 1. by faith, as Sainct John saith in his Canonicall Epistle. 1.Co. 2. 6. 10. And ageync S. Paule sayth in the first to the Corinthians, 11. 12.

that by faith we enter into Gods secrets, yea euen into the deepest of them. For his spirit dwelleth in vs, too warrant vs the things that enter not into fleshly vnderstanding. Faith then proceeding of hearing, bringeth vs to a true perfection of wisdome, and therfore it ought to satisfie vs to haue heard God spoken of. But here Iob ment to betoken, that the knowledge which he had had, was as when we haue speaking of a thing that we haue not seene, for when we see a thing we be the surer of it. The let vs mark well Iobs meening. It is not to refuze the doctrine wherwith we be taught when Gods woord is preached to vs: but to do vs to vnderstād, that if the doctrine do but only beate our eares, it is a dead thing, vntil God revele himself in such wise, that wee knowe him as it were by eyesight. And when is that done? Dayly when the Gospell is preached. For there must God speake to vs after two sorts. He speaketh to vs by the meanes of a man, which is appointed to be the minister to teache vs: And again he speaketh to vs by the working of his spirit, when we be so touched inwardly, as we fare the better by the doctrine, and haue our harts perced with it: for without that the voice vanisheth away, and is but an vnprofitable sound. There are many that here the gospell speak dayly: but the more it is preached to the, the more do they growe hardharted. And that is it which is spoken in the Prophet Esay, Go to this people and tell them, they shall see with their eyes and heare with their eares, but they shal not vnderstand: and why? Because they haue a hard hart, which cannot by any means be softened. VVe see then that if God woorke not by his grace, men shall alwayes continue stubborne. And therfore when God speaketh to vs, he must bee faine to discouer and shewe himself too vs, and to make vs to see him. And how? Not by bodily sight: but by perceyuing his maiestie in such wise, as wee may learne to reuerence him, and to put ourselues wholly into his hand, that he may haue all authoritie and dominion ouer vs.

Now let vs fall down before the face of our good God with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him to make vs feele them more and more, to the end we may come to him with true repentaunce, & he not suffer his dayly calling vpon vs (as well by the doctrine that is preached to vs in his Gospell, as by the corrections that he sendeth vs,) too be vnprofitable to vs, but that we may learne to be confirmed more and more in the feeling of our sinnes, so as we may craue forgiuenesse of them at his hand, and seeke the remedie of them in his goodnessse, and therewithall desire altogether to be taught in his schole, and to yeld our selues teachable vntoo him, euen till hee haue rid vs of our ignorance, and stripped vs quite and cleane out of al the wayne trusts wherin we be wrapped as now. That it may please him to graunt this grace, not only too vs, &c.

The. chvij. Sermon, which is the second vpon the. xlij. Chapter.

6. Therfore I abhorre it, and I repent in dust and ashes.
7. After that the Lord had spoken these vvords vnto Iob, he sayd vnto Eliphaz the Themanite: my vvrath is kindled against thee, and vpon thy tvvo companions: for ye haue not spoken rightly before mee as hath my seruant Iob.
8. Therfore take yee seuen Oxen and seuen sheepe, and get ye to my seruant Iob, and offer sacrifice for your selues: and my seruant Iob shall pray for you: and I vwill accept his face, to the end that your folly be not layd to your charge: for you haue not spoken ryghtly concerning mee, as hath my seruant Iob.

E sawe yesterday what it is too percyue Gods presence and to be touched with his glorie, bycause that without that, it is impossible for men to come to good order, whatsoeuer be sayd vntoo them. For eyther they will play the deaf folkes, or else let slip all that is spoken to them, as experience sheweth too much. Therfore it is requisite that when God speaketh, he should also shewe himself to vs, and giue vs some liuely percyuerance of his maiestie, too the intent wee may feare him. And that is the cause why Iob protesteth that he is discontented with himself, and misliketh all that he had spoken: for men wil neuer vterly mislike bothe their woorks and woordes, except they feele God too bee their judge. VVe knowe how euery man is giuen to soothe himself through fond flatterie, and that when our eyes are once dazed, none of vs seeth his owne shame, or if he do see it: yet doth he not willingly regard it. God then must be sayne to shewe himself before we can come to so much reason as to mislike of ourselues, and too take hold of all that shall be doone and sayd to vs. Howbeit on the contrarie part also we wil not colour our vices nor seeke excuses any more, when wee haue once a true repentaunce, but rather wee will confess that wee haue doone amisse, yea and euen bee hartely sorie for it. For if a sinner returne ryghtly vnto God: he will not only acknowledge his offence, and yeld himself gilty: but also condemne himself for presuming against his maker. Therfore let vs marke well, that true repentaunce importeth a hating of the sin, yea euen to the vttermost, insomuch as a man mislyketh and hateth himself bycause he is not such a one as he ought to be, and ffolioue of Gods ryghtuousnesse he condemneth all that is in himself, and seeketh all meanes possible to be vnceased out of that old skin wherin he is wrapped. This is the true trial of our repentaunce. And herin we see how shamelesse they are which say they be repenant, and yet a man cannot get one woord out of their mouth, that sheweth any token of lowelinesse: but they are so farre off from intending to yeld themselues with their whole harts vnto God, and frō indeuering to make amends for the offences which they haue done: that they wil stil maynteine themselues in their wickednesse. But put the case that a man acknowledge his fault: yet is it nothing worth to do so, except he vterly mislyke and hate himself, as I sayd afore. VVherfore if the one bee not as well as the other: wee see what a mockerie it is too say, that a man is repenant, when in the meane season he is hardharted towrades God, and shamelesse towrades men.

Now if Iob (who was as it were a straunger, in that he was neuer of the churche of God, [that is to say] of that corporation which was chosen of the linage of Abraham) spake after that maner, and knew what true repentaunce is:

Ccc.iiij.

what

what damnation shall lie vpon vs, if we be so brutish and rude in these dayes, that wee wote not what difference there is betwene the cheef grounds of our faith? Lo how we haue profited in the Gospeell. They that were before the Prophets, yea and which were not of the bodie of the Iewes, nor of the people whom God had chosento be his [visible] churche, could skill to declare that it is no true repentance, except men do vtterly condemne and abace themselues in their vices. But nowadyses wheras those that will be taken to be Christians, do vse the woord re-pentance: they do but slayne and vnhalowe it with their leawd and filthie mouthes, courting too haue men take that for repentence, which is but a flat mocking of God. So much the more then behoueth it vs to marke what is conteyned here: namely that if we intend to shewe that we be truly turned vnto God: it behoueth vs to haue an eye to our owne shamefulnesse, and to looke vpon it in such wise, as all that is in vs may be condemned, & we learn to be our own iudges to the end we may be quit before him, which desircth nothing but to pardon such as come back vno him with true lowelines. But Job addeth purposely, that he wil repente him in dust and ashes. As if he shuld say that he is redie to yeeld himself as a wretched offender vnto God. For a man may wel repēt him without putting of sackloth vpō his backe, and without casting of dust vpon his head. Neuerthelesse, the men of old time vsed those ceremonies, when they intended to make solēne protestation, that they were vtterly condemned before God, and that there was no remedie for the, but that God should be gracious to them as to miserable offenders. Therfore let vs marke well, that Job speaketh not here of a common repentence: but acknowledgeth vs offence to be sgreuuouse and outrageouse, as he deserueth well to come as it were with a halter about his necke, & to shew by open signes that there is nothing else but cursednesse in him, til God receiue him and gather him home too him. True it is that this matter might bee layd foorth more at length, neuerthelesse it will suffize vs in effect, that the ashes and dust that are spoken of heere, are not the cheef poynt of repentence, but only an outward token of it. Furthermore this token is not always requisite, but if it be to make open protestation of an outrageouse crime. It behoueth the faithful too be wel aduised that they repente and mislike of themselues all their life long: for we passe not any one day, without many misdoings: we comit infinite faults without our knowledge, yea and euē thinking that we do well: so as if we examine oureselues throughly, wee shal alwayes find that there is somewhat stil amisse in vs. Therfore haue we cause of sorrowe: and yet notwithstanding we shal not neede to make open protestation before men. Then may repentence wel be without the outward signes ioyned with it: but when our faults are grosse, and Gods wrath shewereth it self towards vs: the must we not only be sorie and mislyke of our selues, but also (in consideration, that the same may edifie our neighbours) we must adde some outward signes: as if a man haue giuen some stumblingblocke, & seeth that Gods name is blasphemed by it, and God discouereth his shame: he must not only mislike and hate himself, but also match his doing with outward humilitie before men, as with a record or scale to ratifie his repētance. And this must be not only in every particular persone, but also in the whole people, according as we see it hath alwaies bin the practize of the churche. Moreouer let vs marke wel that it is not ynoch enough for vs to haue the outward tokens: but our hart must specially be wounded, that being throughly grieved for prouoking Gods wrath against vs, we may conceyue a soriness, and condemne ourselues, and be vtterly dismayed in oursel-

ues. And that is the sorrowe wherof Sainet Paule speakeþ, which he sayeth that we must not shun, because it is 2. Co. 7.c. 10 to our saluatiō. And therfore it is sayd also in the Prophet Ioell, rend your harts and not your garments. True it is Ieiel. 2.c. 13. that vnto such as had offended greuously, and were desirous that God should heare them, the Prophet giueth commandment to returne with sackloth, dust, and ashes, and to confesses themselues to be offendes, and to craue forgiuenesse, and too declare with soleme protestation, that they haue deserued death, but if he haue pitie of the. Howbeit forasmuchas men are so sore inclyned to hypocrie, and wil needes content God with fayre contenenāces, and forget that which ought to be the first & cheef point: the Prophet sayeth expreſſly that their harts must bee rent, and that the hardnesse of them must be put away. So we see that the effect which Job ment to say, is, that in repenting him of his vnuadized speeche, he addeth that his so doing was no light nor small sin, but so heynouse that he is readye to shewe himself as a wretched offender, that had committed a crime woorthic of death, and hath none other hope nor refuge, but only to the mere mercie of god yea and euen to make the same protestation willingly before men, to the end that such as haue bene offended by him, may be set vp again, and all men knowe that he desircth nothing but to humble himself vnder Gods hand. Now seeing it is so, when we on our side haue doone any fault, let vs learne not to leissen it, nor to hyde it: but too acknowledge it, yea euen to the vtter abacing of ourselues. Againe when we haue begonne to mislike of our sinnes in our hart, and to lothe them and to be sorie for the to the end that God should not enter into account with vs: let vs also haue the modestie before men, too vse the protestations which God liketh of: namely to confess that in all respects wee haue deserued death, but if God admit vs to mercie: and let not the shame of our sin hinder vs from making amends for the offence which wee haue giuen by our dooing amisse. Herevpon it is sayd, that God after he had spoken vnto Job, turned himself to Eliphas the Themanite, and sayd vnto him: My wrath is kindled against thee and thy companions: for ye haue not spoken rightly before mee as my seruant Job hath doone. VVe haue seen heretofore that God found fault with Job: and now secondarily he findeth fault with his companions, yea and that much more roughly. Before we come to the comparison that is made here betwene Job and his freends: we haue to marke the order, which is, that it is sayd that God bauing spoken those woordes vnto Job, turned his talk to those that had wrongfully condemned him. Hereby we be warned, that although God chastize his own with fatherly gētlenesse: yet notwithstanding hee executeth his Justice throughly vpon them: according as it is sayd that his punishments or chastizements begin at his owne howse or churche. Yee see then that God rebuketh Job, and in the meane whyle letteth the other alone which had offendad more grossely than he. A man might demad here, yea, is it so? VVhy doeth God set himself alonly at Job, and at the partie that had least offendē? For although he had doone faults, yet were they more too bee borne withall than the faults of his companions: and yet God seemeth to vtter all his rigour against him alone. Lo what a man might say. Howbeit he is rebuked first, because the thing which I haue alledged out of the Prophet must be fulfilled: that is to wit, that God beginneth to chastize his own householdfolk first. VVhen he intendeth to execute his justice, he beginneth not at the vnbeleeuers: he letteth the alone, he spareth them as though he had forgotten their faults. Not that they be not throughly recorded, or shal not come to accouēt: but for that he suffereth the sins of those whom 1er. 25. f. 29.

1. Pe. 4. d. 17

whom he loueth not, to rype, yea and to rotte. Yea and in the meane whyle he chastizeth those whom he hath adopted, and whom he auoweth for his children: he sheweth them signes of roughnesse, whyle those that are strangers to him take their rest and welter in their ease & pleasures.

Thus ye see what is shewed vs in this text, and it is a verie profitable lesson for vs. For we see dayly the state of the faithfull is more miserable than the state of the despisers of God. The godly seeme too bee vitterly forsaken of him, they drag their wings after the, and they do but pine away in this world: and in the meane whyle the wicked set vp their crests and are merrie, and make iolly chere, euen in skorne of God. Now how would it trouble men to see these things, if wee had not this doctrine, that iudgement beginneth at Gods owne howse: according also as it is sayd in the Prophet Esay, that when God shall haue finished all his woork vpon mount Sion, then will he not spare the wicked. And the Prophet sayeth purposely that God must performe al his corrections in his churche, for somuchas his owne are those whom he setteth moste store by. Therfore he must visit them first, and clenze the from their sinnes, & reforme them that he may bring the home to himself, and he must not do it for one day and away, but till he haue made an end of his whole woork: & the ther is a horrible vengeance prepared for those that abused his patience, and hardened their harts whyles he bare with the, as S.Peter also warneth vs. Alas, my freends (sayeth he) let vs not bee greeued at the children of this world when God letteth them alone in peace, and we in the meane whyle are chastized by his hand, so as our state is hard and troublesome to beare. Let vs beare it paciently (sayeth he): for seeing that wee must bee faine to passe through the furnace, and too bee tried after that maner: what shall become of those whom God hath vitterly forsaken? So then, let vs acknowledge the goodnessse of our God, according also as the Prophet sayeth, that those who God hath long borne with, are likened to frutes that are referued to the ende of the yere and are as good as rotten: & that such as are gathered sooner shal neuerthelesse be eaten, and men shall do them that honour, notwithstanding that they be gathered. And so let vs learne, that God procureth and furthereth our welfare, in that it pleaseth him to chastize vs first of al others, whyle the wicked give themselues to making of good cheere. Howbeit we cannot say that Eliphias and his companions were vitterly rejected of God (for contrariwise he accepted them): but yet are they alienated from him for a tyme, and Job must be faine to be a meane for them, or else they shall find no meanes of fauour and forgiuenesse. Then if we compare Job with them, we will say he is one of the household of the churche, and the others are as ye would say banished out of it for a tyme till God haue reconciled them to him again. But yet ye see that Job is rebuked, & in the meane whyle God speaketh not a woord to the others. Therfore let vs consider that (as I haue erst sayd) the more God loueth vs, the more hastie is he in visiting vs: and when he seeth that we haue stepped awrie, and are gone out of the right way of saluation: he watcheth ouer vs to bring vs home againe to him with speede. Now let vs come to the comparison that is set downe heire betweene Job and his freends. It is sayd that Job spake rightly before God. How was that? For God notwithstanding condemned him as an ignorant, ouerweening, and vnpacient persone. And tofore how Job had vndertaken a good case, howbeit he proceeded amisse in it. Job therfore overshot himself in the following of his matter, but yet for all that, his case was good still. Contrariwise Jobs freends vsed goodly rea-sions and such as we haue gathered holie doctrine out of: but yet was the groundwoork of them euill. They tooke a generally ground quite besides the case which was, that Job was punished for his misdeeds, and that he was to be taken for a wicked and cursed creature, seeing that God vsed such rigour towards him.

Furthermore also they did set downe a false and vntoward doctrine: saying that God doth even in this world handle men according to their deserts. But that were as much as to take away the hope of the euerlasting life, and to shet all favorablenesse of God out of this frayle and transitorie life: and that were a turning of all things vpside downe. And therfore it behoueth vs too call these twoo points to remembrance, that we may knowe the ryghtnesse that is spoke of here. And to be short, we must note the text that I haue alledged out of the Psalme hertofore, namely that the man is blissted which iudgeth discreetly of the poore that is in aduersitie: where the Prophet sheweth vs that when wee see anie man in aduersitie, Gods will is, that we should haue the discretnesse, not too condemne him at the first dash, but to looke vp hygher: that is to wit, [to consider] that aduersities do some tymes befall men for the chastizement of their sinnes: sometyme for the tryall of their pacience: sometime to present some faults which they might fall into: and also that God setteth the foorth to be as mirroors, to the end that we seeing their obedience might be edified therby: and sometimes for some other secret causes vnowne to vs. Therfore let vs eschew rashnesse when we see God afflict any man roughly, and let vs not be to swift of iudgement to say that he is woorthie to be so handled, and to command such as liue at their ease, as though they were better beloued of God: for that were too vnadvised a iudging, so it were. Then if we haue the discretion in vs to consider the causes that are noted to vs in the scripture: we shall find diuerse times, that such as are the excellent seruants of God, are handled moste rigorously: and it will seeme to vs that God is against them: but wee muste not iudge after our owne fancie. If wee vse that modestie, God will alwayes succour vs when we be afflicted: but if we be cruell, and foolishe in giuing too hastie sentence, the like measure must be moen vnto vs also. Furthermore for the better vnderstanding of that whiche is saide heire, namely that Job bathe spoken ryghtly, and his friendes amisse: it behoueth vs to take this general rule, that when a man is in forwardnesse to followe God and to feare him, he same shal be accepted, notwithstanding that he commit grosse faults: whereas if another man haue not the true feare of God rooted in him, although he haue apparent vertues that are very commendable before men, yet is all of it nothing worth, it is but starke filth. Looke (I say) vpon a man that feareth God, and is rightly and purely mynded to give himselfe to weldoing: and yet notwithstanding he shall haue many infirmities: hee haltereth, he staggereth, he reelth, yea and sometimes falleth flat downe. Yea, but his faultes which hee doth, are forgiven him, and God dothe still reach him his hande to lifte him vp, insomuch that al falleth out to his benefite, bycause the marke that hee aymeth at, is to goe vnto God, and his minde leadeth him still thytherward. On the contrarie parte, it maye come to passe (as I sayde) that a man shall bee greatly commended, that hee shall haue goodly vertues, and that hee shal doe things worthy of honor: and yet in the meane while he hath no good roote in him, but is eyther a despizer of God, or vnmerciful towards his neyghbors. Now if a man be such a one, none of the things that men honor in him can please God. Hereby we may understand in what taking Job was. Job (as I haue erst said) had al his life long bin giue

to woldoing: he had bene a ryghtuouse man and one that feared God: yea and the sayd singlenesse of hart is purposely attributed vnto him hertofore, to shewe that ourlyfe shal never be wel ruled, till we bee cleane rid of all finenesse, and walke as in the sight of God, and not as before men, and that we be not doubleminded, but substantially grounded to giue ourselues wholly vnto God. This hath bin spoken exprefly of Job. As cōcerning the present case, he indured the afflīctiō patiently: nevtherlesse, in the end when he was tormented with extremitie, he fretted and chafed: and specially when men fell to stinging of him, then he forgat and overshot himself, seeming to be minded to resist God in that there scaped frō him many vnadvised words. Iobs faults were these, that his patience hild not out as it ought to haue done, & that he playd the foile in his talk, namely in some particular sayings: but yet for all that he kept on stil to the marke that I speake of in the beginning, & how soever he swarue aside, yet flingeth he not quite away, but holdeth on his race though he go not altogether rightforth: like as whē an archer shots at a mark, although he hit not the whyte full, yet do men see that he smed well at it if he shooote somewhat neere it. Euen so stode the case with Job. And that is the cause why God attributeth rightnesse vnto him. So then let vs learne, that if we haue a pure and holie intent, and seeke [earnestly] to do good: although we be weake, although we be wrapped in many vices, although we happen to stagger and to fall, and although in effect we deserue too be forsaken of God: Yet notwithstanding he beareth with vs, and hath not an eye to our infirmities and vices to cōdemne them without forgiuenesse. And that is the cause why it is sayd

Luk. 1.6. in the scripture, that such as giue theselues to the seruing of God and to the keping of his law, are righteous: after which maner Zacharie & Elizabeth were ryghtuouse before God. How were they ryghtuouse? where is such a má

Pſ. 14.4.1.3. to be found, as it is sayd in the Psalme? Must not all of vs needs be condēned as wretched sinners, and all of vs haue

& 53.4.1.3. our mouthes stopped? Ycs verely. Howbeeit besides that God had receyued Zacharie and Elizabeth to gouerne thē by his holie spirit: he did also accept their desirousenesse of woldoing, as if there were nothing but perfectiō in our desires, which are vtterly vnperset. Our obedience is not such as it ought to be: but yet doth God accept it in good woorth, bycause that when men are [earnestly] desirous to serue him, he layeth not their imperfections to their charge. And thus ye see why he accepteth them for ryghtuouse. Now then although there be faults in vs, yet will

God forgiue them, and they shal be buried in his mercie, so as he wil not faile to take vs as iust and ryghtuouse, so be it that our hart bend thitherward to honour him and to giue ourselues wholly to his obedience, as I sayd afore.

And this ought to serue vs vnto two purposes. For we see first of al that the Papists are out of their witts when they take these texts to ground their merits vpon. O (say they) behold, here is mention made of rightnesse: ergo we deserue to Godward and haue pure and right harts to come vnto him. Alas wheroft commeth this rightnesse? deserue we such a cōmendacion at the mouth of our God? And he might also condemne vs a hundred thousand times without shewing vs any fauour. Howbeeit forasmuch as he wypeth out our faults and forgetteth thē, & intēdeth not to haue any regard of them: therfore accepteth he vs for ryghtuouse. And therfore in this case let vs acknowledge only his mere mercie and goodnessse, & let vs honour him for the same. And furthermore, seing it is sayd that our Lord is cōtent with vs, & accepteth the things for good and cōmendable, which notwithstanding are defiled: and that although there be much amisse & many great faults and imperfēctions in our works, and that we deserue to be abhorred of God, because we can bring nothing to him of our own, but althinesse, yet notwithstanding he accepteth & receiueth those works which are so stained with vices, as a sacrifice of smeete sent: we ought to take corage to do well. For seing it is so, ought we not to be the more inflamed to serue and honour him. Ye see then what we haue to mark in this verse. But by the way let vs mark also, that we may well do heroical acts (as men terme them) & behauie ourselues as vertuously & courteously as can be deuized, and men may carie vs vpon their shoulders, and yet al this shal bee nothing, except wee haue a liuely roote in our harts, and be desirous to serue God, as the mark that we haue taken to shoote at. It were much better to go the right way limping, than to make greate leapes and yet bee neuer the further forward: yea, or to make greate shewes, and in the meane whyle to haue our harts snarled in all wicked affections. Then let vs beware that wee couet not to be praysed much of men, but let vs always come vnder the gouernance of our Lord, that he may hold the brydle ouer vs, and we bethink vs to giue ourselues to him obed̄t̄ly. But by the may we haue here a sure & infallible record of the thing that hath bin treated of before: which is, that although Job fayled in some point: yet he ceassed not to haue a good case, seing that God who is the only cōp̄t̄ judge therof, auoweth it to be so. On the cōtrarie part, although his frends had faire colours & reasons that were very fauorable to seeming: yet are they misliked here: And why? I haue shewed you the two reasons before: wherof the one is, that they condemned Job bycause he was strikē of Gods hand. So then, if we wil not haue our iudgement reversed from aboue, let vs learne to leave iudging at aduenture when God chastizeth men, and let vs cōsider well the causes that are conteyned in holie scripture: and let vs do it, not only towards our neyghbours, but also towards ourselues. Doth God afflict vs? Let vs be wise, according also as when S. James speaketh of patiēce he purposely termeth it wisdome. And surely the gretest wisdome that we can haue, is that after we once knowe that God is our fa- ther and haue received the grace which he offereth vs in our lord Iesus Christ: we cā take the afflīctiōs meekly which he sendeth vs, & bowing downe our shoulelders vnder thē, fal to cōforting of ourselues in our miseries, & to cheering vp of ourselues in our sorrowes. That is the way for vs to be rightly taught in the schole of our God. So then, whēsoever God scourgeth vs, let vs not cōceive any hartburning or bitternessse against him (for we shal gayne nothing by it) but rather let vs beare in minde what the holy scripture sheweth vs. Namely that it is needfull for vs too bee mortified, because we be to much giuen to the world, & be loth to think vpō the heauenly life. If we had our own desires, in what plight should we be? But there is yet moreo-uer, that God knoweth how there are many secret rebellions in our flesh, and therfore we had neede to bee subdued as it were by mayne hand. And again, wee should not know what it is to obey him, if he shuld handle vs [al-ways] after our own liking & with our ease. And therfore he is faine to chastise vs, & to play rough play with vs: howbeit, therin he procureth our welfare by trying vs, and by sending vs rough & troublesome things. For if we grudge not against him at those times: thē is our obed̄eēce wel allo- wed. And the thing that we haue to mark here, is that if we judge discretly of the afflīctiōs that God sendeth to vs, and likewise to our neighbours: we shal haue the said rightnes whereof God beareth witnesse here by his owne mouth. Now for a cōclusion it is sayd, tbat God sendeth Eliphas and bis compāniōs vnto Job, and comandeth thē to offer sacrifices, and sayeth that Job shall find grace to the end tbat their sinnes

may be forgiuen them. Heere first of all we haue to marke, that although God rebuke Eliphias and his companions after that maner : yet he woulde not drive them quite away: and that although condemnation were pronounced vpon them, yet was it not to the ende they shoulde suffer it, so as they shoulde lie still there, vtterly throwne downe without remission. There are then two sortes of condemnation which God pronounceth vpon men : and of those two, the first may also be deuided intoo other two. Generally God condemneth vs, either to the ende to acquit vs when he shall haue found vs to be humbled : or else to destroy vs vtterly, as he doth the vnbeleeuers. Yet notwithstanding there are two sortes of condemnation which are to our welfare. The one is of such as are alreadie faythfull, whom God chastizeth dayly: For although God account vs of his housholde, and that wee bee fully reconciled to him : yet haue we neede to be condemned, and to be stirred vp thereby continually more and more, that we may be ashamed of our selues, and bee sorie and hate our sinnes, and seeke the remedie of them, to the end to magnifie his mercie the more, which he sheweth to vs in that we obtaine forgiuenesse at his hand. Thus ye see there is a condemnation which god layeth vpon his chosen, notwithstanding that they be at one with him, and he haue taken them into his flocke. And there is yet another condemnation which is healthfull also, and that is of such as are after a sort straungers from gods Church, and haue none acquaintance with him, according as we see how he condemned Saint Paule at such tyme as he was a persecuter. And euen in the person of Saint Paule wee may

Gal. 1. 4. 15. the better vnderstande the thing which I intende to say : for if I shoulde alledge twoo severall persons, the thing woulde not be so easie to be vnderstood. Beholde, Saint Paule was so wicked a man, as ye woulde haue thought

Aet. 4. 5. 6. he had bene vtterly past recoverie : and yet was he one of Gods chosen. He was marked out afore hande from his mothers wombe to bee an Apostle : and yet notwithstanding hee seemed not to be of Gods Church, but rather an vtter enimie to it. Neverthelater God condemned

b. 9. him when he did beat him downe, and ridde him of the pride wherewith he was inflamed before, and made him in that case as a poore flau. That burthen was verie heauie to him, and it was a condemnation to him : yea, but yet was it to his welfare. It was meete that the same pride of his shoulde be subdued and beaten downe, by force. Ye see then how it was a healthfull condemnation, but yet was it of a man vtterly estrangned from God, & which seemed to be quite past hope of recoverie. Now after that Saint Paule was once condemned after that fashion, and therby brought into the folde of Gods flocke,

2. Co. 12. b. 7. so as he became a sheepe, yea and therwithall also a shephearde, & was not onely one of the lambes of Iesus Christ, but also a shephearde of his flocke : yet behoued it him to be condemned againe. As howe ? God buffeted him. For hee sayth that God gaue Satan leaue too giue hym buffers, as it were in way of reproche, to the intent hee shoulde not exalt himselfe by reason of the highnesse of the Reuelations which God had giuen him, and it behoued him too haue that counterpoyson too drive out the poyson of pride, and to keepe him from it. Thus we see in Saint Paules person, that there are twoo maners of condemning which are to oour welfare. VVee see the like in this present place, where Jobs frendes bee condemned to their owne saluation. For thereby God openeth them the gate, and sheweth them that they maye hope for pardon, if they come too him with true repentence. But yet doth he draw backe from them, so as hee commeth not familiarly vnto them as he did to Job, nether graunteth he them accessse, and entrance vnto him, but by the meane that is expressed heere : that is to wit, that Job shoulde make intercession for them. Heere therefore we see two diuerse examples of Gods mercie. And although he handle men after diuerse fashions : yet must wee alwayes consider that hee procureth the welfare of those whom he hath not vtterly forsaken. And thereby we be taught to take all the corrections paciently whiche God sendeth. And although he seeme not too handle vs as his children, but to take vs as straungers : yet let vs nor ceasse to hope that he will pitie vs at length, & turne the condemnation whiche wee shall haue indured for a time, to our benefite and soulehealth. Now although we cannot lay forth all that is spoken heere concerning Sacrifices : yet must we note in one worde, that God in no time receyued men to mercie without sacrifices. And that was to betoken that if we will obteyn forgiuenesse of our sinnes, wee must haue recourse too the Sacrifice that was offered vp once for all for our redemption. For so long as Iesus Christ is not the meane betweene God and vs : we must continue accursed, forlorne, and hopelesse. Beholde, God being the welspring of all righteousnesse, sheweth himself an enimie of all sinne. But sin dwelleth in vs : therefore must God needs be at open warre with vs, and his vengeance must light vpon vs, yea and tarye vpon vs for euer : and there is no shift to scape from it, but by resorting to the Sacrifice whereby we haue beeene once reconcyled vnto him. And therefore let vs marke, that wee bee so much the lesse to be excused nowadyses, after that Christ hath suffered his death and passion, if we thinke to be quit before God by any other meane, than by the clensing which Christ hath made, [or for any other cause] than for that hee hath made satisfaction for vs, to discharge vs of the condemnation of death wherein we were. Then if we seeke to obteyne mercie, (as we haue need to do, and as which is the onely meanes wherby for vs to come vnto God) wee must always bear in minde the death and passion of our Lorde Iesus Christ, who is the sacrifice of our redemption and attonement.

Epb. 2. c. 14. 40 VVhen we go this way too woorke, let vs not doubt but that inasmuch as our Lorde hath shewed himselfe pitiful towarde such as offended in the time of the figuies of the lawe, yea and extended his mercie to those that were not the bodie of his [peculiar] people : hee will also receyue vs at this day, seeing that the Gospell is published thoro the whole worlde, and that he hath made a common league as well with the Gentiles, as with the lewes, so as there is no more any w<sup>t</sup> to put difference betwixt them. Let vs not doubt (I say) but that if we haue recourse vnto God by meanes of the sayd Sacrifice : he will preuent vs, to the intent that hauing obteyned fauor at his hande, we may be assured of our saluation.

Now let vs fall downe before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our faults, praying him too clenze vs more and more from them, and that whensoever we bee rebuked by him, he will therwithall make vs too feele his fatherly goodnesse, so as wee may haue whereof to take comfort in our aduersities, and not bee greeued though hee beginne too chastize vs, and in the meane while spare the wretched vnbeleeuers : knowing that by that meanes hee declarath too vs, that seeing hee hath chosen vs to himselfe, hee will not haue vs too perishe. And therefore [let vs pray him] that hee suffer not his roddes to be unprofitable to vs, so as we shoulde abyde still hardened in oure sinnes : but that hee wyll drawe vs to him throughly, that we may with all lowlinesse acknowledge our sinnes, and bee sorie for them in our heartes : yea and also protest before men how much we be bound vnto his mercie, to the end that our neighbours may be edified by vs, and one of vs draw another to the glorifying of him in all our whole life : and for the doing hereof, it may please him to stirre vp true, &c.

The.clix.Sermon, which is.the thirde vpon the.xlij.Chapter.

This Sermon is yet still vpon the eight verse, and then vpon the Text insuing.

9. Then Eliphaz the Themanite, and Baldad the Suhite, and Sophar the Naamathite, vvent and did as God had commaunded : and the Lorde receyued the face of Job.
10. And the Lorde turned the captiuitie of Job vwhen he prayed for his freendes, and he blissted the latter state of Job morethan the first.
11. And al his brethren, and al his sisters camevnto him, and all they that had bin of his acquaintance before : and they eate vvith him in his house, and had compassion of him, and comforted him, of all the aduersitie vwhich the Lord had caused to come vpon him : and hereceyued of eche of them a peece of siluer, and of ech of them an ornament of golde.
12. And the Lorde blissted the latter state of Job more than the first, insomuch that hee had. xiiij. thousand sheepe, six thousand Camels, a thousand yoke of oxen, & a thousand Sheeasse.
13. Also he had seuen sonnes and three daughters.
14. And he called the name of one, Iemima , and the name of another, Kezia : and the name of the thirde, Kerenhapuk.
15. And there vvere not founde more fayrer vvomen in all the Countrey, than Jobs daughters : and their father gauethem inheritance among their brethren.
16. And after these things, Job liued a hundred and fortie yeates, and he savv his sonnes and his sonnes sonnes vnto the fourth generation.
17. And he died aged and full satisfied vvith dayes.

Ee haue scene howe God in rebuking Jobs freends, would not leaue them hopelesse, but calid them to repentance by telling them that hee woulde heare them, and haue pitie vpon them. And so ye see that corrections are profitable too vs, when God shetteth not the gate agaynst vs , but sheweth vs that he is readie to recyue vs to mercie . For otherwise what should it boote vs to be conuictid of our sinnes ? VVe should be drowned in dispaire, if we toke not hold of Gods mercie : and so shoulde wee neuer bee touched with true earnestnesse to repente vs of our euill doings, but rather wexe hardhearted, so as we should chafe vpon the brydle, and there should be none amendment in vs. Therfore let vs marke well, that God worketh men a singular benefite, when after his causing of them to feele theyr owne naughtinesse, hee sheweth them that yet notwithstanding they shall obteyne fauour if they seeke it. But heerewithall we haue scene also, that God commaunded those men to bring their sacrifices to Job, to the end that he should pray for them : and that was too humble them. For although God sheweth himselfe gentle and welminned towardes vs : yet haue we neede that he should partly shew himselfe hard to be intreated of vs. Yea and that is to make vs haue a disliking of our sinnes : for often times it seemeth sufficient to vs to haue giuen one good sigh and away(as we commonly say in our tongue)and so we do as it were but dally with God. Repentance ought to make vs vtterly dismayd, and it ought to strike vs with feare whē we cosider Gods wrath , which is able to ouerwhelme vs vtterly. VVe thinke not vpon that, but wee passe ouer it, as we would passe ouer whote burning coles as they say. In this respect it is good and profitable for vs, that our Lorde should as it were reyne vs short, and shew vs that there is yet still some naughtinesse lurking in vs, the which it standeth vs in hande too perceyue better. Then Gods afoording of so large penywoordes of his mercies vnto men, is to the intent they should alwayes bee the more humbled, and cal to mind the faults which they haue committed. That therfore is the reason why it is said in this text, that Job should pray for those that bad offendid. But yet notwithstanding, it is not to be doubted, but that as well by the sacrifices as by jobs person , God ment too shewe that men haue neede of some meane or Mediator, to make them way to him, and to cause them to finde fauour according as we see, that in the law, God had orin the name of all the people, and that all men else should d.17. stande aloofe, acknowledging themselues vnoworthie to preache neere the presence of God. For that was to betoken, that without a Mediator to go in vnto God on oure behalfe, it shoulde neuer bee lawfull for vs to pray vnto him : and good right also is it that wee shoulde bee hilde scorne of and shette out . Nowe then Job hilde haere the roome and office of a Preest when hee made intercession for his freendes : but hee tooke it not vpon him of his owne head ; for that had beene to great presumption in him. It behoued him to sewe vnto God for [other mennes] pardon, and yet coulde not hee himselfe come thither withoute a Mediator and Aduocate : and howe then coulde hee haue obteyned grace for all the rest, if God had not inioyned him that charge ? And so as touching the present act, God appoynted Job too bee a Preest, and it behoued him so to be. For (as the Apostle sayeth) no man ought to take that honour vpon him , sauing he that is appoynted by God : and such a one is a true and lawfull Preest, like as Iesus Christ himselfe was, who thought hee mayster in the Churche, and the heade of men and Angelles , and sitteth in the glorie of God his father : did yet notwithstanding not thrust in himselfe, but was called therenvnto with a solemne othe by him that sayde too him, I haue sworne and will not repent, thou art a Preest for ever after the order of Mel-

Heb.5.b. 6.

Then let vs marke well that whereas Job is set foorth here here for a Preest : it is to the ende that wee should gather thereof , that whensoeuer we haue to seeke forgiuenesse of our sinnes, euery of vs must not thrust forth himselfe without hauing any better meane : but consider that it is the office of Iesu Christ to giue vs accessse, and to open vs the gate, and to bring vs to the presence of god his father, to the end we may be heard there, and that the throne of Maiestie may not be terrible but amyable to vs. Now if this were done in the time of the lawe , yea and euen among those to whom God communicated not himselfe so familiarly : what shall we do in these dayes when we haue a full declaration that Iesu Christ is the only Aduocate which maketh intercession for vs, to the intent that oursutes may be well receyued ? And heerein appeareth the vnthankefulnesse of the worlde. For what hath beene the cause of seeking so many Aduocates and Pastrones , and that every man hath had a seuerall deuotion to bring himselfe in vnto God, but because men haue not knowne the office of our Lorde Iesu Christ ? So then let vs marke, that whensoeuer any of vs offendeth , hee must not steppe rashly to the heavenly throne, but come thither by the meanes of him that is appoynted for the purpose. And then are we sure that God will not shake vs off, for we haue his promise , whiche cannot deceyue vs. But if wee come thither geerishly or at aduenture, it shall not boote vs awhitte. In like case is it with the Sacrifices that are spoken of heere : For the prayers were neuer heard without the Sacrifice. And why? For God intended to shewe that of good right men are vnworthie to come vnto him , because all haue deserued death, and therefore that their comming thither should be but their destruction. Therefore all they that euer minded to obteyn fauour , haue brought some Sacrifices with them, too confesse that they were in daunger of Gods iudgement, & that they could not be deliuered otherwys than by Sacrifice.

The verie Heathen men haue also followed the same : but they vnderstode not to what ende : [and therfore] it was but onely a witnesse agaynst themselues. Nesuerthelesse it was Gods will to leaue a president through the whole worlde , whereby men shoulde acknowledge that there was nothing but damnation in themselues, and that they could not be ridde of it, except their sinnes were blotted out by making some amedes. But nowe haue we the truth of it reuelled vnto vs in the Gospell : which is, that as oft as we pray before God, wee must haue our recourse too the death and passion of oure Lorde Iesu Christ : for we cannot otherwise be reconciled vnto him, and therefore our prayers must be besprinkled with the bloud which he did shed to wash away our spottes. Thus ye see howe we may become acceptable vnto God, notwithstanding that of good right he be our mortall enimie, and that as we haue made warre vnto him , so his vengeance and curse lie vpon vs, that is to wit, by comming vnto him with the Sacrifice that was offered by our Lorde Iesu Christ, and by applying the same to our vse, to the intent that we & our prayers may be blissted and throughly accepted of God : for then will hee not sayle too deceyue vs intoo fauour. How be it, it is to be noted here, that whereas God sayth to the end I do no follie vntoo you, (for so is it woorde for woerde in the text:) that maner of speech woulde bee somewhat with the hardest. But if

Psa.18.d.57 wee marke what is written in the eighteenth Psalme, wee Leu.26.d.23 shall haue a plaine and easie declaration of this saying.

24. It is sayde that God will handle men according as hee findeth them . VVith the frowarde (sayeth hee) I will deale frowardly. This may seeme verie strange : neuerthelesse, it proueth not that God chaungeth his purpose or is like vntoo vs : but onely importeth that wee shall finde God to bee a rough ryder to a rough horse (as the prouerbe sayth.) For if we bee stuppeorne and stiffe-necked, so as wee will not bowe : God will come vpon vs with maine blowes of the beetle. Then it might seeme vntoo vs , that God is terrible and feerce. According therefore as wee finde God too bee, and as wee conceyue him too bee in our fancies when hee stryketh vpon vs : such a one is hee sayde too bee, althothe no chaunge can light vpon his Maiestie. As muche is to be sayde of this text . It is sayde to the end I do no follie with you : as though our Lorde shoulde say, too the ende that I handle you not according too your follie and frowardnesse : for the woorde importeth that also:

Too the intent then that I execute not my vengeance vpon you, that is to say , to the intent I handle you not after suche fashion as you haue deserued : looke that ye go to my seruant Job. This is according to that which I haue sayde alreadie : namely that forasmuch as Iobs freends hauing knowledge of their offences were not yet sufficienly subdued : God was faine too discouer their shame further , and too make them perceyue that if hee shoulde handle them as they were worthie, it woulde be a terrible dealing too them : and therefore that when Job came as a meane betwixt them with his prayers, then he woulde be at one with them. And therewithall their obedience is declared, in that they did as God bad commaunded them. And heerein we see howe men are chaunged when God speakest to them effectually, not only by making the heare his voyce with their eares, but also by making them too receyue it into their harts. For before that time Iobs frends had taken him for a reprobate, and gaue iudgement vpon him without admitting any excuse. They spake lustily agaynst him as though he had bin but some sillie worme of the earth , or some vyler thing than a worme. But nowe they come to him, yea euen with intreatance. For god hath bereft them of the pridy that blinded them before. Lo then what chaunge followeth when wee bee humbled before God, and that hee hath so spoken in our hearts, as we knewe what wee bee. For there is nothing that keepeth vs from walking in feare, and from vtter abacing of our selues, but that we bee sotted with a foolish ouerweening, to thinke our selues too be that which we be not. Therfore God must be faine to teach vs . For all the men in the worlde cannot mend this foolish pride w<sup>t</sup>rew with we bee puffed vp, till God haue put to his hande. But besides that Iobs frendes had forgotten the pride wherewith they had erewhyles beeene caried away, they did also shewe theyr repentance in obeying God : and in verie deede the true frute that sheweth the roote to bee good , which otherwise should lie hidde in the heart, is that we indeuer too obey Gods ordinaunce. And that also is the cause why it is sayde in the Actes. Men and brethren , what shall wee doo? Act.2.f.37. VVhen Saint Peter had as it were t.<sup>l.</sup>undered agaynst those that had erewhyles despysed oure Lorde Iesu Christ : it is sayde that they beeing wounded in theyr heartes, and pricked inwardly with remorse, said what shal we do? They offered themselues vnto God, to followe whatsoeuer hee shoulde commaunde them. Therefore wee see the like frute of Repentance in this Text : For Iobs frends vpon knowledge and putting away of the fonde ouerweening wherwith they had beene hild before, come and do all that God willed them. And so whensoeuer wee bee throughly humbled before God, so as we be displeased with our selues: we shal also haue a willingesse and desire to submit our selues too Gods woorde : For

For it is one peece of our ouerweening, to do the things that we haue ymagined in our owne braine. And when wee will needes bee ouerwise, wee cannot obey God : but when we be vterly bereft of all pride, then we know that God ought to haue authoritie to tel vs what is good for vs to doo, and that there is nothing else for vs to doo, but to submit our selues without any gainsaying. Nowe it is added immediately, that God receyued the face of Job, and turned his captiuitie, or was turned at his repentance, when he prayed for his freendes. Seeing it is so that God regarded the face of Job, and accepted his prayer, forso-

11.12.f.24. ver be refuzed, nor wee neyther if we come to God hys father by his meanes, holding euermore the way and furtherance that hee hath giuen vs ? Beholde, Job was a poore man, and euen entering into the high way to blasphemie God : and although hee did holde himselfe in pacience in the winding vp, yet had he such pangues as made him to fling ouer the feeldes, insomuch that he offended God greeuously, as I haue declared heeretofore : and yet for all that, when God inioyned him that office of praying, he heard him : not onely for himselfe, but also for straungers, yea and for such as had beene his enimies, and were as good well neere as separated from God. For they had viterly peruerted his woorde, and beaten downe and destroyed the hope of the endlesse life that is to come, as I haue sayde afore : and yet notwithstanding, Job obteyneth grace for them. Nowe if it besayde that God made that thing ayayable which was but a little dimme shadowe : what shall bee done nowe that hee hath appoynted his owne onely sonne to bee the Preest, and commaunded him, not too offer vp Goates and Calues or sheepe, but to offer vp both his bodie and soule in Sacrifice ? Seeing then that the Sonne of God hath in his owne person offered himselfe for our redemption, and to do away all our sinnes, and ceaseth not to make intercession for vs still : shoulde we doubt of obteyning forgiuenesse for his sake, or of beeing alwayes receyued with all louingesse and fauour at Gods hande ? But (as I haue touched alreadie) the naughtynesse of the worlde sheweth it selfe in this, that men can not content themselues with one mediatour alone. The Papists runne seeking to their Heesaints and Sheesaints, to be their Patrones and Aduocates. And what is the cause thereof ? For that they yeeld not so much worship vnto Iesus christ, as to acknowledge that he hath bought them with his death and passion. They can wel ynough call him sonne of God, & Redeemer : but they acknowledge him not for their Aduocate, neyther flee they too him for succour : they knowe not what it is to pray too him, they heare no tydings of it among them : And on our side, do we our dutie as becommeth vs ? I speake of those that are duely taught. For as oft as wee shoulde pray vntoo God : the euerlasting Sacrifice whereby redemption hath beene purchased for vs, ought too come to our remembrance and before our eyes. But we never thinke vpon it, but at a glaunce : and there are manie so grossie and beastly, that although they ought to haue their cares deafe with hearing that Iesus Christ is our Aduocate : yet can they not discerne betweene God and oure Lorde Iesus Christ, insomuch that when they should call vpon the father in the name of our Lorde Iesus Christ, they wote not whither there bee any Aduocate that maketh intercession for vs or no. But it is no manuell though our Lord do oftentimes so dazle mens cies to the ende to turne them away from the meane of furtherance which he hath giuen them by his worde. For they be turned away by their own maliciousnesse, and haue shet the gate agaynst themselues, that they might haue none accesse vnto God to call vpon him : according also as wee knowe that there is no opening, except wee haue Iesus Christ for our spokesman, whome they haue forsaken.

And that is, because the diuell hath at all tymes so laboured to put forth sondē ymaginations to carie away men hither and thither. But let vs keepe our selues from gadding out : and rather sithe wee see that God hath heard men by meanes of their Sacrifices, so that the Preestes of the lawe entered not in vaine into the Sanctuarie that was made with mans handes, and was corruptible, when as they brought no better thing with the than the bloud of a beast : let vs be sure that nowe our Lorde Iesus Christ will make vs too finde God pitifull and fauourable to-wardes vs, so as we shall be receyued to mercie, doubtlesse if our prayers be grounded vpon the Sacrifice which hee hath offered, and that wee acknowledge howe it belongeth to him to carie woorde for vs, and to cause vs too be heard. Heerewithall we haue also to marke howe it is sayde heere, that God made Jobs captiuitie to turne, or was turned at his repentance : for so may the wordes bee taken. But the playnest translation is, that he turned Jobs captiuitie, so as the anguish wherein he was, was taken away : or else, his captiuitie, that is to say, his cattell and substance [that had beene taken away from him] were restored againe. But howsoever it was, it betokeneth that in the ende God had pitie vpon his seruant. Yea and it is purposelē expressed to haue come to passe, when Job prayed for his freendes, that is to say, for those that had persecuted him, as we haue seene afore. And heerin we see that if wee loue our enimyees, and procure their welfare and saluation : it shall bee to our owne benefite and pro-fite, and God will make the blissing to returne vpon vs.
VVe be diuerte tymes afraide least wee shoulde bee too gentle and kinde hearted when men haue offendid vs :
and this diuelish prouerbe, that if a man play the sheepe, the woolfe will eat him vp, is to much practised. That is the cause why we be so wedded to our owne reuenge, when men haue troubled vs or done vs any wrong. It seemeth to vs that in forgiuing, we bee layde open to all reproche, and that our enimyees will take the more boldnesse at it agaynst vs. But it behoueth vs to let all those fancies go : for God hath taken the charge of vs himselfe, and hath giuen vs a good Shephearde, euen oure Lorde Iesus Christ, who hath promised too keepe vs. And furthermore let vs marke well, that when wee pray for such as vexē vs, the same blissing will light vpon vs. If it please God that it take place : it is verie well : whereas they were enimyees before, nowe they shall bee our brethren.
And if they continue wilfull in their malice, yet will our Lorde make all the requestes to redounde to our selues, which we shall haue made for them. Thus ye see why it is purposelē sayde, that God looked mercifully vpon Job, when he bad prayed for those that had so misused him, as we haue seene. And so it behoueth vs to call to minde howe Saint James sayth, you haue heard of the pacience of Job, & seene what ende and issue God gaue him. Now he sheweth vs that the afflictions which god sendeth vppon his children, last but a while, and that the end of the is right happie, so as it is farre better for them to be so afflicted for a time, than to liue alwayes at their ease. For if God should spare them to much, there were not that ma-which would not fall asleepe in this worlde : VVe should no more knowe what obedience were : the lustes of our flesh wold play the restife iades : and we woulde thinke vpon

upon nothing but this present transitorie life. Therefore let vs vnderstande, that when God afflicteth his faithfull ones, first it is not of purpose to presse them to the vttermoske : for hee knoweth what they bee able too beare: 1.C.10.c.13 and Saint Paule sayeth accordingly, that forasmuch as God is faythfull, he will not suffer vs to be tempted beyonde that which we be able to beare. And furthermore he sheweth in the ende, that we haue cause to wish to be so beaten with Gods scourges, according as David saith, Lorde it was good for me that thou didst chastise me. In somuch that we may alwayes glorie in our aduersities and corrections. That is the thing which it behoueth vs too marke in this streyne. For it is not for Iobs sake that this was written, that God blissted his latter state more than his first, that he doubled his goodes and substance whiche were verie great afore, that hee gaue him sonnes and daughters, & that he lengthned his life, so as he saw the children that came of his owne race vnto the fourth generation, after he had seene himselfe at so lowe an ebb. True it is that here the holy ghost ment too leaue a memorall of the gracious goodnesse that God shewed vpon the person of Job: howbeit, that was not for his instruction, but for ours. Then is it not without cause that Saint James hath set vs downe this selfsame mirrour, saying: my freends, true it is that it is a hard and troublesome thing to kepe pacience when men are tormented: it is agaynst their nature. Howbeit, in the ende God turneth all things in such wise too their welfare, as they perceyue it was much better for them to haue bene so afflicted, than to haue beeene to much & so tenderly borne withall and cockered. To be short, whē soever we are troubled with aduersitie, I meane not onely of body, but also when we haue such hartbytings as set vs in a chafe, and tempt vs to dispayre, or to carpe against God: let vs bethink vs of the things which we haue read of Job and of his pacience. For if wee compare his aduersities with all the aduersities that we be able to beare: we shall certenly finde that in him God ment to set oute a myrrour that passed al the temptations and troubles that dayly befall the Godly. See how Job was on the one side spoyled of all his substance: hee had beeene rich, and as a Prince in his Countrey: he is vtterly bereft of all things, and hath neither house nor any thing else left him: besides this, yee see he was also bereft of his children: hys wife spoyted him and was agaynst him: As for his bodie, behold, it was as a rotten carion, such a one as men would be loth to looke vpon, according as we haue seene him complaine that his skinne cleaved too his bones, yea and how it hath beeene sayd that he scraped of the rotteness of his fleshe [with a potsherd.] This was a terrible sight, but yet were not the things that Job suffered both in his goodes, and in his children, and in his wife, and in hys bodie, the cheefe things that he indured. All those were nothing in comparison of the anguishe that hee abode, when hee sawe that God was agaynst him: and that also is the thing whereat he was greeued when hee made his complaintes, saying: What nowe? Why doth not God take me away? Why am I not rased out of the worlde? Must I linger here after this sort? And seeing I am but a poore frayle creature, why doth God presse me so greeuously? Job then was in great trouble, when he saw that God was his aduersarie partie, and that he on his side wist not why. Now seeing it is so: it must not greeue vs if we be meanly afflicted, and that God chastise vs according to our infirmitie, euerie man in his owne behalfe: wee must not thinke it straunge: but let vs resort to this storie which is written for our learning, and therevpon haue an eye to the ende. For if we looke no further but too the extremitie wherein Job was during the time that God persecuted him: alas wee shall bee vtterly dismayde, and there is none of vs all but he shall vtterly quayle, saying: What booreth it a man to serue God, seeing that such haue walked in his feare, are most vnfortunate? But when we looke vpon the ende: that is the thing wherin we haue wherewith to comfort our selues: namely, first of all (as I haue sayde) bycause the afflictions of Gods children last but a while: and secondly they serue them for [salues & ]medicines: and [moreover] the end of the is alwayes happie: insomuch that they haue euer cause to glorifie God, not onely when he deliuereth them, but also bycause he mortifyeth all their wicked lustes: and also therein they haue a better confirmation of the doctrine, in that whereas our Lorde Iesus Christ is the lively Image of all the faythfull children of God, they bee made conformable too him, as Saint Paule declareth in the eight to the Romaynes, that in all our aduersities wee Ro.8.f.28. be shaped like to the Image of our Lord Iesus Christ, who is the eldest sonne in the house of God. And truly if we looke but onely vpon the crosse of Iesus Christ, it is cursed by Gods owne mouth: we shal see nothing there but shame and terror: and to be short, it will seeme that the verie gulfe of hell is open to swallow vp Iesus Christ. But whē we ioyne his resurrection to his death, behold wherwith to comfort vs, beholde wherwith to asswage al our sorrowes, to the ende we be not ouersorrowfull whensoeuer it shall please God to afflict vs. And this was purposedly fulfilled in our Lord Iesus Christ, to the intent we should knowe that this was not written for any one person onely: but to the intent that all of vs shoulde understand, that the sonne of God wil make vs partakers of his life if we lie with him, and partakers of his glorie, if we bear all the shames and aduersities which it shall please God to lay vpon our shoulders, according also as S. Paule speaketh of it in another place. VVee see then that the cause why this is reherced to vs, is that we should not be vtterly dismayde, when wee see that God afflicteth vs, nor conceyue any such sorow as should shet vp our harts and hold vs prisoners so as we might receive no comfort: 40 but that we should alwayes haue an eye to the end which God hath promised to his children, according as he hath shewed by effect, as well in Job, as also in David, and others, but cheeflyest in our Lorde Iesus Christ, who is the true and cheefe patterne of all the faythfull. True it is that it doth not comonly fal out that God doubleth his benefites towrdes such as haue beeene afflicted, so as it may be seene that they be fyercher than they were before, & that they haue children and offspring, and all that is to bee desired to the worldwarde. This is not alwayes seene: 50 for God handleth vs not after one egall rate: he knoweth what is fitte for every man, and it behoueth vs to frame our selues to receyue our portion in suchwise as it shall please him to deale it vnto vs, as at a householders hande which knoweth well what is meete for his household. But howsoever the worlde go, it behoueth vs to take it for a generall rule, that God will not onely bring our afflictions to an ende, but also make them to turne to our welfare, so as we shall perceyue that he forga vs not, at such time as he afflicted vs, but rather shewed himselfe continually a father towrdes vs, in that he suffered vs not too fall too fast asleepe in this worlde. As for the temporall blessings, well may wee take them also as God sendeth them: howbeit let vs haue an eye to the principal: which is, that if there were nothing else but that we bee confirmed in Gods goodnesse, that wee haue the greater assurance of his ayde, and that our fayth is alwayes exercised when we be afflicted: is not that verie much? The man that scarce knewe how auayable Gods fauor is to helpe vs vs at our need , doth in affliction see that God strength-neth him in such wise by his holy spirite, that he beareth the affliction meekly: & when he is deliuered, the knoweth he that god did put to his hand: & therupon he gathe-reth that seeing god hath assisted him for one brüt, he wil neuer faile him after. If we had none other thing, but that on the one side we see the help that God giueth vs : and secondly that he worketh in vs by his holy spirit, to the intent we should not quale: and finally sheweth vs by experience that he is redy to helpe vs at all times: I say if we had no more but that : were it not an inestimable profite ? But there is yet more : which is , that God maketh vs to per-ceiue our infirmities which we knew not before: & ther-by we be the more prouoked to cal vpō him, as though he had whetted vs therenvnto. And on the other side, whereas we had taken the corrections to come by haphazard, we be taught to receyue them as at his hand , & to make our profit of the. And again, whē we be so striken downe we be the better dispozed to seke for the heauenly life: for such as royst it out to the worldward, do turne away frō God.

Contrariwise, when we bee ouermaistred, and God hath cast vs downe to the ground, and we be brought so lowe & feeble as we wote not where to becom: it is to the end to make vs to cleave vnto him, and to taste better of the spirituall welfare that is prepared for vs. Then if we had none other things than these, ought we not to know that the things which are written of Job are performed in vs, and that we haue a true example of them? Therfore let vs suffer God to handle vs, and to deale his benefites to vs as he himselfe shall see good. But howsoeuer we fare, let vs assure our selues that the end shal alwayes be happy. And truly if there were none other thing but this, that afflictions serue to bring vs to the glorie of our lord Iesus christ, and that whē we be once taken out of this world, we shall be in companie with the sonne o<sup>f</sup> God and his Angels : ought we not to honor the? And although they be sharpe and hard to our flesh : yet notwithstanding haue we not whereof to reioyce continually, and to yeeld thankes vnto God, specially when he deliuereth vs out of our present miseries? Howbeit, forasmuch as all could not be discharged at length , and it is ynough to haue a short summe of the things that are sayd here : I forbear to speake now of the bestie of Job's daughters: for in effect the scripture met to betoke, that God made him to prosper in such wise to the worldward, as we may see with our eyes that he fau-red him, yea euen beyond the commō rate. And let vs not thinke it straunge, that God woul<sup>d</sup> in those dayes vnto his loue towards the faithfull, by earthly and transitorie prosperitie. For the heauenly life was not then so perfectly discouered, as it is nowadyses by the Gospell. Iesus Christ was not yet manifested, who came downe hither to lif vs vp, and clothed himselfe with our flesh, to shew that God dwelleth in vs, and hath ioyned vs to his glorie & immortalitie. These things were not yet come to passe, and therefore it behoued the faithfull to be handled partly like little children. And that is the cause why that when the auncient fathers are spoken of in the scripture , it is purposely said that God blissted them in their offspring, in their cattell, in their possessions, and in such other things, and specially in length of life. And why so ? It was for the to be helped by those meanes in wayting till the heauenly life were discouered vnto vs, vnto whom our Lord Iesus Christ hath opened the gate of Paradise by his comming, to make vs mount vp aloft with him. Then if God make not vs nowe to prosper so much to the worldward, wee must not be greeued at it: for our state is not worse thā the state of the auncient fathers: we haue a farre better recompence which ought to comfort vs. For example, let vs take but only that which is said cōcerning long life. God in his law hath highly esteemeed the long life that he gaue to the faithfull. And yet notwithstanding many vnbelee-uers and vter reprobates haue liued long. Therefore we must not rest there, forasmuch as it is a benefite that may be cōmon as well to Gods enimies, as to his freends : It is not the souereine good thing, it is not the true & perfect happinesse: no, it cometh farre short of it. But we must also adde the second point : which is, that the fathers of old time knewe not yet so perfectly as wee do, that God had prepared the an heritage in heauē. True it is that they had some tast of it, & they had the same faith which we haue: but yet had they no such opening as we haue in our Lord Iesus Christ. Therfore it was meet that God should let the liue long, and make them to profit [in knowledge] by lōg experiēce in the world. Lo why Job liued long time. Now adayes our life is shorter, & that is because Iesus Christ is appeared vnto vs, & hath shewed vs that we are but straūgers in this worlde, that wee might runne to the heritage which is purchased by his bloud. The thing that was then but in shadowes, was to be confirmed by vniſle benefites.

But now we haue the substance : the shadowes & figures are past: we haue the bodie of the in our Lord Iesus christ: Col.2.c.17. therfore we must be contented with whatsouer God giueth vs, and referre our selues wholly to his guiding. And furthermore let vs vnderstand, that we must be cōtentend with the life that we haue liued, whēsoever it shal please God to take vs out of the world. True it is that when the scripture speaketh so of Job & Abrahā, that they died old men and full satisfied with dayes: it is to expresse the tem-porall blissing that I haue spoken of. But howsoeuer they faire, neither Job, nor Abrahā, nor such other like would Gen.25.a.7. ever haue bin satisfied with liuing in this worlde , if they had not aimed at a better & more excellent end. Ye see the how it was requisit that God should prolong their life: to the end to give them the longer experiance of his goodnesse : which thing is not nowe so requisite for vs, which haue a more large declaration of Gods fatherly loue towards vs. Therfore it behoueth vs to be satisfied with our life, and to dispose our selues to die when it shall please God, so as we may go hence with a glad hart, & not with gnashing of our teeth as the vnbeleeuers do. For if they had liued a hundred thousand yeres, yet would they faintary here beneath stil: for they haue none other hope but of this present life, & it seemeth to the that death dispat-cheth all. And that is the cause why they are neuer redy to go out of the world. Contrariwise the fathers of old time were wont to confirme their faith by the length of the life which God gaue the: and therwithall disposed theselues to depart whensoeuer God listed to take them hence too himself. And what ought we on our side to do nowadys?
I haue told you alredie that we must not loke to liue long to take knowledge of gods fatherly loue therby: for if we liued but three dayes in this world, it were inough to giue vs a tast of Gods goodness & mercie, and to confirme our faith. For seeing that our Lord Iesus Christ hath died and is risen again, we need no long time in this world to know that God is our father, and that we be sure of our saluation. Therfore as soone as he giueth vs knowledge of the truth of his Gospell, let vs alwayes be readie to die, assuring our selues that he hath adopted vs for his children, and that he will shew himselfe our father both in life and death. Ye see then that we must alwayes bee satisfied with life, seeing that God hath giue vs so good a pledge of his loue in our Lorde Iesus Christ, and we must not desire to haue our life prolonged here, to the end to haue a larger confirmation thereof. VVherfore let vs continually pray him, that hauing guided vs cōtinually with his holy spirit, he

he will draw vs [hence] to himselfe: and that wee may come thither full satisfied, bicause he hath nourished and mainteyned vs, and shewed vs that our true life and euerlasting happiness is prepared for vs aboue.

Now let vs fal down before the face of our good God, with acknowledgement of our sinnes, praying him too vouchsafe to touch vs with them more and more, that we may come to him with true repentance to frame our sel-

ues after his righteousness: and that forasmuch as we be wretched sinners, and wrapped and ouerwhelmed in so many temptations as it is impossible for vs to discharge our selues of the hundred part of our dutie, it may please him to ayde vs with his holy spirite, and too beare with our infirmities and imperfekteions, vntill he haue quite & cleane rid vs of them. And so let vs al say, Almighty God heauenly father, &c.

All prayse, honour and thankes be ynto God.

¶ The prayer which master John Caluin made ordinarily before the beginning of his Sermons.

Let vs call vpon our good God and father, praying him too vouchsafe to turne away his face from the great number of faults and offences, vvh hereby vvee ceasse not too prouoke his vvrath against vs: and forasmuch as vve be too too vnworthe to appeare before his maestie, it may please him to looke vpon vs in the countenance of his vvelbeloued sonne our Lorde Iesus Christ, accepting the desert of his death and passion, for a full recompence of all our sinnes, that by meanes thereof he may like vwell of vs, and vouchsafe to inlighten vs by his spirit, in the vnderstanding of his vvord, and graunt vs the grace to receyue the same in true feare and humilitie, so as vve may be taught therby to put our trust in him, to serue and honour him by glorifying his holy name in all our life, & to yeeld him the loue & obedience vvhich faithful seruants ovve to their maisters, and childrē to their fathers, seing it hath pleased him to call vs to the nūber of his seruants & children. And let vs pray vnto him as our good master hath taught vs to pray, saying. Our father, &c.

The Prayer that Maiter John Caluin ordinarily made at the ending of his Sermons.

Let vs fall dovvne before the face of our good God, &c. (Here he addeth as the matter treated of in his sermon, giueth him occasion to require at Gods hand, and bicause the same chaungeth almost in euerie Sermon, it cannot here be specified.)
